provisions of the Greek CCP.⁴⁴ It would seem recommendable to establish institutions and procedures aimed at appropriate assistance for persons extradited and for their relatives, and it is obvious that Greece is far behind in doing so. One possible solution could be an NGO-based model of assistance.

2.3.4.2 As to statistics regarding extraditions, throughout the years 2005 to 2009, Greece executed 82 EAWs. Between 38–49% of persons sought did not consent to their extradition; the average time needed for the extradition of persons not having consented to extradition was 48 days.⁴⁵ To date, 10 Greek citizens have been extradited to be indicted abroad and serve the sentence in Greece; in four cases concerning alien residents, no return has been decided due to the fact that they were citizens of the issuing state; in one case return was impossible because the Greek authorities did not apply for it; in five cases the aliens were deemed non-residents and the EAW was executed unconditionally.⁴⁶

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1–2.3.5.4 Given the strong adherence in the EAW system to the institution of mutual recognition, judicial review tends admittedly to become rather weak (and more so if the issuing state's authority is a non-judicial one). Since, however, fundamental liberties and rights are at stake in criminal law matters, the standpoint that seeks legitimacy for such weakness through the argument that criminal court decisions have to be assimilated to freely circulating consumer goods, cannot be regarded as acceptable. This is so because orders pertaining to deprivation of freedom, as inherently resistant to any kind of commodification, cannot be normatively equated with rules applicable to consumer goods. In this regard even the exequatur in civil and commercial matters is of dubious legitimacy, especially when the sanctions are so severe that they must be equated to quasi criminal sanctions; the same holds even more true when genuine criminal sanctions are to be imposed. Therefore, we will subsequently highlight six points which provide some additional safeguards in the Greek legal order.

First, one substitute for the lacking judicial review may be found in refusal of execution when the alleged deed does not fall under the jurisdiction of the issuing state, and Greece has no such jurisdiction either. However, this would run contrary to the interpretation of the EAWFD by the Greek courts; according to the judicial interpretation, the courts may not control the substance of the case underlying an EAW which Greece has been requested to execute.⁴⁷

⁴⁴ Mouzakis 2012, p. 64.

⁴⁵ Togias 2013, p. 1154.

⁴⁶ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 101–102.

⁴⁷ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 71–72 and 150–152. See also under Sects. 2.3.1.1–2.3.1.2 above.

Secondly, by way of an analogous substitute, one may consider refusal of execution when a national is sought for execution of a sanction where either the act is not punishable in Greece or simply the sanction is not provided for as such in Greece (e.g. a certain type of internment in a workhouse conceived of as a form of security in the issuing state, but not existing in Greece as such).⁴⁸

Thirdly, along the same lines, one could request a more generous use of the human rights clause and thus the refusal to execute an EAW on the grounds of a potential violation of Art. 6 of the EU Treaty (Art. 1(3) of the EAW FD; Art. 1(2a') of the implementing Law No. 3251/2004). The standpoint of the Greek Supreme Court, which holds that these rights or the fairness of the procedure are not at stake when deciding on the execution of an EAW and that these become relevant only after execution,⁴⁹ is very narrow. In opposition to this, commentary is strongly in favour of taking principles laid down in instruments like the ECHR or the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) like the judgment in the *Soering*⁵⁰ case into consideration. In such a framework, detention conditions that violate Art. 3 ECHR could provide grounds to refuse execution.⁵¹

Fourthly, it was noted that an appeal against a decision to execute an EAW taken by the President of the Appeal Court is not permitted when the person sought has consented to the extradition. Whilst this is in accordance with the speedy nature of the procedure and the freedom of choice of the consenting person and thus complies with Art. 20(1) of the Constitution ('right to be heard'), Art. 6 of the ECHR, Art. 2 (1) of Protocol No. 7 to the ECHR and the ICCPR, the non-permissibility of a refusal to execute such decision, at least in exceptional cases, seems less justified. It is obvious that a decision is not to be executed in the case of invalid consent (e.g. the person sought consents without having a lawyer and without being e.g. informed about the real consequences of consent to waiving the specificity rule (Art. 34 (2) e'-f') of Law No. 3251/2004), despite the fact that this case is not expressly regulated in the law.⁵²

Fifthly, when an appeal is submitted (when the person sought has not consented to the extradition) but the appellant is absent when the court convenes, the Supreme Court will reject the appeal on the formal ground that it is 'unsupported' through the appellant's presence; such presence is indeed required according to Art. 501(1) CCP. This standpoint has, however, been strongly and persuasively contradicted by the minority opinion in Supreme Court Judgment No. 651/2011,⁵³ rejecting the ⁴⁸ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 87–90. If an alien is sought who is resident in Greece and who is a citizen of the issuing state, the link to the issuing state may lead Greece not to refuse to execute the EAW; see also above Sect. 2.3.4.1.

⁴⁹ See for instance AP 1303/2011, Poinika Chronika 2012: 494. See also Mouzakis 2012, p. 67.

⁵⁰ Soering v. the United Kingdom, 7 July 1989, Series A no. 161.

⁵¹ Togias 2013, p. 1161 and footnote 52. As to the impact of international human rights and protective legal means on the EAW, see also Vasilakakis 2006, p. 208. Critically to the conception of the notion of the EAW as an overreacting 'combat norm', see also Papacharalambous 2002.

⁵² Mouzakis 2012, pp. 63–64.

⁵³ AP 651/2011, Poinika Chronika 2012, p. 347.

application of this article. The argument is that the article in question has to do with genuine decisions taken after real trials and not with rulings issued by judicial units acting as mere councils (as in EAW cases), whereby publicity and orality are not followed as in trials. It is further pointed out in the minority opinion that rejection of the appeal significantly deteriorates the procedural status of the person sought also for another reason: it is not permissible to claim that the procedure is invalid, as normally possible for an appellant according to domestic law when the non-appearance of the appellant was due to ‘force majeure’ (Art. 341 CCP), because of the specific and accelerated procedure of the EAW.⁵⁴ Moreover, and according to the same minority opinion, even the appellant’s declaration that he/she ‘will not appear’ before the Supreme Court cannot always be interpreted as a waiver of the initially launched appeal. Such waivers must be made explicitly; tacit waivers are not recognised by the respective provisions of Art. 474(1) and 475(1) CCP. Finally, the presence of the appellant in and of itself adds nothing to the judicial procedure regarding the EAW: it is not matters of evidence but only complex juridical issues that are at stake at this stage. For all these reasons, the rejection of the appeal on formal grounds falls short of the requisite level of due protection of procedural rights.⁵⁵

Finally, a clear case of disproportionate deterioration of the procedural status of the person sought is the formalistic reference in Art. 22(1) of Law No. 3251/2004 to Art. 451(1) CCP as regards the procedure of appealing against the initial decision to execute an EAW. The latter provision requires the person sought to submit an appeal exclusively with the Appeal Court’s secretary within 24 hours after the issuing of the initial decision. Thus, the appeal becomes nearly impossible for a person in custody, since he/she is not permitted to address the director of the penal institution for that purpose, as it is provided for in principle according to Art. 474(1) CCP.⁵⁶ Additionally, this option is misleading: Art. 451 CCP presupposes that the appellant is not in custody. Finally, the disproportionate outcome of this option is evident from the fact that addressing the prison’s director is, according to the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court, allowed if the detainee intends to waive the right to appeal.⁵⁷

⁵⁴ Mouzakis 2012, pp. 62–63; Togias 2013, pp. 1162–1163.

⁵⁵ Mouzakis 2012, p. 63; Baltas 2014, p. 287. Contra AP 241/2013, Poinika Chronika 2014, pp. 286–287.

⁵⁶ Togias 2013, p. 1162, where, as to the rejection of the appeal as inadmissible, the author refers e.g. to AP 478/2011, Nomiko Vima 2011, p. 1005; see also AP 117/2013, Poinika Chronika 2014, p. 285. Regarding the narrow time limit of 24 hours for the appeal, see also the critique in Vasilakakis 2006, p. 208.

⁵⁷ Voulgaris 2014, p. 286. See also against the AP jurisprudence on this, Fytrakis 2006, pp. 219–220.

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

Amongst other challenges to constitutional rights in the context of EU criminal law, six issues will be briefly mentioned here.

First, the territoriality and the notion of the identity of the ‘same act’ (‘idem’) present significant problems as to a stable and foreseeable application of the EAW. According to Art. 11(g)i⁵⁸ of Law No. 3251/2004, Greece shall refuse execution if the act has been committed, even partly, on Greek soil; the optional ground of refusal has also here been recast as an obligatory one. This has been relevant to crimes committed through the Internet, trans-border crimes like cigarette smuggling and other forms of smuggling or drug trafficking, and they have been dealt with in a contradictory manner by the Greek courts. In some cases these have been considered as having been committed (partly) on Greek soil (which leads to a refusal of execution), whilst in others as not influencing the jurisdiction of the issuing state (which leads to execution of the EAW). Whereas the former interpretive option is in concordance with the spirit of the CJEU ruling in Gaetano Mantello, which also refers to Art. 54 of the Schengen Treaty and promotes the idem factum in lieu of the idem crimen approach,⁵⁹ the academic commentary has seen in the latter option a risk of enhancing what is already an overly extensive tendency to affirm execution of an EAW.⁶⁰ In the case of concurrence of more than one crime (and the same holds true for so-called ‘continuous crimes’, i.e. repetitious conduct of more or less the same kind, like more acts of theft, robbery or embezzlement), the point of departure remains their autonomy. Therefore, the Greek judicial authority shall require the urgent delivery of information from the issuing state as to whether the person sought had, even partly, committed separate act(s) of the ‘crime chain’ on Greek soil (according to Arts. 5 and 16 CC and Art. 19(2) of Law No. 3251/2004), in which case execution must be denied.⁶¹ Inherent in all the above constellations is the risk that the ‘wholeness’ of the criminal event is not taken under proper consideration as long as it is ‘chopped’ into pieces, whereby the complexity of the facts, the involvement of more persons and the differences in the procedural laws among the Member States may cause delays and undeserved harm for the accused. A reform at EU level seems unavoidable.⁶¹

⁵⁸ Cf. Case C-261/09 Mantello [2010] ECR I-11477, paras. 38–41.

⁵⁹ See also Togias 2013, pp. 1157–1161; Mouzakis 2012, pp. 65–67; AP 108/2013, Poinika Chronika 2013, pp. 468–469. These authors refer, respectively, to AP 1557/2012, AP 200/2011, AP 2006/2010 and the opposite (refusing the commission on Greek soil) AP 1074/2012, AP 678/2012, AP 994/2010, AP 810/2010. See also on territoriality AP 200/2011, Poiniki Dikaiosini 2011, pp. 579–581 and the respective remarks of Vrioni 2011, p. 582. In favour of the ‘idem factum’ conception as to the identity of the act, see AP 1/2011, Poinika Chronika 2011, pp. 501–504, with approving remarks of Anagnostopoulos 2011, pp. 504–505; see also Karaflos 2013, pp. 91–92.

⁶⁰ Vrioni 2011, p. 583.

⁶¹ This is correctly pointed out by Karaflos 2013, p. 97.

A second area of concern is whether an initial refusal of execution results in blocking the affirmation of a repeated EAW for the same person and deed. Since a clear provision is lacking in the Law, Art. 454 CCP applies per analogiam: in contrast to the final (i.e. irrevocable) judgment as to the substance of the case on which the EAW is based,⁶² there is no res judicata in extradition cases, because the substance is never examined at this stage. Thus, the affirmation of a repeated EAW remains possible, provided that it contains new facts.⁶³

The third point to note is that the requirement of specificity, i.e. the prohibition of being prosecuted or sentenced for an offence other than that for which surrender occurs, is dangerously undermined in Greece. Article 34 paras. (2)–(4) of Law No. 3251/2004 provide for exemptions from this principle, among which is the consent of the executing state after an application from the Appeals Court Prosecutor in this regard.⁶⁴

The fourth point concerns the finding in Supreme Court Judgment No. 1/2011 that where a sentence has in fact been served, this is no longer a prerequisite for denying the execution of the EAW; the Supreme Court interprets Art. 50 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (with regard to the ne bis in idem principle) as so indicating. However the issue cannot be considered as definitely settled.⁶⁵

Another point that has arisen is that minors under 13 are not criminally responsible in Greece. EAWs regarding such persons cannot be executed in Greece.⁶⁶

Last but not least, it is very important that EAWs are not unconditionally executed when human rights and discrimination issues arise in cases where the person sought may be further extradited via the issuing state to a third state of ambiguous democratic legitimacy. In Decision No. 1303/2011, the Supreme Court approved Germany's EAW request concerning a suspect for supporting DHKP-C (the acronym for 'Devrimci Halk Kurtuluş Partisi-Cephesi', meaning 'Revolutionary People's Liberation Party/Front') in Turkey under the condition of no further extradition to third countries (according to Art. 36(2) of Law. No 3251/2004). The minority of the judges in this decision proceeded to an interpretation that was more generous and distinctly protective of human rights; the minority judges called for a rejection of the request on the grounds of a lack of clarity of the accusations and because of the fact that they saw the acts ascribed to the suspect as intrinsically legitimate.⁶⁷

⁶² Whether the judgment is final on the substance is determined according to the legislation of the Member State in which the case has been tried and not according to the legislation of the executing state: Karaflos 2013, p. 92.

⁶³ Togias 2013, pp. 1163–1164.

⁶⁴ Karaflos 2013, p. 99.

⁶⁵ Cf. respectively Karaflos 2013, p. 100.

⁶⁶ Karaflos 2013, p. 93.

⁶⁷ See the majority and the courageous minority in this decision in AP 1303/2011, Poinika Chronika 2012, pp. 494–495 and 495–496, accordingly.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 According to the Greek Constitution, home, private and family life are inviolable; home searches are subject to law and carried out in the presence of representatives of the judiciary (Art. 9(1)). Violations of this right are punishable as crimes of breaches of peace of home and abuse of power, and the perpetrator shall also pay damages to the victim (Art. 9(2)). Further, every person is protected from the collection, elaboration and use, especially through electronic means, of his/her personal data; an Independent Authority is established for this purpose (Art. 9(a)). Finally, correspondence is inviolable except in cases where national security and the fight against especially serious crime so warrant, and an Independent Authority is also established for this purpose (Arts. 19(1) and (2)). Evidence obtained through violations of all of these three articles is not admissible in court.

EU Directive 2006/24⁶⁸ has been incorporated into the Greek legal order through Law No. 3917/2011. The Law provides for some guarantees for the preservation of the rule of law: a) access to data is dependent upon the rules and restrictions laid down in Law No. 2225/1994 concerning the interception of communications (Art. 4); (b) the procedure is supervised by independent authorities like the one protecting personal data (Art. 9); (c) illegal access, elaboration and dissemination of retained data is punishable as a felony with long-term imprisonment (especially when the constitutional order is endangered) or with imprisonment of 2 to 5 years as a misdemeanour when the crime is committed through negligence (Art. 11); (d) data produced in public places may be retained only when serious crimes (treason; public order offences; violent crimes; drug trafficking, crimes against property) or vehicular circulation are concerned (Art. 14).

There have been no judicial challenges with regard to the implementation of the Directive in Greece. However, even with the above safeguards, the Law cannot stand up against the critique already exerted against the Directive itself. The proportionality principle is in particular blatantly violated, in a framework of a general inconsistency of the Directive with Art. 8(2) ECHR: principles like fair warning, foreseeability and the necessity of the measures in a democratic society are not satisfied. The Directive proves unclear, allows retention for disproportionately long periods of time, contains no sufficient procedural safeguards and infringes upon the very meaning of the right to privacy, establishing an Orwellian EU ‘Super-Panopticon’ undermining freedoms and pluralism as fundamental EU values. Thus, the Directive seems totally unconstitutional, empirically unverified as to its necessity and counter-productive. This is evidenced by the annulment or bypassing of the implementing laws of the Directive in Bulgaria, the Czech ⁶⁸ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

Republic, Cyprus, Germany and Romania⁶⁹ and of course by the respective decision of the CJEU in the jointly judged cases Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others.⁷⁰ Nevertheless, Law No. 3917/2011 still remains in force.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 This issue has not arisen in Greece. As was noted in Sect. 2.1.3, the requirement of publication of laws is regarded as part of the concept of a rule-of-law-based state. Article 42 of the Constitution provides that statutes passed by the Parliament are promulgated and published by the President of the Republic. Statutes obtain formal legal effect with their publication in the government gazette, and substantive legal effect ten days after publication; i.e. legal validity begins with publication and legal enforceability ten days later.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 The constitutional rules on legal certainty and non-retroactivity are addressed in Sect. 2.1; see also Sect. 2.8 on judicial review.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule of Law Based State

2.7.1–2.7.3 As noted in academic commentary, especially in a recent Policy Paper of the Robert Schuman Centre of the European University Institute, the establishment of the European Stability Mechanism (ESM) transforms the nature of the EU. The EU is no longer considered a community whose members enjoy only benefits; it is also a community that shares risks.⁷¹ Although the ESM is not formally an institution of the EU, scholars have underlined that we cannot overlook that its function concerns managing financial risks relating to EU members; therefore the

⁶⁹ Lachana 2013, pp. 1143–1153 and generally. With regards to Bulgaria, cf. the Decision of the Supreme Administrative Court of 11.12.2008, <http://secile.eu/wp-content/uploads/2013/11/Data-Retention-Directive-in-Europe-A-Case-Study.pdf>, under Sect. 5.2.

⁷⁰ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

⁷¹ Poiares Maduro et al. 2012, p. 8.

ESM must not function in a way that is incompatible with the principles of transparency and accountability, which are fundamental for the operation of the EU.⁷² However, in the decision-making process within the context of the ESM, the dominant role belongs to a body composed by the Ministers of Finance of the countries participating in the ESM. The choice of means for a country's rescue belongs exclusively to this body, and their decisions do not require any justification in the form of presenting the ground on which they are based, a requirement that exists for all EU institutions, in accordance with Art. 296 TFEU. This absence of justification is even more significant if we consider that the operation of the ESM is not accompanied by the usual accountability mechanisms for EU bodies, i.e. access to documents and the obligation to report to the European Parliament.⁷³

Scholars have additionally identified two other changes brought by the ESM to the institutional architecture of the EU: (a) it alters the balance in favour of transnational over supranational elements of governance and (b) it breaks the unity of the EU legal order, as the legal regime of the ESM is in the form of an international treaty ratified by some members of the eurozone.⁷⁴ The first change is particularly important, if we consider that within the ESM, some countries play the role of the lender and others the role of the debtor, and therefore the power relations between them are unbalanced. This development weakens the economic sovereignty of some members, since the loss of their ability to make decisions on specific issues is not accompanied by the creation of decision-making mechanisms at the EU level that would enjoy democratic legitimacy.⁷⁵ Regarding the second change, it should be mentioned that this undermines the institutional unity of the EU, as the ESM introduces mechanisms that are not governed exclusively by EU law, allowing deviations in the decision-making process from the guarantees given by the institutional architecture of the EU.⁷⁶

As Chiti and Teixeira have observed, whereas the establishment of the ESM and the amendment of certain provisions of the TFEU lead to constraints of national sovereignty over budgetary matters, this does not involve the reinforcement of all EU institutions, especially those which contribute to the transparency and accountability of the decision making process.⁷⁷ Thus, the current structure of the decision-making process of the ESM may contribute to the widening of the EU's democratic deficit and, consequently, also to the democratic deficit in the Members States. Furthermore, scholars have identified that the Memoranda of Understanding

⁷² Ibid., pp. 8–10.

⁷³ Ibid., p. 10.

⁷⁴ Chiti and Teixeira 2013, pp. 673–708, especially p. 685.

⁷⁵ Ibid., pp. 705–706.

⁷⁶ A side effect of the non-inclusion of these mechanisms in the EU legal order is that national courts invoking such specificity may refuse to refer cases to the CJEU for a preliminary ruling, as did the Council of State in Decision 1117/2014 (para. 29), arguing that measures taken in the implementation of these mechanisms are not taken under EU law and therefore there is no need to refer a case for a preliminary ruling.

⁷⁷ Chiti and Teixeira 2013, p. 689.

(MoUs) signed by Greece and other countries make it clear that such instruments constitute a binding framework that Member States which receive financial assistance must respect in order to continue obtaining financial assistance.⁷⁸ As Kenneth Armstrong has observed:

The degree and manner of the constraint on the policy autonomy of the states is significant. The regular mechanisms of accountability and governance are formally not suspended, yet they are in reality restricted for the states which are subject to the discipline imposed via MoU and controls exercised in the context of the adjustment programmes.⁷⁹

Moreover, no legal evaluation of the international bailout agreements can escape considerations about state sovereignty. However, the Greek Council of State evaded the question as to whether the MoU implied a transfer of sovereignty by characterising the MoU as a political programme and not a legally binding document, since the MoU, unlike in other countries, had the support of the Parliament. In all of the relevant cases,⁸⁰ the Council of State has held that the measures taken by the Greek Government (salary cuts and cuts to bonds issued by the State of Greece) in order to comply with the loan agreements are compatible with the Greek Constitution (see below Sect. 2.8).

It is evident from the above-mentioned analysis that only issues within the field of Question 2.7.3 have arisen in Greece, since the Questions in Sects. 2.7.1 and 2.7.2 concern creditors and not debtors, such as Greece.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

It should be noted that Greek courts, from 1984 onwards, recognise the principle of proportionality as a general principle of law, which should rule limitations of rights. Since the 2001 constitutional revision, this principle is enshrined in the Greek Constitution (Art. 25(1)d)). However, as has been pointed out, during the financial crisis, the Council of State has significantly eased or relaxed its control as to the second stage of this principle, in which the necessity of the measure is examined, and has tended to accept the legislature's choices as to the necessity of the measures. At the same time, invoking the principle allows the judge to place some limits on the legislator as to the interference with rights that will be deemed to be compatible with the Constitution.⁸¹

As regards the principle of legal certainty, it should be noted that recognition of this principle in the jurisprudence of the Greek courts has not led the Greek courts,

⁷⁸ See Fabrini 2014, p. 73.

⁷⁹ Armstrong 2013, as cited by Fabrini 2014, p. 15.

⁸⁰ Judgment 668/2012 considering the implementation of the First MoU and Judgments 1117/2014 and 2307/2014 considering the implementation of the Second MoU.

⁸¹ See Contiades and Fotiadou 2013, p. 33.

in the past, to recognise a form of social acquis as regards the level of benefits associated with social rights.⁸² The settled case law of the Greek courts is that the legislature has wide discretion in determining the amount of benefits of this type, and thus the level of benefits cannot be taken for granted. Therefore, the recent case law on the cuts in social benefits does not constitute a change of paradigm within the context of Greek jurisprudence. According to the principle of legal certainty as conceived in the Greek legal order, this principle does not guarantee a specific amount of benefits. Moreover, in accordance with the case law of the Greek courts, this principle does not apply to the expectations of bondholders. According to a recent decision of the Council of State, the application of the principle of legal certainty in relations between bondholders and the issuer of the bonds presupposes that the solvency of the state remains unchanged over time, which, according to the Court, is contrary to reality. Therefore, a ‘haircut’ of bonds is not contrary to the principle pacta sunt servanda, since in cases of changed circumstances, the guiding principle is rebus sic stantibus.⁸³

As for the rule of law, it should be noted that even if we consider that the review of constitutionality of laws is one of the key aspects of this concept, the Greek courts have traditionally been very discreet in relation to the economic choices of the legislature, recognising the primacy of the latter on these issues over time.⁸⁴ We should note that the underlying reasoning of the jurisprudence of the ECtHR concerning the review of financial measures is similar, since it recognises a wide margin of appreciation in favour of the legislator.⁸⁵ Thus, the recent case law of the Greek courts in relation to the countermeasures of the economic crisis is not a deviation from the established case law.⁸⁶ The maximum that the judge can review is whether the legislature has provided sufficient evidence to support its choices.

The judicial review of the measures undertaken by Greece in the implementation of the MoUs does not exceed the limits of the judicial review exercised by the Greek courts in cases in which the crucial legal issue is the compatibility of a rule of EU law with the Greek Constitution. The Greek courts systematically avoid examining the cases at issue from the viewpoint of the protection of the constitutional identity of a Member State or a breach of competence by an EU institution, unlike is the case with the jurisprudence of other supreme courts. In the cases concerning the MoUs, the Council of State has followed this strategy and limited its judicial review of the measures only from the viewpoint of their compatibility with the Greek Constitution and the ECHR, ruling that they are compatible. Furthermore, the Council of State has avoided making a preliminary reference to the CJEU on the issue of whether EU law applied at that time (before the reform of the Treaties), conferred competence on the EU to adopt Council Decision

⁸² See Contiades 1999, p. 199.

⁸³ Judgment 1117/2014, para. 16.

⁸⁴ See Kaithatzis 2010.

⁸⁵ See Koufaki Ioanna and ADEDY v. Greece, no. 57665 & 57657/2012, 7 May 2013.

⁸⁶ Judgments 668/2012, 1972/2012, 38/2013.

2010/320/EU, which constitutes the legal basis of the MoUs. This was despite the fact that a relevant preliminary reference question should have been raised, according to the criteria applied by the CJEU concerning the submission of preliminary references. At the same time, the Council of State has avoided making a preliminary reference with regard to the compatibility of specific measures laid down by the above-mentioned Council Decision, (e.g. wage cuts in the public sector) with specific provisions of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, for instance Arts. 20, 21(1) and 31(1). In general, as has been pointed out in Greek public law theory, the jurisprudence of the supreme courts tends to play down the importance of EU rules, which could contribute to the interpretation of the rules of the internal legal order, and has not yet developed a consistent constitutional policy regarding the relationship between the national constitution and EU law.⁸⁷

We should also note that there has been a clear shift in the jurisprudence of the Council of State, which is based on an extension of the concept of public interest that now includes financial and service targets in order to avoid fiscal ‘derailment’ of the country. However, this is a choice made by the judges which is limited to the formative dimension of interpretation of legal provisions, without reaching the point of creating new rules of law by the court, in order to deal with situations that have not been foreseen by the legislator. It is significant that in a Council of State Decision⁸⁸ only a minority of three judges held that in cases involving the relationship of rights and the financial crisis, the constitutional provision (Art. 48 of the Constitution) which provides for the partial and temporary suspension of the Constitution due to national security reasons should be applied proportionately, even if the Constitution does not explicitly provide for the implementation of this provision in such a case. As far as the specific questions in Sect. 2.8 are concerned, we can make the observations below.

2.8.1 There is no statistical data concerning preliminary rulings addressed to the CJEU by the Greek Courts. It is commonly accepted that the Greek supreme courts were for a long time reluctant to submit preliminary rulings, which has changed over the last ten years, but is still not a well-established practice, as the recent case law concerning the loan agreements shows.

2.8.2–2.8.5 There is also no statistical data concerning the annulment of domestic acts on the grounds of their incompatibility with the Greek Constitution. In general, we can claim that the Council of State, at least after 1975, has been very active on rights protection, especially the protection of rights concerning individual autonomy, human dignity and the environment. The previous analysis also proves that the review of measures that implement EU law by the Greek courts does not demonstrate a sound doctrinal approach similar to that of the German Constitutional Court or the ECtHR. It is also obvious that such a lack of constitutional policy with regard to the relation between EU law and the Greek Constitution results in a gap in judicial review. The range of strategies followed by the Council of State, according to scholarly commentary,⁸⁹ varies from setting aside the Constitution in favour of EU law to setting aside EU law in favour of the Constitution. Both strategies lack consistency, since they do not provide us with sound criteria that are used constantly. Yet we should not come to the conclusion that setting aside EU law in favour of the Greek Constitution results in a more protective approach for the rights' holders, as the recent case law on austerity measures indicates.

⁸⁷ See Yiannakopoulos 2013, pp. 374–375.

⁸⁸ See Dissenting Opinion of three judges of the Council of State to Judgment 693/2011.

2.8.6 As far as the question of reverse discrimination due to the implementation of EU law is concerned, the answer is that we can distinguish two distinct periods in the jurisprudence of the Greek courts. Since 2009, the relevant jurisprudence has changed and reverse discrimination due the implementation of EU law is considered to be unacceptable. The main doctrinal arguments which have led to this shift are founded on the equality principle provided by the Greek Constitution (Art. 4). However, this shift in the jurisprudence does not imply an automatic implementation of EU law with regard to Greek citizens. It only implies that the judge is obliged to examine whether or not the differential treatment between EU and Greek citizens can be justified according to the equality principle.⁹⁰

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 One of the consequences of the economic crisis is the further retreat of the justiciability of social rights, since their operation is completely dependent on available funding sources. Moreover, the case law of the Greek courts does not deny the normative content of social rights, but merely disputes the possibility to found claims for steady and fixed benefits on them.⁹¹ Economic crisis further weakens this dimension of rights, so that they alone cannot provide sufficient basis for reviewing the constitutionality of measures taken, without recourse to constitutional provisions which can give rise to justiciable claims, such as the right to property.⁹²

Another development in the protection of rights during the financial crisis concerns the transformation of the concept of public interest in the case law. According to recent jurisprudence, the measures taken are not merely intended to satisfy a simple public interest but a serious financial interest, which has two sides. On the one hand, its satisfaction is considered as a prerequisite for the state's ability to serve its basic functions under the Constitution. On the other hand, it is connected to the satisfaction of a fundamental interest of the EU, of which Greece is a member.

⁸⁹ Yiannakopoulos 2013, pp. 424–464.

⁹⁰ Ibid., pp. 342–348.

⁹¹ See Ntouchanis 2007.

⁹² Contiades and Fotiadou 2013, p. 31.

The Council of State and the Higher Special Court (Anotato Eidiko Dikastirio), in a series of judgments after 2012 that were not related to cuts in salaries, pensions or other measures taken to comply with the MoUs, have held that any measure which can help to prevent fiscal risk may provide an acceptable foundation for limitation of rights. These cases relate to the so-called ‘privileges of the state’, i.e. the short limitation periods for claims of citizens against the state and the lower rate of interest charged on such claims compared with the rate charged on claims of the state against individuals. Whereas until 2012, the case law of the Council of State, under the influence of the jurisprudence of the ECtHR, considered that these privileges were not compatible with the principle of equality (Art. 4 Constitution), the provisions of Art. 6 ECHR and Art. 1(1) of the First Additional Protocol to the ECHR, the case law changed after a decision by the Higher Special Court.⁹³ According to the rationale of the decision, the shorter limitation period for private claims against the government serves fiscal purposes, in particular the rapid resolution of cases with budgetary costs, which helps the state revenue-expenses balance. A similar shift was observed in the case law of the ECtHR in Giavi v. Greece.⁹⁴ The ECtHR, making a shift from earlier decisions,⁹⁵ held that the severe economic crisis can be an imperative reason of public interest, which imposes the restriction of rights arising from Art. 6 ECHR and Art. 1(1) of the Protocol. Therefore, with regard to Greece, we can claim that the economic crisis also affected a number of rights that do not belong to the category of social rights, but fall into the category of individual rights and rights of due process.

Apart from the above rights, another category affected by the economic crisis is rights regarding labour relations. The MoUs impose measures affecting the constitutionally guaranteed collective autonomy (Art. 22), reducing the role of trade unions in collective bargaining as well as the substance thereof, to the benefit of rules imposed unilaterally by the Greek legislature.⁹⁶ It is a choice that moves in the opposite trajectory from the ECtHR’s jurisprudence on collective autonomy.⁹⁷ Moreover, the two MoUs tend to restrict or even eliminate the role of arbitration, by prohibiting increases in salaries and fees granted through arbitration.⁹⁸

⁹³ Judgment 25/2012.

⁹⁴ Giavi v. Greece, no. 25816/2009, 3 October 2013.

⁹⁵ Meidanis v. Greece, no. 33977/06, 22 May 2008; Zoumpoulidis v. Greece, no. 36963/06, 25 June 2009.

⁹⁶ See Achtioglou and Doherty 2014, pp. 219–240.

⁹⁷ See Demir and Baykara v. Turkey, no. 34503/97, 12 November 2008. For this reason, the strategic litigation followed by the applicants before the ECtHR in the case Koufaki and ADEDY v. Greece was criticised, on the grounds that the applications to the ECHR were limited only to salary cuts, without further developing the issues related to the changes in working relations, see Gavalas 2014.

⁹⁸ However, the Council of State in a recent Judgment (2307/2014) ruled that the relevant prohibition is contrary to Art. 22(2) of the Greek Constitution.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 The question concerning whether the common constitutional traditions of the Member States can be an autonomous source of rights within the context of EU law cannot be answered definitively, since a convincing doctrine of sources from which fundamental rights are derived still remains elusive. However, the jurisprudence of the CJEU offers some guidelines which help us to determine the proper place of the constitutional traditions of the Member States within the context of EU law. On this issue, the jurisprudence of the CJEU on Art. 53 of the Charter is crucial (see Sect. 2.11 below). When the level of rights protection afforded by national constitutions is equivalent to that of the Charter, then common constitutional traditions can be a source of fundamental rights protection. In any other case, the CJEU focuses on whether or not the application of national standards touches upon the unity, primacy and effectiveness of EU law. The solution adopted by the CJEU is that rights protection under the Charter operates as a ‘ceiling’ for the afforded protection. Yet I consider the approach of the Advocate General in the Melloni case⁹⁹ to be more persuasive. Common standards of protection require common definitions. We should then ‘differentiate between situations in which there is a definition at European Union level of the degree of protection afforded to a fundamental right ... and those in which that level of protection has not been subject to a common definition’.¹⁰⁰

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 We cannot examine the issue of stricter constitutional standards and the application of Art. 53 of the Charter without taking into account the CJEU’s case law on the issue. According to the interpretation of Art. 53 given by the CJEU in the Melloni case, ‘national authorities and courts remain free to apply national standards of protection of fundamental rights provided that ... the primacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law are not thereby compromised’.¹⁰¹ Thus, national courts should apply national standards of protection of fundamental rights under the condition that they do not undermine the primacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law. The courts may only enforce more protective constitutional rights when the basic elements of EU law are not undermined. In other cases, the Charter displaces the national constitution and, as a consequence, the level of constitutional protection is lowered. Yet we have to take into account that there are still situations that are not entirely determined by EU law, situations where EU law leaves discretion to the Member States for the implementation of EU law. Arguably therefore, we might conclude that when a situation is entirely determined by EU law, the Charter displaces the level of protection afforded by national constitutions, whereas in cases that are not determined entirely by EU law a more flexible approach should be applied. For instance, there are cases in which the interpretation given to a constitutional right is considered, even by the CJEU, to be part of the national constitutional identity, which is being protected according to Art. 4(2) TFEU. In this regard, the possibility of applying a higher standard of protection provided by a national constitution should not be automatically excluded when the primacy, effectiveness and unity of EU law are involved. The wording of Art. 53 as such does not preclude an interpretation that incorporates a mandate for the CJEU to allow for higher levels of constitutional protection in specific cases, when there are no other rights or interests that should prevail.¹⁰²

⁹⁹ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

¹⁰⁰ Opinion of AG Bot in Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2012:600, para. 124. On this issue see also Torres Pérez 2014, pp. 308–331, especially p. 326.

¹⁰¹ Case C-399/11 Melloni, supra n. 99, para. 60.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1–2.12.3 According to the above-mentioned analysis, we can claim that the main obstacle in Greece concerning the debate on constitutional rights and values within the EU legal order touches upon the restricted judicial review exercised by the Greek courts in cases in which the crucial legal issue is the compatibility of a rule of EU law with the Greek Constitution. The Greek courts systematically avoid examining the cases at issue from the viewpoint of the protection of the constitutional identity of a Member State or the breach of competence of the EU institutions, as is the case with the jurisprudence of other supreme courts. In the recent cases concerning the MoUs, the Greek courts have refrained from making preliminary references to the CJEU, and thus they have refrained from starting a dialogue between a national court and the CJEU that would be crucial for the development of common standards for rights protection.

Considering the restricted standing of private parties to request a review of EU legislation, such omission restricts the level of rights protection in combination with the national courts' lack of jurisdiction to examine the compatibility of EU law with the national constitution. Therefore, it would be necessary to develop mechanisms which would overcome such lacunae in rights protection. Thus, I fully agree that the suspension of the application of, and the carrying out of a review of EU measures, where an important constitutional issue has been identified by a number of constitutional courts, would be a measure to the right direction. This could strengthen the federalist aspects of EU governance, while at the same time respecting a basic precondition for democracy, namely the constant re-evaluation of previous decisions.

¹⁰² Torres Pérez 2014, p. 327.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.3 Concerns about the reduction in the standard of protection and the rule of law in the context of the EU are fairly sound, but the whole issue is not a zero-sum game. As the Greek case indicates, the role of institutions that are entitled to protect rights is crucial. Greek courts have reviewed the measures taken under the bailout agreements only in respect of their compatibility with the Greek Constitution and the ECHR. Such omission is important if we consider that, since the inclusion of the Charter of Fundamental Rights in primary EU law, the whole constitutional structure of the EU has shifted from a constitutional order oriented towards the fulfilment of economic goals to a constitutional order in which a list of fundamental rights has an equal footing. Thus, it would be crucial for the whole system of rights protection in the EU to push the CJEU to rule on the normative content of the rights included in the Charter.

On the other hand, scholars such as De Witte have pointed out that the centralised and unitary form of review exercised by the CJEU in respect of EU law does not fit into the multilevel system of EU governance, since some cases may fall within the scope of application of the Charter and domestic law.¹⁰³ Thus, it would be helpful if there were some changes concerning the primacy of the review by the CJEU. A more proactive role for the national courts and other national institutions and a more relaxed approach by the CJEU concerning national standards of rights protection than currently taken would considerably contribute to moving in the right direction.¹⁰⁴

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 The Constitution of Greece sets the cornerstone of the relationship between Greece and international law in Art. 2(2), according to which, ‘Greece adhering to the generally recognised rules of international law, pursues the strengthening of peace and of justice, and the fostering of friendly relations between peoples and States'. Thus, general objectives for Greek foreign policy and international co-operation are set.

¹⁰³ De Witte 2013, pp. 1523–1538, especially p. 1527.

¹⁰⁴ Ibid., pp. 1527–1533.

The way in which rules of international law are integrated in domestic law either automatically or following ratification is regulated by Arts. 28 and 36 of the Constitution. Article 28(1) distinguishes between 'generally recognised rules of international law' and 'international conventions', a distinction which corresponds to the distinction between unwritten and written international law. Customary international law and general principles of international law are considered rules with general international recognition, which are automatically integrated in domestic law without any further need for ratification. International conventions become operative according to their respective conditions as of the time they are sanctioned by statute and become an integral part of domestic law.¹⁰⁵

The legislature has the competence to ratify international treaties, placing them accordingly above statutes. The judiciary is responsible for classifying an international rule as a generally recognised rule, thus integrating it into domestic law. 'Controversies related to the designation of rules of international law as generally acknowledged' are settled by the Special Highest Court in accordance with Art. 100(1)(f) of the Constitution. The President of the Republic has competence to conclude certain categories of treaties in accordance with Art. 36(1) of the Constitution. Treaties of peace, alliance, economic cooperation and participation in international organisations or unions are ratified by the President of the Republic and published in the government gazette. However, it is the Government that bears responsibility for the political choices reflected in such treaties. Article 36(1) provides that the President of the Republic shall announce them to the Parliament with the necessary clarifications, whenever the interest and the security of the state thus allow.¹⁰⁶

Furthermore, the Constitution explicitly provides in Art. 36(2) for certain categories of treaties that require ratification by statute voted by Parliament. These include conventions on trade, taxation, economic cooperation and participation in international organisations or unions and all others containing concessions for which, according to other provisions of the Constitution, no provision can be made without a statute or which may burden Greeks individually. A contrario, international treaties that do not fall into these categories may be concluded by the Government or by authorised diplomats. However, unless they are ratified by a statute, according to the aforementioned Art. 28(1) of the Constitution, they do not become part of domestic law.

Hence the Constitution explicitly addresses monist and dualist approaches. The Constitution primarily adopts dualism, however the influence of monist theory is detectable in the automatic integration of generally recognised international rules. International law is integrated into the internal hierarchy of legal norms, retaining its unique character. Generally recognised international rules and international conventions sanctioned by statute are placed beneath the Constitution and above statutes in the hierarchy of sources of law.¹⁰⁷

¹⁰⁵ Contiades and Fotiadou 2014, p. 720.

¹⁰⁶ Ibid.

3.1.2–3.1.3 Not applicable.

3.1.4 The Constitution provides an efficient legal framework for the participation of Greece in international organisations and the ratification of treaties. The above-mentioned recent, financial crisis-triggered discussion regarding concessions of sovereignty and the transfer of state competences to international organisations by the law incorporating the Memorandum, under Art. 28 of the Constitution, confirms that the Constitution provides the framework for dealing with concessions of sovereignty. Although Art. 28 was not employed by the Greek Parliament and the Council of State confirmed this choice, what was not questioned was the existence of constitutional paths to allow such concessions.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

See Sects. 3.1 and 3.3.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1–3.3.2 In Greece, international treaties and agreements relating to the areas noted in Sect. 3.1. of this report should be ratified by the Parliament. When such agreements make a concession of sovereignty and transfer state competences to international organisations (like the Troika), according to the Greek Constitution (Art. 28), a three-fifths, enhanced majority of the total number of Members of Parliament is required for ratification. An international agreement or treaty can be subject to referendum under to the Greek Constitution (Art. 44(2)); to be more precise, the relevant provision does not clearly provide for such option but also does not exclude it.¹⁰⁸ The Former Prime Minister proposed that a referendum could be used to ratify the loan agreements (see Sect. 1.4.2.). Yet even members of the Cabinet did not agree, and the referendum never took place.

¹⁰⁷ Ibid., p. 721.

¹⁰⁸ Article 44(2) ‘The President of the Republic shall by decree proclaim a referendum on crucial national matters following a resolution voted by an absolute majority of the total number of members of the Parliament, taken upon the proposal of the Cabinet. A referendum on bills passed by Parliament, regulating important social matters with the exception of fiscal ones, shall be proclaimed by decree by the President of Republic, if this is decided by three-fifths of the total number of its members following a proposal of two-fifths of the total number of its members ...’.

The constitutionality of the loan agreement was challenged before the Council of State. One of the arguments in support of the unconstitutionality of the loan agreement was that the agreement was integrated in the Greek legal order as a piece of legislation by a simple majority and not the qualified majority required for international treaties and agreements. In fact, the ratification of the loan agreement and its compatibility with the relevant constitutional provisions has been the subject of a vivid public deliberation which took place within the community of Greek public law lawyers. No other treaty ratification in the past has been discussed so widely.¹⁰⁹ However, the Greek Council of State rejected the argument of unconstitutionality, ruling that the MoU is merely a political programme, without any legally binding effects on its own.¹¹⁰ Consequently, the existing constitutional provisions provide only for the formal ratification by Parliament of treaties and international agreements. Yet, the observance of the relevant provisions by Parliament is not under an intense review by the courts, since judicial review by Greek courts does not exceed the so-called interna corporis of the Parliament. Thus, considering the Greek judicial practice of the past years, which asserts the observation that the courts have been less active when issues concerning the ratification of a treaty are under review for constitutionality, it might prove helpful if the Greek Parliament were to obtain the means to exercise an intense control over the implementation of treaties and international agreements.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 The judicial review of the MoUs in terms of their compatibility with the Greek Constitution, EU law and the ECHR are discussed above in Sect. 2.8. The following further issues are worth mentioning here.

In Greece, the relevant rules concerning the review of international treaties are set out in Art. 28 of the Greek Constitution (see Sect. 3.1).

Article 28(3) of the Greek Constitution allows for the delegation of state powers to supranational organisations if this does not conflict with the democratic foundations of the Constitution and human rights. This procedure, according to Greek constitutional theory, serves as a quasi-constitutional revision process outside of the strict standard provided for in Art. 110, since the ratification of a treaty may result in an informal revision of the Constitution. Up until the loan agreements, all international treaties had been ratified by the vast majority of the MPs on the basis of Art. 28. Thus, there are two standards on which judicial review concerning the ratification of a treaty or an agreement can rely, i.e. the ratification process (see above Sect. 3.3) and the content of the treaty, or the agreement in respect of the democratic foundations of the Constitution and human rights protection.

¹⁰⁹ See for example Karavokyris 2014, Mantzoufas 2014 and DSA (Athens Bar Association) Essays on the MOU 2013.

¹¹⁰ On the legal Status of the MoU, see Vlachou 2012.

Thus, the critical question is whether the transfer of sovereignty inherent in the loan agreements and in being part of the European Monetary Union (EMU) affect the democratic system of government. The answer is based on an assessment made by the Parliament during the ratification of the relevant Treaty. As far as review by the courts of these matters is concerned, an assessment of the compatibility or otherwise of the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU or the loan agreements with the Greek Constitution would be a review with dubious legal consequences. If it were ruled that the TFEU was not compatible with certain articles of the Greek Constitution, the state would still be bound by the treaty and have legally binding obligations under the treaty. Such decision would not increase the credibility of the court, and would simultaneously reduce its legitimacy. So by the time the Greek judge ruled that the measures adopted in order to activate the European support mechanism are measures ‘deriving from the status of Greece as a member of the EU and of its participation in the EMU’,¹¹¹ the next step was to conclude that ‘the measures are justified by invoking serious grounds of public interest which are objectives of common interest of the Member States of the EU’,¹¹² (i.e. budgetary discipline and the stability of the euro area). The public interest has increasingly obtained an EU dimension and must be served by the policies of the countries participating in the EU. Further on, the question of whether participation in the EU raises issues of potential conflict between national constitutions and the provisions of EU law is only marginally considered by the Greek courts. Thus the national constitution is no longer the guarantor of popular sovereignty rooted in a political decision made by the people (popular sovereignty), but becomes a guarantor of a state’s compliance with the obligations arising from participation in the EMU, regardless of a possible conflict between such obligations and policy decisions based on popular sovereignty.¹¹³

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 In Greece, the loan agreements have taken the form of MoUs and bilateral loans, in which the IMF is part of the Troika and thus one of the two ‘signatories’ parties. Consequently, the related public debate does not refer to the IMF as such or to the implication of its policies upon social rights. Instead, the discussion among public law theorists, the public debate in the press (including the

¹¹¹ See Judgment 668/2012, para. 35; see also the recommendation delivered by Judge E. Sarp on Judgment 668/2012, (in Greek) available at www.constitutionalism.gr. A recommendation is the proposal of one member of the judiciary on which the Court bases the judgment. Translation by the author.

¹¹² Ibid.

¹¹³ See Drosos 2011, pp. 764–779, especially pp. 768–769.

Internet) and mass media, as well as the litigation in courts concerns the impact of the MoUs on social rights and the quality of democracy. However, we cannot ignore the fact that the austerity programme in Greece has a strong EU dimension, since it is related to the obligations undertaken by Greece due to participation in the EMU. Monetary integration is not the same as the general process of globalisation through trade liberalisation. The main difference is that it involves a deliberate institutional decision to give up national prerogatives over the exchange rate and interest levels for the sake of establishing a common currency. Within this context, democracy is affected only if we conflate democracy and state autonomy. If we escape such conflation, we should focus on the EU level and on the possible changes which should take place in order to make the EMU more compatible with democracy. In Greece, such a shift in the agenda is being proposed by political theorists dealing with European integration and less often by public law theorists. As far as the social rights agenda is concerned, a dimension often ignored in Greece is that the judicialisation of so-called mega-politics has had poor results.¹¹⁴ The unprecedented recourse to the Greek courts has created hopes that austerity measures will be defeated in the courts. Yet, as mentioned above, the Greek supreme courts have been hesitant to intervene in the field of technocratic decision-making by the executive that is merely endorsed by the Parliament, since they feel that they are inadequately equipped to overturn such economic decisions. The most they could possibly ask from the governmental officials is a detailed cost-benefit analysis report justifying the necessity of adopted measures.¹¹⁵

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 In all areas included in this section of the Questionnaire, there have been scholarly commentary and parliamentary debates. Yet, according to the analysis above, we can conclude that a prominent characteristic of the Greek case is that debates in the Parliament and scholarly commentary do not affect the practice of the courts, which seem to be very reluctant to review any measure that constitutes an obligation undertaken by Greece in the context of the EU with regard to its compatibility with the Greek Constitution or with EU law. Another observation we can make is that the jurisprudence of Greek courts during the crisis has put the boundaries of constitutional pluralism, as a main characteristic of European Public Law, to the test. Greek courts seem to be reluctant to engage in a dialogue with the CJEU; the dialogue between the Council of State and the European Court of Human Rights, which in the past has produced some fruitful results concerning rights protection, has turned into a monologue under the ‘shadow’ of the financial crisis. What the financial crisis has dredged up are the functional aspects of constitutional pluralism, namely the evasion of conflicts, and not the more substantial elements like the displacement of authority by arguments within the context of constitutional discourse.

¹¹⁴ Kaithatzis 2011.

¹¹⁵ See dissenting opinion of Judge Karamanof to three judgments of the Council of State, 668/2012, 1972/2012, 38/2013.

References

- Achtrioglou E., Doherty M. (2014) There Must be Some Way out of Here: The Crisis. Labour Rights and Member States in the Eye of the Storm. ELJ 20:219–240.
- Amtenbrink F. (2012) The European Court of Justice’s Approach to Primacy and European Constitutionalism – Preserving the European Constitutional Order? In: Hans Micklitz H.W., de Witte B. (eds.) The European Court of Justice and the Autonomy of the Member States. Intersentia, Cambridge, pp. 35–64.
- Anagnostopoulos E. (2005) Η έννοια της «δίωξης» στα άρθρα 11 εδάφ. η και 12 εδάφ. Α του N. 3251/2004 (The notion of ‘indictment’ in art. 11 h’ and 12 a’ of Law No. 3251/2004). Poinika Chronika 9:855–7.
- Anagnostopoulos E. (2011) Παρατηρήσεις σε ΟλΑΠ 1/2011 (Remarks on AP (Plenary) 1/2011, Poinika Chronika pp. 504–505.
- Armstrong A. (2013) Towards a ‘Genuine’ Economic & Monetary Union: The New Governance of Fiscal Discipline (2013) Conference paper. The Constitutionalization of European Budgetary Constraints: Comparative and Interdisciplinary Perspectives. Tilburg Law School, Tilburg, 30–31 May 2013.
- Baltas A. (2014) Παρατηρήσεις σε ΑΠ 241/2013 (Remarks on AP 241/2013). Poinika Chronika 4:287 et seq.
- Brown C. (2003) Case C-112/00, Eugen Schmidberger, Internationale Transport und Planzüge v Austria’ Judgment 12 June 2003. CML Rev. 40:1508 et seq.
- Chiti E., Teixeira P.G. (2013) The Constitutional Implications of the European Responses to the Financial and Public Debt Crisis. CML Rev. 50:673–708.
- Chrysogonos K. (2003) Constitutional law (in Greek). Sakkoulas, Athens.
- Contiades X. (1999) The consolidating function of social rights. The social acquis paradigm (in Greek). Syntagma 2:199 et seq.
- Contiades X., Fotiadou A. (2012) Models of Constitutional Change. In: Contiades X. (ed.) Engineering Constitutional Change. A Comparative Perspective on Europe, Canada and the USA. Routledge, Oxford, pp. 450 et seq.
- Contiades X., Fotiadou A. (2013) How Constitutions Reacted to the Financial Crisis. In: Contiades X. (ed.) Constitutions in the Global Financial Crisis: A Comparative Analysis. Ashgate, Farnham, pp. 9–59.
- Contiades X., Fotiadou A. (2014) The Hellenic Republic. In: Besselink L., Bovend'Eert P., Broeksteeg H., de Lange R., Voermans W. (eds.) Constitutional Law of the EU Member States. Kluwer Law International, Alphen aan den Rijn, pp. 718 et seq.
- Contiades X., Tassopoulos I. (2012) Constitutional change in Greece. In: Contiades X. (ed.) Engineering Constitutional Change: A Comparative Perspective on Europe, Canada and the USA. Routledge, Abingdon, pp. 166 et seq.
- Contiades X., Tassopoulos I. (2013) The Impact of the Financial Crisis on the Greek Constitution. In: Contiades X. (ed.) Constitutions in the Global Financial Crisis: A Comparative Analysis. Ashgate, Farnham, pp. 195–218.
- De Witte B. (2013) Article 53. In: Peers S., Hervey T., Kenner J., Ward A. (eds.) The EU Charter of Fundamental Rights – A Commentary. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 1523–1538.

- Drosos Y. (2011) Constitutional discourse and financial crisis (in Greek). Efimerida Dioikitikou Dikaiou 6:764–779.
- Fabrizi F. (2014) The Euro Crisis and the Courts: Judicial Review and the Political Process in Comparative Perspective. Berkeley Journal of International Law 32:64–129.
- Fytrakis E. (1998) Η απαγόρευση της αναδρομικότητας στην ποινική δικονομία (Non-retroactivity in criminal procedure). Ant. Sakkoulas, Athens.
- Fytrakis E (2006) Το Ευρωπαϊκό Ένταλμα Σύλληψης σε εφαρμογή: Νέες εξελίξεις, νέες ανησυχίες (The EAW applied: new developments, new concerns). Poiniki Dikaiosini 2:210–220.
- Gavalas N. 2014 Memorandum between the devil and the deep blue sea. From Council of State to the European Court of Human Rights (in Greek). <http://www.constitutionalism.gr>.
- Kaiafa-Gbandi M. (2004) Το Ευρωπαϊκό Ένταλμα Σύλληψης: Οι ρυθμίσεις του Ν. 3251/2004 και η μετάβαση από τη έκδοση στην παράδοση (The EAW: The provisions of Law No. 3251/2004 and the transition from extradition to ‘surrender’). Poiniki Dikaiosini 7:1294 et seq.
- Kaithatzis A. (2010) The Judicial Review of Financial Policy Measures: Jurisprudential Tendencies and Adjustments in a Transitional Financial and Political Environment (in Greek). <http://www.constitutionalism.gr>.
- Kaithatzis A. (2011) Megapolitics and weak judicial review: A comment on the strategies of observance of the Constitution in the era of memorandums (in Greek). <http://constitutionalism.gr>.
- Kalfelis G. (2006) Το Ευρωπαϊκό Ένταλμα Σύλληψης (Μονοδιάστατη ενοποίηση των ευρωπαϊκών κατασταλτικών μηχανισμών;) (The EAW (One-sided unification of the European repressive mechanisms?)) Poiniki Dikaiosini 2:199–203.
- Karaflos A. (2013) Ανακύπτοντα νομικά ζητήματα κατά την πρακτική εφαρμογή του ευρωπαϊκού εντάλματος σύλληψης (Emerging issues during the practical application of the EAW). Poiniki Chronika 2:90–101.
- Karavokyris Y. (2014) Constitution and crisis (in Greek). Kritiki, Athens.
- Kedikoglou F. (2014) Ζητήματα έκδοσης και εκτέλεσης του Ευρωπαϊκού Εντάλματος σύλληψης (Questions concerning the issuing and execution of the EAW). A. Sakkoulas, Athens.
- Lachana C. (2013) Quod ab initio non valet, in tractu temporis non convalescit: Νομική θεμελιότητα της ασυμβατότητας της Οδηγίας 2006/24/EK προς το άρθρο 8 της ΕΣΔΑ με αναγωγή στα νομολογιακά προηγούμενα (stare decisis) του Δικαστηρίου του Στρασβούργου (Quod ab initio non valet, in tractu temporis non convalescit: Legal explanation of Directive's 2006/24/EC inconsistency with art. 8 ECHR in connection with the Strasbourg jurisdiction (stare decisis)). Poiniki Dikaiosini 12:1137–1153.
- Mantoufas P. (2014) The financial crisis and the Constitution (in Greek). Sakkoulas, Athens.
- Mouzakis D. (2012) Πρακτικά προβλήματα από την εφαρμογή του Ν. 3251/2004 για το ευρωπαϊκό ένταλμα σύλληψης (Practical problems in the application of law 3251/2004 concerning the EAW). Poiniki Dikaiosini 1:57–67.
- Mouzakis D. (2009) To Ευρωπαϊκό Ένταλμα Σύλληψης (The European Arrest Warrant). Nomiki Bibliothiki, Athens.
- Ntouchanis C. (2007) Lack of justiciability of social rights, as a matter of tracking their regulatory core (in Greek). In: Sotirelis G., Tsaitouridis C., Social rights and crisis of the welfare state (in Greek). Savvalas, Athens, pp. 220 et seq.
- Papacharalambous, C. (2002) Το ποινικό δίκαιο του «εχθρού»: Ευρωπαϊκό ένταλμα σύλληψης, τρομοκρατία και έκτακτη αντιτρομοκρατική νομοθεσία στις ΗΠΑ (The penal law against the ‘enemy’: EU Arrest Warrant, terrorism and extraordinary counter-terrorism legislation in the USA). Poiniki Dikaiosini 2:189–195.
- Poiares Maduro M., de Witte B., Kumm M. (2012) The Euro Crisis and the Democratic Governance of the Euro: Legal and Political Issues of a Fiscal Crisis. RSCAS Policy papers, 2012/08:8.
- Spyropoulos P.C., Fortsakis T.P. (2009) Constitutional Law in Greece. Kluwer Law International, Alphen aan den Rijn.

- Togias S. (2013) Ευρωπαϊκό ένταλμα σύλληψης και έκδοση αλλοδαπών. Επίκαιρες νομολογιακές τάσεις (The EAW and the extradition of aliens). Poiniki Dikaiosini 12:1154–1164.
- Torres Pérez A. (2014) Melloni in Three Acts: From Dialogue to Monologue. EuConst 10:308–331.
- Vasilakakis E. (2006) 9+1 σκέψεις για το ευρωπαϊκό ένταλμα σύλληψης (9+1 thoughts on the EAW). Poiniki Dikaiosini 2:204–209.
- Vlachou I. (2012) Memoranda sunt Servanda? The legal status of the Memorandum of Understanding of the Greek bailout in the Hellenic, European and International legal order. L.L.M. Master's thesis, University of Leiden. http://studentthinktank.eu/wp-content/uploads/2012/11/THESIS_I_VLACHOU-11.pdf.14.
- Voulgaris D. (2014) Παρατηρήσεις σε ΑΠ 117/2013 (Remarks on AP 117/2013). Poiniki Chronika 4:285–286.
- Vrioni K. (2011) Παρατηρήσεις σε ΑΠ 200/2011 (Remarks on AP 200/2011). Poiniki Dikaiosini 5:581–583.
- Yiannakopoulos K. (2013) The influence of the EU on the review of constitutionality (in Greek). Sakkoulas, Athens.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Part IV

The Post-Totalitarian Constitutions of the ‘New’ Member States from the Post-Communist Area: A Detailed Bill of Rights, Rule of Law Safeguards and Constitutional Review Entrenched after the Recent Memory of Arbitrary Exercise of Power

The Future Mandate of the Constitution of Slovenia: A Potent Tradition Under Strain

Samo Bardutzky

Abstract The 1991 Constitution of Slovenia belongs to the category of strong constitutions, with a detailed list of rights. The report informs that the concept of the rule of law mostly draws on German commentaries on the constitutional Rechtsstaat, and its main elements are expressly entrenched in constitutional provisions. Particularly notable are the detailed limits on the power of the state in prosecuting crimes and detailed guarantees for judicial protection, which are identified as more extensive than those in the ECHR and the EU Charter. The constitutional amendments for EU and international co-operation contain a clause on the respect for human rights, democracy and the rule of law. The report extensively documents areas where the above, potent constitutional tradition has come under strain in the context of EU law. The examples range from the Data Retention Directive – the implementation of which was rushed under the threat of EU fines – to concerns by scholars with regard to Viking Line and Laval that the Constitution limits the limitations on fundamental rights, and that economic freedoms ought not to trump fundamental rights despite the status that the former have been accorded by the ECJ. A particularly acute awareness emerges with regard to the changing role of courts in European Arrest Warrant cases, with warnings by lawyers about the danger of instrumentalising judges, and transforming judges into ‘ticking box’ automatons neglecting their duty of safeguarding fundamental rights. The constitutional protection of the right to water has also been debated with reference to an EU directive. More broadly, the report expresses concern that because of the different approach to judicial review of EU measures, the heavy

The author is Assistant Professor of Constitutional Law at the University of Ljubljana, Slovenia; at the time of writing Research Associate, University of Kent, United Kingdom. e-mail: S.Bardutzky@pf.uni-lj.si.

The author is indebted to Anneli Albi, Mojca Plesničar, Andraž Zidar, Peter Pavlin and Maria Gomes for their careful reading of the draft text and valuable comments, and very grateful to Marjan Kos for his thorough and enthusiastic research assistance.

All websites accessed 1 December 2015. Text submitted 20 July 2015.

S. Bardutzky (✉)
University of Ljubljana, Ljubljana, Slovenia
e-mail: S.Bardutzky@pf.uni-lj.si books with commentary on the Constitution are no longer carried by civil servants to meetings to identify constraints on the exercise of public power placed by the Constitutional Court.

Keywords The Constitution of Slovenia · Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation · The Slovenian Constitutional Court Constitutional review statistics and grounds · German influences on the rule of law and the constitutional Rechtsstaat · Limitation of rights · Referendums on accession and on euro crisis measures · European Arrest Warrant, judicial review and defence rights · The changing role of courts · Data Retention Directive and the threat of EU fines · Article 53 EU Charter and the question of a higher standard of protection · The constitutional right to water

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The adoption of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia in 1991¹ followed two tectonic changes. The first was the transition from a non-democratic political system with socialist consensus economics and where the pivotal role in society was played by the Communist party, to a multi-party democracy, market economy and society based on respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.² The second change was the declaration of independence from the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia of which Slovenia was a constituent part.³

Stemming from the decision of the Slovenian people to establish independence and democracy, the Constitution belongs to the category of strong constitutions. It possesses a dominant legal character, not only through the establishment of a special Constitutional Court charged with safeguarding the Constitution and vested with the power to annul legislation (Chap. VIII),⁴ but also through the subjection of the courts (Art. 125) and the public administration (Art. 120(2)) to the Constitution. Furthermore, human rights and fundamental freedoms are exercised directly on the basis of the Constitution (Art. 15(3), emphasis added). This is complemented by the detailed, almost technical phrasing of some of the constitutional guarantees (e.g. Art. 20(2)).

¹ Ustava Republike Slovenije in Slovene. The original text is published in the Official Journal of the Republic of Slovenia (Uradni list Republike Slovenije, hereinafter UL) 33/91-I, with subsequent amendments in UL 42/97, 66/2000, 24/03, 69/04, 68/06 in 47/13. I have drawn on the English translation available from the website of the Constitutional Court, <http://www.us-rs.si/en/about-the-court/legal-basis/constitution/>.

² 1989 Amendments XIII–XXXIV to the 1974 Constitution of the Socialist Republic of Slovenia introduced several elements of economic liberalisation, while the 1990 Amendments XCI–XCV provided for a basis for the first democratic election to the tricameral Assembly of the Republic, which took place in April 1990.

³ The Basic Constitutional Charter on the Sovereignty and Independence of the Republic of Slovenia (UL 1/91-I), proclaiming Slovenia to be an independent state on 25 June 1991 (4 months before the adoption of the Constitution), continues to be considered a ‘valid constitutional act’ of Slovenian constitutional law by the Constitutional Court (CCRS Rm-1/09, Opinion of 18 March 2010, UL 25/2010).

However, some of the solutions adopted in the 1991 Constitution also draw on the tradition of the pre-1991 constitutional system. The superior position of the representative assembly in relation to the other branches of government serves as a simple example. To what extent the aspiration of the Constitution to regulate or at least broadly define the country's economic and social system can be understood as a legacy of the pre-1991 system is a more complex issue, capable of influencing the understanding of the nature and content of the Slovenian constitutional identity.⁵ The gradual legal transition from the old to the new constitutional system (the old 1974 constitution was amended in 1989 and 1990 before the adoption of a new constitutional text) is an additional argument against viewing the Constitution as a revolutionary constitution.⁶ In that sense, it is somewhat helpful to invoke Rosenfeld's 'pacted transition model of constitution-making',⁷ but only to appreciate the limits of the categorisation proposed in the questionnaire and its relevance for the Slovenian case.⁸

1.1.2 The Constitution is concerned with both the organisation of the state and limiting public power, and both elements of the rationale are important. Regarding the latter, the provisions on human rights and fundamental freedoms, along with some of the central principles of the Constitution, such as the separation of powers, are of pivotal importance. This can be said for lawmaking, where constitutional standards are enforced through the case law of the Constitutional Court, as well as with regard to decision making in the judiciary and the public administration. At the same time, the fact that the democratic system in Slovenia is relatively young means that the constitutional provisions establishing the system of government are frequently invoked in public discussions triggered by events in the everyday political life of the country. The financial crisis has to a significant extent also led to a political crisis resulting in unstable governments, snap elections and referendums. In many cases these events have been unprecedented in the history of the nation, sparking the constitutional imagination of the general and professional public.

We can add to the discussion on the rationale of the Constitution that it also purports to lay down the fundamental features of the socio-economic system

⁴ Plesničar and Modic 2007.

⁵ The 'third rationale' of the Constitution (Ch. III) is outlined below in Sect. 1.1.2.

⁶ See above n. 2.

⁷ Rosenfeld 2009, pp. 197–201.

⁸ Rosenfeld's categorisation would also struggle to provide an adequate framework within which the Slovenian path to constitutionalism at the end of the XX century can be understood.

(Chap. III: Economic and Social Relations). This extends beyond protecting economic and social human rights (some of the third generation human rights, e.g. the right to social security including old-age pension, health care and education, are also entrenched in Chap. II ‘Bill of Rights’). The provisions of Chap. III further protect collective industrial action,⁹ natural and cultural heritage, free economic initiative within the boundaries of the public interest, etc. Some of the provisions in the chapter enjoy the status of a justiciable human right (e.g. right to a healthy living environment, Art. 72).¹⁰ Other provisions (e.g. on housing, Art. 78) have a programmatic character.¹¹ Proposed amendments to Chap. III are discussed below in Sect. 3.6.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 The first EU-related constitutional reform was the 1997 amendment of Art. 68, the provision on acquisition of land by foreigners. The ‘Europe Agreement’, an association agreement between the members of the then European Communities and Slovenia, envisaged a liberalisation of land acquisition by foreigners.¹² The agreement was found partly unconstitutional by the Constitutional Court, which triggered an amendment process.¹³ With the constitutional reform, land acquisition was liberalised and subjected to conditions laid down by a statute or an international agreement.¹⁴

The central EU-related constitutional reform took place in 2003, which saw yet another amendment of Art. 68, an amendment of Art. 47 (the absolute prohibition on extradition of a national citizen was relativised) and the introduction of the ‘Europe clause’ (Art. 3.a).¹⁵ The latter allows for transfer of the exercise of part of Slovenia’s sovereign rights to international organisations by virtue of ratification of an international treaty (para. 1; see Sect. 1.3.1). It also provides for a referendum that can be called prior to the ratification of such a treaty (para. 2; see Sect. 1.4.2). Article 3.a also refers to the law of the international organisations mentioned in

⁹ See also Sect. 2.2.1.

¹⁰ Čebulj 2011, p. 1027.

¹¹ Kresal 2011, p. 1080.

¹² Europe Agreement establishing an association between the European Communities and their Member States, acting within the framework of the European Union, of the one part, and the Republic of Slovenia, of the other part, [1999] OJ L 51/3.

¹³ CCRS Rm-1/97 (OdlUS VI, 86).

¹⁴ Constitutional Act amending Art. 68 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, UL 42/97. See also Ribičič 2003, pp. 31–34.

¹⁵ Constitutional Act amending Chapter 1 and Arts. 47 and 68 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, UL 24/03.

Para. 1 (Para. 3; see Sect. 1.3.1) and entrenches the rights of Parliament in the new situation arising post-accession (Para. IV; see Sect. 1.4.1).

In 2013, a ‘fiscal rule’ was introduced in Art. 148 in order to comply with the obligations undertaken by Slovenia under the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance.¹⁶ The rule requires that the revenues and expenditures of the state budget must in principle be balanced in the medium term, without borrowing (or revenues must exceed expenditures). Article 148 foresees that a statute, adopted by the same majority as required for a constitutional amendment, will lay down the way in which the fiscal rule works in more detail.¹⁷

1.2.2 A proposal to initiate the procedure for amending the Constitution can be lodged by twenty deputies of the National Assembly, the Government or at least thirty thousand voters. The National Assembly votes upon such proposals. If a proposal is supported by two-thirds of the deputies present, the procedure to amend the Constitution is initiated (Art. 168 Constitution).

A successful vote is followed by a procedure in the Constitutional Commission, a body of the National Assembly. The Commission is composed of deputies from the political parties, proportionally to the size of each party’s parliamentary group in the National Assembly. The Commission, however, also convenes an ad hoc expert group, typically composed of law professors.

If the idea for the amendment of the Constitution enjoys sufficient support in the Constitutional Commission, the latter drafts the amendment for the National Assembly. Importantly, the drafting is thus withdrawn from the influence of the subject that initially triggered the procedure (e.g. the Government). The National Assembly (in plenary session) may not change the text (Arts. 172–181 Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly; hereinafter PoDZ-1).¹⁸

The proposal must be adopted by a two-thirds majority of all deputies. An amendment can still be subjected to a constitutional referendum if one-third of the deputies so require (Arts. 169–170 Constitution). This is a relatively onerous requirement, and no such referendum has yet been held.¹⁹

1.2.3 The prevalent view was that the accession to the EU required a constitutional amendment. The principal reasons were threefold. The first reason was that transfer

¹⁶ Constitutional Act amending Art. 148 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia (UZ148), UL 47/13.

¹⁷ I.e. the mode and timeframe of exercising the rule, criteria to determine whether exceptional circumstances prevent it, etc. This statute was to be adopted within 6 months of the constitutional reform (Sect. II UZ148). The draft Fiscal Rule Act (ZFisP-1) was still in parliamentary procedure in June 2015 (EPA 0227-VII).

¹⁸ Rules of Procedure of the National Assembly, UL 92/07, 105/10, 80/13.

¹⁹ Kaučič ascribes this difficultly attainable quorum of deputies to a drafting error. Kaučič 2011b, p. 1545.

of a part of sovereignty to another entity under an international treaty would be unconstitutional without express authorisation in the text of the Constitution. Secondly, without a collision rule between EU law and national constitutional law, the Constitutional Court could find itself in a position where it would have to declare EU law unconstitutional. Thirdly, given the symbolic and constitutive value of sovereignty, accession to the EU required a high level of transparency in constitutional lawmaking.²⁰

Despite the fact that Art. 3.a was adopted in order to provide a constitutional basis for the entry of Slovenia into the EU, the text of the article does not expressly refer to it. It instead refers to an international organisation. Matej Avbelj traces this approach to constitutional drafting back to the ‘international law’ approach to the understanding of the EU, which does not sufficiently distinguish the EU from the sphere of international law and international organisations.²¹

At the time of drafting, a more concretised text was also on the table, explicitly referring to the EU. It seems that the abstract, ‘minimalist’ approach was chosen for the following reasons. First, a broad phrasing can accommodate the different outcomes of the evolution of the legal nature of the EU and the related terminology (Community/Union). Secondly, the Slovenian membership was not completely certain at the time of drafting. Thirdly, the abstract phrasing of the constitutional provisions, capable of accommodating a wide range of legal and factual situations, was considered to be part of the Slovenian constitutional tradition. Moreover, it seems that there was an important time factor that in the end curtailed discussions in the Constitutional Commission of the National Assembly.²²

The abstract approach to the wording of the ‘Europe clause’ was advocated by the Government that initiated the amendment procedure. An increasing number of experts advised against the approach taken by the Government, and this opposing view also became prevalent in the expert group of the Constitutional Commission. However, the expert group failed in its attempt to replace the abstract approach with a compromise ‘combined’ approach in the final stages of the procedure in the Constitutional Commission. Under the combined approach, there would have been a clause that explicitly authorised the transfer of the exercise of part of sovereignty to the EU, but also another clause which would have abstractly allowed for the exercise of sovereignty to be partly transferred to an international organisation or international tribunal.²³

1.2.4 There have been no further amendment proposals in relation to the EU that have not materialised in practice.

²⁰ Cerar 2003b, pp. 6–7.

²¹ Avbelj 2012b, p. 6.

²² Cerar 2003a, pp. 1463–1474; see also Sect. 1.4.2.

²³ Cerar 2003a, pp. 1464–1465.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 Transfer of the exercise of a part of Slovenia's sovereign rights to 'international organisations' and the conditions therefor are envisaged in Art. 3.a(1):

Pursuant to a treaty ratified by the National Assembly by a two-thirds majority vote of all deputies, Slovenia may transfer the exercise of part of its sovereign rights to international organisations which are based on respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, democracy, and the principles of the rule of law and may enter into a defensive alliance with states which are based on respect for these values.

Hence, according to the text of the Constitution, only the exercise of sovereignty and not sovereignty itself can be transferred. Behind this wording is arguably the idea that transfer is not eternal in the sense that Slovenia could at some point in the future resume exercising its sovereignty. However, this phrasing and its explanation have been met with scepticism.²⁴ Notably, the majority required for the ratification of an Art. 3.a treaty is the same as the majority required for a constitutional amendment.

In line with the abstract 'international organisation' approach of Art. 3.a, the text of para. 3 provides that [...]legal acts and decisions adopted within international organisations to which Slovenia has transferred the exercise of part of its sovereign rights shall be applied in Slovenia in accordance with the legal regulation of these organisations.

This accommodates the supremacy and direct effect of EU law in the Slovenian constitutional order.

1.3.2 The key decision in the case law of the Slovenian Constitutional Court on sovereignty is its 2003 decision on the 'Vatican Agreement'.²⁵ Adopted after Art. 3. a had already been inserted into the Constitution (albeit not on this basis), it emphasises that neither the internal nor the external element of sovereignty are absolute, the latter because of public international law. Sovereignty prevents the state from transferring sovereign powers to other states or institutions; Art. 3.a is the only exception (allowing for transfer of the exercise of sovereign powers).²⁶

The position in the Vatican Agreement decision served as the basis for the recent State Holding & Bank Stability Referendum decision of the Constitutional Court, with which it prevented the holding of a legislative referendum on two anti-crisis measures.²⁷ Avbelj has commented that in this decision, the Court demonstrated its awareness that Slovenia will have to take into consideration the existence of a host

²⁴ Cerar 2003a, pp. 1471–1474.

²⁵ Agreement between the Republic of Slovenia and the Holy See on legal issues, UL 13/2004.

²⁶ CCRS Rm-1/02, UL 118/2003, paras. 22– 24.

²⁷ CCRS U-II-1/12, U-II-2/12, UL 102/2012.

of transnational actors and learn to react to their impulses if it is to retain its ‘legal and political’ sovereignty.²⁸

The National Assembly opposed the referendum by claiming that failure to enact the Act on the Measures to Strengthen Bank Stability (ZUKSB)²⁹ would push Slovenia into a bail-out situation. European and IMF financial assistance would lead to an encroachment upon sovereignty contrary to Art. 3.a. The Constitutional Court rejected this view and held that the sovereignty of Slovenia entails the prerogative to conclude international agreements. A financial assistance agreement with the IMF would not per se amount to an impermissible encroachment on sovereignty, rather it is the substance of the international agreement that would need to be examined.

1.3.3 The text of the Constitution itself sets a limit to transfer of the exercise of sovereign rights. Such transfer may only be to an international organisation that is based on (1) respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, (2) democracy and (3) the principles of the rule of law (*pravna država*³⁰ in Slovenian). This provision was modelled after Art. 23(1) of the German Grundgesetz and can be understood as introducing a kind of causa for accession to the EU.³¹ The selection of the three substantive limits by the constitutional legislature (human rights, democracy, pravna država) was careful and reflects the general perception of what the essential constitutional principles are. Each of these three principles is unattainable unless all three are respected, while at the same time they set limits to one other.³²

The limits to transfer cannot be understood as empowering the Constitutional Court to reject the application of individual EU legal norms that would be found incompatible with the Constitution. The limits would probably only be invoked should the EU at some point ‘in its fundaments’ digress from these constitutional principles. In such a scenario, the limits could provide a legal basis for the Slovenian authorities to reject the application of EU legal acts and refuse to execute decisions of the EU.³³ Nevertheless, the text prescribing the limits to transfer can serve to infuse the Slovenian court with some self-confidence when it needs to take a stance with regard to the effects of EU law.³⁴

1.3.4 The Constitution does not explicitly declare itself supreme, but it does, however, command that all ‘statutes, regulations, and other general acts’ must be in conformity with it (Art. 153(1)), in reference to domestic legal norms. The Constitution also envisages control of the conformity of treaties with the

²⁸ Avbelj 2013c, p. 6. See also the opinion of Judge Petrič infra n. 150.

²⁹ UL 105/12.

³⁰ See Sect. 2.1.3.

³¹ Testen 2011, p. 91.

³² Cerar 2011, pp. 78–79.

³³ Ibid.

³⁴ Testen 2011, p. 91.

Constitution (discussed below in Sect. 3.4.1). Theoretically then, a review of the constitutionality of a new treaty of EU primary law is not excluded.³⁵ When it comes to EU secondary law, the Constitutional Court, citing Foto-Frost, has declared its respect for the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Justice (ECJ) over questions of validity.³⁶ At the same time, the Court has not relinquished its jurisdiction over domestic legal acts implementing EU law.³⁷ As we have recently seen in U-I-295/13 (see Sect. 2.6.1), it seems that the Constitutional Court will exercise this jurisdiction in dialogue with the ECJ. However, the Court has so far refused to choose between the unconditional supremacy of EU law over the Constitution on the one hand and the possibility that EU law would in exceptional circumstances have to give way to the Slovenian Constitution. The Court again refused to rule on this issue in the State Holding & Bank Stability Referendum case (see Sect. 1.3.2). Notably, in this case the Court found that it did not face a dilemma due to the ‘gravitas of the respect for EU law as a value of constitutional law’, based on Art. 3. a Constitution.³⁸

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The essential guarantee of the participation of the National Assembly in EU affairs is entrenched in the Constitution, establishing a ‘Danish model’ of the relationship between Parliament and Government in EU affairs.³⁹ According to Art. 3.a(4):

In procedures for the adoption of legal acts and decisions in international organisations to which Slovenia has transferred the exercise of part of its sovereign rights, the Government shall promptly inform the National Assembly of proposals for such acts and decisions as well as of its own activities. The National Assembly may adopt positions thereon, which the Government shall take into consideration in its activities. The relationship between the National Assembly and the Government arising from this paragraph shall be regulated in detail by a statute adopted by a two-thirds majority vote of deputies present.

However, should the Government disregard its duties to inform and to take the positions of the National Assembly into consideration, only a political sanction could be imposed.⁴⁰ A more detailed system of parliamentary participation is laid down in a statute adopted with a qualified majority of two-thirds of deputies present.⁴¹

³⁵ See also Nerad 2012, p. 387.

³⁶ CCRS U-I-113/04, Order of 8 July 2004, UL 83/04, para. 7; Oven 2014, p. 25.

³⁷ For example in CCRS U-I-65/13, Order of 26 Sept 2013, para. 7.

³⁸ CCRS U-II-1/12, U-II-2/12, UL 102/2012, para. 53.

³⁹ Avbelj 2012a, p. 346.

⁴⁰ Grad 2007, p. 112.

⁴¹ UL 34/04, 43/10, 107/10. See also Grad 2007, p. 111.

In the Act on Cooperation between the National Assembly and the Government in EU Affairs (ZVSDZVZEU), the National Assembly has recognised that it is the Government that represents Slovenia and furthers its positions in the processes in the institutions of the Union. The Government is independent and accountable in EU affairs, but within the boundaries set by the Constitution, the statute regulating the Government and the ZSDZVZEU (Art. 2). This dominant position of the Government is balanced by the rights of the National Assembly safeguarded in the ZSDZVZEU. The National Assembly, through its standing committees, participates in the formulation of the positions of Slovenia in those EU affairs that would – given their substance – otherwise fall within the competence of the National Assembly (Art. 4). The Government's duty to extensively inform is with regard to Art. 4 EU affairs (Arts. 8–9). The Act instructs the National Assembly to discuss any proposed changes to the founding Treaties and adopt a position. A position on the political direction that Slovenia will take in the EU institutions is also to be adopted in a plenary debate once a year (Art. 5).

The ZSDZVZEU only safeguards the rights of the National Assembly and does not foresee any role for Slovenia's weak and unusually composed second chamber of Parliament, the National Council. The latter challenged the ZSDZVZEU before the Constitutional Court, claiming that the Act is incompatible with the Lisbon Treaty (sic). The Court established that the distribution of powers among organs of the state in relation to EU affairs is by and large a matter for national law. Given that the National Council is not mentioned in Art. 3.a, the Court found that the ZSDZVZEU was in conformity with the Constitution.⁴²

1.4.2 There has only been one EU-related referendum, held on 23 March 2003. The electorate was asked to vote not only on Slovenian membership in the EU, but also in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).⁴³ Unlike several other Member States that joined the EU in the 2004 enlargement but had been members of NATO for some time, Slovenians faced two major decisions on the (geo)political course that their country was about to take at exactly the same time. Joining the EU enjoyed significantly broader support than joining NATO.⁴⁴

As was mentioned above (Sect. 1.2.3), time was an important factor in the referendum story. The referendum was called by the National Assembly on 30 January 2003, and the date of the ballot was set. The referendum was called as a consultative referendum, i.e. a referendum without legally binding results for the organs of the state.⁴⁵ Less than a month later, on 27 February 2003, the

⁴² CCRS U-I-17/11, UL 87/2012.

⁴³ See Sect. 3.1.1 regarding membership in NATO.

⁴⁴ 89.64% of the votes cast were in support of EU membership, in comparison to 66.08% in favour of joining NATO. The turnout was approximately 60%. See National Electoral Commission, Report on the referendum on the accession of Slovenia to the EU, 1 April 2003, <http://www.dvkr.si/files/files/porocilo-o-referendumu-EU.pdf>.

⁴⁵ Ordinance calling a consultative referendum on the accession of the Republic of Slovenia to the European Union, UL 13/03.

constitutional amendment inserting Art. 3.a into the text of the Constitution was adopted, and para. 2 of the new Art. 3.a laid down the rules for referendums on transfers of powers:

Before ratifying a treaty referred to in the preceding paragraph, the National Assembly may call a referendum. A proposal is passed in the referendum if a majority of voters who have cast valid votes vote in favour of the same. The National Assembly is bound by the result of such referendum. If such referendum has been held, a referendum regarding the statute on the ratification of the treaty concerned may not be called.

The constitutional act also provided that the EU and NATO referendums shall be considered to fall under Art. 3.a.⁴⁶ The popular vote was thus linked to the EU amendments, albeit in a peculiar manner.

The haste with which the referendum was coupled with the constitutional reform seems to have been behind the questionable decision for an ‘abstract approach’ to the phrasing of Art. 3.a. Applying Art. 3.a to the March 2003 referendums first and foremost meant that the result was legally binding on the National Assembly. As far as future referendums are concerned, it is important to note that an Art 3.a referendum is not obligatory. Whether such referendum will be called or not lies within the discretion of the National Assembly.

Igor Kaučič has warned that, strictly speaking, the object of an Art. 3.a referendum is not the treaty in question nor the statute ratifying the treaty, but an individual question that is of crucial or central importance to the treaty.⁴⁷ In 2003, the voters voted on whether they were in favour of Slovenia becoming a member of the European Union. This approach put into question the ‘usefulness’ of an Art. 3.a referendum for future reforms of the European Union, where it might be more difficult to identify the central question of the treaty. The relevance of a referendum where the electorate decides on a narrow point addressed by the treaty in question is likewise questionable. This inevitably raises the question whether the Art 3.a referendum was at all conceived as a functional tool of direct democracy in the processes of supranational integration or rather as an una tantum event based on an abstractly worded constitutional basis.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 The 2003 reform The decision for a constitutional reform was based predominantly on the scholarly opinion that without such reform, accession to the EU would be unconstitutional. However, it seems that the influence of scholars was much more limited when it came to the shaping of the amendments. It seems that in the desire to provide additional, ‘constitutional’ legitimacy and weight to the referendum, politicians were ready to settle for a suboptimal phrasing of Art. 3.a, sacrificing a lengthier and more profound debate. This settling and sacrifice seem to have been unnecessary in relation to the process of joining the EU. The 89.64% vote in favour of joining the Union reflects the wide support that European integration enjoyed among the electorate. As far as the European Union was concerned, engaging in legal engineering instead of a substantial debate seems to have been uncalled for. It has to be taken into account, however, that the parallel process of joining NATO was much more controversial and might have lead the political elite to rig the rules of the game somewhat.⁴⁸ In that sense, choosing an abstract, ‘minimalist’ approach to the constitutional reform and intentionally avoiding any explicit reference to the EU or NATO might have served the additional purpose of ‘pooling’ the legitimacy of both integration processes in order to ensure a smooth entry into both organisations. It seems that the whole process would have been more democratically and intellectually honest if the Constitution had, in the words of Confucius, ‘called things by their proper name’.

⁴⁶ Sect. II, Constitutional Act amending Chapter 1 and Arts. 47 and 68 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, UL 24/03.

⁴⁷ Kaučič 2011a, p. 85.

This is not, however, to dismiss the explanations for the choice of the ‘abstract’ model provided by Slovenian scholars. In particular, the argument was put forth that the abstract model is compatible with the standard practice of constitutional drafting, which often opts for laconic phrases, combining them with a rule that prescribes that a statute is required to regulate the matter further.⁴⁹ From my personal experience in observing and participating in the drafting of constitutional amendments (albeit not the EU-related ones), the prominent constitutionalists indeed seem to have a certain sense of what kind of wording is appropriate in the text of the Constitution. This indefinable aesthetics of constitution-making is probably a result of practice or custom and connected to the otherwise frequently cited belief that constitutional amendments are to be written ‘with a trembling hand’, i.e. with great caution and reserve. The laconic, ‘aesthetic’ approach might well partly be behind the division of the matter of the fiscal rule between constitutional and statutory text, discussed in Sect. 1.2.1.⁵⁰

Regarding some of the other matters covered by EU amendments in other Member States, a possible explanation for why Slovenia has not enacted similar clauses is that the Constitution in its original text was to a certain extent already one of ‘open statehood’. It is worth noting, for example, that the original text of the Constitution (1991) foresaw the possibility for a statute to grant electoral votes to foreigners, and the legislature indeed did so even before Slovenia joined the EU.⁵¹

⁴⁸ Traynor, I. (2003, March 22). Slovenia split in run-up to Nato referendum. The Guardian. <http://www.theguardian.com/world/2003/mar/22/iantraynor>.

⁴⁹ E.g. Art. 12.

⁵⁰ The other possible reason would be strategic: by ‘throwing a bone’, i.e. introducing the constitutional reform, the country probably assuaged the financial markets and bought time before more invasive measures were taken with the adoption of the fiscal rule statute.

⁵¹ The active right of permanently resident foreigners to vote in the indirect elections to the National Council, the upper chamber of Parliament, was recognised in 1992. Article 2 National Council Act; however, the right to vote in local elections dates back to 2002, before accession.

The 2013 reform of Art. 148 The introduction of the fiscal rule was not uncontested. First, opinions diverged on whether the treaty required Slovenia to change the constitutional text.⁵² Secondly, Slovenian constitutional scholars felt that there was no room for a strong expression of ideology or one particular economic doctrine in the constitution. Constitutionalisation represents a long-term commitment that would require considerable effort to be overturned in the future, when the economic reality or policy may change.⁵³ Additionally, the reasonableness of pursuing the European project by imposing a top-down constitutional reform on the Member States was questioned.⁵⁴ It has also been pointed out that tension between debt limitations and the concept of the social state is inevitable, with calls made for the priority of the latter as a fundamental value of the Constitution.⁵⁵

1.5.2 Not applicable.

1.5.3 The national constitution remains a powerful tool in the hands of the citizenry of a Member State whenever concerns arise that the power to make decisions on issues that affect them might shift from the democratic organs of the Member State to more distant centres, or simply wither away, with the hands of the elected politicians tied, as was the case with the Fiscal Compact (see above Sects. 1.2.1 and 1.5.1). The eurozone crisis has shown how quickly the Member States positioned the newly established rules and mechanisms (European Stability Mechanism; the Banking Union) in the grey postnational zone of Ersatzunionsrecht rather than within EU law.⁵⁶ A strong case can be made for the requirement that such treaties must be submitted to a regime similar to the Art. 3.a regime (heightened ratification threshold, and substantive requirements for respect for human rights, pravna država and democracy). However, given the wording of Art. 3.a., it is likely that they would fall outside its scope of application. In a potential future constitutional reform, especially one that would introduce a clause calling Europe by its proper name (see above Sect. 1.5.1), I would support combining the latter with a more broadly applicable provision. Such a clause would be capable of submitting a range of different mechanisms of global and regional governance to the requirement of respect for the fundamental values of the Constitution.

⁵² On this debate, see Ahtik et al. 2014, p. 530.

⁵³ Bugarič 2012, p. 3; Vuksanović 2011, pp. 41– 42.

⁵⁴ Nahtigal 2012, p. 22.

⁵⁵ Nahtigal 2012, p. 22; Strban 2012, p. 3.

⁵⁶ Federal Constitutional Court of Germany, 2 BvR 1390/12, Judgment of 12 September 2012, para. 153; Bardutzky and Fahey 2014, p. 343.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 The Constitution, as one of its basic principles, establishes the duty of the state to protect human rights on its territory (Art. 5). It further provides for a comprehensive catalogue of human rights (Chap. II).

The initial provisions of the Chapter guarantee equality in the exercise of human rights (Art. 14(1)) and provide for structural rules on the exercise and limitation of human rights and fundamental freedoms (Art. 15(1–3)). Importantly, the non-enumeration clause (Art. 15(5)) opens the catalogue: no human right or fundamental freedom entrenched in a legal act that is in force in Slovenia may be restricted on the grounds that it is not recognised by the Constitution (see Sect. 3.2.2).

The Constitution guarantees judicial protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms and restitution of the consequences of human rights violations (Art. 15(4)). An individual alleging a human rights violation by an individual legal act (court judgment, administrative decision, etc.) can access the Constitutional Court via a constitutional complaint (modelled after the German Verfassungsbeschwerde) after other remedies have been exhausted (Art. 160).

The Constitution expressly prohibits the retroactive effect of statutes, regulations and other general acts, and lays down the only exception from this rule (Art. 155).⁵⁷ Legal certainty, protection of legitimate expectations and, perhaps most notably, proportionality are considered elements of the principle of pravna država, entrenched in Art. 2 Constitution (see Sect. 2.1.3).

Pravna država is not considered a human right, so one cannot base a constitutional complaint to the Constitutional Court on an allegation that it has been violated. Nevertheless, Art. 2 can and does serve as a yardstick in the procedure for the review of constitutionality of legislation (and other general acts). This procedure can be abstract, triggered by a number of privileged and semi-privileged applicants, concrete (a preliminary ruling-like mechanism initiated by the iudex a quo) and, under certain conditions, also accessible to individuals aggrieved by the norm in question.

2.1.2 The Constitution distinguishes between defining the manner in which a human right is exercised (Art. 15(2)), on the one hand, and limiting a human right (Art. 15(3)) on the other.

A statute can define how a human right is to be exercised ‘whenever the Constitution so provides or where this is necessary due to the particular nature of an individual right or freedom’. For example: ‘[e]very citizen has the right, in accordance with statute, to participate either directly or through elected representatives in the management of public affairs' (Art. 44 Constitution, emphasis added).⁵⁸

⁵⁷ ‘Only a statute may provide for retroactive effect of some of its provisions, if this is required in the public interest and under the condition that no acquired rights are infringed.’ (Art. 155(2)).

On the other hand, human rights and fundamental freedoms can only be limited by the rights of others and in the cases that are provided by the Constitution. First, as for limitations based on the rights of others, the text of the Constitution does not explicitly state that such right must be a constitutional or human right; however, a limitation imposed on a human right is not likely to pass the proportionality test if it is grounded in a right of lower rank (e.g. statutory, contractual).⁵⁹ Secondly, there can be a statutory reservation that limits a human right. For example, the right to free movement (which is to be distinguished from the right to personal freedom) can be limited by statute only when this is necessary to ensure the conduct of criminal procedure, to prevent the spread of a contagious disease, to protect public order or if this is required for the defence of the state (Art. 32). In addition, the Constitutional Court has recognised that human rights can be limited on a third ground: the public interest.⁶⁰

It is difficult to distinguish between a statutory provision that regulates the exercise of a human right (a para. II case) and a limitation of a human right (a para. III case). The distinction is nevertheless important: a lower threshold will be applied to cases where the legislature has regulated the exercise of a human right: it will suffice to show that the legislative solutions are not arbitrary, irrational, etc. However, whenever there is a limitation on a human right, the legislation will be submitted to a proportionality test.⁶¹

2.1.3 The Constitution (Art. 2) declares Slovenia to be a pravna država, a concept that can be considered equivalent to the German Rechtsstaat. The Slovenian term almost literally translates into (or from) the German equivalent; it is customarily translated into English as 'state governed by the rule of law'. Scholarship considers pravna država, democracy (Art. 1) and the social (welfare) state (socialna država; Art. 2) to be fundamental general constitutional principles.⁶²

The discussion of the contents of this principle in the only commentary of the Constitution mostly draws on German commentaries of the Grundgesetz (Maunz/Duerig).⁶³ The majority of what is traditionally considered to be safeguarded by the principle of Rechtsstaat is entrenched expressis verbis in several provisions of the Slovenian Constitution: the principle of separation of powers (Art. 3), limitations on restrictions of human rights (Art. 15, see Sect. 2.1.2), the binding of the executive to statutory legislation (Art. 120(2)), the hierarchy of legal acts (Art. 153), the

⁵⁸ CCRS U-I-47/94, OdlUS IV, 4, para. 2; Avbelj 2011, p. 732.

⁵⁹ Testen 2002a, p. 198.

⁶⁰ Ibid., p. 200.

⁶¹ Ibid., p. 196.

⁶² Šturm 2002, p. 53. Brkan and Nendl 2012 accord pravna država a pivotal role in the constitutional order.

⁶³ Šturm 2002, p. 54.

prohibition of retroactive effect (Art. 155), the obligation to publish legal norms (Art. 154), the right to appeal and judicial review (Art. 25), the right to a constitutional complaint (Art. 160, see supra) and a system of procedural guarantees across the different procedures conducted by organs of public power (Arts. 17–31).

There are, however, three essential elements of pravna država not expressly codified in the text of the Constitution, but which have instead been recognised as such by the Constitutional Court:

- the principle of proportionality,⁶⁴
- the principle of the protection of trust in the law, which requires that legal regulation be stable and foreseeable, and sets a limit on the de facto retroactive effect of legal norms;⁶⁵
- the principle of clarity and coherence of legal norms, which aims at determining legal relationships to a sufficient level of exactness to exclude the arbitrariness of the organs of public power.⁶⁶ Norms need to be clear and precise so that it is possible to determine the meaning of the norms using the methods of legal interpretation.⁶⁷ This principle also precludes the formulation of a norm in such a loose manner that the definition of the content of the norm would de facto lay in the hands of the authority enforcing the norm.⁶⁸

In the context of this report, this becomes important when read together with the provisions of the Constitution that require that certain norms can only be adopted in the form of a statute (zakon). In addition to the rules mentioned above (only a statute can regulate the exercise of a human right and statutory reservations, etc.), the form of a statute is generally required whenever rights or duties are conferred on ‘citizens and other persons’ (Art. 87), in order to define criminal offences (nulla poena nullum crimen sine lege praevia – Art. 28) and in order for the state to ‘impose taxes, customs duties, and other charges’ (Art. 147).

The provision set out in Art. 87 accords the role of the ‘essential legal acts’ in the Slovenian legal system to statutes.⁶⁹ Peter Pavlin has remarked that this is not merely true on the normative level; the statutes play this very role in the reality of the legal system as well. Sub-statutory, i.e. executive or other general legal acts can only regulate certain details regarding the exercise of a certain right or duty, and cannot hollow out or substitute its contents. ‘Rights’ in the sense of Art. 87 are not ⁶⁴ The principle of proportionality is also crucially linked to Art. 15(3), the provision on limitations on human rights and fundamental freedoms (see above Sect. 2.1.2). First, limitations on human rights and fundamental freedoms have to pass a proportionality test. Secondly, limitations are themselves limited, this also means that there are cases where the proportionality test cannot be used to justify a limitation (I am grateful to Andraž Zidar for this remark).

⁶⁵ See e.g. CCRS U-I-47/94, UL 13/95.

⁶⁶ See e.g. CCRS U-I-282/94, OdlUS IV, 108.

⁶⁷ CCRS U-I-32/00, UL 73/03.

⁶⁸ CCRS U-I-287/95, UL 68/96.

⁶⁹ CCRS U-I-40/96, OdlUS VI, 46.

only human or constitutional rights, but all rights.⁷⁰ It should be added that the impact of the use of the zakon as a legal form goes beyond the democratic legitimacy bestowed through the deliberations and vote in the directly elected National Assembly. Before a zakon comes into force, it is also exposed to potential further verification through a possible veto in the National Council and a legislative referendum that can be demanded by 40,000 voters. After a zakon has entered into force, however, it enjoys a privileged position in the legal system: courts of law are only bound by the Constitution and statutes (Art. 125 Constitution). They can refuse to apply a sub-statutory act that is not in conformity with the Constitution or the statutes (exceptio illegalis).

Pravna država and the derived or related principles are widely applied in the review of constitutionality and are the basis of extensive Constitutional Court case law.

In addition to the field of constitutional law, pravna država plays an important political role. The recent economic crisis (2009–ongoing) has caused a strong sentiment in society that the legal system was unable both to prevent and later to penalise the actions that damaged the economic system (politically sanctioned toxic loans issued by state-owned banks in order to finance managerial takeovers, acts of corruption and cartel agreements in large public tenders, etc.). Consequently, the public has criticised what it perceives as ‘inefficiency’ or even a ‘lack’ of rule of law, and expects that the legal system, in simplified terms, will ensure that the innocent walk, but even more that the guilty end up serving time. Given this atmosphere, it is not surprising that the winning party in the 2014 parliamentary election had stated that pravna država was its primary value and objective. The increased use of this notion in political discourse has probably already led to its diverging, multi-layered meanings. In the future, the challenge may lie in retaining the relevance and awareness of the core ideas of pravna država that are essential for the protection of the individual from excessive use of public power.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 There is no available evidence that the courts have transformed the optic or adjusted the balancing approach in a way that would favour economic freedoms over human rights. However, this could simply be due to the relatively limited engagement with EU law in Slovenian courts.⁷¹

In a contribution by Katarina Kresal Šoltes, a labour law scholar, the national constitution was explicitly positioned as relevant for the Viking and Laval controversy. The importance of the right (autonomy) of collective industrial negotiation was underlined, and it was emphasised that despite the status that the economic freedoms have been accorded in ECJ case law, they cannot trump fundamental rights, especially the right to collective industrial action that is entrenched in a range of international documents.⁷² Kresal Šoltes also claims a (national) constitutional status for the right to autonomous collective negotiation, derived from the provisions of Art. 76 Constitution,⁷³ and warns that the Constitution limits the limitations on human rights and fundamental freedoms (Art. 15(3), see Sect. 2.12). Kresal Šoltes has called for an interpretation of the ‘free market and competition rules of EC law’ that would – regardless of the Viking and Laval case law – refrain from limiting the right to collective industrial negotiation beyond the extent permitted under the constitutional traditions of the Member States.⁷⁴ Worth noting is also the perspective of Damjan Kukovec, who discusses the Viking and Laval controversy by openly describing himself as a legal scholar from a periphery Member State (i.e. Slovenia). In his view, the typical framing of the Viking and Laval discussion, i.e. freedom of movement versus right to collective industrial action, overlooks the centre-periphery dynamics of European integration.⁷⁵

⁷⁰ Pavlin 2011, pp. 1154–1155.

⁷¹ See Sect. 2.8.1.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

Introductory remark There are several clauses of the Slovenian Constitution that set limits on the power of the state in investigating and prosecuting crimes. Compared to international human rights documents, these provisions can be considered quite detailed: even some time limits are laid down by the Constitution itself. By way of illustration, a narrow selection of directly relevant articles – Art. 19 (Protection of Personal Liberty), Art. 20 (Orders for and Duration of Detention), Art. 23 (Right to Judicial Protection), Art. 25 (Right to Legal Remedies), Art. 27 (Presumption of Innocence), Art. 28 ((Principle of Legality in Criminal Law) and Art. 29 (Legal Guarantees in Criminal Proceedings) – contain almost 600 words (in their English translation). The text of these provisions has been partly provided in the footnotes in Sect. 2.3.

⁷² Kresal Šoltes 2009.

⁷³ ‘The freedom to establish, operate, and join trade unions shall be guaranteed.’

⁷⁴ Kresal Šoltes 2009, p. 485.

⁷⁵ Kukovec 2014.

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 The European Arrest Warrant (EAW) has not been contested based on the presumption of innocence.⁷⁶ This can possibly be traced back to the phrasing of the relevant constitutional provision.⁷⁷ In light of the Constitutional Court's case law, it is doubtful whether Art. 27 could be perceived as an argument against a measure such as the EAW. The Court does not consider the presumption of innocence to be an obstacle to the judicial detention of a criminal defendant ordered on the basis of the probability that the person in question might repeat the criminal act (Art. 201(1) (3) ZKP). The presumption of innocence is related to criminal guilt (nullum poena sine culpa)⁷⁸ and the key consequences derived from this presumption are closely linked to the establishment of criminal guilt: the onus probandi is on the state rather than on the defendant. Moreover, the risk of failing to prove the case is borne by the state, as the defendant is protected by the principle of in dubio pro reo.⁷⁹

2.3.1.2 A person who is to be surrendered to another Member State on the basis of an EAW has to first be brought before an investigating judge. The scope of the judicial review before surrender, in a nutshell, is the following: the judge will instruct the person with regard to his or her rights, the contents of the warrant and the possibility of consenting to surrender (Arts. 19–22 ZSDČEUKZ-1). If the person does not consent to surrender, the judge will hear the testimony of the person to determine whether there are statutory reasons for refusal to surrender (Art. 23).⁸⁰

The only information on refusals of EAWs by the courts is available from a study by the Institute of Criminology, which looked at all 58 warrants received in the first three years (2004–2007) after the entry into force of the European Arrest

⁷⁶ The author is grateful to Mojca Plesničar for confirming that this argument did not appear in the qualitative study that was based on a number of interviews with practitioners and policy-makers. See Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar 2009, pp. 501–522.

⁷⁷ Article 27 Constitution: 'Any person charged with criminal conduct shall be presumed innocent until found guilty by a final judgment.' Zupančič positions the Slovenian constitutional provision between the broader guarantee of the French Declaration on the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789 on the one hand and the narrower phrasing of Art. 6 ECHR, lamenting that the thus phrased provision is 'no longer a broad ethical postulate, but is rather limited to the context of criminal law'. Zupančič 2002, p. 302.

⁷⁸ Bele 2011, p. 412.

⁷⁹ CCRS U-I-18-93, UL 25/96, para. 67. We must note the institutional consequences of this understanding of the presumption of innocence. By unloading the burden and the risk of probation onto the 'state', it distinguishes the state in principal terms from the independent judiciary (Zupančič 2002, p. 303). This, in turn, requires that there is a prosecutor, an attorney of the state, who will pursue the state's case in an adversary manner.

⁸⁰ See also Šugman Stubbs 2008. It is in practice commonly considered the duty of the person to be surrendered to invoke grounds for refusal rather than this being an ex officio task of the court. Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar 2009, pp. 506–507.

Warrant Act (hereinafter ZENPP).⁸¹ Five of these warrants were rejected: three cases involved Slovenian citizens where the offence was committed on Slovenian territory, one was rejected due to amnesty/pardon and one warrant was rejected because the requesting authority failed to provide assurances.⁸² It seems that at least in the first years of the operation of the system, there were no refusals to execute an EAW based on concerns related to the presumption of innocence.

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 The principle of nullum crimen sine lege praevia is expressly entrenched in Art. 28 Constitution as the ‘principle of legality in criminal law’.⁸³ This article lays down a further formal requirement by referring to a statute (zakon); indeed, the provision set out in Art. 28 has been linked to Art. 87 Constitution by commentators (see above Sect. 2.1.3 on Art. 87).⁸⁴ Also, the Constitutional Court has found that the requirement that a statute defining a criminal offence be clear and precise (nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege certa) derives from the text of Art. 28.⁸⁵

Moja M. Plesničar and Katja Šugman Stubbs have warned that the significant differences between the Member States’ penal laws and the definitions of individual offences in the different systems can lead to a number of difficulties and to violation of the principle of legality as the fundamental principle of criminal law. The Slovenian lawyers who participated in the process of implementing mutual recognition, interviewed by Plesničar and Šugman Stubbs, assessed that the EU’s plunge into mutual recognition in the field of criminal law was too hasty, but at the same time they felt that it was too late for a renegotiation through which the review of double criminality could be reinstated. As an alternative, it was suggested that each Member State could compile a list of offences (criminalised under its own penal law) that belong to the categories set out in Art. 2 of the EAW Framework Decision⁸⁶ (EAWFD). In addition to this ‘positive list’, Member States could enact a ‘negative list’ which would enumerate the offences under penal law that definitely

⁸¹ UL 37/04. ZENPP was substituted by the Cooperation in Criminal Matters with the Member States of the European Union Act in 2008 (ZSKZDČEU; UL 102/07). A new act (ZSKZDČEU-1) was adopted in 2013.

⁸² Šugman Stubbs and Gorkič 2008, Sect. 11.4.2.e.

⁸³ ‘(1) No one may be punished for an act which had not been declared a criminal offence under statute or for which a penalty had not been prescribed at the time the act was performed. (2) Acts that are criminal shall be established and the resulting penalties pronounced according to the statute that was in force at the time the act was performed, except where a more recent statute adopted is more lenient towards the offender.’

⁸⁴ Zupančič 2002, p. 312 citing the dissenting opinion of Judge Zupančič, joined by Judges Šturm and Šinkovec, to the CCRS decision Up-40/94 (OdlUS IV, 136).

⁸⁵ CCRS U-I-247/96, UL 70/98, para. 11; Zupančič 2002, p. 313.

⁸⁶ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

do not fall within the EAWFD categories. This latter solution, however, was found to be more difficult to implement in practice.⁸⁷

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 In the Slovenian context, the issue of the right to a fair trial and the EAW was raised by the failed challenge of Zoran Matešič, whose surrender was requested by an Italian court, against the ZENPP before the Constitutional Court.⁸⁸ The constitutional concerns were also presented by Mr. Matešič's attorney in a periodical for legal professionals, and thus became more visible to academics and practitioners.⁸⁹

The case did not raise issues relating to in absentia trials, but rather addressed the right to a fair trial more generally. First, the challenge invoked the Art. 23(1) right to judicial protection, which not only guarantees everyone a formal appearance before a court, but also that the competent court will substantively review the matter at hand.⁹⁰ However, by limiting the court to a review of purely formal non-execution grounds, the EAW procedures prevent the judiciary from providing any substantive judicial protection. Similarly, this can be seen as a violation of the Art. 25 right to a legal remedy:⁹¹ the Higher Courts that review the orders issued by the first instance panels do not exercise any substantive second instance control. Thirdly, the criminal procedural guarantees set out in Art. 29 Constitution, entrenching everyone's right to a fair trial and more precisely the right of a person 'to present all evidence to his benefit' are ignored.⁹² The requested person de facto has no possibility to present evidence and if he did, it would be to no avail: even if ⁸⁷ Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar 2009, p. 207; Šugman Stubbs and Gorkič 2009a, p. 262; Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar 2009, p. 505.

⁸⁸ CCRS U-I-14/06, order of 22 June 2006, not reported. Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar 2009, pp. 516–517.

⁸⁹ Kovacič Mlinar 2006a, p. 13.

⁹⁰ Article 23 (Right to Judicial Protection):

'(1) Everyone has the right to have any decision regarding his rights, duties, and any charges brought against him made without undue delay by an independent, impartial court constituted by statute.'

'(2) Only a judge duly appointed pursuant to rules previously established by statute and by judicial regulations may judge such an individual.'

⁹¹ 'Everyone shall be guaranteed the right to appeal or to any other legal remedy against the decisions of courts and other state authorities, local community authorities, and bearers of public authority by which his rights, duties, or legal interests are determined.'

⁹² Article 29 (Legal Guarantees in Criminal Proceedings): 'Anyone charged with a criminal offence must, in addition to absolute equality, be guaranteed the following rights:
the right to have adequate time and facilities to prepare his defence;
the right to be present at his trial and to conduct his own defence or to be defended by a legal representative;

the right to present all evidence to his benefit; the right not to incriminate himself or his relatives or those close to him, or to admit guilt.'

the person were able to present convincing evidence that would disprove probable cause or refute the claims made against him or her in the requesting state, this would not have any impact whatsoever on the outcome of the judicial proceeding in the Slovenian court.⁹³

The challenge against the ZENPP was submitted to the Constitutional Court while the EAW procedure was still pending before the first instance court, together with a motion for interim relief. However, the Constitutional Court refused to grant interim relief. As a result, immediately after the second instance criminal court had confirmed the decision to surrender Mr. Matešič, he was surrendered to Italy by the police. Having been surrendered, he lost legal standing in the procedure before the Constitutional Court, and his challenge was dismissed on procedural grounds. The decision was ascribed to the Constitutional Court lacking the courage to take an active position on the protection of human rights in the context of EU law.⁹⁴

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar interviewed a Slovenian defence attorney who often represents persons requested under an EAW. The following is their summary of the lawyer's experience with requested persons, who are usually completely ignorant of the proceedings on EAW and expect that the hearing will give them a chance to prove their innocence. When faced with what seems to be merely an identification process they feel lost and bewildered. They are assigned a defence lawyer but usually are unable to communicate with him/her directly because of the language barriers between them. To requested persons, the entire process seems depersonalised and confusing, since they are usually unfamiliar with the system of surrender based on EAW, with the system in the executing State and very frequently with the system in the issuing country.⁹⁵

To my knowledge, there is no assistance available to persons surrendered on the basis of an EAW after surrender.⁹⁶ In discussing the burdens upon surrendered persons, three points should be made.

First, the burden of transportation to another country and undergoing a criminal trial there should in any case be made conditional upon a suitable standard of proof.

⁹³ Kovačič Mlinar 2006a p. 13.

⁹⁴ Kovačič Mlinar 2006b, p. 15; Erbežnik 2008, II–VII.

⁹⁵ Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar 2009, pp. 520–521.

⁹⁶ Article 11(2) EAWFD was from the beginning implemented in such a way that a person who is subject to an EAW has to be represented by a criminal defence attorney from the moment the person is brought before the investigating judge up to the actual surrender, with the attorney appointed ex officio if the person does not appoint one himself (Art. 15(4) ZENPP, Art. 16(1) ZSKZDČEU, Art. 17(1) ZSKZDČEU-1). Hence, while the legislature has recognised the need for legal counsel and representation in EAW procedures, it has confined this assistance to the territory under its jurisdiction.

According to the Slovenian Constitution, a judge may only order the detention of a person who can be reasonably suspected of having committed a crime (Art. 20 Constitution; emphasis added).⁹⁷ I see no compelling reason to adopt a lower standard for judges to detain and surrender persons under an EAW.

Secondly, in cases such as Symeou, where the person was surrendered on the basis of an EAW to face inhuman detention conditions, true concern for human rights protection in Europe does not limit itself to fear for the wellbeing of the fellow nationals of one's own Member State upon potential surrender to another Member State.⁹⁸ A finding that persons who are detained in a certain Member State suffer undue hardship should lead us not only to contest the system of judicial co-operation but the systemic violations of human rights in that Member State as well.

Thirdly, the potential for better ensuring the effective protection of the human rights of surrendered persons lies in involving a wide array of actors and institutions, from NGOs and defence lawyers to institutions on the national and European level, including ombudspersons. Traditionally, consular authorities are one of the initial points of assistance and information for a non-national facing a foreign repressive system. Despite the protection of this right being provided for in EU law (Art. 7 Directive 2013/48/EU⁹⁹), this unfortunately remains to a great extent dependent on the facilities and capabilities of the Member State. Slovenia, for example, has never had representations in all of the EU Member States, and has recently even closed some of its existing representations due to cuts in public spending. While this has happened in a number of countries, we cannot escape the fact that it is comparatively much more burdensome for smaller countries to ⁹⁷ Article 20 (Orders for and Duration of Detention):

‘(1) A person reasonably suspected of having committed a criminal offence may be detained only on the basis of a court order when this is absolutely necessary for the course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of public safety. (2) Upon detention, but no later than twenty-four hours thereafter, the person detained must be handed the written court order with a statement of reasons. The person detained has the right to appeal against the court order . . .’

It should be noted that the Constitution safeguards personal liberty also in a more general (in scope) yet nevertheless detailed provision of Art. 19 (Protection of Personal Liberty):

‘(1) Everyone has the right to personal liberty.

(2) No one may be deprived of his liberty except in such cases and pursuant to such procedures as are provided by law.

(3) Anyone deprived of his liberty must be immediately informed in his mother tongue, or in a language which he understands, of the reasons for being deprived of his liberty. Within the shortest possible time thereafter, he must also be informed in writing of why he has been deprived of his liberty. He must be instructed immediately that he is not obliged to make any statement, that he has the right to immediate legal representation of his own free choice and that the competent authority must, on his request, notify his relatives or those close to him of the deprivation of his liberty.’

⁹⁸ I am grateful to Monica Claes for this remark.

⁹⁹ Directive 2013/48/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 October 2013 on the right of access to a lawyer in criminal proceedings and in European arrest warrant proceedings, and on the right to have a third party informed upon deprivation of liberty and to communicate with third persons and with consular authorities while deprived of liberty, [2013] OJ L 294/1.

maintain a diplomatic and consular presence abroad. This becomes compounded, as smaller countries tend to first close their representations in other small countries.¹⁰⁰

2.3.4.2 To my knowledge, data on subsequent acquittals is not collected. A case could, however, be made for the collection and processing of a similar data set, as even some Slovenian judges feel that having knowledge of the outcome of the procedure that follows after a person has been surrendered would gradually deepen mutual trust between the judiciaries.¹⁰¹

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 See Sect. 2.3.3.1.

2.3.5.2 In his critique of mutual recognition in EU criminal law, Anže Erbežnik has warned that while Cassis de Dijon-style mutual recognition under the former first pillar has served to enhance European citizens' freedoms in the common market, transplanting this principle to criminal law without the prior substantial harmonisation of defence rights has mostly benefitted state authorities.¹⁰² The experts interviewed by Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar similarly found that former first-pillar EU law typically does not involve such subtle balances between the rights of the state and the rights of individuals.¹⁰³ This is aggravated by the fact that in the former third pillar, this principle was introduced as an intergovernmental project, in absence of a democratic debate.¹⁰⁴

2.3.5.3 Scholarship has warned that the ‘uncritical application of the principle of mutual recognition bears the danger of transforming the judge into a kind of a “ticking box” automaton checking only pre-established criteria and neglecting his/her duty of a critical assessment and safeguarding fundamental (constitutional) rights to the defendant’. This argument is grounded in the principle of separation of powers.¹⁰⁵ Zvonko Fišer has found the ZENPP to instrumentalise the judge.¹⁰⁶ In similar vein, the interpretation of the provision abolishing the dual criminality check for the 32 categories of offences, which was favoured by the European Commission and according to which the judge in the executing state is barred from

¹⁰⁰ Unfortunately, this observation goes hand in hand with Albi's concern that there are no proactive NGOs that would monitor such cases in smaller Member States. Albi 2015, p. 171.

¹⁰¹ Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar 2009, p. 520.

¹⁰² Erbežnik 2014a, pp. 138–139; citing Möstl 2010; Mitsilegas 2006.

¹⁰³ Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar 2009.

¹⁰⁴ Erbežnik 2014a, pp. 138–139.

¹⁰⁵ Erbežnik 2014a, p. 131.

¹⁰⁶ Fišer 2008, Sect. 3.4. Fišer currently serves as State Prosecutor General.

checking prima facie whether the legal qualification put forward by the requesting state is correct or even sensible, has been considered as insulting to the judicial function.¹⁰⁷ More generally, reducing the scope of judicial review has been considered to also reduce ‘the awareness that it is for the judiciary to observe and to enforce procedural safeguards as guaranteed by national constitutional orders, thus preserving the delicate balance between the individual and the state ... [certainly,] the balance has shifted’.¹⁰⁸

2.3.5.4 In my view, it is a fundamental premise of the exercise of public power that interference with the rights and freedoms of the individual must be in proportion with the legitimate interests pursued. The image of a judge whose intellectual activity has been reduced to ticking boxes and who has been purged of the constitutional constraints that should be present at all times is incompatible with this fundamental premise (and with the guarantees of Art. 20 Constitution, see Sect. 2.3.4.1). Stories such as that of Neeme Laurits,¹⁰⁹ for whom the execution of what proved to be a groundless EAW led to grave consequences for his private and family life, have to make us consider the guarantees provided by Art. 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and analogous national constitutional provisions.

As an illustration of how the right of family life (Arts. 53, 54 and 56 Constitution) can soften the effect of the penal system in a situation where a person is to be separated from his environment and sent abroad, consider the Vizgirda decision of the Slovenian Constitutional Court. The case is not connected to the issues of mutual recognition and does not apply EU law. However, the complainant, a Lithuanian citizen, had been convicted in a Slovenian court and was to be expelled from the national territory.¹¹⁰ The Supreme Court had rejected Mr. Vizgirda’s request for an extraordinary suspension of the expulsion sentence, in which he had pleaded that he had fathered a child – a Slovenian citizen, living in Slovenia. The Constitutional Court found that the penalty of expulsion served a legitimate goal of public safety. Nevertheless, in Mr. Vizgirda’s case, it was not proportionate in light of the constitutional right to family life and the rights of the child. Relying on ECHR case law, the Constitutional Court stressed that the deeper the integration of the person concerned in the country in question, the higher the level of protection from expulsion must be. The state was under a duty to consider a range of circumstances before it adopted a final decision.¹¹¹

The Vizgirda decision undoubtedly arose in a very different legal setting, which has to be taken into account when comparing it to EAW cases. Nevertheless, it demonstrates how constitutional judges are prepared to protect an individual’s right to family life even in the face of compelling public interest. That, I would suggest,

¹⁰⁷ Šugman Stubbs and Gorkič 2008, Sect. 9.1.2.

¹⁰⁸ Šugman Stubbs and Gorkič 2009b, p. 242.

¹⁰⁹ Albi 2015, p. 171.

¹¹⁰ Expulsion of a foreign national as a criminal sentence was abolished in 2008.

¹¹¹ CCRS Up-690/10, UL 42/2012.

should be a serious argument when analysing the law and policy behind cases such as that of Mr. Laurits.

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

In Slovenia, the state prosecutor (državni tožilec) is perceived as one of the parties in criminal proceedings. This role is not quasi-judicial, as is the case in some other Member States.¹¹² Erbežnik has warned that it is unsettling for a state such as Slovenia to sanction a direct execution per its judges of a decision taken by a state prosecutor in another Member State. The perception of the role of a prosecutor in a state is often historically rooted as an element of the state's legal culture and identity. Erbežnik fears that a possible spillover effect of the system of mutual recognition might be the obliteration of the differences in the perception of the role of the prosecutor in different Member States, and an overall trend towards the judicialisation of the prosecutor's role, with the prosecutor being armed with various powers over criminal suspects.¹¹³

Language seems to be an issue in the operation of systems based on mutual recognition. Smaller Member States can experience practical difficulties in arranging for the adequate translation of EAW requests, especially those issued by other small Member States, i.e. written in the less commonly spoken languages of the Union.¹¹⁴ In 2014, a police officer of the Ljubljana Schengen Compensatory Measures Unit wrote a very interesting short note defending the legal stance of the Police. The Police had refused to detain a Romanian citizen who was subjected to an EAW until a Romanian translator was found.¹¹⁵

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 A constitutional challenge against the Electronic Communications Act (ZEKom-1),¹¹⁶ the legislation implementing the Data Retention Directive,¹¹⁷ was ¹¹² The Office of the State Prosecutor General is a constitutional institution (Arts. 135–136).

¹¹³ Erbežnik 2010, p. 213; Erbežnik 2014a, pp. 141–143.

¹¹⁴ EAW requests are also accepted by Slovenian authorities if they are issued or translated into English (Art. 6(6) ZSKZDČEU-1). The concerns raised by this rule among the Slovenian practitioners, in a country highly sensitive of its linguistic identity, were recorded by Šugman Stubbs and Plesničar 2009, p. 520. As the official languages of Slovenia are defined by the Constitution (Art. 11), the use of other languages in legal proceedings could present a constitutional issue.

¹¹⁵ Jurič 2014, pp. 8–10.

¹¹⁶ UL 109/12.

¹¹⁷ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available filed by the Information Commissioner in 2013.¹¹⁸ The claim of the Commissioner was that the retention of data on such a massive scale is a disproportionate limitation on freedom of movement (Art. 32 Constitution), the right to privacy (Art. 35), the right to privacy of correspondence and other means of communication (Art. 37) and the right to protection of personal data (Art. 38). The Commissioner also put forward a claim that the implementation of the directive was flawed, as the Slovenian legislature defined a broader set of legitimate objectives than provided in the text of the Directive.

The Information Commissioner underlined that data retention under ZEKom-1 effectively violated the freedom of movement as it enabled location tracking and, as such, was capable of providing a complete record of an individual's movements. In that sense it was comparable to a hypothetical general obligation to carry location tracking chips. Similarly, there were concerns regarding freedom of speech, as the control of communications on such a scale can be expected to lead to self-censorship by individuals communicating with one another. With billions of calls and messages recorded and only several hundred requests made to the processors every year, as few as 0.012% of the personal data retained is ever used in pursuit of the objectives for which data retention was introduced.

The Commissioner also warned of a function creep. In the course of inspecting communication providers, it was established that the providers were receiving requests unrelated to criminal investigations, but rather in connection to, for example, civil litigation or labour disputes.¹¹⁹

In September 2013, the Constitutional Court decided to stay the proceedings and wait for the outcome of the cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 in the ECJ.¹²⁰ The decision to stay and wait was based on the finding that the Commissioner's claim was in effect that the Directive violated Arts. 7 and 8 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights.¹²¹ Hence, the Constitutional Court noted that 'the decision on the validity of the Directive is of key relevance to the review of constitutionality of national legislation'.¹²² The Court did not refer any questions for a preliminary ruling, as electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

¹¹⁸ The Information Commissioner is an independent authority charged with the protection of personal data and access to documents. The Commissioner reviews decisions to deny access to public documents and refusals to disclose personal data. (Act on the Information Commissioner, UL 113/05 and 51/07). The Commissioner has standing before the Constitutional Court, when in a procedure conducted by the Commissioner, a question of the constitutionality of the legislation that the Commissioner has to apply is raised. (Art. 23.a ZUstS).

¹¹⁹ The request of the Information Commissioner is available (in Slovene) at https://www.ip-rs.si/fileadmin/user_upload/Pdf/ocene_ustavnosti/ZEKom_-_Zahtega_za_oceno_ustavnosti_data_retention_.pdf.

¹²⁰ The Court found that the ECJ decision in Case C-301/06 Ireland v. Council was 'with regard to the issue of legal basis only' (emphasis added). CCRS U-I-65/13, Order of 26 Sept 2013, para. 9.

¹²¹ U-I-65/13, para. 5.

¹²² Ibid., para. 8.

similar proceedings were already in progress.¹²³ In the resumed proceedings (after the ECJ judgment), the Court established that even after the annulment of the Directive, data retention remained a matter for EU law: Directive 2002/58/EC¹²⁴ allows the Member States to adopt legislative measures encroaching on the confidentiality of data in transit, including data retention, when this is necessary, appropriate and adequate in a democratic society to serve a number of legitimate aims. The Constitutional Court found these requirements to correspond, in substance, to the requirement of proportionality that must be fulfilled in order for a limitation on a human right to be legal under Slovenian constitutional law. The Court annulled the contested provisions and ordered the processors to immediately destroy all retained data. While the Information Commissioner invoked several human rights provisions of the Constitution, the review by the Court was based on Art. 38(1), which focuses on the personal data aspect of the issue:

The protection of personal data shall be guaranteed. The use of personal data contrary to the purpose for which it was collected is prohibited.¹²⁵

It is clear from this case that the annulment of a ‘source’ directive is not sufficient to remove the legal norms that implement it from the Slovenian legal system. It is, however, questionable whether the precious resources of the Constitutional Court are well allocated with the Court taking over this ‘purification’ function, which could be left to the legislature. A solution (that would admittedly probably require some dialogue among the branches of government) could be found where the Court would only resume the proceedings (in the interest of protecting the individuals aggrieved by the implementing measure) if the legislative and executive branches were dragging their feet after an ECJ annulment. This is far from saying that the Court should not engage with EU law that violates human rights; in fact, it is almost the opposite. Rather than waiting for the ECJ to deliver a judgment and then going through the mental exercise of checking the conformity of the implementing measure with the Constitution, feeding on the arguments of the ECJ, the Court should do the mental exercise at an earlier stage and incorporate the results of the mental exercise into a reference for a preliminary ruling.

¹²³ Bardutzky 2014b.

¹²⁴ Directive 2002/58/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 July 2002 concerning the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector (Directive on privacy and electronic communications), [2002] OJ L 201/37.

¹²⁵ The focus on Art. 38(1) is interesting in its own right, as the provisions of Art. 37 (Protection of the Privacy of Correspondence and Other Means of Communication) offer stricter guarantees: ‘(1) The privacy of correspondence and other means of communication shall be guaranteed.

(2) Only a statute may prescribe that on the basis of a court order the protection of the privacy of correspondence and other means of communication and the inviolability of personal privacy be suspended for a set time where such is necessary for the institution or course of criminal proceedings or for reasons of national security.’

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 It is almost completely unimaginable that unpublished or secret legislation could ever be compatible with the Slovenian constitutional order. The very concept evokes nightmarish flashbacks of the Communist Party controlled regime that was removed in 1990–1991 – inter alia by adopting the new Constitution. There were two types of secret legislation in the former Yugoslavia. First, in addition to the Official Gazette, there was also a secret official gazette that was made available to only between 22 and 40 authorised recipients. The federal secret official gazette was established in 1980, and in the following year, all six constituent republics started issuing their own secret official gazettes. The scope of secret legislation was broad and comparable to the scope of ‘public’ legislation. In addition to numerous executive and sub-statutory acts, as many as 55 statutes (i.e. acts of the legislature of general application) were published in the federal secret official gazette; often, economic and financial regulation was published in this way. Secondly, before and after the introduction of the secret official gazette, there were legal norms in use that were too classified even for ‘secret publication’. These norms primarily dealt with state security. Based on this experience, the opinion was formed that secret legal norms are not legal norms at all; they merely pose as such and can never be part of the legal order.¹²⁶ According to the Constitutional Court, the ‘mere existence of secret norms that contained authorisations for the political police was tantamount to a gross violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms’.¹²⁷

The Constitution states that all general and abstract legal acts (predpis) have to be published before they can enter into force. Legal acts of the state are to be published in the Official Gazette; legal acts of the local communities are to be published in gazettes chosen by the communities (Art. 154). The Constitutional Court has built its Art. 154 case law mostly upon developing a material conception of the predpis. The form of a legal act is less relevant for the question whether the act needs to be published; the essential questions are whether the text contains any general and abstract legal norms, whether it regulates a right or a duty and whether it creates external legal effects.¹²⁸

¹²⁶ Šturm 1998, pp. 285–287; Testen 2002b, p. 1033.

¹²⁷ CCRS U-I-25/95, UL 5/98, para. 84. The case echoed in Sadurski’s account as follows: ‘No doubt the evocation of this recent history, from before the collapse of Yugoslavia, added a powerful persuasive force to the court’s hostility towards the use of such secretive means, even for the perfectly justifiable ends of fighting crime, particularly organised crime.’ Sadurski 2005, p 147.

¹²⁸ Šturm 2011, pp. 1363 et seq. In 1998, the Constitutional Court was seized with a challenge against a secret agreement between the defence ministries (or rather the military intelligence services) of Slovenia and Israel. The Court dismissed the challenge on procedural grounds given that there was no legal act whatsoever that the Court could review; however, obiter dicta, the Court made it clear that without complying with a proper procedure of ratification and publication, an agreement between two states cannot become part of the Slovenian legal order. CCRS U-I-128/98, Order of 23 September 1998, OdlUS VII, 173. See also Sect. 3.1.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 The first request for a preliminary ruling from the Constitutional Court expresses doubt as to the legality of the Commission's 'Banking Communication'.¹²⁹ At the time of writing, the case was pending before the ECJ.¹³⁰ A challenge was brought against the provisions of the Banking Act (ZBan-1)¹³¹ that were the legal basis for a bail-in operation, executed via decisions of the Bank of Slovenia and that affected the holders of bonds of five different Slovenian banks.

In response, the Government and the National Assembly argued that the contested provisions were adopted in order for Slovenia to comply with the requirements put forward by the European Commission in the Banking Communication. The only way that the Commission would find that the state aid given to the banks was legal was if Slovenia complied with the Banking Communication in advance.¹³² In effect, the enactment of the problematic provisions of the Banking Act was allegedly a 'transposition' of this, at least by name, soft law measure. The Constitutional Court has therefore first asked whether the Banking Communication, 'taking into account the legal effects that are de facto created' and given the exclusive competence of the European Union in state aid law, is to be interpreted as being binding for the Member States.

The Court has also asked for a preliminary ruling as to the validity of the Communication, to first determine whether it was within the boundaries of the Commission's competences. However, even if this should be the case, the Constitutional Court has its concerns with regard to the principle of protection of legitimate expectations and the right to private property.

According to the Court, legitimate expectations might be disrupted for the persons who held instruments of equity and debt that had been issued before the Banking Communication was issued. At the time of investing their assets, the affected persons did not know that in the future, state aid to banks would be made conditional upon negative changes to the instruments in their hands. With the exception of insolvency proceedings, there was no legal regime in existence that could lead to the deterioration or obliteration of their entitlements at the time when they chose to invest in the affected instruments. At the same time, the Court has recognised that there is an element of public interest in not limiting the temporal ¹²⁹ Communication from the Commission on the application, from 1 August 2013, of State aid rules to support measures in favour of banks in the context of the financial crisis ('Banking Communication'), [2013] OJ C 216/1; CCRS U-I-295/13, Order of 6 November 2014.

¹³⁰ Case C-526/14 Kotnik and Others [2006] ECLI:EU:C:2016:570.

¹³¹ UL 99/10 etc., the provisions contested in U-I-295/13 were inserted by the ZBan-1L amendments (UL 96/13).

¹³² CCRS U-I-295/13, Order of 6 November 2014, para. 10.

scope of the Banking Communication. To do so would increase the strain on public finances and harm competition.¹³³

There is no doubt that the measures required by the Banking Commission encroach upon the right to private property of the persons affected. The question thus is whether the encroachment is permissible under EU law.¹³⁴ The Court doubts that the encroachment is proportionate, as it does not necessarily make it possible for the concrete circumstances in the individual Member States which could determine the proportionality of the encroachments to be taken into account.

The Constitutional Court has evoked ECHR case law on appropriate compensation for encroachments upon private property and questioned the proportionality of the erasure of the affected entitlements that is based only on an evaluation of the liquidation value of the bank, whereas the actual liquidation will never take place.

The Court is concerned that the persons affected by the Banking Communication measures will be excessively burdened with the costs of restructuring the bank. This is especially the case under the contested regime, as not all categories of stakeholders in the banks participate in the losses; on the contrary, depositors and senior bond holders only reap the benefits of the state aid that will subsequently be given to the bank in question. At the same time, the Court recognises that the Communication pertains to the stakeholders whose position has been more exposed to risk from the beginning.¹³⁵

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 The European Stability Mechanism (ESM) – or the participation of Slovenia therein – has not been challenged before the Constitutional Court. Given the substantial commitment undertaken by Slovenia upon participating in the ESM (the entire capital subscription amounts to almost one-third of the annual state budget),¹³⁶ it is notable that the political debate was almost non-existent. The record of the discussion at the plenary session of the National Assembly in which the ratification statute was adopted is no longer than 1,121 words. The representatives of the largest governing party and the largest opposition party took the floor. For the former, the ESM Treaty was ‘in the utmost interest of Slovenia’, while according to

¹³³ Ibid., para. 44.

¹³⁴ Ibid., para. 48.

¹³⁵ Ibid., paras. 50–51.

¹³⁶ Slovenia’s share in the total authorised capital stock of the ESM is 0.42%, which amounts to 2,993 million EUR (ESM Treaty – consolidated version following Lithuania’s accession to the ESM, Annex I). The State expenditure for 2015 is 9.485 million EUR (Budget of the Republic of Slovenia, UL 102/13, 14/15).

the latter, ‘any measure that strengthens the common currency is more than welcome’.¹³⁷

2.7.2 While the ESM has not been contested in Slovenia, there was a constitutional challenge to one of its predecessors, the European Financial Stability Facility (EFSF). A group of 37 deputies of the National Assembly challenged the ZPZFSSEu, the statute that provided the legal basis for the participation of Slovenia in the EFSF, before the Constitutional Court.¹³⁸ The deputies claimed that the ZPZFSSEu, in determining only the total sum and duration of Slovenia’s guarantees for the EFSF’s funding instruments, violated Art. 149 Constitution.¹³⁹ The deputies asserted that the Constitution demands a special statute for each state guarantee, which lays down all the elements of the guarantee. Failure to provide such statute also amounts to a violation of the principle of separation of powers, as the role of the National Assembly is limited to being informed of any guarantees given.¹⁴⁰

The Constitutional Court rejected all of the deputies’ claims and found that the ZPZFSSEu does not envisage a series of guarantees. It is the legal basis for one large scale guarantee, with withdrawals to be made gradually, over a longer period of time, and in proportion to what is required.¹⁴¹ In laying down the grounds for its ruling, the Court formulated some important positions. First, long term economic effects and their consequences for financial stability cannot be evaluated by looking at an individual measure, but rather require constant observation and continuous assessment. This, however, is not a task for the courts. It is for the Government and the Parliament to undertake and, in doing so, they are to enjoy a wide margin of appreciation. Hence, the judicial review of such questions has to be reserved.¹⁴²

Secondly, even before the fiscal rule was introduced in the Constitution (see Sect. 1.2.1), the Court had found that Art. 149 Constitution cannot be interpreted as allowing the National Assembly to provide a carte blanche to the Government in matters of borrowing: the obligations undertaken must be, if not determined, at least determinable. This is regardless of the fact that Art. 149 does not set any material conditions or limitations for state borrowing or guarantees. The determinability of (future) obligations is required by the principle of pravna država and, not less

¹³⁷ Record of the plenary session of the National Assembly of 19 April 2012. However, Ahtik et al. 2014, p. 529 report on the calls of parliamentarians to be more fully involved in the Economic and Monetary Union governance.

¹³⁸ Act Regulating the Guarantees of the Republic of Slovenia for Ensuring Financial Stability in the Euro Area (UL 59/10, 79/11).

¹³⁹ Art. 149: ‘State borrowings and state guarantees for loans are permitted only on the basis of a statute.’ See Bardutzky 2011, p. 1338.

¹⁴⁰ CCRS U-I-178/10, UL 12/2011, para. 1.

¹⁴¹ Ibid., para. 29.

¹⁴² Ibid., para. 9.

importantly, the principle of the social (welfare) state (socialna država) that commands that the State, in any given moment and also for future generations, which are to bear the burden of the debt incurred in the present, must provide the social minimum, that amounts not merely to the minimum required to survive, but ensures the possibilities to foster social relationships and to participate in social, cultural and political life.¹⁴³

It is quite striking that the Court not only looked beyond the constitutional provisions that would conventionally be considered most narrowly related to the issue at hand, but it also invoked none other than the principle of socialna država. The latter traditionally stands for demands for solidarity within society and recognises the value of wide access to public services. It can potentially present a strong obstacle to a spectrum of different designs for Europe's economic constitution. In the hands of the Slovenian Constitutional Court, visibly influenced by the discourse prevalent in the German Federal Constitutional Court, it was deployed in order to establish an 'unwritten debt cap'. Meta Ahtik, Maja Brkan and Živa Nendl have thus justifiably wondered whether the Court has not taken 'a step too far in limiting the state's margin of manoeuvre for guaranteeing the respect for the value that the Court appears to hold at the heart of its reasoning'.¹⁴⁴ Whether the Court's concern for the welfare state (of future generations) will consequently be employed in the future to further the ordoliberal ideals of prudent public spending, remains to be seen.

2.7.3 Perhaps the most commonly mentioned reason for the Slovenian economic crisis is the large influx of cheap capital between 2004 in 2008.¹⁴⁵ This was cut short by the global financial crisis when lenders refused to extend loans which businesses were unable to repay, thus exposing the fact that the borrowing was excessive. The banking sector itself was not inflated (as was for example the case in Cyprus),¹⁴⁶ but it was detrimental that the majority of it was state owned, as the losses of the banks immediately impacted state finances.¹⁴⁷ State ownership of the banks and the resulting political influence over lending decisions led the banks to finance managerial takeovers of state-owned businesses in the real sector. This contributed to the sum of toxic loans in the banks' balances. In general, Slovenia stands out somewhat from the other post-socialist Member States of the European Union, as its process of privatisation of state-owned companies has been exceptionally slow and is in fact not yet finished.¹⁴⁸ As a consequence, foreign direct investment in the country remains low.

¹⁴³ Ibid., para. 25.

¹⁴⁴ Ahtik et al. 2014, p. 535.

¹⁴⁵ See for example Križanič 2012.

¹⁴⁶ (2013, November 30). Slovenia's financial crisis: Stressed out. The Economist. <http://www.economist.com/news/finance-and-economics/21590956-fight-avoid-sixth-euro-zone-bail-out-reaches-climax-stressed-out>.

¹⁴⁷ Jazbec 2014.

¹⁴⁸ For an overview of the privatisation process in Slovenia until 2005, see Mencinger 2006.

Slovenia has so far avoided having to ask for financial support and entering an externally imposed austerity programme. However, as there were severe difficulties with the state's public finances in recent years, Slovenia found itself in a situation where the bailout scenario appeared to be an inevitable reality.¹⁴⁹ In my view, the general public was prevalently opposed to the possibility of a bail-out and, consequently, to any austerity programme designed by the EU and the IMF. This might be attributable to the fact that at the time Slovenia was facing this scenario, the public was already aware of the experiences of other countries that had gone down that road before, especially Greece.¹⁵⁰ A scenario of external financial support was by and large considered undesirable by Slovenian lawyers and economists,¹⁵¹ however, this view was not unanimous. Avbelj discussed the possibility of the troika as a 'catalyst for democracy'. In his argument, the insolvency of a state is a reflection of its dysfunctional democratic process. The most persuasive out of a range of possible reasons for this dysfunction is that the system has been captured by smaller interest groups that prevent it from cleansing itself of bad rulers. If this were the case, the right to vote would become no more than illusory; once the state is totally captured, the only solution is an intervention from outside. This option harbours the potential to liberate the state from its captors, thus reinstating factual democracy. In reality, it is unlikely that the troika would wield sufficient power to truly prevent the interest groups from releasing their grip on the state.¹⁵²

¹⁴⁹ Slovenia remains in an excessive deficit procedure (Regulation 473/2013) that has been ongoing since 2009, and is considered to be experiencing excessive macroeconomic imbalances in the sense of Regulation 1176/2011.

¹⁵⁰ That the image of Greece and its experience was present even in the discussions of the judges of the Constitutional Court is revealed in the concurring opinion of Judge Petrič (a professor of international law) in U-II-1/12, U-II-2/12 (the decision is discussed above in Sect. 1.3.4): 'The position of Greece in relation to those, who de facto (albeit in the form of negotiations) determine the conditions of assistance and subsequently oversee the implementation of that agreement (including the parliaments of the other EU/Eurozone Member States), from a substantive point of view amounts to a limitation of Greece's sovereignty, even if the country – from a formal point of view of international law – remains a sovereign state.', para. 4.

¹⁵¹ As an example, the opinion of Bogomir Kovač, Professor of Economics at the University of Ljubljana, that the reforms of economic governance have turned the EU into a tyranny, with the troika as the essence of European democracy rather than a deviation from it (Kovač, B. (2014, January 24) 1, 2, 3. Mladina.). See also Trampuš, J. (2013, October 10). Klicanje trojke (Calling the troika). Mladina, for a selection of views of politicians and other public figures on the consequences of possible entry into an austerity programme for Slovenia.

¹⁵² Avbelj 2013a, b.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Slovenian courts have not been very active in requesting preliminary rulings from the ECJ (nine requests altogether since the 2004 accession).¹⁵³ The eight requests filed by the Supreme Court, the Administrative Court and the High Court of Maribor were all with regard to the interpretation of EU law.¹⁵⁴ Only the request filed by the Constitutional Court (currently pending) regards the conformity of an EU soft law measure with superior EU law and legal principles (see Sect. 2.6.1).

2.8.2–2.8.3 The tables below indicate the intensity of judicial review before the Constitutional Court between 2009 and 2013. The data presented is with regard to the two most important types of procedure: the review of abstract legal norms, including parliamentary legislation, executive and local regulations, etc. (the ‘U-I’ docket), and constitutional complaints against individual legal acts (the ‘Up’ docket; see Sect. 2.1.1). In general terms, the Constitutional Court controls the regulatory activity of the legislative and executive branches and of the local governments in U-I cases. In Up cases, it oversees the compliance of the judiciary with human rights requirements.

In the observed period, between 7 and 15% of challenges against the different abstract legal norms were successful, as described in Table 1.¹⁵⁵

With regard to constitutional complaints, it must first be noted that the Constitutional Court is seized every year with more than one thousand complaints, but only a tiny percent advance to the merit stage.¹⁵⁶ Of the less than one hundred cases heard on the merits, a huge majority are successful. However, it is clear that many unfounded cases are dealt with in the admissibility stage. Therefore, in order to provide an accurate picture of the Constitutional Court’s review of other ¹⁵³ Zagorc and Bardutzky 2010, p. 444.

¹⁵⁴ The database of preliminary rulings requested by Slovenian courts other than the Constitutional Court is maintained by the Supreme Court and available at http://www.sodisce.si/znanje/sodna_praksa/baza_seu/.

¹⁵⁵ The numbers in the table encompass all challenges regardless of the type of act that was challenged (parliamentary legislation, executive regulation, local act) and the type of applicant (state institution, private citizen or court by way of incidenter proceedings). Under ‘successful challenges’, I have counted all the cases where a norm was annulled or a situation of nonconformity with superior law was merely established. Under ‘unsuccessful challenges’, I have counted all cases where the Court has ruled that the measure is not contrary to superior law and the cases where a private citizen’s claim was rejected, which occurs when a claim is either manifestly unfounded or does not address an important issue (Art. 26(2) ZUstS). Challenges are dismissed on procedural grounds mostly when the private citizen that filed a claim is not considered to be affected by the contested measure (pravni interes; Art. 24 ZUstS), but also when other procedural requirements are not fulfilled.

¹⁵⁶ Legislation enables the Court to weed out the complaints that neither bear grave consequences for the complainant nor lead to the resolution of an important question (Arts. 55–56 ZUstS).

Table 1 Outcome of the review of legislation and other abstract legal norms

Year	2013	2012	2011	2010	2009
Successful challenges	26	31	49	25	32
	7.16 %	8.86 %	14.45 %	9.77 %	9.61 %
Unsuccessful challenges	77	50	76	42	68
	21.21 %	14.29 %	22.42 %	16.41 %	20.42 %
Challenges dismissed on procedural grounds	260	269	214	189	233
	71.63 %	76.86 %	63.13 %	73.83 %	69.97 %
Total	363	350	339	256	333

Source Annual Report of the Constitutional Court (2013)

The figures are from the Annual Report of the Constitutional Court (2013), p. 77, http://www.urs.si/media/rsus_porocilo_o_delu_2013_web.pdf

Table 2 Success of constitutional complaints in 2009–2013

Year	2013	2012	2011	2010	2009
All cases received	1031	1203	1358	1582	1495
Cases admitted	23	47	26	74	58
Percentage of cases admitted (%)	2.2	3.9	1.9	4.9	3.9
All cases where final decision was made	22	44	26	58	63
Complaint granted	18	41	21	57	37
Complaint rejected	4	3	8	1	26
Percentage of successful cases out of all cases where final decision was made (%)	81.82	93.18	80.77	98.28	58.73

Source Annual Report of the Constitutional Court (2013)

The figures are from the Annual Report of the Constitutional Court (2013), p. 79

Slovenian courts, the numbers have to be read together; these are provided in Table 2.

2.8.4 See Sect. 1.3.4.

2.8.5 In my opinion, the perception of whether there is a gap in judicial review will depend to a great extent on the outcome of the recent, first request for a preliminary ruling made by the Constitutional Court (see Sect. 2.6.1) and especially on the course of the judicial dialogue.

2.8.6 The situation where different sets of rules would apply to a ‘purely domestic’ criminal case on the one hand and a case with an element of EU law on the other has been described using Ronald Dworkin’s concept of ‘checkerboard laws’: ‘laws that treat similar [cases] differently on arbitrary grounds’.¹⁵⁷ In light of the position of the scholarship that ‘the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia which, even in the circumstances of the full Slovenian EU membership, precludes any decrease in the already existing constitutional standards of human rights protection’,¹⁵⁸ it seems inevitable that this issue will be addressed in Slovenian constitutional law. The gruesome example of the ‘anticanon’ Dred Scott case teaches us that historically, the existence of checkerboard laws has led to the absolute harmonisation of constitutional rights on the federal/supranational level.¹⁵⁹ A possible alternative to the process of harmonisation is to institute a ‘maximum standard’ mechanism, as proposed by Cyril Ribičič: the law that provides the higher standard of human rights protection is applied.¹⁶⁰

¹⁵⁷ Erbežnik 2010, p. 216; Dworkin 1986, p. 179.

It should be noted that the equality clause in the Slovenian Constitution (Art. 14(1)) expressly guarantees equal human rights and fundamental freedoms to everyone regardless of their personal circumstances. If the EU human rights ‘checkerboard laws’ were to face a constitutional challenge based on Art. 14(1), the Constitutional Court would probably administer a strict proportionality test.¹⁶¹ It is likely that the Court would recognise mutual recognition among the Member States of the EU as a legitimate goal; however, the result of the balancing phase of the test is less predictable. If in weighing equality against mutual recognition the Court were to favour the former, this would mean adopting a maximum standard approach. If, on the other hand, the Court were to let mutual recognition prevail, it is hard to imagine that it would not accompany this move with a Solange type caveat. This, in turn, could contribute to a move for absolute harmonisation on the EU level.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

Implementation and minimum standards Boštjan Zalar has reported on how the implementation of the Asylum Procedures Directive,¹⁶² which defines minimum standards for the procedure in which refugee status is recognised and withdrawn, has led to the lowering of procedural standards in Slovenian refugee law.¹⁶³ What is especially problematic is that these standards were established by the case law of the Slovenian Constitutional Court. Zalar has observed that, nevertheless, ‘the Constitution itself and the existing case law of the Constitutional Court ... are not considered strong enough factors to force the executive and legislative branch of government towards the preservation of fundamental standards of human rights in the transposition of the [Directive]’.¹⁶⁴

¹⁵⁸ Avbelj and Peršolja 2012, pp. 395–396. In a similar vein, see Novak 2004, p. 113.

¹⁵⁹ Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393 (1857); Erbežnik 2012, p. 9; Halberstam 2015.

¹⁶⁰ Ribičič 2006, n. 7. See Halberstam 2015 for scepticism toward the ‘higher standards’ approach.

¹⁶¹ CCRS U-I-425/06, UL, especially paras. 7 and 14.

¹⁶² Directive 2013/32/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 26 June 2013 on common procedures for granting and withdrawing international protection, [2013] OJ L 180/60.

¹⁶³ Council Directive 2005/85/EC on minimum standards on procedures in Member States for granting and withdrawing refugee status, [2005] OJ L 326/13.

¹⁶⁴ Zalar 2008, p. 202.

Choice of legal form for implementation Implementation of EU law has not brought about a significant change in the legal form in which legal norms are adopted. The constitutional rule under which the rights and duties of citizens and other persons may be determined by the National Assembly only by statute (Art. 87 Constitution, see Sect. 2.1.3; for the reflection of this provision in the rules on the ratification of treaties see Sect. 3.1.1) functions as a bulwark against a large-scale erosion of this kind.¹⁶⁵ The rights and duties of individuals, however, are not the only type of legal norms for which the preferred form in the Slovenian legal system under normal circumstances would be a statute. When it comes to the assignment of different tasks to the various administrative organs, for example, the instructions found in the text of the Constitution (Art. 3 – separation of powers and Art. 120 – organisation and work in the state administration) are perhaps less direct than in Art. 87. Nevertheless, the Constitution also demands the use of a statute in a number of situations based on these clauses. In these types of cases, I believe it might happen that EU legislation, especially when the implementation deadline is approaching, would be implemented in the Slovenian legal system with the use of a sub-statutory instrument; however, later, the situation would be remedied in legislation.¹⁶⁶

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 Traditions, by definition, originate in the past that is (or has been) passed on to the present. At first sight, the different historical characteristics of the Member States' constitutions (even beyond the strong/evolutionary divide, see Sect. 1.1.1), could lead us to a finding that there is little commonality in the Member States' traditions. In addition, a 'statistical' analysis of constitutional texts could easily turn into a cynical operation through which a minimum common denominator is to be identified, possibly leading to a reduction in the scope of European human rights law. At the same time, there is in my opinion nevertheless a message that is common to European constitutionalism as a whole: the rejection of the various totalitarian regimes that have abused public power and trampled on the integrity and dignity of the individual. In that sense, the constitutional traditions common to the ¹⁶⁵ I am grateful to Peter Pavlin for an informative discussion on this matter.

¹⁶⁶ I have been able to find one such example. In 2011, the Governmental decree on the implementation of legal acts of the European Union on the stepping up of cross-border cooperation, particularly in combating terrorism and cross-border crime (UL 18/11), in order to implement Council Resolutions 2008/615/JHA and 2008/616/JHA of 23 June 2008, assigned the execution of the relevant legal norms to the Ministry of Internal Affairs and designated the different units of the Police as national contact points. In 2013, the National Assembly adopted the new Police Tasks and Powers Act (UL 15/13). The Act, in Art. 161, assigned (again) the execution of the same norms to the Ministry and gave an authorisation to the Government to designate the national contact points pursuant to the Council Resolutions.

Member States are legal expressions of the ‘never again’ cries that have followed periods of suffering and injustice in Europe.¹⁶⁷ However, the text of Art. 6(3) TEU assigns a future-oriented purpose to the essentially retrospective concept of constitutional tradition. If it is to become a workable tool for the European courts, an approach will have to be identified that can apply historical lessons not only to the problems of which we are presently aware (e.g. data retention), but also to a host of yet unforeseeable challenges.

2.10.2 As discussed in Sect. 1.3.1, the principles of supremacy and direct effect of EU law have not been accommodated in Slovenian constitutional law explicitly, but with a rather more abstract provision according to which the legal acts of Art. 3.a. organisations (i.e. the EU) ‘shall be applied in Slovenia in accordance with the legal regulation’ of such organisations.¹⁶⁸ The term ‘legal regulation of such organisations’ is most commonly interpreted as a device that accommodates supremacy and direct effect as structural principles of EU law within the Slovenian constitutional order. However, supremacy and direct effect are not the only principles of this rank. Zalar has recalled that respect for the common constitutional traditions, via Art. 6(3) TEU, also needs to be considered part of this ‘legal regulation’.¹⁶⁹ Indeed, the traditions inform the general principles governing the body of EU law. Were we to accept Zalar’s reading of Art. 3.a, this would mean that pursuant to this article, EU law would have to be applied in Slovenia in accordance with respect for the common constitutional traditions. In effect, the Slovenian Constitution would bind EU law, insofar as it is applied in Slovenia, to the Member States’ constitutions. A demand that fundamental rights, as they result from the common constitutional traditions, be respected by EU law, would then be based not only in the TEU, but also in the Constitution.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 In the domestic context, Constitutional Court Judge Ribičič has vocally opposed the practice of reducing the standard of human rights protection from the higher Slovenian constitutional level to the lower level of the ECHR. His reasoning is that the mission of the Council of Europe system of human rights protection, including the Convention and the Strasbourg Court, is to progressively ensure as high as possible minimum standards. To allow the states to drop from established standards would put an end to the positive development of human rights standards in Europe, amounting to abuse of the Convention as prohibited by Arts. 17 and 18 ECHR.¹⁷⁰ Ribičič's position – in my opinion – accurately illustrates the perception of the ECHR as an absolute 'floor' among Slovenian lawyers.¹⁷¹

¹⁶⁷ Cf. Jambrek 2012, p. 32.

¹⁶⁸ See above Sect. 1.3.1. Emphasis added.

¹⁶⁹ Zalar 2005; Ahtik et al. 2014, p. 771. It is unlikely that this was the intention of the drafters who adhered to what I have referred to as the indefinable aesthetics of constitution making (Sect. 1.5.1); however, the more laconic the wording, the wider the field of interpretation.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 The Government took the usual steps to include the views of the public in the process of drafting the ZEKom-1, the implementing statute for the Data Retention Directive (see Sect. 2.4.1). It invited written comments and held two public consultation sessions. Throughout the dialogue with the public, fifty different entities (state authorities, businesses, individuals) submitted comments (however, the ZEKom-1 regulates the entire area of electronic communications, and therefore the consultation and the public discussion covered several issues beyond data retention).¹⁷² Concerns were repeatedly expressed regarding the provisions on data retention: whether data retention is truly necessary and whether the data retained indeed is useful in criminal investigations. The Government 'warned' the public that the Commission had lodged an action against Germany for non-implementation of the Directive, imposing a daily penalty of 315,036.54 EUR until implementation.¹⁷³ In this sense, the implementation of the Data Retention Directive in Slovenia is an example of infringement proceedings for non-implementation echoing in domestic lawmaking procedures.

2.12.2–2.12.3 In Art. 260 TFEU proceedings, a Member State should be allowed to raise a 'constitutional defence' if it has failed to implement a directive because the implementation encountered serious constitutional obstacles articulated in the course of procedures established at the national level for the review of constitutionality, such as a procedure before the constitutional court or an analogous procedure in parliament.¹⁷⁴

¹⁷⁰ CCRS U-I-272/98, UL 48/2003, Concurring opinion of Judge Ribičič, para. 8.

¹⁷¹ See also Erbežnik 2014b and the discussion in Sect. 2.8.6. I would also like to acknowledge Mojca Plesničar's comment that all the practitioners and policy-makers interviewed in the framework of the study on the EAW (see Sect. 2.3) expressed fears that the standard of human rights protection was being reduced, towards a minimum common denominator.

¹⁷² Predlog ZEKom-1, Sect. I.2.3.d.

¹⁷³ Ibid., Sects. III. and XIII.

¹⁷⁴ Bardutzky 2014a; see also Douglas-Scott 2002, pp. 411–413.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.3 I believe that to a certain extent Slovenia has faced a reduction in the standard of protection of fundamental rights as one of the consequences of European Union membership. Even though it was later successfully challenged before the ECJ, I believe that data retention can serve as an example. If this had been a purely domestic legislative project, it would have probably met insurmountable constitutional and democratic obstacles. But as it originated in the EU, it became part of the law in a very different atmosphere (see Sect. 2.12.1).

The reduction in standards is likely to be accepted among the citizenry as a trade-off for the benefits of integration. It is not to be dismissed that Slovenians, perhaps in contrast to other post-socialist Member States, have only recently begun to take advantage of the freedom of movement as a consequence of the economic crisis. This has made the benefits of membership very visible, especially among the young, educated and unemployed. In addition to the economic benefits of integration, I believe that governance on the European level is perceived as an additional check on national politics, with the latter enjoying relatively low respect among Slovenians.

While this may explain the forgiving attitude of the citizenry with regard to the reduction in standards, it does not supply an ‘across the board’ justification, at least not from the point of view of a constitutional lawyer. Whenever a supranational measure sits uncomfortably with domestic constitutional standards, the tension cannot simply be decided in favour of the former by saying the magic words ‘effectiveness and unity’; a certain type of weighing is in order to ascertain whether the attainment of effectiveness and unity is needed sufficiently urgently as to justify the setting aside of constitutional standards.

Primarily, this is a matter for the courts. The recent ‘new era’ (to borrow the words of Giuseppe Martinico)¹⁷⁵ of preliminary references from constitutional courts to the ECJ is a promise of a more proactive attitude. Constitutional courts should not shy away from eloquently sharing their concerns and positions with the ECJ, substantiating them with national constitutional (case) law whenever they question the validity of EU secondary law, measured against the yardstick of fundamental rights. The ECJ should respect fundamental rights as informed by the constitutional traditions common to the Member States by building these arguments into the fundaments of its reasoning.¹⁷⁶

¹⁷⁵ Martinico 2010, p. 221.

¹⁷⁶ As a small comparative side note, the US Supreme Court is known to let constitutional issues ‘percolate’ upward through the judicial system before it grants certiorari to one of the cases dealing with a particular issue and finally resolves the issue. In other words, before the Justices take a stand on a matter, they wish to have before them an array of the different possible solutions provided by the lower courts (and scholarly commentary!). Although in a much less hierarchical setting, this logic might make sense in the courts of the European Union as well. In situations

This is not to idealise the conciliatory effects of judicial dialogue. Even in a situation where national constitutional courts are proactive and ‘in the mood for dialogue’ (to borrow more of Martinico’s vocabulary),¹⁷⁷ and the ECJ is responsive, it cannot be excluded that the standards are simply different. In mutual trust scenarios (such as Melloni), Daniel Halberstam’s ‘safety valve’ proposal should be considered seriously.¹⁷⁸ It remains open whether a similar solution can be found beyond scenarios involving mutual trust.

2.13.4 While in the scholarly quest for democracy and constitutionalism in the European Union attention on the Member State level is most often paid to national parliaments and (constitutional) courts, this focus of attention leaves out a crucial element: the administration. I acknowledge my personal bias in this matter, having previously served in a government department in a Member State; indeed my observations are based on my personal experience. Civil servants are important gatekeepers of the legal system and have enormous potential to prevent the adoption of unconstitutional norms. They draft legislation, including implementing legislation. At the same time, they exert influence on lawmaking at the European level, either directly or by way of expertise provided to the ministers.¹⁷⁹ Again, based on my personal experience, the national constitution is far from a solemn monument to dwindling sovereignty; it is rather a workable tool, a source of arguments and a constant yardstick. We did not carry the heavy commentary of the Constitution to meetings in other departments to celebrate the country’s sovereignty; we did it because in our work, we felt constrained by the constitutional court case law and scholarly opinion.

This account is of course part prescriptive and part descriptive. The claim here is not that all bureaucrats are staunch defenders of constitutionalist values. Whether the words ‘the Constitutional Court will never allow it’ gets the person who utters them in a meeting in a government department attention or gets him waved off by his interlocutors depends on a number of factors. The first factor is education, including continuous professional development. The second is the position and role of the professional civil service in the system of government. Third, the constitutional judiciary can (and has to) play a crucial role here by developing consistent where a number of constitutional courts are seized of challenges to EU (implementing) legislation, procedural solutions could be established and a principle could be formulated according to which the ECJ would ensure that national constitutional courts’ concerns are articulated, so that the ECJ can adequately respond to them. Perry 1991, pp. 230–234.

¹⁷⁷ Martinico 2010, p. 221.

¹⁷⁸ Halberstam 2015.

¹⁷⁹ Notably, Plesničar and Šugman Stubbs 2009, p. 212 recorded the discontent of Slovenian civil servants regarding the implementation of the EAW. The limited capacities of the (small Member State’s) public administration mean that the persons in charge of the legislative drafting in the ministries are not the ones negotiating the instruments in EU lawmaking procedures; the small number of staff at the permanent representation to the EU prevents a sufficient specialisation among them; often, the transfer of information between the negotiators and the implementers is inadequate.

and well-argued case law. Pythic holdings may be useful for disguising disagreement on the bench, but they are unlikely to strengthen the constitutionalist discourse among government lawyers.¹⁸⁰ A transparent and consistent stance on the scope of the court's deference to the legislative branch is also likely to strengthen the legitimacy of the court's judgments by dispelling the impression among the readers of the case law that the court is acting on prevalently political motives.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 Ratification of treaties The Constitution distinguishes between international treaties that are to be ratified by the National Assembly and all other international treaties. Only the international treaties that are ratified by the National Assembly enjoy an elevated position in the hierarchy of legal acts: they are superior to all other legal acts except the Constitution, including statutes. International treaties that are not ratified by the National Assembly are only superior to sub-statutory legal acts.

The text of the Constitution does not delimit the two categories of international treaties further nor designate the body responsible for the ratification of 'sub-statutory' treaties. The legislature, by virtue of the Foreign Affairs Act (FAA),¹⁸¹ has vested the power of ratification of 'sub-statutory' treaties in the Government. The FAA further provides that the Government shall only ratify an international treaty if the incorporation of the treaty does not require statutory reform. Also, the Government only ratifies international treaties which:

- regulate questions that would, pursuant to the domestic legal order, fall within the Government's sphere of competences;
- are concluded in order to execute acts of international organisations that bind Slovenia, previously concluded international treaties and decisions of international cooperation in defence or internal affairs matters;
- regulate diplomatic and consular relations.

All other treaties need to be ratified by the National Assembly (Art. 75 FAA). The division of competences between the executive and legislative branches in the ratification of international treaties hence follows the dividing line drawn between the branches in domestic lawmaking. As was discussed above in Sect. 2.1.3, the Constitution demands that rights and duties be conferred by a statute, which accords a relatively strong position to the National Assembly in terms of the breadth of its competences.

¹⁸⁰ In the context of the ECJ, a similar argument was recently presented in Bobek 2013, p. 207.

¹⁸¹ UL 113/03, 20/06, 76/08, 108/09, 80/10.

The ratification and publication of treaties is considered of constitutional importance; the Constitutional Court considers secret international agreements to be contrary to the fundaments of the Slovenian constitutional system.¹⁸²

Transfer of powers Article 3.a Constitution does not refer to the European Union, but generically to ‘international organisations’ and provides a legal basis for transfer of the exercise of sovereign powers (see Sects. 1.2.1 and 1.3.1). To this day, this limb of Art. 3.a has only been used in relation to the European Union; however, this is not to say that it would be inapplicable to possible accession to international organisations in the future.

Article 3.a was also adopted in order to provide a legal basis for the accession of the Republic of Slovenia to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). With that purpose, the text of the provision, in its second limb, also includes an authorisation for the state to ‘enter a defensive alliance with [other] states’, provided that such alliance is based on the respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, democracy and the rule of law. In Slovenian constitutional law, membership in defence alliances thus represents a special category of Slovenian participation in mechanisms of global governance.

3.1.2 There has been no reform of this kind.

3.1.3 A few years before the EU-related reform of the Constitution, Ivan Kristan wrote in favour of expanding Art. 8 Constitution. While Kristan also proposed Art. 8 as the locus for the legal basis for accession to the EU, he would additionally in concreto anchor Slovenia’s membership in some of the important international organisations (United Nations, NATO, Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe) in Art. 8.¹⁸³

3.1.4 See Sect. 1.5.3.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 As mentioned above in Sect. 3.1.1, Slovenian constitutional law recognises two categories of international treaties with different positions in the hierarchy of legal norms. Statutes (and all other lower norms) also have to be in conformity with the ‘generally valid principles of international law’ (Art. 153(2)).

The Constitution also provides for the direct applicability of international treaties that have been ratified and published (Art. 8). Legal commentary adds that not all international treaties (or all provisions of a treaty) are suitable for direct applicability; only those with a self-executing character can be applied directly.¹⁸⁴ The Constitution is silent on the form of ratification; as per Art. 169(1) PoDZ-1, treaties are ratified by statute (zakon).

¹⁸² See above n. 128.

¹⁸³ Kristan 2001, p. 4.

3.2.2 It would seem that the dualism-monism dichotomy is of little use when attempting to conceptualise the position of the sources of international law in the Slovenian legal (constitutional) system. The way the Constitutional Court has worded its position on the purpose of Art. 8, namely that it ‘defines, in principal terms, the relationship between the international legal order and the Slovenian legal order’¹⁸⁵ has been interpreted as stemming from a position of dualism, namely recognising that these are two separate legal spheres.¹⁸⁶ However, Urška Umek has also underlined the important elements of monism in the Slovenian system: first, treaties are incorporated into the legal system by simple adoption; secondly, treaties thus incorporated can be directly applicable.¹⁸⁷

At the same time, Art. 8 cannot be read in isolation from the non-enumeration clause (Art. 15(5)) mentioned above (see Sect. 2.1.1). The position of the Constitutional Court is that by virtue of Art. 15(5), human rights and fundamental freedoms enshrined in international treaties that are in force in Slovenia are accorded ‘constitutional rank’.¹⁸⁸ The tangible consequence of this position is that the Constitutional Court has in its history already issued a decision, which in its operative part established that the complainant’s ECHR right had been violated.¹⁸⁹ Upon finding that the text of the Constitution did not explicitly provide for the human right in question while the ECHR did, the Constitutional Court adopted the provision of the ECHR as premissa maior in the concrete case. It explained that the non-enumeration clause in Art. 15(5) Constitution is (inter alia) a response to the requirement of Art. 13 ECHR, the latter calling on States Parties to provide for effective remedies for violations of Convention rights.

Sketching the case of direct application of the ECHR by the Constitutional Court ultimately serves to illustrate the relative ineptitude of the concepts of dualism and monism when it comes to explaining the everyday interplay of the different instruments of human rights protection in action. There is enough support in the text of the Constitution for us to understand the Slovenian constitutional system as one open to international law. Seeing domestic and international law as two separate systems cannot be understood as an impediment to the perception of international law as a functional tool in the hands of the citizen and the judge. This openness

¹⁸⁴ Umek 2011, p. 133.

¹⁸⁵ CCRS U-I-274/02, OdlUS XI, 204, para. 4.

¹⁸⁶ See also CCRS Rm-1/09, para. 18. The Court used the phrase ‘separate legal system’ and immediately stressed the importance of international law for the interpretation of domestic law where the substance of domestic law originates from international law obligations.

¹⁸⁷ Umek 2011, p. 135.

¹⁸⁸ Up-43/96, OdlUS IX, 141.

¹⁸⁹ CCRS Up-555/03, Up-827/04, Ur. list 78/2006.

reaches its highest level in the case of international human rights law, with the recognition of the constitutional rank of the rights recognised by its instruments.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 In the case of international treaties that have to be ratified by the National Assembly, the National Assembly is involved not merely in the procedure of ratification, but also earlier, in the phase that precedes the negotiations.¹⁹⁰

The internal aspect of the procedure to conclude an international treaty commences with the formulation of an official initiative to conclude a certain treaty. The initiative is sponsored by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs or another department of the Government and must already state the reasons in favour of conclusion of such a treaty and the draft positions of the future state delegation negotiating the treaty. It must nominate the members of the state delegation. If possible, a draft text of the treaty is to be attached together with a statement of the essential elements of the treaty. The initiative must provide an assessment of the financial impact of the treaty, of conformity of the treaty with valid law and whether the potential conclusion of the treaty will require legislative reform.

In any case, the Government must approve the initiative before negotiations can start. If an international treaty requires ratification in the National Assembly, the initiative is also sent to the Assembly's Committee of Foreign Policy for confirmation (Art. 70 FAA). The state delegation is bound by the positions in the approved initiative; should the negotiations diverge from the foreseen course, new positions need to be approved by the parliamentary committee (Art. 71 FAA).

The legislative branch and the directly elected representatives of the people are thus not only present, but are also given a veto power over a draft from the very beginning. Indirectly, the National Assembly will also be able to exert its influence over all the elements of the international treaty that are already included in the text of the initiative and thus co-decide the frame of the negotiations.

The National Assembly then plays the central role again when it comes to ratification of the treaty, i.e. the adoption of the ratification statute. The ratification statute will contain little more than the text of the international treaty. As further amendments to the text of the international treaty are inadmissible in this phase (Art. 169(4) PoDZ-1), the National Assembly expedites this quasi-legislative procedure by following the procedural rules applicable to the emergency procedure (Art. 169(3) PoDZ-1). The emergency procedure is otherwise applied when for reasons of security, defence or due to a natural disaster, etc., the adoption of a statute cannot wait (Arts 143-144 PoDZ-1).

¹⁹⁰ The response to question 3.3.1 refers to the National Assembly, the lower chamber of the Slovenian Parliament. The National Council as the upper chamber does not have any competences under the FAA. In practice, the National Council can still exercise the general powers that it has within the legislative function (Art. 97 Constitution) also with regard to ratification statutes. Thus the International Relations and European Affairs Committee of the National Council regularly scrutinises the international treaties ratified in the National Assembly and issues consultative opinions. At least in theory, the National Council could use its power of suspensive veto to prevent the ratification of a treaty approved by the National Assembly.

The National Assembly can adopt declarations to ‘express general positions on issues of internal and external policies ...’ (Art. 110 PoDZ-1). Such declarations do not produce legal effects. The National Assembly has made use of this possibility infrequently, but it has used it, notably, to formulate the starting points of Slovenia’s general strategy in international relations.¹⁹¹ With regard to global governance, the 1999 Declaration on the Foreign Policy of Slovenia, for example, listed the international organisations that Slovenia was planning to join at the time and the values and objectives that Slovenia would advocate in global politics.¹⁹² The instrument of declaration harbours potential for the increase of parliamentary participation in global governance affairs, especially in areas that are beyond the reach of the Parliament’s power to ratify international treaties, e.g. the participation of Slovenia’s representatives in international organisations. The process of adopting a declaration is an opportunity for the participation not only of the parliamentary opposition but also of civil society in the formulation of priorities, objectives and values that are to be pursued in foreign policy. Despite the fact that the text of the declaration is de facto drafted in the executive branch, the parliamentary procedure offers an appropriate platform that can attract an exchange of views across society.¹⁹³ Whether the potential of the declaration to pursue these goals is developed to the full extent of course depends on the interest and capability of the parliamentarians to take an active role in global governance affairs.

3.3.2 The 2013 revision of the Constitution changed a number of defining features of the system of direct democracy in Slovenia.¹⁹⁴ The reform was introduced after ¹⁹¹ Declaration on the Foreign Policy of Slovenia (DeZPRS), UL 108/99. The National Assembly has issued declarations e.g. to formulate its position on the role of Slovenia in global climate change policies (Declaration on the Active Role of Slovenia in the Shaping of a New Global Climate Change Policy), UL 95/09) or to define Slovenia’s position towards the countries of the Western Balkans (Western Balkans Declaration, UL 58/10).

¹⁹² For example: ‘In the area of global and regional international economic relations, the Republic of Slovenia will stand for solutions that will ensure full employment, higher quality of life and conditions for economic and social progress and development.’ DeZPRS, Introduction.

¹⁹³ The 2014 coalition agreement between the political parties forming the government foresees a new declaration on foreign policy to be adopted by the National Assembly in 2015 ‘by broadest possible consensus, following negotiations within the coalition and the parliament, a public debate and with consideration to other strategic documents of the state ...’. Coalition Agreement for the Parliamentary Term 2014–2018, p. 52, http://www.vlada.si/fileadmin/dokumenti/si/dokumenti/2014_Koalicijski_sporazum_parafiran.pdf.

¹⁹⁴ Constitutional Act amending Arts. 90, 97 and 99 of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia, UL 47/13. No revision was made to Art. 3.a (discussed above) nor to Art. 170 discussed above in Sect. 1.2.2. Albeit adopted in the same session of the National Assembly (24 May 2013), this is nevertheless formally a separate constitutional revision from the amendments to Art. 148 introducing the fiscal rule (discussed above in Sects. 1.2.1 and 1.5.1).

the 2010–2012 ‘referendum wave’ with a number of controversial decisions.¹⁹⁵ The central element of the reform was the removal of the right of the National Council and the parliamentary minority to demand that a referendum be called (Art. 90(1)). Even after the reform, 40,000 voters can require the National Assembly to call a referendum as a matter of right. However, the previously extraordinarily strong role of the legislative referendum was also curtailed by limiting referendums ratione materiae, i.e. a referendum is no longer possible if the statute regulates certain questions. The list includes statutes ratifying international treaties.¹⁹⁶

The proposal for the revision of the Constitution filed by a group of National Assembly deputies did not include ratification statutes in the list of limitations on legislative referendums.¹⁹⁷ This additional limitation was added to the draft text following a suggestion by the expert group to the Constitutional Commission (see above Sect. 1.2.2), i.e. by constitutional lawyers rather than politicians. The expert group pointed out that the possibility to challenge the ratification of an international treaty is unusual in the comparative perspective, where treaties are rarely ratified by statute but rather by another type of parliamentary legal act (e.g. decree).¹⁹⁸ For the expert group, it was the ‘specific nature of the way international treaties are concluded’ that called for referendums on ratification statutes to be banned.¹⁹⁹ The expert group did not elaborate further how this specific nature collides with the possibility of a referendum. With the adoption of the Constitutional Act, there is now no opportunity in Slovenian constitutional law to challenge a decision of the National Assembly to ratify an international treaty by popular vote with a legally binding result. What remains is the general possibility for the National Assembly to call sua sponte for a non-binding, consultative referendum (Arts. 26–29 Referendum and Popular Initiative Act).²⁰⁰

¹⁹⁵ Referendums were used not only in attempts to block economic reforms (see Skledar 2013) but also to prevent the coming into force of a family law reform that featured significant moves towards sexual orientation equality (Ribičič and Kaučič 2014, p. 904).

¹⁹⁶ Article 90(2) Constitution. In addition to ratification statutes, a legislative referendum is not allowed for

- statutes enacting emergency measures to ensure the defence of the state or security or that remedy damage caused by natural disasters;
- statutes on taxes and other compulsory contributions and on the statute for the execution of the state budget;
- statutes adopted to remedy an unconstitutional situation.

¹⁹⁷ Proposal of Katarina Hočevar et al. to initiate the procedure to amend the Constitution (13 September 2012, EPA 620-VI).

¹⁹⁸ See also above n. 190 with regard to the consequences of choosing statute as the form in which the Parliament ratifies treaties.

¹⁹⁹ Report of the Constitutional Commission of the National Assembly on the Proposal for the initiation of the procedure for an amendment of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – UZ 90, 97, 99 (15 January 2013, EPA 620-IV), p. 13. See contra Vuksanović 2013, p. 13.

²⁰⁰ As the expert group stressed, certain international treaties (Art. 3.a) could still be subjected to a referendum (the Art. 3.a referendum was discussed above in Sect. 1.4.2).

Generally speaking, the referendum-related constitutional revision of 2013 was necessary to put a stop to the erosion of the power of representative democracy and the disproportionate rise of direct democracy, which was happening at the expense of constitutional democracy.²⁰¹ However, this observation may not apply to the limitation imposed on referendums on ratification statutes. The laconic case for the elimination of referendums on ratification statutes makes it quite difficult to provide a clear-cut analysis of this reform. Two objections can be raised against the argumentation put forward by the expert group. First, in its case against the ratification statute referendum, it did not engage to a sufficient extent with the details of the ratification procedure in Slovenian foreign affairs law, especially not with the attention paid in diplomatic practice to the internal procedures of ratification.²⁰² Secondly, while displaying consideration for the rules of international lawmaking, it failed to take into account the growing role of global governance, its impact on the everyday life of citizens and the erosion of constitutionalism to which it can lead.

Holding a referendum on a ratification statute may not be the optimal solution for the inclusion of direct democracy in domestic processes of participation in international lawmaking. It is very much a zero-sum game, capable of taking the negotiators as well as legislators by surprise at the very last moment when the expectations of international partners are the highest. The problem that we can observe is that the process of constitutional reform at this important moment was restrained from looking beyond the established categories and types of referendums. We could also speculate that the debates on the important domestic question of limiting referendums overshadowed the global governance dimension of the issue. Should the discussion be reopened, it would need to be liberated from exclusively using the language of Slovenian constitutional law while at the same time retaining the values of the Slovenian Constitution. This is the first precondition if we want to see the constituent power conjure up, on the national level, a robust system of decision making in foreign policy that strikes a workable balance between the pace dictated by the processes of globalisation on the one hand, and the requirements of constitutionalism and democracy on the other.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 The Constitution (Art. 160(2)) establishes a special procedure before the Constitutional Court where the Court issues a legally binding opinion on the constitutionality of a treaty. This procedure is somewhat different from the review of constitutionality of statutes and other norms. There are comparatively few subjects with legal standing: the President of the Republic, the Government, or one-third of the deputies of the National Assembly. In contrast to the procedures for the review of domestic norms (see Art. 24 ZUstS), there is no standing for the individual citizen. However, this is the only procedure for review of constitutionality that the President can initiate. This is likely related to the President's functions in the field of foreign affairs (Arts. 102 and 107 Constitution).

²⁰¹ Compare Ribičič and Kaučič 2014, p. 901.

²⁰² See below Sect. 3.4.1 and especially n. 209.

In contrast to the generally a posteriori procedures before the Constitutional Court, the opinion on an international treaty is issued a priori, 'in the process of ratifying an international treaty'. According to Nerad, this is to prevent the state, by ratification, from committing to international law obligations at odds with the Constitution, which would happen if there were self-executing legal norms in the treaty or if the treaty contained an obligation for the state to adopt an unconstitutional legal act.²⁰³

There have so far been five proceedings of review of an international treaty before the Slovenian Constitutional Court. Three of them were brought by the Government and two by the parliamentary minority.²⁰⁴ It is notable that the Constitutional Court has used 'interpretative decisions' three times in procedures of treaty review.²⁰⁵ These are decisions where the Court uses the operative part of its decision to declare how to interpret a contested provision in order for it to stay within the confines of the Constitution. The Court – at least within a priori procedures, much less so in a posteriori cases – has not shunned away from full review on the merits and has in that sense confirmed the position of Mirjam Škrk (herself formerly a judge of the Court) that

[w]hile the executive and legislative branches, also when it comes to a priori review, may expect a 'kind' attitude from the Constitutional Court, since the executive branch has already externally displayed the interest of the state to conclude the treaty under review, one should nevertheless not lose sight of the fact that the internal ratification of the international treaty is in the exclusive domain of the sovereignty of every state and subject to the decision of independent political (or judicial) organs that hold the respective competences.²⁰⁶

A priori review of the constitutionality of international treaties does not create a tension with the principle of pacta sunt servanda. This is mainly because in diplomatic practice, for Slovenia, the signing (or acceptance) of an international treaty does not yet represent consent to be bound.²⁰⁷ For a treaty to enter into force, ²⁰³ Nerad 2011, p. 1441.

²⁰⁴ Drenik 2013, pp. 77–78. There have also been attempts to contest a statute ratifying an international treaty. For example the Constitutional Court in Opinion Rm-1/09 reviewed the Croatia-Slovenia Arbitration Agreement, and later, after the Agreement had been ratified, in its Decision U-I-180/10, the ratification statute.

²⁰⁵ CCRS Rm-1/97 (the European Accession Agreement), CCRS Rm-1/02 (the Agreement with the Holy See), CCRS Rm-1/09. Škrk 2006, p. 83.

²⁰⁶ Škrk 2006, p. 95.

²⁰⁷ Jager Agius 2013, p. 13. Signature is an expression of the state's intent to bind itself and not to act contrary to the purpose of the treaty. Should the treaty include a provision stating that the parties will be bound by it by force of signature, Slovenia has to sign the treaty with a 'subject to ratification' reservation. For Škrk, the Slovenian legal system does not recognise signature as a possible way of concluding an international treaty. Škrk 2006, p. 77.

it needs to be ratified, and diplomatic practice distinguishes internal ratification (procedure in the National Assembly or the Government) and international ratification (exchange of ratification instruments between the states parties to the treaty).²⁰⁸ In that sense, the Art. 160(2) procedure falls squarely within the internal phase of ratification; the President will only issue a ratification instrument once the ratification statute has been published in the Official Gazette.²⁰⁹

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 Slovenia has not been subject to a programme of financial assistance. The constitutional implications of such a scenario were discussed hypothetically in the Constitutional Court's State Holding & Bank Stability Referendum decision (see Sect. 1.3.2).

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

The right to water In the past two years, demands have been voiced for the introduction of constitutional protection for the right to water. After the 2013 initiative of the National Council, proposals were formulated by groups of National Assembly deputies. A proposal submitted in 2014 failed, as the parliamentary term came to an end. At the time of preparing this report, a new proposal had been tabled.²¹⁰

The proposal refers to the experience of Greece, Portugal, Italy, Spain and France, where privatisation of the water supply system has led to an increase in the prices charged to the end users and to a decrease in the quality of water. In several cases, privatisation of the water supply was demanded by the ‘troika’ as part of the conditionality for the country to receive financial support. It mentions Bolivia as an example of a country where privatisation of the water supply was one of the conditions put forward by the World Bank in order to extend a loan. The purpose of the initiative is thus to prevent changes in water regulation: the proposal mentions that Directive 2014/23/EU²¹¹ initially planned to liberalise the system of concessions for water. To that end, two paragraphs would be added to Art. 70 of the Constitution:

²⁰⁸ Jager Agius 2013, p. 16.

²⁰⁹ Drenik 2013, pp. 64–65 (Table 1). With regard to the discussion above in Sect. 3.3.2, the same logic also applies to the legislative referendum (that is no longer admissible since 2013). The referendum would in any case be held after the adoption of the statute in the National Assembly and before the statute is promulgated by the President of the Republic (Art. 9 Referendum and Popular Initiative Act). In other words, it is impossible that the ratification statute would be struck down after the ratification instruments have been exchanged, thus violating Slovenia's international obligations. In this sense, the a posteriori legislative referendum is different from a posteriori judicial review of constitutionality. The former will always be held before the promulgation of the statute by the President and its publication in Uradni list. The latter can be filed at any time after the statute has entered into force and hence long after the ratification instruments have been exchanged and the treaty has entered into force.

²¹⁰ (2015, February 17). Znova predlog o ustavni zaščiti pitne vode (Again a proposal for constitutional protection of potable water). Delo. <http://www.del.si/novice/okolje/znova-predlog-o-ustavni-zasciti-pitne-vode.html>.

Everyone has the right to potable water.

Water sources that supply potable water and household water to the population shall be exploited in the form of a non-profit public service.²¹²

Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP) The TTIP has been met with criticism in Slovenia predominantly from environmentalist NGOs and trade unions. A number of them have jointly demanded from the government ministers that Slovenia reject the introduction of the investor-state dispute settlement (ISDS) mechanisms in the TTIP. This protest rejects any scenario according to which states would be exposed to legal claims against their public policies in arbitration tribunals.²¹³ The concerns seems to have spread comparatively widely among the population, as Slovenia is among the countries where the number of signatures in support of the ‘Stop TTIP’ initiative has reached the ‘country quorum’ (Art. 7, Regulation 211/2011/EU).^{214,215}

It seems that the concerns with regard to the TTIP are slowly making their way into the institutions of the state. The National Council, in early 2015, hosted an NGO-convened conference with the telling title of ‘TTIP – are corporations to kidnap our future?’²¹⁶ In the Government commissioned study on the effects of the TTIP on the Slovenian economy, scholars warn of the unpredictable outcomes of the ISDS mechanisms and recommend maintaining the jurisdiction of national and ²¹¹ Directive 2014/23/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 26 February 2014 on the award of concession contracts, [2014] OJ L 94/1. The 2014 proposal for constitutional reform mentioned that the pressure from the environmental NGO Right2Water which collected 1.5 million signatures demanding that water services be excluded from liberalisation (<http://www.right2water.eu/news/vote-right-water-european-parliament-approaches>) led Commissioner Michel Barnier to announce that the water services would be excluded from the scope of Directive 2014/23/EU. See Art. 12 (‘Specific exclusions in the field of water’) Directive 2014/23/EU.

²¹² Order of the National Council of 15 May 2013, No. 802-01/13-6; Proposal of Brane Golubovič et al. to initiate a procedure to amend the Constitution (20 March 2014, EPA 1861–VI).

²¹³ <http://www.umanotera.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/02/Javni-poziv-za-izklju%C4%8Ditev-mehanizma-ISDS.pdf>.

²¹⁴ Regulation (EU) No. 211/2011 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 February 2011 on the citizens’ initiative, [2011] OJ L 65/1.

²¹⁵ <https://stop-ttip.org/signatures-member-states/>.

²¹⁶ <http://www.umanotera.org/wp-content/uploads/2015/02/POSVET-vabilo-TTIP.pdf>.

European courts over TTIP disputes.²¹⁷ Finally, the relevant committees of the National Assembly have adopted a position on the TTIP, the Comprehensive Trade and Economic Agreement with Canada and the WTO Trade in Services Agreement. The committees have called on the Government to negotiate for the exclusion of ISDS mechanisms from the agreements, to ensure that the agreements will not compromise the level of EU standards in environment, health and labour and social rights, and to defend the position that the Comprehensive Economic and Trade Agreement (CETA) and TTIP are mixed agreements.²¹⁸

References

- Ahtik M., Brkan M., Nendl Ž. (2014) In: Neergaard U., Jacqueson C., Danielsen J.H. (eds.) The Economic and Monetary Union: Constitutional and Institutional Aspects of the Economic Governance within the EU, The XXVI FIDE Congress in Copenhagen, 2014 Congress Publications Vol. 1. DJØF Publishing, Copenhagen, pp. 515–545.
- Albi, A. (2015) Erosion of Constitutional Rights in EU Law: A Call for ‘Substantive Co-operative Constitutionalism’, Part 1. Vienna Journal of International Constitutional Law (ICL Journal) 9:151–185, <http://ssrn.com/author=1246144>.
- Avbelj M. (2011) 44. člen (Article 44). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 730–735.
- Avbelj M. (2012a) Slovensko ustavno pravo v odnosu do prava EU (Slovenian constitutional law in relation to EU law). In: Kaučič I. (ed.) Dvajset let Ustave Republike Slovenije: pomen ustavnosti in ustavna demokracija (Twenty years of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia: the relevance of constitutionality and constitutional democracy). Pravna fakulteta Univerze v Ljubljani and Ustavno sodišče Republike Slovenije, Ljubljana, pp. 341–351.
- Avbelj M. (2012b) Ustavni pluralizem v EU in Sloveniji (Constitutional pluralism in the EU and in Slovenia). Pravna praksa 31(6):6–9.
- Avbelj M. (2013a) Trojka kot katalizator demokracije (The Troika as a democracy catalyst), 11.10.2013, <http://www.insolvin.si/DnevneVsebine/Kolumna.aspx?Id=105711>.
- Avbelj M. (2013b) Trojka kot instrument regresije (The troika as an instrument of regression), 25.10.2013, <http://www.insolvin.si/DnevneVsebine/Kolumna.aspx?Id=106676>.
- Avbelj M. (2013c) Konec ali začetek slovenskega ustavnega prava (The beginning or the end of Slovenian constitutional law). Pravna praksa 32 (1):6 et seq.
- Avbelj M., Persolja N. (2012) Slovenia. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 555–574.
- Bardutzky S. (2011) 149. člen (Article 149). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 1338–1343.
- Bardutzky S. (2014a) Constitution as argument in infringement/enforcement proceedings: The case study of fines for delays in implementing the Data Retention Directive. Paper presented at the ‘Assessing the EU’s responsiveness to constitutional rights: Data Retention, Arrest http://www.vlada.si/fileadmin/dokumenti/si/projekti/2015/TTIP/TTIP_Analiza_1_.pdf.

²¹⁷ Damijan et al. 2014.

²¹⁸ National Assembly, Resolutions of the Joint Session of the EU Affairs Committee (22nd Session) and the Economic Committee (5th Session), 12 February 2015.

- Warrants and beyond' Work-in-Progress Seminar, University of Kent, Canterbury, 28–29 August 2014.
- Bardutzky S. (2014b) The Timing of Dialogue: Slovenian Constitutional Court and the Data Retention Directive. <http://verfassungsblog.de/timing-dialogue-slovenian-constitutional-court-data-retention-directive/>.
- Bardutzky S., Fahey E. (2014) Who Got to Adjudicate the EU's Financial Crisis and Why? Judicial Review of the Legal Instruments of the Eurozone. In: Adams M., Fabbrini F., Larouche P. (eds.) The Constitutionalization of European Budgetary Constraints. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 341–358.
- Bele I. (2011) 27. člen (Article 27). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplosmske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 412–414.
- Bobek M. (2013) Of Feasibility and Silent Elephants: The Legitimacy of the Court of Justice through the Eyes of National Courts. In: Adams M., de Waele H., Meeusen J., Straetmans G. (eds.) Judging Europe's Judges: The Legitimacy of the Case Law of the European Court of Justice. Hart, Oxford, pp. 197–234.
- Brkan M., Nendl Ž. (2012) Slovenia. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 775–800.
- Bugarič B. (2012) Reševanje evra in začetek konca EU? (The saving of the euro and the beginning of the end of the EU?). Pravna praksa 31 (issue 5):3.
- Čebulj J. (2011) 72. člen (Article 72). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplosmske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 1026–1031.
- Cerar M. (2003a) Ustavna podlaga za prenos suverenosti in za vstop v obrambne zveze (Constitutional basis for a transfer of sovereignty and accession to defence alliances). Podjetje in delo 29:1463–1474.
- Cerar M. (2003b) O nujnosti sprejetja novega 3.a člena Ustave (Of the necessity of adoption of the new Article 3.a of the Constitution). Euro PP 1(1):6–7.
- Cerar M. (2011) Komentar k drugemu odstavku 3.a člena (Commentary of the first paragraph of Article 3.a). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplosmske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 73–84.
- Damijan J., Kostevc Č., Redek T. (2014) Vpliv Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP) na slovensko gospodarstvo (The impact of the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP) on the Slovenian economy). Center poslovne odličnosti Ekonomski fakultete, Ljubljana. http://www.vlada.si/fileadmin/dokumenti/si/projekti/2015/TTIP/TTIP_Analiza_1_.pdf.
- Douglas-Scott S. (2002) Constitutional Law of the European Union. Longman, Harlow.
- Drenik S. (2013) Mednarodne pogodbe v pravnem redu Republike Slovenije (International law treaties in the legal order of the Republic of Slovenia). In: Polak Petrič A., Jager Agius I., Zidar A. (eds.) Pravo mednarodnih pogodb. Fakulteta za družbene vede, Založba FDV and Ministrstvo za zunanje zadeve Republike Slovenije, Ljubljana, pp. 33–104.
- Dworkin R. (1986). Law's Empire. Belknap Press, Cambridge.
- Erbežnik A. (2008) Ustavno sodišče RS ter evropski nalog za prijetje in predajo ali 'kdo se boji Virginije Woolf' (The Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia and the European Arrest Warrant or 'who's afraid of Virginia Woolf?'). Pravna praksa 27(1):II–VII.
- Erbežnik A. (2010) Načelo vzajemnega priznavanja v okviru EU kot slaba utilitaristična rešitev (The principle of mutual recognition in the EU as a bad utilitarian solution). Dignitas 47/48:205–224.

- Erbežnik A. (2012) The principle of mutual recognition as a utilitarian solution, and the way forward. EuCLR 2(1):3–19.
- Erbežnik A. (2014a) Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Its Effects on the Role of a National Judge. In: Peršak N. (ed.) Legitimacy and Trust in Criminal Law, Policy and Justice Norms, Procedures, Outcomes. Ashgate Publishing Limited, Farnham, pp. 131–152.
- Erbežnik A. (2014b) Skupni standardi EU na področju kazenskega prava v primerjavi z nacionalnimi (ustavnopravnimi) standardi – Solange Reloaded (Common EU standards in criminal law in comparison to national (constitutional) standards – Solange Reloaded). Pravna praksa 33(26):II–VI.
- Fišer Z. (2008) Izročitev, predaja in njuna uvedba v slovensko kazensko pravo (Introducing extradition and surrender into Slovenian criminal law). In: Šugman Stubbs K. et al. (eds.) Evropski nalog za prijetje in predajo: primerjalnopravni in nacionalni vidiki – Porocilo (The European Arrest Warrant: comparative and national perspectives – Report). Inštitut za kriminologijo pri Pravni fakulteti v Ljubljani, Ljubljana, pp. 19–59.
- Grad F. (2007) Nova razmerja med parlamentom in vlado (New relations between the parliament and the government). Javna uprava 43(1):101–113.
- Halberstam D. (2015) ‘It’s the Autonomy, Stupid!’ A Modest Defense of Opinion 2/13 on EU Accession to the ECHR, and the Way Forward. German Law Journal 16:105–146.
- Jager Agius I. (2013) Postopek sklepanja mednarodnih pogodb in drugih mednarodnih aktov – piročnik (The procedure of concluding treaties and other international acts – a vademecum). In: Polak Petrič A., Jager Agius I., Zidar A. (eds.) Pravo mednarodnih pogodb (The law of treaties). Fakulteta za družbene vede, Založba FDV and Ministrstvo za zunanje zadeve Republike Slovenije, Ljubljana, pp. 3–28.
- Jambrek P. (2012) Iskanje neusahljivega vira slovenske državnosti ter njegove ustavne identitete (The quest for the inexhaustible source of Slovenian statehood and its constitutional identity). In: Kaučič I. (ed.) Dvajset let Ustave Republike Slovenije: pomen ustavnosti in ustavna demokracija (Twenty years of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia: the relevance of constitutionality and constitutional democracy). Pravna fakulteta Univerze v Ljubljani and Ustavno sodišče Republike Slovenije, Ljubljana, pp. 23–33.
- Jazbec B. (2014) Financial crises and the current situation in Slovenia. Address by Mr. Boštjan Jazbec, Governor of the Bank of Slovenia, at the Annual Conference of the Bank Association of Slovenia, Ljubljana, 18 November 2014. <http://www.bis.org/review/r150205e.htm>.
- Jurič T. (2014) Evropski nalog za prijetje in predajo – kritična presoja zakonitosti ravnanja sodišča in Policije (The European Arrest Warrant – a critical assessment of the legality of actions of the courts and of the police). Pravna praksa 35(28):8–10.
- Kaučič I. (2011a) Komentar k drugemu odstavku 3.a člena (Commentary on the second paragraph of Article 3.a). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 84–88.
- Kaučič I. (2011b) 170. člen (Article 170). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 1543–1548.
- Kovačič Mlinar B. (2006a) Je ZENPP v neskladju z ustavo? (Is ZENPP unconstitutional?). Pravna praksa 25:(4):13–14.
- Kovačič Mlinar B. (2006b) Pomanjkanje poguma pri odločitvi o pobudi za oceno ustavnosti ZENPP (A lack of courage in the decision regarding the initiative to review the constitutionality of ZENPP). Pravna praksa 25:(37):15–16.
- Kresal B. (2011) 78. člen (Article 78). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 1080–1085.

- Kresal Šoltes K. (2009) Primera Laval in Viking z vidika slovenske pravne ureditve avtonomije kolektivnega pogajanja (Laval and Viking case law from the perspective of the Slovenian law of autonomy of collective negotiations). Delavci in delodajalci 9:465–489.
- Kristan I. (2001) Dimenzijsije ‘evropskega člena’ (Dimensions of the ‘European clause’). Pravna praksa 20(31):4–5.
- Križanič F. (2012) Fiskalna restrikcija v času recesije (Fiscal restriction in the time of the recession). Gospodarska gibanja 2012(447). <http://www.eipf.si/publikacije/gospodarska-gibanja/2012/gospodarska-gibanja-447/fiskalna-restricija-v-casu-recesije/>.
- Kukovec D. (2014) Law and the Periphery. ELJ 21:406–428.
- Martinico G. (2010) Preliminary References and Constitutional Courts: Are You in the Mood for Dialogue? In: Fontanelli F., Martinico G., Carrozza P. (eds.) Shaping Rule of Law through Dialogue: International and Supranational Experiences. Europa Law Publishing, Groningen, pp. 221– 253.
- Mencinger J. (2006) Privatization in Slovenia. Slovenian Law Review 3:65–81.
- Mitsilegas V. (2006) The constitutional implications of mutual recognition in criminal matters in the EU. CML Rev. 43:1277–1311.
- Möstl M. (2010) Preconditions and Limits of Mutual Recognition. CML Rev. 47:405–436.
- Nahtigal M. (2012) Evropski fiskalni pakt – preveč tog in omejevalen (The European Fiscal Compact – too rigid and limiting). Pravna praksa 31(12):II–VII.
- Nerad S. (2011) 160. člen (Article 160). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 1414–1462.
- Nerad S. (2012) Recepceija prava Evropske unije v nacionalno ustavno pravo (Reception of EU law into national constitutional law). In: Kaučič I. (ed.) Dvajset let Ustave Republike Slovenije: pomen ustavnosti in ustavna demokracija (Twenty years of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia: the relevance of constitutionality and constitutional democracy). Pravna fakulteta Univerze v Ljubljani and Ustavno sodišče Republike Slovenije, Ljubljana, pp. 379–392.
- Novak M. (2004) Slovenska ustavna identiteta v primežu evropskega prava – preliminarna razmišljanja (Slovenian constitutional identity in the vice of European law – preliminary thoughts). Revus 2(2): 95–115.
- Oven B. (2014) Ustavno sodišče med sekundarnim pravom EU in ustavo Republike Slovenije: diplomsko delo (Constitutional Court between secondary EU law and the constitution of the Republic of Slovenia: thesis). Pravna fakulteta Univerze v Ljubljani, Ljubljana.
- Pavlin P. (2011) 87. člen (Article 87). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 1151–1163.
- Perry H.W. (1991). Deciding to decide: Agenda setting in the United States Supreme Court. Harvard University Press, Cambridge.
- Plesničar M.M., Modic M. (2007) The Constitutional Court of the Republic of Slovenia. Slovenian Law Review 4 (Dec. 2007):287–307.
- Plesničar M.M., Šugman Stubbs K. (2009) Implementacija in percepcija načela vzajemnega priznavanja v slovenskem kazenskem pravu (Implementation and perception of the principle of mutual recognition in Slovenian criminal law). Zbornik znanstvenih razprav 69:203–228.
- Ribičič C. (2003) Mozaik ustavnih sprememb: od slovenske ustavnosti k evropski (The mosaic of constitutional reform: from Slovenian towards European constitutionality). GV Založba, Ljubljana.
- Ribičič C. (2006) Položaj slovenske ustave po vključitvi v EU (The position of the Slovenian constitution after the accession to the EU). Pravna praksa 25(29/30):II–VI.
- Ribičič C., Kaučič I. (2014) Constitutional Limits of Legislative Referendum: The Case of Slovenia. Lex Localis – Journal of Local Self-Government 12:899–928.

- Rosenfeld M. (2009). The Identity of the Constitutional Subject: Selfhood, Citizenship, Culture and Community. Routledge, London.
- Sadurski W. (2005) Rights Before Courts: A Study of Constitutional Courts in Postcommunist States of Central and Eastern Europe. Springer, Dordrecht.
- Skledar Š. (2013) Changes proposed to referendum rules, 7. 4. 2013, <https://www.eurofound.europa.eu/publications/article/2013/changes-proposed-to-referendum-rules>.
- Škrk M. (2006) Ustavnosodna presoja mednarodnih pogodb (Constitutional review of treaties). Revus 4(6):73–96.
- Strban G. (2012) Ustavna zapoved socialne države ni pravno nezavezujoča norma (The Constitutional commandment of social state is not legally non-binding). Pravna praksa 31 (22):3.
- Šturm L. (1998) Omejitev oblasti: ustavna izhodišča javnega prava (The limits on power: constitutional foundations of public law). Nova revija, Ljubljana.
- Šturm L. (2002) 2. člen (Article 2). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana, pp. 52–98.
- Šturm L. (2011) 154. člen (Article 154). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 1363–1370.
- Šugman Stubbs K. (2008) Obseg sodne kontrole ENPP (The scope of judicial review of the European Arrest Warrant). In: Šugman Stubbs K. et al. (eds.) Evropski nalog za prijetje in predajo: primerjalnopravni in nacionalni vidiki – Poročilo (European Arrest Warrant: comparative and national perspectives – Report). Inštitut za kriminologijo pri Pravni fakulteti v Ljubljani, Ljubljana, pp. 136–141.
- Šugman Stubbs K., Gorkič P. (2008) Empirična analiza postopkov v zadevah odločanja o ENPP (Empirical analysis of procedures in European Arrest Warrant cases). In: Šugman Stubbs K. et al. (eds.) Evropski nalog za prijetje in predajo: primerjalnopravni in nacionalni vidiki – Poročilo (European Arrest Warrant: comparative and national perspectives – Report). Inštitut za kriminologijo pri Pravni fakulteti v Ljubljani, Ljubljana, pp. 155–186.
- Šugman Stubbs K., Gorkič P. (2009a) Abuse of the EAW System. In: Keijzer N., van Sliedregt E. (eds.) The European Arrest Warrant in Practice. TMC Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 245–264.
- Šugman Stubbs K., Gorkič P. (2009b) Denial of Guilt. In: Keijzer N., van Sliedregt E. (eds.) The European Arrest Warrant in Practice. TMC Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 229–243.
- Šugman Stubbs K., Plesničar M.M. (2009) Mutual recognition in the context of Slovenian criminal law. In: Vernimmen-Van Tiggelen G., Surano L., Weyembergh A. (eds.) The future of mutual recognition in criminal matters in the European Union. Ed. de l'Université de Bruxelles, Brussels, pp. 501–522.
- Testen F. (2002a) 15. člen (Article 15). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana, pp. 192–204.
- Testen F. (2002b) 154. člen (Article 154). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana, pp. 1024–1049.
- Testen F. (2011) Komentar k tretjemu odstavku 3. a člena (Commentary on Article 3. a, Paragraph III). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije – dopolnitev A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana, pp. 89–95.
- Umek U. (2011) 8. člen (Article 8). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije: dopolnitev – A (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia – Supplement A). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Kranj, pp. 131–145.
- Vuksanović I. (2011) Ustava in ekonomska politika (Constitution and economic policy). Pravna praksa 30(41/42):18–20.

- Vuksanović I. (2013) Ustavne omejitve referendumu (Constitutional limitations of the referendum). Pravna praksa 32(2):13–14.
- Zagorc S., Bardutzky S. (2010) Application of EU law in Slovenia: teething troubles of the blue-eyed boy. In: Lazowski A. (ed.) Application of EU Law in the New Member States: Brave New World. T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 421–451.
- Zalar B. (2005) Prve izkušnje sodišča in sodnikovi pogledi na uporabo prava Evropske unije (First experiences of the court and the views of a judge on the application of European Union law). Pravna praksa 24(6): I–VIII.
- Zalar B. (2008) Constitutionalisation of the implementing act of the procedures directive: the Slovenian perspective. European Journal of Migration and Law 10:187–217.
- Zupančič B.M. (2002) 28. člen (Article 28). In: Šturm L. (ed.) Komentar Ustave Republike Slovenije (Commentary of the Constitution of the Republic of Slovenia). Fakulteta za podiplomske državne in evropske študije, Ljubljana, pp. 306–314.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Role of the Polish Constitution (Pre-2016): Development of a Liberal Democracy in the European and International Context

Stanisław Biernat and Monika Kawczyńska

Abstract The report outlines the Polish constitutional culture and explores the interaction with EU and international law before the 2015–2018 illiberal turn in the country. The report recalls that the Communist Constitution had been political and its observance was fictional. After the transition in 1989 and in the new 1997

Stanisław Biernat is Professor of European Law, Jagiellonian University, Cracow; at the time of writing Judge and Vice-President of the Constitutional Tribunal of Poland. e-mail: biernat@cicero.law.uj.edu.pl.

Monika Kawczyńska is Assistant Professor of European Law, Jagiellonian University, Cracow; at the time of writing Judicial Assistant, Constitutional Tribunal of Poland. e-mail: monika.kawczynska@uj.edu.pl.

All websites accessed 10 January 2018. Main text submitted September 2015.

The report is an analysis of the Polish Constitution and of the jurisprudence of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal before a serious systemic crisis, which formally began at the end of 2015. See selected judgments of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal: <http://trybunal.gov.pl/en/>. At that time, the first statutes limiting the systemic role of the Constitutional Tribunal were adopted, and three judges were elected to the Constitutional Tribunal in violation of the Constitution. Despite unfavourable legal and political circumstances, in 2016 the Constitutional Tribunal was able to issue three judgments declaring the statutory amendments to the legislation governing the Constitutional Tribunal unconstitutional. It was not until May 2018 that the judgments were officially published, which was contrary to the clear obligation provided for in Art. 190(2) of the Constitution (<http://konstytucyjny.pl/nieopublikowane-wyroki-tk-w-wersji-angielskiej>). The currently binding statutes concerning the Constitutional Tribunal were adopted in November and December 2016. Moreover, in 2017, the Parliament adopted new legislation relating to the Polish judiciary which, in the opinion of the vast majority of experts, raises grave constitutional concerns regarding judicial independence (cf. opinions of the Venice Commission <http://www.venice.coe.int/webforms/documents/?country=23&year=all>; Rule of Law Recommendations of the European Commission and its reasoned proposal under Art. 7(1) TEU for a Council Decision http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-17-5367_en.htm; and selected judgments of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal: <http://trybunal.gov.pl/en/>). Many other statutes adopted since 2016 have raised serious constitutional concerns, e.g. Public Prosecutors' Law, Civil Service Law and the Law on Assemblies.

S. Biernat (✉) · M. Kawczyńska
Jagiellonian University, Kraków, Poland
e-mail: biernat@cicero.law.uj.edu.pl

M. Kawczyńska
e-mail: monika.kawczynska@uj.edu.pl

Constitution, emphasis was on the direct application of constitutional provisions, the rule of law principle, the democratic and social state, a broad catalogue of rights and freedoms with the precise permissible grounds for their limitation, as well as institutional guarantees and judicial procedures against violations of those rights and freedoms. The Constitutional Tribunal carried out stringent review of legal provisions. The main grounds for declaration of unconstitutionality were violation of the rule of law, the right to a fair trial, the principle of proportionality and exceeding powers delegated to the executive. The Constitutional Tribunal also exercised review over EU and international treaties and measures implementing EU law. Although the Constitutional Tribunal stated that the Constitution was the supreme law of Poland, it respected the autonomy of EU law and the competences of the ECJ, adopting the approach of a consistent interpretation of Polish law with EU law. Some key examples of the case law include constitutional challenges regarding the Accession Treaty, the Brussels I Regulation, the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) and the ESM Treaty. The EAW judgment led to a constitutional amendment allowing the surrender of Polish citizens under certain circumstances. The conditions and grounds for limitation of rights are more restrictive than in EU law.

Keywords The Constitution of Poland · Constitutional provisions regarding EU and international co-operation · The Polish Constitutional Tribunal
Constitutional review · The rule of law, fundamental rights and their limitation Constitutional safeguards and judicial review · The principles of proportionality, legal certainty and legitimate expectations · Defence rights, presumption of innocence · Constitutional review of EU law · Accession Treaty · European Arrest Warrant · ESM Treaty · International extradition treaties · Referendum

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The history of Polish constitutionalism dates back to the 16th century.¹ The crowning achievement was the Constitution of 3 May (Konstytucja 3 Maja), adopted by the Parliament (Sejm Wielki) in 1791. It is considered to be the second written constitution in the world and the first in Europe. The Constitution, formally enacted as Governmental Act (Ustawa Rządowa), introduced the principle of sovereignty of the people, the separation of powers into legislative, executive and judiciary and guaranteed a number of important individual liberties. It was influenced by views of the French philosophers J.J. Rousseau and C.L. Montesquieu. The Constitution was an attempt to reform the political system after many years of political stagnation at the time of Poland's dependence on powerful neighbours. The Three Partitions of Poland (1772, 1793 and 1795), the territory of which was seized by the Russian Empire, Prussia and the Austrian Empire, effectively ended Polish national sovereignty until 1918. Although in effect for only a short time, the Constitution of 3 May became a symbol of Poland's national identity based on constitutional values and allowed its principles to survive for the upcoming years of foreign domination.²

¹ Uruszzak 2010, p. 222.

Poland regained its independence after World War I in November 1918. During the time of the Second Polish Republic until the outbreak of World War II in 1939, three constitutions were adopted: the Little Constitution of 1919 (Mała Konstytucja z 1919), the Constitution of 1921 (Konstytucja Marcowa) and the Constitution of 1935 (Konstytucja Kwietniowa).

After World War II, the Polish Parliament controlled by Communists adopted the provisional Little Constitution in 1947 (Mała Konstytucja z 1947). On 22 July 1952 the Parliament enacted a Communist constitution, based on the Stalinist Soviet Constitution of 1936, and the name of the state was changed to the People's Republic of Poland. The sovereign was described as the working people of towns and villages, and the system was structured upon socialised ownership of the means of production and central planning. The structure of state organs was based on the principle of the uniformity of state authority. The political constitutional provisions were only a facade hiding the real system of government, subordinate to the principle of leadership of the Communist Party with limits on Polish sovereignty imposed by the USSR,³ irrespective of the fact that the systemic role of the Communist Party was only formally introduced into the Constitution in 1976. The rights and freedoms of individuals were regulated in the final part of the Constitution, giving clear priority to social and economic rights. The Constitution of 1952 did not introduce institutional guarantees or judicial procedures against violations of rights and liberties, and therefore its observance was only fictional.⁴ The nature of the Constitution was predominantly political and its role as the legal act having superior position in the system of national law was considerably reduced.⁵

A new chapter in the history of Polish constitutionalism started in 1989. Changes in the Constitution reflected the political and economic transition towards a democratic state and market economy. The amendment re-established the traditional name of the Polish state – the Republic of Poland (Rzeczpospolita Polska), restored the principle of the sovereignty of the Nation and introduced the principle of a democratic state ruled by law.⁶

The current Constitution, which is one of the newest constitutions in Europe, was adopted by the National Assembly on 2 April 1997 and approved by a national

² Brzezinski 1991, pp. 60–70; see also Davies 2005, pp. 511 et seq.

³ Garlicki 2010b, p. 15.

⁴ Prokop 2011, pp. 24–25.

⁵ Garlicki 2010b, p. 16.

⁶ Prokop 2011, p. 27.

referendum held on 25 May 1997.⁷ It entered into force on 17 September 1997. It falls within the category of basic laws of the state that were created after the fall of a Communist regime.⁸ Accordingly, the Preamble emphasises that in 1989, the Homeland recovered the possibility of a sovereign and democratic determination of its fate. Article 13 provides that political parties and other organisations with programmes based upon totalitarian methods and the modes of activity of Nazism, Fascism and Communism, shall be prohibited.⁹ The present Constitution remains within the category of constitutions that have a legal character and are enforceable in courts. The main approach to constitutional regulation relevant to the founders of the Polish Constitution, as in other countries of Eastern and Central Europe, was an emphasis on the legal nature of the norms contained in the basic law of the state.¹⁰ According to Art. 8(2), provisions of the Constitution shall apply directly, unless the Constitution provides otherwise. Chapter II of the Constitution entitled ‘The Freedoms, Rights and Obligations of Persons and Citizens’ contains a wide catalogue of rights and freedoms which may be invoked directly on the basis of constitutional norms before the courts and administrative organs of the state.

1.1.2 Compared to other European constitutions, the Polish Constitution is quite long. It is composed of a preamble and 13 chapters, including 243 articles. The legal commentary explains this unique feature as a consequence of seeking the widest possible democratic compromise during the creation of the basic law.¹¹

The Polish Constitution contains provisions proclaiming the sovereignty of the Nation and the organisation of the State, as well as provisions limiting the power of public authorities by protecting the constitutional rights and freedoms, the rule of law and the separation of powers with due checks and balances. Chapter I entitled ‘The Republic’ contains provisions regarding the principle of a democratic state ruled by law (Art. 2), the principle of sovereignty of the Nation (Art. 4), the independence and territorial integrity of the state (Art. 5), the principle of legality (Art. 7), the principle of separation and balance between the legislative, executive and judicial powers (Art. 10), political pluralism (Art. 11) and the decentralisation of public power (Art. 15).

Having in mind the negative experience regarding the Constitution of 1952, the founders of the current Constitution gave priority to the provisions concerning human and citizens’ rights and freedoms as well as the ways to protect them, placing them before the provisions on the functioning of the state and its organs.¹²

⁷ The Constitution of the Republic of Poland of 2 April 1997, Journal of Laws 1997, No. 78, item 483.

⁸ Albi 2005, pp. 19–21.

⁹ All translations of constitutional provisions are from the unofficial translation of the Polish Constitution provided by the Parliament available at <http://www.sejm.gov.pl/prawo/konst/angielski/kon1.htm>.

¹⁰ Grzybowski 2002, p. 12.

¹¹ Rakowska and Skotnicki 2007, p. 219.

¹² Sokolewicz 2001, pp. 19–20.

On the one hand, such solution proves that the state authorities have a subsidiary role in relation to the individual, and on the other hand it creates the highest guarantee and respect for individual rights and freedoms. Chapter II contains provisions devoted to general principles (Arts. 30–37), personal freedoms and rights (Arts. 38–56), political freedoms and rights (Arts. 57–63), economic, social and cultural freedoms and rights (Arts. 64–76), means for the defence of freedoms and rights (Arts. 77–81) and obligations (Arts. 82–86). Provisions concerning rights and freedoms of the individual are also found in the Preamble, and in Chapters I, IV and XI. It must be concluded that such provisions account for more than 25% of the Constitution.¹³

Further chapters of the Constitution concern sources of law (Chapter III), the Parliament (Sejm) and the Senate (Chapter IV), the President of the Republic (Chapter V), the Council of Ministers and government administration (Chapter VI), local government (Chapter VII), courts and tribunals (Chapter VIII), organs of state control and for defence of rights (Chapter IX), public finances (Chapter X), extraordinary measures (Chapter XI) and amendment of the Constitution (Chapter XII).

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 The Agreement establishing an association between the European Communities, its Member States and Poland (Europe Agreement) was signed in December 1991. Among various issues discussed in the course of preparatory work on the new Constitution was the so-called ‘integration clause’ or ‘European clause’ concerning the transfer of competences to international organisations and forming a legal basis for future accession to the European Union. The integration clause was included as Art. 90(1) in the Constitution of 1997. Article 90 is contained in Chapter III of the Constitution entitled ‘Sources of Law’. The discussion on the drafting of the provision concerned phrases such as ‘supranational organisation’, ‘transfer of the exercise of the competences’ and ‘public organs’.¹⁴ Finally the expressions ‘international organization or international organ’, ‘transfer of competences’ and ‘organs of State authority’ were used. It must be emphasised that the Polish word ‘przekazanie’, used in Art. 90(1) of the Constitution may be translated alternatively as ‘transfer’, ‘delegation’ or ‘conferral’ of competences.¹⁵

¹³ Jabłoński 2010, p. 80.

¹⁴ Biernat 2007, p. 247; Wojtyczek 2007, p. 17; Działocha 1996, pp. 6–11.

¹⁵ The unofficial translation of the Polish Constitution uses the word ‘delegation’. The word ‘conferral’ is used by the Constitutional Tribunal Publication Office in Selected rulings of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal concerning the law of the European Union (2003–2014), vol. LI, Warsaw 2014. <http://trybunal.gov.pl/publikacje/wydawnictwa/art/7070-tom-li-selected-rulings-of-the-polish-constitutional-tribunal-concerning-the-law-of-the-european-un/>. The authors of the

According to Art. 90(1) of the Constitution, ‘[t]he Republic of Poland may, by virtue of international agreements, transfer to an international organization or international institution the competence of organs of State authority in relation to certain matters’. The procedure concerning ratification of such an agreement is specified in Arts. 90(2)–(4) of the Constitution. A statute granting consent for ratification of the agreement may be adopted by a two-thirds majority vote of the Sejm (lower chamber of the Polish Parliament) and the Senate or approved in a nationwide referendum. The resolution in respect of the choice of procedure for granting consent to ratification (by Parliament or national referendum) shall be taken by the Sejm by an absolute majority vote taken in the presence of at least one-half of the statutory number of Deputies. Accordingly, the ratification of international agreements concerning transfer of competences requires greater democratic legitimacy granted by the Parliament, or by the Nation, than other international agreements specified in Art. 89 of the Constitution (see Sect. 3.1.1). To date, the procedure specified in Art. 90 of the Constitution has been used twice, in both instances in relation to the European Union. Consent for ratification of the Accession Treaty signed in Athens on 16 April 2003 was given in a national referendum held on 7 and 8 June 2003 by 77.45% of voters. In accordance with the result of the referendum, the President ratified the Accession Treaty on 23 July 2003. Consent for ratification of the Lisbon Treaty was given by the Sejm and the Senate with a two-thirds majority vote and ratified by the President on 10 October 2008.

During preparatory work for the new Constitution, the provisions concerning the position of primary and secondary EU law within the system of sources of law applicable in the territory of Poland were also discussed. The drafters of the Constitution decided that the main sources of primary law – the EU Treaties – shall not be distinguished from other ratified international agreements in the Polish legal system (Arts. 91(1) and (2) of the Constitution). After promulgation, an international agreement constitutes part of the domestic legal order and applies directly, unless its application depends on the enactment of a statute. If such an agreement is ratified upon prior consent granted by a statute, in the case of a conflict of norms, the agreement has precedence over statutes (see Sect. 3.2.1). As for secondary EU law, Art. 91(3) of the Constitution states that ‘[i]f an agreement, ratified by the Republic of Poland, establishing an international organization so provides, the laws established by it shall be applied directly and have precedence in the event of a conflict of laws’. In the course of parliamentary drafting work, Deputies and Senators opted not to establish the precedence of EU secondary law over ‘norms of national law’ (including the Constitution), in favour of ‘statutes’.¹⁶

Since its adoption, the Constitution of 1997 has been amended only twice. The amendment of 8 September 2006 was directly related to membership in the present contribution share the view that the word ‘transfer’ corresponds best to the meaning of the word ‘przekazanie’.

¹⁶ Wojtyczek 2007, p. 25.

European Union and concerned the prohibition of the extradition of Polish citizens provided in Art. 55(1) of the Constitution.¹⁷ The Constitution was amended in order to give effect to Council Framework Decision 2002/584 on the European Arrest Warrant¹⁸ (see Sect. 1.2.3).

1.2.2 Poland's Constitution is considered to be a 'rigid constitution' because the process of amendment prescribed in its Art. 235 is detailed and requires political consent. A bill to amend the Constitution may be submitted by at least one-fifth of the statutory number of Deputies, the Senate or the President. A bill to amend the Constitution shall be adopted by the Sejm by a majority of at least two-thirds of votes in the presence of at least one-half of the statutory number of Deputies, and by the Senate by an absolute majority of votes in the presence of at least one-half of the statutory number of Senators. If a bill to amend the Constitution relates to the provisions contained in Chapters I, II or XII, all subjects authorised to submit the bill may require, within 45 days of the adoption of the bill by the Senate, that a confirmatory referendum be held. Such amendment of the Constitution shall be deemed to be approved if the majority of persons voting in the referendum express support for the amendment. The President shall sign the statute within 21 days of its submission and order its promulgation in the Journal of Laws of the Republic of Poland.

The amendment concerning Art. 55(1) of the Constitution related to Chapter II of the Constitution. It was adopted by a two-thirds majority of the Deputies and by an absolute majority of the Senators. A confirmatory referendum was not required.

1.2.3 The direct reason for the amendment of Art. 55(1) of the Constitution was the judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal relating to the European Arrest Warrant (EAW).¹⁹ The aforementioned provision originally stated that '[t]he extradition of a Polish citizen shall be forbidden'. The Constitutional Tribunal decided that Art. 607t§1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to the extent that it permitted surrender of a Polish national to a Member State of the European Union, was inconsistent with Art. 55(1) of the Constitution. The Tribunal analysed whether there was any difference between 'extradition' (ekstradykcja), within the meaning of Art. 55(1) of the Constitution, and 'surrender' (wydanie, przekazanie) used in the EAW Framework Decision. Different views were presented in the legal literature.²⁰ The Tribunal stated that the essence (core) of extradition lies in the transfer of a prosecuted or sentenced person for the purpose of conducting a criminal prosecution or

¹⁷ Statute amending the Constitution of the Republic of Poland of 8 September 2006, Journal of Laws 2006 No. 200, item. 1471.

¹⁸ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

¹⁹ Judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal of 27 April 2005, ref. No. P 1/05.

²⁰ Płachta 2002, pp. 71–72; Kruszyński 2004, pp. 9–10.

executing a penalty imposed against them. The surrender of a prosecuted person on the basis of an EAW is in essence the same. Accordingly, it should be viewed as a particular form of extradition. The Tribunal pointed out that considering Poland's obligations as implied by EU membership, it is essential that the applicable law be changed such as to enable full implementation of Framework Decision 2002/584.

The bill to amend Art. 55 of the Constitution was submitted to Parliament by the President on 15 May 2006. The Deputies, in line with the aforementioned judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal, decided that the surrender of persons on the basis of an EAW must be viewed as a form of extradition in the meaning of Art. 55(1) of the Constitution.²¹ According to the new Art. 55 of the Constitution:

1. The extradition of a Polish citizen shall be prohibited, except in cases specified in paras. 2 and 3.
2. Extradition of a Polish citizen may be granted upon a request made by a foreign state or an international judicial body if such a possibility stems from an international treaty ratified by Poland or a statute implementing a legal instrument enacted by an international organisation of which the Republic of Poland is a member, provided that the act covered by a request for extradition:
 - (1) was committed outside the territory of the Republic of Poland, and
 - (2) constituted an offence under the law in force in the Republic of Poland or would have constituted an offence under the law in force in the Republic of Poland if it had been committed within the territory of the Republic of Poland, both at the time of its commitment and at the time of the making of the request.
3. Compliance with the conditions specified in para. 2 subparagraphs 1 and 2 shall not be required if an extradition request is made by an international judicial body established under an international treaty ratified by Poland, in connection with a crime of genocide, crime against humanity, war crime or a crime of aggression, covered by the jurisdiction of that body.
4. The extradition of a person suspected of the commission of a crime for political reasons but without the use of force shall be forbidden, so as an extradition which would violate rights and freedoms of persons and citizens.
5. The courts shall adjudicate on the admissibility of extradition.

1.2.4 The current provisions including Arts. 90 and 91 of the Constitution are considered by some observers to be insufficient, considering further developments in the European legal order, especially those introduced by the Lisbon Treaty. Different proposals concerning the amendment of the Constitution relating to Poland's membership in the EU were formulated in the legal literature and were submitted to Parliament.²² The most important proposals were presented by

²¹ Extraordinary Commission for consideration of the draft legislation presented by the President of the Republic of Poland concerning the amendment of the Constitution and Code of Criminal Procedure, Bulletin No. 972/V of 21 August 2006.

²² Laskowska 2011, pp. 201 et seq.

President Bronisław Komorowski (on 16 November 2010, No. 3598) and by the Deputies (on 26 November 2010, No. 3687) and concerned the introduction of a new chapter Xa relating to Poland's membership in the EU in the Constitution.²³ The proposals were jointly considered by the Constitutional Committee and underwent two readings in the Sejm. They did not come into force due to a lack of political will on the part of the Deputies followed by the end of the VII term of office of the Sejm in November 2011.

The changes to the Polish Constitution related to membership in the European Union can be divided into the necessary and the desirable (see Sects. 1.5.2 and 2.13.4). In view of the future adoption of the euro, Art. 227 of the Constitution must be amended to guarantee the independence of the National Bank of Poland and ensure the competence of the European Central Bank associated with the issue of the common currency. Such amendment is necessary for compliance with Art. 131 TFEU.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The rules regarding the transfer of competences of the organs of state authority to the European Union are specified in Art. 90 of the Constitution (see Sect. 1.2.1). The primacy of secondary EU law over statutes and the direct applicability of such law is governed by Art. 91(3) of the Constitution (see Sect. 1.2.1).

1.3.2 The most comprehensive interpretation of Art. 90(1) of the Constitution was presented by the Constitutional Tribunal in the European Stability Mechanism (ESM) case,²⁴ where the Court stated that the essence of Art. 90 is to provide a guarantee for the sovereignty of the Nation and the state by providing formal restrictions to the transfer of competences vested in the organs of state authority. The transfer of competences is admissible under the following conditions: (1) the transfer is to an international organisation or organ; (2) the competences relate to certain matters and (3) consent is granted by the Parliament or alternatively by the sovereign acting by way of a nationwide referendum. This triad of constitutional restrictions must be preserved in order to maintain the conformity of the conferral with the Constitution. Taking into consideration its previous jurisprudence as well as views presented in legal commentaries, the Tribunal stated that Art. 90 shall be applied in the following situations: (1) the subject of the international agreement concerns competences on the basis of which the organs of state authority issue legal acts (in particular legislative acts); (2) the competence is conferred on an international (supranational) institution or organisation; (3) the effect of the conferral is that the organisation can exercise the competence to issue legal acts (in particular legislative acts) that are binding on individuals and state organs.

²³ Chruciak 2013, pp. 59 et seq.

²⁴ Judgment of 26 June 2013, ref. No. K 33/12.

The Constitutional Tribunal has also developed the concept of ‘activation of competences’ as opposed to ‘transfer of competences’ in its jurisprudence. In the judgment concerning a declaration specified in the former Art. 35(2) TEU on acceptance of the jurisdiction of the European Court of Justice (ECJ) in the Third Pillar and in order to allow the submission of requests for a preliminary ruling by the Polish courts in the Third Pillar,²⁵ the Tribunal underlined that such competence was acquired by Poland by the Treaty of Accession, and that the declaration ‘means only activation of that competence, and not its emergence’.

The Polish Constitutional Tribunal acknowledged the view presented in the legal literature that absolute sovereignty has been replaced by a modern and revised approach. In its judgment on the constitutionality of the Treaty of Lisbon,²⁶ the Tribunal emphasised that ‘in the doctrine of international law, there is the view that the concept of absolute, unrestrained sovereignty is a thing of the past’. The Constitutional Tribunal stated that a distinction is drawn between, on the one hand, the limitation of sovereignty arising from the will of the state that is in accordance with international law and, on the other hand, the infringements of sovereignty which occur against the will of the state and which are inconsistent with international law. By incurring obligations, the state does not necessarily limit its freedom of activity, but at times extends its activity into fields where it has not acted before. The ability to incur international obligations is what international law implies in the legal character of the state, and what constitutes the identity of the state in international law. Therefore, this is not a factor that limits sovereignty, but it is rather a manifestation of sovereignty. The Constitutional Tribunal shared the view expressed in legal commentary that accession to the European Union is perceived as a sort of limitation of the sovereignty of a given state, but it does not mean the loss of sovereignty and is tied to a compensatory effect in the form of the possibility to partake in the decision-making processes of the European Union.

1.3.3 In its judgment on the constitutionality of the Treaty of Accession,²⁷ the Tribunal determined the limits to the transfer of powers by stating that the conferral of competences ‘in relation to certain matters’ must be construed as a prohibition against conferring all competences vested in a given organ of state authority, and conferring all competences within a given scope, as well as a prohibition against conferring competences concerning matters that fall within the scope of powers of a given organ of state authority. Therefore, it is necessary to precisely specify the areas and the scope of competences that are subject to conferral. At the same time,

²⁵ Judgment of 18 February 2009, ref. No. Kp 3/08.

²⁶ Judgment of 24 November 2010, ref. No. K 32/09.

²⁷ Judgment of 11 May 2005, ref. No. K 18/04.

Art. 90(1) of the Constitution may not constitute a basis for granting an international organisation (or an organ thereof) the competence to enact legal acts or make decisions that would be inconsistent with the Constitution, in particular to the extent that Poland could not function as a sovereign and democratic state ('core' powers). Further, in the judgment concerning the Lisbon Treaty, the Tribunal shared the view expressed in the legal commentaries that the concept of constitutional identity determines the scope of matters excluded from the competence to confer competences. The matters for which conferral is prohibited are the fundamental principles of the Constitution: the principle of independent statehood, democratic governance, rule of law, social justice, human dignity and protection of the rights and freedoms of the individual.

1.3.4 According to Art. 8(1) of the Constitution, '[t]he Constitution shall be the supreme law of the Republic of Poland'. This principle is also upheld by Art. 91 of the Constitution that determines the position of primary and secondary EU law within the system of sources of law applicable in the territory of Poland (see Sect. 3.2.1). The most comprehensive interpretation of the supreme role of the Constitution over European Union law was presented in the judgment concerning the Treaty of Accession. The Constitutional Tribunal stated that given its supreme legal force, the Constitution enjoys primacy within the territory of the Republic of Poland. If an irreconcilable inconsistency were to appear between a constitutional norm and an EU norm, such a collision could in no event be resolved by assuming the supremacy of the EU norm over the constitutional norm. Furthermore, such collision could not lead to a situation where a constitutional norm loses its binding force and is substituted by an EU norm, nor could it lead to the application of the constitutional norm restricted to areas beyond the scope of EU law. This view was upheld by the Constitutional Tribunal in its judgments concerning the Lisbon Treaty and the Brussels I Regulation.

The principle of interpreting domestic law in a 'Europe-friendly' manner is clearly phrased in the case law of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal. However, there are limits to such interpretation and they result from the supreme power of the Constitution. In particular, the norms of the Constitution within the field of individual rights and freedoms indicate a minimum threshold which may not be lowered or questioned as a result of EU provisions. Undoubtedly, a ruling declaring the non-conformity of EU law with the Constitution should be an ultima ratio and ought to be delivered only when all other ways of resolving a conflict between Polish norms and the norms of the EU legal order have failed. In the event a 'Europe-friendly' interpretation is not possible, the Nation as the sovereign or an organ of state authority authorised by the Constitution to represent the Nation would need to decide to either amend the Constitution, seek modifications to the EU provisions or, ultimately, initiate Poland's withdrawal from the European Union.

The Brussels I judgment of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal was the first case in which the constitutional court of an EU Member State directly reviewed the constitutionality of secondary EU law and issued a ruling on the merits.²⁸ The Constitutional Tribunal adjudicated that Art. 41, second sentence, of the Brussels I Regulation (Council Regulation 44/2001 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters)²⁹ was consistent with the right to a fair hearing and the equal rights of parties to court proceedings (Art. 45(1) in conjunction with Art. 32(2) of the Constitution). The admissibility of such control was closely related to the type of constitutional proceedings commenced by way of a constitutional complaint submitted by an individual (substantial review of norms).³⁰ According to Art. 79(1) of the Constitution, an individual may in a constitutional complaint challenge the conformity of a statute or other normative act (forming a basis for the court's judgment in his or her case) with the Constitution. According to the Constitutional Tribunal, 'normative act', within the meaning of Art. 79(1) of the Constitution, includes not only normative acts issued by one of the organs of the Polish state, but also – after fulfilling further requirements – legal acts issued by an organ of an international organisation. In view of the Tribunal, the regulation specified in Art. 288 TFEU may be regarded as a normative act within the meaning of Art. 79(1) of the Constitution. Allowing for the possibility of examining the conformity of EU secondary legislation with the Constitution, the Tribunal emphasised the need to maintain due caution and restraint in that regard, because of the principle of sincere cooperation referred to in Art. 4(3) TEU (see Sect. 2.8.4). The judgment in case ref. No. SK 45/09 opened a wide debate as to the limits of control of EU secondary law by the Constitutional Tribunal.³¹ In the opinion of one group of authors, the Tribunal has no competence to control EU secondary law and should discontinue any such pending proceedings. The courts of the European Union have exclusive jurisdiction in that respect. By contrast, the authors belonging to another group share the view that the limits of control are determined by constitutional norms, as well as EU law. The Tribunal has competence to control EU secondary legislation (normative acts) only where the Constitution explicitly refers to the review of normative acts (i.e. within the framework of a constitutional complaint or questions of law referred by national courts). By virtue of the limitations imposed on the constitutional complaint procedure, the Tribunal would not be able to examine whether a given act was ultra vires, i.e. whether it was within the scope of competence conferred by Poland on the EU. If, however, an ultra vires action resulted in an infringement of Polish constitutional rights and freedoms, the complaint would have to be considered admissible. The Tribunal has no jurisdiction to declare

²⁸ Judgment of 16 November 2011, ref. no SK 45/09.

²⁹ [2001] OJ L 12/1.

³⁰ In its Order of 17 December 2009, ref. No. U 6/08, the Tribunal expressed the view that the constitutional review of norms of EU secondary legislation was inadmissible. The proceedings in that case were instituted by an application submitted by a group of Sejm Deputies and they concerned an abstract review of norms.

³¹ Safjan 2012, pp. 339–367; Bogdanowicz and Marcisz 2012, pp. 47–53; Tatham 2013, pp. 252–259; Kawczyńska 2014, pp. 233–243; Dudzik and Półtorak 2012, pp. 245–255.

that the acts of EU institutions are invalid. However, as other national courts, the Tribunal may consider the validity of an EU act.³² In case of doubt, it should ascertain the content of the norms of EU secondary legislation which are subject to review. This may be achieved by referring questions to the ECJ for a preliminary ruling, pursuant to Art. 267 TFEU, as to the interpretation or validity of provisions that raise doubts. It is also worth mentioning that one of the proposals concerning amendment of the Constitution submitted by a group of Sejm Deputies in November 2009 postulated the competence of the Constitutional Tribunal to adjudicate the conformity of secondary EU law with the Constitution (new Art. 188(1a)). Legal experts unanimously held that such amendment would be incompatible with EU law (see Sect. 1.2.4).

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The participation of the national parliament in EU decision-making processes is regulated in the statute of 8 October 2010 on cooperation of the Council of Ministers with the Sejm and the Senate in matters related to the membership of the Republic of Poland in the European Union (hereinafter Cooperation Act).³³ It takes into account the provisions of the Treaty of Lisbon that strengthened democratic legitimacy within the EU. Cooperation between the executive and legislative powers covers five main areas: adoption of EU law and revision of the Treaties, adoption of national acts implementing EU law, lodging of complaints with the ECJ concerning breaches of the principle of subsidiarity by an EU legislative act, expressing opinions on candidates for certain posts in the EU and the participation of the representatives of the Polish Council of Ministers in the Council. According to the Cooperation Act, the Council of Ministers is obliged to provide the Parliament with information on Poland's participation in EU activities, transmit the documents of the EU which are subject to consultation with Member States, transmit Poland's draft positions on draft EU legislative acts, lodge complaints upon Parliamentary request to the ECJ concerning breaches of the principle of subsidiarity and present candidatures for certain posts in the EU.

The detailed rules concerning the participation of the Polish Parliament in EU decision-making are specified in the Rules of Procedure of the Sejm (Chapter XIIIa) and the Rules of Procedure of the Senate (Chapter VIIIa). There is a European Union Affairs Committee in each of the chambers that expresses the opinions of its members concerning drafts of EU legal acts and Poland's positions taken in the course of EU law-making procedures. Opinions expressed by the Committee should provide a basis for Poland's position. If a position taken or presented by the Polish

³² Case C-314/85 Foto-Frost [1987] ECR I-04199.

³³ Journal of Laws 2010, No. 213, item 1395.

Council of Ministers in the Council or in the European Council does not take such opinions into consideration, the minister is required to explain the reasons why.

1.4.2 The Constitution provides for three types of nationwide referendum: (1) deciding on matters of particular importance to the state (Art. 125); (2) granting consent for ratification of an international agreement transferring the competences of organs of state authority to an international organisation or international organ (Art. 90(3)); and (3) amending Chapters I, II or XII of the Constitution (Art. 235(6)). In the first two cases the result of a nationwide referendum shall be binding if more than one-half of entitled voters have participated in the vote. The requirement regarding turnout is very demanding and may cause problems in fields where citizens are not very active.³⁴ During the parliamentary proceedings to adopt Art. 90(3) of the Constitution, the Constitutional Committee abandoned the idea of an obligatory referendum in cases concerning transfer of competences to an international organisation because it might have required the organisation of a referendum on a number of occasions.³⁵ In Poland there has only been one referendum related to EU matters, held on 7 and 8 June 2003, in which 58.85% of eligible voters participated. The Nation expressed its consent for the ratification of the Treaty of Accession by a 77.45% majority. A referendum concerning the adoption of the EU Constitutional Treaty was planned for October 2005, but this was abandoned due to the negative referendum results in France and the Netherlands.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.2 The EU amendment to the Polish Constitution of 1997 is limited in its scope (see Sect. 1.2.3). The reason behind such disposition is the dispute about the necessity and scope of such amendments and the difficulty of the amendment procedure (see Sect. 1.2.2), especially in the Sejm where at least two-thirds of votes in the presence of at least one-half of the statutory number of Deputies is required. It is very difficult to obtain a political consensus between the governing coalition and the opposition (which mainly consists of Eurosceptics). The experts share the view that the Constitution in its present state allows Poland to fulfil its obligations arising from membership in the European Union.³⁶ However, in view of the future accession of Poland to the eurozone, the Constitution requires amendments concerning the position of the National Bank of Poland and the Council for Monetary Policy (see Sect. 1.2.4). At present there is no political consensus for such an amendment.

³⁴ In Judgment of 27 May 2003, ref. No. K 11/03, the Constitutional Tribunal stated that if the ratification referendum specified in Art. 90(3) of the Constitution did not deliver a legally binding result for reasons of an insufficient turnout (i.e. fewer than 50% of citizens with the right to vote participated), the Sejm could adopt a resolution governing the choice of procedure for granting consent for ratification again and, therefore, could choose whether to hold another referendum or to initiate the parliamentary procedure.

³⁵ Chruściak 2003, pp. 52–53.

³⁶ Biernat 2004, pp. 63–85.

1.5.3 The role of national constitutions in a context where power is increasingly exercised at supranational and global level is still fundamental. The authors of the present contribution share the view expressed by the Constitutional Tribunal in the Lisbon Treaty case that ‘the EU Member States retain their sovereignty due to the fact that their constitutions, being manifestation of the state’s sovereignty, maintain their significance’. The need for amendments depends on the wording of the given constitution, the constitutional traditions of the particular state and its political situation. The Polish Constitution is characterised by openness towards the European Union.³⁷

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Chapter I of the Constitution entitled ‘The Republic’ (Rzeczpospolita) expounds the systemic principles that serve as the foundation of the Polish constitutional system (see Sect. 1.1.2). One of the most important principles is contained in Art. 2 of the Constitution, which states that ‘[t]he Republic of Poland shall be a democratic state ruled by law and implementing the principles of social justice’ (see Sect. 2.1.3). The Constitutional Tribunal has derived a number of general principles of law such as legal certainty, protection of acquired rights, protection of legitimate expectations, proportionality, non-retroactivity of law and sufficient vacatio legis from this clause.³⁸ The Constitution also enshrines other general principles of law, such as subsidiarity (Preamble), legality (Art. 7), proportionality in limitation of rights and freedoms (Art. 31 (3)), nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege and the non-retroactivity of criminal law (Art. 42(1)).

Personal, political, economic, social and cultural freedoms and rights are contained within the comprehensive Chapter II entitled ‘The Freedoms, Rights and Obligations of Persons and Citizens’. The most fundamental principle is contained in Art. 30 of the Constitution, which states that ‘[t]he inherent and inalienable dignity of the person shall constitute a source of freedoms and rights of persons and citizens. It shall be inviolable. The respect and protection thereof shall be the obligation of public authorities’. In drafting these provisions the founders of the Constitution were inspired by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of 1966 and the European Convention on Human Rights of 1950 (ECHR) as well as the constitutions of other states.³⁹

³⁷ Biernat 2002b, pp. 439–45.

³⁸ See for example Judgment of 12 April 2000, ref. No. K 8/98.

Rights and freedoms are enforceable in courts, unless the Constitution provides otherwise. According to Art. 77(2) of the Constitution, statutes shall not bar recourse by any person to the courts in pursuit of claims alleging infringement of freedoms or rights. Institutional guarantees for the protection of rights and freedoms are specified in Chapter II of the Constitution. These include the right to a fair trial (Art. 45(1)), the right to compensation for any harm done by any action of an organ of public authority contrary to law (Art. 77(1)), the right to appeal against judgments and decisions made at first instance (Art. 78), the guarantee of at least two-stage court proceedings (Art. 176), the right to submit a constitutional complaint to the Constitutional Tribunal (Art. 79) and the right to apply to the Commissioner of Human Rights (Ombudsman) (Art. 80). Specific limitations are provided for in Art. 81 of the Constitution enumerating economic and social rights and freedoms that are enforceable only within the limits specified in a statute (minimum level of remuneration for work, full and productive employment, aid to disabled persons, consumer protection, ecological security and environmental protection).

2.1.2 Article 31(3) of the Constitution provides the conditions under which limitations can be imposed upon the exercise of constitutional freedoms and rights.

Commentators point out that the general limitation clause provided in the Polish Constitution is stricter than the limitation clause provided in Art. 52(1) of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (the Charter). Limitations to constitutional rights and freedoms must meet the following cumulative conditions: may be specified only by statute, must be necessary and must have one of only six particular aims enumerated in Art. 31(3) of the Constitution:⁴⁰

Article 31(3).

Any limitation upon the exercise of constitutional freedoms and rights may be imposed only by statute, and only when necessary in a democratic state for the protection of its security or public order, or to protect the natural environment, health or public morals, or the freedoms and rights of other persons. Such limitations shall not violate the essence of freedoms and rights.

However, this does not mean an absolute prohibition on placing restrictions on constitutional rights and freedoms by governmental regulation, but a statute (Act of Parliament) in this respect must play a decisive role.⁴¹ The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Tribunal holds that particular rights and freedoms (of social and economic character) may be limited by governmental regulation (i.e. executive acts), issued on the basis of a specific authorisation contained in a statute (Art. 92(1) of the Constitution).⁴²

³⁹ Masternak-Kubiak 2010, p. 32. The provision contained in Art. 30 of the Constitution was also inspired by the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany of 1949; see Zajadło 1998, p. 53.

⁴⁰ Wróbel 2013, p. 1348.

⁴¹ Bösek and Szydło 2016, p. 780.

Nevertheless, with regard to personal rights and freedoms, penal law and tax law, limitations may be imposed only by a statute adopted by the Parliament.⁴³

Limitations to rights and freedoms in the Polish legal system may also stem from international agreements ratified upon prior consent granted by statute, or from EU regulations or EU decisions (that are applied directly in the national legal system).⁴⁴ According to Art. 91(2) and (3) of the Constitution, these acts shall have precedence over statutes.

The test of proportionality contained in the above Art. 31(3) is construed as the sum of three component principles: the principle of usefulness, the principle of necessity and a prohibition against excessive interference.

Notwithstanding the abovementioned clause, the Constitution contains provisions that exclude any restrictions to rights and freedoms (Art. 40) or allow restrictions to certain rights and freedoms only when introducing extraordinary measures (Art. 228).

The conditions that define the public interest that are enumerated in Art. 31(3) of the Constitution resemble those set out in the European Convention on Human Rights (compare Arts. 8–11) and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (compare Arts. 12(3), 18(3), 19(3), 21(3) and 22(2)). It should be noted that the official Polish translations of the limitation clauses in the European Convention on Human Rights are somewhat ambiguous. They do not refer to ‘law’ as in the English or French versions (‘prescribed by law’ and ‘prévue par la loi’), rather they refer to statute (‘przewidziane przez ustawę’ i.e. ‘prescribed by statute’). This does not mean that the Convention excludes acts issued by executive authorities, but additional requirements may arise from the different national legal systems. If the system is based – as in Poland – on the principle of exclusivity of statutes to regulate the legal situation of individuals, the limitations contained in executive regulations (issued without statutory authorisation) may be regarded as contrary to national law.⁴⁵

The conditions specified in the general limitation clause in the Polish Constitution are interpreted strictly. This means that if a limitation imposed on rights or freedoms is not justified by any of the six aims enumerated in Art. 31(3) of the Constitution, the limitation is prohibited, unless the specific provision of the Constitution provides otherwise.⁴⁶

⁴² Judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal of 25 July 2006, ref. no. P 24/05.

⁴³ Judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal of 6 March 2002, ref. no. P 7/00.

⁴⁴ Bösek and Szydło (2016), pp. 782–783.

⁴⁵ Garlicki 2010a, p. 486.

⁴⁶ Garlicki 2003, p. 22.

The Polish Constitution contains other (specific) limitation clauses in addition to Art. 31(3) of the Constitution. Some are wider than the general limitation clause. For example, freedom of economic activity may be limited only for ‘important public reasons’ (Art. 22). Some of the limitation clauses are narrower than the general limitation clause. For example, the freedom to publicly express religion may be limited only where this is necessary for the ‘defence of State security, public order, health, morals or the freedoms and rights of others’ (Art. 53). As another example, limitations on the right to obtain public information and access to public documents may be imposed solely to ‘protect freedoms and rights of other persons and economic subjects, public order, security or important economic interests of the State’.

2.1.3 According to Art. 2 of the Constitution, the Republic of Poland shall be a democratic state ruled by law. This provision enacts a constitutional principle equivalent to the rule of law or Rechtsstaat. It was introduced in December 1989 as an amendment to the Constitution of 1952. The Constitutional Tribunal has derived a number of principles of law from this clause, which also remained valid under the Constitution of 1997⁴⁷ (see Sect. 2.1.1). Article 2 of the Constitution and specific principles derived from the rule of law are frequently used by the Constitutional Tribunal, common and administrative courts in exercising judicial review. The constitutional provision in question is treated as lex generalis. In most cases the courts invoke more specific provisions aimed at the protection of rights and freedoms. According to the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Tribunal, Art. 2 of the Constitution may not form the sole legal foundation for a constitutional complaint submitted by an individual contesting the validity of a legal norm, if the Constitution provides for more specific provisions guaranteeing the protection of rights and freedoms.

The Constitution of 1952 did not contain guarantees for the protection of rights and freedoms such as the right to a fair trial. After the amendment of 1989, the Constitutional Tribunal inferred the right to access to a court from the principle of the rule of law.⁴⁸ The Constitution of 1997 contains a special provision in Art. 45(1) which stipulates that ‘everyone shall have the right to a fair and public hearing of his case, without undue delay, before a competent, impartial and independent court’. The Constitutional Tribunal has indicated in its jurisprudence that the right to a fair trial enshrined in this provision comprises the following: (1) the right of access to a court (the right to institute proceedings before a court – an impartial and independent organ of the state); (2) the right to proper court proceedings which comply with the requirements of a fair and public hearing; (3) the right to a court ruling (the right to have a given case determined in a legally effective way by a court); and (4) the right to have cases examined by a court with an adequate organisational structure and position. In recent case law, the ⁴⁸ Judgments of the Constitutional Tribunal ref. No. K. 3/91, ref. No. K. 8/91, ref. No. K. 4/94, ref. No. K. 11/95 and ref. No. K 14/96.

⁴⁷ Garlicki 2010b, p. 61.

Constitutional Tribunal has also emphasised the right to the effective enforcement of a final court ruling.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 To date, no cases of direct conflict between EU economic freedoms and fundamental rights have been brought before the Constitutional Tribunal. Such issues arise more frequently before common and administrative courts. A recent case concerned a conflict between the free movement of goods and protection of the life and health of individuals. The case related to the prohibition on registering passenger vehicles having their steering equipment on the right-hand side. In a series of judgments the Supreme Administrative Court upheld the decisions of the Minister of Transportation refusing registration of such vehicles taking into consideration the protection of road safety and protection of the health and lives of people.⁴⁹ The ECJ found that such restriction constituted a measure having equivalent effect to a quantitative restriction on imports within the meaning of Art. 34 TFEU.⁵⁰ In the opinion of the Polish Council of Ministers, the ban imposed on the registration of vehicles was justified by an imperative requirement in the public interest for the purpose of protecting the lives and health of road users. The ECJ accepted this reasoning but stated that the measure at issue was not compatible with the principle of proportionality. In the view of the Court, according to the present state of technology, measures exist that are less restrictive of the free movement of goods and which are capable of significantly reducing the risk which could be created by the use of vehicles with the steering wheel placed on the same side as the direction of traffic.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 According to Art. 42(3) of the Constitution '[e]veryone shall be presumed innocent of a charge until his guilt is determined by the final judgment of a court'. A restatement of this principle is found in Art. 5 of the Code of the Criminal ⁴⁹ See for instance the Judgments of the Supreme Administrative Court of 26 January 2009 ref. No. I OSK 63/08, of 21 September 2010 ref. No. I OSK 1550/09, of 27 July 2011 ref. No. I OSK 1336/10, of 24 July 2012 ref. No. I OSK 1031/11.

⁵⁰ Case C-639/11 European Commission v. Republic of Poland [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:173.

Procedure, which additionally stipulates that ‘unresolvable doubts shall be resolved in favour of the accused’.

As mentioned in Sect. 1.2.3, the Constitutional Tribunal in the EAW case decided that Art. 607t§1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure that allowed the surrender of a Polish national under the EAW was inconsistent with Art. 55(1) of the Constitution. Article 55 of the Constitution was amended in September 2006 in order to give effect to Framework Decision 2002/584. Three additional reasons for mandatory refusal of the execution of an EAW that are not provided for in Framework Decision 2002/584 but are aimed at the protection of Polish citizens were introduced in paras. 2 and 4 of Art. 55 Constitution. These are: the principle of territoriality, the requirement of double criminality and the principle of protection of rights and freedoms of persons and citizens. Accordingly, the Polish Constitution and Art. 607p(1)–(5) of the Code of Criminal Procedure provide grounds for refusal to execute an EAW if this would ‘violate rights and freedoms of persons and citizens’. The dominant scholarly view is that the provision should be interpreted broadly and ought to comprise the rights which are guaranteed by the provisions of acts of international law that bind Poland, as well as the rights and freedoms protected by the Constitution.⁵¹

The issues of presumption of innocence, the right to defence and the right to a fair trial arose before the Constitutional Tribunal in a case concerning a Polish citizen accused of rape and assault in the city of Exeter in the UK in July 2006.⁵² The Polish court decided to surrender the accused on the basis of an EAW issued by the British court under the condition that he would be transferred to Poland to serve his sentence. In June 2007, the accused filed a constitutional complaint, challenging the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, insofar as they allow for the surrender of a person, even if it has not been determined that it is probable that the alleged offences have been committed by the person who is the subject of the EAW.

The Constitutional Tribunal stated that, on the basis of Art. 607p(1)(5) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it should be possible to refuse to execute an EAW in cases where it is obvious for the court adjudicating on the execution of the warrant that the person who is the subject of the warrant has not committed the act on which the warrant is based. Such a decision may arise from findings made on the initiative of the person who is the subject of the EAW, his defence counsel, the prosecutor as a party to the proceedings, as well as findings made on the initiative of the court adjudicating on the execution of the warrant, or from findings arising from the facts which are known to the court. At the same time, the Constitutional Tribunal emphasised that this position should not be regarded as tantamount to allowing the court adjudicating on the execution of the EAW to carry out detailed proceedings to receive evidence with regard to the guilt of the person who is the subject of the warrant. In the case of surrender to another EU Member State on the basis of an

⁵¹ Nita 2008, p. 93.

⁵² Judgment of 5 October 2010, ref. No. SK 26/08.

EAW, the level of confidence in the legitimacy of the request for surrender should be higher than in the case of surrender on the basis of a ‘classic’ extradition request to another state which is not necessarily bound by at least the minimum level of guarantees provided by the ECHR.

2.3.1.2 A court that receives an EAW-based request for surrender ‘shall decide on the surrender and provisional detention at a hearing in which both a public prosecutor and defence counsel may participate’ (Art. 607i§1 Code of Criminal Procedure). This provision does not mention the person indicated in the EAW. However, the dominant view in the legal literature is that exclusion of the person concerned from the hearing where the court decides on surrender or provisional detention would violate the right to a fair trial contained in Art. 45(1) of the Constitution and Art. 6 of the ECHR.⁵³ In practice, the courts grant the person indicated in the EAW a right to be heard even if the warrant is not accompanied by a request to interrogate the prosecuted person.

Polish courts present a somewhat restrained approach towards arrest warrants concerning Polish citizens. They consider the requirements specified in Art. 607p and Art. 607r of the Code of Criminal Procedure concerning grounds for mandatory or optional refusal to execute an EAW. According to the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court, they may also consider whether the warrant has been issued by a competent judicial authority and whether it contains the elements which are essential for declaring it to be in compliance with the formal requirements. A review may not, however, lead to substantive adjudication of whether there exist sufficient grounds for the execution of the warrant.⁵⁴ In some cases the courts decide to surrender the accused under the condition that he/she will be transferred to Poland to serve his/her sentence (see Sect. 2.3.5.1).

In 2014, the Ombudsman formulated an official request to the Supreme Court to adjudicate if the issuance of an EAW may in itself form a sufficient basis for a domestic court to decide on the provisional detention of an accused person without analysing any further evidence. The Ombudsman had received a significant number of complaints from citizens alleging that in such cases Polish courts apply provisional detention automatically without examining any evidence. One of the major arguments against this practice was the presumption of innocence of a person indicated in an EAW. In its order of 26 June 2014, the Supreme Court responded that domestic courts must not examine evidence forming the basis for the issuance of an EAW.⁵⁵ However, a refusal to decide on provisional detention may be based on the statutory grounds for refusal to execute the warrant, e.g. violation of the rights and freedoms of persons specified in Art. 607p§1(5) of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The Supreme Court rejected the view of the Ombudsman that a decision on the provisional detention of a person indicated in an EAW violates the presumption of innocence guaranteed by Art. 42(3) of the Constitution. According to the Supreme Court, provisional detention is only a preventive measure, and the accused shall be presumed innocent until his guilt is determined by the final judgment of a court.

⁵³ Nita 2014; Jaworski and Soltysińska 2010, p. 329.

⁵⁴ Judgment of the Supreme Court of 8 December 2008, ref. No. V KK 332/08.

⁵⁵ Order of the Supreme Court decided by a panel of 7 judges of 26 June 2014, ref. No. I KZP 9/14.

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 According to Art. 42(1) of the Constitution

[o]nly a person who has committed an act prohibited by a statute in force at the moment of commission thereof, and which is subject to a penalty, shall be held criminally responsible. This principle shall not prevent punishment of any act which, at the moment of its commission, constituted an offence within the meaning of international law.

As specified in Sect. 2.3.1.1, the amendment to the Constitution of 2006 introduced an additional requirement of double criminality in Art. 55(2) that was not provided for in Framework Decision 2002/584. Consequently, the extradition of a Polish citizen may be granted provided that the act covered by a request for extradition constituted an offence under the law in force in the Republic of Poland or would have constituted an offence under the law in force in the Republic of Poland if it had been committed within the territory of the Republic of Poland, both at the time of its commitment and at the time of the making of the request.

Article 607w of the Code of Criminal Procedure abolishes the rule of double criminality for 32 offences only in respect to non-Polish nationals. Therefore, if an arrest warrant concerns a foreigner, the fact that an act is not a criminal offence according to Polish law does not prevent the warrant from being executed, if it concerns an act punishable in the issuing state by a penalty of at least 3 years of imprisonment and constitutes one of the 32 types of offences. The requirement of the rule of double criminality for acts committed by Polish citizens constitutes an incorrect implementation of Framework Decision 2002/584. This issue has been pointed out by legal experts in the course of legislative work on the amendment of Art. 55 of the Constitution as well as in the legal commentary on the subject.⁵⁶ The European Commission has also indicated that this contradicts the Framework Decision.⁵⁷

It has also been pointed out that Art. 607w of the Code of Criminal Procedure merely enumerates types of offences and contains imprecise and even ambiguous phrases. The crimes are not defined either in Art. 2(2) of Framework Decision 2002/584 or in the Code of Criminal Procedure, and thus the qualification of certain criminal acts may be seriously impeded.⁵⁸

⁵⁶ Steinborn 2013.

⁵⁷ Second evaluation report on the state of transposition of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, MEMO/07/288, Brussels, 11 July 2007, p. 7.

⁵⁸ Steinborn 2013.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 Article 45(1) of the Constitution stipulates the right to a fair trial that covers the right to a proper court proceeding which complies with the requirements of a fair and public hearing. It must be emphasised that the right to a fair trial may be subject to the limitations provided by Art. 31(3) of the Constitution (see Sect. 2.1.2).

According to Art. 479§1 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, ‘if an accused person upon whom a summons has been served, fails to appear at the main trial, the court may conduct the proceedings in the absence of the accused and, if his defence counsel also fails to appear, the court may render a judgment by default’. A judgment by default shall be served upon the accused. Within seven days, the accused may file an objection to the judgment by default, in which he should provide a statement of the reason for his failure to appear at the trial (Art. 482). With the transposition of Framework Decision 2009/299⁵⁹ into the Code of Criminal Procedure, the accused obtained two more procedural guarantees concerning judgments in absentia: a new basis for the re-opening of the proceedings (Art. 540b) and an additional ground for optional refusal to execute an EAW (Art. 607r§3).

The Constitutional Tribunal has considered trials in absentia in criminal and civil proceedings (see Sect. 2.3.5), as well as trials in absentia under the provisions of the Fiscal Penal Code.⁶⁰ Such proceedings may be conducted against a person who has committed a fiscal offence and who permanently resides abroad or whose place of residence in Poland is unknown. The Constitutional Tribunal has stated that Arts. 173–177 of the Fiscal Penal Code provide for sufficient guarantees for persons accused of a fiscal offence in view of the right to a fair trial (Art. 45(1) of the Constitution) and the right of defence (Art. 42(2) of the Constitution). The Tribunal added that these rights may be limited under the conditions specified in Art. 31(3) Constitution. In this case, the constitutional value which was considered to legitimise the limitation was the principle of legality in criminal law, understood as the obligation to prosecute crimes.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 Poland does not provide the assistance of interpreters or legal aid to its extradited citizens or residents who are involved in trials abroad since this lies within the jurisdiction of the foreign courts. Assistance to extradited persons may be provided by Polish diplomatic and consular offices. The Ombudsman safeguards the liberties and rights of citizens as set forth in the Constitution and in other legal acts. His competence is limited to the territory of Poland, but he may conduct an inquiry concerning the performance of duties by Polish diplomatic and consular missions in providing assistance to extradited citizens.

⁵⁹ Council Framework Decision 2009/299/JHA of 26 February 2009 amending Framework Decisions 2002/584/JHA, 2005/214/JHA, 2006/783/JHA, 2008/909/JHA and 2008/947/JHA, thereby enhancing the procedural rights of persons and fostering the application of the principle of mutual recognition to decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned at the trial, [2009] OJ L 81/24.

⁶⁰ Judgment of 9 July 2002, ref. No. P 4/01.

2.3.4.2 The Polish Ministry of Justice does not provide any statistical data on persons who have been surrendered by a Polish court and have subsequently been found innocent.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 The issue of the enforceability of judgments in civil and commercial matters in view of the right to a fair and public hearing guaranteed by Art. 45(1) of the Constitution was the subject of a constitutional complaint in the Brussels I case (see Sect. 1.3.4). The applicant questioned the second sentence of Art. 41 of the Brussels I Regulation, according to which a debtor against whom enforcement is sought should not at the stage of first instance proceedings be entitled to make any submissions on the application. The Constitutional Tribunal stated that the legal construct of ex parte proceedings (i.e. where the defendant has not received notice and, therefore, is neither present nor represented) is justified by the special character, subject or function of such proceedings. In particular, it reflects the need to grant, even temporarily, legal protection quickly or to preserve the element of surprise. Without such proceedings, it would be impossible in many cases to fulfil the function of civil proceedings, namely to grant legal protection. This means that the interests of the two parties to the proceedings may justify postponing the exercise of the right to a hearing of one party to the proceedings at a later stage. The Tribunal concluded that such procedural solution implements the principle of the free movement of judgments within the EU (as part of cooperation in judicial matters among the Member States) and the principle of mutual trust in the administration of justice in the EU Member States, which also apply to rulings issued by Polish courts.

The amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure abolishing the declaration of enforceability for judgments and protection measures originating in another Member State entered into force on 10 January 2015. It is in line with Regulation 1215/2012 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters⁶¹ and Regulation 606/2013 on mutual recognition of protection measures in civil matters⁶².

⁶¹ Regulation (EU) No 1215/2012 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December 2012 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters, [2012] OJ L 351/1.

⁶² Regulation (EU) No 606/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 June 2013 on mutual recognition of protection measures in civil matters, [2013] OJ L 181/4.

The issue of mutual recognition of criminal judgments where the penalty imposed by the court of another Member State is excessively lengthy arose in the aftermath of the case referred to in Sect. 2.3.1.1. In January 2008, a British court sentenced a Polish citizen to double life imprisonment. Due to the reservation made in the EAW, he was transferred to Poland to serve his sentence. According to the Polish Criminal Code, the maximum penalty for rape is 12 years of imprisonment with a maximum penalty of 10 years for assault. Consequently, he requested that the court executing the judgment adjust the penalty to the conditions set forth in Polish law. In March 2009, the Polish Supreme Court refused his claim. In January 2011, Art. 607s§4 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was amended to allow domestic courts to amend a penalty in line with the maximum punishment available for the offence in question under Polish law, if the sentence imposed by a foreign court exceeds the upper limits of the potential sanction for the offence in question. In November 2011, the court of appeal adjudicated that in Poland, he must serve a 12-year prison sentence.

2.3.5.2 In Poland there was no debate about the suitability of transposing mutual recognition from internal market matters to criminal law and civil and commercial disputes. In the view of the experts, the rules concerning mutual recognition pertaining to the free movement of goods cannot be easily transposed to criminal law, since criminal law involves vital rights and freedoms of the utmost importance to individuals, which must be safeguarded by very restrictive procedural guarantees.

2.3.5.3 The experts share the view that the national courts maintain both roles. They provide judicial protection as well as perform the tasks imposed by EU law concerning mutual recognition and judicial cooperation in criminal, civil and commercial matters.

2.3.5.4 The issue of proportionality with regard to the EAW has been raised in the legal literature and case law. The report of the European Commission of April 2011 indicated that Poland issued the greatest amount of arrest warrants between 2005–2009 (17,015).⁶³ A Centre for European Policy Studies report (cf. the Questionnaire) indicates that in 2005–2011, Poland issued 31% (24,577) of the total number of warrants in the European Union (78,785).⁶⁴ In legal writings it has been pointed out that the courts of Ireland, Great Britain and Germany are faced with a vast amount of Polish warrants in trivial cases such as ‘stealing a mobile phone or two chickens’.⁶⁵ In 2012, the High Court of Ireland relied on the principle of proportionality and refused to surrender a Polish national accused of possession of a small amount of marihuana.⁶⁶ Moreover, Polish circuit courts have postulated that it

⁶³ Report on the implementation since 2007 of the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, Brussels, 11.4.2011, COM(2011) 175 final, p. 12.

⁶⁴ Carrera, Guild and Hernanz 2013, p. 38.

⁶⁵ Górska 2010.

⁶⁶ Judgment of the High Court of Ireland of 8 February 2102 in case MJLR v. Ostrowski, (2012) IEHC 57.

should be possible, due to the principle of proportionality, to assess the seriousness of a crime and the possible penalty before issuing or executing an arrest warrant.⁶⁷ For instance, in 2010 the Circuit Court in Łódź relied on the principle of proportionality and Art. 49 of the Charter and refused to issue an arrest warrant for a person accused of non-payment of alimony. In 2011, the Circuit Court in Białystok based its refusal to issue an arrest warrant against a person accused of extortion of child benefits on the same argument.⁶⁸

According to Art. 607b(1) of the Polish Code of Penal Procedure a warrant may not be issued in connection with criminal proceedings against a person prosecuted for an offence punishable by imprisonment for up to one year. A statute of 27 September 2013 that entered into force on 1 July 2015 introduced an additional obligation to refuse to issue an EAW ‘if it is not required in view of the interests of justice’.

2.4 The Annulment of the Data Retention Directive by the ECJ

2.4.1 Article 47 of the Constitution stipulates that ‘[e]veryone shall have the right to legal protection of his private and family life, of his honour and good reputation and to make decisions about his personal life’. According to Art. 49 of the Constitution, ‘[t]he freedom and privacy of communication shall be ensured. Any limitations thereon may be imposed only in cases and in a manner specified by statute’. The constitutional right to privacy may be limited under the conditions specified in Art. 31(3) of the Constitution (see Sect. 2.1.2) e.g. for the protection of the security of the state or public order. According to Art. 51(2) of the Constitution, ‘[p]ublic authorities shall not acquire, collect nor make accessible information on citizens other than that which is necessary in a democratic state ruled by law’.

The Data Retention Directive⁶⁹ was transposed by a statute of 24 April 2009 into Arts. 180a–180g of the Telecommunications Law. In legal commentary it has been pointed out that such provisions may significantly affect the right to privacy of ordinary citizens and allows for the conduct of full surveillance of society under the guise of combatting terrorism.⁷⁰ The provisions of the Telecommunications Law

⁶⁷ Order of the Circuit Court in Tarnów of 26 October 2004, ref. No. II KOP 17/04, Order of the Circuit Court in Łódź of 2 February 2011, ref. No. XVIII Kop 4/11, Order of the Circuit Court in Gdańsk of 17 March 2011, ref. No. XIV Kop 12/11. See in more detail Ostropolski 2013, pp. 22–23.

⁶⁸ See in more detail Gardocka 2011, pp. 47–50.

⁶⁹ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁷⁰ Suchorzewska 2010, p. 206.

implementing the Directive will hopefully be rescinded by Parliament; however, the relevant bill has not yet been submitted.

In April 2013 the Court of Appeal in Warsaw adjudicated the case of a Polish journalist who had been placed under surveillance by the Central Anti-Corruption Bureau (CBA) after a series of articles concerning the operational activities of this authority.⁷¹ The CBA obtained the phone records of 10 journalists retained by the telecommunication companies. In the view of the Court, the operations of the CBA were unfounded, disproportionate and violated the journalists' right to private and family life as well as the freedom and privacy of communication.

On 30 July 2014, the Constitutional Tribunal issued a judgment with regard to seven joined applications submitted by the Ombudsman and the Prosecutor General.⁷² These applications concerned provisions on the conduct of operational surveillance activities and the disclosure of communications data to the Police, the Border Guard, the Military Police, authorities responsible for tax audits, the Internal Security Agency, the Military Counter-Intelligence Service, the Central Anti-Corruption Bureau and the Customs Service. The Constitutional Tribunal stated that the data were obtained confidentially and without any knowledge or involvement of the persons on whom the information was gathered. Further, the lack of independent supervision over that process posed a risk of abuse. The lack of such supervision may not only contribute to unjustified interference in the rights and freedoms of persons, but it may also pose a threat to the democratic mechanisms of the exercise of state authority. Therefore, the Constitutional Tribunal decided that certain provisions of the contested statutes were inconsistent with Art. 47 and Art. 49 in conjunction with Art. 31(3) of the Constitution.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 The constitutional principles of legality (Art. 7) and legal certainty derived from the rule of law (Art. 2) require that acts of universally binding law shall be promulgated in a proper manner.⁷³ According to Art. 88 of the Constitution, '[t]he condition precedent for the coming into force of statutes, governmental regulations and enactments of local law shall be the promulgation thereof'. Further, international agreements ratified with prior consent granted by statute shall be promulgated in accordance with the procedures required for statutes. The principles of, and procedures for, promulgation of normative acts shall be specified by statute. According to Art. 2 of the Act on Publishing Normative Acts of 2000, 'promulgation of a normative act in a legal journal is obligatory'. The sources of universally binding law of the Republic of Poland are published in the Journal of Laws of the Republic of

⁷¹ Judgment of the Court of Appeal in Warsaw of 26 April 2013, ref. No. I A Ca 1002/12.

⁷² Judgment of 30 July 2014, ref. No. K 23/11.

⁷³ See further Biernat and Niedzwiedz 2012, pp. 112–113.

Poland (Dziennik Ustaw). According to the case law of the Constitutional Tribunal, in order to satisfy the requirements laid down in Art. 88(1) of the Constitution, the Journal of Laws shall not only be published but also shall be made available to the public by means of distribution. It is not relevant whether the individual has actually used the opportunity to acquaint himself with the normative act.⁷⁴

On 1 May 2004 Poland acceded to the European Union, but the process of translation of EU legislation continued until 2006. Before the ruling in Skoma-Lux,⁷⁵ the case law of the Polish administrative courts was divergent. Some courts decided that legal acts published in one of the official languages of the EU may be enforceable against Polish citizens from 1 May 2004,⁷⁶ whereas other courts held this to violate the principle of certainty of law guaranteed in Art. 2 of the Constitution.⁷⁷ The current position of the Supreme Administrative Court is that acts of EU secondary law, in order to be enforceable against Polish citizens, must be formulated in the Polish language and published in the Official Journal.

On 12 May 2011, the ECJ issued its judgment in case C-410/09 in response to a preliminary question from the Polish Supreme Court concerning the enforcement of certain regulatory obligations envisaged in Commission Guidelines of 2002 that had not been published in Polish.⁷⁸ The ECJ stated that Art. 58 of the Accession Treaty does not preclude a national regulatory authority from referring to the Commission Guidelines imposing certain regulatory obligations on an operator of electronic communications services, notwithstanding the fact that those guidelines have not been published in the Official Journal in Polish, even though that language is an official language of the Union.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-Retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 The standard of protection of property rights, legal certainty, legitimate expectations, non-retroactivity and proportionality in the field of market regulation

⁷⁴ Judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal of 21 December 1999, ref. No. K 4/99. The case related to the statute that entered into force on 1 January 1999 and was published in the Journal of Laws on 30 December 1998. The Journal of Laws was not distributed before the statute entered into force and thus individuals did not have the opportunity to acquaint themselves with the normative act. The Tribunal invalidated the provisions of the statute on a different constitutional basis and decided not to adjudicate upon conformity with Art. 88(1) of the Constitution.

⁷⁵ Case C-161/06 Skoma-Lux [2007] ECR I-10841.

⁷⁶ Judgment of the Provincial Administrative Court in Łódź of 27 April 2007, ref. No. III SA/Ld 564/06.

⁷⁷ Judgment of the Provincial Administrative Court in Bydgoszcz of 20 July 2005, ref. No. III I SA/Bd 275/05.

⁷⁸ Case C-410/09 Polska Telefonia Cyfrowa [2011] ECR I-03853.

is the same in Polish law irrespective of whether the obligations imposed on individuals arise from national legislation, measures implementing EU law or directly from EU acts.

For instance, the Constitutional Tribunal has declared that certain provisions of an executive regulation concerning the amount of fines for infringements of rules relating to fishing are inconsistent with the principle of legal certainty guaranteed by Art. 2 of the Constitution.⁷⁹ The fines were the consequence of Commission Regulation No 804/2007 of 9 July 2007 establishing a prohibition of fishing for cod in the Baltic Sea by vessels flying the flag of Poland.⁸⁰ As a result of the judgment, the Ministry of Agriculture annulled the fines imposed on Polish fishermen for illegal cod fishing that were based on the repealed act.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 In the ESM case, the Constitutional Tribunal considered an application, submitted by a group of Sejm Deputies, which challenged a procedure for the enactment of the Act on the ratification of European Council Decision of 25 March 2011 amending Art. 136 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union with regard to a stability mechanism for Member States whose currency is the euro (2011/199/EU).⁸¹ The Tribunal stated that the amendment to Art. 136 of the TFEU did not concern competences vested in the organs of state authority, and therefore the ratification did not entail the transfer of such competences upon an international organisation or an international authority; therefore the Act was not inconsistent with Art. 90 of the Constitution (see Sect. 1.3.2).

Moreover, the Tribunal indicated that the provisions of the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) did not bind Poland as a Member State which does not belong to the eurozone. The decision whether to adopt the ESM Treaty – and in accordance with what ratification procedure – would be taken by Poland upon accession to the eurozone. Also, the potential evaluation of the constitutionality of the ESM Treaty might occur only at the moment of accepting the binding force of this international agreement. Currently, Poland is not a party to the Treaty, as it has neither signed it nor commenced the ratification process. The issue of the ratification of the ESM Treaty will become one of the essential elements of any future political decision concerning accession to the eurozone, provided that the Treaty is still in force at that time. At the time of the judgment, the ESM Treaty did not impose any obligations on Poland and did not cause any changes in the way the Polish organs of public authority exercise their competence in financial matters.

⁷⁹ Judgment of 7 July 2009, ref. No. K 13/08.

⁸⁰ [2007] OJ L 180/3.

⁸¹ Judgment of 26 June 2013, ref. No. K 33/12.

2.7.2 In March 2013, a group of Deputies and Senators challenged the constitutionality of the procedure for the ratification of the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union (the Fiscal Compact). In the view of the applicants, the Fiscal Compact confers the competences of national authorities upon an international organisation, which means that the ratification statute should have been adopted in accordance with the Art. 90(1) procedure, rather than the Art. 89 procedure.⁸² The proceedings before the Constitutional Tribunal were discontinued since after the parliamentary elections in 2015 the Members of the new Parliament did not uphold their motion.

2.7.3 Poland has not been subject to a bailout or austerity programme. According to the well-established case law of the Constitutional Tribunal, the financial equilibrium of the state is a constitutional value taken into consideration in assessing the constitutionality of law.⁸³

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Between 2006 and September 2015, Polish courts submitted 81 requests for a preliminary ruling.⁸⁴ The most requests were submitted by Polish administrative courts, with 28 by the Supreme Administrative Court and 22 by provincial administrative courts.⁸⁵ The Supreme Court issued 10 requests, and the common courts 21 requests.⁸⁶ Poland is one of the largest EU countries, yet it is a Member State from which the ECJ receives one of the lowest number of requests for a preliminary ruling.⁸⁷ During this period, Polish courts only submitted questions with regard to the interpretation of EU primary and secondary law (mainly regulations and directives), but not with regard to the validity of EU measures. Problems with the application of EU law occur primarily in the field of customs, indirect taxes, social security, road transportation, veterinary matters, EU citizenship, agricultural law and intellectual property law.⁸⁸

⁸² Case ref. No. K 11/13.

⁸³ Judgment of 19 December 2012, ref. No. K 9/12.

⁸⁴ Until 2006, Polish courts submitted only one request for a preliminary ruling; see Case C-313/05 Brzeziński [2007] ECR I-00519.

⁸⁵ List of cases available at: <http://www.nsa.gov.pl/pytania-prejudycjalne-wsa-i-nsa.php>.

⁸⁶ List of cases available at: <http://www.iws.org.pl/analizy-i-raporty/pytania-prejudycjalne-polskich-sadow-powszechnych>.

⁸⁷ According to the Annual Report of the Court of Justice, Polish courts submitted 14 requests in 2014, 11 in 2013, 6 in 2012, 11 in 2011 and 8 in 2010. Court of Justice of the European Union, Annual report 2014, Luxembourg 2015, p. 122.

⁸⁸ Biernat 2009, p. 29.

In July 2015 the Constitutional Tribunal decided to submit its first reference for a preliminary ruling concerning the validity of the provisions of Directive 2006/112 on the common system of value added tax (VAT Directive).⁸⁹ The questions formulated by the Tribunal concern the rate of VAT on books published in digital form and other electronic publications.⁹⁰ In its judgement of 7 March 2017 the Court of Justice stated that despite different VAT rates on electronic and printed publications, the contested provisions were valid.

2.8.2 In Poland a declaration of invalidity of a statute or legal provision issued by a central organ of the state lies solely within the competence of the Constitutional Tribunal. As opposed to other constitutional courts, the Polish Constitutional Tribunal does not review rulings or decisions issued in individual cases, rather controls normative acts serving as legal grounds for a given ruling or decision. According to statistical data, in 2014 the Tribunal issued 69 judgments and in 36 cases (52%) declared at least one provision questioned by the claimants to be unconstitutional. The Tribunal declared legal provisions to be invalid in 39 cases (55%) in 2013, in 35 cases (52%) in 2012, in 25 cases (42%) in 2011 and in 37 cases (54%) in 2010.⁹¹ The most common ground for a declaration of unconstitutionality of a legal norm was violation of the rule of law and legal principles derived from Art. 2 of the Constitution (see Sect. 2.1.1), the right to a fair trial, the principle of proportionality and the transgression of the authorisation contained in a statute in issuing a regulation by the executive. The Supreme Administrative Court and provincial administrative courts exercise control over the performance of public administration. According to statistical data, in 2013 provincial administrative courts examined 75,372 claims, which led to the annulment of administrative action in 17,149 cases. The success rate was approximately 24.36% in 2013, 22.3% in 2012, 22.5% in 2011 and 23% in 2010.⁹² Based on these statistics, it must be concluded that the review of legality of national legislation, executive regulations and administrative action is more successful than the review of legality of EU measures in the EU courts.

The experts share the view that the EU courts represent a protective approach towards EU institutions and organs in actions for annulment and failure to act. The underlying motive is to ensure the effectiveness of EU decision-making. A very restrictive approach is also demonstrated in claims for damages against EU institutions submitted on the basis of Art. 340(2) TFEU, since in the view of the ECJ such claims may hinder the ability of the institutions to fully exercise their competences in the general interest. In the last 60 years, the EU courts have awarded damages in only 43 cases. However, in recent years, the ECJ has put more emphasis

⁸⁹ Council Directive 2006/112/EC of 28 November 2006 on the common system of value added tax, [2006] OJ L 347/1.

⁹⁰ Case C-390/15 RPO [2017] ECLI:EU:C:2017:174.

⁹¹ Statistical data available at: <http://trybunal.gov.pl/publikacje/informacje-o-problemach-wynikajacych-z-dzialalnosci-i-orzecznictwa-tk/od-2003/>.

⁹² Statistical data available at: <http://www.nsa.gov.pl/statystyki-wsa.php>.

on the protection of fundamental rights specified in the Charter.⁹³ Also in deciding actions for damages the EU courts underline that individuals may not bear the consequences of flagrant and inexcusable misconduct by the EU institutions.⁹⁴

2.8.3 The Polish Constitutional Tribunal does not take an overly active approach to review of the constitutionality of normative acts. In adjudicating a case, the Tribunal is bound by the limits of the application, question of law or complaint. The result of such constitutional review of the law is that the obligation to identify the grounds for the alleged unconstitutionality of a challenged provision is imposed on the participants in the proceedings (parties). Such a concept of constitutional judiciary is a derivative of the presumption of constitutionality of the law and the principle of stability of the legal order.

The administrative courts decide within the limits of a particular case, however without being bound by the claims and legal bases indicated in the complaint. The court is able to examine the content of a contested act or action of an administrative authority in terms of its compliance with substantive and procedural law. The Supreme Court and administrative and common courts may review the legality of regulations issued by the executive and may refuse to apply such a regulation in a particular case. However, they can not decide on the validity of a regulation since this lies solely within the competence of the Constitutional Tribunal. For statistical data on the proportion of validity challenges concerning domestic acts that have led to annulment and the main grounds for annulment, see Sect. 2.8.2.

2.8.4 The Polish Constitutional Tribunal reviews domestic statutes implementing EU legislation in the same manner as other parliamentary statutes or legal acts issued by central organs of the state.⁹⁵ In its Brussels I judgment, the Constitutional Court recognised its competence to directly review EU secondary law in the constitutional complaint procedure (see Sect. 1.3.4). The Tribunal indicated that it would examine the conformity of norms of EU law with the Constitution in future constitutional complaints in a special way and adopted an approach similar to that of the German Constitutional Court in *Solange II*⁹⁶ or the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in Bosphorus,⁹⁷ recognising a presumption of legality with

⁹³ Joined cases C-402/05 and C-415/05 Kadi [2008] ECR I-06351; Joined cases C-92/09 and C-93/09 Volker und Marcus Schecke and Eifert [2010] ECR I-11063; Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

⁹⁴ Case T-351/03 Schneider Electric [2007] ECR II-02237; Case T-47/03 Sison v. Council [2007] ECR II-00073; Case T-429/05 Artegodan v. Commission [2010] ECR II-00491; Case T-333/10 Animal Trading Company [2013] ECLI:EU:T:2013:451.

⁹⁵ See for example the Judgments of 27 April 2005 ref. No. P 1/05 (see Sect. 1.2.3) and of 5 October 2010 ref. No. SK 26/08 (see Sect. 2.3.1) concerning the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure implementing Council Framework Decision 2002/584 on the European Arrest Warrant.

⁹⁶ 19 BVerfGE 73, 339 [1986] (Solange II).

⁹⁷ Bosphorus Hava Yolları Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Şirketi v. Ireland [GC], no. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

regard to EU law. An individual submitting a constitutional complaint which challenges the conformity of an act of EU law with the Constitution is required to demonstrate that the legal act undermines the level of protection of rights and freedoms, in comparison with the level of protection guaranteed by the Constitution. It follows that the Polish constitutional court placed emphasis on examining whether a particular EU legal act offers an adequate level of protection of rights and freedoms, rather than taking the EU legal system in general into consideration.

2.8.5 The Constitutional Tribunal in its jurisprudence has expressed the view that a level of protection of an individual's rights that arises from EU law that is lower than the level of protection guaranteed by the Constitution would be unacceptable.⁹⁸ The constitutional norms on the rights and freedoms of the individual set a threshold which may not be lowered or challenged as a result of the implementation of EU legal acts. At the same time, the Tribunal has underlined that the Charter, the ECHR and the constitutional traditions of the Member States set a high level of protection of fundamental rights in the EU. These circumstances prove a significant axiological similarity between Polish law and EU law. Therefore, the risk of a potential gap between the levels of protection of fundamental rights guaranteed in these legal systems is not high.

2.8.6 The issue of equal treatment of individuals falling within the scope of EU law and national law has arisen in a few cases before the Constitutional Tribunal. For instance, in the Brussels I case the legal situation of the complainant (the debtor) was regulated by Council Regulation 44/2001 (see Sect. 1.3.4). Article 41 of this Regulation excludes a debtor from proceedings before a court of first instance in cases concerning the enforceability of a ruling issued by a court of another EU Member State. If the case had concerned the enforceability of a judgment from a non-EU Member State, the Polish Code of Civil Procedure would have applied. According to Art. 1151¹§2 of the Code, a debtor, upon being served a motion for enforcement of a judgment, is allowed to present his or her position before the court of first instance.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 Similar issues concerning the implementation of EU law as reported in the Questionnaire arose in Poland in relation to the regional operational programmes within the European Regional Development Fund. The implementation systems for regional operational programmes were usually adopted in the form of a resolution issued by the governing bodies of a voivodeship (province) and regulated certain rights and freedoms of individuals in relation to the procedure for the selection of projects and the related appellate procedure. Such resolutions do not fulfil the constitutional requirements for determining the rights and obligations of individuals within the meaning of Art. 87 of the Constitution (enumerating the acts of universally binding law: statutes, executive regulations or enactments of local law). The Constitutional Tribunal declared that certain provisions of the Act of 6 December 2006 on rules for carrying out development policy were inconsistent with Art. 87 of the Constitution.⁹⁹

⁹⁸ Judgment ref. No. K 18/04 and ref. No. SK 45/09.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 Analysis of the jurisprudence reveals that the ECJ, in assessing the common constitutional traditions¹⁰⁰ and legal principles common to the laws of the Member States specified in Art. 340(2) TFEU,¹⁰¹ uses the method of evaluative comparative law ('wertende Rechtsvergleichung'). Therefore, even a legal principle that is recognised in a minority of national legal systems may be identified as forming part of EU law, if it best meets the requirements of the EU legal system. In the view of the experts, the following rights and values may be regarded as part of the common constitutional traditions of the Member States as set out in Art. 6(3) TEU and Art. 52(4) of the Charter: the principle of equality, the principle of proportionality, legal certainty and protection of legitimate expectations, the right to a fair trial, the protection of property, the freedom to express opinions, the right of defence, non-retroactivity of law and nulla poena sine lege.

2.10.2 Recognising the general principles of Union law, the ECJ does not rely on the interpretation of the constitutional provisions of the Member States, but rather refers to the principles resulting from the constitutional traditions of the Member States. This way of formulating the general principles of Union law avoids the allegation that the domestic provisions or standards of certain Member States will determine the content of EU law, which would be tantamount to a reversal of the primacy of EU law over the law of the Member States.¹⁰² In view of the protection of the rights of individuals, it would be suitable for the ECJ to refer to the 'common constitutional traditions' as a more direct source of EU law or even long-standing rights and values prescribed in the constitution of a given Member State, as long as this would not violate the primacy and autonomy of Union law.

⁹⁹ Judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal of 12 December 2011, ref. No. P 1/11.

¹⁰⁰ Opinion of Advocate General Kokott of 29 April 2010 in Case C-550/07 Akzo Nobel Chemicals [2010] ECR I-08301, para. 94.

¹⁰¹ Opinion of Advocate General Poiares Maduro of 20 February 2008 in Joined cases C-120/06 P and C-121/06 FIAMM and Fedon [2008] ECR I-06513, para. 55.

¹⁰² Case 11/70 Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 01125, para. 3; Wróbel 2010, p. 50.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 The Constitutional Tribunal represents the view that a lower level of protection of an individual's rights arising from Union law compared to the level of protection guaranteed by the Polish Constitution would be unacceptable (see Sect. 2.8.5). Further, in its jurisprudence the Supreme Court invokes the provisions of the Polish Constitution over the provisions of the ECHR, if the former offer a higher standard of protection for the individual.¹⁰³ Analysis of the jurisprudence of the Polish courts reveals that the Charter is invoked in exceptional cases and only as additional justification to the outcome determined on the basis of Polish law. The Charter is relatively frequently invoked by the parties to the proceedings; however, it is referred to without adequate justification or as additional argumentation in support of statements based on national law.¹⁰⁴

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 At the time of the adoption of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision in 2002 there was no public deliberation in Poland since the country did not accede to the EU until May 2004. During the process of implementing the Decision through the Code of Penal Procedure by virtue of the Act of 18 March 2004,¹⁰⁵ there was academic and political debate, which led to the constitutional amendment discussed in Sects. 1.2.3 and 2.3.

At the time of adoption and implementation of the Data Retention Directive through the Telecommunications Law by virtue of the Act of 24 April 2009 there was no public deliberation concerning the defence of citizens' rights. However, on 13 May 2014 the Committee on Human Rights of the Senate organised an expert debate on the legal consequences of the judgment in the case Digital Rights Ireland and its impact on the use of telecommunications data by police and other public authorities for the purpose of preventing and combating crime.

¹⁰³ In its Order of 9 September 1998, ref No. III RN 73/98, the Supreme Court held that a foreigner who does not have a valid passport, valid visa or permanent residence card but who has a valid certificate of registration of an application instituting proceedings for refugee status, resides lawfully within the territory of Poland and is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time guaranteed by Art. 45(1) of the Constitution. The Supreme Court stated that this constitutional provision offers a wider scope of protection than Art. 6(1) of the ECHR that is limited to civil rights and obligations or criminal charges.

¹⁰⁴ Biernat 2012, pp. 74–78; Półtorak 2014, p. 17.

¹⁰⁵ Act of 18 March 2004 on the amendment of the Law – on the Criminal Code, the Law – on the Code of Penal Procedure and the Law – on the Code of Petty Offences (Journal of Laws No. 69, Item 626).

It is worth mentioning that one of the largest public debates in Poland, as well as public manifestations, took place in February 2012 and concerned the right to privacy of Internet users in view of the adoption of the Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement (ACTA).

2.12.2 Statutes implementing EU law are subject to preventive and subsequent control by the Constitutional Tribunal. At the stage of implementation of EU law, a statute may be subject to preventive control (i.e. before the statute enters into force). This can only be initiated by the President who may, before signing a statute, refer it to the Constitutional Tribunal for adjudication of its conformity to the Constitution (Art. 122(3) of the Constitution). For example, the President initiated control of the Act of 5 December 2008 concerning the organisation of the fish market implementing Council Regulation 1224/2009 establishing a Community control system for ensuring compliance with the rules of the common fisheries policy.^{106,107} He successfully challenged the conformity of the requirement that all fisheries products must first be marketed or registered with an auction centre, registered buyer or producer organisations with Art. 22 of the Constitution guaranteeing the freedom of economic activity. In the view of the Experts, the present system allows sufficient space for constitutional review at the stage of implementing EU law. However, if serious constitutional problems are identified, a Member State is still obliged to respect and ensure the full effectiveness of EU law in the domestic legal system. Otherwise, infringement proceedings as defined in Art. 258–260 TFEU may be initiated.

2.12.3 The Experts support the recommendation to suspend the application of EU measures and carry out a review if important constitutional issues are identified by a number of constitutional courts. Moreover, if such unconstitutionality has been identified, it should be recognised as a defence on the part of the Member State in an infringement proceeding.

In the Brussels I case the Constitutional Tribunal considered the effects of a potential judgment that would find norms of EU secondary legislation inconsistent with the Constitution (see Sect. 1.3.4). In the context of acts of Polish law, inconsistency with the Constitution results in a declaration that the unconstitutional norms are no longer legally binding (Arts. 190(1) and (3) of the Constitution). With regard to acts of EU secondary legislation, such a result would be impossible, as it is not the organs of the Polish state that decide whether such acts are legally binding or not. The consequence of such judgment would be to rule out the possibility that the act of EU secondary legislation would be applied by the organs of the state and would have any legal effects in Poland. Therefore, the ruling of the Constitutional Tribunal would result in a suspension of the application of the unconstitutional norms of EU law in the territory of the Republic of Poland. The Constitutional

¹⁰⁶ [2009] OJ L 343/1.

¹⁰⁷ Judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal of 13 October 2010 ref. No. Kp 1/09, OTK No. 8A/2010, item 74.

Tribunal also noted that such situation may lead to proceedings against Poland by the European Commission and an action before the ECJ for the infringement of obligations under the Treaties.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 The Experts do not share the concerns about an overall reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights and the rule of law in the context of EU law.

2.13.2 Not applicable.

2.13.3 The Experts submit the view that the ECJ should have broader recourse to the referring court or tribunal and request clarification where the circumstances of the case are imprecise or the formulation of a preliminary question raises considerable doubts. All constitutional courts of EU Member States should have the right to submit observations to the ECJ in a preliminary ruling procedure initiated by one of the national courts, if the case involves issues of fundamental constitutional importance. The lack of such provision prevented the Czech Constitutional Court from submitting its observations in Landtová.¹⁰⁸

The participation of constitutional courts in the preliminary ruling procedure would be advisable in the following situations:

(1) the threat of substantive differences between EU law and the constitutional law of the Member States (as in the case of Landtová);

(2) a conflict of the duty of a national court to file a legal question with the constitutional court of that Member State and its duty to submit a preliminary question to the ECJ.

2.13.4 In the view of the Experts, it would be desirable if Poland were to withdraw from Protocol (No 30) on the application of the Charter to Poland and to the United Kingdom, because the Protocol has more political than legal character.¹⁰⁹ The Experts would also recommend an amendment to the Constitution aimed at simplifying the procedure for implementing EU law into the national legal system and alleviating the strict standards governing the system of the sources of law (e.g. by using government decrees). The problem especially arises in relation to measures adopted in relation to the European Structural Funds (see Sect. 2.9.1).

¹⁰⁸ Case C-399/09 Landtová [2011] ECR I-05573.

¹⁰⁹ Biernat 2012, p. 86. Cf. OJ C 115, 9.5.2008, pp. 313–314.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 The rules regarding the transfer of competences of the organs of state authority to an international organisation or international organ are specified in Art. 90 of the Constitution (see Sect. 1.2.1). While Art. 90(1) of the Constitution does not use the word ‘European Union’, it was originally seen as the provision that provided the basis for Polish accession to the European Union. To date, it has not been applied to any international organisation other than the European Union, although such a possibility was considered with regard to Poland’s ratification of the Statute of the International Criminal Court, as well as in the context of an agreement with the United States of America concerning a missile defence system.¹¹⁰

The Council of Ministers is authorised to conclude international agreements requiring ratification and to accept and renounce other international agreements (Arts. 146(4)10 of the Constitution). The President, as a representative of the state in foreign affairs, ratifies and renounces international agreements (Art. 133(1)1 of the Constitution). The Constitution provides for three procedures for ratification of international agreements.

In the first procedure the Council of Ministers submits an international agreement which does not require consent granted by a statute (Art. 89(2)) to the President for ratification. The second procedure involves the Parliament and requires granting consent to ratification by statute. The Sejm and the Senate must pass bills by a simple majority vote, in the presence of at least one-half of the statutory number of their members. The choice of one of the above procedures is determined by the subject matter of the particular international agreement. Prior consent by statute is required for: (1) peace, alliances, political or military treaties; (2) freedoms, rights or obligations of citizens, as specified in the Constitution; (3) Poland’s membership in an international organisation; (4) considerable financial responsibilities imposed on the state; (5) matters regulated by statute or those in respect of which the Constitution requires the form of a statute (Art. 89(1)).

The third procedure applies to international agreements transferring competences of the organs of state authority. Consent can only be granted by a statute or nationwide referendum (Art. 90(2) and (3)). The consent for ratification of an international agreement specified in Art. 90 of the Constitution has higher requirements and involves a greater degree of democratic control (see Sect. 1.2.1).

3.1.2 Before the Constitution of 1997 there were no constitutional provisions determining the status of international agreements in the domestic legal order or the ratification procedures. The rules concerning the ratification of treaties and transfer of competences to international organisations were developed in the course of preparatory work for the Polish Constitution of 1997 (as to Art. 90, see Sect. 1.2.1). The purpose of these provisions was to determine the role of the Council of Ministers, the President and the Parliament in the ratification procedures and to strengthen democratic control upon the conclusion of international agreements. Article 89 is contained in Chapter III of the Constitution entitled ‘Sources of Law’. The intention of the drafters was to adopt a wide catalogue of international agreements which must be ratified through consent granted by statute as a general rule for the conclusion of agreements.¹¹¹ In legal commentary, it has been stated that the criteria formulated in Art. 89(1)(1)–(5) of the Constitution are far from clear and leave the Parliament a large margin of discretion in deciding whether an international agreement requires consent granted by statute.¹¹² However, it is impossible to identify the general guidelines indicating precisely which categories of international agreements shall be subject to ratification in accordance with Art. 89(1) of the Constitution, based on constitutional provisions. Each international agreement should be considered individually, as to its nature, subject matter and the circumstances surrounding its conclusion.¹¹³

¹¹⁰ Wyrozumska and Kranz 2001, pp. 15–35; Wyrozumska and Płachta 2001, pp. 87 et seq.

3.1.3 In the legal literature the view has been expressed that the rule that a nationwide referendum expressing consent for ratification of an international agreement by which competences are transferred to an international organisation is binding only if at least 50% of citizens eligible to vote participate, is too strict.¹¹⁴ In 2010, the Parliament unsuccessfully considered proposals concerning the transfer of competences and other provisions with regard to Poland’s membership in the European Union (see Sect. 1.2.4).

3.1.4 See Sects. 1.5.3 and 2.13.4.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 The Constitution of 1997 is the first basic law in Poland defining the position of international law in the domestic legal order. The general principle is expressed in Art. 9 of the Constitution and states that ‘[t]he Republic of Poland shall respect international law binding upon it’. It is the expression of the classic rule of pacta sunt servanda. In legal commentary and domestic case law the prevailing view is that the term ‘international law’ covers international treaties, international custom and general principles of international law. Article 9 of the Constitution is not a merely declaratory provision but rather obliges all state authorities to respect

¹¹¹ Szymański 2010, pp. 504–505.

¹¹² Banaszak 2012.

¹¹³ Wyrozumska 2006a, p. 177.

¹¹⁴ Biernat 2002a, pp. 41–65.

international law in the performance of their duties, and to interpret Polish law in a manner consistent with international law.¹¹⁵ This indicates the openness of the Polish legal system to international law.¹¹⁶

The position of international agreements in the national legal order is determined by Art. 91 of the Constitution. A ratified international agreement, after promulgation in the Journal of Laws, constitutes part of the domestic legal order and shall be applied directly, unless its application depends on the enactment of a statute (Art. 91(1) of the Constitution). Such provision refers to so-called self-executing or directly applicable norms. An international agreement ratified upon prior consent granted by statute has precedence over a statute if the agreement cannot be reconciled with the provisions of the statute. This concerns the primacy of application of international agreements by state authorities and domestic courts and it does not affect the validity of national law (Art. 91(2) of the Constitution). The Constitutional Tribunal has the sole competence to adjudicate on the conformity of a statute with ratified international agreements and to derogate from incompatible national law (Art. 188(2) of the Constitution). In the legal commentary and the jurisprudence of the courts, the dominant view is that an international agreement ratified without consent granted by statute does not have precedence over statutes.¹¹⁷

As specified in Sect. 1.2.1, Art. 91(3) of the Constitution determines the position of law enacted by an international organisation, if an agreement, ratified by the Republic of Poland, so provides. Accordingly, the law adopted by the international organisation shall be applied directly and have precedence in the event of a conflict with a statute. The jurisprudence of the Constitutional Tribunal clearly demonstrates that law enacted by an international organisation, in this case EU secondary law, does not have precedence over the Constitution.¹¹⁸

3.2.2 Taking into consideration the interaction between international and national law, in legal commentary the prevailing view is that the monist system is predominant in Poland (incorporation doctrine).¹¹⁹ This statement is based on Art. 91(1) of the Constitution. The jurisprudence of the national courts is not entirely clear on this matter, and there have been rulings based on a dualist approach (transformation doctrine).¹²⁰

¹¹⁵ Biernat and Niedzwiedź 2012, p. 93.

¹¹⁶ Wasilkowski 2006, pp. 9 et seq.

¹¹⁷ Garlicki 2010a, p. 144; Wyrozumska 2006a, pp. 578–579.

¹¹⁸ In case ref. No. SK 45/09 the Constitutional Tribunal directly adjudicated the conformity of Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 to the Polish Constitution and issued a judgment on the merits.

¹¹⁹ Biernat and Niedzwiedź 2012, p. 121; Wyrozumska 1996, p. 24; Szafarz 1998, p. 3; Wasilkowski 1998, p. 86.

¹²⁰ Wyrozumska 2006a, pp. 592–599; Wyrozumska 2006b, pp. 45–50.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 The foreign policy of Poland is conducted by the Council of Ministers (Art. 146(1) of the Constitution), which includes negotiating and signing international agreements. The Act on International Agreements of 2000 specifies that Parliament is involved when ratification of an international agreement requires the form of a statute under the provisions of Arts. 89(1) and 90 of the Constitution. Withdrawal from an international agreement ratified with the consent referred to in Arts. 89(1) and 90 of the Polish Constitution also requires consent granted by statute (Art. 22(2) of the Act on International Agreements). In the case of other international agreements, the involvement of the Sejm is limited to receiving information from the Prime Minister on any intention to submit an agreement to the President for ratification (Art. 89(2) of the Constitution; see Sect. 3.1.1).¹²¹ However, according to Art. 15(4) of the Act on International Agreements, if the Sejm issues a negative opinion on the choice of such procedure within 30 days after notification, the Council of Ministers must reconsider its position on the matter. The Council of Ministers may decide to change its position and submit the agreement to the Sejm for consent granted by statute or decide to submit the agreement directly to the President. The President may ratify the agreement, share the view of the Sejm and return it to the Council of Ministers or submit the case to the Constitutional Tribunal for adjudication on the mode of ratification in conformity with the Constitution. Such procedure preserves the institutional balance in the ratification of international agreements.¹²²

The Marshal of the Sejm, the Marshal of the Senate, 50 Deputies or 30 Senators may submit an application to the Constitutional Tribunal for control of the conformity of an international agreement to the Constitution (Art. 188(1) of the Constitution). This is the so-called subsequent control (kontrola następca) of normative acts and relates only to international agreements that have been ratified and form part of the Polish legal system.¹²³ In legal commentary, the view has been expressed that both chambers of the Polish Parliament should have competence to initiate preventive control of international agreements.¹²⁴ However, this would require the amendment of the Constitution, since such control lies solely within the competence of the President.

The Sejm usually holds debates on current matters of foreign policy. On most occasions the debates relate to information submitted by the Council of Ministers ¹²¹ In view of Art. 12(3) of the Act on International Agreements, international agreements that do not require ratification are subject to approval by the Council of Ministers.

¹²² Wyrozumska 2006a, p. 194.

¹²³ In its Order of 21 May 2013, ref. No. K 11/13, the Constitutional Tribunal dismissed the application filed by 50 Deputies concerning the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union (Fiscal Compact), since at the time of submitting the application the agreement had not yet been ratified.

¹²⁴ Wyrozumska 2006a, p. 74.

on Poland's participation in the activities of the European Union and the ratification of international agreements.¹²⁵

3.3.2 A nationwide referendum is one of the ways for obtaining consent for ratification of an international agreement transferring competences of the organs of state authority to an international organisation or international organ (Art. 90(3) of the Constitution). This provision served as the basis for the referendum on the EU Accession Treaty in 2003. It cannot be excluded that the Sejm or the President may order a nationwide referendum as specified in Art. 125 of the Constitution to decide on matters of particular importance to the state.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 As stated above, Art. 9 of the Constitution stipulates that the Republic of Poland shall respect international law binding upon it (see Sect. 3.2.1). This provision must be reconciled with Art. 8, which provides that the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the Republic of Poland. To this end, the Constitutional Tribunal acquired the competence to adjudicate upon the conformity of international agreements to the Constitution (Art. 188(1) of the Constitution). International agreements are subject to preventive control (kontrola prewencyjna) or subsequent control (kontrola następcza). The first type of control can be initiated only by the President who may turn to the Constitutional Tribunal before ratification of an agreement with a request to adjudicate upon its conformity to the Constitution (Art. 133(2) of the Constitution). Subsequent control may be initiated by the President, the Marshal of the Sejm, the Marshal of the Senate, the Prime Minister, 50 Deputies, 30 Senators, the First President of the Supreme Court, the President of the Supreme Administrative Court, the Public Prosecutor-General, the President of the Supreme Chamber of Control and the Ombudsman. International agreements may also be questioned by the National Council of the Judiciary in cases related to the independence of the courts and judges (Art. 186(2) of the Constitution), by national courts referring a question of law (Art. 193 of the Constitution) and by individuals in cases of constitutional complaints (Art. 79 of the Constitution). Among the international agreements that have been submitted to the Tribunal for subsequent control are the Accession Treaty, Protocol No. 4 to the Association Treaty, the Lisbon Treaty, the Extradition Treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Poland and the Fiscal Compact.¹²⁶ A judgment of the

¹²⁵ See as an example the list of Debates of the Sejm, 7th term available in English at: http://oide.sejm.gov.pl/oide/en/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=14684&Itemid=717.

¹²⁶ In cases ref. No. K 18/04 (the Association Treaty), ref. No. SK 54/05 (Protocol No 4 to the Association Treaty), ref. No. K 32/09 (the Lisbon Treaty) and ref. No. SK 6/10 (Extradition Treaty) the Constitutional Tribunal decided that the contested international agreements were in conformity with the Constitution. Case ref. No. K 11/13 concerning the Fiscal Compact has not yet been decided.

Constitutional Tribunal in which it is held that an international agreement is inconsistent with the Constitution results in a declaration that the unconstitutional norms are no longer legally binding on the territory of Poland (Art. 190(1) of the Constitution). However, the Constitutional Tribunal may specify another date for the end of the binding force of an international agreement and postpone the effects of its judgment for a period not exceeding 12 months (Art. 190(3) of the Constitution). Such decision provides time to bring the agreement into conformity with the Constitution.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 In the period immediately following the political transformation in 1989, the IMF and the World Bank had a great influence on the radical economic reforms undertaken in Poland. The assessment of these reforms differs. On one hand they had a positive impact on the prompt creation of the basis of a market economy. On the other, they created some negative social consequences involving the impoverishment of certain social groups, such as employees of large state agricultural farms. These reforms took place before the adoption of the current Constitution which contains provisions on economic and social rights (Arts. 64–76). In a number of cases, the Constitutional Tribunal has accepted the admissibility of the temporary limitation of social rights during the economic crisis (which in Poland was less severe than in other countries).¹²⁷

3.5.2 See Sect. 2.7.3.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 In its judgment of 21 September 2011, the Constitutional Tribunal decided that Art. 4(1) of the Extradition Treaty of 10 July 1996 between the United States of America and the Republic of Poland is consistent with Arts. 55(1) and (2) in conjunction with Art. 2 of the Constitution (see Sect. 3.4). The complainant, who held both American and Polish citizenship, contested the provision stipulating that '[n]either contracting State shall be bound to extradite its own nationals, but the executive authority of the requested State shall have the power to extradite such persons if, in its discretion, it be deemed proper and possible to do so'. In the opinion of the complainant such provision was inconsistent with Arts. 55(1) and ¹²⁷ See as examples the Judgments of 12 December 2012, ref. No. K 1/12 and of 19 December 2012, ref. No. K 9/12.

(2) of the Constitution, as the possibility of extraditing a Polish citizen did not result from the content of an international agreement, which only referred to the system of law and left the determination of the admissibility of extradition of a Polish citizen to the administrative discretion of an official, without any clear guidelines for such discretion. Moreover, it lacked sufficient specificity and was imprecise, and thus failed to comply with the principle of a state ruled by law, expressed in Art. 2 of the Constitution. The Tribunal stated that Art. 4(1) of the Extradition Treaty is an example of an optional clause which provides for the possibility to refrain from extraditing a country's own nationals. However, this provision should be interpreted taking into account Art. 1 of the Extradition Treaty, which gives rise to the obligation to extradite all persons sought for prosecution or found guilty of an extraditable offence, regardless of their nationality. Despite the complainant's claims, the Extradition Treaty implies a possibility to extradite a Polish citizen, and thus the requirement set out in Arts. 55(1) and (2) of the Constitution is met, namely that the extradition of a Polish citizen may be granted 'if such a possibility stems from an international treaty ratified by Poland'. In other words, the extradition of a Polish citizen is admissible not only when a ratified international agreement introduces such an obligation, but also when only such a possibility arises therefrom.

On 24 July 2014 the ECtHR issued judgments in the cases Husayn (Abu Zubaydah) v. Poland and Al Nashiri v. Poland, concerning allegations of torture, ill-treatment and secret detention of a Saudi Arabian national and a stateless Palestinian, both suspected of terrorist acts.¹²⁸ The applicants alleged that they were held at a CIA 'black site' in Poland. In both cases, the Court found that Poland had failed to comply with its obligation to furnish all necessary facilities for the effective conduct of an investigation under Art. 38 of the ECHR. According to the ECtHR, Poland had violated the applicants' rights by enabling the United States to secretly detain and torture the applicants on Polish territory, conducting an inadequate investigation into the acts of torture and ill treatment committed in Poland and allowing the applicants' transfer to Guantánamo despite the real risk they would be tortured and could be subjected to unfair trials and the death penalty by the United States. The Court held that these failures constituted violations of the prohibition of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, the right to liberty and security, the right to respect for private and family life, the right to an effective remedy and the right to a fair trial. As regards Mr. Al Nashiri, the Court further held that there had been a violation of the right to life and abolition of the death penalty. Poland referred the case to the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR, contesting the judgment on procedural grounds. The appeal was rejected on 17 February 2015.

The Polish Constitution provides the same level of guarantees for the rights and freedoms of foreigners as for those of Polish citizens. According to Art. 37(1) of the Constitution all persons, being under the authority of the Polish State, shall enjoy the freedoms and rights ensured by the Constitution. A criminal investigation into CIA secret prisons is still pending before the Polish Prosecutor's Office. Mr. Abu Zubaydah and Mr. Al Nashiri have been granted the status of victim in the investigation. According to information provided by the Prosecutor's Office, the investigators are still collecting evidence and the investigation is taking longer than expected since US officials have not responded to requests for information. The Polish Government has also asked the US for diplomatic assurances with regard to Mr. Abu Zubaydah and Mr. Al Nashiri, who could face the death penalty in the US.

¹²⁸ Husayn (Abu Zubaydah) v. Poland, no. 7511/13, 24 July 2014; Al Nashiri v. Poland, no. 28761/11, 24 July 2014.

References

- Albi A. (2005) EU Enlargement and the Constitutions of Central and Eastern Europe. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Banaszak B. (2012) Komentarz do art. 89, Konstytucja Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej (Commentary to Article 89, Constitution of the Republic of Poland). C.H. Beck, Warsaw.
- Biernat S. (2002a) Czy konieczne są zmiany w Konstytucji RP przed przystąpieniem Polski do Unii Europejskiej? (Are amendments to the Constitution of the Republic of Poland necessary before acceding to the European Union?). In: Barcz J. (ed.) Czy zmieniać konstytucję? Ustrojowo-konstytucyjne aspekty przystąpienia Polski do Unii Europejskiej (Should the Constitution be changed? Systemic and constitutional aspects of Polish accession to the European Union). Instytut Spraw Publicznych, Warsaw, pp. 41–65.
- Biernat S. (2002b) The openness of the Constitution of the Republic of Poland towards European integration In: Amato G., Braibant G., Venizelos E. (eds.) The Constitutional Revision in Today's Europe. Esperia Publications, London, pp. 439–445.
- Biernat S. (2004) Are the acceding states constitutionally prepared to become members of the European Union? In: Neuwahl N. (ed.) European Union Enlargement: Law and Socio-Economic Changes. Éditions Thémis, Montreal, pp. 63–85.
- Biernat S. (2007) Offene Staatlichkeit: Polen. In: von Bogdandy A., Cruz Villalón P., Huber M. (eds.) Handbuch Ius Publicum Europaeum, Band II: Offene Staatlichkeit – Wissenschaft vom Verfassungsrecht. C.F. Müller, Heidelberg, pp. 243–275.
- Biernat S. (2009) Pytania prejudycjalne polskich sądów administracyjnych do Europejskiego Trybunału Sprawiedliwości (doświadczenia i perspektywy) (Preliminary references of the Polish administrative courts to the European Court of Justice (experiences and perspectives)). In: Supernat J. (ed.) Między tradycją a przyszłością w nauce prawa administracyjnego (Between tradition and the future in the science of administrative law). Wydawnictwo Uniwersytetu Wrocławskiego, Wrocław, pp. 28–36.
- Biernat S. (2012) Czy Karta Praw Podstawowych Unii Europejskiej obowiązuje w Polsce? (Does the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union have legal force in Poland?). In: Kardas P., Sroka T., Wróbel W. (eds.) Państwo prawa i prawo karne. Księga Jubileuszowa Profesora Andrzeja Zolla (Rule of law and criminal law. Jubilee book for Professor Andrzej Zoll) Vol. I. Wolters Kluwer, Warsaw, pp. 59–77.
- Biernat S., Niedźwiedź M. (2012) Znaczenie prawa międzynarodowego i unijnego dla prawa administracyjnego i administracji publicznej w świetle Konstytucji RP (The role of international law and the EU for administrative law and public administration in the light of the Constitution of the Republic of Poland). In: Hauser R., Wróbel A. Niewiadomski Z. (eds.) System Prawa Administracyjnego (The system of Administrative Law) Vol. 2. C.H. Beck, Warsaw, pp. 89–125.

- Bogdanowicz P., Marcisz P. (2012) Szukając granic kontroli – glosa do wyroku TK z 16.11.2011 r. (SK 45/09) (Searching for the limits of control – Commentary to the Judgment of the Constitutional Tribunal of 16.11.2011, ref. No. SK 45/09). Europejski Przegląd Sądowy 9:47–53.
- Bosek L., Szydło M. (2016) Komentarz do art. 31 (Commentary to Article 31). In: Safjan M., Bosek L. (eds.) Konstytucja RP. Tom I. Komentarz do art. 1–86 (The Constitution of the Republic of Poland. Vol. I. Commentary to art.1–86). C.H. Beck, Warsaw.
- Brzezinski M.F. (1991) Constitutional Heritage and Renewal: The Case of Poland. Virginia Law Review 1:49–112.
- Carrera S., Guild E., Hernanz N. (2013) Europe's most wanted? Recalibrating Trust in the European Arrest Warrant System. Centre for European Policy Studies, Brussels, Report No. 76. <http://www.ceps.eu/publications/europe%E2%80%99s-most-wanted-recalibrating-trust-european-arrest-warrant-system>.
- Chruściak R. (2003) Procedury przystąpienia Polski do Unii Europejskiej w pracach nad Konstytucją (The procedures of the accession of Poland to the European Union in legal works on the Constitution). Państwo i Prawo 5:44–54.
- Chruściak R. (2013) Prace konstytucyjne w latach 2008–2011 (Constitutional works 2008–2011). Wydawnictwo Sejmowe, Warsaw.
- Davies N. (2005) God's Playground: A History of Poland, Vol. 1: The Origins to 1795. Columbia University Press, New York.
- Dudzik S., Półtorak N. (2012) The Court of the Last Word: Competences of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal in the Review of European Union Law. Yearbook of Polish European Studies 15:225–258.
- Działocha K. (1996) Podstawy prawne integracji Polski z Unią Europejską w pracach nad nową konstytucją (Legal bases of Poland's integration with the European Union in work upon the new Constitution). Państwo i Prawo 4–5:5–14.
- Gardocka T. (2011) Analiza polskiej praktyki występowania do innych państw Unii Europejskiej z wnioskiem o wydanie osoby trybem europejskiego nakazu aresztowania. (Analysis of the Polish practice in submitting surrender requests in the form of a European Arrest Warrant to other Member States of the European Union). Instytut Wymiaru Sprawiedliwości, Warszawa. http://www.iws.org.pl/pliki/files/badania/raporty/raporty11/AR_Gardocka%20T_%20ENA%202011.pdf.
- Garlicki L. (2003) Komentarz do art. 31 (Commentary to Article 31). In: Garlicki L. (ed.) Konstytucja Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej. Komentarz. Tom III (The Constitution of the Republic of Poland. Commentary. Vol. III). Wydawnictwo Sejmowe, Warsaw.
- Garlicki L. (2010a) Komentarz do art. 8 (Commentary to Article 8). In: Garlicki L., Hofmański L., Wróbel A. (eds.) Konwencja o Ochronie Praw Człowieka i Podstawowych Wolności. Komentarz do artykułów 1–18. Tom I (Convention on Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Commentary to Articles 1–18. Vol. I.). Wydawnictwo Sejmowe, Warsaw.
- Garlicki L. (2010b) Polskie prawo konstytucyjne. Zarys wykładu (Polish Constitutional Law. Lecture outline). Liber, Warsaw.
- Górski A. (2010) Między zasadami legalizmu a proporcjonalności (Between the principles of legality and proportionality). Rzeczpospolita, 7 April 2010.
- Grzybowski M. (2002) Konstytucja Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej na tle doświadczeń konstytucyjnych państw Europy Środkowej i Wschodniej (kilka uwag o unormowaniu relacji państwo–obywatel) (The Constitution of the Republic of Poland in the light of the constitutional experience of the Central and Eastern European States (remarks on regulations concerning the relations between the state and the citizen)). Przegląd Sejmowy 5:11–22.
- Jabłoński M. (2010) Klasyfikacja wolności i praw jednostki w Konstytucji RP (The classification of rights and freedoms of the individual in the Polish Constitution). In: Jabłoński M. (ed.) Wolności i prawa jednostki w konstytucji RP (Freedoms and rights of the individual in the Polish Constitution), Vol. I. C.H. Beck, Warsaw, pp. 78–107.

- Jaworski G., Sołtysińska A. (2010) Postępowanie w sprawach karnych ze stosunków międzynarodowych. Komentarz (Proceedings in criminal matters in international relations. Commentary). Wolters Kluwer, Warsaw.
- Kawczyńska M. (2014) Kontrola zgodności z Konstytucją aktów unijnego prawa pochodnego w postępowaniach przed Trybunałem Konstytucyjnym (Controlling the conformity of EU secondary law to the Constitution in proceedings before the Constitutional Tribunal). In: Dudzik S., Półtorak N. (eds.) Prawo Unii Europejskiej a prawo konstytucyjne państw członkowskich (European Union law and the constitutional law of the Member States). Wolters Kluwer, Warsaw, pp. 213–243.
- Kruszyński P. (2004) O niektórych propozycjach rządowego projektu ustawy o zmianie ustawy – Kodeks karny, ustawy – Kodeks postępowania karnego oraz ustawy – Kodeks wykroczeń (On some proposals of the government bill to amend the Criminal Code, the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Code of Petty Offences). Prokuratura i Prawo 2:7–14.
- Laskowska M. (2011) Przyczyny i skutki zmian w konstytucji Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej z 1997 roku a członkostwo w Unii Europejskiej (The reasons and consequences of amendments to the Constitution of the Republic of Poland of 1997 and membership in the European Union). In: Kubuś K., Wawrzyniak J. (eds.) Europeizacja konstytucji państw Unii Europejskiej (The europeanisation of the constitutions in European Union countries). Scholar, Warsaw, pp. 201–225.
- Masternak-Kubiak M. (2010) Miejsce i znaczenie międzynarodowych źródeł praw człowieka w polskim porządku konstytucyjnoprawnym (The position and meaning of international sources of human rights in the Polish constitutional system). In: Jabłoński M. (ed.) Wolności i prawa jednostki w konstytucji RP (The freedoms and rights of the individual in the Polish Constitution), Vol. I. C.H. Beck, Warsaw, pp. 30–57.
- Nita B. (2008) Ograniczenia ekstradycji po zmianie art. 55 Konstytucji RP a europejski nakaz aresztowania (Limitations on extradition under the amended Art. 55 of the Polish Constitution and the European Arrest Warrant). Przegląd Sejmowy 2:93–113.
- Nita B. (2014) Komentarz do art. 607l (Commentary on art. 607l). In: Skorupka J. (ed.) Kodeks Postępowania Karnego. Komentarz Online (The Code of Criminal Procedure. Online Commentary). C.H. Beck, Warsaw.
- Ostropolski T. (2013) Zasada proporcjonalności a europejski nakaz aresztowania (The principle of proportionality and the European Arrest Warrant). Europejski Przegląd Sądowy 3:14–24.
- Płachta M. (2002) Europejski nakaz aresztowania (wydania): kłopotliwa ‘rewolucja’ w ekstradycji (European Arrest Warrant: a troublesome ‘revolution’ in extradition). Studia Europejskie 3:51–72.
- Półtorak N. (2014) Zakres związania państw członkowskich Kartą Praw Podstawowych Unii Europejskiej (Scope of the binding force of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights on Member States). Europejski Przegląd Sądowy 9:17–28.
- Prokop K. (2011) Polish Constitutional Law. Temida 2, Białystok.
- Rakowska A., Skotnicki K. (2007) Konstytucja RP na tle innych obowiązujących ustaw zasadniczych państw Europy Środkowo-Wschodniej i Południowej (The Constitution of the Republic of Poland in the light of constitutions existing in other countries of Central, Eastern and Southern Europe). Przegląd Sejmowy 4:211–228.
- Safjan M. (2012) Dialog czy konflikt? O relacjach Europejskiego Trybunału Sprawiedliwości z sądem konstytucyjnym (Dialog or conflict? Relations between the European Court of Justice and the Constitutional Court). In: Kardas P., Sroka T., Wróbel W. (eds.) Państwo prawa i prawo karne. Księga Jubileuszowa Profesora Andrzeja Zolla (Rule of law and criminal law. Jubilee book for Professor Andrzej Zoll), Vol. I. Wolters Kluwer, Warsaw, pp. 339–367.
- Sokolewicz W. (2001) The new role of the constitution in the post-socialist states of Central and Southeast Europe. In: Działocha K., Mojak R., Wójcik K. (eds.) Ten years of the democratic constitutionalism in Central and Eastern Europe. Morpol, Lublin.
- Steinborn S. (2013) Komentarz do art. 607w (Commentary on Art. 607w). In: Paprzycki L.K., Grajewski J., Steinborn S. (eds.) Kodeks postępowania karnego. Komentarz (Code of the Criminal Procedure. Commentary), Vol. II. Wolters Kluwer, Warsaw.

- Suchorzewska A. (2010) Ochrona prawa systemów informatycznych wobec zagrożeń cyberterroryzmem (Legal protection of informatics systems in the face of cyber terrorism). Wolters Kluwer, Warsaw.
- Szafarz R. (1998) Skuteczność norm prawa międzynarodowego w prawie wewnętrznym w świetle nowej Konstytucji (The effectiveness of norms of international law in the light of the new Constitution). Państwo i Prawo 1:3–11.
- Szymański J. (2010) Konstytucja RP a umowy międzynarodowe (The Polish Constitution and international agreements). In: Bożyk S., Jamróz A. (ed.) Konstytucja – ustrój polityczny – system organów państwowych: prace ofiarowane profesorowi Marianowi Grzybowskiemu (The Constitution – the political system – the system of state organs: the works offered to Professor Marian Grzybowski). Temida 2, Białystok, pp. 491–517.
- Tatham A.F. (2013) Central European Constitutional Courts in the Face of EU Membership: The Influence of the German Model in Hungary and Poland. Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Leiden, Boston.
- Uruszczak W. (2010) Historia państwa i prawa polskiego. Vol. 1 (996 – 1795) (The history of the Polish State and law. Vol. 1 (996–1795)). Wolters Kluwer, Warsaw.
- Wasilkowski A. (1998) Transformacja czy inkorporacja? (Transformation or incorporation?). Państwo i Prawo 4:85–87.
- Wasilkowski A. (2006) Przestrzeganie prawa międzynarodowego (art. 9 Konstytucji) (Observing international law (art. 9 of the Constitution)). In: Wójtowicz K. (eds.) Otwarcie RP na prawo międzynarodowe i procesy integracyjne. Wydawnictwo Sejmowe, Warsaw, pp. 9–30.
- Wojtyczek K. (2007) Przekazywanie kompetencji państwa organizacjom międzynarodowym (Transfer of state powers to international organisations). Wydawnictwo Uniwersytetu Jagiellońskiego, Kraków.
- Wróbel A. (2010) Źródła prawa Unii Europejskiej (The sources of European Union Law). In: Wróbel A. (ed.) Stosowanie prawa Unii Europejskiej przez sądy (The application of European Union law by the courts), Vol. I. Wolters Kluwer, Warsaw.
- Wróbel, A. (2013) Komentarz do art. 52 (Commentary to Article 52). In: Wróbel A. (ed.) Karta Praw Podstawowych Unii Europejskiej. Komentarz (Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. Commentary). C.H. Beck, Warsaw.
- Wyrozumska A. (1996) Zapewnianie skuteczności prawa międzynarodowemu w prawie krajowym w projekcie konstytucji RP (Ensuring the effectiveness of international law in national law under the draft Polish Constitution). Państwo i Prawo 11:16–34.
- Wyrozumska A. (2006a) Umowy międzynarodowe. Teoria i praktyka (International agreements. Theory and practice). Prawo i Praktyka Gospodarcza, Warsaw.
- Wyrozumska A. (2006b) Prawo międzynarodowe oraz prawo Unii Europejskiej a konstytucyjny system źródeł prawa (International law, European Union law and the constitutional system of sources of law). In: Wójtowicz K. (ed.) Otwarcie Konstytucji RP na prawo międzynarodowe i procesy integracyjne (The openness of the Polish Constitution to the international law and integration processes). Wydawnictwo Sejmowe, Warsaw, pp. 45–50.
- Wyrozumska A., Kranz J. (2001) Ratyfikacja Rzymskiego Statutu Międzynarodowego Trybunału Karnego a interpretacja Konstytucji z 1997 r.: art. 90 – czy tylko klauzula europejska? (The ratification of the Statute of the International Criminal Court and interpretation of the Constitution of 1997: Art. 90 – only a European clause?). Studia Prawno-Europejskie, Volume V. Wydawnictwo Uniwersytetu Łódzkiego, Łódź, pp. 15–35.
- Wyrozumska A., Płachta M. (2001) Problem ratyfikacji Statutu Międzynarodowego Trybunału Karnego (The problem of ratification of the Statute of the International Criminal Court). Państwo i Prawo 5:87–97.
- Zajadło J. (1998) Godność i prawa człowieka. Ideowe i normatywne źródła przepisu art. 30 Konstytucji (Dignity and human rights. Ideological and normative sources of Art. 30 of the Constitution). Gdańskie Studia Prawnicze 2:53–62.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Czech Republic: From a Euro-Friendly Approach of the Constitutional Court to Proclaiming a Court of Justice Judgment Ultra Vires

Zdeněk Kühn

Abstract The Czech Constitution of 1992, associated with the revolutionary fervour of the 1989 Velvet Revolution, attempted to annihilate the Communist, totalitarian heritage. According to the judgments of the Constitutional Court (CCC), this meant that the rule of law in a constitutional state has not only a formal but also a substantive side, expressing the fundamental, inviolable values of a democratic society. There was a break from an approach that had seen the judiciary as a submissive and unthinking instrument of enforcement. In relation to EU law, several measures have been subject to constitutional challenges, including domestic acts implementing the European Arrest Warrant, the Data Retention Directive, and EU sugar quotas. The Czech Constitutional Court, which has a strong position, has underlined its EU-friendly approach. At the same time, for exceptional, flagrant cases, the CCC has retained the constitutional limits based on the democratic, rule-of-law-based state (unamendable provision under Art. 9(2) of the Constitution) and the protection of fundamental rights. Notably, in Landtová, the CCC declared an ECJ judgment ultra vires. In general, the reasoning of the CCC often follows that of the German Constitutional Court. In the practice of the ordinary courts, it emerges from the report that the Czech courts have adopted a rights-protective approach and carry out judicial review, including in European Arrest Warrant cases and other mutual recognition cases. The EU amendments in the Constitution are considered brief but sufficient.

Keywords The Czech Constitution • Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation • The Czech Constitutional Court
Constitutional review statistics • Fundamental rights and the rule of law

Zdeněk Kühn is Associate Professor of Jurisprudence, Charles University Law School, and Justice, Supreme Administrative Court of the Czech Republic. e-mail: kuhnz@prf.cuni.cz.

All websites accessed 21 September 2015. Text submitted 7 January 2015.

Z. Kühn (✉)
Charles University Law School, Prague, Czech Republic
e-mail: kuhnz@prf.cuni.cz

Data Retention Directive and surveillance • European Arrest Warrant, defence rights and judicial review • Sugar Quotas cases, property rights and the principles of legal certainty and legitimate expectations • Unamendable constitutional provision on the democratic, rule-of-law-based state • Constitutional limits Landtová and ultra vires review • Skoma-Lux and publication of laws

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The Czech Constitution of 1992 was adopted as a response to the totalitarian past of Czechoslovakia. It was enacted three years after the fall of the Czechoslovak Communist regime and must be interpreted against this backdrop.¹ The drafters of the Constitution did not strive for continuity with the old regime; quite the contrary, the Constitution was associated with the revolutionary fervour of the 1989 Velvet Revolution and attempted to annihilate the Communist heritage.

The text of the Constitution is rather brief. The Constitution seems to be less detailed than its Central European counterparts, e.g. the Polish Constitution of 1997 or the Hungarian Constitution of 2011. Let us keep this in mind when analysing the relative brevity of the 2001 Euro-amendment to the Constitution (Sect. 2 below).

The Constitution created a strong Constitutional Court (hereinafter CCC) which soon became its most powerful protector. The CCC started with almost a total absence of constitutional conventions and tradition.² Its doctrine is therefore unoriginal, as it mostly copies the German approach (sometimes quite unsystematically and simplistically). The principle of adherence to the letter of the law endorsed via a ‘weak’ judiciary that is unable to interpret general constitutional clauses (textual positivism) is said to be discredited by the fact that law might sometimes be grossly unjust, as happened during the Communist era. The CCC has stated that:

The history of the Twentieth Century relating to the existence of totalitarian states proved that mechanical identification of the law with legal texts had become a welcome tool of totalitarian manipulation. It made the judiciary a submissive and unthinking instrument in the enforcement of totalitarian power.³

¹ In order to be accurate, I shall add that the immediate reason for adopting the Constitution in fall 1992 was the break-up of the Czechoslovak federation.

² Hungarian legal philosopher and comparatist Csaba Varga has noted that ‘[i]n want of constitutional precedents, conventions, and customs, in short, of established practice, the field where the political and legal game is played is rather empty. The transition period now is the dramatic high time for Central and Eastern Europe nations to set the style for their future’. Varga 1995, p. 75.

³ See the judgment of 17 December 1997, file No. Pl. ÚS 33/97 (translation by the author). Translations of some important judgments of the CCC are available at <http://www.usoud.cz/en/decisions/>. I have used the translations available at this website unless indicated otherwise. All decisions in Czech are available at <http://nalus.usoud.cz/Search/Search.aspx>.

The CCC made the same point already in its first judgment on the Act on the Lawlessness of the Communist Regime:

However, the [pre-WW II] positivist tradition ... in its later development many times exposed its weakness. ... in Germany the National Socialist domination was accepted as legal, even though it gnawed out the substance and in the end destroyed the basic foundations of the Weimar democracy. After the war, this legalistic conception of political legitimacy made it possible for Klement Gottwald [the first Communist Czechoslovak president] to 'fill up old casks with new wine'. Then in 1948 he was able, by the formal observance of constitutional procedures, to 'legitimate' the February Putsch. In the face of injustice, the principle that 'law is law' revealed itself to be powerless.⁴

Although these claims are now generally considered overstated in Europe,⁵ a growth in the role of the judiciary, 'the least dangerous branch', was none the less supported as a result of such claims. Therefore, a strong judicial power was no longer viewed as a danger to democracy, but rather as an enhancement of democracy. Weak judges came to be considered dangerous for democracy. Moreover, virtually overnight, Eastern Europe joined the trend in which law replaced 'old' ideologies (especially religion, which was already weak in ex-Socialist countries, save some exceptions).⁶

1.1.2 The Czech Constitution includes only organisational matters and almost completely leaves out the substance of fundamental rights. This was caused, at the time of drafting in fall 1992, by political disagreement over the content of the bill of rights. As a sort of compromise, the federal Czechoslovak Charter of Fundamental Rights was reaffirmed as part of the Czech legal system, and the Constitution referred to it as a part of the 'constitutional order'. Despite some initial doubts about the status of the Charter, the CCC applied it effectively as constitutional law. Fundamental rights dominate much of the workload of the CCC. It is therefore fair to say that even though the Constitution itself deals strictly with organisational matters, fundamental rights protection is a central element in the broader constitutional culture of the Czech Republic.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1, 1.2.3 The Czech Constitution enacted in 1992 did not allow for any transfer of competences. At the same time, it maintained, with the exception of the limited area of international human rights treaties, the dualist model of the relation between municipal and international law.⁷ The first major article criticising the closed attitude of the Constitution to international law and its inability to give a constitutional basis for EU membership was published by Eric Stein in the United States as early as 1994.⁸ However, the domestic debate on the future status of international and EU law did not begin before the second part of the 1990s.⁹ This reflects the reality of the legal order which originally did not care about international law or the European Union. Instead, the concept of sovereignty was praised at the moment of regaining independence.

⁴ Judgment of 21 December 1993, file No. Pl. ÚS 19/93.

⁵ Müller 1991, pp. 220 et seq., claiming that post-war references to positivism served as an excuse for the entire German legal profession: 'These falsehoods and distortions of history were intended to exculpate an entire profession and to discredit the reputation of the democrats on law school faculties' (pp. 222–223).

⁶ Generally on the trend in which law replaces old ideologies including religion cf. Badinter and Breyer 2004.

In 2001 the Czech Republic enacted the so-called ‘Euro-amendment’ to its Constitution.¹⁰ Czech politicians preferred a brief and relatively simple clause about the transfer of competences, which is consistent with the generally brief and succinct style of the Czech Constitution (see Sect. 1.1.1 above). Interestingly, the original bill also included a primacy clause for EU law, but after this issue was debated in Parliament, this part of the amendment was omitted, perhaps because of its controversial nature for some Eurosceptic deputies.

The 2001 amendment served two basic functions. First, it made international law directly enforceable within the domestic legal system. Secondly, the amendment made possible the transfer of powers of the Czech state to the EU. Article 10a now reads as follows:

- (1) Certain powers of Czech Republic authorities may be transferred by treaty to an international organization or institution.
- (2) The ratification of a treaty under paragraph 1 requires the consent of Parliament, unless a constitutional act provides that such ratification requires the approval obtained in a referendum.

In addition to this provision, should a treaty mentioned in Art. 10a be ratified by Parliament, Art. 39(4) provides that Parliament must give its consent by a three-fifths majority of its deputies and three-fifths of the votes of senators present. The President cannot veto parliamentary ratification; however, the CCC, prior to the ratification of a treaty, has jurisdiction to decide on the treaty’s conformity with the Constitution (Art. 87(2), see also infra) and the President is amongst the bodies empowered to bring such an issue to the CCC.

⁷ For details, see Stein 1994 and Stein 1997, pp. 358 et seq.

⁸ See Stein 1994. Eric Stein was a Czech émigré and University of Michigan Law School Professor who took part in preparing the Czechoslovak federal constitution in the early 1990s. At the end of the day his work was not used: due to the break-up of the federation, no federal constitution was needed.

⁹ The leading figure to have influenced the Czech internationalist doctrine is Jiří Malenovský, who is currently a judge of the European Court of Justice. He was also the most important thinker behind the ‘Euro-amendment’ to the Constitution in 2001. At that time he was a judge of the Czech Constitutional Court (appointed in 2000, in 2004 he left for the CJEU).

¹⁰ The Constitutional Act No. 395/2001 Sb. (Sbírka a zákonů, the Official Gazette). The English version of the Constitution as amended in 2001 is available at <http://www.usoud.cz/en/legal-basis/>. All translations of the Constitution are taken from this website unless indicated otherwise.

1.2.2 The amendment procedure is addressed in Sect. 1.5.

1.2.4 The Constitution's EU-related provisions, despite their brevity (or because of it?) are now generally considered sufficient and there are no proposals for their further amendment.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 Article 10a, quoted supra Sect. 1.2., means that there were essentially two ways to join the EU or to ratify any other treaty which further transferred powers to the EU (such as the Lisbon Treaty). The first was parliamentary consent by a qualified majority of both chambers of Parliament (three-fifths of votes, the so-called 'constitutional supermajority'). The second was approval by referendum. It must be highlighted that the Czech Republic does not have a general law on referendums.

As I have indicated above (Sect. 1.2), the original provision on the supremacy of EU law was not enacted because of doubts among some deputies in Parliament. It was not until 8 March 2006 that the Constitutional Court explained the relation between national and EU law. The case was the Sugar Quota Case III, where the question at stake was whether the EU sugar quotas were contrary to the Constitution.¹¹ In its reasoning, the CCC summarised that the direct effect of EU law and its primacy over national (although not necessarily constitutional) law has its origins in EU law. The national Constitution and its Art. 10a are just the bridge through which EU law flows into the national legal order:

Direct applicability in national law and the applicational precedence of a regulation follow from Community law doctrine itself, as it has emerged from the case-law of the CJEU [Court of Justice of the European Union]. If membership in the EC brings with it a certain limitation on the powers of the national organs in favor of Community organs, one of the manifestations of such limitation must necessarily also be a restriction on Member States' freedom to designate the effect of Community law in their national legal orders. Art. 10a of the Constitution of the Czech Republic thus operates in both directions: it forms the normative basis for the transfer of powers and is simultaneously the provision of the Czech Constitution which opens up the national legal order to the operation of Community law, including rules relating to its effects within the legal order.

1.3.2 The CCC has interpreted sovereignty and its transfer in a flexible way. This is best visible in two judgments relating to the constitutionality of the Lisbon Treaty. In the first judgment (Lisbon I), the Court rebuffed the argument of Eurosceptic president Václav Klaus that the Lisbon Treaty would be incompatible with the sovereignty of the Czech Republic. The Court ridiculed the President's notion (that had been supported at the time by the mainstream Czech scholarship) that sovereignty implies ‘independence of the state power from any other power, both externally (in foreign relations), and in internal matters’. Strictly speaking, the Court remarked, no country, not even the United States of America, would fulfil the elements of sovereignty. Sovereignty, in the Court’s view, should not be understood only as a rigid legal concept, but also as a concept with a practical, moral, and existential dimension. In practice, national sovereignty is always limited by objective conditions, including the reactions of neighboring states. Under these conditions, national sovereignty means above all a legitimate government that has at its disposal the formal power to choose between available alternatives, and not to pursue an alternative dictated by a foreign power. In other words, for a nation-state just as for an individual within a society, practical freedom means being an actor, not an object. For a state that is in a tightly mutually interdependent system, practical sovereignty consists in being understood as a player to whom neighboring states listen, with whom they actively negotiate, and whose national interests are taken into consideration.¹²

¹¹ Judgment of 8 March 2006, file No. Pl.ÚS 50/04, Sugar Quota Case III.

The CCC also stated that the European Union had advanced by far the furthest in the concept of shared, ‘pooled’ sovereignty, and at that time already formed an entity sui generis, which is difficult to classify under classical political science categories. A key manifestation of a state’s sovereignty is the ability to continue to manage its sovereignty (or part of it), or to cede certain powers temporarily or permanently.¹³

The Court added in its second Lisbon judgment that this concept is nothing new in Czech political theory and practice. President Klaus criticised the recent and relatively frequent use, but only in ‘non-rigorous debate’, of the concept of shared sovereignty, which according to the President is ‘a contradiction in terms’. Responding to this argument, the CCC quoted from the 1995 memorandum attached to the Czech Republic’s application to join the EU, signed by the then Prime Minister Klaus:

The government of the Czech Republic has irrevocably reached the same conclusion as that reached in the past by today’s Member states, that in modern European evolution, the exchange of part of one’s own state sovereignty for a share in a supra-state sovereignty and shared responsibility is unavoidable, both for the prosperity of one’s own country, and for all of Europe.

Thus, there was no doubt, in the Court’s view, that the concept of shared sovereignty had been familiar to leading Czech politicians since the mid-1990s.¹⁴

1.3.3 The Constitution in its Art. 10a provides for the transfer of ‘certain’ powers to the European Union. From the text it is clear that it is not possible to transfer all of the powers of the Czech Republic. This cannot not happen in any way, including not by referendum.

¹² Judgment of 26 November 2008, file No. Pl. ÚS 19/08, Lisbon Treaty I, para. 107 (referring to David P. Calleo, Rethinking Europe’s Future, Princeton/Oxford, at 141, 2001).

¹³ Ibid., para. 104.

¹⁴ Judgment of 3 November 2009, file No. Pl. ÚS 29/09, Lisbon Treaty II, paras. 147–148.

The Court has faced repeated attempts by Eurosceptic politicians to demand that the Court delineate the powers which can never be delegated to the Union. The CCC has declined to do so. According to the Court, '[t]hese limits should be left primarily to the legislature to specify, because this is a priori a political question, which provides the legislature wide discretion'.¹⁵ The CCC stressed that responsibility for these political decisions cannot be transferred to the judicial branch; the Court can review them only at the point when they have actually been made on the political level.¹⁶ The Court emphasised its judicial restraint and judicial minimalism, which is perceived as a means of limiting the judicial power in favour of political processes, and which outweighs the requirement of absolute legal certainty. ... The attempt to define the term 'sovereign, unitary and democratic state governed by the rule of law, founded on respect for the rights and freedoms of the man and of citizens' once and for all (as the petitioners, supported by the president, request) would, in contrast, be seen as an expression of judicial activism, which is, incidentally, consistently criticized by certain other political figures.¹⁷

1.3.4 The CCC has never accepted the supremacy of EU law over the national constitution. Quite the contrary, following its German archetype, the Court from the very beginning has emphasised that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land. The primacy of EU law is thus conditional on the fact that EU law must not be in conflict with the basic requirements of the national constitution:

There is no doubt that, as a result of the Czech Republic's accession to the EU, a fundamental change occurred within the Czech legal order, as at that moment the Czech Republic took over into its national law the entire mass of European law. [This necessarily must influence the meaning of the entire existing legal order], constitutional principles and maxims included, naturally on the condition that the factors which influence the national legal environment are not, in and of themselves, in conflict with the principle of the democratic law-based state or that the interpretation of these factors may not lead to a threat to the democratic law-based state. Such a shift would come into conflict with [the unchangeable core of the Constitution]. The current standard within the European Union for the protection of fundamental rights cannot give rise to the assumption that this standard ... is of a lower quality than the protection accorded in the Czech Republic, or that the standard of protection markedly diverges from the standard up till now provided in the domestic setting by the Constitutional Court.¹⁸

The CCC emphasised that the national constitution shall be interpreted in conformity with the Czech Republic's obligations resulting from its membership in the European Union. This EU friendly interpretation maxim (itself a constitutional principle) is limited by the range of interpretations possible under the Constitution. Therefore, it shall not be used to amend any express constitutional provision, since '[i]f the national methodology for the interpretation of constitutional law does not

¹⁵ Lisbon Treaty I, supra n. 12, para. 109.

¹⁶ Lisbon Treaty II, supra n. 14, para. 111.

¹⁷ Ibid., para. 113.

¹⁸ Sugar Quotas III, supra n. 11.

enable a relevant norm to be interpreted in harmony with European Law, it is solely within the Constituent Assembly's prerogative to amend the Constitution'.¹⁹

Therefore, EU friendly interpretation is only a soft metarule. It is to be applied if more than one interpretation is possible, with both or all of them being plausible interpretative outcomes of the constitutional text:

A constitutional principle can be derived from Article 1 para. 2 of the Constitution, in conjunction with the principle of cooperation laid down in Art. 10 of the EC Treaty, according to which domestic legal enactments, including the constitution, should be interpreted in conformity with the principles of European integration and the cooperation between Community and Member State organs. If the Constitution, of which the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Basic Freedoms forms a part, can be interpreted in several manners, only certain of which lead to the attainment of an obligation which the Czech Republic undertook in connection with its membership in the EU, then an interpretation must be selected which supports the carrying out of that obligation, and not an interpretation which precludes it.²⁰

This line of case law was summarised in the second judgment on the Lisbon Treaty. The Court emphasised that

- it generally recognises the functionality of the EU institutional framework to ensure review of the scope of exercise of transferred powers; however, its position may change in the future if it appears that this framework is demonstrably non-functional;
- in terms of the constitutional order of the Czech Republic—and within it especially in view of the essential core of the Constitution—what is important is not only the actual text and content of the Treaty of Lisbon, but also its future concrete application; and finally, that
- the CCC too will (may) – although in view of the foregoing principles – function as an ultima ratio and may review whether any act by Union bodies has exceeded the powers that the Czech Republic transferred to the European Union pursuant to Art. 10a of the Constitution. However, the CCC assumes that such a situation can occur only in quite exceptional cases; these could include, in particular, abandoning the identity of values and, as already cited, exceeding of the scope of conferred competences.²¹

Ironically, it soon became clear that a situation where the CCC would intervene and proclaim EU law ultra vires would not necessarily be 'quite exceptional'. From the very beginning one might have wondered what really limits the application of EU law in the Czech Republic. Is it really only a clash with the super-core of the Constitution, those unalterable basic principles that are beyond the power of the legislature? Or is it also the case where the CCC simply reaches a different opinion than the CJEU? I have consistently warned that the overall rhetoric of the CCC,

¹⁹ Judgment of 3 May 2006, file No. Pl. ÚS 66/04, European Arrest Warrant, paras. 79–83 (translation on the Court's website revised by the author).

²⁰ Ibid., para. 61.

²¹ Lisbon Treaty II, supra n. 14, para. 150, summarising Lisbon Treaty I, supra n. 12, partly quoting its para. 120.

despite having its basis in German case law, tends to the latter solution rather than to the former.²²

This was dramatically confirmed in early 2012 when the CCC for the first time in European history declared a judgment of the CJEU ultra vires.²³ The CCC did not struggle to explain why the CJEU was in conflict with the basic core of the Constitution. Rather, it simply remarked that the CJEU judgment was in conflict with the established case law of the CCC. It then condemned the CJEU for ignoring European history.²⁴ Thus it seems that, using the wording of the CCC itself, ‘a situation in which an act by a European body exceeded the powers that the Czech Republic transferred to the European Union under Art. 10a of the Constitution’ and therefore being beyond the scope of the transferred powers (ultra vires) could occur anytime the CCC does not like the result of a CJEU judgment. The noble idea of the CCC protecting the national constitution against undue encroachments by EU law turned into the sad reality of the CCC protecting the ‘judicial egos’ of the respective national constitutional justices.²⁵

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The Constitution is very brief with regard to the rules that govern the participation of the national parliament in the EU decision-making processes. Article 10b merely provides that the Government shall inform the Parliament, regularly and in advance, on issues connected to obligations resulting from the Czech Republic’s membership in an international organisation or institution referred to in Art. 10a para. 1. The chambers of Parliament shall give their views on prepared decisions of such international organisation or institution in the manner laid down in their rules of procedure.

The details of parliamentary participation are included in the rules of proceedings of both chambers of Parliament. Here I will give as an example the rules of proceedings of the lower chamber, the Assembly of Deputies.²⁶ The rules of proceedings state that the Government shall submit draft acts of the EU to the ²³ At stake was Case C-399/09 Landtová [2011] ECR I-05573.

²² See Kühn 2004.

²⁴ Judgment of 31 January 2012, file No. Pl. ÚS 5/12, Slovak Pensions XVII ('Failure to distinguish the legal relationships arising from the dissolution of a state with a uniform social security system from the legal relationships arising for social security from the free movement of persons in the European Communities, or the European Union, is a failure to respect European history, it is comparing things that are not comparable.').

²⁵ The judgment received considerable attention in European scholarship. Cf. e.g. Zbíral 2012; Komárek 2012; Bobek 2014; Kühn 2016 (papers written in English by Czech scholars of EU law who are critical of the CCC's judgment). Conversely, on the Czech national level the judgment and its Europe-wide impact was largely ignored, save by a few EU law scholars.

²⁶ Law No. 90/1995, as amended by law No. 282/2004.

Assembly via the Committee for European Affairs. The Government shall submit its preliminary opinion on the draft acts. The Government shall submit legal acts of the EU to the Assembly at the same time they are submitted to the Council of the EU. The Government shall also submit other acts and documents of the EU if it so decides or if requested by the Assembly or its bodies (Art. 109a).

Members of the Government might and, if requested by the Committee, must take part in the Committee's deliberation. With the exception of acts or other documents of considerable urgency, the Government shall not adopt its final opinion in the Council deliberations until the procedure in the Chamber pursuant to the preceding paragraphs has been completed (Art. 109b).

In fact, parliamentary control is mostly formal. The sessions of the parliamentary committee are poorly attended, and the deputies generally prefer to sit in the different committees that deal with domestic issues. To many politicians, EU issues seem too difficult and detached from daily political life.

1.4.2 The Czech Constitution is hostile to referendums. It highlights that the people shall exercise their power through the legislative, executive and judicial branches (Art. 2 para. 1) while it does not provide for any referendums. This notion reflects the rightist and conservative political majority of the 1990s which was very cautious with respect to direct democracy. As a result of compromise, the Constitution just briefly mentions the possibility of enacting a new constitutional law on referendums in Art. 2 para. 2. This effectively means that regulation of the issue of referendums was left for a constitutional law with a required supermajority in both chambers of Parliament. Consequently, within the first twenty years of Czech democracy no general law on referendums has ever been enacted.

Article 10a, already discussed above (see Sect. 1.3.1), provides that the ratification of a treaty which transfers certain powers to an international organisation or an institution requires the consent of Parliament, unless a constitutional act provides that such ratification requires that the approval be obtained in a referendum. This effectively means that it would be necessary to enact a special constitutional law even to hold a referendum relating to the transfer of powers to the EU. To put it differently, without a new constitutional act on referendums, no referendum can take place.

So far, the only state-wide referendum that has ever taken place in the Czech Republic was the referendum on EU Accession in 2003, based on a special constitutional act enacted only for this specific purpose.²⁷ The law required the approval of the majority of the participants in the referendum. The referendum took place on 13 and 14 June 2003, with a turnout of 55% of eligible voters, of whom 77.3% voted in favour of accession, and 22.7% voted against.

There has been some debate concerning referendums on some other EU treaties, most notably on the Lisbon Treaty. However, no agreement on the proper mode of ratification of the treaties amending EU primary law has ever been reached. As early as in May 2004, former Czech President Václav Havel criticised the idea of a referendum on such a complex document as the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe, which was in his opinion unsuitable for wide public discourse.²⁸ Yet some politicians preferred a referendum on the Treaty, and there were several unsuccessful bills submitted to Parliament to enact either a law on general referendums or on a special referendum on the Constitutional Treaty.

²⁷ No. 515/2002 Sb.

Legal scholarship mostly opposed this referendum. One of the most influential Czech figures in this field, CJEU judge Jiří Malenovský, reasoned that under the Czech Constitution the only constitutional means of ratifying the Constitutional Treaty would be through parliamentary approval. His argument was that the Treaty was more an authoritative restatement of EU law than a novel document. Taking into account the then recent referendum on EU accession, the proposed referendum was ‘highly problematic from the point of view of its constitutionality’,²⁹ while a consultative referendum would be a ‘possible way of reconciliation of constitutional requirements with political demand’.³⁰

After the failure of the Constitutional Treaty in France and the Netherlands in 2005, the Czech debate on the ratification slowly died away. The Lisbon Treaty was subsequently ratified without a referendum, based on the approval of a constitutional supermajority in Parliament. The former opposition party, the Civic Democrats (ODS), who in the meanwhile became the senior coalition party of a new centre-right Government, were not excited about the Lisbon Treaty. They rather emphasised that it was a result of a rational compromise. Most of the Civic Democrats did not insist on a referendum. They emphasised that unlike the Constitutional Treaty (which they opposed), the most important difference in the Lisbon Treaty was that it lacked any constitutional symbols and, as such, did not aspire to create ‘a European superstate’.³¹ Upon signing the Lisbon Treaty on behalf of the Czech Republic, Czech Premier Topolanek (ODS) said that he personally would prefer ratification by Parliament. The Treaty, in his opinion, did not interfere with the Constitution, thus no referendum was needed. Some of his party members were more reserved, however, as they emphasised that the issue of constitutionality of the Treaty must be resolved by the Constitutional Court.³² The only political party that called for a referendum was thus the Czech Communist Party.

To summarise, it is fair to say that the role of referendums with respect to the EU has been close to zero, if we set aside the initial vote on EU accession.

²⁸ See Kramer, A. (2004, May 15), Nahrážkové vlastenectví hospodských fanoušků je mi cizí, říká Václav Havel (I do not share the fake patriotism of our pub guys, Václav Havel says). Právo. http://www.vaclavhavel.cz/showtrans.php?cat=rozhovory&val=1557_rozhovory.html&typ=HTML.

²⁹ See Malenovský 2005, p. 350.

³⁰ Ibid., p. 357 (translation by the author).

³¹ Cf. the article by Deputy Premier of the Czech Government responsible for European matters: Vondra, A. (2007, October 19) Evropský sňatek z rozumu (European marriage out of reason). Hospodářské noviny. <http://archiv.ihned.cz/c1-22254960-evropsky-snatek-z-rozumu>.

³² See the opinion of the leadership of ODS of 20 October 2007, available at www.euroskop.cz.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

As I have already indicated, the Constitution has only one EU amendment from 2003, which is very limited in its scope. EU matters are regulated by only two very short articles (Art. 10a and 10b, already discussed above). The reason for this brevity is above all the Czech constitutional culture. The Constitution of 1992 was written in simple language, and was originally composed of 113 provisions (articles). The brevity of the Constitution is appreciated by many scholars, including this author. The EU amendment thus fits the general image of the Constitution.

In addition, it is hard to amend the Constitution: the approval of three-fifths of all deputies (120 out of 200) and three-fifths of senators present (the number of senators is 81) is required. Thus, amendments to the Constitution are rare. Interestingly, after 2003, no amendments related to EU law have been seriously debated.

Last but not least, the Eurosceptic nature of Czech politicians might have also played a role in the final version of the EU amendment. As I have already noted above, the original draft submitted by the EU-friendly Government in 2003 also included a clause on primacy of EU law. This was eventually dropped during the debate in the Assembly of Deputies, perhaps because of the distaste of many deputies over the fact that EU law has priority over national law and the ambiguity of this relation with respect to the national constitution.

I do not think that the brevity of the Constitution with respect to the EU is necessarily bad or that it would make the Constitution somewhat obsolete. First, the Czech Republic is not unique among the EU Member States. Although both France and Germany do have detailed provisions on the EU and its functioning, many other states have much shorter provisions on the same issue (Spain, Italy, etc.). In the Czech Republic, the scholarly reason for this is that the functioning of the EU is something which is to be dealt with by EU treaties, whereas the Constitution is to deal with domestic issues and procedures. It is useless for the Constitution to regulate issues regarding the functioning of the EU, its effects on national law, etc. This has also repeatedly been emphasised by the CCC.³³ From its case law, it does not appear that the short constitutional text makes the CCC powerless with respect to EU law. The CCC has always described its role as that of the guardian of the bridge through which the domestic constitution allows EU law to enter the national legal system.³⁴ Last but not least, concerns about the Constitution's brevity with respect to the EU are almost completely missing from the Czech legal discourse.

³³ See already Sugar Quotas III, supra n. 11. In debating what the basis is for direct effect and primacy of EU law, the CCC remarked that those doctrines must not be fixed in the national constitution because they are flexible on the EU level. Thus the CCC applauded the approach of the national constitution which did not ‘permanently fix doctrine as to the effects of Community law in the national legal order’. The competence to control the flexible development of these doctrines is, however, at the end of the day vested in the CCC itself. For the sake of argument, I shall add that in debating this issue, I am not entirely neutral. This has been the thesis I have supported for a long time, and the CCC openly took over my claim in Sugar Quotas III, quoting my earlier articles on this issue.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 The Czech Constitution itself deals only with the organisational matters of the state and the separation of powers. While drafting the constitutional text in the summer of 1992, the founding fathers intentionally left fundamental rights out of the Constitution. The reason was a sharp disagreement over social rights in the Constitution. As a sort of compromise, the Czechoslovak Charter of Fundamental Rights of 1991 was separately reaffirmed as being part of the Czech legal system, and the Constitution referred to it as the part of the 'constitutional order'. In reality, this technicality does not really matter, as the Charter has equal force with the Constitution itself.

The text of the Charter has been influenced by a plethora of European and international constitutional texts, most importantly by the European Convention on Human Rights. It includes all traditional fundamental and political rights as well as social rights. The general principles of law which are not expressly codified (e.g. legal certainty and legitimate expectations, non-retroactivity, proportionality) have been interpreted by the CCC as arising from the Constitution and now form an undisputed part of the Czech constitutional system. The Constitution itself declares that fundamental rights are subject to judicial protection (Art. 4) which makes constitutional rights and general principles enforceable through courts. This self-executing nature of fundamental rights seems to be an inviolable part of the Constitution, beyond the reach of the constitution-maker.³⁵

2.1.2 The issue of defining the restrictions which can be imposed on rights has been much debated by the framers of the Charter in 1990 and 1991. The result is the mixture of a general provision on limitation combined with specific restrictions included in special provisions on individual rights.

The general provision (Art. 4 of the Czech Charter) provides that limitations may be placed upon fundamental rights and freedoms only by law and under the conditions prescribed in the Charter. Any statutory limitation upon fundamental rights and freedoms must apply in the same way to all cases which meet the specified conditions. When employing the provisions concerning limitations upon fundamental rights and freedoms, the essence and significance of these rights and freedoms must be preserved. Such limitations shall not be misused for purposes other than those for which they were enacted.

³⁴ Cf. especially the (in)famous Judgment of 31 January 2012, file No. Pl. ÚS 5/12, Slovak Pensions XVII, declaring the CJEU's judgment ultra vires.

³⁵ See especially Judgment of 25 June 2002, file No. Pl. ÚS 36/01 in which this has been associated with centralised review of legislation.

Certain specific fundamental rights provisions have separate limitation clauses. For instance, the right to free exercise of religion may be limited by law in the case of measures necessary in a democratic society for the protection of public safety and order, health and morals, or the rights and freedoms of others (Art. 16 of the Czech Charter). Provisions on other rights simply refer to the law as the source of limitations (like the right to confidentiality of correspondence in Art. 13 of the Czech Charter), which are of course subject to the general limitation set out in Art. 4. Some rights are defined as unconditional and subject to no limitations (for instance the ban on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading punishments).

2.1.3 The Constitution is based on the principle of the rule of law (in Czech právní stát, a concept identical to Rechtsstaat). Indeed, this is the very first principle of the Constitution, mentioned already in Art. 1. The CCC has been framing this principle from the very beginning. Already in its first, ‘foundational’ judgment which dealt with transitional issues and the punishment of Communist crimes, the CCC emphasised that the rule of law principle was not only about formalities, but also had an important substantive and value-laden content. The substantive content was based, above all, on the requirements of human rights protection, the impossibility to derogate from fundamental rights provisions and respect for human dignity. This ‘substantive rule of law’ principle is in stark contrast with the formal conception of the rule of law prior to 1945:

Our new Constitution is not founded on neutrality with regard to values, it is not simply a mere demarcation of institutions and processes, rather it incorporates into its text also certain governing ideas, expressing the fundamental, inviolable values of a democratic society. ... Positive law does not, however, bind it merely to formal legality, rather the interpretation and application of legal norms are subordinated to their substantive purpose, law is qualified by respect for the basic enacted values of a democratic society and also measures the application of legal norms by these values. This means that even while there is continuity of ‘old laws’ there is a discontinuity in values from the ‘old regime’. This conception of the constitutional state rejects the formal-rational legitimacy of a regime and the formal law-based state. Whatever the laws of a state are, in a state which is designated as democratic and which proclaims the principle of the sovereignty of the people, no regime other than a democratic regime may be considered as legitimate.³⁶

The rule of law principle is justiciable and is often used by the Constitutional Court. In fact, in the argumentation of the Court it often serves (together with the due process clause) as a default maxim, if more concrete provisions are not applicable to the case at hand. Moreover, it also serves as a starting point for the deduction of more concrete requirements. Thus, the CCC has inferred the general ban on retroactivity, the principle of legal certainty and legitimate expectations, etc.,

³⁶ Judgment of 21 December 1993, file No. Pl. ÚS 19/93, Lawlessness of the Communist Regime.

from the rule of law principle. Non-retroactivity is part of the inviolable core of the Constitution (even though there are some limited exceptions to the strict ban on retroactivity in Czech law). According to the Court,

[t]he basic principles defining a law-based state include the principle of protecting the confidence of citizens in the law, and the related principle of the prohibition on retroactivity of legal norms. ... Thus, with true retroactivity, a lex posterior annuls (does not recognize) legal effects at a time when a lex prior was in effect, or calls forth or connects the rights and obligations of subjects with facts that were not legal facts when the lex prior was in effect.³⁷

Similarly, the notion that only published laws can be applicable is one requirement of the rule of law. Czech courts seem to be very formalistic in this regard (see for more detail Sect. 2.5 below).

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 According to the CCC's early case law, fundamental rights could be limited without an explicit constitutional provision only because of another conflicting fundamental right. As the CCC declared in its first important judgment on this issue:

Fundamental rights and basic freedoms may be restricted, despite the fact the constitutional text makes no provision therefor, only in the case that two such rights come into conflict with each other. There is a rudimentary maxim that a fundamental right or basic freedom may be restricted only for the sake of another fundamental right or basic freedom. Should the Court reach the conclusion that it is reasonable to give priority to one of the two conflicting fundamental rights, it is necessary, as a condition of the final decision, to take all possible steps to minimize the impingement of one upon the other. This principle can be inferred from Article 4 para. 4 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Basic Freedoms, (1) namely to the effect that fundamental rights and basic freedoms must be preserved not only when applying provisions on the limits of the fundamental rights and basic freedoms, but also analogously in the case that they are bounded as the result of a conflict between two rights.³⁸

Later, the CCC accepted that a compelling public interest (public good) might provide another legitimate reason for a limitation of a fundamental right without an explicit constitutional basis.³⁹

Generally, the CCC gives priority to classical fundamental rights in its case law. The weight given to conflicting protection of the public good and economic considerations seems to be much weaker. Yet I have not noticed a direct clash with CJEU case law. The closest issue was the saga regarding sugar quotas. In its earlier case law prior to EU accession, the CCC was generally willing to rule against the constitutionality of sugar quotas as provided by national legislation. After the 2004 accession, this line of case law came into conflict with the CJEU's case law, which generally approved various types of EU quotas, including sugar quotas. The CCC openly acknowledged the force of CJEU case law and overruled its previous jurisprudence:

³⁷ See Judgment of 10 September 2009, file No. Pl. ÚS 27/09, Melčák, part VI/b. (summarising its earlier case law).

³⁸ Judgment of 12 October 1994, file No. Pl. ÚS 4/94, Anonymous Witness.

³⁹ Judgment of 21 March 2002, file No. III.ÚS 256/01, Recognition.

After full consideration of the constant jurisprudence of the CJEU and the CCC's own current jurisprudence, the CCC weighed whether this case does not present facts which would justify a departure from the CCC's existing holdings. As was already mentioned above, there is no doubt that, as a result of the Czech Republic's accession to the EC, or EU, a fundamental change occurred within the Czech legal order, as at that moment the Czech Republic took over into its national law the entire mass of European law. ...

In other words, in the case currently before it, as far as concerns measures of an economic nature pursuing an aim that flows directly from the Community policy of the EC, the Constitutional Court cannot avoid the conclusions which flow directly from the case-law of the CJEU and from which a definite principle of constitutional self-restraint can be inferred. For that matter, the Constitutional Court was also aware of this point when it adopted judgment No. Pl. US 39/01, since it stated in its reasoning that, as concerns the extent of its review powers, such a conclusion may not be reached which would afterwards present an obstacle to the Czech Republic's membership in the European Union, albeit by its holding it traversed that self-restraint to a certain extent.⁴⁰

Apart from this case, the balancing of fundamental rights with economic free movement rights has not yet raised any real dilemma in the CCC's jurisprudence.⁴¹ Thus it is difficult to say whether the national courts have adjusted their balancing to match the CJEU's approach. Potentially, however, this balancing represents future potential conflict between the CCC and the CJEU.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

The relevant provisions are contained in Chapter 5 of the Czech Charter of Fundamental Rights entitled 'The Right to Judicial and other Legal Protection'. The main provisions include the following:

Article 36

(1) Everyone may assert, through the prescribed procedure, her rights before an independent and impartial court or, in specified cases, before another body.

⁴⁰ Sugar Quotas III, supra n. 11.

⁴¹ I have already discussed the case proclaiming the CJEU's judgment ultra vires. See Sect. 1.3.4. But I do not view this case as balancing fundamental rights against economic freedoms. There is nothing like this mentioned in the short judgment of the CCC. Instead, the case seems to be a simple insistence by the CCC of its previous case law without even discussing conflicting economic interests stemming from EU legislation relating to EU-wide pensions.

(2) Unless a law provides otherwise, a person who claims that her rights were curtailed by a decision of a public administrative authority may turn to a court for review of the legality of that decision. However, judicial review of decisions affecting the fundamental rights and freedoms listed in this Charter may not be removed from the jurisdiction of courts.

(3) Everybody is entitled to compensation for damage caused her by an unlawful decision of a court, other State bodies, or public administrative authorities, or as the result of an incorrect official procedure.

...

Article 37

...

(2) In proceedings before courts, other State bodies, or public administrative authorities, everyone shall have the right to legal assistance from the very beginning of such proceedings.

...

(4) Anyone who declares that she does not speak the language in which a proceeding is being conducted has the right to the services of an interpreter.

Article 38

(1) No one may be removed from the jurisdiction of her lawful judge. The jurisdiction of courts and the competence of judges shall be provided for by law.

(2) Everyone has the right to have her case considered in public, without unnecessary delay, and in her presence, as well as to express her opinion on all of the admitted evidence. The public may be excluded only in cases specified by law.

Article 39

Only a law may designate which acts constitute a crime and what penalties, or other detriments to rights or property, may be imposed for committing them.

Article 40

(1) Only a court may decide on guilt and on the punishment for criminal offences.

(2) A person against whom a criminal proceeding has been brought shall be considered innocent until her guilt is declared in a court's final judgment of conviction.

(3) The accused has the right to be given the time and opportunity to prepare a defence and to be able to defend herself, either pro se or with the assistance of counsel. If she fails to choose counsel even though the law requires her to have one, she shall be appointed counsel by the court. The law shall set down the cases in which the accused is entitled to counsel free of charge.

...

(5) No one may be criminally prosecuted for an act for which she has already been finally convicted or acquitted. This rule shall not preclude the application, in conformity with law, of extraordinary procedures of legal redress.

(6) The question whether an act is punishable or not shall be considered, and penalties shall be imposed, in accordance with the law in effect at the time the act was committed. A subsequent law shall be applied if it is more favourable for the offender.

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 Various issues relating to the constitutionality of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) have been raised in the Czech Republic. However, as far as I know, there have been no concerns with regard to the presumption of innocence. I think this is because persons subject to any criminal proceeding have some disadvantages compared with people who are not under investigation or prosecution. The presumption of innocence does not go so far as to require that nothing uncomfortable can happen to anyone unless there is a guilty verdict. Surrender of a person suspected of a crime to a requesting country can therefore hardly collide with this principle. Moreover, those who would argue otherwise are trapped in a circular argument: a person cannot be treated to his disadvantage unless some formal decision has been made, but in fact a formal decision supported by some hard facts has been made by the requesting country.

2.3.1.2 It is hard to say what the prevailing practice for judges is with respect to the EAW. In some cases they indeed just rubber-stamp extradition requests. On the other hand, a suspect is granted procedural rights to defend himself or herself against surrender. In reality, it depends on the suspect to what extent he or she is willing to fight surrender or whether, in contrast, the person agrees to be surrendered to the requesting state (in which case a shortened procedure according to Art. 413 of the Code of Criminal Procedure follows).

An assessment of how the courts handle specific cases can be made based on the statistics. For instance, in 2006 the Czech Republic received 99 EAW requests and surrendered 49 persons. Of these 49, 34 persons agreed to the surrender and 15 disagreed. In 2007, there were 176 EAW requests and 108 persons were surrendered. Of those surrendered, 81 agreed to the procedure. That the courts do not just rubber-stamp requests is illustrated by the fact that in 2006 and 2007, Czech courts refused to surrender 11 persons.⁴²

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 Unlike the presumption of innocence, abolition of the rule of double criminality caused a lot of debate in the Czech Republic. Lifting the double criminality rule seems after all to be one of the most controversial novelties introduced by the EAW Framework Decision.⁴³ When Eurosceptic deputies challenged the national implementation of the EAW Framework Decision, they also criticised the fact that the law derogated from the double criminality rule and thus endangered the nullum crimen sine lege principle. The CCC rejected their argument while trying to interpret EU law in a manner which would be consistent with the Constitution. At the same time, the elimination of the double criminality requirement was overcome by ostensible formalism:

⁴² See the statistics of the Ministry of Justice available at www.justice.cz.

⁴³ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1, Art. 2(2), covering a very broad list of vaguely named offences which are not subject to double criminality including ‘computer-related crimes’ and ‘racism and xenophobia’. For instance, Tomuschat calls this a ‘list of horrors’. See Tomuschat 2006, p. 218. Personally, I find the explanation of Advocate General Colomer far from satisfactory on this point. See the Opinion of Advocate General Colomer of 12

The enumeration of criminal offences which do not require dual criminality is not given due to the fact that it would otherwise be presumed that some of these categories of conduct do not qualify as criminal offences in one or more of the Member States; rather the exact opposite, that it is conduct which, in view of the values shared by the EU Member States, is criminal in all of them. The reason for enumerating them in this fashion is to speed up the execution of European Arrest Warrants, as the proceeding for ascertaining the criminality of such acts under Czech law has been dropped. In addition, in adopting this Framework Decision each EU Member State expressed its agreement that all criminal conduct coming within the categories defined in this way will also be criminally prosecuted.⁴⁴

At first glance, the Czech Constitutional Court's premises relating to the degree of harmonisation of substantive criminal law are plainly wrong⁴⁵ and even contrary to the opinion of the Court of Justice.⁴⁶ Another reading of that provision might be, however, that this claim is not descriptive but rather normative. This reading is confirmed by the Czech Constitutional Court's concession 'that, under quite exceptional circumstances', the application of the EAW might be in conflict with the Czech Constitution, especially if the offence 'would qualify as a criminal act under the law of the requesting state, but would not qualify as such under Czech criminal law, and perhaps would even enjoy constitutional protection in the Czech Republic (e.g. within the framework of the constitutional protection of free expression)'. Then the arrest warrant would not be executed.⁴⁷

This conclusion, however, raises more questions than it settles. What would happen, for instance, if a person who was arrested for a crime regarding which dual criminality shall not be verified were to argue that the crime did not have a Czech equivalent? The CCC does not explicitly say. I suppose that such a case would force the Czech authorities to check double criminality; its absence would perhaps

September 2006 in Case C-303/05 Advocaten voor de Wereld [2007] ECR I-03633, paras. 100–107. The Court in the same case touched upon the issue in its judgment even less satisfactorily.

⁴⁴ Czech European Arrest Warrant case, supra n. 19, para. 103 (emphasis added).

⁴⁵ See for a very different logic the European Arrest Warrant Act case of the Federal Constitutional Court of Germany, BVerfG, 2 BvR 2236/04 – vom 18.07.2005, Rn. (1–203), available at <http://www.bverfg.de/entscheidungen/rs200507182bvr223604.html>, para. 77, emphasising that 'the cooperation that is put into practice in the 'Third Pillar' of the European Union in the shape of limited mutual recognition, which does not provide for a general harmonisation of the Member States' systems of criminal law, is a way of preserving national identity and statehood in a single European judicial area' (emphasis added).

⁴⁶ Cf. C-303/05 Advocaten voor de Wereld, supra n. 43, para. 52: 'The Framework Decision does not seek to harmonise the criminal offences in question in respect of their constituent elements or of the penalties which they attract.'

⁴⁷ The Czech European Arrest Warrant case, supra n. 19, para. 114.

establish a ground for refusal to surrender because of conflict with the Constitution. Whether this would only be the case vis-à-vis distance offences (i.e. acts committed within Czech territory but investigated abroad), as the Court seems to point at, or also with regard to some offences committed abroad, remains to be seen (e.g. an improbable case where Ireland would seek the surrender of a Czech woman who underwent an abortion in Ireland, for the crime of homicide).

The problem of double criminality was in some countries at least partly solved by the legislature (for instance in Germany as instructed by the German Constitutional Court).⁴⁸ In contrast, the CCC attempted to solve this problem but its decision stopped short of any clear statement. However, it seems fair to say that the principle of nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege is granted the same level of protection as before, at least for actions committed on the territory of the Czech Republic, thanks to the judgment of the CCC. The CCC clearly indicated that in actions committed at home and investigated elsewhere execution of an EAW might be refused on constitutional grounds.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 Foreign in absentia criminal judgments could hardly raise constitutional issues in the Czech Republic, as the Czech Code of Criminal Procedure recognises this type of judgment as well. Article 302 et seq. of the Code gives prosecutors the power to initiate proceedings against an accused person as a fugitive if he or she avoids criminal proceedings by being abroad or in hiding. In such cases the accused person must be represented by an attorney. If the person appears before the Czech authorities after the final guilty verdict has been made, the person has the right to a new trial (which will take place if the person requests it). A new trial will also be granted if an international treaty so requires.

However, if a person who is about to be surrendered were to argue that he was sentenced in absentia in the requesting country and no new trial could be granted there, this would very likely provide a good ground for a constitutional complaint. This is even more likely if one considers the willingness of the CCC to protect (through envisioned judicial review of the constitutionality of individual arrest warrants) both the trust of Czech citizens in Czech law and the trust and legal certainty of ‘other persons, authorized to stay within the territory of the Czech Republic’.⁴⁹

⁴⁸ The German Federal Constitutional Court addressed the problem of lifting the double criminality rule extensively. The legislature shall ensure that ‘[c]harges of criminal acts with such a significant domestic connecting factor are, in principle, to be investigated in the domestic territory by German investigation authorities if those suspected of the criminal act are German citizens’. The German European Arrest Warrant case, supra n. 45, para. 85.

⁴⁹ The Czech European Arrest Warrant, supra n. 19, para. 113. One cannot but compare this part to a dissenting opinion by Justice Lübbe-Wolff in the corresponding German case, especially part

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 The Czech Republic does not provide any assistance beyond standard consular assistance to its surrendered or extradited citizens or residents. On the other hand, Czech law is rather generous towards persons who do not speak Czech in the course of criminal proceedings (the right to an interpreter, the right to receive a translation of the court's reasoning, the right to an attorney for persons of low income, etc.). It is very likely that the Czech legal system simply expects the same to be provided to persons surrendered under an EAW.

I am not aware of any NGOs that provide assistance to persons extradited from the Czech Republic. In fact, the number of nationals surrendered pursuant to an EAW (outside the scope of an EAW, no national can be extradited) is very low.

I do not think that any state assistance to residents who are involved in trials abroad is needed. Instead, I would rather prefer an increase in the common procedural rights for foreigners in EU Member States.

2.3.4.2 Compensation for persons who have been tried and subsequently found innocent has been a sensitive issue in many high-profile domestic criminal proceedings. In contrast, with respect to the EAW, the Czech authorities have indicated that so far no such claims have been made.⁵⁰

Media coverage of EAW application is light. According to what I have read in both the printed and online media, most reports just consist of information about someone surrendered based on an EAW. As such, these surrenders are ‘success stories’. I have never read anything about someone who was surrendered and later acquitted.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1–2.3.5.3 With regard to mutual recognition of civil judgments, the Czech Constitutional Court has already held that their recognition is not automatic. In fact, fulfilment of the basic constitutional principles of fair trial by a foreign court is indispensable for the recognition of its judgment according to Council Regulation 44/2001.⁵¹ In one case the complainant, a Czech corporation, lost a lawsuit in Italy. The Italian court decided that the Czech corporation must pay 16,686 EUR plus interest. The Italian judgment was recognised by the Czech courts, despite the fact that the complainant argued that the Italian court ignored the corporation's motions, did not order hearings and decided the case without allowing the Czech party to be heard. Although the Czech civil court rebuffed these arguments, the CCC disagreed. It highlighted:

1.(a) of her dissenting opinion, where the said Justice criticised the majority for protecting German nationals only and ignoring the legitimate expectations of others.

⁵⁰ See for instance <http://register.consilium.europa.eu/doc/srv?l=CS&f=ST%2015691%202008%20REV%202>.

⁵¹ Council Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters, [2001] OJ L12/1.

Insisting on the protection of fundamental rights is without any question one of the very basic principles of the Czech legal order. In other words, recognition of a decision which does not comply with human rights protection would be in conflict with the public order of the Czech Republic and at the end of the day with the constitutional order of the Czech Republic.⁵²

The CCC therefore quashed the judgment of the civil court and ordered the civil court to consider the reasons claimed by the complainant for not recognising the Italian judgment. Although the judgment of the CCC might seem to be a principled defence of fundamental rights on the EU level, it opens Pandora's box, in my opinion. It effectively pushes the Czech civil courts into scrutinising the lawfulness of the procedure before the foreign court. I am wondering on what basis and how a Czech court could review the procedural steps of the court of another EU Member State.

In the same way, but much more vigorously, the CCC emphasised the role of law courts in protecting nationals and others against (however it would be unlikely, in the view of the CCC) abuse of the EAW. The CCC was in a different position than the German Constitutional Court because the Czech act did not exclude judicial review of the decision to surrender. The CCC founded the ultimate justification of its decision on this fact and held that although the implementation of an EAW is not unconstitutional as such, individual arrest warrants might be unconstitutional in exceptional cases due to conflict with the Constitution,⁵³ as predicted by Art. 377 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.⁵⁴

Considering the previous examples, and because the CCC reserves the right to have the ultimate word in exceptional (unconstitutional) situations, I do not think that the principle of the rule of law is no longer fully granted the same level of protection as prior to the introduction of the mutual recognition rule in criminal law and the abolition of the exequatur in civil and commercial matters. Moreover, in my view, removing old-fashioned obstacles in criminal co-operation between states serves justice better than did the previous lengthy procedures.

⁵² Judgment of 25 April 2006, file No. I. ÚS 709/05.

⁵³ Paragraph 115 of the Czech European Arrest Warrant case, supra n. 19, 'Even though the contested provisions ... might be applied in an unconstitutional manner, such a hypothetical and unlikely situation does not provide grounds for their annulment. [The Court's case law says] that "theoretically every provision of a legal enactment can naturally be applied incorrectly, hence even in conflict with constitutional acts, which in and of itself does not constitute grounds for the annulment of a provision which can conceivably be incorrectly applied". [The purpose of this proceeding] is not, however, to resolve every single hypothetical situation which has not as yet come to pass, even though it may occur at some point [because] it would ... supplant the protection of fundamental rights which, in the nature of things, the ordinary ... courts must also provide.'

⁵⁴ According to Art. 377 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the request of a foreign state's organ may not be granted if, inter alia, this would constitute a violation of the Constitution of the Czech Republic.

2.3.5.4 I would personally disagree with any legal amendment which would make surrender or recognition of civil judgments more difficult. In my opinion, this very nature of the EU with its free movement of people, goods, services and capital requires that the old notions of state supremacy and difficult cross-border legal arrangements must be abandoned in favour of more efficient and speedy procedures. Moreover, similar ideas have been put forward by the CCC as well. The Court rightly reasoned that if one enjoys EU rights of movement, the exercise of those rights must also entail some responsibilities.⁵⁵ This idea is in my view also fully applicable to civil law. If one does not travel or does not engage in business with a foreign partner, one need not worry about the EAW or foreign civil judgments being imposed.

Last but not least, we must not forget the rights of victims. Criminal proceedings are after all not only about the protection of accused persons. The legitimate rights and interests of victims should also be considered.⁵⁶

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The EU Data Retention Directive 2006/24⁵⁷ or, to put it better, its national implementation, has seen a constitutional challenge also in the Czech Republic. The

⁵⁵ Cf. Czech European Arrest Warrant case, supra n. 19, paras. 70–71:

‘70. It cannot be overlooked that the current period is connected with an extraordinarily high mobility of people, ever-increasing international cooperation and growing confidence among the democratic states of the EU, which places new demands on the arrangements for extradition within the framework of the Union. A qualitatively new situation exists in the EU. Citizens of the Member States enjoy, in addition to the rights arising from citizenship in their own state, also rights arising from EU citizenship, which guarantees, among other things, free movement within the province of the entire Union. ...’

71. If Czech citizens enjoy certain advantages, connected with the status of EU citizenship, then it is naturally in this context that a certain degree of responsibility must be accepted along with these advantages. The investigation and suppression of criminality which takes place in the European area, cannot be successfully accomplished within the framework of individual Member States, but requires extensive international cooperation. ...’

⁵⁶ Cf. Czech European Arrest Warrant case, supra n. 19, para. 96: ‘It can generally be said that, in view of the evidence that will be found in the state where the criminal act occurred, a criminal proceeding there will be quicker, more effective and, at the same time, more reliable and just both for the defendant and for any victim of the criminal act.’

⁵⁷ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

action was brought to the Constitutional Court by a group of deputies of the lower chamber. They argued that the retention of data on communication constitutes interference with the private life of persons whose data are stored, and that such data, moreover, are vulnerable to potential abuse or misuse.

The CCC based its lengthy and somewhat chaotic reasoning mostly on the previous judgment of its German counterpart.⁵⁸ First, the CCC rejected the option of making a preliminary reference to the Court of Justice. In the CCC's view, the content of the Data Retention Directive provided the Czech Republic with sufficient room to implement it in conformity with the constitutional order, since its individual provisions in fact only define the obligation to retain data. For the purposes of implementation, the objective defined by the Directive must be met, but Czech law must also follow the domestic constitution.⁵⁹ To put it differently, the problem of constitutionality lay in the national implementation, not within the Directive itself.

With regard to the merits of the case, the CCC first criticised the domestic implementation for its vagueness⁶⁰ including the vaguely defined purpose for which traffic and location data are to be provided to the competent authorities (the limitation of privacy shall not be made through vague and unclear provisions).⁶¹ The Court criticised the vague law for providing incentive to use requests for data even in less serious crimes. For instance, in 2008, the total number of criminal offences recorded on the territory of the Czech Republic amounted to 343,799, while at the same time the number of requests to provide traffic and location data made by the competent public authorities reached 131,560.⁶² The CCC concluded:

The legal regulation contested by the applicant fails to define sufficiently, or fails to define at all, unambiguous and detailed rules containing minimum requirements concerning the security of the retained data, in particular, taking the form of restricting third-party access, the procedure of maintaining data integrity and credibility, or the removal procedure. Furthermore, the contested regulation does not provide individuals with sufficient guarantees against the risk of data abuse and arbitrariness. ... the need to have such guarantees available is becoming even more important to the individual owing to the current enormous and fast-moving development and occurrence of new and more complex information technologies, systems and communication tools, which unavoidably results in the borders between private and public space being blurred to the benefit of the public sphere, since in the virtual environment of information technologies and electronic communications (in the so-called cyberspace), every single minute, especially owing to the development of the Internet and mobile communication, thousands or even millions of items of data and information are recorded, collected and virtually made accessible, interfering with the

⁵⁸ Judgment of the Federal Constitutional Court of Germany, BVerfG, 1 BvR 256/08 of 02.03.2010, Rn. (1–345), available at http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20100302_1bvr025608.html.

⁵⁹ Judgment of 22 March 2011, file No. Pl. ÚS 24/10, Data Retention in Telecommunications Services, para. 25.

⁶⁰ Ibid., para. 46.

⁶¹ Ibid., paras. 47–48.

⁶² Ibid., para. 49.

private (personality) sphere of the individual, yet if asked, they would probably be reluctant to knowingly let someone else in.⁶³

What is more interesting, in an obiter dictum the CCC expressed its doubt that the very existence of the instrument of global and preventive retention of location and traffic data on almost all electronic communications is justified. It referred to similar criticism in other European countries. The CCC also doubted whether it could be an effective tool, mainly due to the existence of so-called anonymous SIM cards, which in up to 70% of cases are used to commit a criminal offence. Last but not least, the CCC doubted whether it was at all desirable that private persons (service providers) should be entitled to retain all data on the communications provided by them, as well as on customers to whom services are provided.⁶⁴

This part of the CCC's judgment, being obiter dictum only, is not, however, binding. Moreover, it has been met with severe criticism from leading Czech experts on IT law.⁶⁵ Furthermore, the public mood, supported by several high profile cases in which the retention of telecommunications data helped to find the perpetrators of violent crimes, seems to be in favour of some sort of data retention. Similarly, the police have lamented their lack of power to obtain data, which could help only criminals. Accordingly, the legislature reacted swiftly, adopting an amendment to the law which made the rules more detailed as required by the CCC. The fact that the Court of Justice later found part of the Directive to be unlawful⁶⁶ does not have a direct impact on the Czech law.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 The insistence on officially published law is one of the primary features of civil law countries.⁶⁷ Publication is the ultimate step in making law valid. It is also one of the key principles of the Czech legal order (see also Sect. 2.2 above). It was after all a Czech court which initiated the CJEU's Skoma-Lux case.⁶⁸

The CJEU's approach, according to which unpublished law is not invalid (or even null or non-existent) but rather inapplicable, is more pragmatic than the traditionalist approach. The Czech courts live well with this approach. Expanding on Skoma-Lux further, the Supreme Administrative Court held that the fact that the act of EU law had not been published at the moment when the customs tax was due had

⁶³ Ibid., para. 50.

⁶⁴ Ibid., paras. 55–57.

⁶⁵ See Polčák 2012, p. 363.

⁶⁶ Joined cases C-293/12 and Case C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

⁶⁷ Actually, such an approach would be too formalistic or even shocking for a lawyer coming from a common law tradition. See Damaška 1968.

⁶⁸ Case C-339/09 Skoma-Lux [2010] ECR I-13251.

to be taken into account by the courts ex officio, even though none of the parties made this argument (and even though it was actually clear that the complainant knew the disputed law very well).⁶⁹ This approach, however, following Skoma-Lux, shall be used in pending cases only. It is therefore not applied to cases where final decisions have been made.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 The most important cases dealing with the impact of EU law on the national standard of protection of property rights in the adjudication of the validity of EU measures or measures implementing EU law in the field of market regulation are the numerous cases dealing with various quotas imposed by EU law on national producers.

The CCC has dealt with sugar and milk quotas in a series of judgments, with the first dating back long before EU accession. Whereas some of its earlier judgments seemed to be more in favour of property rights and the right to do business unrestrained by any governmental regulation, post-accession case law has changed in direction. In March 2006 the CCC summarised the approach taken by the Court of Justice in relation to quotas, emphasising that [i]n the field of the Common Agricultural Policy, and especially as regards the setting of production quotas, there is such an extensive, consistent and long-term settled case-law of the CJEU as to, without any doubt, enable the Constitutional Court to review the key to the allocation of the production quotas from the perspective of national constitutional law interpreted in light of Community law itself, or in light of its conformity with the general principles of Community law. In that process, the Constitutional Court allows the general principles of Community law, expressed in the existing CJEU jurisprudence, to radiate through its interpretation of constitutional law.⁷⁰

The CCC approved the high margin of discretion left by the CJEU to the Union legislature; indeed, as regards the principle of proportionality, it noted that fundamental rights may be subject 'even to significant limitation'. The Court then referred to its own previous judgments in the field of production quotas. These might be considered 'excessive' because the Constitutional Court ventured out onto the relatively 'thin ice' of assessing economic quantities, which it later projected onto its constitutional law assessment. Therefore, in the case currently before it, the ⁶⁹ Judgment of the Supreme Administrative Court of 18 June 2008, file No. 1 Afs 21/2008, TV PRODUCTS CZ, s.r.o. Therefore the outcome of the case was that the customs tax was imposed on the complainant facing a complete absence of the law. Note that I was the judge-rapporteur of this case.

⁷⁰ Sugar Quotas III, supra n. 11.

CCC did not consider itself competent to examine the actual key for the allocation of quotas in the abstract. I find this new approach more persuasive than the older approach which guided the CCC to review the complex math formulas for the quota allocation.⁷¹

The Court's judgment does not, however, mean that unconstitutional situations would not be remedied by the courts. The Court 'does not rule out the possibility that the ordinary courts address, in specific cases of individual producers, the fairness of this key, assuming that specific facts will be established on the basis of which such inequality is alleged'.⁷²

This approach has been followed in many subsequent cases, whether governed by EU law or not. It effectively means that in making complex economic policies, the legislature shall have a wide margin of appreciation.⁷³ This was the case in the past as well. This was after all exactly what the CCC tried to say when it noted that its earlier judgment was in conflict with its own case law. As early as 1997, the CCC was willing to take the interpretation of EU antitrust law by the European bodies into account as a valuable source for the interpretation of national law. That is why the CCC confirmed the constitutionality of the decision of the Ministry of Finance and of the ordinary court.⁷⁴ Later, the CCC has deepened this logic. In 2001 in a case dealing with the possibility of the executive power to impose quotas on producers of milk, the senators claimed that this was a breach of the right to free enterprise. The Constitutional Court denied the claim, and argued, inter alia, that certain types of regulation are also permitted under EU law and the GATT. Further, the regulation that was subject to constitutional review was a step towards approximation with EU law. The petitioners, however, argued that European law was not applicable, because it was not binding at that time (three years before accession). The CCC rebuffed this idea. It emphasised the existence of general principles of law, common to all EU Member States. The content of these principles is formed by the common European values, and the general principles fill the abstract concept of the rule of law, including human rights. The CCC had to apply such principles, thus to follow European legal culture and its constitutional tradition: 'Primary law of the EU is not foreign law for the Constitutional Court; it

⁷¹ Ibid.

⁷² Ibid.

⁷³ Cf. for instance Judgment of 15 May 2012, file No. Pl. ÚS 17/11, Photovoltaic Power Plants. The petitioners argued that the Czech legislative measures imposing new tariffs on photovoltaic power plants harmed the power producers and violated the ban on retroactivity. The CCC rebuffed this argument, emphasising that 'the choice of statutory provisions aimed at limiting state support for the production of solar energy is in the hands of the legislature, provided the guarantees are preserved. The principle of legal certainty cannot be considered to be a requirement for an absolute absence of change in the legislative framework; that is also subject to other social-economic changes and demands on the stability of the state budget' (para. 85). On the other hand, the CCC left open the possibility for finding unconstitutionalities in real life cases based on the facts of the respective producers.

⁷⁴ Judgment of 29 May 1997, file No. III. ÚS 31/97, Škoda Auto.

radiates, mainly as the general principles of European law, into the Court's adjudication.⁷⁵

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

As the Czech Republic has not joined the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism, this Treaty has been an issue for political clashes rather than a subject of legal debate in the Czech Republic.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 There are no statistics which would indicate the number of cases in the Czech Republic in which a party has requested a preliminary ruling with regard to the validity of an EU measure. Neither the Ministry of Justice nor the judiciary collect data on this. It is my rough estimate, based on my judicial practice, that such requests are very rare. Personally, I have never seen any challenge to an EU measure before the Czech courts. I can also surely say that there have been no preliminary references in this regard either, with the only exception being the challenge to the applicability of EU measures before they have been officially published in the Czech language.⁷⁶

2.8.2 The standard of judicial review by the EU Courts is not often debated in the Czech scholarship. If it is debated, quite often it is discussed by Eurosceptic lawyers who use misleading and basically non-legal arguments (such as xenophobic claims, etc.). I do not view the standards used by EU Courts as substantially lower than the standards used by the CCC in reviewing the Czech Constitution. Moreover, this has generally been approved by the CCC itself.⁷⁷ Likewise, the CCC gives more room for political judgments in cases dealing with laws relating to economic policy and taxation.⁷⁸

⁷⁵ Judgment of 16 October 2001, file No. Pl. ÚS 5/01, Milk Quotas.

⁷⁶ See Sect. 2.5.

⁷⁷ See Sect. 2.6.1.

⁷⁸ With some haphazard exceptions to this rule: see recently Judgment of 10 July 2014, file No. Pl. ÚS 31/13, Tax Deductions for Employed Pensioners (the CCC interfered with a technicality of tax law due to alleged age discrimination; the Court's majority was strongly criticised by the dissenting justices for its flagrant deviation from self-restraint in economic and tax law issues. I concur with the dissenting justices and find this case to be an overt deviation from the established case law.).

2.8.3 There are two basic types of judicial review in the Czech Republic. The first is the judicial review of regulatory acts of the executive branch that is performed by all courts. The second type is constitutional review of legislation by the CCC. There are no statistics on the former. With regards to the latter, the frequency of annulment of legislation varies based on the type of petitioner.

On the one hand, abstract referrals by politicians are successful in about half of the total number of petitions. Such referrals are, however, rare: between 1993 and 2013, they accounted for five cases per year on average. In the middle are referrals made by the general courts in the course of their proceedings. The general courts have initiated over 250 proceedings between 1993 and 2013, and almost half of them were decided by the Court on the merits, while the rest were rejected for procedural reasons or for being manifestly unfounded. The courts were successful in about one-fourth of their referrals. Individual petitioners are the least likely to succeed in having a law annulled for its unconstitutionality. Although individuals make hundreds of petitions to annul legislation annually (among thousands of complaints which just claim the unconstitutionality of a judicial decision), they will succeed with actual annulment very exceptionally (perhaps less than once in five hundred petitions).⁷⁹

The typical reasons for annulment of legislation are general principles and default constitutional rules, like substantive due process, the rule of law (although the latter usually combined with more specific constitutional principles), the ban on discrimination (although applied very broadly, beyond traditional reasons such as gender, race, etc.), the right to a judicial remedy (annulling various exceptions to judicial review), etc.

2.8.4 I have already indicated that if we put aside the applicability of EU measures that have not been published in the Czech language, I have never encountered any challenge to an EU measure in the Czech Republic. What is far more common, however, is disputing the national implementation of EU law. The CCC is not entirely clear as to the limits of its review of national implementation acts. Constitutional review of European laws is in principle excluded in the Czech Republic. The Sugar Quota III judgment approved the current standard within the EU for the protection of fundamental rights, which neither is ‘of a lower quality than the protection accorded in the Czech Republic’, nor does the standard ‘markedly diverge from the standard up till now provided in the domestic setting by the Constitutional Court’. The CCC emphasised that the delegation of part of the powers of national organs to the EU is conditional and ‘may persist only so long as these powers are exercised in a manner that is compatible with the preservation of the foundations of state sovereignty of the Czech Republic’, and should not threaten the basic principles of the Czech Constitution which are not subject to revision (eternal law). If these conditions were threatened, the CCC would be ‘called upon to protect constitutionalism⁸⁰ and to exercise constitutional review. The CCC thus rephrased the famous German *Solange II*⁸¹ decision.

⁷⁹ In more detail see Kühn 2013, pp. 246 et seq.

The crucial question in both the Sugar Quotas III and the EAW case was whether the Constitutional Court should review domestic laws which implement EU obligations. In Sugar Quotas III, the CCC held that if ‘the Community delegates powers back to the Member States for the purpose of implementing certain Community law acts, or it leaves certain issues unregulated’, the respective rules take the form of national law, and as such they must be in conformity with both EU law and the Czech Constitution. The domestic law (whether or not EU law gives the national legislature any discretion) is thus subject to full constitutional review, even though the maxim of European conform interpretation applies.⁸²

The EAW case does not seem to fit easily into this line of thought. While Sugar Quotas III relied on full (though Euro-friendly) constitutional review of domestic acts implementing EU law, a few weeks later in the EAW case, the Court said:

In areas where Community law applies exclusively, it is supreme, so that it cannot be contested by means of national law referential criteria, not even on the constitutional level. According to this doctrine the Constitutional Court would have no competence to decide on the constitutionality of a European Law norm, not even in the case that they are contained in legal enactments of the Czech Republic. Its competence to adjudicate the constitutionality of Czech norms is, thus, restricted in the same respect. ... [W]here the delegation of authority leaves the member states no room for discretion ... the doctrine of primacy of Community law in principle does not permit the Constitutional Court to review such Czech norm in terms of its conformity with the constitutional order of the Czech Republic, naturally with the exception [of the alleged conflict with the very core of the Constitution]⁸³ [emphasis added].

Interestingly, this opinion was criticised as an unjustified ‘shift’ by the Justice-Rapporteur of the Sugar Quota III judgment, who dissented in the EAW case.⁸⁴ This doctrinal difference, however, did not make a significant difference in practice, because the CCC, despite its alleged self-restraint, did engage in a complete review of the implementing law. The CCC preached self-restraint (claimed that it would review the domestic implementation only with respect to conflicts with the constitutional core), but in reality reviewed the domestic implementation of EU law completely. In my opinion, the only way to explain the difference between what the CCC said and what it really did is to presume that all arguments made by the petitioners were based on the ‘eternal’ constitutional core, which is why all of them were used in constitutional review.⁸⁵

⁸⁰ Sugar Quotas III, supra n. 11, part VI.B.

⁸¹ 19 BVerfGE 73, 339 [1986] (Solange II).

⁸² Ibid., VI.A.

⁸³ Czech European Arrest Warrant case, supra n. 19, paras. 52 and 54 (emphasis added).

⁸⁴ See the dissenting opinion of Justice Wagnerová in the Czech European Arrest Warrant case, supra n. 19.

⁸⁵ See Czech European Arrest Warrant case, supra n. 19, para. 53, last sentence: ‘In this matter, however, the petitioners asserted that, by adopting the European Arrest Warrant, just such a

In any case, notwithstanding some doctrinal inconsistencies in its case law, in practice the CCC has always reviewed the national implementation of EU law. I would therefore not agree that national implementing laws are shielded against review by the CCC only because they are ‘European’ in nature. What is more troublesome is the question of whether the CCC is obliged to make a preliminary reference in such situations. The CCC is very reluctant to accept its duty to make a reference, even though this might be useful in cases where the CCC indirectly reviews EU law.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

Not applicable.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

When making a preliminary reference, the Czech administrative courts try to take the ‘common constitutional traditions’ seriously. A typical preliminary reference highlights both the domestic constitutional rights and comparative constitutional case law on the established standards in different Member States (in so doing the courts after all take the CILFIT line of case law seriously).

For instance, in a case regarding the scope of the Personal Data Directive,⁸⁶ in making a reference requesting the definition of what constitutes processing of personal data ‘by a natural person in the course of a purely personal or household activity’, in my capacity as a judge, I emphasised the relevant domestic constitutional principles and at the same time made a number of comparisons between several EU states. I then argued that the Directive did not in fact embody any Europe-wide principle, which is why the Court of Justice should leave the residual meaning of that provision for the national courts to decide.⁸⁷ If courts wanted to proceed in this way, they would need a comparative law unit that could search and locate comparative materials. If courts were to begin to work with and quote their foreign counterparts, this would be an important step towards bringing common constitutional traditions closer to reality.

conflict with the essential attributes of a democratic law-based state has come about’ (emphasis added). In more detail see Kühn 2007.

⁸⁶ Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 October 1995 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data [1995] OJ L 281/31.

⁸⁷ The Court of Justice did not, however, follow this opinion. Case C-212/13 Ryneš [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2428.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 It is questionable to what extent the doctrine of margin of appreciation as employed by the European Court of Human Rights is workable at the EU law level. The Court of Justice faces a legal arena with almost half the number of states of its Strasbourg counterpart. Moreover, some of its areas of jurisdiction require more consistency, especially because of the freedoms protected by EU law and the danger that these freedoms might otherwise become illusory. On the other hand, it is not true that the Court of Justice leaves no space whatsoever for heightened national standards. In cases like Omega,⁸⁸ the Court of Justice has applied a sort of margin of appreciation, effectively leaving the final word to the Member States and their constitutional courts. Likewise, in some other cases, strengthening the fundamental rights of some has at the same times weakened the rights of someone else (cases of Drittirkung, the horizontal application of fundamental rights).⁸⁹

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 No public debate about the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision took place in the Czech Republic at the time of its adoption. This absence is easy to explain: the Czech Republic was not an EU member state back in 2002. Later, however, the debate became quite extensive. At the moment the EAW Framework Decision was implemented into the national legal order, Eurosceptic deputies and above all the Eurosceptic President Vaclav Klaus started a fierce and manipulative public debate. The picture of the EAW they presented was far from the real EAW. The President and some of his like-minded emulators shared their view of the horrors which the Czech Republic would face if the EAW were to come into effect. For instance, the President argued that the EAW, if applied, would mean criminalisation of all those who criticised the EU. Some authors, including me, tried to argue rationally and to explain what the EAW was really about, including some of its problems. I doubt, though, that the opposing camp was willing to listen to those arguments.⁹⁰ The debate effectively ended with the decision of the Constitutional Court which rejected all the arguments promoted by the President's camp.⁹¹

⁸⁸ Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECLI:EU:C:2004:614.

⁸⁹ In this line of argument I cautioned against a country-by-country application of fundamental rights, ignoring or weakening corresponding EU law arguments. See Kühn 2004.

No similar debate took place in relation to the national implementation of the Data Retention Directive. It is hard to say why (perhaps the topic was not that attractive for the Eurosceptics), but save for a few specialists in privacy law, no one debated either this directive or its implementation.⁹²

2.12.2 Reference to the domestic debate with regards to the implementation of EU law reminds me of the prolonged debates surrounding the EU anti-discrimination directives in the Czech Republic. It would be too risky to use extensive political debate as an excuse for non-implementation. The Czech debate about anti-discrimination, for instance, was effectively caused by the disagreement among a substantial portion of the population, including the political elite, with the very idea of non-discrimination and equality before the law. At the end of the day, the EU discrimination directives were implemented because of the threat of infringement proceedings. It is true that the disadvantage of this approach is the fact the values surrounding equality and non-discrimination have not really been internalised in the Czech Republic and the respective laws are rarely applied in practice. The alternative, however, would be to have no law at all.

2.12.3 In my opinion, if important constitutional issues have been identified by a constitutional court in an EU-related case, the court should make a preliminary reference to the Court of Justice. I understand that many constitutional tribunals hesitate to openly accept their duty to make a reference, perhaps because they feel that they would thereby recognise a sort of hierarchy between them and the Court of Justice. This might not, however, necessarily be so.

Since constitutional courts cannot identify such problems extrajudicially, there is no danger that they would not be able to make a reference. Therefore, I see no reason to create new institutional mechanisms in addition to those which already exist (especially if informal mechanisms are also considered, like the participation of judges of high courts and the CJEU at scholarly conferences and like events).

As a matter of principle, I would be against a Member State submitting as a defence in an infringement proceeding that the unconstitutionality of an EU measure has been identified in domestic proceedings. If that were the case, the domestic court should have made a reference to the Court of Justice with respect to the lawfulness of the EU measure in the first place. If this were an issue relating to the domestic constitution only (so the lawfulness of the EU measure could not be questioned), it would be the duty of the domestic lawmaker to amend the constitution. I am well aware of the possibility of a (systemic) conflict between a constitutional court and the Court of Justice with respect to some particular issue, but in such an unlikely case, the Court of Justice should accept the defence of the Member State, and base its reasoning on the EU Treaty and respect by the EU of the identities of the national legal orders.⁹³

⁹⁰ For a summary of the arguments of the President's camp and my own arguments, see Drda, A. (2004, September 25) Týden v České republice (A week in the Czech Republic). BBC. http://www.bbc.co.uk/czech/domesticnews/story/2004/09/040925_tyden_v_cr.shtml.

⁹¹ Interestingly, the President did not initiate proceedings before the CCC despite the fact that he had the power to do so. This was in line with his conservative approach to constitutional review and his criticism of the so-called 'judgeocracy', a term close to the Western concept of 'juristocracy'.

⁹² In particular, several NGOs, and above all, Juridicum remedium. See the article written by its director, Vobořil, J. (2014, June 3), Jaké budou dopady zrušení směrnice o data retention? (What will be the effects of annulment of the data retention directive?). <http://www.epravo.cz/top/clanky/jake-budou-dopady-zruseni-smernice-o-data-retention-94415.html>. For a summary of the debate, see Polčák 2008.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

I do not share concerns about an overall reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights and the rule of law in the context of EU law. I think that both EU law and activist constitutional courts capable of protecting domestic constitutional identities are able to further enhance the protection of fundamental rights in the EU legal arena.

There is a gradual process in the Central European legal systems towards more discursive and elaborative judicial decisions.⁹⁴ Compared to this, the cryptic style of the EU courts' judgments might become more problematic in Central Europe than it used to be just a few years ago. On the other hand, the opinions of Advocates General might serve precisely the purpose of making judicial reasoning more transparent.

The responsiveness of the Court of Justice with regard to Czech national constitutional concerns is a tricky issue. The most prominent case in which this responsiveness could be expressed was the Slovak pension saga. In the Landtová case mentioned in Sect. 1.3.4, however, it was difficult for the EU Court to assess the national constitutional concern. Both the Government of the Czech Republic and the Supreme Administrative Court, the court making the reference, argued in the direction eventually followed by the Court of Justice as well. At the same time, the CJEU knew very well that its decision went against the established case law of the CCC. A personal letter from the Chief Justice of the Constitutional Court was after all (in)famously returned by the CJEU's staff to the Chief Justice and excluded from the proceedings. Ironically, the CCC did not hesitate to express its frustration over this, and noted a sort of violation of its right to be heard in the proceedings before the CJEU. Instead of remedying this and giving the CJEU a chance to weigh the CCC's principled arguments, the CCC went on to proclaim the CJEU's judgment to be ultra vires. I consider this a major flaw in the CCC's approach, effectively forfeiting the chance to debate the importance of the national case law at EU level.⁹⁵

⁹³ Article 4 para. 2 TEU: 'The Union shall respect [Member States'] national identities, inherent in their fundamental structures, political and constitutional ...'.

⁹⁴ See Matczak et al. 2015.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 The constitutional provisions that regulate the transfer of powers to international organisations or institutions, such as the International Criminal Court, are identical with those which govern the transfer of powers to the EU. The relevant provision is of a very general nature and contains no reference to the objectives sought by international co-operation, to limits to the delegation of powers, etc. Likewise, provisions on the ratification of treaties are very general and just provide that the consent of both chambers of Parliament is needed for selected categories of treaties that are to be ratified by the head of state (generally the most important treaties).

3.1.2 The 2001 'Euro-amendment' to the Constitution⁹⁶ changed the original Czechoslovak and then Czech approach to international law from a dualist system into a system closer to the monist ideal. At the beginning of the 1990s, only international human rights treaties were incorporated and became part of the law of the land. The Czechoslovak approach of 1991 was followed by the Czech and Slovak constitution-makers.⁹⁷ While the first major article criticising the hostile attitude of both constitutions had been published by Eric Stein in the United States in a prominent law journal already in 1994,⁹⁸ the domestic discussion on the future status of international law did not start until 1997.⁹⁹

The amendment was driven by domestic academic criticism, especially from international law circles. This opening of the door to international law was rather a by-product of the constitutional EU clause. The scholars who took part in writing the EU clause were also in favour of opening the Constitution to international treaties. In a way, many domestic politicians 'bought' the change of perspective towards international law because of their (false) belief that this was something which was required by the future EU accession.

⁹⁵ In more detail see Sect. 1.3.4 above.

⁹⁶ In more detail see Sect. 1.2 above.

⁹⁷ See Art. 10 of the Czech Constitution before 2002.

⁹⁸ See Stein 1994.

⁹⁹ The leading figure to influence the Czech internationalist doctrine by his doctrinal writings was Jiří Malenovský, current Czech judge at the Court of Justice. See Malenovský 2000 and Malenovský 2002.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 According to Art. 10 of the Czech Constitution, as amended by the ‘Euro-amendment’, international treaties, the ratification of which has been approved by Parliament, and which bind the Czech Republic, are part of the legal order. If an international treaty provides something different than a statute, the former shall be applied.¹⁰⁰

3.2.2 Mainstream Czech scholarship agrees that neither dualism nor monism in their traditional form are able to capture the diversity of the processes of globalisation and the current relation between domestic and international law.¹⁰¹ My opinion is that these concepts are just ideals, through which legal systems can be explained, although they never materialise in practice in their pure forms.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 The most important treaties, including all that impose duties on individuals, on membership in international organisations, economic treaties of a general nature, etc., require ratification by the legislature (Art. 49 of the Constitution). Unlike normal law-making, in which the position of the Senate is much weaker, the Senate and the Assembly of Deputies have an equal role in giving consent to the ratification of treaties. Consent of the Assembly requires two readings of the treaty, during which deputies are supposed to debate the treaty and its content. The details are regulated in the rules of proceedings of the Assembly. The proceedings start in the committee responsible for the area of government which is most closely related to the substance of the treaty. The committee then makes a recommendation to the Assembly on whether or not ratification is advised.¹⁰² According to what I know from parliamentary debates, issues relating to international obligations are mostly neglected in parliamentary debates, as the deputies and senators prefer discussing domestic laws over international obligations.

3.3.2 As of the time of writing the report, only one nation-wide referendum has been held in the Czech Republic, i.e. the referendum dealing with EU accession. In order to hold a referendum, the Constitution requires that a constitutional act be enacted. While in theory a referendum can be held in any case, in reality politicians are very sceptical about direct democracy. There were some indications in 2014 that this political position, which had been firm since 1993, might change in the future because the rightist and conservative parties that were opposed to referendums lost their ground in the early 2010s, and centrist and leftist parties that are more friendly towards direct democracy might want to enact a general constitutional law on referendums.

¹⁰⁰ Many less important treaties, signed by the ministries, are not ratified subject to approval by Parliament (Art. 49 of the Czech Constitution). Article 10 is not applicable to these treaties.

¹⁰¹ See, most importantly, Malenovský 2008.

¹⁰² §108 and §109 of the Rules of Proceedings of the Assembly of Deputies, Law No. 90/1995 Sb.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 The Constitution is silent on the issue of constitutional review of international treaties. The only exception is ex ante review before the ratification of an international treaty by the Constitutional Court (Art. 87 para. 2 of the Constitution). However, it is unclear what would happen if a ratified treaty were in conflict with the Constitution.

Shortly after the opening of the Constitution to international law in 2002, Jan Kysela and I wrote an article in which we argued in favour of the constitutional review of ratified international treaties on a case-by-case basis. We argued that ratified international treaties cannot exclude the application of constitutional rights. In the case of a conflict, the Constitution must set aside conflicting international treaty provisions.¹⁰³ This argument was followed in the case law of the CCC. In the never-ending saga of Czecho-Slovak pensions, the CCC repeatedly set aside the provision of the Czecho-Slovak Pension Treaty which in the CCC's view was in conflict with the ban on discrimination of Czech citizens. The CCC reasoned that even if international treaties have precedence over national law based on the maxim lex specialis derogat legi generali, a treaty cannot be applied if it is in conflict with higher law, that is, the Constitution.¹⁰⁴

Opposition to this claim came from the Supreme Administrative Court (SAC), the Constitutional Court's 'arch-enemy' in the Slovak pension saga. The SAC held that no court in the Czech Republic is empowered to review the constitutionality of ratified treaties. Neither the Constitution nor the law gives such power to the CCC. This argument has been repeatedly rebuffed by the CCC.¹⁰⁵

Apart from the Czecho-Slovak pension saga, there is no other judgment which has set aside an international treaty for its unconstitutionality.

¹⁰³ Kysela and Kühn 2002, p. 301.

¹⁰⁴ Judgment of 22 May 2008, file No. I. ÚS 366/05, Slovak pensions XI, para. 15. Cf. also Lisbon Treaty I, supra n. 12, para. 84.

¹⁰⁵ See Judgment of the SAC of 23 February 2005, file No. 6 Ads 62/2003, quashed by Judgment of the CCC of 13 November 2007, file No. IV. ÚS 301/05, Slovak pensions VI.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

Social rights are constitutionally protected in the Czech Republic. However, their enforcement via judicial process is limited in scope through Art. 41(1) of the Charter which provides that social rights are justiciable only in connection with the laws which implement them. The question of whether a law can be annulled because of conflict with social rights has been explained by the CCC through its doctrine of the hard core of social rights. In 2008, the Court explained that the core or essential content of social rights shall be protected against legislative encroachments. According to the Court, '[i]t follows from the nature of social rights that the legislature cannot deny their existence and implementation, although it otherwise has wide scope for discretion.'¹⁰⁶

References

- Badinter R., Breyer S. (eds.) (2004) Judges in Contemporary Democracy. An International Conversation. NYU Press, New York.
- Bobek M. (2014) Landtová, Holubec, and the Problem of an Uncooperative Court: Implications for the Preliminary Rulings Procedure. EuConst 10:54 et seq.
- Damaška M. (1968) A Continental Lawyer in an American Law School: Trials and Tribunals of Adjustment. Univ. of Pennsylvania Law Review 116:1363–1378.
- Komárek J. (2012) ‘Playing with matches’: The Czech Constitutional Court declares a judgment of the Court of Justice of the EU ultra vires. EuConst 8:323–337.
- Kühn Z. (2004) Rozšíření Evropské unie a vztahy šestadvaceti ústavních systémů (Expansion of the European Union and the relations between twenty-six constitutional systems). Právník 143:745–786.
- Kühn Z. (2007) The European Arrest Warrant, Third Pillar Law and National Constitutional Resistance / Acceptance: The EAW Saga as Narrated by the Constitutional Judiciary in Poland, Germany, and the Czech Republic. Croatian Yearbook of European Law & Policy 3:99–134.
- Kühn Z. (2013) Ústavní soud České republiky: proměny instituce v průběhu dvou desetiletí (The Constitutional Court of the Czech Republic: transformation of the institution in two decades). In: 20 let Ústavy České republiky. Ohlédnutí zpět a pohled vpřed (20 years of the Czech Constitution. A glance at the past and considerations forward). Aleš Čeněk, Plzeň, pp. 246–255.
- Kühn Z. (2016) Ultra Vires Review and the Demise of Constitutional Pluralism: the Czech-Slovak Pension Saga, and the Dangers of State Courts’ Defiance of EU Law. MJ 23:185–194.
- Kysela J., Kühn Z. (2002) Aplikace mezinárodního práva po přijetí tzv. euronovely Ústavy ČR (The application of international law after the enactment of the so-called Euro-amendment of the Constitution). Právní rozhledy 10:30–312.
- Malenovský J. (2000) Poměr mezinárodního a vnitrostátního práv obecně a v českém právu zvláště (The relation between international and municipal law generally and in Czech law especially). Masarykova Univerzita, Brno.

¹⁰⁶ Judgment of 23 September 2008, file No. Pl. ÚS 1/08, Health Care Fees, paras. 103 and 105.

- Malenovský J. (2002) Postavení mezinárodních smluv o lidských právech v českém právu po 1. červnu 2002 (The position of international treaties on human rights in Czech law after 1 June 2002). Právnik 141:917–932.
- Malenovský J. (2005) K řízení o ratifikaci smlouvy o Ústavě pro Evropu: na okraj uvažovaného ústavního zákona o referendu (On the process of ratification of the European Constitutional Treaty: A note on the bill of a Constitutional Act on referendum), Právnik 144:337–359.
- Malenovský J. (2008) Mezinárodní právo veřejné : jeho obecná část a poměr k jiným právním systémům, zvláště k právu českému (International public law: its general part and its relation to other legal systems, above all to Czech law), 5th rev. edn. Masarykova univerzita, Brno.
- Matczak M., Bencze M., Kühn Z. (2015), EU law and Central European judges: Administrative judiciaries in the Czech Republic, Hungary and Poland Ten Years after Accession. In: Bobek M. (ed.) Central European Judges under the European Influence: The Transformative Power of the EU Revisited. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 43 et seq.
- Müller I. (1991) Hitler's Justice: The Courts of the Third Reich. (transl. Deborah Lucas Schneider). Harvard University Press, Cambridge.
- Polčák R. (2008) The Global Information Assembling: Viewing the Data Retention Just as a Child Play. In: Know Right 2008. Österreichische Computer Gesellschaft, Vienna, pp. 199–207.
- Polčák R. (2012) Internet a proměny práva (The Internet and the metamorphosis of law). Auditorium, Prague.
- Stein E. (1994) International Law in Internal Law: Toward Internationalization of Central-Eastern European Constitutions? AJIL 88:427 et seq.
- Stein E. (1997) Czecho-Slovakia, Ethnic Conflict, Constitutional Fissure, Negotiated Breakup. The University of Michigan Press, Ann Arbor.
- Tomuschat C. (2006) Inconsistencies – The German Federal Constitutional Court on the European Arrest Warrant. EuConst 2:209 et seq.
- Varga C. (1995) Transition to Rule of Law / On the Democratic Transformation in Hungary. Hungarian Academy of Science, Budapest.
- Zbíral R. (2012) Czech Constitutional Court, Judgment of 31 January 2012, Pl. Ús 5/12: A Legal Revolution or Negligible Episode? Court of Justice Decision Proclaimed Ultra Vires (June 5, 2012). CML Rev. 49:1475–1491.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Slovakia: Between Euro-Optimism and Euro-Concerns

Zuzana Vikarská and Michal Bobek

Abstract In the Slovak constitutional system, the understanding of the concept of the rule of law is closer to the German concept of the Rechtsstaat rather than the common law concept. The constitutional elements of the Slovak accession to the EU have been largely settled by a comprehensive and detailed EU Amendment to the Constitution (2001). The accession to the EU was confirmed by a referendum in 2003. Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international law include provisions that enable the implementation of EU law by governmental regulations. The report generally observes a lack of case law and scholarly debate on matters relating to Slovakia's membership in the EU. Some critical voices have considered the Slovak solutions regarding the European Arrest Warrant to be overly enthusiastic and lacking the constitutional guarantees provided elsewhere. However, a constitutional challenge was brought with regard to the Data Retention Directive, together with a request by the claimants to refer a question to the ECJ. The Constitutional Court decided to wait for the ECJ judgment in Digital Rights Ireland and subsequently declared that the implementation measures were in breach of Zuzana Vikarská is Lecturer in Constitutional Law at Masaryk University in Brno, Czech Republic, and DPhil candidate at the University of Oxford. e-mail: zuzana.vikarska@law.ox.ac.uk.

Michal Bobek is Professor of European Law, College of Europe, Bruges, and Research Fellow, Institute of European and Comparative Law, University of Oxford. e-mail: michal.bobek@eui.eu.

All websites accessed 5 October 2015. Text submitted 7 January 2015.

Z. Vikarská (✉)

Masaryk University, Brno, Czech Republic
e-mail: zuzana.vikarska@law.ox.ac.uk

Z. Vikarská

University of Oxford, Oxford, UK

M. Bobek

College of Europe, Bruges, Belgium e-mail: michal.bobek@eui.eu

M. Bobek

Institute of European and Comparative Law, University of Oxford, Oxford, UK

several provisions of the Slovak Constitution, without addressing the alleged breach of the Charter provisions. The report generally recalls the high value placed on the right to privacy in Central and Eastern Europe, given the historical reality of surveillance by the secret police before 1989. Debate on the ESM Treaty was held at the political level; the report surmises that constitutional challenges might arise if citizens were actually asked to pay. More broadly, the report observes that the ongoing interaction between the national and European legal orders need not be one-directional, requiring only changes in the national legal systems; rather, a cluster of Member States might push towards a constitutional change at the European level.

Keywords The Slovak Constitution · Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation · The Slovak Constitutional Court
Constitutional review · Fundamental rights and the Rechtsstaat approach to the rule of law · Data Retention Directive, surveillance and the right to privacy and secrecy of communications · European Arrest Warrant · Publication of laws
Absence of constitutional limits · Referendum · Kyrian and the right to judicial review in EU mutual recognition system in administrative co-operation
ESM Treaty · The right to property

Introductory Note to the Slovak Report

The Slovak Republic (Slovakia) is a smaller jurisdiction. In July 2014, its estimated population was slightly under five and half million inhabitants.¹ Being a smaller EU jurisdiction has two consequences for the purpose of this report. First, in smaller jurisdictions, not that many cases are likely to be litigated. Thus, a number of issues raised by this questionnaire have not yet been addressed judicially in Slovakia. Secondly, in contrast to larger states, there is relatively little legal scholarship being produced on the specific and specialised matters addressed in this questionnaire. For these two reasons, together with the fact that the constitutional elements of the Slovak accession to the EU have been largely settled by a comprehensive and detailed EU Amendment to the Slovak Constitution, with regard to a number of specific questions asked, the authors of this report can provide but an advised estimate on how the issue would likely be tackled if it were to arise in the future, but hardly a reflection of any established national case law or comprehensive scholarly debates.

¹ The CIA World Fact book gives the estimate of 5,443,583 inhabitants. <https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/lo.html>.

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 According to the division suggested by Besselink,² the Constitution of the Slovak Republic³ (hereinafter Constitution or Slovak Constitution) could be said to fall within the first category of constitutions, i.e. those with ‘a legal character, with detailed rules and enforceability in courts’.⁴ The Constitution is rather detailed, consisting of 156 articles, with most articles further subdivided into a number of detailed paragraphs. Furthermore, the Constitution also includes a full catalogue of fundamental rights (Chap. II, Arts. 12–54 of the Constitution).

The Constitution currently in force in the Slovak Republic was adopted in a specific historical and political context, when, as of 1 January 1993, the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic split into two sovereign countries.⁵ The draft of the Slovak Constitution played a strong symbolic role in the Slovak emancipation from the Federation, which had begun already earlier, in the course of 1992. Although the dissolution of the Federation on the international plane was the result of bilateral political arrangements put in place by the Czech and Slovak prime ministers, from the internal legal point of view the split of the Czech and Slovak Federation was the result of a unilateral secession of Slovakia carried out already in summer 1992. On 17 July 1992, the Slovak National Council (i.e. the Parliament of the Slovak part of the Federation, which was, however, not part of the Federal Parliament) adopted the Declaration on the Sovereignty of the Slovak Republic, a document invoking the natural right of states to self-determination and declaring the independence of the Slovak Republic. This declaration served as a stepping-stone to the ulterior adoption of the Constitution of the Slovak Republic, adopted on 1 September 1992 by a constitutional majority,⁶ again in the Slovak National Council. This Constitution did not merely regulate the constitutional arrangements in the Slovak part of the Federation, as foreseen by the federal legislation in force.⁷ Rather, it had the ambition to serve as a constitution of a sovereign state, the Slovak Republic, which, however, at that time was legally speaking a part of a Federation. From this point of view, the dissolution of the Federation became inevitable. The Slovak Constitution

² See Besselink 2006, pp. 113 et seq.

³ Constitutional Act No. 460/1992 Coll., Constitution of the Slovak Republic. One of the English translations of the Slovak Constitution can be found at <https://www.president.sk/upload-files/46422.pdf>. In some cases, the authors have slightly changed the wording of the translated provisions in order to express the content of the norm as precisely as possible.

⁴ See the Questionnaire for this project.

⁵ Generally on this process in English, see e.g. Stein 1997.

⁶ The constitutional majority required was three-fifths of all the MPs, i.e. 90 out of 150. Out of the 134 MPs present, 114 voted in favour of the Constitution, 16 voted against and 4 refrained from voting. For a stenographic record of the voting (in Slovak only), see <http://www.nrsr.sk/dl/Browser/Document?documentId=71565>.

⁷ Article 142(2) of Constitutional Act No. 143/1968 Coll., on the Czechoslovak Federation.

entered into force on 1 October 1992 (with the exception of some provisions that entered into force on 1 January 1993), and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic was formally dissolved on 1 January 1993.

The interpretation of the summer 1992 constitutional events and the de facto unilateral secession of Slovakia from the Federation are still far from settled. Also, it is not surprising that their interpretation is very different in the Czech Republic and in Slovakia. Be that as it may, although these circumstances probably did not amount to a cataclysmic event, the fact remains that the current Slovak Constitution ‘was prepared in a hasty and secretive manner and gave rise to bitter political divisions in the Parliament’.⁸

Lastly, as far as the constitutional tradition and influence are concerned, the Slovak Constitution can be said to be based on the Czechoslovak constitutional tradition, i.e. the constitutional norms and culture that the common state shared from 1918 until 1993, including several joint constitutions (of 1920, 1948 and 1960, respectively, as well as the federalisation legislation of 1969–1970, by which the formerly unitary Czechoslovakia was transformed into a federal state). In contrast to the Czech approach, however, the Slovak texts and constitutional culture appear to avoid explicit references to the Czechoslovak tradition.⁹

Apart from the common Czechoslovak origins, the Slovak constitutional culture finds on-going inspiration in the current Czech constitutional culture: the use of and references to Czech constitutional law textbooks and commentaries are common practice, whether openly acknowledged or somewhat hidden. It would appear that some limited inspiration comes also from Hungarian legal sources and constitutional case law, but this inspiration is even less likely to be openly acknowledged, often for political reasons.¹⁰

1.1.2 The Slovak Constitution is the foundation of the Slovak legal system, a document at the top of the hierarchy of legal acts. Its role and rationale are comparable to those of the constitutions of most other European states: to govern the main institutional setting of the state (including the separation of powers and due checks and balances) and to provide for a catalogue of the fundamental rights of its citizens. It is difficult, if not impossible, to single out any of the rationales as being key or dominant.

In Art. 1(1), the Constitution establishes the rule of law and the sovereignty of the Slovak Republic (SR), stating that ‘the Slovak Republic is a sovereign, democratic state governed by the rule of law’. This sovereignty may be nonetheless limited, as follows from Art. 1(2) (respect of international obligations) and Art. 7 (modalities of entry into international obligations).

⁸ Procházka 2002, p. 68.

⁹ See, for example, the Preamble to the Slovak Constitution, which refers all the way back to the ‘spiritual heritage of Cyril and Methodius and the historical legacy of Great Moravia’ (Saints Cyril and Methodius were 9th century Byzantine Greek missionaries who preached among the Slavic tribes of Great Moravia and Pannonia, i.e. roughly the eastern part of the Czech Republic and western part of Slovakia today), but not to the Czechoslovak constitutional history of the 20th century.

¹⁰ Further see Bobek 2013a, pp. 174–191.

Limits to state powers are mainly addressed in Art. 2(2), as well as in the institutional provisions further on, in which state powers are specifically fleshed out, while fundamental human rights are provided for in Arts. 12 to 54 (Chap. II: Basic Rights and Freedoms). The separation of powers as a principle is not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution, but the structure of the constitutional text clearly indicates that power is divided into legislative power (Chap. V), executive power (Chap. VI) and judicial power (Chap. VII).

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 In the context of EU accession, the Slovak Constitution was significantly amended by Constitutional Act No. 90/2001 (the so-called ‘EU Amendment’, adopted on 23 February 2001, in force since 1 July 2001), adopted by 90 Members of Parliament (MPs) (the smallest number possible for a constitutional amendment), with 57 MPs voting against the proposal. This constitutional change paved the way towards accession to the EU, as well as to NATO.

The EU Amendment was a direct amendment of the Constitution. It inserted a number of key articles relevant for Slovak membership in the EU.

Article 1 was amended to include a second subparagraph that reads: ‘The Slovak Republic recognizes and honours general rules of international law, international treaties by which it is bound and its other international obligations.’

Article 7, which in its original version only included what is now Art. 7(1), was further elaborated so as to differentiate among the various international organisations and international obligations to which Slovakia might be a party in the future. The amended Art 7 reads:

- (1) The Slovak Republic may enter into a state union with other states upon its free decision. The decision on entering into a state union with other states, or on withdrawal from this union, shall be made by a constitutional law, which must be confirmed by a referendum.
- (2) The Slovak Republic may, by an international treaty ratified and promulgated in a manner laid down by law, or on the basis of such treaty, transfer the exercise of a part of its rights to the European Communities and European Union. Legally binding acts of the European Communities and European Union shall have primacy over the laws of the Slovak Republic. The transposition of legally binding acts that require implementation shall be executed by law or a government ordinance pursuant to Art. 120, para. 2.
- (3) The Slovak Republic may, with the aim of maintaining peace, security and democratic order, under the terms laid down by an international treaty, join an organization of mutual collective security.

(4) In order for any international treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms, international political treaties, international treaties of military nature, international treaties establishing the membership of the Slovak Republic in international organizations, international economic treaties of general nature, international treaties whose execution requires a law and international treaties which directly constitute rights or obligations of natural persons or legal persons to be valid, an approval of the National Council of the Slovak Republic is required prior to their ratification.

(5) International treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms, international treaties whose executions does not require a law and international treaties which directly establish rights or obligations of natural persons or legal persons and which were ratified and promulgated in a manner laid down by law shall have primacy over the laws.

The original Art. 11, which had laid down the primacy of international human rights treaties if they provided for a more extensive human rights protection, was repealed in 2001.¹¹ The same issue is now governed by Art. 7(5) and Art. 154c. Articles 17 and 18, which address personal liberty, were amended and the time limits for detention were prolonged from 24 hours to 48 and 72 hours. Furthermore, Art. 23(4) was amended to abolish the constitutional prohibition on extradition (or surrender) of citizens, and now reads: ‘(4) Every citizen has the right to freely enter the territory of the Slovak Republic. No citizen may be forced to leave his or her homeland or be expelled.’ The last part of the provision which read ‘or extradited to another state’ was removed from the constitutional provision.¹²

Article 30 on the right to vote was amended to include the following last sentence in its first subparagraph: ‘Foreigners with a permanent residence on the territory of the Slovak Republic have the right to vote and be elected in the self-administration bodies of municipalities and self-administration bodies of superior territorial units.’ This provision goes further than required by EU law, since it does not limit the right to vote to EU citizens, but extends it to all foreigners who permanently reside in Slovakia.

Article 120 was amended to include a new subparagraph (2) which reads:

If so laid down by law, the Government is authorised to issue ordinances in order to execute the Europe Agreement establishing an association between the European Communities and their Member States, of the one part, and the Slovak Republic, of the other part, and to execute international treaties stipulated in Art. 7, para. 2.

Article 125 on the powers of the Slovak Constitutional Court (SCC) was amended so that the referential framework for the constitutionality of legal acts includes not only the Constitution and constitutional laws, but also ‘international treaties to which the National Council of the Slovak Republic has expressed its assent and which have been ratified and promulgated in the manner laid down by ¹¹ See Sect. 3.2.1 below for a detailed analysis of the former Art. 11 and its legal effects.

¹² Thus constitutionally pre-empting much of the debate that later ensued in other Member States of the EU (e.g. Germany, Poland and the Czech Republic) about constitutional prohibitions on extraditing (surrendering) own citizens. See e.g. Komárek 2007 and Siegel 2008.

law'.¹³ This has been affirmed by a consistent line of case law of the SCC, which states that 'the competence of the Constitutional Court under Art. 125(1)(a) of the Constitution also includes international treaties that have been consented to by the National Council of the Slovak Republic and that have been ratified and promulgated as required by law'.¹⁴

However, the SCC has also ruled that if a provision is in breach of the Constitution, there is no need to further examine its alleged breach of any international instruments, since the potential breach of an international instrument would not bring any additional effects.¹⁵

Further, two new articles were inserted in the chapter on the SCC, of which Art. 125a bears relevance to EU accession and further EU developments:

- (1) The Constitutional Court decides on the compliance of concluded international treaties for which consent of the National Council of the Slovak Republic is required with the Constitution or a constitutional law.
- (2) A petition for a decision pursuant to para. 1 may be filed with the Constitutional Court by the President of the Slovak Republic or the Government before submitting the concluded international treaty for deliberation to the National Council of the Slovak Republic.
- (3) The Constitutional Court decides on the petition pursuant to para. 2 within the period laid down by law; if the Constitutional Court by its decision expresses that the international treaty is not in compliance with the Constitution or a constitutional law, such international treaty may not be ratified.

Article 144 specifies which legal instruments are binding for judges when they decide cases. In its original version, it stated that judges were bound only by laws, and that in cases where it is so established by the Constitution or by law, judges were also bound by international treaties. After amendment, the article reads as follows:

- (1) Judges are independent in the performance of their functions and bound solely by the Constitution, constitutional laws, international treaties stipulated in Art. 7, paras. 2 and 5 and laws.
- (2) If the court is of the opinion that another generally binding legal regulation, its part or a particular provision related to the subject-matter of the proceeding contravenes the Constitution, constitutional laws, international treaties stipulated in Art. 7, paras. 2 and 5 or laws, it will interrupt its deliberations and submit a motion that a proceeding under Art. 125, para. 1 be initiated. The finding of the Constitutional Court of the Slovak Republic is binding for all courts.

¹³ However, it is important to note that even before the EU Amendment, the original Art. 125 included in the referential framework 'international treaties promulgated in a manner established for the promulgation of laws'.

¹⁴ Judgment of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 10/14 (Data retention) of 29 April 2015, para. 70. Translation by the authors.

¹⁵ See e.g. Judgment of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 3/09 (Health insurance) of 26 January 2011 and Pl. ÚS 10/14 (Data retention), n. 14.

The last crucial article that was inserted by the EU Amendment in 2001 is Art. 154c, which regulates the position of international treaties in the Slovak legal order and which reads as follows:

- (1) International treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms that [have been] ratified by the Slovak Republic and promulgated in a manner laid down by law before this constitutional law comes into effect are a part of its legal order and have primacy over [national] law, if they provide a greater scope of constitutional rights and freedoms.
- (2) Other international treaties which [have been] ratified by the Slovak republic and promulgated as required by law before this constitutional law comes into effect are a part of its legal order, if so laid down by law.

Thus, the bulk of changes relating to the Slovak accession to the EU were carried out by the EU Amendment in 2001. As for subsequent constitutional changes relating to EU membership, in 2004, the Slovak legislator sought to regulate the relationships between the Government and Parliament in their participation in the EU legislative process, as well as the incompatibility of serving as an MP of the Slovak Parliament (the National Council of the Slovak Republic, hereinafter NCSR) and the European Parliament. Both of these provisions were originally included in the draft of Constitutional Act No. 140/2004. They did not, however, secure sufficient support in the NCSR and were removed from the draft. The incompatibility provision was nonetheless later included in Constitutional Act No. 323/2004 (adopted on 14 May 2004, in effect since 1 June 2004), and the relationship between the Government and Parliament was later provided for expressly by Constitutional Act No. 397/2004 on the cooperation of the National Council of the Slovak Republic and the Government of the Slovak Republic in EU matters (adopted on 24 June 2004, in effect since 1 August 2004). The latter constitutional amendment is different from the ones previously mentioned in that it did not directly alter the constitutional text, but rather exists as a self-standing piece of constitutional legislation.

1.2.2 The National Council of the Slovak Republic, i.e. the Slovak Parliament, is composed of one chamber, consisting of 150 Members of Parliament. For a constitutional amendment to be adopted, at least 90 MPs must support it. Pursuant to Art. 84(4) of the Constitution, the agreement of at least a three-fifths majority of all Members of Parliament is required to pass and amend the Constitution and constitutional laws, to adopt an international treaty stipulated in Art. 7, para. 2, adopt [a] resolution on [a] public vote to remove the President of the Slovak Republic, file charges against the President and to declare war on another state.

This procedure, which is the only one for constitutional amendments, has been used for all previous constitutional amendments, including those related to the EU.

Interestingly, draft constitutional laws cannot be vetoed by the President. The original wording of the Constitution was unclear on this point, but the provision has been amended to make this clear.¹⁶

1.2.3 After the political turmoil of late 1990s, including the problematic autocratic Mečiar-period, the main interest of the SR was to join the EU together with the other countries of the so-called Visegrad Group (the Czech Republic, Hungary and Poland). The EU was perceived as a club of ‘rule of law countries’, and joining the EU primarily meant becoming part of the political ‘West’. From this point of view, accession in the 2004 wave of enlargement was a clear priority, with the discussion centring perhaps more on the practical form and wording of the constitutional amendments, but not questioning their aims or overall direction. Thus, the amendment process was perceived of as a rather straightforward ‘technical’ exercise in constitutional drafting. The advice of legal scholars and experts was no doubt present in the process of the legal drafting, since some of them were involved, in one way or another. For the size-related reasons outlined above in the Introductory Note and also due to the speed with which the EU Amendment was approved by the NCSR, no sizeable debate on the actual drafts could be discerned. For further details, see Sects. 1.2.1 and 1.5.

1.2.4 There have been no instances of EU-related proposals which have not materialised in practice. However, there have been two amendment proposals that were deflected in the legislative process. First, there was the proposed Constitutional Act No. 140/2004, discussed above in Sect. 1.2.1. As already explained, the substance of that proposal was subsequently put into different constitutional acts. Secondly, a similar moment occurred in 2011, when a draft constitutional act was being prepared with the aim of amending Constitutional Act No. 397/2004 Coll. (See Sect. 1.4.1 below for a detailed analysis of this act). The aim of the proposed amendment was to regulate the national procedures following an amendment of primary EU law pursuant to the special procedure foreseen by Art. 48(6) TEU. However, the necessary three-fifths majority was not found in the NCSR and the constitutional amendment was not adopted. Eventually, the contemplated change was nevertheless carried out in the form of an ordinary law amending the Rules of Procedure of the NCSR. Thus, the content of the provision made its way into the Slovak legal order, although endowed with lower legal force.¹⁷

Currently, there are no EU-related amendment proposals being discussed or tabled. The reason for such absence might be the fact that, as outlined above in Sect. 1.2.1, the 2001 EU Amendment was quite detailed and explicit, thus, in contrast to more ‘economic’ EU amendments in other new Member States, limiting the need for further amendments and constitutional litigation.

¹⁶ Article 87(3) of the Constitution, as amended.

¹⁷ For a more detailed analysis, see Jánošíková 2014.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 Within the Constitution the transfer of powers to the European Union is governed by Art. 7(2), which is EU-specific and allows the SR to ‘transfer the exercise of a part of its rights to the European Communities and European Union’. The details and limits of this provision are discussed below in Sect. 1.3.3.

As for the legal effects of EU law, the relevant general provision is Art. 1(2), which states that the SR shall respect its international obligations. The legal effects of primary EU law are not addressed specifically by the Constitution, but the EU Treaties may be classified as ‘international treaties whose execution does not require a law’ and ‘international treaties which directly establish rights or obligations of natural persons or legal persons’, which are the terms used in Art. 7(5). The EU Treaties thus ‘shall have primacy over the laws’, as expressly laid down in the second sentence of Art. 7(5).

The position of EU primary law in the Slovak legal order has been contested by academic writers, and this issue has been also addressed in quite a confusing way by the SCC. Some authors¹⁸ have argued that primary EU law derives its legal effects from Art. 7(2) of the Constitution, while other authors¹⁹ would rather place primary EU law under the regime of Art. 7(5) of the Constitution. Even the SCC has changed its position in this regard over time. In its decision on health insurance companies (discussed in more detail below in Sect. 1.3.4), the SCC stated that ‘although the notion of “legally binding acts” used in the second sentence of Art. 7(2) of the Constitution could give rise to problems when defining its exact scope, it can undoubtedly be concluded that the TFEU is such a legally binding act’.²⁰ According to the SCC, the TFEU falls into a ‘special subcategory of international treaties’ through which the SR has transferred competences to the EU and which are thus governed by Art. 7(2).²¹ However, treaties falling within this special subcategory still qualify as ‘international treaties to which consent [has been] given by the NCSR and which [have been] ratified and promulgated in a manner laid down by law’, which means that they still belong to the referential framework of constitutional review, as is set out in Art. 125 of the Constitution. The SCC has, however, departed from this position in its more recent case law (see the data retention judgment discussed below).

¹⁸ See for example Drgonec 2013. Drgonec claims that ‘legally binding acts’ comprise primary EU law and those acts of secondary EU law that are directly applicable, i.e. regulations and decisions.

¹⁹ See for example Jánošíková 2014, according to whom the notion of ‘legally binding acts of the EC/EU’ only refers to legal acts that have been ‘made by the EC/EU’, while primary EU law derives its effects from Art. 7(5), rather than Art. 7(2).

²⁰ Judgment of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 3/09 (Health insurance), part V.3.4.

²¹ Ibid.

Yet, despite all these disagreements, other authors note that this taxonomic dispute is quite pointless,²² since the effects of primary EU law are nevertheless determined by EU law itself and are not dependent on a constitutional recognition in one provision or another. These authors believe that primary EU law is more likely to fall within the regime of Art. 7(5) of the Constitution, but it is in fact not excluded that it can also be covered by the provision in Art. 7(2). These two subsections are not necessarily mutually exclusive. The preference for categorisation under Art. 7(5) follows from the fact that the NCSR, upon giving consent to both the Accession Treaty and the Lisbon Treaty, also declared that these treaties are international treaties in the sense of Art. 7(5) of the Constitution.²³

This latter position has also been confirmed in a recent case concerning the constitutionality of the data retention provisions, in which the SCC stated the following:

The position of the founding EU Treaties (TEU and TFEU) in the Slovak legal order is governed by Art. 1(2) and Art. 7(5) of the Constitution. Article 7(5) lists the categories of international treaties that have primacy over laws. The founding EU Treaties can undoubtedly be included in these categories. Even the Charter, which has the same legal force as the founding Treaties, must thus have the same position in the Slovak legal order as is given by Art. 7(5) of the Constitution to the listed categories of international Treaties. More precisely, the Charter must be assigned such legal position in the Slovak legal order as is assigned to international treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms under Art. 7(5) of the Constitution.²⁴

The SCC derives this conclusion also from Art. 6(1) TEU.²⁵

The situation is slightly different with regard to secondary EU law. It also explicitly has primacy over Slovak laws, but the constitutional basis for this is different, and is provided for in the second sentence of Art. 7(2), which states that ‘legally binding acts of the EC/EU shall have primacy over the laws of the Slovak Republic’. The notion of ‘legally binding acts’ is a concept of Slovak constitutional law that does not correspond to any established concept of EU law, which has caused considerable confusion.²⁶ One thing that is clear is that from the point of view of the Constitution, all these provisions establish the explicit primacy of EU

²² See Brösl 2013, p. 97.

²³ See Decision of the NCSR No. 365 of 1 July 2003 in the case of the Accession Treaty, and Decision of the NCSR No. 809 of 10 April 2008 in the case of the Lisbon Treaty.

²⁴ See Judgment of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 10/14 (Data retention), n. 14, para. 69. The position of the EU Charter is then further developed in paras. 70–72 of the judgment, and the SCC concludes quite strongly in para. 73 that EU Treaties clearly fall within Art. 7(5) of the Constitution. The SCC also refers to the two decisions of the NCSR, which have categorised EU primary law as falling under Art. 7(5) of the Constitution. Translation by the authors.

²⁵ See para. 73 of the Judgment: ‘On the basis of Art. 6(1) TEU, which assigns to the Charter the same legal power as to the founding Treaties, the Charter is to be given the same legal position in the Slovak legal order as is given to international treaties under Art. 7(5) of the Constitution. These are undoubtedly also treaties that fulfil the criteria of Art. 125(1) of the Constitution.’ Translation by the authors.

²⁶ See Drgonec 2013 and Jánošíková 2014, who have presented two differing points of view.

law only over the sub-constitutional norms of the domestic legal order, while the Constitution (and the SCC) remains silent on the hierarchy between EU norms and domestic norms of constitutional nature.²⁷

1.3.2 The question of absolute versus relative sovereignty has not yet been addressed by the SCC. It remains a matter of (future?) interpretation whether Art. 7 has transformed the notion of sovereignty from an absolute into a relative one.

It may be only added that such an (inherently political) assessment of the nature of constitutional sovereignty can hardly be inferred from any national constitutional provisions, but will always be dependent first on the particular case and, secondly, on the overall political and legal climate in the Member State in question and within the Union itself at a given moment. To provide an extreme example: in its Lisbon II decision,²⁸ the Czech Constitutional Court announced its ‘shared’ or ‘pooled’ sovereignty vision of Czech constitutionality, for which it was greatly praised in (constitutional pluralist) academic circles Europe-wide. Three years later in Holubec,²⁹ the very same court announced something quite different, in effect reaffirming a de facto absolute (and quite isolationist) view of sovereignty. Needless to say that the text of the Czech Constitution itself did not change in the course of those three years. Presently, not only legal scholarship may harbour some doubts as to how to ‘interpret’ and ‘conceptualise’ such an approach in general terms.³⁰

1.3.3 As to the limits to the delegation of powers, the wording of Art. 7(2) suggests that Slovakia may only transfer ‘the exercise of a part of its rights’ to the EC/EU. The provision raises two interesting questions. First, it speaks not about transfer of powers, but rather about transfer of the exercise of rights. (This wording is similar to that of the Belgian or Luxembourgish constitutional texts.) Secondly, it follows from the wording that any transfer must not entail all the rights, but be limited to a part thereof. These seem to be the two most obvious and textual limits of Art. 7(2).

The preceding paragraph, Art. 7(1), deals with a more significant change in sovereignty, namely entering into and withdrawing from a ‘state union’ with other states. Such a decision would have to be made in the form of a constitutional law, confirmed by a referendum.

²⁷ Drgonec 2013 has argued that ‘European law has primacy over laws, but not over the Constitution. This conclusion can be derived from the legal opinions of the SCC, although these did not concern Art. 7(2) directly, but were aimed more generally at the relationship of the Slovak Constitution and international treaties, where the SCC attributed to the international treaties merely the role of an interpretation tool’. The unanswered question remains, however, how far the legal effects of EU law may be derived from the legal effects of international treaties in general. On the other hand, this may reflect the endless and ongoing controversy between ‘internationalist’ and ‘Europeanist’ views on EU law and its nature – contrast e.g. the opposing views relating to the EU-law-character-narrative of De Witte 2012 and Walker 2012.

²⁸ Judgment of the Czech Constitutional Court of 3 November 2009, Pl. ÚS 26/06, in English online at www.usoud.cz. Further see Komárek 2009.

²⁹ Judgment of the Czech Constitutional Court of 31 January 2012, Pl. ÚS 5/12, online at www.usoud.cz. Further e.g. Zbíral 2012 or Bobek 2014.

³⁰ Recently e.g. Přibáň 2015, pp. 323–348.

The SCC dealt with this issue in its decision II. ÚS 171/05 (EU Constitutional Treaty), in which the Court considered whether the Slovak membership in the EU could fall within the scope of Art. 7(1) rather than Art. 7(2). This case arose from a constitutional complaint of a number of natural persons (associated with the Conservative Institute of Milan Rastislav Štefánik), who claimed that the EU Constitutional Treaty transformed the Union into a federation and thus a ‘state union’. The ratification of the Constitutional Treaty by the SR should therefore have been subjected to an obligatory referendum, as required by Art. 7(1). The claimants argued that by not organising a referendum, the NCSR had breached their constitutional right to participate in the governance of public affairs.

The SCC disagreed with such claims, stating that even after the changes brought about by the EU Constitutional Treaty, the Union is not a ‘state’ in the sense of Art. 7(1) of the Slovak Constitution, and that the EU Treaties, including the Constitutional Treaty, were correctly subjected to the regime of Art. 7(2). The SCC further added that ...the developments in the EU undoubtedly proceed in the direction of a future state, i.e. a state union, but the Constitutional Court believes that at present, it is impossible to predict, at which concrete moment this transformation will take place. The evidence in these proceedings revealed that the EU shows already at present a whole range of features and functions, which can be seen ... as features of a state union.

Having said that, the SCC concluded that all the future acts and steps that the SR will take in the framework of its relationship with the ... European Union, must be governed by the provision of Art. 7(2) of the Constitution. This would not be different even if the act were such as to change the qualitative parameters of the cooperation between the members of the given organisation, which is the case of the [Constitutional] Treaty. Therefore, irrespective of the character of the EU, neither the accession of the SR to the EU nor any other act initiated either by the EU or by the SR, could lead to a situation that would coincide with the aim or the content of Art. 7(1) of the Constitution.³¹

This conclusion is rather surprising, since it postulates either that the EU can never in the future become a ‘state union’ in the meaning of Art. 7(1) of the Slovak Constitution, or that even if it one day were to become such ‘state union’, the Slovak Constitution would nevertheless treat it, irrespective of its change in quality, as a mere ‘international organisation’ within the meaning of Art. 7(2) and without the need for a referendum. Both statements appear to be highly speculative and ought to be treated as a mere obiter, hardly apt for fixing the situation immutably for the future.

1.3.4 The Constitution does not address the relationship between EU law and Slovak constitutional law. It only recognises the primacy of EU law over (sub-constitutional) domestic legal norms. So far, there has not been any direct conflict between an EU law norm and a norm of Slovak constitutional law, so the question of the supremacy of the Constitution remains open.

³¹ Judgment of the SCC, II. ÚS 171/05 (EU Constitutional Treaty) of 27 February 2008.

Interestingly, however, a practical example of the presence of such a conflict can be found already in the Constitution itself. Pursuant to Art. 144(2) thereof, a judge who thinks that a provision of Slovak law is in conflict with an international treaty in the sense of Art. 7(5) of the Constitution (which includes the EU Treaties), shall suspend proceedings and refer the case to the SCC. This requirement seems to be in direct conflict with the *Simmenthal*³² ruling of the Court of Justice, and potentially also with the more recent *Melki and Abdeli*³³ judgment.

Even the SCC has acknowledged that in a situation like this, the ordinary court facing a conflict of a Slovak norm and a European norm should not refer the case to the SCC, but should rather follow the doctrine of Simmenthal. In its decision in case Pl. ÚS 3/09 (Health insurance), the SCC first quoted from the Court of Justice's rulings in Costa and Simmenthal, explaining the principle of primacy of EU law over domestic law and its practical effects for ordinary courts. It then noted that if an ordinary court is confronted with a conflict between a domestic legal norm and a provision of EU law, the judge is under a duty to give full effect to [the provision of EU law], if necessary refusing of its own motion to apply any conflicting provision of national legislation, even if adopted subsequently, and it is not necessary for the court to request or await the prior setting aside of such provision by legislative or other constitutional means.³⁴

In a similar vein, the last sentence of Art. 144(2) provides that '[t]he finding of the Constitutional Court of the Slovak Republic is binding for all courts'. In its decision in Križan,³⁵ the Grand Chamber of the Court of Justice indirectly negated this provision by stating that a national court, such as the referring court [the Supreme Court of the Slovak Republic – authors] is obliged to make, of its own motion, a request for a preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice even though it is ruling on a referral back to it after its first decision was set aside by the constitutional court of the Member State concerned and even though a national rule obliges it to resolve the dispute by following the legal opinion of that latter court.³⁶

These remain, however, points of potential conflict, so far limited to the pronouncements of the Court of Justice, but left 'unanswered' in any way by the SCC.

On a general note, however, it could be said that the SCC is an 'EU-friendly' court, as far as any generalisation of similar type may be made. Sometimes its judgments seem to be even overly optimistic towards EU law (e.g. the above-mentioned ruling in the case Pl. ÚS 3/09 (health insurance) or Pl. ÚS 10/14 (data retention), which both show willingness to include EU law and even ³² Case 106/77 Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v. Simmenthal [1978] ECR 00629.

³³ Joined cases C-188/10 and C-189/10 Aziz Melki and Sélim Abdeli [2010] ECR I-05667.

³⁴ Judgment of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 3/09 (Health insurance) of 26 January 2011.

³⁵ Case C-416/10 Križan and Others [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:8, paras. 62–73.

³⁶ Ibid., para 73.

international law in the referential framework for the SCC), but it is too early to deduce any general conclusions from the case law.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The role of the Slovak Parliament in EU matters is defined by the Constitution, by Constitutional Act No. 397/2004 Coll. on the cooperation of the NCSR and the Government of the SR in EU matters, and by Act No. 350/1996 Coll. on the rules of procedure of the NCSR.³⁷

At the moment of accession, the involvement of the NCSR and the cooperation between the NCSR and the Government in EU matters had not been settled in any way. This gap was filled shortly after accession, in June 2004, by the adoption of Constitutional Act No. 397/2004 Coll. It is a very short act, consisting of only four articles, aimed primarily at defining the respective powers of the NCSR and the Government in EU matters.

Pursuant to Art. 1, the Government has an obligation to inform the NCSR about the current EU agenda, about any draft legislation debated at the EU level, and about any draft opinions (draft EU legislation) or positions that are to be presented in the name of the SR. Pursuant to Art. 2, the NCSR may endorse any such draft opinions, and any other opinions in EU matters. If the NCSR does not issue an opinion within two weeks, it is presumed that it has endorsed the Government's opinion. Furthermore, Art. 2(4) states that a parliamentary decision shall be legally binding for any member of the Government, and Art. 2(5) allows for an exception from this principle in pressing cases, in which case the member of the Government must act in the interest of the SR without delay, but is subsequently obliged to inform the NCSR of the action. The Constitutional Act also requires a regular parliamentary deliberation on EU matters that is to take place at least once a year, on the basis of a report proposed by the Government. This discussion should result in a set of recommendations given by the NCSR to the Government for the following year.

Although the above-mentioned Constitutional Act undoubtedly strengthened the position of the NCSR in EU matters, it should be pointed out that the Government played a major role in the approximation of the Slovak legal system to the EU legal system before accession, and continued to play a major role in the transposition of certain EU legal acts after accession. Pursuant to Art. 7(2), third sentence, and Art. 120(2) of the Constitution, the Government has 'the power to issue regulations to implement laws'. This power is fleshed out further by Act No. 19/2002 on the conditions of issuing governmental regulations, which defines in its Art. 2(1) the specific areas in which a governmental regulation may substitute a legislative transposition of EU law measures. These are custom duties; banking legislation; corporate accountancy and taxation; intellectual property; protection of workers; financial services; consumer protection; technical regulations and norms; use of nuclear power; transportation; agriculture; environment; and free movement of labour. In practice, this brings about a major decrease in the parliamentary workload, and it shifts the burden of transposition from the legislative to the executive branch. It also proves that transposition of EU norms is seen as a technical issue, rather than a politically sensitive one. However, pursuant to Art. 2(2) of the Act, such governmental regulations cannot regulate fundamental rights and freedoms, the state budget or other matters where the Constitution requires a law, and also cannot create new state institutions.

³⁷ For a detailed study of the respective roles of the Parliament and the Government in EU matters, see Bartovič 2010.

As for the practical organisation of the EU agenda in the NCSR, Art. 45 of the Rules of Procedure of the NCSR allows the NCSR to create specialised committees. On the basis of this provision, the NCSR created the Committee for European Affairs (CEA) in April 2004. Before the creation of the CEA, EU matters had been dealt with by the Foreign Committee, the Constitutional and Legal Affairs Committee, and the Committee for European Integration.³⁸ The Rules of Procedure of the NCSR were then amended to include a separate provision on the CEA, namely Art. 58a, which provides for the composition of the committee (proportionate representation of all the parliamentary political parties), its competences and various procedural matters. The CEA currently consists of 15 members and 15 substitute members, it functions continuously (unlike other committees) and it is one of the busiest parliamentary committees. However, there is quite a difference between the formally strong position of the CEA and its actual weight. The main problems are: lack of interest in the EU agenda, low administrative and expert capacity to handle the EU agenda, late involvement of the Parliament in the creation of positions and the fact that the CEA members are simultaneously members of other parliamentary committees, which leaves them with little time to focus on the CEA agenda.³⁹

1.4.2 In 2003, the SR held a referendum on accession to the European Union. The question was worded as follows: ‘Do you agree to the Slovak Republic becoming a Member State of the European Union?’ In total, 52.15% of registered voters participated in this referendum, 92.46% of whom voted in favour of the accession and 6.2% against. It is noteworthy that out of the eight referendums that have been organised in the history of the independent Slovak Republic, this was the only one where the required turnout threshold (higher than 50%) was reached.

Since the accession to the EU is governed by Art. 7(2) of the Constitution rather than by Art. 7(1), a referendum was actually not constitutionally required. Therefore, even if the required turnout had not been reached, the accession would have been possible. However, if a majority of voters had voted no (and if the turnout had been high enough), the Parliament would have been able to change the outcome of the referendum only after the lapse of a three-year time limit.

³⁸ Ibid.

³⁹ Ibid. The name of this expert report ('Giant in Theory, Dwarf in Practice') gives a clear indication of this.

In the case of the EU Constitutional Treaty and the Lisbon Treaty, no referendum was held. An analysis of the constitutional complaint in relation to the failure to hold a referendum in the case of the EU Constitutional Treaty was provided in Sect. 1.3.3 above.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 There was some academic discussion concerning the need for a constitutional amendment in relation to the Slovak accession to the EU. Although some authors argued that an amendment was not absolutely necessary, the prevailing opinion seemed to be that the Constitution should be amended in order to prepare the Slovak legal order for membership in the EU.

Again, as already explained above, due to the overwhelming political support for the SR to emerge from the Mečiar-period and accede to the EU in the ‘first wave’ (see Sect. 1.2.3 above), the 2001 EU Amendment was seen as a constitutional necessity, an exercise in quick constitutional drafting, and did not spur much of any of the indicated types of debates.

1.5.2 Since the Slovak Constitution was amended significantly prior to the Slovak accession to the EU, this question is not relevant in the Slovak context.

1.5.3 Perhaps as in any federated structure, within which the individual units have their own rules, the role of national constitutions remains the same as it has always been: in the bottom-up direction, it is one of initiative and inspiration; in the top-down direction, it is largely one of control and checks and balances. Intriguingly, in its horizontal dimension, it may be both. Thus, looking at the European constitutional reality empirically rather than normatively, the Member States, driven by their constitutional ideas and backgrounds, have been operating as both the initiators and the inspiration for change at the European level. Conversely, national constitutions, their provisions and the values enshrined therein have always been the guiding principles for both national interpretation of EU law and a potential resistance to it on the national level.

Such ongoing interaction between the layers in Europe, in the recent two decades enlarged by its horizontal dimension (the Member States being obliged by the EU to recognise and to enforce decisions of other Member States in various fields and areas) does not perhaps necessitate explicit constitutional amendments. These are of course possible, on both levels, but not, strictly speaking, necessary. They are also not necessarily one-directional, as the question would imply, i.e. that the Member States would have to alter their values and convictions under the impact of the EU and other international organisations. Member States, or a number of them, acceded in ‘clusters’, which might possibly lead to a ‘qualified revolt’ whereby the Member States might push the European or international level towards a constitutional change, not necessarily vice-versa.⁴⁰

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 The Slovak Constitution includes a full catalogue of fundamental rights in its Chap. II (Arts. 11–54). This chapter is divided into eight sub-chapters (general provisions; fundamental human rights and freedoms; political rights; rights of national minorities and ethnic groups; economic, social and cultural rights; environmental and cultural heritage rights; the right to judicial protection; concluding provisions). The Slovak human rights catalogue is thus rather comprehensive, spelling out in detail the individual rights that are guaranteed on the constitutional level.

General principles of law (in the more traditional, narrower sense, i.e. excluding human rights but including a range of principles such as legal certainty, non-retroactivity, protection of good faith, etc.) are not explicitly listed in the Slovak Constitution. They are, however, universally understood as components or elements of the rule of law principle (or, rather, in the continental context, of the Rechtsstaat principle), as established in Art. 1(1) of the Constitution (see Sect. 2.1.3 below), and as such applied by the courts.

As for the enforceability of fundamental human rights, Art. 12(2) of the Constitution lays down that fundamental rights and freedoms ‘are guaranteed to everyone’. The most robust way of enforcing one’s rights is through judicial protection, both in ordinary courts and before the SCC. Pursuant to Art. 127(1) of the Constitution, the SCC ‘shall decide on complaints by natural persons or legal persons objecting to violation of their basic rights and freedoms ... unless another court shall make decisions on the protection of such rights and freedoms’. Furthermore, fundamental rights and freedoms also enjoy constitutional protection by the Prosecutor’s Office of the SR (by virtue of Arts. 149–151) and by the Ombudsperson (by virtue of Art. 151a).

Moreover, since the SCC understands fundamental rights to impose positive obligations on the state, these in turn bind (and ought to be upheld) by all state bodies and authorities. As the SCC stated in its decision in II. ÚS 8/96 (abduction of Michal Kováč Jr.), ⁴⁰ For examples, see e.g. Bobek 2017.

[t]he rights and freedoms embedded in the Constitution of the Slovak Republic are protected by a positive obligation. The content of this positive obligation of the state in relation to rights and freedoms of a citizen is the duty to take measures to protect the rights that have been guaranteed to citizens in the Constitution.⁴¹

2.1.2 The general constitutional provisions on limiting rights and imposing duties are set out in Art. 13 of the Constitution. It reads as follows:

- (1) Duties may be imposed
 - (a) by statute or on the basis of a statute, within its limits, and while complying with basic rights and freedoms,
 - (b) by international treaty pursuant to Art. 7, par. 4 which directly establishes rights and obligations of natural persons or legal persons, or
 - (c) by government ordinance pursuant to Art. 120, para. 2.
- (2) Limits to basic rights and freedoms may be set only by a statute under conditions laid down in this Constitution.
- (3) Legal restrictions of basic rights and freedoms must apply equally to all cases which meet prescribed conditions.
- (4) When restricting basic rights and freedoms, attention must be paid to their essence and meaning. These restrictions may only be used for the prescribed purpose.

The general rights limitation clause is thus quite robust. It contains all the limitations one normally associates with the (largely German-styled) rights-limitation clause. Most importantly, Art. 13(1)(a) and 13(2) provide for 'Gesetzesvorbehalt' – limits to rights and the imposition of duties are generally permissible only by a statute, i.e. an Act of Parliament, not by an executive decree – although letters (b) and (c) do water down this original limitation somewhat. Furthermore, Art. 13(4) protects the essence of the rights and prevents their 'hollowing out'.

In addition to these general rights-limitation provisions, there are also specific (or sectoral) limitations of rights. In addition to Art. 7(4) and Art. 120(2), which are mentioned explicitly in the first paragraph of Art. 13, there are other constitutional provisions that limit rights, such as Art. 17 on the conditions of detention, Art. 25(1) on compulsory military service, Art. 42(1) on compulsory school attendance and Art. 54 on restrictions on the entrepreneurial activities of certain professions and restrictions on the right to strike.

As a 'limit to the limit', there is Art. 2(2), which establishes that 'state bodies may act only on the basis of the Constitution, within its limits, and to the extent and in a manner which shall be laid down by law'. Therefore, the state cannot limit fundamental rights and freedoms without an express entitlement by the Constitution or by a law.

⁴¹ Judgment of the SCC, II. ÚS 8/96 (Abduction of Michal Kováč Jr) of 4 September 1996.

Finally, the Constitution also includes a specific ‘procedural limit’ as to changes to the constitutional system: pursuant to Art. 93(3), fundamental rights and freedoms cannot form the subject matter of a referendum.

2.1.3 The rule of law Article 1(1) of the Constitution states that the SR ‘is a sovereign, democratic state governed by the rule of law’. This principle is perhaps closer, both in its wording and in its content, to the German concept of Rechtsstaat, rather than the common law concept of the rule of law. The elements of this principle are not spelled out in the Constitution, but courts (especially the SCC) often refer to the ‘rule of law principle’ in their reasoning. They treat the principle as an umbrella concept that includes various general principles of law (e.g. legal certainty, legitimate expectations, the prohibition of (true) retroactivity, etc.).

Over the years, the SCC has expanded the rule of law into one of the robust constitutional principles. For example in PL. ÚS 3/00, the SCC opined that:

The rule of law principle also includes the citizens’ trust in the legal order. In principle, it is necessary to protect the trust that the legal consequences that follow from unchanging factual circumstances are recognised (and remain recognised). However, the protection of such trust does not apply in cases where trust in a certain legal state would not be substantively justified, i.e. the rule of law principle does not protect a citizen from every subjectively perceived loss of trust or from every disappointment.⁴²

Moreover, in its decision in PL. ÚS 17/08, the SCC subscribed to a material notion of the rule of law:

The material rule of law concept includes a requirement of substantive quality and value quality of a legal norm, which is to ensure that the legal instrument, as implemented in the chosen legislative regulation, is adequate in relation to the legitimate aim pursued by the legislator, and that the chosen legislative measure is compatible with constitutional principles and democratic values.⁴³

Thus, the rule of law is in practice both frequently invoked by applicants and also frequently employed by the courts in their reasoning. Its specific components tend, however, to be quite rich and variable.

Judicial protection The right to access to a court is embedded in Art. 46 of the Constitution. It reads as follows:

(1) Everyone may claim his right in a manner laid down by law in an independent and impartial court and, in cases laid down by law, at another body of the Slovak Republic.

(2) Anyone who claims to have been deprived of his rights by a decision of a public administration body may turn to the court to have the lawfulness of such decision re-examined, unless laid down otherwise by law. The re-examination of decisions concerning basic rights and freedoms may not, however, be excluded from the court’s authority.

⁴² Judgment of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 3/00 (Land ownership) of 24 April 2001.

⁴³ Judgment of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 17/08 (Rule of law) of 20 May 2009.

(3) Everyone is entitled to compensation for damage incurred as a result of an unlawful decision by a court, or another state or public administration body, or as a result of an incorrect official procedure.

(4) Conditions and details concerning judicial and other legal protection shall be laid down by law.

This right has been given a rich and wide interpretation from the very beginning. Its connection with the rule of law principle is obvious for example from the decision of the SCC in case I. ÚS 4/94, in which the Court stated: ‘the right to judicial protection is not exhausted by a victory in a civil dispute; the right to judicial protection also means that the courts are bound by law, both procedurally and substantively.’⁴⁴ The flipside of this argument has been expressed by the SCC in case I. ÚS 6/97: ‘[t]he practice of a judicial institution, which acts in accordance with substantive and procedural provisions of law, cannot establish a breach of a fundamental right embedded in Art. 46(1) of the Constitution’.⁴⁵

Publication of legislation As a general rule, in order to become valid law, legal acts must be duly published in the Collection of Laws. With regard to Slovak laws (statutes), this principle is provided for in Art. 1 of Act No. 1/1993 Coll., on the Collection of Laws of the Slovak Republic. Moreover, the duty to make statutes accessible to the public may be seen, on the constitutional level, as an emanation of the principle of the rule of law, provided for in Art. 1(1) of the Constitution.⁴⁶ For a more detailed examination of the issue of unpublished legislation, refer to Sect. 2.5 below.

Limitation of rights Finally, as already outlined in Sect. 2.1.2 above, Art. 13 of the Constitution expressly provides, in the form of a provision on limitation of rights, that duties and obligations (which naturally also include sanctions and penalties) may be provided for only by a statute, i.e. an Act of Parliament. However, this previously categorical limitation has been watered down by the EU Amendment, which put international treaties into a similar category under Art. 7(4), but most importantly did the same for government ordinances, pursuant to Art. 120(2). The latter category includes government ordinances that are adopted for the implementation of EU measures in given areas (further above in Sects. 1.2.1 and 1.4.1).

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 As to the balancing of fundamental rights with economic free movement rights, the question cannot be usefully answered if it is framed in this way. First, as a general matter, courts are typically not allowed to frame the answer in the way they please, but have to frame it according to the structure of the case that is brought before them. The role of the given court and the type of cases it receives also pre-determine what will be the ‘basic rule’ and what will be its ‘limitation’ or ‘exception’. Thus, since the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) is not a general human rights court, the cases brought before it come as ‘economic’ cases – free movement is the basic rule and other values and interests are the limitations. That is logical and relates to the competence and the field of application of EU law: there must first be an EU law (economic) element and only then can any human rights considerations be triggered, at least certainly as far as Member States’ measures are concerned, which was also the case in both *Omega*⁴⁷ and Schmidberger.⁴⁸ Conversely, national constitutional courts are human rights courts. Thus, cases brought before them are pleaded primarily on human rights grounds, with other values and interests providing the permissible limitations or exceptions.

⁴⁴ Judgment of the SCC, I. ÚS 4/94 (Judicial protection) of 27 October 1994.

⁴⁵ Judgment of the SCC, I. ÚS 6/97 (Judicial review) of 23 January 1997.

⁴⁶ See e.g. Hodás 2008, p. 527.

From this point of view, the ‘structure’ of the case is given by the nature of the court. The idea presented by some of the critiques of the Court’s decision in *Viking*⁴⁹ and Laval,⁵⁰ namely that the Court of Justice ‘prioritised’ the economic freedom over social rights because the economic free movement was the rule and fundamental rights the exception, demonstrates considerable disregard for the competence of the CJEU. A case may fall into the competence of the CJEU only if it is presented as an ‘economic’ case. The (primary) freedom invoked is bound to be ‘economic’, i.e. one of the four freedoms, in order for the case to fall within the scope of application of EU law. Reversing the rule with the exception could amount to asserting a general human rights competence by the CJEU, so dreaded by all the Member States and a substantial number of legal scholars.

Conversely, a national constitutional court will always approach a case submitted to it with the primary vantage point of the fundamental right in question, to which EU law and economic freedoms might provide legitimate exceptions. The SCC has not yet ruled on the specific balance between fundamental rights and EU economic freedoms, but balancing human rights with economic interests generally is a common exercise performed by the Court. Thus, for example, in a case dealing with the alleged unconstitutionality of expropriation due to the construction of highways, the SCC reasoned by a typical proportionality test, presented in four consecutive steps: (1) is there a fundamental right at stake? (2) is there an interference with such fundamental right? (3) is the interference lawful? (4) does the interference satisfy the test of proportionality, i.e. the conditions of legitimate aim,

⁴⁷ Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609.

⁴⁸ Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659.

⁴⁹ Case C-438/05 The International Transport Workers’ Federation and The Finnish Seamen’s Union [2007] ECR I-10779.

⁵⁰ Case C-341/05 Laval un Partneri [2007] ECR I-11767. For a summary of this traditional ‘labour law’ or ‘human rights’ critique of both decisions, see Introduction in Freedland and Prassl 2014.

suitability, necessity and proportionality in the strict sense?⁵¹ The Act on Highway Construction that provided for the possibility of exploitation for the purpose of highway construction was eventually struck down by the SCC on the grounds of the necessity condition. The SCC observed in para. 74 of the judgment that the adopted measures were certainly not the least restrictive way to reach the desired aim.

From the above, follows the second point: since the two courts have differently defined jurisdiction, the ‘adjustment’ potential is rather limited. The CJEU will not receive primarily human rights cases (since these are outside its competence, unless they have some other link with EU law), and national constitutional courts will not deal with free movement or other economic cases if they have no primary fundamental rights element (they will declare these to be devoid of a constitutional dimension and for the ordinary courts to deal with). This does not preclude, however, that each of the actors might be more ready to take the interests and concerns from the other ‘box’ into account in its balancing exercise. However, no such distinct change can be traced in the case law of the SCC and, on a general level, would be difficult to expect.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

Constitutional framework The Slovak Constitution offers an extensive and detailed framework for principles of criminal law, including issues such as personal freedom and limits to deprivation of liberty (Art. 17), access to courts (Art. 46), defence rights (Arts. 47–48), nulla poena sine lege (Art. 49) or the presumption of innocence and the ne bis in idem principle (Art. 50).

Implementation of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) in Slovakia European criminal law has brought a number of major changes into the Slovak legal order. As has been explained in Sect. 1.2.1 above, the Slovak Constitution was amended in 2001 so that the prohibition of surrendering a citizen to another state was removed from the provision of Art. 23(4) of the Constitution, without any further guarantees or limits. This solution may seem overly enthusiastic and it has been criticised as lacking the necessary constitutional guarantees, such as are provided for example in Art. 16(2) of the German Constitution.⁵² On the other hand, it might be added that the EU amendment was adopted in 2001, i.e. before the adoption of the EAW Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA.⁵³ The reason for the Slovak amendment at that time was the pending ratification of the Statute of the International Criminal

⁵¹ See Judgment of the SCC, No. Pl. ÚS 19/09 (Highways) of 26 January 2011, para. 69; see also para. 74.

⁵² See Hodás 2011, pp. 68–69.

⁵³ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

Court and not the EU EAW Framework Decision, which, at the time, had been contemplated but not yet adopted.

On the national sub-constitutional level, the EAW Framework Decision was first transposed into the Slovak legal order by Act No. 403/2004 Coll., on the European Arrest Warrant. The practice subsequently showed that this implementation was insufficient in various regards – it failed to transpose some of the EAW provisions comprehensively, it was not systematic enough and it was too rigorous in matters of detention for some types of crimes.⁵⁴ This act was therefore repealed and replaced by Act No. 154/2010 Coll., on the European Arrest Warrant (currently in force), which corrected these insufficiencies. The new Act built on the existing terminology introduced in the original Act, but it introduced a new systematic structure that should be more in line with the practical experience in the field.⁵⁵ The most important change, from a procedural point of view, was the introduction of preliminary detention (Art. 15 of Act No. 154/2010 Coll.), inspired by the provisions of the criminal code that regulate extradition. Substantively, the crucial change was the inclusion of a proportionality clause in Art. 5(3) of the Act, which states: ‘A court shall not issue a European arrest warrant if it is clear before such issuance that the requesting of the person from a foreign country would cause a degree of harm disproportionate to the significance of the criminal proceedings or to the consequences of the criminal act.’

The SCC has not yet had a chance to (fully) assess the compatibility of the EAW provisions with fundamental human rights. However, in a recent case Pl. ÚS 12/2012 (Hungarian car accident),⁵⁶ two judges expressed doubt about the constitutionality of the current constitutional framework in their dissenting opinions. The facts of the case were as follows: in 2002, a Slovak citizen (Mr. J.B.) caused a car accident in Hungary. In 2004, Hungarian courts declared that Mr. J.B. was guilty of having caused a car accident that resulted in the death of a person, and requested that Mr. J.B. be surrendered to the Hungarian authorities in order to serve his sentence of imprisonment on Hungarian territory. The Slovak authorities complied with this request and surrendered Mr. J.B. to Hungary. After having served his custodial sentence in Hungary, Mr. J.B. sued the SR for damages, arguing that the legal framework that had allowed his surrender to Hungary was unconstitutional. The Slovak regional court seized of the question referred the case to the SCC, requesting constitutional review on the basis of Art. 23 of the Constitution ('freedom of movement and right of abode'). However, the SCC rejected this request on procedural grounds, since the subject matter of the pending case (i.e. Mr. J.B.'s claim for damages) was too remote from the question of constitutionality of Art. 23.

The two dissenting judges, Justice Macejková and Justice Mészáros, nonetheless expressed concerns about the constitutionality of the current legal framework, not due to the requirements flowing from the EAW itself, but rather due to the way it was transposed by the Slovak legislator. In the words of Justice Mészáros, ‘the Slovak legislator has not used and is not using the leeway offered by the Framework Decision, which allows for a higher constitutional protection of citizens’.⁵⁷ Justice Macejková furthermore stated that the legal framework would only be in conformity with constitutional requirements if the legislator decided to broaden the protection of citizens’ fundamental rights and to guarantee the right to the widest extent allowed by the Framework Decision on the EAW, namely by Art. 4(6) and 5(3) thereof. This change was indeed introduced into the law, not in reaction to the dissenting opinion of Justice Macejková, but in reaction to Framework Decision 2008/909/JHA of 27 November 2008, on the application of the principle of mutual recognition to judgments in criminal matters.⁵⁸ Following this EU legislative act, the NCSR adopted Act No. 549/2011 Coll., on recognition and execution of criminal decisions, and Act No. 344/2012 Coll., on changes to Acts No. 154/2010 and 549/2011 Coll.

⁵⁴ See the Explanatory Report to Act No. 154/2010 Coll., Part A (General Part).

⁵⁵ Ibid.

⁵⁶ Judgment of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 12/2012 (Hungarian car accident) of 11 July 2012.

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 To our knowledge, no concerns have been voiced or discussed with regard to the lack of the presumption of innocence under the EAW mechanism in Slovakia. At an early stage of the Hungarian car accident case, the regional court that decided on the surrender of Mr. J.B. to Hungary merely stated that ‘the judicial authority of the executing state is not entitled to examine the guilt or innocence of the person requested by the EAW, but merely to decide whether the EAW will or will not be executed’.⁵⁹ The courts thus comply with the provisions of the EAW Framework Decision, as transposed into Slovak law, which states that the executing judicial authorities are not competent to examine the question of guilt.

Moreover, it is not quite clear in the Experts’ view how the presumption of innocence would specifically be undermined by a national court surrendering a person under the EAW mechanism, unless of course there is an unspoken assumption that the requesting court in another Member State is not able to conduct a fair trial. If that were the case, the key problem would rather be posed in terms of absence of fair trial or trial in a reasonable time, but not necessarily in terms of the presumption of innocence. Moreover, the fact that some persons might be deprived of their liberty for a limited time before the question of their guilt is finally determined before a judge is a general feature of any domestic legal system, inherent to the institution of pre-trial custody. Also in similar, purely domestic cases, persons might be deprived of their liberty by a court order, without being immediately allowed to rebut all of the charges raised against them, which is possible only at the later full trial.

⁵⁷ Ibid.

⁵⁸ Council Framework Decision 2008/909/JHA of 27 November 2008 on the application of the principle of mutual recognition to judgments in criminal matters imposing custodial sentences or measures involving deprivation of liberty for the purpose of their enforcement in the European Union, [2008] OJ L 327/27.

⁵⁹ See the decision of the Regional Court in Košice, Ntc 2/04-124 (22 February 2005), as paraphrased in the Judgment of the SCC (Hungarian car accident), n. 56 above, para. 21.

2.3.1.2 When Slovak courts are asked to surrender a person to another Member State, they do not examine the question of guilt per se. Pursuant to Act No. 154/2010 Coll., courts merely examine whether there are any reasons (obligatory or facultative) not to execute the EAW at stake, but they do not go beyond this analysis, since they do not have such power. The executing court is not in a position to examine the question of guilt, since that question will be examined by the foreign court that has issued the EAW. Therefore, to our knowledge, extradition has never been refused on the ground of a claim of innocence.

The procedural guarantees, including the provisions regarding the hearing of the requested person, are regulated in detail by Act No. 154/2010 Coll., which is a very loyal transposition of the EAW Framework Decision. As a result, the Slovak legal framework honours the principle of mutual trust between the EU Member States in their respective systems of criminal law. Again, under the logic of the EAW mechanism, the Slovak courts could hardly do otherwise, unless the EAW system were to revert to a traditional form of extradition proceedings as known in international law where a number of issues would be checked by the extraditing court.

Furthermore, some data have been published regarding the number of persons surrendered (a) from other states to Slovakia, and (b) from Slovakia to other states; this is summarised in Table 1.

Table 1 Data regarding surrender of persons in Slovakia

Year	Number of people handed over from other countries to the SR	Number of people handed over from the SR to other countries
2008	116	36
2009	143	53
2010	152	48
2011	170	65
2012	157	45
2013	140	47
2014	143	58

Source The Slovak Ministry of Interior. [See the statistics of the Slovak Ministry of Interior. http://www.minv.sk/?European_Arrest_Warrant]

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 The abolition of dual criminality has not been addressed by the Slovak courts. Technically, the principle of nulla poena sine lege is not breached, since the legal framework incorporates the EAW as a legal instrument into the legal order, and it is thus foreseeable for citizens that in certain cases, they can be prosecuted for crimes that are (only) punishable in Member States other than the SR.

By way of constitutional provisions, Art. 17 of the Constitution states: '(1) Personal freedom is guaranteed. (2) No one may be prosecuted or deprived of freedom other than for reasons and in a manner which shall be laid down by law', and Art. 49 states: 'Only the law establishes which conduct constitutes a criminal act and what punishment or other form of deprivation of rights or property may be inflicted upon those who commit it.' Since the provisions of the EAW Framework Decision have been properly implemented, they have become part of the Slovak legal framework.

Still, concerns have been expressed by academic experts. Jakubčík has claimed that Art. 2(2) of the EAW Framework Decision is 'the most controversial point of the law on the EAW', since it brings about 'severe procedural consequences for Slovak judicial authorities'.⁶⁰ He considers the 32 categories to be too vaguely formulated and too broad, which results in the incorrect classification of crimes by the Member States, or even abuse of the vagueness by the Member States.⁶¹ However, apart from the occasional academic voices, the issues outlined above have not, to our knowledge, given rise to any (constitutional) litigation.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 In contrast to the Spanish constitutional system but similarly to a number of other legal systems including the Czech legal system, the Slovak legal order does not perceive in absentia judgments as a constitutional problem. Articles 358–362 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act No 301/2005 Coll.) provide for a specific type of criminal procedure entitled 'proceedings against a fugitive'. This type of procedure will be triggered against an accused person who evades criminal proceedings by escaping abroad or by hiding. The fugitive is assigned an attorney, who will represent the fugitive throughout the entire procedure. Article 361(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure expressly provides that the announcement of the date and place of the trial will be made public and will be served to the appointed attorney. The trial will, however, take place irrespective of whether or not the accused has obtained knowledge of it. Finally, Art. 362(2) opens the possibility of a retrial once the accused obtains knowledge of either the trial or the final sentence, made subject to two types of time limits: a subjective one, i.e. six months from the moment the accused obtained knowledge of the trial/sentence, and an objective one, referring to the general provisions on prescription for the individual crime provided for in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Thus, re-trial is conceived as a matter of right, open to the accused, typically if the accused returns to the national territory. It does not, however, appear to be a constitutional requirement. As a consequence, in absentia judgments and their execution under the EAW mechanism are constitutionally possible. To our knowledge, their constitutionality has not been challenged. Even if it were, it is hard to see how the SCC could find such practice unconstitutional. After all, it is the fugitive who by his absence or hiding obstructs the course of justice, and there is the possibility of a re-trial should the fugitive return to the national territory.

⁶⁰ See Jakubčík 2009, pp. 1178–1188.

⁶¹ Ibid.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 As to the issue of providing assistance to extradited citizens or residents, there are two different scenarios that arise from this question. First, legal aid provided by the surrendering Member State to the person it is surrendering, but before any trial takes place in the requesting Member State. Second, ex post facto help to persons who have been extradited but subsequently acquitted in the requesting Member State or subjected to extensively long proceedings or a miscarriage of justice.

As far as the first scenario is concerned, pursuant to Decree No. 135/1994 Coll., on the expatriation of persons, the SR bears some of the costs. Article 8 of this Decree states the following:

- (1) Costs incurred by the surrendering of the sentenced person, who is in detention or who is serving their imprisonment sentence, to the competent body of the Police forces, are borne by the Prison Service of the Slovak Republic.
- (2) Personal expenses and travel expenses incurred by the expatriation are borne by the sentenced person alone, unless another natural or legal person decides to bear them.
- (3) If the sentenced person does not have their own financial means to cover the costs of the expatriation sentence, these are borne by the Police forces.

There appear, however, to be no dedicated national funds for assisting surrendered persons in other Member States. This is perhaps not entirely surprising, since under the logic of the EAW mechanism, the surrendered individual should be allowed to make use of the local system of legal aid in the state to which he or she is surrendered.

The same logic applies to the second scenario. Under Slovak law, damages can be claimed from the Slovak state for unlawful detention, excessively long proceedings or other miscarriages of justice.⁶² However, such damages must be attributable to a failure on the part of the Slovak (judicial) authorities.⁶³ The rationale behind the right to compensation has been clarified by the Supreme Court of the SR:

⁶² See Art. 46(3) of the Constitution: ‘Everyone is entitled to compensation for damage incurred as a result of an unlawful decision by a court, or another state or public administration body, or as a result of an incorrect official procedure.’ This constitutional provision is further implemented in Act No. 514/2003 Coll. on the liability for damage caused by the exercise of public power, which regulates the conditions of compensation in cases of unlawful decisions, unlawful limitations of personal freedom, unlawful sanctions or incorrect administrative proceedings. Although the

If a state is to be truly rooted in the rule of law principle, it must bear objective liability for the conduct of its authorities that have directly interfered with the fundamental rights of an individual On the one hand, prosecuting authorities are obliged to prosecute and sanction criminal activities, but on the other hand, the state cannot avoid liability for the conduct of such authorities if such conduct turns out to be mistaken, interfering with fundamental rights. In such a situation, the important issue is not how the authorities have assessed the original accusation, but whether their presumptions were confirmed in the criminal proceedings.⁶⁴

On the other hand, a person who has been surrendered to Slovakia from another Member State under the EAW mechanism and who has been exposed to any of the above-mentioned miscarriages committed by Slovak authorities could claim damages under this heading.

As for any institutionalised assistance to individuals involved in trials abroad, there is a difference between what would be desired and what would be legally and economically possible. With regard to individual fates and situations, some form of financial support could only be commended. Structurally, however, it would be difficult to put into practice unless the ‘publicly funded’ assistance were adopted on the European level, with equal support for all European citizens. Only in this way could equality amongst EU citizens be guaranteed; if states were to reserve such aid only for their citizens (or previous residents) abroad, it would be likely that the aid would quickly bring about a ‘caste system’ in access to justice based on de facto nationality, amounting to a textbook example of indirect discrimination on the grounds of nationality. Imagine that a Czech and a Swedish citizen were surrendered under the EAW system to, for example, Greece, but only Sweden provided financial assistance to its citizens standing trial abroad. Both of them would be sent to an ‘unknown environment’ in which they arguably need assistance. Thus, their situation could be said to be in all material aspects comparable. But since only one Member State provided assistance, both ‘European citizens’ could be treated very differently. Furthermore, introduction of such state-based measures could also be understood as the re-introduction of traditional public international law features into EU law, whereby states would exercise a sort of ‘diplomatic protection’ over their citizens on the territory of other Member States, in the form and extent known in general public international law.

2.3.4.2 There are no comprehensive statistics capturing the proportion of unfounded extraditions, but once in a while, the media points out an individual story involving situation of an acquittal is not explicitly covered by the Act, courts have concluded by means of analogous interpretation that such situations also fall within the scope of the Act (see Judgment of the Supreme Court of the SR, No. 3 Cdo 194/2010).

⁶³ Cf. Art. 3(1) of Act No. 514/2003 Coll.

⁶⁴ See Decision of the Supreme Court of the SR, No. 4 M Cdo 15/2009.

judicial error. One recent case concerned a Slovak national who was extradited to the Netherlands under the provisions of the EAW, but was later acquitted because it became evident that the DNA samples had been mixed up and that the accused was in fact innocent. Mr. Harabin, the former president of the Supreme Court of the SR, has recently suggested that such cases are not rare and that it is necessary to initiate a legislative solution that would help minimise judicial errors and compensate innocent citizens who have suffered damage.⁶⁵ However, as already noted, no reliable data in this regard is available.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 After the Slovak accession to the EU, a number of mutual recognition issues arose in civil, administrative and criminal matters. For administrative matters, the cases were similar to those described in the question⁶⁶ and were in fact raised in a Czech request for a preliminary ruling in *Kyrian*⁶⁷ before the Court of Justice. The Kyrian case concerned the enforcement of an order for payment of excise duty owed by Mr. Kyrian, a Czech truck driver, to German customs authorities (Hauptzollamt Weiden) for amounts of imported alcohol. After the Czech accession to the EU in 2004, the German authorities served the order for payment on Mr. Kyrian through the Czech tax authorities pursuant to Art. 6 of Directive 76/308.⁶⁸ The case gave rise to two important questions of principle: the permissible scope of review of the administrative order for payment by the courts of the executing state and the question of the language in which the order was to be served. The element common to both questions was the problem of effective legal protection for decisions crossing

⁶⁵ See the media coverage of this story: (2013, July 10). Štefan Harabin navrhuje upraviť európsky zatýkaci rozkaz (Štefan Harabin suggests amending the European Arrest Warrant). Webnoviny.sk. <http://www.webnoviny.sk/slovensko/clanok/700381-stefan-harabin-navrhuje-upravit-europsky-zatykaci-rozkaz>.

⁶⁶ Generally, however, tax and customs decisions from other Member States would be enforced under the heading of cooperation in administrative matters, and not as a civil matter, as would appear to be indicated by the Estonian case. For an exception confirming the rule, see ECJ, Case C-49/12 Sunico and Others [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:545.

⁶⁷ Case C-233/08 Kyrian [2010] ECR I-00177.

⁶⁸ Council Directive 76/308/EEC of 15 March 1976 on mutual assistance for the recovery of claims resulting from operations forming part of the system of financing the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund, and of the agricultural levies and customs duties, [1976] OJ L 73/18, in the meantime replaced by Council Directive 2008/55/EC of 26 May 2008 on mutual assistance for the recovery of claims relating to certain levies, duties, taxes and other measures, [2008] OJ L 150/28, which was itself soon repealed by Council Directive 2010/24/EU of 16 March 2010 concerning mutual assistance for the recovery of claims relating to taxes, duties and other measures, [2010] OJ L 84/1.

borders between Member States: how far (if at all) may the executing Member State subject the administrative order coming from a different state to any substantive judicial review, in particular if because of a lack of knowledge, the individual did not seek judicial review in the requesting state? Moreover, in what language must the order for payment be served?

In Kyrian, the opposing approaches of the Advocate General and the Court itself are noteworthy. In his Opinion, AG Mazák robustly relied on effet utile and a purposive reading of the Directive: full effectiveness of horizontal mutual assistance for the recovery of levies and taxes cannot be called in question and must be asserted, even if the procedural system established by the Directive is rather questionable and leaves the individual without any possibility of judicial review of an administrative decision in the adoption of which he did not participate in the requesting state and which was simply served on him in his home state in a foreign language. Conversely, the Court (first chamber) took a much more critical and rights-protective approach to the interpretation of the Directive: the courts of the executing Member States are entitled to carry out (albeit limited) judicial review and the individual must be served with documents in the language of the executing Member States, i.e. in a vast number of cases, his own language.

In general, however, broader concerns of the sort outlined in the question cannot be detected in either Slovak case law or commentary. It cannot, however, be stated categorically that effective legal protection is no longer guaranteed following the introduction of cooperation in criminal, administrative and civil matters. Such assessment will be very case-dependent and cannot be stated in such categorical terms.

Perhaps the best approach in cases like that of Mr. Kyrian would be to open up the possibility of an administrative court retrial and/or extraordinary administrative review in the requesting Member State within the normally applicable time-limits, conditional upon the fact that the addressee of the original administrative act had no knowledge of the administrative proceedings against him being carried out in the requesting Member State. The burden of proof would be on the authorities of the requesting Member State that would have to establish that at a certain point in time, the addressee of the act was duly served (as would normally be the case with truck drivers involved in smuggling at the moment of the interception of the goods by the customs authorities).

2.3.5.2 In Slovak scholarship, there is no discernible debate about the suitability of transposing mutual recognition from internal market matters to criminal law and civil and commercial disputes. However, to state that the principle of mutual recognition cannot be transposed per se from the area of internal market to criminal, civil or administrative matters is again not warranted in such categorical terms. The debate should rather be conducted about the exact procedural modalities, scope and possible exceptions. After all, mutual recognition is not a principle unique to EU law. International cooperation writ large in criminal or civil matters is based on the same principle, albeit in a more limited form.

2.3.5.3 There has been no debate regarding a change in the role of the courts.

2.3.5.4 As already outlined above, Act No. 154/2010 Coll. (implementing the EAW Framework Decision), introduced a proportionality clause in its Art. 5(3) (see Sect. 2.3 above). However, this ‘check’ applies only if a Slovak court is the requesting court, i.e. for considerations whether or not an EAW shall be issued. It also has no bearing on the issue of guilt.

On a general level, re-introducing judicial review in the surrendering Member State prior to the surrender would essentially amount to returning to traditional extradition proceedings. The same applies to the potential re-insertion (or rather re-evaluation, since it still remains in some residual form in Regulation 44/2001)⁶⁹ of exequatur for civil and commercial matters. Should such (essentially political) decision be taken, EU legislation in these areas would become unnecessary.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The Data Retention Directive⁷⁰ was implemented in the Slovak legal order by inserting new provisions into a number of legal acts, most notably Act No. 351/2011 Coll., on electronic communications and Act No. 301/2005 Coll., the Code of Criminal Procedure. The Slovak legislator opted for a rather modest implementation: internet data are to be retained for 6 months and all other data for 12 months.

This implementing legislation was challenged in October 2012 by a group of 31 MPs in a petition for abstract constitutional review pursuant to Art. 125(1)(a) of the Constitution. The claimants argued that the provisions were in breach of a number of provisions of the Slovak Constitution,⁷¹ as well as Arts. 8 and 10 of the European ⁶⁹ Council Regulation (EC) No 44/2001 of 22 December 2000 on jurisdiction and the recognition and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters, [2001] OJ L 12/1.

⁷⁰ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁷¹ The allegedly violated provisions were the following:

‘Article 13: ...

(4) When restricting constitutional rights and liberties, attention must be paid to their essence and meaning. These restrictions must not be used for any other than the set purpose.

Article 16: (1) The inviolability of the person and its privacy is guaranteed. It can be limited only in cases defined by law.

...

Article 19: ...

(2) Everyone has the right to protection against unwarranted interference in his private and family life. (3) Everyone has the right to protection against the unwarranted collection, publication, or other illicit use of his personal data.

...

Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), and Arts. 7, 8, 11 and 52(1) of the EU Charter.

According to the claimants, the collection of data amounted to universal surveillance of all citizens, irrespective of their integrity and (lack of) criminal record. The claimants invoked a number of European Court of Human Rights cases, such as *Klaas v. Germany*⁷² and Copland v. UK,⁷³ arguing that the data collection and retention amounted to a significant interference in the private life of individuals. They acknowledged that the interference pursued a legitimate aim, namely the protection of national security, national defence and public security, but they disagreed with the appropriateness of the adopted measures and their necessity. Moreover, the claimants argued that the challenged measures denied the very nature of the right to privacy. With regard to the EU dimension of the discussion, the claimants requested the SCC to submit a reference for a preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice.⁷⁴

The SCC was aware of the pending case in Digital Rights Ireland, and the judges decided to wait for the outcome of that case, rather than to refer their own question to the Court of Justice. In April 2014, when the judgment in Digital Rights Ireland was published,⁷⁵ the SCC issued an interim decision⁷⁶ suspending the legal effects of the challenged legal provisions until the publication of the final decision in the case.

The decision on merits was delivered one year later, on 29 April 2015. The SCC opened its analysis by discussing the referential framework of constitutional review, acknowledging that

[e]ven after the accession of the SR to the EU, the referential framework of constitutional review remains limited to the norms of the Slovak constitutional order. However, the Constitutional Court cannot disregard the effects of EU law on the creation, application and interpretation of domestic norms in the fields of regulation that have their origin in EU law.⁷⁷

Article 22: (1) The privacy of correspondence and secrecy of mailed messages and other written documents and the protection of personal data are guaranteed. (2) No one must violate the privacy of correspondence and the secrecy of other written documents and records, whether they are kept in privacy or sent by mail or in another way, with the exception of cases to be set out in a law. Equally guaranteed is the secrecy of messages conveyed by telephone, telegraph, or other similar means.

...

Article 26: (1) The freedom of speech and the right to information are guaranteed.'

⁷² Klaas v. Germany, 22 September 1993, Series A no. 269.

⁷³ Copland v. the United Kingdom, no. 62617/00, ECHR 2007-I.

⁷⁴ See the claimants' submissions in Part I of the SCC judgment in case Pl. ÚS 10/14, n. 14 above, pp. 2–27.

⁷⁵ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] EU:C:2014:238.

⁷⁶ Decision of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 10/14-29 (Data retention, interim) of 23 April 2014.

⁷⁷ See Pl. ÚS 10/14 (Data retention), n. 14, para. 62.

The SCC then elaborated on the principles of the scope of application of EU law, referring to Art. 51(1) of the EU Charter and the explanatory notes thereto, as well as to the judgments of the Court of Justice in a number of cases (i.e. Wachauf,⁷⁸ ERT,⁷⁹ Fransson,⁸⁰ *Ymeraga*⁸¹ and *Siragusa*⁸²). On the basis of this case law, the SCC concluded that even after the annulment of the Data Retention Directive, the domestic implementation thereof is still to be seen as a measure adopted within the scope of application of EU law, since it represents a derogation from the E-Privacy Directive,⁸³ namely Art. 15(1) thereof.⁸⁴ The SCC therefore concluded that ‘in the constitutional review of the challenged decisions ... the Constitutional Court must also take into consideration the relevant provisions of the Charter, especially Art. 7, 8, and 52(1) thereof and the relevant case law of the Court of Justice of the EU’.⁸⁵ However, in its ruling, the SCC declared that the implementation measures were in breach of several provisions of the Slovak Constitution, namely Arts. 13(4), 16(1), 19(2), 19(3) and 22, as well as Art. 8 ECHR, without addressing the alleged breach of the Charter provisions.

The decision of the Court of Justice in *Ireland v. Council*⁸⁶ was not addressed at all by the SCC.

It can be only the purest speculation what the decision of the SCC or the SSC might have been if the case had been approached as an issue of national constitutional review only, without the constraints and guidance from the Court of Justice. However, as far as such speculation might be offered, it is more likely that if it were to face a purely national measure of a similar kind, the SCC, similarly to other constitutional courts in the Central European region, would be rather likely to annul such similar measure as unconstitutional.

The reason for such an outcome in balancing these values might be traced back to historical experience. In this regard, a number of new, Central and Eastern European Member States, but also Germany and Austria, highly value the right to privacy, in particular in its dimension as the prohibition of large-scale, systemic governmental ‘spying’ on a state’s own citizens.⁸⁷ The robust German constitutional case law

⁷⁸ Case 5/88 Hubert Wachauf v. Bundesamt für Ernährung und Forstwirtschaft [1989] ECR 02609.

⁷⁹ Case C-260/89 ERT [1991] ECR I-02925.

⁸⁰ Case C-617/10 Åkerberg Fransson [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:105.

⁸¹ Case C-87/12 Ymeraga and Ymeraga-Tafarshiku [2013] EU:C:2013:291.

⁸² Case C-206/13 Siragusa [2014] EU:C:2014:126.

⁸³ Directive 2002/58/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 July 2002 concerning the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector, [2002] OJ L 201/37.

⁸⁴ See Pl. ÚS 10/14 (Data retention), n. 14, para. 68.

⁸⁵ Ibid.

⁸⁶ Case C-301/06 Ireland v. European Parliament and Council [2009] ECR I-00593.

⁸⁷ As indirectly also confirmed by the list of the Member States that eventually ended up invalidating parts of the national measures implementing the Data Retention Directive, before as well as after the decision of the Court of Justice was rendered.

concerned with the right to ‘informational self-determination’⁸⁸ might be seen as providing the intellectual leadership in this area, followed in a number of the new Member States. The historical explanation for such enhanced protection of the private sphere is not difficult to understand. The reality of total surveillance by the secret police in the East before 1989 can perhaps be best explained visually, by simply watching, for instance, the film ‘The Lives of Others’.⁸⁹

Thus, if any advised guess might be entered, then the SCC, together with other constitutional courts in the region, would be more likely to react rather sensitively to a blanket, arguably disproportionate surveillance of citizens, and more likely to annul such measures if they originated from the national level only.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 Article 1 of the Act No. 416/2004 Coll., on the Official Journal of the EU, provides that only legally binding measures of the Union that have been published in the Official Journal of the EU may produce effects on the territory of the SR. Moreover, the SCC has also ruled that as a matter of general principle, laws cannot enter into effect before their publication in the Official Journal of the SR.⁹⁰

The absence of the due publication of secondary EU law after the 2004 accession⁹¹ was recognised as a pressing problem and discussed in the Slovak scholarship.⁹² However, the first court cases apparently came only after the decision of the Court of Justice in Skoma-Lux.⁹³ Thus, for example, in a decision of 18 March 2008, case No. 5 Sžf 59/2007, the Slovak Supreme Court applied the holding of the Court of Justice from Skoma-Lux to a case concerning the importation of a quantity of industrial salt from Ukraine and Belarus. The Supreme Court observed that at the time at which the contested importation took place, the Commission Regulation implementing the Common Customs Tariff was not available in Slovak, and annulled the decision of the customs authorities.

In contrast, there have been no cases concerning the (total) absence of publication of statutes (legislation), such as those that arose in the Heinrich case.⁹⁴ Under ⁸⁸ Starting already with BVerfGE 65, 1 (Volkszählung), judgment of the First Chamber of the Federal Constitutional Court of 15 December 1983, 1 BvR 209/83, resounding in the judgment of 2 March 2010, 1 BvR 256/08, 1 BvR 263/08, 1 BvR 586/08 that declared the German legislation transposing the Data Retention Directive unconstitutional.

⁸⁹ Original title ‘Das Leben der Anderen’, director Florian Henckel von Donnersmarck, release date 13 April 2007. The film depicts the surveillance measures, phone tapping and flat bugging by the East German secret State Police (Stasi) in East Berlin in the 1980s.

⁹⁰ See Judgment of the SCC, PL. ÚS 17/96 (Publicity of laws) of 4 March 1998.

⁹¹ Further e.g. Bobek 2006–2007.

⁹² Hodás 2008 or Procházka 2004, p. 856.

⁹³ Case C-161/06 Skoma-Lux [2007] ECR I-10841.

⁹⁴ Case C-345/06 Heinrich [2009] ECR I-01659.

the Slovak constitutional understanding outlined above (Sect. 2.1.3), the due publication of a statute would be seen as a necessary condition for its validity. If a statute has never been published, it has never came into existence as a valid piece of legislation. Thus, under Slovak constitutional rules, the total absence of publication of a legally binding act would entail the nullity of the act in question, i.e. it would be declared to be legally non-existent. That means that secret statutes (Acts of Parliament) cannot exist, because the legislative process would not be complete without a due publication of the statute.

By the way of a conclusion, it might be added that neither the Polish nor the Czech courts were obliged to ‘revisit their more stringent’ decisions for the simple reason that the result of the case would have been the same. What was typically attacked was the decision of a national administrative authority whereby the latter imposed a sanction or a fine based on EU legislation, which was not available in the official language of the Member State in question at the material time in question. Under Czech, Polish and Slovak law, such an administrative decision had to be annulled, because it was, formally speaking, issued without a legal basis (non-existent legislation). In its Skoma-Lux decision, the Court of Justice stated that such EU legislation is valid, but it cannot impose obligation on individuals. Thus, applying Skoma-Lux in the pending national cases also meant the compulsory annulment of the national administrative decisions. Therefore, although the underlying theoretical construction was different, the practical effect of both approaches amounted to the annulment of the original national administrative decision. For this reason, and also due to the fact that the Court of Justice expressly limited the temporal effects of the Skoma-Lux decision to pending cases,⁹⁵ the national courts with the originally more ‘stringent’ approach have not in fact been obliged to revisit anything.⁹⁶

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-Retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 There have been no such debates in the Slovak context.

⁹⁵ Case C-161/06 Skoma-Lux, n. 93 above, para. 72.

⁹⁶ Further on the Skoma-Lux aftermath, see Bobek 2016.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 The Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) and other proposed measures of financial solidarity across the eurozone have raised considerable discussion in the Slovak media, but have never been dealt with by the Slovak courts. The ESM was introduced into the Slovak legal order by Act No. 296/2012 Coll., on the European Stability Mechanism, which governs some of the rights and obligations of the SR in the ESM. The overall contribution of the SR amounts to 5.768 billion EUR, of which 659 million EUR is the paid-in capital, while the remaining amount of 5.109 billion EUR is the unpaid capital subscription. In 2012, the GDP of the Slovak Republic was 72.185 billion EUR, which means that the amount of the ESM paid-in capital equals 0.91% of the GDP, while the full ESM capital subscription of Slovakia represents about 8% of its GDP.

2.7.2 There has been no separate debate about the other proposed measures; the Slovak media usually treats these systems as one single topic of ‘financial solidarity in the eurozone’. In the public debates, the issues of transparency and democratic control were discussed in the context of the potential (Greek) sovereign default and the duty of Slovakia, as a Member of the eurozone, to contribute to yet another bailout programme for Greece. It was generally suggested that Slovakia, as a poorer Member State with nominal income per capita in fact lower than in Greece and as a state that itself was obliged to introduce harsh reform measures in the early 2000s, should not be asked to guarantee the public debts of a country that is in fact better off, but apparently not ready or able to carry out any reforms.

Thus, if Slovakia were really obliged to pay up at a certain stage, constitutional or legal dispute from the other side would be more conceivable than those described with regard to the recipient side, namely citizens or other subjects challenging the uncontrolled and thus undemocratic public spending of the Slovak authorities to pay someone else’s debts abroad.

It is also interesting to note that in response to the Slovak participation in the ESM Treaty, the Government of Prime Minister Radičová lost a confidence vote and was brought down.

2.7.3 Not applicable, since Slovakia has not been the subject to a bail-out programme.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Since the pleadings of the parties are not accessible to the public, it is impossible to state in how many cases individuals have requested a Slovak court to submit a request for a preliminary ruling concerning the validity of an EU measure.

What is, however, known is that Slovak courts have not yet submitted any preliminary ruling references with regard to the validity of an EU measure.

2.8.2 There is no representative debate discernible on the standard of judicial review by the CJEU in Slovakia.

2.8.3 As for the approach of the Slovak courts to the review of constitutionality/legality of legislation, no comprehensible statistical data exist in this regard. In general, it could be suggested that the SCC, in particular in the first Constitutional Court (1990s), as well as the early second Court (early 2000s), was quite an assertive court, exercising rigorous constitutional review. This would have led to a higher portion of annulments, both of general legislation as well as executive acts.

However, such findings have to be put into their proper context. First, Central and Eastern European constitutional courts, put in place in early 1990s as the guardians and enforcers of the new constitutional settlement,⁹⁷ in general demonstrated a higher rate of reversals than their Western counterparts.⁹⁸ This was logical since a substantial part of their work was to weed out the old ‘Communist’ legislation, practices and acts, which still remained in force but were no longer compatible with a democratic, rule-of-law-based state. Secondly, this already enhanced level of annulments was supplemented by the peculiar context of the Slovak political landscape of the second half of 1990s and early 2000s, in which the SCC played the occasional role of the residual guardian of the democratic legal order against the autocratic tendencies of the Mečiar-led Government.⁹⁹

For these reasons, the perhaps statistically higher rate or reversals/annulments carried out by the constitutional courts in the newly emerged CEE democracies in the 1990s up to perhaps the mid-2000s, cannot really be compared with the reversal rate prevailing in the established systems in the West, or with the EU system. Both of these are established systems, in which one would normally assume the reversal/annulment rate to be rather low, since the normal (non-transitory) political and legal mechanisms ought to operate properly.

2.8.4 As has already been outlined in the replies to the previous questions, the constitutional review carried out by the SCC with regard to EU law has so far been notably ‘light touch’ and quite deferential. In general terms, the SCC has accepted a variety of the Solange construction, and has effectively withdrawn its review from the area of competences transferred to the European level.

The decision of the SCC in case II. ÚS 501/2010¹⁰⁰ might provide an illustration in this regard. The case concerned a decision of the European Commission that declared a previous tax relief granted to a company as state aid incompatible with the internal market. The recipient of the state aid contested the internal binding force of the Commission’s decision, suggesting that national courts cannot be ⁹⁷ In detail Bobek 2013a, pp. 255–272.

⁹⁸ For a Visegrad comparison regarding the 1990s, including some figures, see Procházka 2002.

⁹⁹ For a personal retrospective, see Drgonec 2010.

¹⁰⁰ Judgment of the SCC, II. ÚS 501/2010 (Tax relief) of 6 April 2011.

bound by a mere administrative decision of a European institution. If they were, it would amount to the negation of the requirement of an independent judicial review and protection.

In dismissing such suggestions, the SCC noted that on the European level, judicial legal protection is guaranteed by the Union courts, which are entitled to review an administrative decision of the Commission. Expressly referring to the decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court in Solange II,¹⁰¹ the SCC concluded that it also accepts the control exercised by the Union courts with regard to the exercise of the competences transferred to the Union, and has generally no reason to consider it insufficient.

2.8.5 If such lower level standard of protection on the European level were to be ascertained, then a gap in judicial protection might indeed pose a problem. So far, it has not, however, been identified and discussed as such in the Slovak scholarship or case law. The rather sporadic and occasional dissonant voices direct themselves more towards the national legislator who, when transposing EU law and fleshing it out in the Slovak legal order, have not made full use of the leeway and discretion attributed to it by the Union legislator, such as was the case with the first domestic implementation of the EAW Framework Decision (discussed above in Sect. 2.3).

2.8.6 No discussion regarding equality of treatment of individuals within and outside the scope of national/EU law has arisen in Slovakia with regard to this issue.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 With regard to a shift in implementation of EU measures from parliamentary legislation to governmental regulation, see Sects. 1.4.1 and 2.1.3.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 The fact that a question framed in such a way in the FIDE 2012 Congress questionnaire stirred little enthusiasm in terms of national rapporteurs answering it might be explained in two ways. First, national experts and national rapporteurs are normally called to provide information and assessment with regard to the one Member State for which they are providing a report. Thus, if asked, a rapporteur might provide an opinion whether or not, for example, the principle 'nulla poena sine lege' forms a part of the national legal system. The rapporteur cannot, however, without the knowledge of the state of law of a sizeable number of other Member States, answer the question whether or not the same principle might be a common European constitutional tradition.

¹⁰¹ 19 BVerfGE 73, 339 [1986] (Solange II).

Thus, nulla poena sine lege or the right to judicial protection may certainly be viewed as general principles of law recognised in the Slovak constitutional system. Whether they might be elevated to the ‘European’ level in this regard and proclaimed to also be common European constitutional traditions is for the general rapporteur, having an overview of the situation in a number of Member States, to ascertain.

Secondly, however, the identification of general principles of law in the European legal space remains an exercise in ‘value comparison’.¹⁰² This means that establishing a new general principle in law is not a matter of mere ‘head counting’, in which it would be ascertained which is the most common solution with this then automatically accepted. It is an exercise in value congruence and approximation, seeking to find out which of the possible solutions match not only in terms of function, but also in terms of values and convictions. Thus, the fact that a majority of Member States adopts a solution X does not necessarily mean that the EU or the ECHR system must also adopt solution X.¹⁰³

2.10.2 To our knowledge, the ‘common constitutional traditions’ might play a greater role in EU law already today than visible from the outside. First, a number of national courts, when submitting a request for a preliminary ruling, already in fact make a reference to their national context/legal and constitutional situation and explain why this or that principle of EU law in question is of importance to them. In this way, they draw the attention of the Court of Justice to the existence of their national approach and tradition, often, however, with too much emphasis on the national aspect, rather than what is ‘common’ across the EU.¹⁰⁴ Secondly, when deciding more important cases, the Court of Justice’s Research and Documentation Service draws up comparative reports on issues commissioned by members of the Court, often dozens every year.

The idea that the reference to comparative materials ought to be ‘delegated’ to the national courts posing the question is both unrealistic and dangerous. It is unrealistic in the sense that it is difficult to expect ‘mortal’ judges to, in addition to all the work they have already got on their plate, carry out a Comparative Study of the question they are about to ask, drawing also on legislation and case law from other systems in the EU. It is equally dangerous because if such a requirement were to be set, it is likely that very few national judges would be inclined to send any more references. By way of a parallel, the Court of Justice has famously stated in *CILFIT*¹⁰⁵ that a Comparative Study of the approaches adopted by other Member States' highest courts is to be carried out in order to ascertain that the answer is 'equally obvious' to them and therefore there is no need for a preliminary ruling. It is perhaps also no secret that this requirement of the Court of Justice has remained a dead letter. In sum, if anybody should carry out comparative studies and draw the attention of the legal practice to the existence of or a need for a 'common constitutional tradition', it should be the legal scholarship, but hardly the judges.

¹⁰² Already in Zweigert 1949, who called it ‘wertende Rechtsvergleichung’.

¹⁰³ Further on the various ways of using comparative inspiration in EU law, see e.g. Lenaerts 2003 or Kiikeri 2001.

¹⁰⁴ For example, in the Heinrich case discussed above, the submitting Verwaltungssenat im Lande Niederösterreich clearly pointed out that under Austrian (and German) law, the absence of due publication is an issue of validity, not mere interpretation. The referring court also in fact posed its question as a request for a preliminary ruling on validity, not on interpretation. It was the Court of Justice which rephrased the question; but it was certainly aware of the German approach and tradition, which was also discussed in quite some detail by AG Sharpston in her Opinion in Case C-345/06 Heinrich [2009] ECR I-01659.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 As already explained in the Introductory Note to this report and occasionally reiterated with regard to rather specific and advanced doctrinal issues in EU law, such issues are not really the 'daily bread' in small jurisdictions.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 Since at the time of the adoption of the EAW FD Slovakia was not yet a Member State of the Union and, at the moment of the adoption of the EU Data Retention Directive, it had just become a Member State, no public debate can be discerned on these issues at the time in question. This might not necessarily mean, however, that information on these pieces of legislation was withheld or kept secret from the public, but rather that in the avalanche of the pre-accession EU acquis that had to be transposed, nobody really noticed.

2.12.2 Perhaps a more useful question might be when should the 'system' allow sufficient space for democratic deliberation, since the answer to the question if there should be more democratic deliberation is bound to always be 'yes'. From the point of view of the EU legislator, the requirement that democratic deliberation and accommodation of important constitutional issues ought to be carried out before the adoption of an act of EU law is perhaps not that surprising. In other words and for the purpose of a potential infringement action brought by the European Commission against a defaulting Member State, the suggestion that that state should have either voiced its concerns within the EU legislative process and sought the appropriate blocking minority to prevent the adoption of the measure and/or, if outvoted, challenged the measure before the Court of Justice, does not seem misplaced if viewed from the EU perspective. The issue of standing does not really come into play here, because a Member State is always a privileged applicant (of course if remaining within the time limits).

¹⁰⁵ Case 283/81 CILFIT v. Ministero della Sanità [1982] ECR 03415, para. 16.

What might rather pose a problem, in practical terms, is when there is no one single position on an EU law issue within a Member State: the legislature might have different ideas than the executive, which in turn might think something quite different than the courts and/or the national constitutional court. The recent cases of *Landtová*¹⁰⁶ and *Holubec*¹⁰⁷ demonstrate the unlucky constellation in which the absence of a voice on the European level might prod a national actor into an open revolt.¹⁰⁸

A different question is whether the EU legislative process allows for a sufficient scope of deliberation before a measure is adopted. In general, and in particular since the Treaty of Lisbon, the potential for participation of both the national governments as well as the national parliaments is perhaps not that bad as sometimes portrayed. A separate issue is, rather, to what degree the national players really make use of the space provided to them. The pragmatic record here might not be that optimistic: national governments sometime agree a measure in Brussels but then negate it politically when it is met with a hostile reception in their domestic constituency. As would appear from the frequency of the use of the Protocol on Subsidiarity and the involvement of national parliaments mechanism instituted thereby, the national parliaments are not really able or willing to make use of it.

As for the Data Retention Directive itself, it can hardly be suggested that there was no debate about the measure prior to its adoption: the measure itself was first tabled in 2000, rejected and re-worked several times, but in the end adopted in the aftermath of the 2005 London bombings.¹⁰⁹ The eventual adoption of the Directive could thus be seen not necessarily as an example of the absence of deliberation prior to its adoption, but rather an example of the dangerous impact of one exceptional situation and the (over-)use of emergency rhetoric eventually pushing through a highly problematic measure.

2.12.3 The fact that a Member State has ‘suddenly’ awakened to find that a measure previously adopted on the EU level happens to be incompatible with its national constitutional rules should not constitute a sufficient ground for suspending/circumventing the execution of its obligation.

However, two measures should be contemplated instead. First, a Member State that believes that an adopted EU measure is incompatible with its constitutional order should be obliged to bring, within the appropriate period, an annulment action before the Court of Justice. Secondly, if it fails to do so, if the problem is only detected later at the stage of the national application of the measure, the national

¹⁰⁶ Case C-399/09 Landtová [2011] ECR I-05573.

¹⁰⁷ Judgment in Holubec, n. 29 above.

¹⁰⁸ In detail Bobek 2014, pp. 78–84.

¹⁰⁹ In detail see Jones and Hayes 2013, pp. 6–11.

court addressing the issue should submit a request for a preliminary ruling on validity to the Court of Justice, which is in fact already the requirement following Melki and Abdeleli.¹¹⁰ Both of these avenues, taken conjointly or separately, would allow the Court of Justice to be seized with the issue and for the concern of the Member State and other actors to be heard. At the same time, the fact that such an action concerning the validity of a measure was pending before the Court of Justice, irrespective of whether it had been brought as a direct action by the Member State or as a request for a preliminary ruling, would be a sufficient reason for the Court of Justice to suspend the Art. 258 TFEU procedure before the question on validity is decided on merits. However, failure to bring an action before the Court of Justice, a ‘defence’ in the framework of Art. 258 TFEU, would not be sufficient in itself.

2.13 Experts’ Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 We do not share entirely the editors’ concerns about an overall reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights in EU law. The ‘reduction of protection’ suggestion might be true if viewed through the lenses of the level of protection that was extant before 2004 in some of the new Member States. When viewed diachronically within the EU legal order itself, however, i.e. comparing the level of fundamental rights protection in the EU in the past and today, the same suggestion becomes much more questionable.

We are far from suggesting that ‘all is well’ with regard to the fundamental rights protection in EU law. To talk of an ‘overall reduction’ on an EU-wide level (i.e. not just contrasted with the rather abnormal, transformative situation in the new Member States before 2004) would, however, appear to be far-fetched. In addition, the signs coming from the Luxembourg courts since 2009 and the entry into force of the Charter appear to hint at a movement in the other direction: the amount of annulments of EU legislation has increased. This number may not be dramatic, but since previously it was close to zero, any increase counts.

2.13.2 Even though the answer to the previous question was ‘no’, as a general rule of thumb, it may be only suggested that the way forward for the EU protection of fundamental rights is certainly not in the creation of new institutions, new tribunals or new, complex procedures, including the EU accession to the ECHR. In general, creating new institutions or procedures rather shifts the original responsibility to someone else without reforming the original problem. Moreover, after Opinion 2/13,¹¹¹ it is unlikely that the EU accession will happen any time soon.

¹¹⁰ Joined cases C-188/10 and C-189/10 Melki and Abdeleli, n. 33, paras. 54–55.

¹¹¹ Opinion 2/13 Opinion pursuant to Art. 218(11) TFEU [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2454.

However, the fact that the Court of Justice will in the foreseeable future not be subject to external scrutiny from Strasbourg means that it should be obliged to take fundamental rights protection within the EU legal order into its own hands and provide it with even greater post-Lisbon vigour, in particular with regards to acts of the EU institutions themselves. Moreover, the absence of accession to the procedural framework in no way means the absence of being bound by the substance of Strasbourg case law. Already today, Art. 52(3) of the Charter connects the Court of Justice internally to the ECHR and the case law of the Strasbourg Court. This provision ought to be taken seriously, applied faithfully and visibly adhered to not only in the Opinions of the Advocates General, but also in the reasoning of the Court of Justice.

2.13.3 In contrast to the academic calls of Anglo-American provenance, one of the authors of this report has repetitively expressed his doubts as to how far the current reasoning style of the Court of Justice can be still called ‘cryptic and Cartesian’.¹¹² If measured against the English or American judicial style, the reasoning of the Court of Justice might indeed appear to be rather condensed. The style may be viewed with much greater understanding if measured against the Germanic Continental tradition, and it might be judged as outright lengthy and too discursive if compared with the Latin Continental tradition. On the other hand, sharing more information on the Court’s judicial business, as well as background information, could only be welcome. Equally, everyone is bound to agree that greater responsiveness to the parties would be also appreciated, of course within the limits of the possible, taking into account the length of the decisions and the need for their translation into all the other languages of the Union.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 Since the 2001 EU Amendment discussed in detail in Sect. 1.2.1 above, the Slovak Constitution governs the transfer of powers to international organisations predominantly in its Art. 7 (see Sect. 1.2.1 for the full wording). The different sub-sections of Art. 7 have different purposes.

Article 7(1) addresses the possibility of a radical change in the constitutional design, namely an entry into a ‘state union’ with other states (or withdrawal from such a union). This provision allows the SR to join a federation, requiring the adoption of a constitutional law and a referendum.

Article 7(2) allows for accession to the EU, as has been discussed above.

¹¹² Further Bobek 2013b, pp. 203–208; or Bobek 2015, pp. 169–172.

Article 7(3) is another specific provision that was adopted in order to allow for the accession of the SR to NATO. This provision is different from Art. 7(2) in that it explicitly refers to the objectives sought by accession, namely ‘maintaining peace, security and democratic order’. Article 7(3) does not refer directly to NATO, but allows accession of the SR to ‘an organization of mutual collective security’.¹¹³

Articles 7(4) and 7(5) determine the applicability of international treaties and their position in the hierarchy of the Slovak legal order.

Interestingly enough, the provisions of Art. 7 do not contain any limits to the delegation of powers to international or supranational organisations (the only limit being that the SR may only transfer the exercise of a part of its rights; see Sect. 1.3.3 above for more detail), nor any values or principles that ought to be upheld by the SR when participating in international co-operation. It remains to be seen whether such limits or values will be developed in the case law of the SCC. This could happen either in the framework of fundamental rights protection (where the SCC has consistently held that the standard of protection cannot be weakened) or on the occasion of ex ante review of any future international treaty, pursuant to Art. 125a (which has not yet been used).

As for the ratification process itself, the relevant provisions are Arts. 84 and 86 (dealing with the NCSR), Art. 102(a) (concerning the powers of the President) and Art. 119(f) (relating to the Government). Pursuant to Art. 86(d), the power of the NCSR comprises (inter alia) expressing consent, prior to ratification, to international treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms, international political treaties, international treaties of military nature, international treaties establishing membership of the SR in international organizations, international economic treaties of a general nature, international treaties whose execution requires the enactment of a law, as well as with international treaties that directly establish rights or obligations of natural persons or legal persons, and at the same time determining if these are international treaties stipulated in Art. 7(5).

Pursuant to Art. 102(1)(a), the President ‘represents the SR outwardly and concludes and ratifies international treaties. He may delegate to the Government of the SR or, with the Government’s consent, to individual members of the Government of the SR, the conclusion of international treaties’. Finally, pursuant to Art. 119(f), the Government decides on ‘international treaties of the SR, the negotiation of which has been transferred by the President of the SR to the Government’.

¹¹³ See Drgonec 2012. Drgonec has argued that the singular form used in Art. 7(3) precludes the possibility to enter into more than just one such organisation, and that the purpose of this subsection has been exhausted by the accession of the SR to NATO. However, the authors believe that this is a rather unpersuasive argument, especially since Drgonec seems to be inconsistent in his approach to textual interpretation: while in his commentary to Art. 7(3) he puts substantial weight on the singular/plural wording of the article, in his commentary to Art. 7(1) he argues that the plural form (‘with other states’) has to be read so as to also include situations where the SR enters into a ‘state union’ with just one other state.

The Constitution does not differentiate between international treaties negotiated by the SR and international treaties to which the SR accedes subsequently, without having a say in the negotiation process (such as the NATO Treaty, concluded long before the SR acceded).¹¹⁴ The objective of ratification by the NCSR is therefore rather limited – the legislator does not influence the content of the treaty (this task remains with the executive branch), but rather confirms the will of the SR to be bound by the given international obligations.¹¹⁵

3.1.2 As already discussed in detail in Sects. 1.2 and 1.3 above, the present form of Art. 7 and the various sub-categories of international organisation to which the SR may potentially accede is the result of the 2001 EU Amendment of the Slovak Constitution. According to the position of the NCSR, the adoption of Art. 7(1) was ‘a result of a generally known fact that state unions have been unpredictably and unregularly formed and dissolved in history’¹¹⁶ and the aim of this provision was ‘to create a legal basis for future changes, not foreseen at the time when the Constitution was adopted, which lead to the SR entering a state union with another state or states’.¹¹⁷

As for the wording of Art. 7(2), one of the contemplated versions of its wording was that the SR may ‘transfer a part of the exercise of its sovereignty,’ but this draft wording was later changed to ‘rights’. Azud has argued that the reference to ‘sovereignty’ was more appropriate, and that Art. 7(2) should not only refer to the EC/EU, but rather to ‘supranational bodies’ in general.¹¹⁸

3.1.3 To our knowledge, there has not been any discussion about the need to amend the wording of any of the articles concerning international obligations and effects of international and supranational law.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 Prior to the EU Amendment (2001), the only provision relevant to the place of international treaties in the Slovak legal order was Art. 11 (now repealed): ‘International treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms, which have been ratified and promulgated in a manner laid down by law, shall have primacy over the

¹¹⁴ Drgonec 2012, p. 120.

¹¹⁵ Ibid., pp. 120–121.

¹¹⁶ See the parties’ argumentation in Judgment of the SCC, II. ÚS 171/05 (EU Constitutional Treaty) of 27 February 2008. The submission then goes on to name several examples of such ‘state unions’, e.g. the Kalmar Union (1397–1523), the Polish-Lithuanian Union (1569–1795), French West Africa (1904–1958), the Soviet Union (1922–1991), the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (1945–1992), the Union of African States (1960–1962) and, most importantly, the Czechoslovak Federation (1918–1992).

¹¹⁷ Ibid., p. 122.

¹¹⁸ Azud 2003, p. 596.

laws of the Slovak Republic, if they guarantee a greater scope of constitutional rights and freedoms.¹¹⁹ This was the only provision governing the relationship between international law and domestic law, and it only covered those treaties that guaranteed ‘a greater scope of constitutional rights’ than the Slovak Constitution.¹²⁰ Academic writers have named this concept ‘the principle of alternative primacy of international law’ or ‘the conditional primacy of international treaties’.¹²¹

The SCC had an opportunity to cast more light on the interpretation of Art. 11 in December 1999 when deciding on a constitutional complaint launched by a Belarusian citizen (Mr. A.R.) who had been criminally prosecuted in the SR and who claimed that his rights under Art. 6 of the ECHR and under Art. 4 of Protocol 7 to the ECHR had been violated by the Regional Court in Košice. The claimant did not invoke any of the provisions of the Slovak Constitution, and the SCC therefore had to clarify whether it was competent to hear a constitutional complaint that only raised points under provisions of an international human rights treaty.¹²²

The SCC opened its (very brief) reasoning by asserting that the Constitution did not offer an unambiguous solution to the problem of the relationship between international human rights treaties and the domestic legal order. It then proceeded to argue that the problem could be resolved with the help of Art. 11 of the Constitution and Act No. 1/1993 Coll., on the Collection of Laws of the SR, according to which international treaties form part of the legal order of the SR when certain conditions are satisfied (which they were, in the case of the ECHR). The SCC further stated that it is competent to decide constitutional complaints brought by natural or legal persons who claim a violation of their rights (Art. 130(3) of the Constitution), and that the rights allegedly violated must be duly characterised and identified, as required by law.¹²³ According to the SCC, this legal provision requires a due characterisation and identification of not just any right, but a particular right guaranteed by the Slovak Constitution. To support this argument, the SCC referred to some academic works, and then concluded:

International human rights treaties have a special place in the hierarchy of legal sources in the SR. Upon fulfilment of the conditions stipulated in Art. 11 of the Constitution, they have primacy over the laws of the SR. Although they have primacy over (ordinary) laws, they do not have primacy over the Constitution. They cannot be considered to be part of constitutional law. The protection of rights and freedoms therein embedded thus does not amount to a protection of constitutionality. The Constitutional Court is an institution protecting constitutionality. Therefore, the Constitutional Court is not competent to deal with the protection of rights and freedoms embedded in international instruments, if the ¹¹⁹ This construction dates in fact back to the times of the Czechoslovak Federation. Further see Bobek and Kosař 2010.

¹²⁰ This formulation has created some uncertainty: how exactly is it to be determined which source of law guarantees ‘a greater scope of protection’? See for example Balog 2009, p. 2.

¹²¹ Klučka 1993, p. 295. See also Balog 2009, pp. 2–3.

¹²² Judgment of the SCC, II. ÚS 91/99 (Belarusian citizen) of 16 December 1999.

¹²³ Act No. 38/1993 Coll., on the organization of the Constitutional Court of the Slovak Republic; §20.

claimant does not at the same time claim a violation of a right or freedom that is guaranteed by the Slovak Constitution.¹²⁴

The SCC dismissed the constitutional complaint. By this decision, the SCC clearly identified the position of international human rights treaties in the hierarchy of legal norms: they stand above ordinary laws, but below the norms of constitutional legal force.

When Art. 11 was repealed in 2001, its content was relocated to Art. 7(5) and Art. 154c of the Constitution. Article 7(5) now establishes the primacy of three types of international treaties: (1) treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms; (2) self-executing treaties; and (3) treaties with direct effect; on condition that they have been ‘ratified and promulgated in a manner laid down by law’. It follows from Art. 86(d) in fine of the Constitution that it is up to the NCSR to decide whether an international treaty falls into one of these three categories.

As for international treaties that were ratified and promulgated before 1 July 2001 (i.e. before the EU Amendment entered into force), these are governed by Art. 154c of the Constitution, pursuant to which they form part of the Slovak legal order and they have primacy over (ordinary) laws on condition that they provide either (a) ‘a greater scope of constitutional rights and freedoms’ (para. 1), such as the ECHR, or (b) ‘if so laid down by law’ (para. 2), such as the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (No. 160/1991 Coll.).

To take the example of the ECHR, this international treaty has a very special place in the system of human rights protection in Slovakia, which has also been consistently recognised by the SCC in its case law. In one of its most recent cases, the SCC has held that ‘the fundamental rights and freedoms embedded in the Constitution are to be interpreted and applied in the sense and in the spirit of international treaties on human rights and fundamental freedoms and the relevant case law that interprets them’.¹²⁵ This principle follows from the legal effect of the ECHR, as well as from the principle of pacta sunt servanda.¹²⁶

3.2.2 The original version of the Slovak Constitution adopted in 1992 was predominantly dualist, with no general incorporation clause for provisions of international law (see Sect. 3.2.1 above). The only monist element in the original Constitution was the conditional inclusion of some international treaties. The EU Amendment of 2001 made a significant change to the constitutional architecture and brought the Slovak legal order much closer to monism.¹²⁷

¹²⁴ Judgment of the SCC, II. ÚS 91/99, n. 123, translation by the authors; see also the comment by Drgonec 2013.

¹²⁵ Judgment of the SCC, Pl. ÚS 10/14 (Data retention), n. 14, para. 84, which refers to a well-established line of case law in which the Court has ruled the same. Translation by the authors.

¹²⁶ See e.g. Judgment of the SCC, I. ÚS 5/02 (Publicity of judgments) of 21 May 2003.

¹²⁷ For a more detailed analysis of the monist nature of the Slovak legal order, see Dobrovičová 2007, pp. 55 et seq.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 The Parliament's involvement in the initial negotiations of international treaties is close to none, since the negotiations belong to the competences of the executive, rather than the legislative branch. Even the possibility of ex ante review of international treaties (see Sect. 3.4 below) excludes the NCSR from initiating the review procedure, since only the President of the Republic and the Government have standing. The NCSR thus remains uninvolved in the negotiations, and its role is limited merely to give consent to ratification, pursuant to Art. 86(d) of the Constitution.

On the other hand, it ought to be added that should the NCSR so wish, it may obtain information and may subject the Government to parliamentary scrutiny via the normal channels of governmental responsibility, such as requesting information as to the status of negotiations or ratification from the relevant minister, subjecting the responsible minister or Prime Minister to questioning on these issues during parliament question time, requesting a committee to address the issues, etc. The pragmatic reasons for these mechanisms not being activated too frequently are twofold: first, as in any form of parliamentary democracy, it is in practical terms rather the Government that controls the Parliament and not always vice-versa, and, secondly, international and/or European affairs tend in general not to be in the limelight of parliamentary interest.

3.3.2 The only valid referendum in the history of the SR has been the 2003 referendum on the Slovak accession to the European Union (see Sect. 1.4.2).

In May 1997, the SR held a referendum on a number of issues related to national defence. The first out of four questions was phrased 'Do you agree with the accession of the SR to NATO?' This referendum, however, had the lowest turnout (9.53%) in history, and was therefore not valid.¹²⁸

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 The judicial review of provisions of international law is limited in the SR to the ex ante review of international treaties pursuant to Art. 125a of the Constitution, the text of which was provided in Sect. 1.2. This provision was introduced into the Slovak legal system by the EU Amendment in 2001, but has not yet been used, most likely because only the President and the Government have standing to bring such a claim.

¹²⁸ See the webpage of the Slovak Statistical Office at <http://slovak.statistics.sk/>.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 Not applicable to the Slovak report, since Slovakia has never been subject to any bail-out programme.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 No significant further issues have arisen.

References

- Azud J. (2003) K otázke vplyvu vstupu SR do EÚ na suverenitu SR v kontexte čl. 7 Ústavy Slovenskej republiky (On the Influence of the Slovak Accession to the EU on the Sovereignty of the SR in the Context of Art. 7 of the Slovak Constitution). Právny obzor 86(6):591–609.
- Balog B. (2009) International Treaties in the Constitutional System of the Slovak Republic. In: Conference Proceedings from the International Conference Days of Law, Masaryk University, Brno, 18–19 November 2009. https://www.law.muni.cz/sborniky/dny_prava_2009/files/mezin_smlouvy.html.
- Bartovič V. (2010) National Council of the Slovak Republic in the EU Agenda: Giant in Theory, Dwarf in Practice. In: Král D., Bartovič V. (eds.) The Czech and the Slovak Parliaments after the Lisbon Treaty. Europeum, Prague, pp. 47–78.
- Besselink L. (2006) The Dutch Constitution, the European Constitution and the Referendum in the Netherlands. In: Albi A., Ziller J. (eds.) The European Constitution and National Constitutions: Ratification and Beyond. Kluwer Law International, Alphen aan den Rijn, pp. 113–123.
- Bobek M. (2006–2007) The Binding Force of Babel: The Enforcement of EC Law Unpublished in the Languages of the New Member States. Cambridge Yearbook of European Legal Studies 9:43–80.
- Bobek M. (2013a) Comparative Reasoning in European Supreme Courts. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Bobek M. (2013b) Of Feasibility and Silent Elephants: The Legitimacy of the Court of Justice through the Eyes of National Courts. In Adams M. et al (eds.) Judging Europe's Judges: the Legitimacy of the Case Law of the European Court of Justice. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 197–234.
- Bobek M. (2014) Landtová, Holubec, and the Problem of an Uncooperative Court: Implications for the Preliminary Rulings Procedure. EuConst 10:54–89.
- Bobek M. (2015) The Court of Justice of the European Union. In: Arnulf A., Chalmers D. (eds.) The Oxford Handbook of EU Law. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 153–177.
- Bobek M. (2016) The Court of Justice, the National Courts, and the Spirit of Cooperation: Between Dichtung und Warheit. In Lazowski A., Blockmans S. (eds.) Research Handbook on EU Institutional Law. Edward Elgar, Cheltenham, pp. 353–373.
- Bobek M. (2017) Fundamental Rights and Fundamental Values in the Old and the New Europe. In Douglas-Scott S., Hatzis N. (eds.) Edward Elgar Research Handbook on EU Human Rights Law. Edward Elgar, Cheltenham, pp. 309–323.
- Bobek M., Kosař D. (2010) The Application of European Union Law and the Law of the ECHR in the Czech Republic and Slovakia: An Overview. In: Martinico G., Pollicino O. (eds.) National

- Judges and Supranational Laws: A Comparative Overview of the National Treatment of EU Law and the ECHR. Europa Law Publishing, Groningen, pp. 157–190.
- Bröstl A. (2013) Ústavné právo Slovenskej republiky (Constitutional Law of the Slovak Republic). Aleš Čeněk, Plzeň.
- De Witte B. (2012) The European Union as an International Legal Experiment. In: De Búrca G., Weiler J.H.H. (eds.) The Worlds of European Constitutionalism. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, pp. 19–56.
- Dobrovičová G. (ed.) (2007) Vplyv medzinárodného práva a európskeho práva na právny poriadok Slovenskej republiky (The influence of international law and European law on the legal order of the Slovak Republic). UPJŠ, Košice, pp. 55–69.
- Drgonec J. (2010) Ochrana ústavnosti Ústavným súdom Slovenskej republiky (Protection of Constitutionality by the Slovak Constitutional Court). Eurokódex, Žilina.
- Drgonec J. (2012) Ústava Slovenskej republiky: Komentár (The Constitution of the Slovak Republic: A Commentary). Heuréka, Šamorín.
- Drgonec J. (2013) Ústavné a únirové právo: začneme hľadať rozumnú rovnováhu? (Constitutional Law and Union Law: shall we start looking for a reasonable balance?) Justičná Revue 11:1463–1489.
- Freedland M., Prassl J. (eds.) (2014) EU Law in the Member States: Viking, Laval and Beyond. Hart Publishing, Oxford.
- Hodáš M. (2008) Kumulatívna citácia publikačného zdroja právnych aktov ES/EÚ v multilinguálnom prostredí Európskej únie (Cumulative Citation of Publication Source of EC/EU Legal Acts in the Multilingual Setting of the EU). Právny obzor 91, pp. 6 et seq.
- Hodáš M. (2011) Komparatívny ústavnoprávny pohľad na inštitút európskeho zatýkacieho rozkazu a nedostatky slovenskej ústavnej úpravy (Comparative Constitutional Assessment of the European Arrest Warrant and the Shortcomings of the Slovak Constitutional Solution). Acta Iuridica Olomucensia 6:2 et seq.
- Jakubčík S. (2009) Európsky zatýkací rozkaz a problémy jeho aplikácie v praxi (The European Arrest Warrant and Some Practical Problems with its Application). Justičná revue 10:61 et seq.
- Jánošíková M. (2014) Ústava Slovenskej republiky a členstvo Slovenskej republiky v Európskej únii (The Slovak Constitution and the Membership of the Slovak Republic in the European Union). Iuridicum Univerzita Karlova No. 4/2013.
- Jones C., Hayes, B. (2013) The EU Data Retention Directive: a case study in the legitimacy and effectiveness of EU counter-terrorism policy. SECILE project paper. <http://www.statewatch.org/news/2013/dec/secile-data-retention-directive-in-europe-a-case-study.pdf>.
- Kiikeri M. (2001) Comparative Legal Reasoning and European Law. Springer, The Hague.
- Klučka J. (1993) Medzinárodné právo a právny poriadok Slovenskej republiky (International Law and the Legal Order of the Slovak Republic). Právny obzor 76:4 et seq.
- Komárek J. (2007) European Constitutionalism and the European Arrest Warrant: In Search of the Limits of ‘Contrapunctual Principles’. CML Rev. 44:9–40.
- Komárek J. (2009) The Czech Constitutional Court’s Second Decision on the Lisbon Treaty of 3 November 2009. EuConst 5:345–352.
- Lenaerts K. (2003) Interlocking Legal Orders in the European Union and Comparative Law. ICLQ 52:873–906.
- Přibáň J. (2015) Constitutional Sovereignty in Post-Sovereign Jurisprudence of the Czech Constitutional Court. In: Bobek M. (ed.) Central European Judges Under the European Influence: The Transformative Power of the EU Revisited. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 180–199.
- Procházka R. (2002) Mission Accomplished: On Founding Constitutional Adjudication in Central Europe. CEU Press, Budapest.
- Procházka R. (2004) K publicite prameňov komunitárneho práva (On the Publicity of Sources of Community Law). Justičná revue 56:8–9.
- Siegel S. (2008) Courts and Compliance in the European Union: The European Arrest Warrant in National Constitutional Courts. Jean Monnet Working Paper No. 05/08. <http://www.jeanmonnetprogram.org/papers/08/080501.pdf>.

- Stein E. (1997) Out of the Ashes of a Federation, Two New Constitutions. Am.J.Comp.L. 1997:45–69.
- Walker N. (2012) The Place of European Law. In: De Búrca G., Weiler J.H.H. (eds.) The Worlds of European Constitutionalism. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Zbíral R. (2012) Czech Constitutional Court, Judgment of 31 January 2012, Pl. ÚS 5/12: A Legal Revolution or Negligible Episode? Court of Justice Decision Proclaimed Ultra Vires. CML Rev. 49:1–18.
- Zweigert K. (1949) Rechtsvergleichung als universale Interpretationsmethode. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches und Internationales Privatrecht (later RabelsZ) 15:5 et seq.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Estonia: The Unexpected Challenges of Unlimited Primacy of EU Law

Madis Ernits, Carri Ginter, Saale Laos, Marje Allikmets, Paloma Krõõt Tupay, René Väärk and Andra Laurand

Abstract The report informs that due to historical ties to the German legal culture, the most influential model for reconstruction of the Estonian legal order after the restoration of independence was German law, including when drafting the 1992 Constitution. However, with regard to EU law, a different approach was chosen: a Madis Ernits is Judge at the Tartu Court of Appeal, and Visiting Lecturer of Constitutional Law at the Faculty of Law, University of Tartu. e-mail: madis.ernits@kohus.ee.

Carri Ginter is Associate Professor of European Law at the Faculty of Law, University of Tartu. e-mail: carri@ginter.ee.

Saale Laos is Justice of the Supreme Court of Estonia. e-mail: saale.laos@riigikohus.ee.

Marje Allikmets is Legal Advisor, Supreme Court of Estonia; at the time of writing Adviser to the Chancellor of Justice. e-mail: marje.allikmets@riigikohus.ee.

Paloma Krõõt Tupay is Lecturer in Constitutional Law at the Faculty of Law, University of Tartu; at the time of writing Legal Expert on Constitutional Law at the Ministry of Justice. e-mail: palomakreet.tupay@ut.ee.

René Väärk is Associate Professor of International Law at the Faculty of Law, University of Tartu. e-mail: rene.vark@ut.ee.

Andra Laurand is a student assistant to the Estonian report, stud. iur., Universität Hamburg. e-mail: andra.laurand@studium.uni-hamburg.de.

Madis Ernits wrote Sections 1.1; 1.3.2; 1.4–2.1; 3.1; 3.3–3.6. Madis Ernits and Carri Ginter wrote Sections 2.5; 2.9; 2.10 and 2.12.2–2.12.3. Madis Ernits and Andra Laurand wrote Sections 1.2. Carri Ginter wrote Sections 1.3.1; 1.3.3–1.3.4; 2.2; 2.6–2.8; 2.11; 2.12.1 and 2.13. Saale Laos and Marje Allikmets wrote Section 2.3. Paloma Krõõt Tupay wrote Section 2.4. René Väärk wrote Section 3.2.

All websites accessed 23 March 2016. Text submitted 15 August 2015.

M. Ernits (✉) · C. Ginter
Faculty of Law, University of Tartu, Tartu, Estonia e-mail: madis.ernits@kohus.ee

C. Ginter
e-mail: carri@ginter.ee

P. K. Tupay
Faculty of Law, University of Tartu, Tallinn, Estonia
e-mail: palomakreet.tupay@ut.ee blanket clause in a self-standing constitutional act that suspends the Constitution, in order to give full supremacy to EU law. The Supreme Court and its Constitutional Review Chamber have adopted an unconditionally EU-friendly approach. However, the report documents the widespread concerns that have emerged amongst Estonian lawyers with regard to setting aside the Constitution, as well as the practical difficulties in constitutional adjudication by the Supreme Court. The tensions peaked in the process of ratification of the ESM Treaty, which was approved by 11 judges against 8, with the latter submitting strongly worded dissenting opinions expressing concerns about the impact of the very large financial liabilities on the rule-of-law-based, democratic and social state. Concerns by lawyers were also raised with regard to the European Arrest Warrant system, which led to review proceedings initiated by the Chancellor of Justice based on defence rights. The report also explores the excess sugar stocks cases concerning the principles of legitimate expectations and non-retroactivity, and issues regarding publication of laws in the context of EU law. The report finds that broadly speaking, any strains on constitutional values have been justified, given the benefits of EU integration. It nevertheless recommends introducing a German Solange-style limitation clause into the Constitution.

Keywords The Estonian Constitution · Constitutional amendments regarding EU integration · The Estonian Supreme Court and the Constitutional Review Chamber · Fundamental rights and the Rechtsstaat approach to the rule of law · Influences of the German constitutional tradition · Constitutional review statistics and grounds · ESM Treaty · European Arrest Warrant and defence rights · Balbiino · Excess Sugar Stocks cases and publication of laws · The principles of legal certainty, legitimate expectations and non-retroactivity · Justiciability of social rights · Data Retention Directive · Unconditional supremacy of EU law · Referendum · Parliamentary reservation of law

R. Värk
e-mail: rene.vark@ut.ee

S. Laos
Supreme Court of Estonia, Tartu, Estonia
e-mail: saaale.laos@riigikohus.ee

M. Allikmets
Supreme Court of Estonia, Tartu, Estonia
e-mail: marje.allikmets@riigikohus.ee

A. Laurand
Universität Hamburg, Hamburg, Germany
e-mail: andra.laurand@studium.uni-hamburg.de

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 At the top of the Estonian norm hierarchy stands the *Põhiseadus*¹ (Constitution), which was adopted by a referendum on 28 June 1992 and came into force on the following day, as prescribed by § 1(1) of the *Eesti Vabariigi põhiseaduse rakendamise seadus*² (The Constitution of the Republic of Estonia Implementation Act, hereinafter CREIA). The Estonian Constitution is a typical example of a constitution adopted after the fall of an authoritarian regime – it is fully binding and enforceable in courts. The Estonian constitutional order is determined by five fundamental principles of the Constitution: human dignity,³ democracy,⁴ the rule of law,⁵ the social state⁶ and the Estonian identity.^{7,8} The Estonian legal order is part of the continental legal culture with a strict hierarchy of norms, the principle of reservation of law provided by § 3(1) of the Constitution that requires a specific enactment of a statute for every specific exercise of state power, and the fundamental division of the legal order into public and private law. Historically bound to the German legal culture, old ties awoke from hibernation after the restoration of independence in 1991. The most influential model for reconstruction of vast parts of the Estonian legal order was again German law. In first order this applies to the central parts of private law, but also to criminal law and general administrative law.

1.1.2 The rationale of the Constitution is best defined in its preamble, according to which the Constitution is created to protect the peace and defend the people against aggression from outside, to form a pledge to present and future generations for their social progress and welfare, and to guarantee the preservation of the Estonian

¹ Riigi Teataja [State Gazette] (RT) RT 1992, 26, 349; RT I, 27.04.2011, 2. Estonian legislation in Estonian and English is available at: <https://www.riigiteataja.ee/en/>. Some revisions have been made to the translations by the editors of this volume.

² RT 1992, 26, 350.

³ E.g. Judgment of the Constitutional Review Chamber of the Supreme Court (CRCSCj) 21.01.2004, 3-4-1-7-03, para. 14; 05.05.2014, 3-4-1-67-13, para. 49. Selected decisions of the Constitutional Review Chamber and the Administrative Law Chamber are available in English at <http://www.riigikohus.ee/?id=823> and <http://www.riigikohus.ee/?id=719>. Some revisions have been made to the translations by the editors of this volume.

⁴ E.g. Judgment of the Supreme Court en banc (SCebj) 01.07.2010, 3-4-1-33-09, paras. 52 and 67.

⁵ E.g. Order of the Constitutional Review Chamber of the Supreme Court (CRCSCo) 07.11.2014, 3-4-1-32-14, para. 28.

⁶ E.g. CRCSCj 21.01.2004, 3-4-1-7-03, para. 14; 05.05.2014, 3-4-1-67-13, para. 49.

⁷ CRCSCj 04.11.1998, 3-4-1-7-98, para. III.

⁸ On the debate about fundamental principles of the Constitution, see Drechsler and Annus 2002, p. 473 et seq.; Ernits 2012, p. 126 et seq.; Maruste 2007, p. 8 et seq.; Maruste 2000, p. 311 et seq.; Laffranque 2007, p. 528 et seq.; Narits 2009, p. 56 et seq. For a compilation of the sources in Estonian and presentation of the debate, see Ernits 2011, p. 5 fn. 9, p. 6 et seq. and p. 23 et seq.

people, the Estonian language and the Estonian culture through the ages. The Constitution is organised as follows. It opens with an introductory chapter of seven sections (§), which includes a rather strict sovereignty clause in § 1. This chapter is followed by a detailed catalogue of constitutional rights with 48 sections (see Sect. 2.1.1). The Constitution also contains fundamental principles in § 10: human dignity, democracy, social state and the rule of law. The rule of law principle has complex elements, which are relatively frequent grounds of adjudication (see Sect. 2.1.3). The organisation of the state is regulated in Chapters III–XIII: The People, The Riigikogu (Parliament), The President of the Republic, The Government of the Republic, Legislation, Finance and the State Budget, Foreign Relations and International Treaties, National Defence, The State Audit Office, The Chancellor of Justice and The Courts. The Supreme Court (SC) is the highest court and also has powers of constitutional review.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1–1.2.2 On 1 May 2004, Estonia, together with nine other European countries, joined the European Union. Before accession, the Constitution was amended by the Eesti Vabariigi põhiseaduse täiendamise seadus (The Constitution of the Republic of Estonia Amendment Act, hereinafter CREAA),⁹ which provides as follows:

In a referendum held on 14 September 2003 pursuant to section 162 of the Constitution of the Republic of Estonia, the people of Estonia adopted the following Act to amend the Constitution:

§ 1. Estonia may belong to the European Union, provided the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the Republic of Estonia are respected.

§ 2. When Estonia has acceded to the European Union, the Constitution of the Republic of Estonia shall be applied taking into account the rights and obligations arising from the Accession Treaty.

§ 3. This Act may only be amended in a referendum.

§ 4. This Act shall enter into force three months after the date of its promulgation.

As noted in the preamble of the Act, the CREAA was adopted by a referendum. It entered into force on 6 January 2004. The draft CREAA was submitted to the Riigikogu on 16 May 2002. The draft presented had one important difference compared with the final version of the CREAA: § 1 of the initial version laconically provided that ‘Estonia may accede to the European Union’.¹⁰ As a result of parliamentary debates and criticism from legal scholars (see Sect. 1.2.3), § 1 of the draft CREAA was amended on the recommendation of the then Chancellor of Justice Allar Jöks, to provide as follows: ‘Estonia may belong to the European Union, provided the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the Republic of Estonia are respected’.¹¹ On 18 December 2002, the Riigikogu adopted a resolution¹² on holding a referendum on accession to the EU and on amending the Constitution by the CREAA, by a vote of 88 for and 1 against out of 101. The referendum was held on 14 September 2003 and is to date the only referendum that has been held under the Constitution of 1992. The turnout was 64% of all citizens eligible to vote, and 67% of all voters gave their consent to the amendment.

⁹ RT I 2003, 64, 429; RT I 2007, 43, 313.

¹⁰ Draft Act No. 1067 SE (16 May 2002). Draft Acts are available in Estonian at <http://www.riigikogu.ee//?s=&checked=eelnoud>.

1.2.3 The aims of the amendment and idea behind the amendment On 28 November 1995, Estonia applied for membership of the EU. Becoming a member of the EU was one of the most important aims of the post-Soviet independence period for many reasons. First and foremost, a new isolation and seclusion from western societies which are based on the principle of individual freedom – as had occurred in the 1940s – was feared. Moreover, Estonia wished to guarantee that the principles of democracy, the rule of law and human rights that had once again been enforced would remain the fundamental principles of its legal order, regardless of possible geopolitical challenges that could lie ahead in the future. Bearing those aims in mind, the Riigikogu together with the Government began with preparations for joining the EU soon after the restoration of independence in 1991.

Conceptual background to the choice of wording and key factors influencing the decision on the scope and content of the amendment In 1991, the Põhiseaduse Assamblee (Constitutional Assembly, hereinafter Assembly) gathered with the task of drafting a new Constitution for Estonia. The members of the Assembly were aware of the wish of the population of Estonia to become a member of the EU in the future; however, at the time this aim was still so far out of reach that the assembly scarcely touched upon the issue. However, one foreign legal expert, Peter Germer, did point out that ‘the draft contains no provision concerning the transferral of power to supranational organizations like the European Community’, and that even though it may not happen in the near future, some day Estonian may join the European Community and might need a special provision to that effect, as in most other countries.¹³

In March 1995 the Constitutional Committee of the Riigikogu proposed that the Government prepare a legal expert analysis on the Constitution; this resulted in a landmark report of 1998 by the Legal Expertise Committee, which aimed to analyse, inter alia, whether the Constitution contained any conflicts of norms or legal gaps and whether the Constitution – also in the light of possible accession to the EU – required amendment.¹⁴

¹¹ List of amendment proposals to the CREAA Draft Act No. 1067 SE II (12 December 2002).

¹² RT I 2002, 107, 637.

¹³ Peep 1997, p. 331; Laffranque 2003, p. 181.

The present report will now explore the amendment proposals and debates in greater detail, as several issues have resurfaced in result of more recent cases, and have prompted calls to change the EU provisions in the Estonian Constitution. In the above-mentioned 1998 Report, the Expert Committee concluded that in order to become a Member State of the EU, the Constitution had to be amended. The committee first proposed the addition of § 1(3) to the Constitution, according to which Estonia may accede to the European Union by a referendum and on the conditions laid down in a new § 123¹. Secondly, the committee proposed the addition of § 123¹ to the Constitution, with the following wording:

Estonia may, based on the principles of reciprocity and equality, delegate state powers stemming from the Constitution to the institutions of the European Union for the purposes of joint realisation by the Member States of the European Union to the extent necessary to implement the agreements underlying the union and on the condition that this does not contradict the fundamental principles as established in the preamble of the Constitution.

The Government shall inform the Riigikogu as early and comprehensively as possible in matters concerning the European Union and shall take the positions of the Riigikogu into account upon participating in the European Union legislative process. Upon membership, a more detailed procedure shall be provided by law.¹⁵

The report also contemplated on the question of what the EU ‘is’. The Expert Committee took the view that the Constitution would theoretically allow Estonia to accede to the EU if it were a confederation, however it also affirmed that the EU is an international organisation sui generis.¹⁶

Sixteen foreign legal experts also participated in the drafting of the expert report. Amongst some of the views, Professor Robert Alexy elaborated in his expert opinion on the fundamental rights catalogue of the Estonian Constitution that § 1 hinders accession to the EU and should be amended by the addition of a third paragraph in the following wording: ‘The independence and sovereignty of Estonia do not exclude membership in the European Union’.¹⁷ From the report of McKenna & Co it can be concluded that in order to ensure conformity between Estonia’s legal order and the principle of primacy of EU law, amending the Constitution would be inevitable.¹⁸ Several amendments were proposed, for example to complement § 1 (2) with permission to transfer a part of sovereignty to an international organisation

¹⁴ The resulting report is entitled Võimalik liitumine Euroopa Liiduga ja selle õiguslik tähendus Eesti riigiõiguse seisukohalt (Possible accession to the European Union and its legal meaning from the perspective of Estonian constitutional law), Final Report of the Legal Expertise Committee for the Constitution of the Republic of Estonia (1998), (available in Estonian) <http://www.just.ee/et/est-vabariigi-pohiseaduse-juriidilise-ekspertisi-komisjoni-lopparuanne>, hereinafter referred to as ‘The 1998 Report of the Legal Expertise Committee’. See also Varul 2000.

¹⁵ The 1998 Report of the Legal Expertise Committee, supra n. 14 (translation by the authors).

¹⁶ Ibid.

¹⁷ Alexy 2001, p. 93.

¹⁸ McKenna & Co 1996, p. 17 and para. 3.1.

in accordance with § 3 of the Constitution, and to amend § 3 such that it would also allow for the exercise of governmental authority pursuant to EU law.¹⁹ Professor Guy Carcassonne proposed the addition of a separate chapter on the EU in the Constitution.²⁰ This Chapter would have consisted of three paragraphs allowing Estonia to become a member of the EU, every new treaty would have had to be submitted to the SC before ratification by Parliament, and the Government would have been required to introduce a specific procedure for informing Parliament.

In Estonian domestic discussions that followed the conclusions and proposals of the Expert Committee, Anneli Albi suggested an alternative wording for the constitutional amendment. Albi suggested that the two provisions proposed in the report, § 1(3) and § 123¹, be merged and that the amendment be added as a separate paragraph to § 1 of the Constitution.²¹ A further contribution to the discussion on whether/how to amend the Constitution was made by Julia Laffranque, who in an article in 2001 listed possible ways to amend the Constitution for the purpose of EU membership; the list also summarised proposals presented by other legal experts, inter alia the possibility of introducing a third supplementing act to the Constitution.²²

In 2002, a working group comprised of experts and members of the political factions in the Riigikogu was formed.²³ It should also be stressed that during the time the working group held its sessions, a public opinion survey showed that more than half (51%) of the citizens who had the right to vote were against joining the EU, and only 37% supported accession.²⁴ The solution later found by the working group was presumably to some extent influenced by this survey.²⁵

In January 2002, the Minister of Justice at the time, Märt Rask, asserted that the legal scholars had not reached a conclusion on whether and, if so, how exactly and to what extent the Constitution should be amended. Subsequently, Rask published the preferred form for the amendment – a laconic supplementing act to the Constitution – and its possible content.²⁶ The reasoning behind this choice was the desire not to amend the base text of the Constitution, since the Constitution itself was considered a ‘sacred’ text, and the Minister of Justice did not want the

¹⁹ Ibid., pp. 18–19.

²⁰ Carcassonne 1998, p. 10.

²¹ Albi 2000, p. 164.

²² Laffranque 2001, p. 215 et seq.

²³ According to Mart Nutt, the following experts played a central role in the drafting process of the future CREAA, submitted to the Riigikogu on 16 May 2002: Kalle Merusk, Jüri Pöld, Ülle Madise, Julia Laffranque and Märt Rask, see minutes of the IX Riigikogu, VII session (11 June 2002), (available in Estonian) <http://stenogrammid.riigikogu.ee/et/200206111000#PKP-2000008924>.

²⁴ For the period January 2000 to March 2001, see Mattson, T. (2001, March 28). Üle poole kodanikest on euoliidu vastu (More than half of all citizens oppose the EU). Postimees. <http://www.postimees.ee/1858647/ule-poole-kodanikest-on-euoliidu-vastu>. See also Albi 2005, p. 89.

²⁵ Albi 2005, p. 89.

²⁶ Rask, M. (2002, January 15). Kas muuta põhiseadust või mitte? (To amend the Constitution or not?) Postimees. <http://arvamus.postimees.ee/1914493/kas-muuta-pohiseadust-voi-mitte>.

Constitution to become a pile of amendments and insertions, losing its clarity and simplicity.²⁷

The critique and advice of legal scholars A wave of criticism from legal scholars followed. Rait Maruste, at the time Judge of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), conceded that the Minister of Justice's proposal was one possible solution – and definitely a politically convenient one; however, he expressed doubt whether the Third Act (as the supplementing act came to be widely known) could maintain the clarity and simplicity of the Constitution.²⁸ He insisted that the Constitution had to reflect the actual mechanisms of exercising power. The Third Act with its few sentences would not be able to do so. According to Maruste:

It is as clear as day that upon joining the EU the actual ways in which power is exercised change, and change significantly. They change, in my opinion, to such an extent that this cannot be overcome through simple interpretation, by establishing a general rule or, in the worst case, by tacitly looking past any incompatibilities. It would be a rape of the Constitution and constitutional nihilism.²⁹

The criticisms by Maruste were followed by the Chancellor of Justice, Allar Jõks,³⁰ who also pointed out several shortcomings of the Third Act solution. For example, Jõks stated that without establishing clear rules on changes brought upon by the EU, it would be impossible to foresee problems that might arise from the Third Act.³¹ Furthermore, by raising EU law above the Constitution, Estonia would give up too much and, moreover, the Constitution does not permit entry into an international treaty that is not in accordance with the Constitution. Jõks proposed following the German example by adding a clause which would bind membership in the EU with adherence to the fundamental principles of the Constitution. Among further scholars, Lauri Mälksoo, now Professor of International Law at the University of Tartu, argued that amending the Constitution with a separate addendum which, in addition, modifies the contents of the Constitution itself, would

²⁷ Ibid.

²⁸ Maruste, R. (2002, January 29). Põhiseadust tuleks siiski muuta (The Constitution should nevertheless be amended). Postimees. <http://arvamus.postimees.ee/1917325/pohiseadust-tuleks-siiski-muuta>.

²⁹ Ibid., (translation by the authors).

³⁰ The monarchic institution of the Chancellor of Justice is unique, with a tripartite division of its functions. The first is to exercise supervision over the constitutionality and legality of the proceedings of the legislative and executive powers. To perform this function, the Chancellor of Justice has the right to speak before the Riigikogu (the Estonian Parliament) and during the sessions of the Government, to lodge a complaint against any state organ, to submit a direction to the Riigikogu to initiate an Act and also to appeal to the SC, if this request is not fulfilled. The second function is the ombudsman function, which includes the right to receive individual complaints, and to analyse and make suggestions to improve administrative governance. Thirdly, the Chancellor of Justice has the right to decide whether to bring a question of removal of immunity before Parliament.

³¹ Jõks, A. (2002, April 16). Põhiseadus muutuste kündisel (The Constitution on the brink of change). Postimees. <http://arvamus.postimees.ee/1933583/pohiseadus-muutuste-kunnisel>.

be harmful for the clarity of the Constitution.³² In addition, Mälksoo stated that the ‘neutral’ route of the CREAA was being used in an attempt to avoid some essential questions on the extent to which the rights and obligations arising from the Accession Treaty will change the Constitution. The irony of this ‘legal masquerade’ was that the Estonian Constitution provided one of the strictest sovereignty clauses in Europe.³³ Mälksoo insisted that the core of the Constitution should be respected, and the Third Act should not become a Trojan horse which would allow the fundamental principles of the Constitution to be turned upside down; he proposed the addition of reference to the fundamental principles of Estonian statehood and of the Constitution in the text of the CREAA.

In the summer of 2002, six scholars – Anneli Albi, Michael Gallagher, Indrek Koolmeister, Rait Maruste, Lauri Mälksoo and Peeter Roosma – published a joint statement concerning the Third Act.³⁴ The statement stressed that the Third Act would not describe the actual way power is exercised, and that accession to the EU must be regulated in accordance with constitutional law. By choosing the supplementing act solution, the text of the Constitution would cease to be as clear and easily applicable as it was before the Third Act. Moreover, the Constitution itself does not foresee the possibility to change the Constitution by means of a separate act: Chapter XV of the Constitution only permits amendment of the Constitution by amending its text. The six scholars concluded that the draft CREAA was not in accordance with the principle of a democratic state based on the rule of law, and that the Act might lay a foundation for a risky precedent in future. As an alternative, the scholars proposed that the text of the Constitution be amended by adding Chapter IX¹ on the European Union. The proposed chapter would have included Article § 123¹ ('Estonia may delegate state powers stemming from the Constitution to the European Union according to the conditions laid down in the Treaties of the European Union and to the extent that this does not harm the fundamental principles of Estonian statehood'), and provisions regarding the participation of the Riigikogu, application of EU law in cases of conflict, equal treatment of EU citizens, and a revision regarding the Bank of Estonia with a view to participation in the Monetary Union.

In April 2002, the Minister of Justice recognised that many legal scholars wanted to change the Constitution in detail, so that exactly what would change after joining the EU would be clear.³⁵ The Minister proposed that the changes should be explained and clarified in the explanatory memorandum to the draft CREAA; however the draft itself, he maintained, should remain ‘short, simple and clear’.³⁶

³² Mälksoo, L. (2002, May 13). Kuidas muuta põhiseadust? (How should the Constitution be amended?) Postimees. <http://arvamus.postimees.ee/1938787/kuidas-muuta-pohiseadust>.

³³ Ibid.

³⁴ Albi et al. 2002, pp. 352–353.

³⁵ Rask, M. (2002, April 19). Ühinemise otsustab rahvas (Accession will be decided by the people). Postimees. <http://arvamus.postimees.ee/1936071/uhinemise-otsustab-rahas>.

³⁶ Ibid. (translation by the authors).

A more comprehensive justification for the Third Act was presented in an academic article by the working group.³⁷

Amendment procedure and obstacles The procedure for amending the Constitution is set out in Chapter XV of the Constitution.³⁸ Notably, § 162 provides that Chapter I (General Provisions) and Chapter XV (Amendment of the Constitution) may only be amended by referendum. Since the CREAA would in principle have changed the first chapter of the Constitution (particularly § 1 and § 3), the amendment could only be adopted by a referendum.

1.2.4 With regard to EU-related amendment proposals, two different periods can be distinguished: the first period up to the decision by the Riigikogu to hold a referendum on the CREAA, and the second period starting from this decision and continuing to this day.

The question of further amendment of the Constitution was in particular revived by the discussions on the Treaty Establishing a Constitution for Europe, which ultimately never came into force. During the debates on the CREAA, it had been stressed on several occasions (including in the above-mentioned justification article by the working group that initiated the Third Act) that the next time the EU Member States amended the fundamental treaties of the EU, Estonia would need to amend the CREAA accordingly, and therefore a new referendum would have to be held.³⁹

In the context of the European Constitutional Treaty, some legal experts proposed a total revision of the Constitution. Märt Rask, who meanwhile in 2004 had been appointed Chief Justice of the SC, asserted that it would be very difficult for the Constitutional Review Chamber of the SC (CRCSC) to interpret the Constitution, considering that both the European Constitutional Treaty and the Estonian Constitution were applicable.⁴⁰

The subsequent developments in the Riigikogu, however, took a completely different direction. In December 2004, a working group to analyse the European Constitutional Treaty was formed with the task of, inter alia, analysing whether the Constitution and the CREAA allowed for ratification of the European Constitutional Treaty in the Riigikogu without amending the Constitution.⁴¹

³⁷ Laffranque et al. 2002, pp. 563–568. Cf. Ginter and Narits 2013, p. 60.

³⁸ The right to initiate amendments rests with one-fifth of the members of the Riigikogu and with the President (§ 161(1) of the Constitution).

³⁹ E.g. in Laffranque et al. 2002, p. 567.

⁴⁰ Piirsalu, J. (2004, 21 September): Märt Rask: põhiseadus vajab lähiajal kindlasti revideerimist (Märt Rask: The Constitution must definitely be revised in the near future). Eesti Päevaleht. <http://epl.delfi.ee/news/eesti/mart-rask-pohiseadus-vajab-lahiajal-kindlasti-revideerimist?id=50993275>.

⁴¹ See Riigikogu press release of 14 December 2004 and Riigikogu press release of 4 February 2005.

In March 2005, Chancellor of Justice Allar Jõks warned in a press article that in the interests of at least the formal constitutionality of the changes brought about by the European Constitutional Treaty, the reference to the Accession Treaty in § 2 CREAA should be replaced with ‘Treaty Establishing a Constitution for Europe’.⁴² For this minimum change, a new referendum should be held, since according to § 3 CREAA, the Act can only be amended by referendum. In the beginning of 2005, Uno Löhmus, Judge of the European Court of Justice, referred inter alia to the standpoints of the legal experts who had drafted the CREAA⁴³ and stated that a new EU Treaty would have to be adopted by a referendum, since the CREAA only applies to the Accession Treaty explicitly named in the CREAA.⁴⁴

However, the report of the working group of the Riigikogu published subsequently concluded that the European Constitutional Treaty should be treated as a normal international treaty and therefore requires no referendum. The report stated:

The Treaty Establishing a Constitution for Europe ... is by its nature in a wider sense a constitutional act, which in the meaning of the Constitution must be considered as an international treaty.⁴⁵

The conclusions were not reached unanimously.⁴⁶ Insofar as the European Constitutional Treaty never came into force, the report did not have any significant impact on the decisions relating to amendment of the Constitution in 2005. However, some years later, the Lisbon Treaty was approached in a similar way as the European Constitutional Treaty: no amendments were introduced in either the Constitution or the CREAA.

In September 2010 the issue of amending the Constitution was once again brought to the forefront. Rait Maruste proposed a revision of the Constitution in the light of the changes that had taken place during the previous years.⁴⁷

⁴² Jõks, A. (2005, March 7). Põhiseaduse leping ja põhiseadus õiguslike küsimusi (Legal Questions regarding the Constitutional Treaty and the Constitution). Postimees. <http://www.postimees.ee/1460167/allar-joks-pohiseaduse-leping-ja-pohiseadus-oiguslike-kusimusi>.

⁴³ Laffranque et al. 2002, p. 566.

⁴⁴ Löhmus 2005, p. 78.

⁴⁵ Euroopa põhiseaduse lepingu riigiõigusliku analüüsü tööruhma seisukohad lepingu ratifitseerimise küsimuses (Report of the working group on the European Constitutional Treaty) 2005, para. II 1. (translation by the authors). http://www.riigikogu.ee/v/failide_arhiiv/Riigikogu/epsl_20051211_ee.pdf.

⁴⁶ Ibid.

⁴⁷ Although Maruste’s proposal was no different from his earlier statements, his proposal caused a passionate debate (possibly also because he had embarked on a political career). See Maruste, R. (2010, September 17). (Pariis) vaba Eesti põhiseadus (The (truly) free Estonian Constitution). Postimees. <http://pluss.postimees.ee/314169/rait-maruste-paris-vaba-eesti-pohiseadus>.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The delegation of powers to the EU is regulated in § 2 CREAA (for the text, see Sect. 1.2.1). There are no clear limits to the transfer or delegation of powers to the EU. The brief wording of the CREAA has left several major questions open, e.g. the effect of EU law, for interpretation by the judiciary.

The SC ruled on this issue in 2012. Although in this case concerning the constitutionality of the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) the SC held that the ESM Treaty is not part of EU law, it included an obiter dictum on the potential limits to transfer of competences to the EU.⁴⁸ The Court referred to the CREAA and stated that in the view of the Court, ‘the CREAA is not an authorisation to legitimise the integration process of the European Union or to delegate the competence of Estonia to the European Union to an unlimited extent’.⁴⁹ It can be derived from the reasoning of the SC that any further amendment which leads to deeper integration of the EU and any additional delegation of competences, would need additional approval by referendum. According to the SC:

If it becomes evident that a new founding treaty of the European Union or amendment to a founding treaty of the European Union gives rise to a more extensive delegation of the competence of Estonia to the European Union and a more extensive interference with the Constitution, it will be necessary to seek the approval of the holder of supreme power, i.e. the people, and presumably to amend the Constitution once again.⁵⁰

1.3.2 The SC has not given much attention in its case law to the concept of sovereignty. The SC has addressed this concept directly only in the case concerning the constitutionality of the ESM Treaty in 2012:⁵¹

[T]he Constitution does not require, despite the strict wording of the sovereignty clause, observation of absolute sovereignty. ... [M]embership of the EU and in international organisations has become a natural part of sovereignty in this day and age.⁵²

In the reasoning that followed, the SC treated sovereignty as a principle that can be weighed against other principles. In fact, Estonian doctrine has never known a prevailing theory of absolute sovereignty. Instead, already in 1936 the leading professor of international law, Ants Piip, observed that the contemporary concept of sovereignty had changed significantly; it was only understood as a leeway within ⁴⁸ SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12, paras. 217–233.

⁴⁹ Ibid., para. 223.

⁵⁰ Ibid., para. 223. See also Sect. 2.7. for a discussion regarding potential limits arising out of principles such as the budgetary autonomy of Parliament.

⁵¹ SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12.

⁵² Ibid., paras. 128 and 130. See on this judgment: Ginter 2013, p. 335 et seq.

the limits deriving from international law. Sovereignty, according to Piip, was at that time already used in this sense in interstate relations.⁵³ In contemporary writings, sovereignty was no longer considered an absolute concept.⁵⁴ On the other hand, the SC also stated in the ESM case: ‘The core essence of sovereignty is the right of discretion in all matters, irrespective of external influences’.⁵⁵ This can be considered as an expression of the classic concept of sovereignty.

In Estonian constitutional doctrine, the classic Kelsenian distinction between internal and external sovereignty is deep-rooted.⁵⁶ The former refers to the state’s power competences; the latter bears the connotation of independent statehood in the international arena.⁵⁷ Kelsen’s disciple Artur-Tõeheid Kliimann introduced this distinction to Estonian doctrine, re-naming internal sovereignty as independence (sõltumatus) and external sovereignty as self-determination (iseseisvus).⁵⁸ However, according to the Government’s translation of the Constitution (and as used in the work of e.g. Albi⁵⁹), ‘iseseisvus’ equals independence and ‘sõltumatus’ equals sovereignty. In this way the translators have put sovereignty on an equal footing with independence and the similarity of this distinction with the Kelsenian approach is no longer recognisable.

These two concepts can be found again in the wording of § 1(1) of the Constitution, and e.g. the Legal Expertise Committee for the Constitution of the Republic of Estonia adopted this dualistic definition of sovereignty in its expert report.⁶⁰ However, the significance of the two elements is not entirely clear. The author suggests that internal sovereignty ought to be considered as identical with democracy because it refers to the unimpeded exercise, by the people, of the highest inner-state decision-making competence that lies in a democratic state. The SC proclaimed in 2012: ‘The sovereignty of the people gives rise to the sovereignty of the state and thereby all state institutions obtain their legitimization from the people.’⁶¹ External sovereignty, on the other hand, concerns rather the commitment of the state in international relations and means simply the right of the state to govern itself.

Thus, the concept of sovereignty remains classic but the approach to the concept has been influenced by modern legal theory – the SC considers sovereignty to be open to restrictions and weighing. Therefore, not every infringement of sovereignty necessarily constitutes a violation, and an infringement may be justified by

⁵³ Piip 2007, p. 415 et seq. Cf. Kalmo and Luts-Sootak 2010, p. 14.

⁵⁴ See also two Estonian edited volumes: Kalmo, Luts-Sootak 2010; Loone et al. 2004.

⁵⁵ SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12, para. 127.

⁵⁶ Kelsen 1925, p. 110.

⁵⁷ Ibid.

⁵⁸ Kliimann 1935, p. 49 et seq.

⁵⁹ Albi 2005, pp. 25, 30 et seq., 126.

⁶⁰ The 1998 Report of the Legal Expertise Committee, supra n. 14.

⁶¹ SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12, para. 127.

weightier reasons, e.g. by the financial stability of the euro area, including of Estonia, like in the case concerning the ESM Treaty.

1.3.3 Whilst there is no clear articulation of any limits on EU law, the fundamental principles of the Constitution have been articulated in the case law of the SC and are listed in Sect. 1.1.1. The current interpretation of the Constitution implies that potential limits could indeed be surpassed by referendum. It could be argued that the fundamental values of the Constitution, such as the right to national self-determination, preservation of the Estonian nation and culture, etc., are inalienable and therefore cannot be forsaken.

1.3.4 The Constitution does not directly proclaim the supremacy of the Estonian Constitution, although § 3(1) provides that state authority shall be exercised solely pursuant to the Constitution and laws which are in conformity therewith. Currently, the Constitution is interpreted in a Europe-friendly manner, and Estonia, with a liberal approach to the economy and law, has shown a remarkable willingness to adapt to EU principles, led by its SC, with the suspension of Constitutional provisions in the event of a conflict with EU law.⁶² According to the SC:

Proceeding from of § 2 of the Constitution of the Republic of Estonia Amendment Act ..., pursuant to which when Estonia has acceded to the European Union, the Constitution of the Republic of Estonia shall be applied taking into account the rights and obligations arising from the Accession Treaty, the result of the adoption of this Act is that only that part of the Constitution which is in conformity with European Union law or which regulates the relationships not regulated by European Union law can be applied. The effect of those provisions of the Constitution that are not compatible with European Union law and are thus inapplicable, is suspended.⁶³

On 11 May 2006 the SC, this time performing constitutional review, adopted an opinion regarding the interpretation of the Constitution (the Transition to the Euro case).⁶⁴ According to the opinion:

In the substantive sense this [i.e. § 2 CREAA] amounted to a material amendment of the entirety of the Constitution to the extent that it is not compatible with European Union law. ... only that part of the constitution is applicable, which is in conformity with European Union law or which regulates relationships that are not regulated by the European Union law. The effect of those provisions of the constitution that are not compatible with the European Union law and are thus inapplicable, is suspended.⁶⁵

The decisions of the SC have been criticised in the dissenting opinions of two justices. Primarily the existence of limitations to this interpretation as well as to the binding nature of the opinion on further practice have been questioned. In a dissenting opinion, Justice Kõve expressly stated that when analysing the implications

⁶² Ginter 2008. The process of accepting the supremacy and direct effect of EU law in Estonia has been analysed in detail in Ginter 2007, pp. 337–345.

⁶³ CRCSCo 26.06.2008, 3-4-1-5-08, para. 30.

⁶⁴ CRCSC Opinion 11.05.2006, 3-4-1-3-06.

⁶⁵ Ibid., para. 16.

of § 2 CREAA, the Court should have also clarified the meaning of § 1 as well as the meaning of Chapter I of the Constitution in its entirety.⁶⁶ Dissenting Justice Kergandberg equally pointed to the need for an analysis of the nature and impact of § 1 CREAA.⁶⁷

In the absence of a decision by the SC, it is currently not clear whether § 1 CREAA should be seen as what it says grammatically – a limitation to Estonia’s membership in the EU – or as an interpretative tool, to the benefit of the fundamental principles of the Estonian Constitution in the case of a conflict with EU law. The grammatical text of the CREAA seems to favour the first interpretation. On the other hand, the practice of the supreme courts of ‘old’ Member States, including but not limited to the famous Solange saga,⁶⁸ would rather support the second alternative. Indeed the court may even find that both solutions can be applied simultaneously.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 There are no specific rules in the Constitution concerning the participation of the Estonian Parliament in the EU decision-making processes. In 2004 the Riigikogu Rules of Procedure Act (RRPA)⁶⁹ was amended and a new standing committee, the European Union Affairs Committee (EUAC), was introduced.⁷⁰ The EUAC is unique since it is comprised of members who at the same time are members of other committees of the Riigikogu. The EUAC has the right to compose, in the name of the entire Riigikogu, opinions concerning draft EU acts. This position of the Riigikogu is in general binding for the Government. However, the Government has also been left a certain amount of discretion in negotiations: the Government is allowed to deviate from this position, but only on exceptional grounds.⁷¹ One exceptional ground would be for example a change of situation during the discussions at the EU level. If the Government does not follow the official position of the Riigikogu, it is bound to appear before the EUAC or the Foreign Affairs Committee to provide an explanation.

1.4.2 On the EU accession and constitutional amendment referendum of 2003, see Sect. 1.2.

⁶⁶ Dissenting Opinion of Justice Kõve to CRCSC Opinion 11.05.2006, 3-4-1-3-06, para. 2.

⁶⁷ Dissenting Opinion of Justice Kergandberg to CRCSC Opinion 11.05.2006, 3-4-1-3-06.

⁶⁸ Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts (BVerfGE) 37, 271 (Solange I); BVerfGE 73, 339 (Solange II).

⁶⁹ RT I 2003, 24, 148; RT I, 05.11.2014, 5.

⁷⁰ See also Kundla in Mõttus et al. 2012, Introduction to Chapter § 18¹, comm. 5.

⁷¹ Ibid., § 152⁴, comm. 5.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.2 On the reasons behind the amendments and the factors that influenced the content of the amendments, see Sects. 1.2.2–1.2.3 and 1.5.3.

1.5.3 The CREAA, introduced by a referendum in 2003, unfortunately entails more problems than it solves. As pointed out above, it was heavily criticised already in the course of the travaux préparatoires. The application of the CREAA has shown that some of that criticism was justified. The following proposal is therefore another attempt to point out the key issues regarding the CREAA and to offer a suitable solution to these problems.

Delegation of powers clause Sovereignty and the partial delegation of powers are the key aspects of all international cooperation clauses. The Constitution in § 1(2) establishes a particularly strong sovereignty clause: ‘The independence and sovereignty of Estonia are timeless and inalienable.’ It is one of the strongest accentuations of sovereignty in Europe⁷² and perhaps even the world. It should also be stressed that the fear of a rollback to a Soviet Union-type organisation was the main consideration behind the wording of § 1(2).⁷³

Amending the Constitution by a separate act has been sharply criticised, as seen in Sects. 1.2.3–1.2.4. Even if it is not explicitly prohibited by the Constitution, this practice does not constitute a welcome way to amend a legal document of central importance. Amending the text of the Constitution should be preferred in order to preserve legal clarity and to avoid unnecessary interpretation issues. What is more, both of the relevant sections, § 1 and § 2 CREAA, introduced problems that could have easily been avoided by simply amending the text of the Constitution.

It is not only the EU that restricts sovereign statehood in the globalised world, but also the Council of Europe, NATO, the UN, etc. In 2012 the question of international organisations other than the EU reached the SC in a case regarding the ESM Treaty. The delegation of powers to the ESM was found to be outside of the regulative effect of the CREAA.⁷⁴ The SC en banc identified an infringement of the principle of sovereignty but found by an extremely narrow majority of ten votes to nine that this was proportionate and justified by substantial considerations.⁷⁵ This tactic of reasoning has been sharply criticised, particularly by Justice Luik in his dissenting opinion. Justice Luik clearly held that ‘due to the existence of the prohibition on partial waiver of sovereignty, the Constitution does not permit ratification of the Treaty’,⁷⁶ with reference to § 1(2) of the Constitution.

Indeed, this was perhaps the most problematic point in the reasoning of the SC. Section 1 CREAA does not permit the delegation of powers to any international

⁷² Albi 2002, p. 42; cf. the table in Albi 2005, p. 26 et seq. and its summarised background p. 30.

⁷³ Cf. Peep 1997, p. 68.

⁷⁴ SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12, para. 110.

⁷⁵ SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12, paras. 176–203 and 207–210.

⁷⁶ Dissenting Opinion of Justice Luik to SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12, para. 14.

organisation other than the EU and, in the light of this conclusion, the restriction of sovereignty for any other purpose is in fact questionable in the light of § 1(2) of the Constitution. Taking the aforementioned aspects into consideration, it would seem appropriate to amend the sovereignty clause with an exception that would also allow the delegation of powers to other international organisations, instead of restricting its application solely to the EU. Simultaneously, the minimum requirements for such organisations should be established to exclude the legality of any potential attempt to incorporate Estonia into any organisation that does not respect human rights, democracy or the rule of law.⁷⁷ A good example of such a clause is Art. 3a of the Constitution of Slovenia (see the Slovenian report in this Volume).

European Union clause In addition to a more detailed delegation of powers clause, (a) revised provision(s) concerning the functioning and aims of the EU should be introduced. The author of this section recommends the introduction of a set of conditions for the EU in the Constitution. The freedom that was regained in 1991 is based on respect for human dignity, democracy, the rule of law, a social state and the national identity of Estonia. These fundamental principles should be respected both nationally and within the EU. The guarantee of equally effective protection of fundamental rights on the EU level should also be mentioned. These criteria are necessary to stress the objectives of the EU for Estonian political decision-makers and to guarantee an effective constitutional review of future amendments to the EU treaties. An example of such a clause is Art. 23(1)1 of the German Grundgesetz (see the German report in this Volume). In the Estonian Constitution, the systematic position for this type of article could be in the preamble or in Chapter I or IX of the Constitution; the preferable position, however, would be a new § 120(1) of the Constitution.

Qualified majority clause There are three possible procedures for delegating powers to the international level. The first and probably most democratic procedure would be the holding of a referendum for any delegation of powers. The second possibility would be to follow the regular legislative procedure in Parliament, i.e. powers could be delegated by a simple majority. The third alternative, in a sense the golden mean, would be to introduce a legislative procedure which requires a qualified parliamentary majority.

Compared to other possibilities, referendums are usually financially more onerous, more time-consuming and often politically unpredictable. Furthermore, powers are delegated through international treaties and, according to § 106(1) of the Constitution, no ratification of any international treaty shall be submitted to a referendum. However, a mere simple majority would not correspond to the importance of the decision. Therefore, in order to stress the importance of a delegation of powers, a qualified majority of two-thirds of all the members of the ⁷⁷ The best solution would be to add a new section § 1(3) to § 1. Such clause would determine legally that Estonia will remain part of the free world, and Soviet-type organisations would thus be precluded.

Riigikogu, which is presently foreseen in four instances in the Constitution, would seem appropriate. A comparable rule can also be found in Art. 3a of the Slovenian Constitution.

Exercise of power clause According to § 3(1), of the Constitution, state authority shall be exercised solely pursuant to the Constitution and laws which are in conformity therewith. According to § 2 CREAA, when Estonia has acceded to the EU, the Constitution shall be applied taking into account the rights and obligations arising from the Accession Treaty. As the SC asserted in its opinion of 11 May 2006,⁷⁸ § 2 CREAA led to a suspension of a large part of the Constitution and to a redefinition of § 3(1) of the Constitution. This has been described as one of the most significant (legal) changes caused by accession to the EU.⁷⁹ The SC has even relinquished its competence to perform constitutional review if EU law collides with the Constitution, with reference to the competence provision: ‘§ 152(2) of the Constitution, as well as the Constitutional Review Court Procedure Act passed for the implementation thereof, must not be applied to the extent that these enable to declare invalid, due to unconstitutionality, a provision relating to EU law of any Act or other legislation, which is in conformity with the EU law on the basis of which it was enacted’.⁸⁰

The main argument in support of the view of the SC is that the SC does not have competence to exercise judicial review over national legislation transposing EU law into national law.⁸¹ This restrictive interpretation of the SC’s competence has been sharply criticised with overweighing arguments.⁸² Since the Constitution gives the SC universal competence to review all laws that might contradict the Constitution, there can be no doubt that the SC is competent to review all laws that are applied in Estonia. If the SC thereby comes to the conclusion that the object of the review is national legislation transposing EU law, it should take the primacy of EU law into consideration in deciding the case. Otherwise, by suspending some of the norms of the Constitution, the SC would decide on the validity of the norms on which its own competence for constitutional review is based. Pursuant to the Constitution, however, this would be ultra vires.⁸³

⁷⁸ See Sect. 1.3.4, CRCSC Opinion 11.05.2006, 3-4-1-3-06, para. 16. Cf. CRCSCj 26.06.2008, 3-4-1-5-08, para. 30.

⁷⁹ Madise et al. in Madise et al. 2012, Introduction to the CREAA.

⁸⁰ CRCCo 26.06.2008, 3-4-1-5-08, para. 30.

⁸¹ Kalmo 2008, p. 583 et seq.; Laffranque 2007b, p. 535 et seq.; Laffranque 2009, p. 498. Cf. the discussion in Ernits 2011, p. 49 et seq.

⁸² Lõhmus 2011, p. 24 et seq.; Mälksoo 2010, p. 147 et seq.; Ernits 2011, p. 37 et seq. and 61 et seq.; Ernits 2012, p. 137 et seq. (See also Sect. 2.9)

⁸³ Ernits 2011, p. 49 et seq.; cf. Lõhmus 2011, p. 25. In 2015, the SC revised partially its earlier far-reaching position, cf. SCebj 15.12.2015, 3-2-1-71-14, para. 81, 83: ‘The fact that any provisions are compatible with European Union law cannot lead to the conclusion that the same provisions are also compatible with the Estonian Constitution or that declaring a provision unconstitutional and repealing it would constitute a breach of European Union law. The connection of a legal act with EU law, or an opinion of any other institution on the compatibility of

It is well established that after accession to the EU, state powers can be exercised not only on the basis of parliamentary laws but also on the basis of directly applicable EU law. However, instead of declaring a conflict between the Constitution and EU law, suspending the Constitution⁸⁴ and relinquishing competence for constitutional review, it would be advisable to re-interpret the relevant provisions of the Constitution (and thus still apply them) in conformity with EU law, and thus to apply EU law on the basis of the Constitution to the extent possible. As long as there is no violation of the fundamental constitutional principles, it would be the legitimate way to achieve both: conformity with the EU Treaties and preservation of the Constitution, including the constitutional review competence of the SC.⁸⁵ This concept is not new in the context of other EU Member States.⁸⁶ It would, however, be an innovation in the Estonian context.

Since § 2 CREAA serves as the basis for the current interpretation of the SC, it would be recommendable to abandon the present text of § 2 CREAA and to choose a solution that better fits the system of the Constitution. Instead of integrating § 2 CREAA into the text of the Constitution, § 3 of the Constitution should be amended with a new para. 2, whereas the existing para. 2 would become the new para. 3. A good example of such a clause is Art. 8(4) of the Constitution of Portugal (see the Portugal report in this Volume). This would help to avoid the erosion of the Constitution and at the same time systematically guarantee that EU law is applied in accordance with the Constitution.

Parliamentary participation and information clause The 1998 legal expert report on the Constitution proposed inter alia a further clause introducing the obligation of the Government to inform the Riigikogu as early as possible and comprehensively of matters relating to the EU. Although a similar procedure is foreseen in § 152¹ RRPA, no such guarantee is provided by the Constitution. As this question concerns the checks and balances on state powers, it is a constitutional matter. According to the present regulation, the Government is not obliged to involve the Riigikogu in matters concerning the EU and Parliament is not able to effectively demand information and compliance with the parliamentary opinion by the Government. It would therefore be necessary to include such provisions in a domestic legislation with EU law cannot in itself preclude review of the constitutionality of the legal act within the meaning of § 152 of the Constitution. [...] Within the boundaries set by EU law, including state aid guidelines, the national legislator is bound by the requirements arising from the Estonian Constitution, and the national courts by the duty under § 152 of the Constitution to check the constitutionality of the measure(s) chosen for achieving the aim. By no means does EU law prohibit member states from ensuring domestic fundamental rights to the extent that the exercise of the rights does not endanger the supremacy, uniformity and effectiveness of EU law.' However, it still remains unclear how far would the SC go in recognising the primacy of the EU law over the Constitution.

⁸⁴ CRCSC Opinion 11.05.2006, 3-4-1-3-06, para. 16; CRCSCo 26.06.2008, 3-4-1-5-08, para. 30.

⁸⁵ Cf. Ernits 2011, p. 61 et seq.

⁸⁶ Cf. Ehricke 1995, p. 598 et seq.; Nettesheim 1994, p. 261 et seq.; Heukels 1999, p. 313 et seq.

future reform package (e.g. in Chapter VI of the Constitution). Comparable rules can also be found in Art. 23(2) and Art. 45 of the German Grundgesetz.

Further issues The list of the aforementioned problems is not exhaustive. There are further questions, for example whether there should be a parliamentary committee authorised to exercise the rights of the Parliament in matters concerning the EU, whether § 111 and/or § 112 of the Constitution should be amended with a euro clause and/or European Central Bank clause, and whether the Constitution needs to contain an equal rights clause for European citizens. There are, moreover, other issues that should be analysed in depth, e.g. the often-cited § 58 of the Constitution that allows for the restriction of the right to vote of imprisoned Estonian citizens only.

Furthermore, there has been a call for a general renovation of the Constitution of 1992.⁸⁷ The need for a general renovation is questionable, since there is no constitutional crisis in Estonia and the Constitution of 1992 has proven, beyond the CREAA, to be well-functioning and, in a historical perspective, the most successful Constitution for Estonia ever.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Constitutional rights are provided in Chapter II of the Constitution. Five general rights can be identified: a general right to liberty in § 19(1), general right to equality in § 12(1), general right to state protection in § 13(1), general right to organisation and procedure in § 14⁸⁸ and a general social right in § 28(2).⁸⁹ The chapter on constitutional rights is otherwise rather comprehensive and detailed.⁹⁰ Constitutional rights and fundamental principles like the rule of law are enforceable in courts. They are procedurally guaranteed by the general right to address a court in the case of an alleged violation of a right, provided for in § 15(1).

⁸⁷ Maruste's written report for Eesti Õigusteadlaste Päevalad (Congress of Estonian lawyers) 2004, cited in Maruste, supra n. 47.

⁸⁸ ‘The guarantee of rights and freedoms is the duty of the legislative, executive and judicial powers, and of local governments.’

⁸⁹ This division was first introduced by Robert Alexy in the first systematic monograph concerning fundamental rights in the Estonian Constitution: Alexy 2001, pp. 51 et seq., 56 et seq., 68 et seq., 73 et seq., 76 et seq.

⁹⁰ It contains classic rights and liberties such as the right to privacy in § 26, freedom to choose an occupation in § 29(1), right to property in § 32, inviolability of the home in § 33, right to free movement in § 34, freedom of religion in § 40, secrecy of correspondence in § 43, freedom of expression in § 45, freedom of assembly in § 47, etc., as well as special social rights such as the right to education in § 37.

However, the enforceability of constitutional rights has not been fully developed. It remains disputable in Estonian constitutional law theory whether there is a right to an individual constitutional complaint to the SC on the grounds of the Constitution or whether all courts have the obligation to enforce constitutional rights with no room for a direct complaint to the SC. It can be noted that the Constitutional Review Court Procedure Act (CRCPA)⁹¹ does not foresee an individual constitutional complaint.

2.1.2 Section 11 of the Constitution states: ‘Rights and freedoms may be restricted only in accordance with the Constitution. Such restrictions must be necessary in a democratic society and shall not distort the nature of the rights and freedoms restricted’. The aforementioned § 3(1) and § 11 define the general minimum requirements for every restriction: every infringement of a constitutional right requires a legal basis and must be proportional. However, these provisions cannot be considered as sufficient authorisations to restrict a particular constitutional right. If the legislator wants to restrict a particular constitutional right, it must consider the statutory reservation of the particular constitutional right. For example, the second sentence of § 26 of the Constitution states: ‘State agencies, local governments and their officials shall not interfere with the private or family life of any person, except in the cases and pursuant to procedure provided by law to protect health, morals, public order, or the rights and freedoms of others, to combat a criminal offence or to apprehend a criminal offender’. This is an example of a clause that states a qualified statutory reservation. Beyond this, there are constitutional rights with a simple statutory reservation (e.g. § 29(1), second sentence: ‘Conditions and procedure for the exercise of this right may be provided by law’) and rights without any statutory reservation (e.g. § 38(1)). A simple statutory reservation does not add anything substantial to the general minimum requirements, whereas the SC has specified that only other fundamental rights or constitutional values can provide a legitimate justification for an infringement of a fundamental right established without reservations.⁹² In every case the state has a duty to justify all infringements of rights and liberties.⁹³

2.1.3 The rule of law can be considered as one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution anchored in § 10 and determining the rules and principles for the exercise of state power.⁹⁴ The rule of law is the most complex principle in the Constitution, containing further sub-principles such as the separation of powers and due checks and balances, the supremacy of law, the reservation of law and certainty of law, non-retroactivity, legitimate expectations, the principle of proportionality, access to courts, judicial review and judicial independence.

⁹¹ Põhiseaduslikkuse järelevalve kohtumenetluse seadus. – RT I 2002, 29, 174; RT I, 23.12.2013, 57.

⁹² SCebo 28.04.2004, 3-3-1-69-03, para. 28; SCebj 03.07.2012, 3-3-1-44-11, para. 72.

⁹³ Cf. Ernits in Madise et al. 2012, Introduction to Chapter 2 of the Constitution, comm. 8 et seq.

⁹⁴ Cf. CRCSCj 19.03.2009, 3-4-1-17-08, para. 26.

In the Estonian legal commentary, five key elements of the rule of law principle have been identified:⁹⁵ (1) restriction of state power by constitutional rights and the principle of proportionality; (2) separation of powers and due checks and balances; (3) legal certainty; (4) legality; and (5) access to courts and judicial review.

Legal certainty is one of the five central postulates of the rule of law principle and is intended to create order and stability in society.⁹⁶ The SC has stated:

The principle of legal certainty is based on § 10 of the Constitution In the most general sense this principle should create certainty in regard to the current legal situation. Legal certainty means clarity in regard to the content of valid norms (principle of legal clarity) as well as certainty that the established norms shall remain in force (principle of legitimate expectations).⁹⁷

Legal clarity Legal clarity has a double nature in the Constitution. First, it is a fundamental right guaranteed by § 13(2), according to which ‘the law shall protect everyone from the arbitrary exercise of state authority’.⁹⁸ Already in its early case law, the SC proclaimed that ‘insufficient regulation upon establishing restrictions on fundamental rights and freedoms fails to protect everyone from the arbitrary treatment of state power’.⁹⁹ The classic meaning was given to subjective legal clarity by the SC en banc in 2002:

Legal norms must be sufficiently clear and comprehensible, so that an individual can foresee the conduct of public power with a certain probability and can regulate his or her conduct. A citizen must be able – if need be with appropriate advice – to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail. Those consequences need not be foreseeable with absolute certainty: experience shows this to be unattainable.¹⁰⁰

Secondly, according to the SC, legal clarity also derives as an objective principle directly from the rule of law set out in § 10.¹⁰¹

Legitimate expectations Legitimate expectations include three subcategories: nulla poena sine lege, non-retroactivity and legitimate expectation in a narrower sense.¹⁰² First, the nulla poena sine lege rule in § 23(1), and (2), can be identified as lex specialis to the general principle of legitimate expectations and is explored in detail in Sect. 2.3.2.

⁹⁵ Ernits in Madise et al. 2012, p. 93, § 10 of the Constitution, comm. 3.4. et seq.

⁹⁶ CRCSCj 30.09.1994, III-4/1-5/94; 23.03.1998, 3-4-1-2-98, para. IX.

⁹⁷ CRCSCj 02.12.2004, 3-4-1-20-04, para. 12; 15.12.2005, 3-4-1-16-05, para. 20; 20.03.2006, 3-4-1-33-05, para. 21; 31.01.2007, 3-4-1-14-06, para. 23.

⁹⁸ SCebj 28.10.2002, 3-4-1-5-02, para. 31; CRCSCj 20.03.2006, 3-4-1-33-05, para. 21; Judgment of the Criminal Law Chamber of the SC (CLCSCj) 28.02.2002, 3-1-1-117-01, para. 12.

⁹⁹ CRCSCj 12.01.1994, III-4/1-1/94. See also Alexy 2001, p. 36.

¹⁰⁰ SCebj 28.10.2002, 3-4-1-5-02, para. 31.

¹⁰¹ SCebj 10.12.2003, 3-3-1-47-03, para. 30; CRCSCj 31.01.2007, 3-4-1-14-06, para. 22.

¹⁰² Ernits in Madise et al. 2012, § 10, comm. 3.4.3.2.

The second element is non-retroactivity which derives from the constitutional interpretation of the SC. The SC proclaimed already in its early case law in 1994: ‘One of the general principles of law is that as a rule, laws must not have retroactive effect.’¹⁰³ Later the SC, referring to its earlier case law, specified that the legislator is entitled to issue legislation with retroactive effect in areas other than criminal law, but it must thereby take into account the will of the people expressed in the Constitution, bear in mind the general interests of the state, and consider the actual situation as well as the principle of legality.¹⁰⁴ The administrative law chamber of the SC has stated even more precisely that the legislator may give retroactive force to a law if there is a well-founded need, it does not cause disproportionate harm to legitimate expectations and the law is not surprising for the person concerned.¹⁰⁵ Recently, the SC has restricted its point of view: ‘It is generally inadmissible to increase obligations with a genuine legal instrument of retroactive force, which means that no legal consequences may be established on actions already performed in the past.’¹⁰⁶

The third element of legitimate expectations is legitimate expectation in a narrower sense, concerning ‘non-genuine retroactive force’, which arises ‘if it concerns an activity that has started, but has not yet ended by the time of the adoption of a legal instrument, to be more exact, if it establishes prospectively legal consequences for an activity that has started in the past’.¹⁰⁷ The most important definition was provided in 2004:

Pursuant to the principle of legitimate expectations everyone must have the possibility to arrange his or her life in reasonable expectation that the rights given to and obligations imposed on him or her by the legal order shall remain stable and shall not change dramatically in a direction unfavourable for him or her.¹⁰⁸

Thus, according to the principle of legitimate expectation in a narrower sense,

[e]veryone has a right to conduct his or her activities in the reasonable expectation that applicable Acts will remain in force. Everyone must be able to enjoy the rights and freedoms granted to him or her by law at least within the period established by the law. Modifications to the law must not be perfidious towards the subjects of the law.¹⁰⁹

If something is promised by law, the legitimate expectation is that the promise shall be applied to those who have started to exercise their rights.¹¹⁰ However,

[t]he principle of legitimate expectations does not mean that the restriction of persons’ rights or withdrawal of benefits is impermissible. The principle of legitimate expectations

¹⁰³ CRCSCj 30.09.1994, III-4/1-5/94.

¹⁰⁴ CRCSCj 20.10.2009, 3-4-1-14-09, para. 50.

¹⁰⁵ ALCSCj 17.03.2003, 3-3-1-11-03, para. 33.

¹⁰⁶ CRCSCj 16.12.2013, 3-4-1-27-13, para. 61.

¹⁰⁷ Ibid.

¹⁰⁸ CRCSCj 02.12.2004, 3-4-1-20-04, para. 13; 31.01.2012, 3-4-1-24-11, para. 49.

¹⁰⁹ E.g. CRCSCj 30.09.1994, III-4/1-5/94; 31.01.2012, 3-4-1-24-11, para. 49 et seq.

¹¹⁰ CRCSCj 17.03.1999, 3-4-1-2-99, para. II.

does not require fossilisation of the valid regulatory framework – the legislator is entitled to re-arrange legal relationships according to changed circumstances and, by doing so, inevitably deteriorate the situation of some members of society. The legislator is competent to decide which reforms to undertake and which groups of society to favour with these reforms.¹¹¹

Prohibition of secret laws The rule that only published laws can be valid or the prohibition of secret law plays a central role in the Estonian Constitution – § 3(2), second sentence states explicitly: ‘Only published laws have obligatory force’. This norm can be considered as a reaction to the tendency of the Soviet occupation regime to apply secret laws from time to time. In particular, the deportations of March 1949 during which more than 20,000 persons were expatriated and transported to Siberia were based on secret Soviet regulations.¹¹² Furthermore, since § 3 of the Constitution is located in Chapter I, it not only belongs formally to the core elements of the rule of law principle, but it can also be amended only by a referendum. Beyond this, the vacatio legis principle can be considered as part of the principle of prohibition of secret law: ‘The requirement arising from the vacatio legis principle is that, prior to the entry into force of amendments, persons concerned must have sufficient time to examine the new legislation and take it into account in their activities.’¹¹³

Legality The rule that the imposition of obligations, administrative charges or penalties and criminal punishments is only permissible on the basis of a parliamentary statute derives from § 3(1) of the Constitution, according to which: ‘State authority shall be exercised solely pursuant to the Constitution and laws which are in conformity therewith’. Several sub-principles derive from this norm; the two most important in the present context shall be presented briefly.

According to the principle of parliamentary reservation, the legislator is obliged to regulate essential questions in law itself: ‘What the legislator is ... obliged to do under the Constitution cannot be delegated to the executive, not even temporarily and on the condition of judicial review’.¹¹⁴ This defines the separation of powers principle, or, more specifically the division of powers between the legislator and the Government as the issuer of regulations: ‘The reservation of law principle delimits the competence of the legislative and executive powers’.¹¹⁵ Robert Alexy has called this aspect the democratic dimension of the principle of legislative reservation.¹¹⁶ The SC has stated that in regard to issues concerning fundamental rights, all

¹¹¹ E.g. CRCSCj 02.12.2004, 3-4-1-20-04, para. 14; cf. CRCSCj 31.01.2012, 3-4-1-24-11, para. 49.

¹¹² See Jäätma 2006, p. 31.

¹¹³ CRCSCj 16.12.2013, 3-4-1-27-13, para. 51.

¹¹⁴ CRCSCj 12.01.1994, III-4/1-1/94. See also: CRCSCj 26.11.2007, 3-4-1-18-07, para. 36; 20.10.2009, 3-4-1-14-09, para. 32.

¹¹⁵ CRCSCj 26.11.2007, 3-4-1-18-07, para. 36; 20.10.2009, 3-4-1-14-09, para. 32.

¹¹⁶ Alexy 2001, p. 36.

decisions that are essential from the point of view of the exercise of fundamental rights must be taken by the legislator.¹¹⁷

According to the principle of legal basis, every infringement of any constitutional right needs a legal basis. According to the SC, '[p]ursuant to this principle an authorisation by the legislator is required for the restriction of fundamental rights by a body ranking lower than the legislator'.¹¹⁸ Public authority is only entitled to act if there is a legal basis or enabling act permitting it to do so. The law must determine the conditions for and extent of every infringement.

Access to courts and the right to judicial review Access to courts and the right to judicial review result from § 15(1) of the Constitution: 'Everyone whose rights and freedoms are violated has the right of recourse to the courts. Everyone has the right, while his or her case is before the court, to petition for any relevant law, other legislation or procedure to be declared unconstitutional'. This guarantee – a constitutional right in itself – is broad and strong and must be regarded as a core element of the rule of law.¹¹⁹ It enables the rule of law to be rendered fully justiciable through a constitutional right, i.e. if there is an infringement of any constitutional right which constitutes a violation of any of the sub-principles of the rule of law, the constitutional right is also violated. The SC has also stressed the close tie between Art. 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and § 15(1) of the Constitution: 'The violation of Art. 6(1) of the Convention, found by the European Court of Human Rights, also constitutes a violation of § 15 of the Constitution'.¹²⁰

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

In Estonia, the balancing of fundamental rights with economic free movement rights has not raised substantial constitutional issues or discussion. There have, however, been some cases where such a discussion would have been merited.

In 2009, the media covered the case of Aivo Piirsoo,¹²¹ a truck-driver from a small Estonian village who had been detained in Germany on the accusation of smuggling cigarettes. He had been released due to his innocence. Approximately nine years later, he discovered that his Estonian bank account had a negative ¹¹⁷ SCebj 03.12.2007, 3-3-1-41-06, para. 21; 02.06.2008, 3-4-1-19-07, para. 25; cf. CRCSCj 24.12.2002, 3-4-1-10-02, para. 24.

¹¹⁸ CRCSCj 13.06.2005, 3-4-1-5-05, para. 9; 20.10.2009, 3-4-1-14-09, para. 34.

¹¹⁹ Cf. CRCSCo 05.02.2008, 3-4-1-1-08, para. 3.

¹²⁰ SCebj 06.01.2004, 3-3-2-1-04, para. 27.

¹²¹ Henno, E. (2009, November 4). Saksamaa nõuab eestlastelt miljoneid kroone (Germany is demanding millions of kroons from an Estonian). Postimees. <http://www.postimees.ee/183910/saksamaa-nouab-eestlastelt-miljoneid-kroone>.

balance of 6.7 million Estonian kroons (approx. 430,000 EUR). The Estonian Tax and Customs Board had frozen the bank account upon the request of the German authorities due to a claim for tax and interest on the illegal cigarettes. With interest, the total claim amounted to more than 10 million Estonian kroons (i.e. approx. 640,000 EUR). The case made apparent the fact that there is no judicial involvement in administrative cooperation, i.e. authorities can cause a significant change in a person's financial standing without prior judicial review in the Member State of residence of the person. It became apparent that in cases of such cooperation, there is no effective remedy for an ordinary citizen (in this particular case with a monthly salary of ca. 700 EUR) without sufficient funds for a cross-border legal battle. It is at minimum debatable whether this is in line with the requirements of Art. 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (the Charter) and the equivalent provisions of the Estonian Constitution.

A similar series of events unrolled when a truck driver, Neeme Laurits, was jailed in Finland for nine months, accused of organising international drug-trade.¹²² He was picked up by the Estonian police from his home in Estonia and delivered to the Finnish authorities pursuant to a court order issued by an Estonian judge to execute a European Arrest Warrant (EAW). The accusations related to events in February of the same year. However, Mr. Laurits had not in fact travelled to Finland within the five years before his detention. The main evidence against him in Finland appeared to be the fact that three traffickers arrested in Finland all had his mobile phone number in their phones. Hence, he was treated as the mastermind of the criminal scheme. The actual explanation was that Mr. Laurits had worked in Estonia conducting vehicle roadworthiness tests years ago – and thus they had his number as that of an ordinary service provider. He was later released and acquitted by a Finnish appeals court.

There has been no extensive discussion about the above cases in the Estonian academia. A prominent attorney, Kaido Pihlakas, sharply criticised the system of European arrest warrants in an article published in the media, referring to the fact that Estonia is too eager to trust foreign authorities when executing their requests.¹²³ He proposed that the relevant procedure be expanded to include the right of a person to be heard before being extradited and that a simpler procedure for obtaining compensation for having been detained should be established. A Member of Parliament and former judge of the ECtHR opined that there is a strong need for local judicial supervision and stated that '[d]omestic control must be substantive and not only formal'.¹²⁴ The fact that this is not the case with the European arrest warrant is obvious.

¹²² Randal, S. (2012, February 1) Narkoparuniks tembeldatud eestlane pisteti 9 kuuks Soome vanglasse (Estonian labelled as drug baron and thrown into Finnish jail for 9 months). Estonian National Broadcasting. <http://uudised.err.ee/v/est/242d45bc-0425-415a-b986-4163decf25dc>.

¹²³ Loonet, T. (2012, February 29). Advokaat: Eesti täidab Euroopa vahistamismäärusi liiga püüdlikult (Attorney: Estonia executes European Arrest Warrants too eagerly). <http://www.postimees.ee/756124/advokaat-eesti-taidab-euroopa-vahistamismaarusi-liiga-puudlikult>.

Indeed, there seems to be a strong imbalance between the effectiveness of the extradition process and the mechanisms available for obtaining compensation. At a minimum, individuals should be able to initiate compensation mechanisms with their domestic authorities. Thus, the requesting Member State would still obtain full and efficient cooperation from other Member States during the extradition process and at the same time take into account that those very same authorities would later be entitled to order compensation measures equally effectively. This would most likely reduce the moral conflict involved, as the risk of actually having to pay compensation would most likely increase significantly.

The third example of a shift in the protection of fundamental rights concerns the excess stocks cases, which will be discussed in Sect. 2.6.

2.3 Constitutional rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 The first two paragraphs of § 22 of the Constitution stipulate as follows:

No one may be deemed guilty of a criminal offence before he or she has been convicted in a court and before the conviction has become final.

No one is required to prove his or her innocence in criminal proceedings.

The principle of the presumption of innocence is closely related to the right to liberty and security guaranteed by § 20 of the Constitution ('No one may be deprived of his or her liberty except in the cases and pursuant to a procedure provided by law') and to the grounds for lawful deprivation of liberty listed in § 20.

There has been no significant constitutional debate covering the presumption of innocence in the context of surrender procedures. Instead, more general questions concerning the right to defence during surrender proceedings – in the situation where the courts do not examine evidence for or against the suspicion of a criminal offence set out in a European arrest warrant – have been raised both in the media and in professional discussions in recent years (mainly from 2012 onwards, after media coverage of the Laurits case, see Sect. 2.2). However, the legal commentary has found that e.g. in the case of a valid alibi, the surrender of a person should be refused on grounds of conflict with the general principles of Estonian law, whereby suspicion of guilt is a precondition for surrender.¹²⁵ Until 1 January 2015, it was not possible to refuse a request for surrender due to the general grounds for refusal in international cooperation in criminal matters (inter alia conflict with the general principles of Estonian law) specified in § 436(1) CCP, except if there was reason to believe that the request had been issued for the purpose of bringing charges against or punishing a person on account of his or her race, nationality or religious or political beliefs, or if the situation of the person may have deteriorated for any such reasons. Due to the restrictions on the right to appeal an EAW, the SC has not had enough opportunities to rule upon matters regarding surrender. The constitutional aspects of surrender proceedings have not been successfully raised before the courts as of yet. However, the evaluations given by SC to the regulation of extraditions under international treaties could, by analogy, be in some aspects relevant.

¹²⁴ Krjukov, A. (2012, February 5). Maruste: kodanike väljaandmisel peab olema tugev siseriiklik kontroll (Maruste: Strong domestic control is needed when extraditing citizens). Estonian National Broadcasting. <http://uudised.err.ee/v/eesti/4cd69e51-2204-498c-8d0b-b4aa1377166e>.

Domestic criminal procedure requires that in order to take a person into custody, a reasonable suspicion and legal (constitutional) ground for deprivation of liberty has to be present. The same applies when an EAW is issued by Estonia. In the context of extradition under international treaties, the SC has, in response to the defence's argument that extradition to and the conduct of criminal proceedings in the USA would infringe the fundamental rights of the defendant, acknowledged the limitation of fundamental rights. The SC concluded that the fundamental rights of a person in domestic proceedings were guaranteed since the defence had, during the court proceedings, a possibility to effectuate the right to protection of fundamental rights¹²⁶ and, in addition, there was an option to contest the extradition decision (either adopted by the Government or the Ministry of Justice) in an administrative court.¹²⁷

The legal situation of the protection of fundamental rights in the framework of surrender between EU Member States differs from that in domestic criminal proceedings by virtue of the essence of surrender. In EAW proceedings, the right to appeal is restricted, as a ruling made by a county court can be contested only in the circuit court, whose judgment is final (§ 504(4) CCP). In order to ensure the uniform application of law, the SC has only explained that restrictions of basic rights may occur prior to the issue of an EAW as well as during execution of the EAW in the requesting state, but not through issue itself. Therefore, disputes concerning the existence of a legal ground for deprivation of liberty in Estonia do not include the right to contest an EAW by the requested person in Estonia. If there was no legal ground for detention, the person is entitled to claim compensation.¹²⁸

Interpreting the evaluation of the SC by analogy, it can be concluded that the constitutional ground for arrest for surrender is § 20(1)(6) of the Constitution. The SC has found that arrest for extradition is different from taking a person into custody in domestic criminal proceedings, because in extradition proceedings the ¹²⁵ Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 492, comm. 7.1.

¹²⁶ The legal admissibility of the extradition of a person shall be verified by a court in extradition proceedings pursuant to international treaties.

¹²⁷ CRCSCo 29.05.2013, 3-4-1-10-13, para. 11.

¹²⁸ CLCSCo 19.09.2011, 3-1-1-93-11, paras. 17 and 18.

decision to deprive the person of liberty has already been made by a court of the requesting state. The principle of mutual recognition in international co-operation in criminal procedure means that the executing state is not allowed to question such a decision. In addition, the grounds for deprivation of liberty may to some extent vary from state to state.¹²⁹ The same limitation upon the courts therefore applies accordingly in the case of surrender.

From a wider perspective of a right of defence, in April 2012 the Estonian Bar Association submitted a proposal to the Legal Affairs Committee of the Estonian Parliament to amend the regulation of surrender in the CCP, by way of a brief summary, as follows: (1) refusal to surrender a person on the ground of a conflict with the EU Charter should be provided for; (2) the list of the rights of a person arrested for surrender should be stipulated, including the right to be heard immediately by a judge; (3) the requirements for formalising voluntarily consent to surrender should be defined; (4) there is a need for more specific regulation in cases where a party requests that additional information be sought from a requesting state. The committee forwarded the proposal to the Minister of Justice. As the Minister of Justice did not support the amendments,¹³⁰ in November 2012 the Estonian Bar Association asked the Chancellor of Justice to verify the conformity of the surrender regulation with the Constitution. The Chancellor of Justice initiated the respective proceedings in April 2013.

Although the legal analysis of the Chancellor of Justice is still pending, he expressed his preliminary opinion in the request for information sent to the Minister of Justice.¹³¹ He found that in addition to the legal interpretations, how the regulation governing surrender procedures is applied in practice, in other words, what kind of problems have been raised in protecting the fundamental rights of the persons affected and how these problems have been handled, must inevitably be explored. The Chancellor of Justice also established that there is no such overview on the Ministry of Justice website or in the explanatory memorandum to the latest ¹²⁹ CLCSCo 19.12.2013, 3-1-1-101-13. In this case the defence lawyer claimed that the CCP is unconstitutional to the extent that it does not provide for alternatives (bail, electronic surveillance) to custody in extradition proceedings, as are provided for in domestic criminal proceedings. According to the SC decision, there is no unlawful unequal treatment because of the different legal situation: in extradition proceedings the decision to take a person into custody has already been made by the requesting state, whereas in domestic proceedings it is decided by the domestic court. Furthermore, the legislator has not expanded the domestic regulation of imposing bail or electronic surveillance instead of taking a person into custody to the regulation of international co-operation in criminal procedure.

¹³⁰ Minister of Justice letter No. 8-2/8349 (23 October 2012), <http://adr.rik.ee/jm/>.

¹³¹ Chancellor of Justice letter No. 6-1/130507/1301793 (16 April 2013), <http://adr.rik.ee/okk/>. The opinion of the Chancellor of Justice is based on the same document. Both co-authors of Sect. 2.3 were involved in preparing this preliminary opinion. After this report was written, the new Chancellor of Justice, Ülle Madise, took office in March 2015. She issued a final opinion in which she found in an abstract review of constitutionality that the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure relating to the EAW are not in conflict with the Constitution. See Chancellor of Justice Letter No. 6-1/130507/1601468 (7 April 2016), <http://adr.rik.ee/okk/dokument/4680282>.

draft law dealing with international co-operation in criminal matters.¹³² Some individual cases have been discussed in the media as well as in legal commentary.¹³³

In short, the Chancellor of Justice focused his analysis on two main topics: (1) can the person affected and his/her counsel effectively exercise the right of defence in surrender proceedings, considering the short time limits foreseen by the CCP; this includes the question of how the clause enabling a court to obtain additional information from a requesting state is applied in practice; (2) how the state reacts or should react if subsequently it becomes evident that the person surrendered has been acquitted or released on other grounds (the issue of compensation for damage).

The Estonian legal literature has pointed out that the exercise of some procedural rights in surrender proceedings is problematic, e.g. the right to notify a person close to the detainee of his/her detention.¹³⁴ Additionally, the question of the conformity of the CCP with Art. 12 of the EAW Framework Decision (FD)¹³⁵ has been raised, as § 503(4) of the CCP (mandatory detention until factual surrender) excludes the use of alternatives to detention in surrender proceedings.¹³⁶ Another issue that has raised concerns is the conformity of § 492(3) of the CCP (Estonia will surrender its citizens who reside permanently in Estonia for the period criminal proceedings are conducted, provided that the punishment imposed in the requesting state will be executed in Estonia), with the prohibition of discrimination.¹³⁷

From the perspective of the right of defence, it is important to keep in mind the readiness and willingness of defence lawyers to request, if needed, clarification of foreign law from the requesting state or a preliminary ruling from the Court of Justice (CJEU). The Chancellor of Justice has also addressed the Estonian Bar Association and raised the question of the need for training for defence lawyers. Additionally, the Chancellor of Justice has requested examples of problematic practices of surrender.¹³⁸ In its reply, the Bar Association advised that in the course of its supervision, it has discovered no misgivings on the part of advocates regarding surrender proceedings.

2.3.1.2 Estonian law guarantees the right to be heard in court before surrender to all persons, irrespective of consent to surrender (§ 502(4)(3) CCP). An analysis of Estonian court practice has confirmed this.¹³⁹

¹³² Draft Act No. 578 SE, adopted 12 June 2014.

¹³³ E.g. Albi 2015.

¹³⁴ Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 502, comm. 3.4.

¹³⁵ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

¹³⁶ See CLCSCo 19.12.2013, 3-1-101-13. By analogy, the alternatives to detention are excluded also in surrender proceedings, although once in the practice of the county courts, bail was imposed instead of detention (Order of the Harju County Court 12.09.2008, 1-08-4553).

¹³⁷ Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 504, comm. 4.1. and § 492, comm. 3.2.

¹³⁸ Chancellor of Justice letter No. 6-1/130507/1301794 (16 April 2013), <http://adr.rik.ee/okk/>.

¹³⁹ The summary of court practice (2004–2012) is based on the MA thesis by Marje Allikmets 2013.

Estonian courts have on several occasions been faced with claims on the part of the defence that the person has an alibi, that the person was not aware of the allegations or that the respective circumstances set out in the EAW were superficial. In contesting an EAW, requested persons and their counsel have sought to prove the existence of an alleged alibi, although they have often been unsuccessful for different reasons. In court practice from 2002–2012, there were at least two cases where the court, in order to refute reasonable suspicion, decided to request additional information from the requesting state.¹⁴⁰ In general, an analysis of court practice indicates that overall, no preliminary review of evidence takes place and, as a rule, Estonian courts follow the principles of mutual recognition and mutual trust strictly.

In connection with the right to be heard, it is worth mentioning that the Estonian Bar Association has proposed that a person's right to be heard by a judge immediately after his/her arrest should be included in the CCP. However, in a reply to the Chancellor of Justice, the Minister of Justice held that such amendment would have no added value.¹⁴¹ A requested person has the opportunity to express his/her opinion on three occasions: upon arrest, at the court hearing in which detention before surrender is decided and at the court hearing in which surrender is decided. According to the Minister of Justice, additional questioning would not in any way support the possibility of the Estonian court to evaluate the decision of the requesting state to issue an EAW in respect of a particular person objectively, if the evidence reviewed by the requesting state is unknown to the Estonian court. The Minister of Justice also referred to cases where a person has claimed his/her innocence and has managed independently to obtain essential supportive evidence within 24 hours, in result of which the EAW has been withdrawn.¹⁴² However, the Minister of Justice also noted that a refusal to surrender a person to a Member State does not entail the obligation of the requesting state to withdraw the EAW and to remove the notice of a wanted person in the Schengen Information System (SIS). According to the Minister of Justice, it has happened that after an Estonian court has refused surrender, the person has been arrested based on an SIS notice in some other Member State and has nevertheless been surrendered.

The Chancellor of Justice is of the opinion that a person's right of defence can be seen as a right to get explanations from his or her defence lawyer with regard to surrender proceedings and the related documents, as well as the use of defence tactics such as presenting evidence in order to preclude or restrict surrender. Considerable weight should be attributed to the right to consent or refuse to consent to surrender. According to § 499(3) CCP, consent, once given, cannot be withdrawn. The Chancellor of Justice has therefore proposed that the Minister of Justice consider elaborating the requirements for how consent is obtained and formalised. Statistical data show that the majority of surrendered persons consent to surrender.¹⁴³ However, it is notable that Neeme Laurits, who was surrendered to Finland and acquitted after 9 months of detention and whose case was extensively discussed in the Estonian media, is among those who have consented to surrender. According to Laurits, he had agreed to surrender because the police told him that if he did, even if the request was groundless, then at least he could be back from Finland in a couple of days. If he did not agree, he would be thrown in jail for several months in Tallinn and then would be surrendered to Finland anyway.

¹⁴⁰ Harju County Court Order 22.12.2011, 1-11-13412 and Tallinn City Court Order 21.11.2005, L-15/05.

¹⁴¹ Minister of Justice letter No. 10-2/13-4291 (4 June 2013), <http://adr.rik.ee/jm/>. Here and subsequently, the opinion of the Minister of Justice is based on same document if not shown otherwise.

¹⁴² (2007, April 26) Itaalia nõudis Eestist välja süütu mehe (Italy demanded extradition from Estonia of innocent man). Eesti Ekspress. <http://ekspress.delfi.ee/news/paevauudised/itaaliannoudis-eestist-valja-suutu-mehe.d?id=69107847>; see also Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 490, comm. 1.2.

At the same time no data exists on the number of cases in which consent has been given but the initial suspicion has turned out to be unsubstantiated or the criminal proceedings have been terminated for some other reason. The Chancellor of Justice has emphasised that even if it can be assumed that protection of the fundamental rights of the requested person will be endangered only in exceptional cases, it is the obligation of the state to guarantee a fair trial to everyone. Therefore, in his opinion, the factual application of the regulation of surrender proceedings has to be explored.

The Chancellor of Justice also recalled that the time limits in surrender proceedings are tight and, because of this, it is of practical importance to evaluate whether the exercise of the right of defence is at all effectively possible within these time limits. The true aim of the right to be heard and its impact on the decision taken in surrender proceedings is also relevant.

If a surrender decision cannot be made within the prescribed term, the time period for making the surrender decision shall be extended by thirty days (§ 502(7) CCP). A court may set a term for the submission of additional information (§ 502 (5) CCP) by the requesting state, although it may extend the length of detention. The right of a court to acquire additional information and the right of the parties to request it from the court are relevant first and foremost in cases of incomplete or ambiguous EAWs, e.g. if there are doubts concerning the identity of the person requested or the facts relating to or classification of the criminal offence (i.e. check of double criminality, if allowed).¹⁴⁴ The SC has acknowledged the need for additional information where there is uncertainty whether the limitation period for the criminal offence has expired or it is unclear whether the person requested has absconded from criminal proceedings.¹⁴⁵

¹⁴³ According to the summary of court practice 2004–2012, consent was given to 226 (74.3%) of the total of 304 surrender requests.

¹⁴⁴ Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 502, comm. 5.

¹⁴⁵ CLCSCo 18.03.2009, 3-1-1-9-09, para. 8.3.

In the above-mentioned preliminary opinion, the Chancellor of Justice noted that in the case of reasonable doubt, a request for additional information may be of critical importance. Surrender of a person may be refused if additional information has not been submitted by the deadline determined by the court. Additional information may, and as previously mentioned has, in (rare) individual cases resulted in the withdrawal of an EAW.

In practice, defence lawyers seek to convince the court of the need to request additional information, especially when the substance of the charge is incomplete or unclear. In reply to one such request, a county court explained that in surrender proceedings there is no room for disputes in respect of the substance of the charge.¹⁴⁶ In most cases such request will not be satisfied. Based on the court practice, it is possible to conclude that in deciding on a request for additional information, the court will primarily rely on the opinion of the prosecutor.¹⁴⁷

In the preliminary opinion, the Chancellor of Justice categorised the potential problems in exercising the right of defence in surrender proceedings as follows: (1) defective regulation (e.g. insufficient time limits); (2) officials violating their duties (e.g. not allowing examination of respective documents; not explaining a person's rights to them); (3) incompetent defence lawyers; (4) concurrence of these reasons. In domestic court proceedings there is the additional factor of the understanding of judges of the role and competence of courts in surrender proceedings.

Overall, an analysis of court practice reveals that, as a rule, Estonian courts do not carry out preliminary judicial review in order to evaluate the factual basis of an EAW, although the right to be heard is guaranteed to all requested persons. On several occasions, the courts have expressis verbis found that the court hearing the EAW case does not have any competence to deal with the substance of the charge, and is allowed only to check whether circumstances exist which preclude or restrict the surrender of the person. Therefore, the majority of court rulings deciding on surrender are laconic in their formulation. The same applies to decisions on detention for the purposes of surrender. In the latter case, the courts usually write in their decisions that the court has no reason to doubt the information sent by the requesting state and, in order to ensure the execution of the EAW, the person has to be detained. Courts have sometimes additionally explained that it is reasonable to assume that upon issuing an EAW, the requesting state has ascertained the relevant facts on which the charge is based and that this is sufficient for arrest as a precondition for surrender.¹⁴⁸

In legal commentary, however, it has been remarked that the examination of an EAW is not always formalistic and, in the case of reasonable doubt, certain substantial requirements have to be followed to control the validity of relevant information.¹⁴⁹ The SC has, in the context of the expiry of the limitation period of the ¹⁴⁶ Harju County Court Order 21.03.2012, 1-12-2617.

¹⁴⁷ E.g. Harju County Court Order 29.05.2012, 1-12-73 and 03.01.2011, 1-10-16977.

¹⁴⁸ E.g. Harju County Court Order 03.12.2012, 1-12-11375.

¹⁴⁹ Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 492, comm. 7.1.

offence, noted the following: if an EAW does not contain information that the person requested has absconded from the criminal proceedings, the court must hold that this has not happened. If the court still has doubts concerning the circumstances on which an EAW is based (including expiration of the limitation period), the court has to acquire additional information from the requesting state.¹⁵⁰

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

This principle is stipulated in § 23(1) and (2), first sentence of the Constitution:

No one may be convicted of an act which did not constitute a criminal offence under the law in force at the time the act was committed.

No one may be sentenced to a penalty that is more severe than the one that was applicable at the time the offence was committed.

The principle of legality in criminal matters derives from this provision, in conjunction with § 13(2) of the Constitution, which provides that everyone is entitled to protection by the state and of the law.

As far as it is known to the Experts, in practice no problems with the application of the nulla poena sine lege rule have arisen. Estonia has on one occasion refused the surrender of a person to Sweden due to the fact that the act committed (infringement of the Swedish law regulating the collection of debts) was not punishable in Estonia and it was not an offence in the list of 32 offences in the EAW FD.¹⁵¹ In legal literature, there has been no additional discussion on this subject. The legal commentary only refers to the decision of 18 July 2005 of the German Constitutional Court and to the CJEU Advocaten voor de Wereld decision.¹⁵²

In the view of the Experts, there is a justified concern regarding the legal regulation of surrender, as the 32 crimes stipulated in the EAW FD include offences that are not harmonised in EU law. In addition, this may cause problems relating to the proportionality of the offence on which an EAW is based. The SC has stated in obiter dictum that in the case of an offence other than one stipulated in the EAW FD, the court may not solely rely on the qualification of the act stated in the EAW by the requesting state, and must therefore verify whether the facts of the case correspond to the necessary elements of an offence stipulated in Estonian law.¹⁵³

¹⁵⁰ CLCSCo 18.03.2009, 3-1-1-9-09, para. 8.3.

¹⁵¹ Harju County Court Order 21.11.2007, 1-07-14422.

¹⁵² Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 491, comm. 2.2.

¹⁵³ CLCSCo 18.03.2009, 3-1-1-9-09, para. 8.2.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

Everyone's right to attend all hearings held by a court in his/her case is stipulated in § 24(2) of the Constitution. The CCP provides some grounds for a court hearing without the participation of the accused. As an exception, a criminal matter may be heard in the absence of the accused if his/her whereabouts in Estonia cannot be established, there is sufficient reason to believe that he/she is outside the territory of Estonia and is absconding from the court proceedings, reasonable efforts have been made to find him/her and the court hearing is possible without the accused (§ 269(2) CCP). If an in absentia hearing is not possible due to the facts of the case, there may be grounds for issuing an EAW.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 Estonia does not provide any practical assistance to surrendered citizens or permanent residents. In the view of the Chancellor of Justice,¹⁵⁴ it would be important to explore the practical aspects of implementing EAWs and, if necessary, to learn from any mistakes.

In response to the Chancellor of Justice, the Minister of Justice has stated that the rare, negative cases covered by the media have not been caused by any miscarriage of justice by Estonian law enforcement authorities, but by a reappraisal of the evidence in the requesting state.

In response to the question whether the state should be obliged to give necessary contact information to persons surrendered, the Minister of Justice responded that Estonia does not have information about the authorities a person could turn to in order to get more information about one's rights in another Member State.

The Minister of Justice replied to the Chancellor of Justice that the state does not have any information concerning the criminal proceedings of surrendered persons in other Member States. Thus, there is no plan to analyse 'the fate' of surrendered persons. Likewise, Estonia does not give information to other states about criminal proceedings in which Estonia has issued an EAW. According to the Minister of Justice, there have only been a few cases in one Member State where, figuratively speaking, the person surrendered has come to the Estonian embassy on the following day asking for help in returning to Estonia.

In practice, individuals themselves and their defence lawyers have sometimes claimed that they do not have any information about the proceedings in another Member State and that Estonia should protect and help its citizens in surrender proceedings.¹⁵⁵ Estonia, however, does not have any public or non-governmental organisations that provide assistance to surrendered persons.

¹⁵⁴ Preliminary opinion of the Chancellor of Justice, Chancellor of Justice letter No. 6-1/130507/1301793 (16 April 2013), <http://adr.rik.ee/okk/>.

Unquestionably, several problems arise when participating in criminal proceedings in another Member State, e.g. starting with the need for translation. Questions regarding the guarantee of fundamental procedural rights equally to citizens and permanent residents do not arise only in the case of surrender, but also in all other cases involving foreigners. Freedom of movement within the EU has raised the number of alien suspects and accused persons. Ideally, the state should provide additional help for its citizens and permanent residents in proceedings in other Member States, even though under recent EU directives defence rights in the requesting state are now more clearly regulated.

2.3.4.2 According to information from the Minister of Justice, 8,508 criminal convictions entered into force in 2013, 94 (1.1%) persons were partially acquitted and 73 (0.86%) were fully acquitted (this data may include cases where the prosecutor withdrew the charges or the proceedings were terminated on grounds other than acquittal). In 2012, the percentage of partially or fully acquitted persons was 1.62% (156 of 9,638).¹⁵⁶

Between 2011–2013 only one of all the persons surrendered to Estonia was partially acquitted. According to the official data,¹⁵⁷ during these years 67, 61 and 88 EAWs, respectively, were issued in Estonia. At the time of the compilation of this data, during those years, 31, 39 and 45 persons, respectively, were surrendered to Estonia (including surrenders on the basis of EAWs issued in earlier years). Therefore, the percentage of surrendered persons who have been acquitted cannot be reliably compared to the percentage of individuals who have been acquitted in domestic criminal proceedings.

There is no information on how many of the individuals surrendered from Estonia have subsequently been found innocent.

The legal literature has pointed out a problem which arises from a so-called negative conflict of competency, i.e. a situation where none of the Member States involved foresee any rules for compensation for violations that occur in surrender proceedings.¹⁵⁸ One of the reasons may be the absence of such rules in the EAW FD.

With regard to compensation for damage, the Chancellor of Justice has made a proposal to analyse whether the Minister of Justice could help surrendered

¹⁵⁵ Harju County Court Order 27.03.2012, 1-12-2397.

¹⁵⁶ Urvo Klopets (adviser in the Criminal Policy Department of the Ministry of Justice) in response (e-mails of 13 and 17 June 2014) to the enquiry of Saale Laos (6 June 2014). For statistical data see also ‘Kuritegevus Eestis 2012’ (Crime in Estonia in 2012), p. 29. http://www.kriminaalpoliitika.ee/sites/krimipoliitika/files/elfinder/dokumentid/17_kuritegevus_eestis_2012_0.pdf.

¹⁵⁷ Webpage of the Ministry of Justice, statistics on international legal aid. <http://www.just.ee/et/eesmargid-tegevused/rahvusvaheline-oiguskoostoo/rahvusvahelise-oigusabi-statistika>.

¹⁵⁸ Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 490, comm. 6.2.2.

individuals by publishing overviews of the rules on state liability and pertinent court practice in the Member States that submit the most EAWs to Estonia.

The Minister of Justice is of the opinion that Estonia could compensate for damage only in cases where Estonia is the requesting state. The SC has stated that the state's obligation to pay fair compensation even in the case of a lawful restriction in an extraordinary manner of some fundamental right (obligation to endure the performance of criminal procedural acts in respect of a person, as criminal proceedings serve the public interest) arises from the Constitution.¹⁵⁹ In the opinion of the Chancellor of Justice, the same principle applies to international co-operation in criminal procedure, including surrender. The Compensation for Damage Caused in Offence Proceedings Act (entered into force 1 May 2015) includes rules on compensation for damage caused by measures applied in the course of international co-operation in criminal proceedings.¹⁶⁰

Publication in the media of the Neeme Laurits case in Finland brought about public debate and calls for a more thorough control of EAWs by the domestic courts, including from politicians (e.g. statement of the head of the Constitutional Committee of the Riigikogu).¹⁶¹

In another case, a person surrendered to Italy who had been accused because he had been a passenger in the same bus as the actual criminals, was released three months later.¹⁶² There has also been at least one negative case concerning identity theft, in which a person was surrendered to France, although the accused claimed that his passport had been stolen; he was released soon after the surrender.¹⁶³ In this case, it was problematic that the court had not requested any necessary supplementary information.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 The above-mentioned Piirsoo case (see Sect. 2.2)¹⁶⁴ is remarkable, but unfortunately there is no public information as to whether the topic has been discussed any further in Parliament or at the Governmental level.

¹⁵⁹ E.g. SCebj 31.03.2011, 3-3-1-69-09, paras. 60 and 64.

¹⁶⁰ RT I, 20.11.2014, 1, Compensation for Damage Caused in Offence Proceedings Act § 2(4), see also explanatory memorandum to Draft Act No. 635 SE, paras. 12 and 13.

¹⁶¹ See supra n. 124.

¹⁶² Filippov, J. (2008, December 18). Itaalia vaikib Eesti juveeliröövlitest (Italy silent on Estonian jewel thieves). <http://ekspress.delfi.ee/news/paevauudised/itaalia-vaikib-eesti-juveeliroovlitest?id=27684285>; see also supra n. 142.

¹⁶³ Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 492, comm. 4, with reference to Harju County Court Order 06.06.2008, 1-08-6004.

¹⁶⁴ Also reflected in the paper by Albi 2015, p. 176.

2.3.5.2 There has been no extensive debate on the move to mutual recognition in criminal matters. However, related issues have arisen in the context of specific cases. In legal commentary, Plekksepp has criticised the shift to mutual recognition in criminal matters, stating that unlike the free movement of goods, penal law is a societal and cultural construction, based on agreements and values recognised in the particular Member State.¹⁶⁵

2.3.5.3 From a critical point of view it could be concluded that it is largely unclear what the role of the courts is in safeguarding individual rights in surrender proceedings, what level of protection is guaranteed by the Constitution and what, in addition to the formal prerequisites for surrender, the courts can assess. There is no relevant CJEU case law as of yet and it is not clear how the Charter can and will be applied in practice.

In short, Estonia tends to satisfy all EAWs. Court practice indicates that courts in Estonia operate exactly pursuant to the regulation in the CCP (and therefore pursuant to the EAW FD) and, as a rule, they have not established any new grounds for refusal to execute an EAW.

As of 31 December 2012, courts in Estonia have refused to execute 8 (i.e. 2.6% of all) EAWs. Only in one notable case did a court refuse surrender on the grounds of a general provision of international co-operation, as the accused had a valid alibi.¹⁶⁶ However, it has to be said that in many other similar cases, courts have satisfied the request to surrender. On three occasions, Estonia has refused surrender on the grounds that the double criminality requirement was not fulfilled.¹⁶⁷ On one occasion, the EAW was considered to be an international rogatory letter.¹⁶⁸ A requesting state has twice annulled an EAW after Estonia asked for additional information,¹⁶⁹ and Estonia has once refused surrender due to expiry of the limitation period.¹⁷⁰

¹⁶⁵ Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012, § 490, comm. 1.2.

¹⁶⁶ Harju County Court Order 29.03.2007, 1-07-3718; see also Plekksepp in Kergandberg and Pikamäe 2012.

¹⁶⁷ Tartu County Court Order 24.04.2012, 1-12-3543 (causing damage to a person's health did not constitute a criminal offence under Estonian law, as the health disorder caused persisted less than four weeks); Harju County Court Order 25.09.2008, 1-08-12380 (theft of a CD-player is a misdemeanour under Estonian law because of the low value of the object) and 21.11.2007, 1-07-14422 (infringement of the Swedish law regulating collection of debts).

¹⁶⁸ Harju County Court Order 31.03.2008, 1-08-4051.

¹⁶⁹ Harju County Court Order 22.12.2011, 1-11-13412 and Tallinn City Court Order 21.11.2005, L-15/05.

¹⁷⁰ Tallinn Circuit Court Order 17.11.2008, 1-08-13649.

2.3.5.4 The question of proportionality arises in the context of deprivation of liberty (detention for surrender), as this constitutes an intensive restriction of a fundamental right. To date, the European handbook on how to issue a European arrest warrant,¹⁷¹ which also introduces a proportionality test, is just an advisory guideline.

The Minister of Justice has explained that even though the CCP does not provide any requirement of a proportionality test, various guidelines and trainings have emphasised that authorities conducting proceedings should consider proportionality. The Minister of Justice has confirmed that Estonia has not submitted any EAWs that have been in conformity with the EAW FD but not proportionate.

In the Experts' view, application of the EAW FD needs to be assessed and problems that arise should be resolved through amendments to the EAW FD (if application of the EAW FD on the national level is problematic). If the competence of the local courts is to be reinstated, the problems this aims to resolve (e.g. re-establishment of the requirement of double criminality, pre-evaluation of evidence, etc.) must first be identified. It is therefore difficult to support a general proposal to widen the jurisdiction of the courts of the executing state to expand preliminary judicial review. It is clear that the amount and quality of evidence may vary depending on the stage of the pre-trial procedure, and the prerequisites for suspicion of guilt (e.g. for arrest) may differ among the Member States. As a starting point, it may be reasonable to reassess the time-limits for proceedings and to focus on requesting additional information without having false modesty about distrusting the judicial authorities of another Member State.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The implementation of the Data Retention Directive 2006/24/EC¹⁷² (DRD) has not raised any serious constitutional concerns in Estonia. The Directive was implemented in national law by amendment of the Electronic Communications Act (ECA) in 2007.¹⁷³ According to § 111¹ ECA, communication data is generally retained for one year. Requests submitted and information given to specific authorities is retained for two years. In the interest of public order and national security, the Government can extend these terms of retention.

¹⁷¹ Council of the European Union, 17195/1/10 REV 1 (17 December 2010).

¹⁷² Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

¹⁷³ Draft Act No. 62 SE (28 May 2002).

By the amendment of 2012,¹⁷⁴ the legal classification of requests submitted by law enforcement agencies to communication services providers was downgraded from ‘measures of surveillance activities’ to ‘general investigative activities’. This means that certain special legal requirements for surveillance activities, inter alia, the agencies’ obligation to notify the person subjected to surveillance measures after their completion, no longer apply to the requests concerned. Additionally, through this amendment, the right of request was no longer restricted to criminal proceedings exclusively, and was extended to misdemeanour proceedings. This right, which had been exclusive to the specific prosecution authorities, was extended to other authorities entitled to process administrative offences (e.g. the Environmental Inspectorate, the Financial Supervisory Authority and the tax and customs authorities). Aware of the European Commission’s critical approach to the vague term ‘serious crime’ used in the Directive, the legislator defended the amendment by declaring that the right to define the term ‘serious crime’ lies with the national legislator.¹⁷⁵

The explanatory memorandum to the amending act did not consider questions concerning the compatibility or proportionality of the measures envisaged, rather the motivation for their adoption was based particularly on the necessity to reassess the needs of internal security after the terror attacks in Madrid and London in 2004–2005.¹⁷⁶

According to the Estonian legislator¹⁷⁷ and the prevailing legal opinion,¹⁷⁸ the statutory duties provided for in the DRD did not interfere with the right to secrecy of correspondence guaranteed in § 43 of the Estonian Constitution,¹⁷⁹ as the retention obligation refers only to connection data but not to its content. Although the retention of connection data does encroach on the right to the inviolability of private life guaranteed in § 26 of the Constitution, the latter is seen as less entitled to protection than the right to secrecy of correspondence.¹⁸⁰ The general diagnosis is that these topics are not in the awareness of the Estonian public at large.¹⁸¹ At the same time, the practical realisation of an e-state – including e-governance, e-healthcare and e-voting, to name only a few areas – has long become reality in Estonia.

¹⁷⁴ Draft Act No. 175 SE (6 February 2012).

¹⁷⁵ Explanatory memorandum to Draft Act No. 175, supra n. 174, p. 6.

¹⁷⁶ See explanatory memorandum to Draft Act No. 62, supra n. 173, pp. 11 and 13.

¹⁷⁷ Ibid., p. 12.

¹⁷⁸ Kask et al in Madise et al. 2012, § 43, comm. 6.

¹⁷⁹ ‘Everyone has the right to confidentiality of messages sent or received by him or her by post, telegraph, telephone or other commonly used means. Derogations from this right may be made in the cases and pursuant to a procedure provided by law if they are authorised by a court and if they are necessary to prevent a criminal offence, or to ascertain the truth in criminal proceedings.’

¹⁸⁰ See explanatory memorandum to Draft Act No. 62, supra n. 173, p. 12.

¹⁸¹ See also Tigasson’s critical remarks on the lack of public awareness concerning the topics of eavesdropping and surveillance in Estonia. Tigasson, K.-R. (2013, October 30). Klaasist maailm (Glass world). Eesti Päevaleht. <http://epl.delfi.ee/news/arvamus/kulli-riin-tigasson-klaasist-maailm.d?id=66999970>.

Concerning the disclosure of personal information, the Estonian SC has without further consideration approved the Estonian lawmaker's general decision to disclose the identity of the defendant in court decisions (the latter are generally made public via the Internet).¹⁸² It has also approved the right of creditors to publicly disclose their debtors, arguing that this constitutes an appropriate instrument to protect the legitimate interests of the former.¹⁸³ These judgments exemplify the Court's disposition to accept restrictions to the right to privacy and/or the secrecy of correspondence where it finds the given grounds justifiable.

In a recent ruling of February 2015, the Criminal Law Chamber of the SC also delivered its opinion on the invalidation of the DRD and its legal impact on national law.¹⁸⁴ In its decision, the Chamber acknowledged that the invalidation of the DRD does not automatically lead to the unconstitutionality of the respective national law, and upheld the constitutionality of the Estonian rules on data retention discussed above as in force prior to the amendments of 2012. According to the Chamber's majority view, the classification of insurance fraud as a 'serious crime' was up to the legislator, while the proportionality of the measure was ensured in particular by the requirements applicable to surveillance activities.¹⁸⁵ Two out of the six justices of the Chamber presented a dissenting opinion. Among other issues, they challenged the adequacy of the procedural guarantees under the measures, and questioned the Chamber's view concerning the proportionality of the general one-year data retention period.¹⁸⁶

There is another aspect that has in the past made data retention an unlikely topic for particular concern in Estonia. This is the issue of national security. Due to its historical experience and geo-political position, since the restoration of independence in 1991, Estonia has regarded NATO and therewith the U.S. as the strongest guarantors of its sovereignty and security interests.¹⁸⁷ For this reason, Estonia unequivocally supported – rhetorically and militarily – the U.S. invasion of Iraq, notwithstanding the strong opposition of e.g. Germany and France.¹⁸⁸ This may help explain Estonia's willingness to prioritise security matters over aspects of personal freedom.

Based on the above, it seems rather unlikely that the SC would have considered declaring measures on data retention – even if they were not part of the EU legal order – unconstitutional prior to the CJEU's decision to annul the DRD.

¹⁸² See, e.g., CLCSCo 10.09.2007, 3-1-1-35-07.

¹⁸³ E.g. Judgment of the Civil Chamber of the Supreme Court (CiCSCj) 21.12.2010, 3-2-1-67-10, para. 22.

¹⁸⁴ CLCSCj 23.02.2015, 3-1-1-51-14.

¹⁸⁵ Ibid.

¹⁸⁶ CLCSCj 23.02.2015, 3-1-1-51-14, dissenting opinion of Justices Kergandberg and Laos para. 5 et seq. Furthermore, the judges underlined that if the Criminal Chamber had doubts concerning the conformity of the regulations with the Constitution, it would by law be obliged to refer the decision on the constitutionality of the legal norms to the SC en banc (ibid., paras. 1 and 3).

¹⁸⁷ See also: Sprūds 2012, p. 60 et seq.; Kaldas 2006, pp. 97 and 107 et seq.

¹⁸⁸ Ibid.

The author's view is corroborated by the Estonian answers to the Questionnaire on the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice and the Information Society for the FIDE Congress in Tallinn 2012.¹⁸⁹ Concerning the question of the impact of the Data Retention Directive on the legal order of the Member State, Estonia's answers focus on the Directive's vital role in the fight against terrorism and serious crime and reiterate the importance of every Member State to implement the Directive as soon as possible.¹⁹⁰ Equally, the invalidation of the DRD by the CJEU did not attract any special interest at societal level in Estonia. However, the Ministry of Justice in cooperation with the Ministry of Economic Affairs and Communications decided in spring 2014 to conduct a legal analysis on the rules in question. Additionally, the Estonian Chancellor of Justice has asked the Ministries of Justice, of the Interior and of Economic Affairs and Communications for their opinion on the constitutionality of the national regulation in force. The Government's official conclusions are still pending at the time of writing in May 2015.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 In the context of EU law, the issue of unpublished or secret measures has arisen in case law on the applicability of measures adopted immediately before EU accession.

In 2006, the SC was confronted with the question of whether EU legislation, which had not been published in Estonian, was binding on individuals. In two decisions of the Administrative Law Chamber of the SC of 10 May 2006, the applicants argued that they were not to be blamed for incorrectly declaring their goods to the customs authorities. The case related to customs declarations filed immediately after the accession of Estonia to the EU. According to the applicants, they did not knowingly submit false data to the customs authorities as 'they did not and could not have known it, as the EU rules were hard to access and the relevant Estonian regulations were passed, so to speak, at the last minute'. The SC stated that ignorance of the law does not release the declarant from the duty to submit correct data to the authorities. The court also decided that since the applicant acted as a professional customs broker, it was irrelevant whether the EU acts had been published in Estonian.¹⁹¹

Curiously enough, this decision relies on a number of cases from the CJEU regarding substantive rules. Yet the decision makes no reference to the obligation of the court of last instance to refer matters of EU law for a preliminary ruling (Art. 267 TFEU). Almost exactly at the same time, namely on 24 March 2006, a Czech court, faced with a similar dilemma of EU legislation having to be published in the official language of the Member State, referred a question to the CJEU, which led to the famous Skoma-Lux decision.¹⁹²

¹⁸⁹ Antonova et al. 2012, p. 319 et seq.

¹⁹⁰ Ibid., p. 325 et seq.

¹⁹¹ ALCSCj 10.05.2006, 3-3-1-65-05 and 3-3-1-66-05.

Consequently, the SC had to revisit its earlier position. As an example of creative judicial writing, the Court placed the responsibility on the CJEU, stating that ‘[a]t the time of the processing of the current administrative matter, the CJEU has in its more recent practice expressed a clear position regarding the central importance to the rights of individuals of the requirement to publish EU legal acts in the language of the Member States, which is why in solving of the current case it is not appropriate to take into account the positions of the chamber expressed in the 10 May 2006 decisions’.¹⁹³

In the Pimix case, the CJEU, responding to a request from the Estonian SC, confirmed that ‘the relevant provisions of Regulations Nos 1789/2003 and 1972/2003 could not be enforced against individuals in Estonia with effect from 1 May 2004, since they had not been properly published in Estonian in the Official Journal of the European Union or reproduced in Estonian national law’.¹⁹⁴

The Constitution foresees that laws have to be published and that only published legislation can have mandatory force; this is also a key part of the rule of law. According to Estonian legal doctrine, publication of laws is a necessary precondition for their legal existence as such.¹⁹⁵ Accordingly, the prevailing opinion is that unpublished legislation cannot be binding and valid laws cannot be declared secret. The Estonian rule is stricter, and the law is considered non-existent instead of merely ‘not enforceable’.

Another question relates to secret regulations of a minister (or of the Government). Such regulations mainly concern national security, e.g. regulations concerning the methods used by that authority to secretly gather information, but also e.g. the requirements for encrypted materials and processing and protection thereof. Section § 3(2) of the Constitution, which states that only published laws may have binding force, does not explicitly mention ‘regulations’. Non-publication of some regulations is expressis verbis allowed by § 4(2) of the Riigi Teataja seadus (the Estonian State Gazette Act)¹⁹⁶ and is based on the understanding that ‘law’ in the sense of § 3(2) of the Constitution must be interpreted to mean only Acts of Parliament. In these cases, the State Gazette publishes only the title, date and number of the regulation together with its unclassified provisions. However, this interpretation of § 3(2) is not mandatory: the SC has not yet answered the question whether the word ‘law’ in the meaning of § 3(2) of the Constitution only refers to Acts of the Parliament or also to regulations of the Government or a minister. Although Acts of Parliament are the only ‘laws’ in the formal sense, ‘law’ in the substantive sense includes all acts that are addressed to an undetermined number of addressees. Thus, in the substantive sense, regulations are also

¹⁹² Case C-161/06 Skoma-Lux [2007] ECR I-10841, para. 37.

¹⁹³ ALCSCj, 13.10.2008, 3-3-1-36-08, para. 21.

¹⁹⁴ Case C-146/11 Pimix [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:450, para. 42.

¹⁹⁵ Merusk et al in Madise et al. 2012, § 3, comm. 4.

¹⁹⁶ Riigi Teataja seadus. – RT I 2010, 19, 101.

'laws'.¹⁹⁷ Furthermore, there are good reasons to treat regulations as laws in the sense of § 3(2) of the Constitution. First, there is neither a theoretical nor a practical need to enact secret regulations because everything that must remain secret may also be adopted by an administrative act that will be classified according to the State Secrets and Classified Information of Foreign States Act.¹⁹⁸ Secondly, it is questionable whether a universal legal norm can be valid at all without prior publication, since an unpublished act cannot be followed by the public and cannot therefore be socially effective.¹⁹⁹ Thus, there is no consensus among Estonian scholars whether § 3(2) excludes secret regulations of the Government or a minister or not.

A practical example of unpublished documents having a character similar to unpublished legislation is the question of references to national or international standards, such as e.g. CEN and CENELEC as well as ISO and IEC. For instance in construction related disputes, the standards form a part of the rules relevant to solving disputes. As the standards are not available without charge, they may be considered similar to unpublished legislation de facto. So far the Estonian courts have not addressed this issue and the standards have been accepted as relevant in litigation. For example in civil litigation, a county court has referred to standard EN 976-2 regarding underground tanks of glass-reinforced plastics when dismissing a buyer's damage claim that relied on a lack of installation instructions in the documents handed over with a purchased underground tank.²⁰⁰

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

The Estonian SC has taken a relatively liberal approach towards accepting EU law as interpreted by the CJEU.²⁰¹ There have been very few cases in the SC in which the argument of EU law being contrary to national constitutional law has arisen.

Such cases have primarily concerned the taxation of excess stocks (of e.g. sugar) that took place at the time of the accession of Estonia to the EU in 2004.²⁰² There ¹⁹⁷ Cf. Merusk 1995, p. 13.

¹⁹⁸ Riigisaladuse ja salastatud väliseabe seadus. - RT I 2007, 16, 77.

¹⁹⁹ The concept of legal validity, according to Gustav Radbruch, includes three elements: a legal, a social and a legal philosophical element, see Radbruch 1914, p. 158 et seq. The publication of a universal act can be considered as a precondition for social effectiveness. If it is lacking, the validity of the act is questionable.

²⁰⁰ Harju County Court Judgment 16.03.2011, 2-06-11240, para. 7; upheld on appeal by the Tallinn Circuit Court 20.03.2012.

²⁰¹ For an analysis of the practice of the SC, see Ginter 2008.

²⁰² For a detailed discussion, see Albi 2009, pp. 46–69 and Albi 2010, pp. 791–829. Albi's analysis suggests that the standard of protection of e.g. legitimate expectations and property rights by the CJEU in these cases was significantly lower than in the established Estonian case law.

were many issues with constitutional implications in the matter, however only two will be mentioned here: the issue of legal certainty and the right to property. Undertakings were requested to make payments for excess stocks of certain products as of 1 May 2004. Up until the last minute, it was not clear which products would be subject to the tax and how it would be determined what stock would be considered normal and what would be considered to be in excess of that normal. The relevant regulations were, however, not adopted by the European Commission in due time. EU Regulation 1972/2003 entered into force only on 1 May 2004, and the draft was amended immediately before its enactment – i.e. on 10 April 2004 and 20 April 2004. In Estonia, the Surplus Stocks Act, implementing the EU regulations, was published on 27 April 2004 and took effect on 1 May 2004. This gave the relevant undertakings nowhere near enough time to adjust their behaviour or dispose of excess stocks.

The most famous case where property rights were invoked is the 5 October 2006²⁰³ decision of the SC (the excess stocks case). The applicant challenged the administrative prescriptions ordering it to pay a fee on its excess stock of sugar at the time of the accession of Estonia to the EU. The applicant (unsuccessfully) argued, inter alia, that the challenged administrative acts as well as the legislative provisions which formed the legal basis for those acts breached provisions of the Estonian Constitution protecting the rights of enterprise and property. The applicant also requested that the relevant regulations of the European Commission be set aside because they breached the Estonian Constitution.

In the light of the SC's stringent rule of law case law outlined in Sect. 2.1.3, it is very doubtful that in a wholly internal situation such a significant financial impact, imposed over such a short period of time, would have been acceptable under national constitutional rules.²⁰⁴

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 In Estonia, the ESM Treaty was subject to a constitutional challenge by the Estonian Chancellor of Justice. In his legal challenge to the Estonian SC, the Chancellor of Justice pointed out that the unprecedented magnitude of the financial commitment could potentially seriously limit the very ability of the state to ensure the functioning of state institutions, including the judicial system, and the protection of the rights and social welfare benefits envisaged under the Constitution.²⁰⁵ The case has been analysed in detail in other publications.²⁰⁶

²⁰³ ALCSCj 05.10.2006, 3-3-1-33-06, <http://www.juradmin.eu/docs/EE01/EE01000007.pdf>.

²⁰⁴ In Case C-146/11 Pimix, n. 194, the CJEU decided that the regulations could not be enforced against individuals due to the fact that they had not been published in Estonian. No consideration regarding the temporal scope of application was expressed in the decision.

According to the treaty framework, after the ‘temporary correction period’, the contribution of Estonia, if the maximum capital calls allowed under the ESM Treaty were to be made, would amount to 1.79 billion EUR.²⁰⁷ In 2013, the GDP at current prices of Estonia was 18.4 billion EUR.²⁰⁸ Accordingly, the maximum contribution would amount to approximately 9.7% of the GDP. Estonia’s commitment to the European Financial Stability Facility (EFSF) is close to 2 billion EUR.

The issue of whether those amounts would be added together or absorbed was of central focus during the parliamentary debate, where the reporting Member of Parliament (MP) was unable to provide a consistent response.²⁰⁹ The debate is best illustrated by the following question of MP Igor Gräzin:

You have heard that they are not summed. I have heard that they are. You have heard one thing, I have heard another. Hasn’t the thought crossed your mind that if we are talking about billions, it would be wise to check if they are or are not summed?

The fact that the contribution of Estonia is very large was also one of the central arguments of the national constitutional challenge, where the constitutionality of the ‘emergency voting’ mechanism set out in Art. 4(4) of the ESM Treaty was questioned.

It was argued that the emergency voting provisions render this mechanism contrary to the principle of parliamentary democracy, the principle of parliamentary prerogatives, parliamentary control over public finances and the principle of a democratic state subject to the rule of law. More generally, the delegation of responsibility over public finances from Parliament to the executive branch would, according to the petition, break the chain of legitimization and political responsibility; it would greatly impact the budgetary powers of Parliament and its ability to use funds to guarantee the rights and liberties of the people.

The constitutional challenge also focused on the issue of ‘incalculable risks’ and the Parliament no longer being able to exercise overall budgetary responsibility. In the German ESM case, the German Constitutional Court noted the ambiguities in the Treaty’s wording about whether a maximum limit exists, and thus requested Parliament to address this issue in the ratification process. In Estonia, the SC was confident in deciding that the amount set in the Treaty ‘is the maximum limit of the obligations of Estonia, which cannot be changed without its consent and without

²⁰⁵ SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12 on the ESM Treaty.

²⁰⁶ Ginter 2013, pp. 335–354; Ginter and Narits 2013, pp. 55–76.

²⁰⁷ See Art. 42 of the ESM Treaty.

²⁰⁸ Press release by Statistics Estonia ‘Economic growth slowed down in 2013’ (11 March 2014), <http://www.stat.ee/72427>.

²⁰⁹ Minutes of the XII Riigikogu (30 August 2012), (available in Estonian) <http://stenogrammid.riigikogu.ee/et/20120830/>.

amending the Treaty'.²¹⁰ However, Justice Kõve, one of the dissenting justices, argued along the same lines as the Bundesverfassungsgericht, stating that

I deem it necessary to note that I am not convinced that the opinions of the SC en banc on the interpretation of the Treaty are correct. Namely, I am not convinced that the maximum limit of the possible obligations of Estonia according to the Treaty does not in any case exceed 1.302 billion euros and that obligations larger than that may arise for Estonia only through amendment of the [Treaty].²¹¹

This is evidence of the fact that the existence or absence of an upper limit was discussed in the deliberation room.

The same issue was addressed in the parliamentary debate. When the head of the parliamentary Finance Committee was asked whether the maximum amount of the contribution could be increased under the emergency procedure, the chairperson responded that '[t]his is the information I have at the moment and what I will base my decisions on in today's voting. Should you have different information be sure to let me ... know. ... I suppose it is so'.²¹² In a press conference, the Prime Minister of Estonia was quoted as saying '[f]irst the ESM must be ratified and then we can discuss the details'.²¹³

The fact that under Arts. 8(4) and 9(3) of the ESM Treaty the capital calls have to be met 'irrevocably and unconditionally', within seven days, was not analysed from the point of view of the Constitution. In a dissenting opinion, six justices proclaimed that '[t]his is the most important case in the history of [Estonian] constitutional review'.²¹⁴ In the same dissenting opinion, the six justices pinpointed the very same issue, writing that '[w]e find that in addition to Art. 4(4) of the Treaty referred to by the Chancellor of Justice, also the irreversible and unconditional nature of the financial obligations to be assumed by the Treaty ... and the limited nature of judicial review of the operations of the ESM ..., as referred to by Anneli Albi ..., should have been addressed as related provisions'. In the opinion of the dissenting judges, this condition also should have been taken into account when analysing the seriousness of the interference with the Constitution. According to the dissenting judges, as the obligations are irrevocable and unconditional, '[c]onsequently, the Riigikogu cannot, without breaching the Treaty, alleviate the effect of ²¹⁰ SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12, para. 144.

²¹¹ Dissenting Opinion of Justice Kõve to SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12. Estonian law does not recognise the term 'concurring opinion' which is why, although justice Kõve supported the final decision, the opinion is titled 'dissenting'.

²¹² Quoted text by MP Sven Sester, see minutes of the XII Riigikogu, VIII session (18 December 2014), (available in Estonian) <http://stenogrammid.riigikogu.ee/et/201412181000>. The final comment by MP Sester was edited out of the revised version of the official transcript.

²¹³ Quote by Andrus Ansip as provided by Kuusik, I. (2012, August 14). Ansip: kõigepealt tuleb ESM ratifitseerida, siis räägime detailidest (Ansip: First the ESM must be ratified, then we can discuss the details). Postimees. <http://majandus24.postimees.ee/939704/ansip-kõigepealt-tuleb-esm-ratifitseerida-siis-raagime-detailidest>.

²¹⁴ Dissenting Opinion of SC Justices Jõks, Järvesaar, Kergandberg, Kivi, Kull and Laarmaa to SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12.

possible negative consequences for Estonia arising from the application of Art. 4(4) of the Treaty'. Dissenting Justice Luik added along the same lines:

Now it is time to ask: what is/will be left of the Riigikogu's financial sovereignty besides a merely formal competence to decide on the ratification of the Treaty in question and on the post-ratification obligation to establish a legal environment necessary for the fulfilment of the financial obligation assumed irrevocably and unconditionally, and to reserve 1,153,200 million euros to ensure the satisfaction of a claim filed at any given time? Perplexed, I place three question marks here.

The narrow majority of the SC concluded that Art. 4(4) of the ESM Treaty does not breach the Constitution of Estonia. The Court confirmed that the ESM Treaty affected the financial competences of Parliament, including those of future parliaments and thereby also the financial sovereignty of the state. The Court recognised that budgetary powers are one of the core competences of Parliament. The essence of this competence is the right and duty of Parliament to decide on the revenue and expenditure of the state. It added that, 'the state must use public assets in a manner which enables the performance of the duty ... to guarantee the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms'.²¹⁵ The Court decided that the interference with the parliamentary powers was justified.

The Court expressly excluded the possibility that the seriousness of the interference could be derived from the fact that it constitutes a vast financial obligation.²¹⁶

Differently from the German Bundesverfassungsgericht, which relied on the fact that the Bundestag remains in control of decision-making, the Estonian court accepted the reduction of the powers of Parliament in order to provide financial stability. The SC decided that 'the economic and financial sustainability of the euro area is contained in the constitutional values of Estonia as of the time Estonia became a euro area Member State'.²¹⁷ According to the Court,

[e]conomic stability and success ensure the planned receipt of state budget revenue. Incurring necessary expenditure ensures constitutional values. The obligation to guarantee fundamental rights arises from § 14 of the Constitution. Extensive and consistent guarantee of fundamental rights is extremely complicated, if not impossible, without a stable economic environment.²¹⁸

The Estonian decision was very much focused on the close connection between fundamental rights and having the necessary finances available to secure their existence.

While the ESM Treaty is not considered as EU law,²¹⁹ in an obiter dictum the Court considered it necessary to point out potential constitutional limitations for further EU integration (see Sect. 1.3).

²¹⁵ SCebj 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12, para. 139.

²¹⁶ Ibid., para. 190.

²¹⁷ Ibid., para. 163

²¹⁸ Ibid., para. 166.

²¹⁹ As was confirmed later by the CJEU in Case C-370/12 Pringle [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:756.

2.7.2 There has been no substantial discussion about the constitutionality of other proposed measures, such as Eurobonds and the Banking Union, from the point of view of the potential of exposing the country's citizens and residents to unlimited liability for bank failures in other European countries.

2.7.3 Not applicable; Estonia has not been subject to a bailout programme.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 We have no information of any cases where the applicants would have challenged the validity of secondary EU law via the preliminary ruling procedure. It is possible that such arguments have arisen within the context of national proceedings, but there have been no references for a preliminary ruling that pose such questions.²²⁰ However, the possibility to invoke EU regulations against individuals was addressed in the so-called 'sugar saga' vis-à-vis rules regulating the imposition of financial duties on excess stocks at the time of EU accession (see Sect. 2.6).

2.8.2 It is the impression of the Experts that there seems to be a discrepancy between the strict application of the principle of proportionality to the legislation of the Member States when compared to the methodology applied when reviewing the legality of secondary EU law. In the context of the free movement of goods, for example, it is not uncommon for the CJEU to point to an abundance of more lenient alternatives available to the legislator as sufficient grounds to declare national measures illegal. In judicial review of secondary EU law, however, such an approach is rarely to be seen, and the Court focuses more narrowly on issues such as the existence of a proper legal basis for the measure. Accordingly, the author would suggest that a stricter standard of judicial review of EU measures could be argued for. For example, the CJEU could in fact exercise a stricter review of concepts such as subsidiarity. Although subsidiarity is a core concept of EU law that is prominently displayed in the first chapters of any respectable EU law textbook, one has to look carefully to find any cases where it has been considered by the CJEU in the context of review of EU legislation. As a rare example, in Vodafone, referring back to Imperial Tobacco,²²¹ the CJEU analysed the conformity of an instrument of secondary EU law with the principle of subsidiarity, confirming that the measure's objective could best be achieved at EU level.²²²

The rarity of such review has in fact led to statements such as echoed by the spokesperson of the European Commission, stating that '[t]he issue here is that subsidiarity is a political concept rather than a judicial one. Every proposal we make, we believe, respects subsidiarity'.²²³ This may be interpreted as a sign of confidence that subsidiarity is something for the Commission to assess without fear of judicial review.

²²⁰ A full list of references from Estonia can be found on the page Eesti kohtute eelotsusetaotlused (available in Estonian) <http://www.riigikohus.ee/?id=872>.

²²¹ Case C-491/01 Imperial Tobacco [2012] ECR I-11453.

²²² Case C-58/08 Vodafone [2010] ECR I- 04999, paras. 72–79.

2.8.3 In Estonia, the SC is rather open towards review of constitutionality/legality of legislation, regulatory acts of the executive branch and administrative action. Judgments of the CRCSC establishing the unconstitutionality of national laws and regulations are quite regular.²²⁴ By way of recent examples, in June 2014 the SC declared legislative measures regarding pensions for judges to be unconstitutional.²²⁵ In January 2014, the court declared unconstitutional a law establishing differentiated state fees depending on whether an applicant used digital means to address the court.²²⁶ In many cases, the annulment of a law has been based on fundamental principles of law, such as legitimate expectations, equal treatment and proportionality.

2.8.4–2.8.5 In its 25 April 2006 ruling (in the case related to the effects of the Polish challenge to the excess stock rules), the SC recognised the exclusive competence of the European Court to decide on the invalidity of secondary Community law, as was established in Foto-Frost, and the obligation of a domestic court to make a reference, where doubts as to such validity arise.²²⁷

The SC has accepted that in the case of a contradiction between Estonian and EU law, the Estonian law should be disappplied without initiating constitutional review proceedings.²²⁸ It is not clear what the approach of the SC would be should a contradiction with the fundamental principles of Estonian constitutional law arise. The Court has so far not adopted a position similar to that in the German Constitutional Court's Solange II judgment²²⁹ or the ECtHR's Bosphorus judgment²³⁰ that would assume that the EU standard of protection of rights is equivalent

²²³ Quoted in Mahony, H. (2012, May 29). National parliaments show 'yellow card' to EU law on strikes. EU Observer. <http://euobserver.com/social/116405>.

²²⁴ In the period 1993–2004 the CRCSC declared an act or a provision unconstitutional in 75.5% cases (68 out of 90 cases), see Aaviksoo 2005, pp. 295–307. According to another source, in the period 2010–2013, the SC declared a norm or absence of a norm unconstitutional on 72 occasions. See information provided by the SC in 2014, (available in Estonian) http://www.riigikohus.ee/vfs/1712/Lisa%202_PS%20jarelevalve%20lahendite%20taitmine.pdf. In 2014, the SC heard 48 constitutional review cases and in 23 cases declared the relevant provisions unconstitutional, see: Teeveer et al. 2014, (available in Estonian) <http://www.riigikohus.ee/vfs/1885/Kohtute%20aastaraamat%202014.pdf>.

²²⁵ SCebj 26.06.2013, 3-4-1-1-14.

²²⁶ SCebj 21.01.2014, 3-4-1-17-13.

²²⁷ ALCSCo 25.04.2006, 3-3-1-74-05, para. 21; Case C-314/85 Foto-Frost v. Hauptzollamt Lübeck-Ost [1987] ECR I-04199.

²²⁸ ALCSCo 07.05.2008, 3-3-1-85-07, para. 38.

²²⁹ Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts (BVerfGE) 37, 271 (Solange I); BVerfGE 73, 339 (Solange II).

²³⁰ Bosphorus Hava Yolları Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Şirketi v. Ireland [GC], no. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

to the ECtHR or national standard, unless the applicant proves a significant fall of standards.

2.8.6 In Estonia, the issue of reverse discrimination has not been reflected in case law.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

In Estonia, discussions regarding constitutional rights and the rule of law in relation to EU law, beyond the issues explored in the preceding sections, are overall rather scarce.

One example would be the issue of imposing duties on traders for excess stocks accumulated up until the time of accession of Estonia to the EU. The Estonian SC has a long line of case law confirming the principle that taxes can only be imposed by a law enacted by Parliament. A constitutional issue could have arisen vis-à-vis the question of whether regulations such as Commission Regulation (EC) No. 1972/2003 of 10 November 2003 on transitional measures relating to accession of new Member States could in fact impose financial obligations on individuals. The question is further complicated considering that the regulations could not traditionally produce effects in states that were not yet in the EU (e.g. the day before accession). However, the issue remained undecided in the context of the 2004 enlargement, as the possibility to apply the regulations against individuals was excluded by the CJEU on other grounds, namely that they had not been published in the Official Journal in Estonian.

The issue of whether the suspension of large parts of the Constitution by the SC²³¹ was a good solution²³² or not²³³ has been the subject of a passionate debate. Supporters of the SC's approach argue that it would be pointless and useless for the constitutional court of any Member State to have constitutional review competence with regard to EU law. They warn that a deviation from the primacy of EU law in a particular case could lead to a withdrawal from the EU by the Member State in question or even to a collapse of the EU.²³⁴ Critics argue that the material amendment of the entirety of the Constitution that was claimed by the SC lacks a mainstay in the text of the Constitution as well as the relevant will of the people to abandon sovereignty. On the contrary, a clear intention not to abandon sovereignty can be identified in the explanatory memorandum to the CREAA.²³⁵ Furthermore, such an interpretation is an imperative neither from the point of view of the

²³¹ See Sect. 1.3.4.

²³² Laffranque 2009, p. 483 et seq.; Kalmo 2008, p. 583 et seq.

²³³ Mälksoo 2010, p. 132 et seq.; Lõhmus 2011, p. 15 et seq.; Ernits 2011, p. 35 et seq.; Ernits 2012, p. 137 et seq.

²³⁴ Cf. the discussion in Ernits 2011, p. 46 et seq.

²³⁵ Explanatory Memorandum to the CREAA.

Constitution nor because of the primacy of EU law. There are weighty reasons supporting the thesis that the SC did not act on the basis of the competence conferred on it by the Constitution. Neither the Constitution nor any other act confers on the SC competence to rule on the validity of constitutional provisions.²³⁶ On the contrary, the Constitution provides the legal basis for the existence of the SC itself, and gives it the task and the competence to act as the Constitutional Court. If the SC does not perform this function, it endangers not only its own existence but also the continuity of the entire Constitution.²³⁷ This situation has been referred to as the ‘erosion of the Constitution’ by Uno Lõhmus.²³⁸

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 The SC relied on the central importance of the practice of the EU in determining the principles of law long before Estonia’s accession to the EU. Already in September 1994, the SC declared that general principles of law developed by European institutions are incorporated into the fundamental principles of Estonian law.²³⁹ According to the SC,

[i]n developing the general principles of Estonian law, in addition to the Constitution, the general principles of law developed by the institutions of the Council of Europe and the European Union must also be considered. These principles have their origin in the general principles of law of the highly developed legal systems of the Member States.²⁴⁰

A contradiction with those principles would constitute a violation of the Constitution.²⁴¹ A norm contrary to the Constitution will be declared null and void by the SC. Such semi-automatic extension of the vast catalogue of general principles of law represents a strong willingness to develop the Estonian legal system in harmony with the European legal system. It may be seen as a demonstration of the general openness and trust of the SC towards European institutions.

As arguments of interpretation, general principles of law provided an impetus for the SC to develop the following principles in the 1990s: legality, non-retroactivity, legitimate expectations and legal certainty more broadly, and the principle of equality.²⁴² In a certain sense the general principles of law served as a catalyst for a constitutional leap from a post-communist transformation society to a modern democratic rule-of-law-based state of Western European character.

²³⁶ Lõhmus 2011, p. 18.

²³⁷ Ernits 2011, pp. 44, 62 and 69 et seq.

²³⁸ Lõhmus 2011, p. 24.

²³⁹ CRCSCj 30.09.1994, III-4/A-5/94; 17.02.2003, 3-4-1-03.

²⁴⁰ CRCSCj 30.09.1994, III-4/A-5/94.

²⁴¹ Cf. Ernits 2011, p. 11 et seq.

²⁴² ALCSCo 24.03.1997, 3-3-1-5-97, para. 4.

Accordingly, we consider it likely that ‘common constitutional traditions’ may indeed exist among the Member States of the EU as well as within the EU itself. It is of course difficult to come up with a list that could claim universal legitimacy.

As an example of the practical difficulties, one can take the different positions adopted by the German *Bundesverfassungsgericht*²⁴³ and the Estonian SC in their respective ESM cases. In the German case, the Court focused on the importance of the fact that Parliament remains the central decision-maker over the budget and that it retains a veto over the decisions of the ESM with Germany’s shares. In the Estonian case, the court accepted the need to limit the budgetary autonomy of Parliament for the greater good of having the ESM functional.²⁴⁴ However, it is our hypothesis that the fundamental principles, even budgetary autonomy, should essentially have a very similar substance throughout the 28 Member States of the EU. There may be differences in the value attributed to each and every one of the principles depending on local geographical, ethnic, religious, cultural or other reasons. For example, the value attributed to the protection of small languages such as Estonian or Gaelic may well be different due to the need to take into account the very real risk of these languages diminishing.

From the Estonian perspective, we would indeed argue that many principles could be regarded as a part of the ‘common constitutional traditions’, such as the principle of the democratic legitimisation of policy-makers, nulla poena sine lege, the right to be heard, access to courts, judicial independence, etc. We believe that the Estonian constitutional interpretation would support the interpretation of the German Constitutional Court in the Data Retention Case, and would conclude that it is part of the constitutional identity that the citizens’ enjoyment of freedom may not be totally recorded.

2.10.2 It would certainly facilitate identification of the common constitutional traditions if the courts highlighted the long-standing constitutional rights or safeguards for the rule of law in the national constitutions, along with comparative case law on the established standards in different Member States (as suggested separately by Torres Perez and Albi, cited in the Questionnaire).

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

We appreciate the controversy surrounding the approach adopted by the court in the Melloni case and the wording of Art. 53 of the Charter.²⁴⁵

²⁴³ BVerfGE 131, 152, 194 ff.

²⁴⁴ For the relevant discussion, see Ginter 2013, pp. 335–354.

²⁴⁵ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107, paras. 59 and 63.

In the case of Estonia, we do not foresee any substantial controversy concerning the standard of protection of fundamental rights at the national and EU level.²⁴⁶ The reason for this can be found in the very pro-European approach to interpretation of national constitutional principles by the SC and in the existence of social rights in the Constitution. Already in September 1994, only a year after its establishment, the SC declared that general principles of law developed by the Council of Europe and EU institutions are incorporated into the fundamental principles of Estonian law. A contradiction with those principles would constitute a violation of the Constitution. Such semi-automatic extension of the vast catalogue of general principles of law represents a strong willingness to develop the Estonian legal system in harmony with the European legal system. The pro-European approach of the SC is further evidenced by its willingness to refer to European sources even in cases where the substance of the case is not directly based on European law. For example, the ambiguous legal status of the Charter did not prevent the SC from referring to the Charter several times even before Estonia's accession to the EU.

On 17 February 2003, the SC referred to the Charter as one of the most recent international documents on fundamental rights evidencing the existence of the general principle of good administration.²⁴⁷ Other pre-accession references to the Charter include the principle that if, subsequent to the commission of a criminal offence, the law provides for a lighter penalty, that penalty shall be applicable,²⁴⁸ and that the EU recognises the right to social and housing assistance so as to ensure a decent existence for all those who lack sufficient resources.²⁴⁹ Since EU membership, references to the Charter have included the right to bequeath property (Art. 17).²⁵⁰ On 28 March 2006,²⁵¹ the SC referred to Art. 1 of the Charter when confirming that human dignity is inviolable, the basis for all of the fundamental rights of the individual and the goal of protecting fundamental rights and freedoms.²⁵²

A clear parallel between the practice of the SC and that of the CJEU in establishing pan-European fundamental rights can thus be seen. Accordingly, we do not predict that the Charter or practice of the CJEU would lead to a lowering of the existing constitutional guarantees vis-à-vis fundamental rights. However, for discussion on some areas where the standards under the Estonian Constitution may be higher, see Sect. 2.1.3 (the judicial protection of the rule of law, especially legitimate expectations); Sects. 2.5–2.6 (excess stocks cases in the context of the publication of laws, legitimate expectations and property rights), and Sect. 2.2 (judicial protection in the Piirsoo and Laurits cases).

²⁴⁶ Ginter 2008.

²⁴⁷ CRCSCj 17.02.2003, 3-4-1-03, para. 15.

²⁴⁸ SCebj 17.03.2003, 3-1-3-10-02.

²⁴⁹ CRCSCj 21.01.2004, 3-4-1-7-03, para. 20.

²⁵⁰ SCebj 22.02.2005, 3-2-1-73-04.

²⁵¹ ALCSCj 28.03.2006, 3-3-1-14-06, para. 11.

²⁵² Case C-377/98 Netherlands v. Parliament and Council [2001] ECR I-07079.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 The adoption of the European Arrest Warrant was not surrounded with substantial scholarly debates; the debate primarily emerged in 2012 after some problematic cases were highlighted in the media. The explanatory memorandum to the implementing law briefly dealt with the constitutional conflict concerning the prohibition of extradition of Estonian citizens. According to the document, as accession to the EU was approved by a referendum in 2003 and the EAW system was foreseen in the existing acquis, the Constitution must be interpreted taking into account this obligation of Estonia arising from EU law.²⁵³ Thus, the conclusion that the adoption of the EAW Framework Decision was marked by ‘the lack of public engagement in the area of defence rights and the almost total absence of political debate on the subject’ (see the Questionnaire) is fully applicable also to Estonia. The same applies to the adoption of the EU Data Retention Directive.

There have been no cases where important constitutional issues have arisen and have been referred to the SC at the stage of implementing EU law. The case relating to the implementation of the ESM Treaty is excluded here, as the treaty was considered to be non-EU law.

2.12.2–2.12.3 Considering the long line of case law of the CJEU referring to the system of protection of fundamental rights on the EU level being related to the common constitutional traditions of the Member States, if important constitutional issues have been identified by a number of constitutional courts, it would be appropriate for the application of the questioned measure to be suspended and a review of the measure initiated on the EU level.

The authors have differing opinions in regard to the recommendation to recognise, as a defence on the part of the Member State in an infringement procedure, that unconstitutionality has been identified in accordance with the domestic system of control of constitutionality. On the one hand, there are some cases where the need for more effective protection of fundamental rights, also in the face of EU law, is hard to deny.²⁵⁴ In such cases the Estonian system of control of constitutionality would be in a position to grant the necessary protection properly and responsibly. Furthermore, as long as the Member States remain the only genuine bearers of sovereign power in the EU, the supremacy of the fundamental principles of their constitutions and the sovereignty of their interpretation by national constitutional courts are also hard to deny.²⁵⁵ If an infringement procedure were initiated in a case like Piirsoo or Laurits because of a refusal to deliver the person to another Member State on the grounds that the delivery would violate at least one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution (e.g. the rule of law), it would seem to be a good solution to allow the state to defend itself with the argument that unconstitutionality has been identified in accordance with the domestic system of control of constitutionality. On the other hand, we see the danger of undermining the uniform application of EU law that could at one point lead to a fragmentation of the EU along national lines. From this point of view, a procedure whereby the validity of the EU measure is checked by the CJEU with reference to a potential breach of common constitutional principles would be preferable.

²⁵³ Explanatory memorandum to the amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure (RT I 2004, 54, 387).

²⁵⁴ Cf. e.g. the Piirsoo and Laurits cases in Sect. 2.2.

²⁵⁵ Cf. Ernits 2011, p. 60 et seq.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.2 It is extremely difficult to provide an accurate conclusion regarding whether or not there has been an overall reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights and the rule of law in the context of EU law. In our opinion the balance would inevitably have to take into account the significant positive impacts of EU law in the fields of free movement, non-discrimination, gender equality and other areas noted in the Introduction to Part 2 in the Questionnaire. It is perhaps appropriate to refer to the English idiomatic proverb, ‘you can’t have your cake and eat it’. Accordingly, we have to consider the concept of trade-offs.

For instance, the internal market freedoms regarding free movement of persons or goods provide a considerable benefit to the persons exercising those freedoms. In exchange, the risk of cross-border crime inevitably increases. Accordingly, as a trade-off, a measure is needed which in the case of cross-border crime appears e.g. in the form of the European Arrest Warrant. Thus if one were to examine the concept of the arrest warrant in a vacuum, one could establish a significant reduction in the protection of constitutional rights by the national court. However, considering it in context with a person’s increased mobility, one could conclude that the reduction is proportional to the increased opportunities for the person and the increased impact of his or her activities in the jurisdictions of other Member States.

It is likely that in some areas a reduction in the level of protection of constitutional rights has taken place. At times, this has been inevitable given the objectives of European integration, and at times this may have resulted from a lack of wider awareness and debate given issues such as the complexity of multilevel governance.

In the light of e.g. the decision of the CJEU in the EU Data Retention case, we are of the opinion that the CJEU is in principle equipped to deal with issues relating to the guarantee of a higher level of protection of fundamental rights. We do not consider that EU accession to the ECHR would significantly increase the level of protection of fundamental rights within the EU, as it is common knowledge that the ECtHR is overburdened with cases and has difficulty providing decisions in due time as it is.

2.13.3 An increased dialogue between the national constitutional courts and the CJEU in cases dealing with fundamental rights could provide a potential improvement. If the CJEU, when faced with the need to decide on a matter of interpretation of fundamental rights, were able to engage the national constitutional courts by asking for an opinion on the matter, the legitimacy of the interpretations provided might be increased.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 There is no explicit provision in the Estonian Constitution nor does the Constitution regulate the general transfer of powers to international organisations. Indirectly, however, § 123(1) of the Constitution states that Estonia may not enter into international treaties which are in conflict with the Constitution. If laws or other legislation of Estonia are in conflict with an international treaty ratified by the Riigikogu, the provisions of the international treaty shall apply (§ 123(2)). If, however, an international treaty is not in accordance with the Constitution, § 65, clause 4, of the Constitution gives the Riigikogu the right to denounce the treaty. It follows that the limit to the delegation of powers is the Constitution itself – no international treaty may be in conflict with constitutional norms.

The procedures concerning international treaties are regulated in detail in the *Välissuhhtlemisseadus*²⁵⁶ (Foreign Relations Act (FRA)). According to § 6(1)(2) FRA, the Riigikogu has the competence to ratify treaties by passing Acts concerning accession, approval, acceptance, ratification or other Acts, and to denounce ratified treaties by passing Acts concerning the denunciation of, withdrawal from or termination of the agreement or other Acts. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA) has the right to initiate the conclusion of a treaty. The MFA shall review the materials specified in § 14 submitted thereto for compliance with legislation (§ 15 (1) FRA). If the materials of a treaty contain deficiencies, the MFA shall set a reasonable term for the elimination of deficiencies (§ 15(2) FRA). A treaty prepared for conclusion has to be approved by the Government (§ 16 FRA). According to § 121 of the Constitution, ratification by the Riigikogu is required if (1) state borders are altered by the treaty; (2) the implementation of the treaty requires the passage, amendment or repeal of Acts of the Republic of Estonia; (3) the Republic of Estonia joins an international organisation or union according to the treaty; (4) the Republic of Estonia assumes military obligations by the treaty; (5) by the treaty, the Republic of Estonia assumes proprietary obligations in relations in public law for the performance of which no funds have been designated in the state budget, or which exceed the limits for proprietary obligations established by the state budget within which the Government of the Republic is authorised to conclude the treaty; (6) ratification is prescribed in the treaty.

²⁵⁶ RT I 2006, 32, 248; RT I, 21.06.2014, 10.

The instrument of agreement of a treaty ratified by the Riigikogu shall be signed by the President of the Republic. The instrument of agreement of a treaty concluded by the Government of the Republic shall be signed by the Prime Minister or the Minister of Foreign Affairs (§ 21 FRA).

3.1.2 Not applicable.

3.1.3 No amendments concerning international law and global governance have been made or debated on the parliamentary or Governmental level.

3.1.4 See Sect. 1.5.3.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 The Constitution contains a special section (§ 123) with two paragraphs addressing the applicability of treaties and their relationship in domestic law. The first paragraph provides that ‘[t]he Republic of Estonia shall not enter into international treaties which are in conflict with the Constitution’. This provision is usually understood to mean that in the domestic hierarchy of legal sources, the Constitution takes the highest position. In practice, it requires the authorities to analyse the constitutionality of a treaty in the course of its preparation and conclusion. The Constitution does not explain what happens if there is a collision between the Constitution and a treaty in force. Such collisions are overcome, to the extent possible, by interpretation. As the Constitution cannot release Estonia from its international obligations, the courts should adopt an international law friendly approach in this regard. The Constitution does not provide for the judicial review of treaties; however the CRCPA authorises the SC to verify the conformity of international agreements with the Constitution.

Within the Constitution, § 123(2) provides: ‘If laws or other legislation of Estonia are in conflict with international treaties ratified by the Riigikogu, the provisions of the international treaty shall apply’. The status of treaties depends on whether they have been approved by Parliament or some other state organ. In the former case, the Constitution confirms that the treaties are directly applicable domestically, provided that they are able to regulate domestic relations and are detailed enough for that purpose. Parliament does not rewrite treaties into domestic legislative acts, which means that treaties remain connected to their international ‘background’ (e.g. text, interpretation, practice), which consequently affects their application. If a domestic legislative act is in conflict with a treaty, it is not unconstitutional and does not become null and void. Instead, the treaty is applied as a practical solution. When it comes to treaties approved by other state organs (e.g. agreements between ministries), such treaty may be directly applicable, although its position in the domestic hierarchy of legal sources depends on the state organ which concluded the treaty.

3.2.2 Estonia is often considered monistic, as the Constitution and the practice of the different state organs are international law friendly. The supporters of the monistic approach point to the fact that treaties are not rewritten into domestic legislative acts, meaning that their original texts are applied, i.e. international law is applied domestically. However, as was explained above, this logic applies fully only to treaties which have been approved by Parliament. The monistic view is also supported by § 3(1) of the Constitution, which provides that '[g]enerally recognised principles and rules of international law are an inseparable part of the Estonian legal system'. Regardless of the actual wording, this section refers to customary international law and general principles of law. It should be noted that the Constitution does not similarly provide that treaties form an inseparable part of the Estonian legal system.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 Estonian law entrusts the primary responsibility for initial international negotiations to the Government, first and foremost to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. According to § 9(3) FRA, the MFA initiates the conclusion of treaties, participates in negotiations concerning treaties, prepares or approves and submits to the Government draft treaties or the texts of treaties adopted, and organises the preparation, signing and exchange or submission to the depositary of the instruments of agreement.

The competency of the Riigikogu and its Foreign Affairs Committee (FAC) primarily relates to the procedure of ratification. However, the FAC regularly discusses foreign policy, discusses the report from the Government on the foreign policy of the state and presents its report at a plenary sitting of the Riigikogu, and also discusses the bases of security policy and the principles of development co-operation and humanitarian aid presented by the Government.

The detailed procedure is regulated in the RRPA. Section 115 RRPA provides that drafts concerning international treaties undergo two readings in the Riigikogu, if the leading committee does not propose otherwise.

Subsequent involvement in scrutinising an international organisation beyond the initial ratification of a related treaty has not been regulated in detail. The MFA is, however, obliged to regularly inform the President, the President of the Riigikogu, the Prime Minister and the FAC of the implementation of foreign policy. Also, once a year the MFA prepares a report of the Government on foreign policy.

3.3.2 The ratification and denunciation of international treaties may not be subjected to a referendum as stems from § 106(1) of the Constitution. Thus, the referendum on amending the Constitution and accession to the EU was in this respect constitutionally debatable.

3.4 Judicial Review

The competence of the SC to review treaties and measures adopted under international law derives from § 2 clause 2 and § 4(1) CRCPA. Further, the Chancellor of Justice may submit a request to the SC to declare an international agreement which has been signed or a provision thereof to be in conflict with the Constitution.²⁵⁷ The SC further may, on the basis of a reasoned request of a participant in the proceedings or on its own initiative, suspend, with good reason, the enforcement of a contested legislative act or a provision thereof or the enforcement of an international agreement until the entry into force of the judgment of the SC.

In the adjudication of cases, the SC may declare an international agreement which has entered into force or has not yet entered into force or a provision thereof to be in conflict with the Constitution (§ 15(1) No. 3 CRCPA). Further, § 15(3) CRCPA adds that if an international agreement or a provision thereof is declared to be in conflict with the Constitution, the body which entered into the agreement is required to withdraw from it, if possible, or commence denunciation of the international agreement or amendment thereof in a manner which would ensure its conformity with the Constitution; an international agreement which is in conflict with the Constitution shall not be applied domestically.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 The social state dimension is mentioned in § 10, whereas the general social right is embedded in § 28(2) of the Constitution.²⁵⁸ According to the SC, the social state is a fundamental, core principle of the Constitution.²⁵⁹ The SC stated in 2004:

The concepts of a social state based on social justice and the protection of social rights contain an idea of state assistance and care to all those who are not capable of coping independently and sufficiently. The human dignity of those persons would be degraded if they were deprived of the assistance they need for satisfaction of their primary needs.²⁶⁰ ²⁵⁷ The SC en banc held that § 6(1)4) CRCPA gives the Chancellor of Justice the right to challenge a signed international agreement or a provision thereof both before the ratification of the international agreement, i.e. by way of preliminary review, and after ratification, i.e. by way of ex-post review. The SC held that the competence arising from § 6(1)4) CRCPA is in accordance with the Constitution, see SCebj, 12.07.2012, 3-4-1-6-12.

²⁵⁸ ‘An Estonian citizen has the right to state assistance in the case of ... need.’ According to § 28 (2), citizens of foreign states and stateless persons who are in Estonia have this right equally with Estonian citizens, unless otherwise provided by law.

²⁵⁹ CRCSCj 21.01.2004, 3-4-1-7-03, para. 14; 05.05.2014, 3-4-1-67-13, para. 49.

²⁶⁰ CRCSCj 21.01.2004, 3-4-1-7-03, para. 14.

The SC has declared a number of laws unconstitutional on the ground of social rights, and has stressed that ‘the right to receive state assistance in the case of need is a subjective right, in the case of violation of which a person is entitled to go to court, and the courts have an obligation to review the constitutionality of an Act granting a social right’.²⁶¹ However, the SC has stressed several times: ‘[u]pon ensuring social rights, the legislator has an extensive right of discretion and the courts must not make social policy-related decisions in lieu of the legislator. The exact extent of social fundamental rights also depends on the state’s economic situation’.²⁶²

The potential impact of the policies of global institutions on the social state has not been a matter of discussion in Estonia.

However, the concern of the dissenting judges that the financial commitments undertaken under the ESM Treaty may undermine the social state are outlined in Sect. 2.7.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

There are many further theoretical constitutional issues arising in the context of constitutional rights and values in global governance, e.g. the transfer of a part of sovereign powers to the International Criminal Court. However, due to the space restriction, they shall not be addressed here.

References

- Aaviksoo B. (2005) Kohtulik aktivism põhiseaduslikkuse järelevalve funktsioonina. Kui aktivistlik on Eesti põhiseaduskohus? (Judicial activism as a function of constitutional review. How activist is the Estonian constitutional court?) Juridica 5:295–307.
- Albi A. (2000) Euroliit ja kaasaegne suveräänsus. Üks võimalikke vastukajasid põhiseaduse ekspertiisikomisjoni üleskutsele aruteluks (The European Union and contemporary sovereignty. One possible response to the call for a discussion by the Constitutional Expert Committee) Juridica 3:160–171.
- Albi A. (2002) Estonia’s Constitution and the EU: How and to What Extent to Amend It? Juridica International 7:39–48.
- Albi A. (2005) EU Enlargement and the Constitutions of Central and Eastern Europe. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Albi A. (2009) Ironies in human rights protection in the EU: pre-accession conditionality and post-accession conundrums. ELJ 15:46–69.

²⁶¹ CRCSCj 21.01.2004, 3-4-1-7-03, para. 16; reiterated in CRCSCj 05.05.2014, 3-4-1-67-13, para. 31.

²⁶² E.g. SCbj 07.06.2011, 3-4-1-12-10, para. 58.

- Albi A. (2010) From the Banana saga to a Sugar Saga and Beyond: Could the Post-communist Constitutional Courts Teach the EU a Lesson in the Rule of Law? CML Rev. 47:791–829.
- Albi A. (2015) Erosion of constitutional rights in EU law: A call for ‘substantive co-operative constitutionalism’, Part 1. Vienna Journal of International Constitutional Law 9(2):151–185.
- Albi A., Gallagher M., Koolmeister I., Maruste R., Mälksoo L., Roosma P. (2002): Ühispuõrdumine seoses nn Põhiseaduse Kolmanda akti riigioiguslike probleemidega (Joint appeal regarding constitutional law problems relating to the so-called Third Act of the Constitution). Juridica 5:352–353.
- Alexy R. (2001) Põhiõigused Eesti põhiseaduses (Fundamental rights in the Estonian Constitution). Juridica Eriväljaanne:5–96.
- Allikmets M. (2013) Loovutatava isiku õigused loovutamismenetluses – kohtupraktika analüüs (Rights of the requested person in surrender proceedings – Analysis of judicial practice). Master’s Thesis, University of Tartu. http://dspace.utlib.ee/dspace/bitstream/handle/10062/31813/allikmets_marje.pdf?sequence=1.
- Antonova J., Pardla M., Markus I. (2012) Estonia. In: Laffranque J (ed.) The Area of Freedom, Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues. Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 319–331.
- Carcassonne G. (1998) Kommentaarid Euroopa Liiduga ühinemisega seotud uue paragraahi kohta Eesti põhiseaduses (Commentary on the new section in the Estonian Constitution relating to accession to the European Union). www.just.ee/sites/www.just.ee/files/elfinder/article_files/prof_guy_carcassone._kommentaarid_euroopa_liiduga_uhinemisega_seotud_uee_paragrahvi_kohta_eesti_pohiseaduses.pdf.
- Drechsler W., Annus T. (2002) Die Verfassungsentwicklung in Estland von 1992 bis 2001. Jahrbuch des öffentlichen Rechts der Gegenwart 50:473–492.
- Ehricke U. (1995) Die richtlinienkonforme und die gemeinschaftsrechtskonforme Auslegung nationalen Rechts. RabelsZ 59:598–644.
- Ernits M. (2011) Põhiõigused, demokraatia, õigusriik (Fundamental rights, democracy, the rule-of-law-based state). Tartu Ülikooli Kirjastus, Tartu.
- Ernits M. (2012) 20 Jahre Menschenwürde, Demokratie, Rechtsstaat, Sozialstaat. In: Hülshörster S., Mirow D. (eds.) Deutsche Beratung bei Rechts- und Justizreformen im Ausland: 20 Jahre Deutsche Stiftung für Internationale Rechtliche Zusammenarbeit (IRZ). Berliner Wissenschafts-Verlag, Berlin, pp. 123–140.
- Ginter C. (2007) Effective Implementation of the Trade Mark Directive in Estonia. ECLR 28 (6):337–345.
- Ginter C. (2008) Application of principles of European Law in the Supreme Court of Estonia. PhD Thesis. University of Tartu. <http://dspace.utlib.ee/dspace/handle/10062/6494>.
- Ginter C. (2013) Constitutionality of the European Stability Mechanism in Estonia: Applying Proportionality to Sovereignty. EuConst 9(2):335–354.
- Ginter C., Narits R. (2013) The Perspective of a Small Member State to the Democratic Deficiency of the ESM. Review of Central and East European Law 38(1):55–76.
- Heukels T. (1999) Von richtlinienkonformer zur völkerrechtskonformen Auslegung im EG-Recht: Internationale Dimensionen einer normhierarchiegerechten Interpretationsmaxime. Zeus (3): 313–333.
- Jäätsma J. (2006) Salajane õigus – “kas õigus?” (Secret law – ‘is it law?’). Bachelor Thesis, University of Tartu.
- Kaldas K.-H. (2006) The Evolution of Estonian Security Policy. In: Kasekamp A. (ed.) The Estonian Foreign Policy Yearbook 2006, pp. 95–117.
- Kalmo H. (2008) Mis on järel põhiseadust? Veel kord Euroopa Ühenduse õiguse ülimuslikkusest (What is left of the Constitution? Once more about the supremacy of European Community Law). Juridica 9:583–597.
- Kalmo H., Luts-Sootak M. (2010) Suveräänsus: iganenud või igevene? (Sovereignty: obsolete or eternal?). Kalmo H., Luts-Sootak, M. (eds.) Iganenud või igavene? Tekste kaasaegsest suveräänsusest (Obsolete or eternal? Texts on contemporary sovereignty). Tartu Ülikooli Kirjastus, Tartu, pp. 9–37.

- Kelsen H. (1925) Allgemeine Staatslehre. Springer, Berlin.
- Kergandberg E., Pikämäe P. (eds.) (2012) Kriminaalmenetluse seadustik: Kommentaar (Code of Criminal Procedure: Commentary). Juura, Tallinn.
- Kliimann A.T. (1935) Eesti iseseisvuse areng (The development of Estonian independence). Ōigus, Tartu.
- Laffranque J. (2001) Constitution of the Republic of Estonia in the Light of Accession to the European Union. Juridica International 6:207–221.
- Laffranque J. (2003) Eesti põhiseaduse ja Euroopa õiguse kooselu (The cohabitation of the Estonian Constitution and European law). Juridica 3:180–190.
- Laffranque J. (2007) Pilk Eesti õigusmaastikule põhiseaduse täiendamise seaduse valguses Euroopa Liidu õigusega seotud võtmeküsimusel põhiseaduslikkuse järelevalles (A Glance at the Estonian Legal Landscape in View of the Constitution Amendment Act on key issues relating to EU law in constitutional review). Juridica 8:528–536.
- Laffranque J. (2009) Sõltumatu ja demokraatlik õigusriik Riigikohtu praktikas Eesti Euroopa Liidu liikmesuse kontekstis (An independent and democratic rule-of-law-based state in the practice of the Supreme Court Estonia in the context of European Union membership). Juridica 2009 8:483–499.
- Laffranque J., Madise Ü., Merusk K., Pöld J., Rask M. (2002) Põhiseaduse täiendamise seaduse eelnõust (On the draft Constitution Amendment Act). Juridica 8:563–568.
- Lõhmus U. (2005) Mida teha põhiseadusega? (What to do about the Constitution?). Juridica 2:75–83.
- Lõhmus, U. (2011) Põhiseaduse muutmine ja muutused põhiseaduses (Amendment of the Constitution and amendments in the Constitution). Juridica 1:12–26.
- Loone E., Järvik M., Loone K.O. (2004) Suveräänsus, seadus, immigratsioon (Sovereignty, law, immigration). Altex, Tallinn.
- Madise Ü., Aaviksoo B., Kalmo H., Mälksoo L., Narits R., Pruks P., Vinkel P. (eds.) (2012) Eesti Vabariigi Põhiseadus. Kommenteeritud väljaanne (The Constitution of the Republic of Estonia. Commentary), 3rd edn. Juura, Tallinn.
- Mälksoo L. (2010) Eesti suveräänsus 1988–2008 (Estonian sovereignty 1988–2008). In: Kalmo H., Luts-Sootak M. (eds.) Iganenud või igavene? Tekste kaasaegsest suveräänsusest (Obsolete or eternal? Texts on contemporary sovereignty). Tartu Ülikooli Kirjastus, Tartu, pp. 132–156.
- Maruste R. (2000) Democracy and the Rule of Law in Estonia. Review of Central and East European Law 26(3):311–327.
- Maruste R. (2007) The Role of the Constitutional Court in Democratic Society. Juridica International 13:8–13.
- McKenna & Co (1996) Seadusandluse ühtlustamine: konstitutsioonilised parandused (Harmonising legislation: constitutional amendments). www.just.ee/sites/www.just.ee/files/elfinder/article_files/mckenna_co._seadusandluse_uhtlustamine_-_konstitutsioonilised_parandused.pdf.
- Merusk K. (1995) Kehtiv õigus ja õigusakti teoria põhiküsimus (Applicable law and the fundamentals of the theory of legal acts), 2nd edn. Juristide Täienduskeskus, Tartu.
- Mõttus, A., Ernits M., Oja L. (eds.) (2012) Riigikogu kodu- ja töökorra seadus. Kommentaarid, (Riigikogu Rules of Procedure and Internal Rules Act. Commentary). Riigikantselei, Tallinn.
- Narits R. (2009) About the Principles of the Constitution of the Republic of Estonia from the Perspective of Independent Statehood in Estonia. Juridica International 16:56–64.
- Nettesheim M. (1994) Auslegung und Fortbildung des nationalen Rechts im Lichte des Gemeinschaftsrechts. Archiv des öffentlichen Rechts 119:261–293.
- Peep V. (ed.) (1997) Põhiseadus ja Põhiseaduse Assamblee (The Constitution and the Constitutional Assembly). Juura, Tallinn.
- Piip A. (2007) Suveräänsuse mõiste (The concept of sovereignty). In: Piip A., Pärna, P. (eds.) Õiguse jõud (The force of law). Ilmamaa, Tartu, pp. 413–422. (Original work published in 1936).
- Radbruch G. (1914) Grundzüge der Rechtsphilosophie. Quelle & Meyer, Leipzig.

- Sprūds A. (ed.) (2012) Friendship in the Making: Transforming Relations between Germany and the Baltic-Visegrad Countries. Latvian Institute of International Affairs, Friedrich Ebert Stiftung, Riga.
- Teeveer R., Anton T., Lapimaa V., Narits R., Pappel T., Saar T., Saarmets V. (eds.) (2014) Kohtute aastaraamat 2014 (Yearbook of Estonian courts 2014).
- Varul P. (2000) Põhiseaduse juriidiline ekspertiisi: eesmärgid, töökorraldus ja tulemused (Legal expert analysis of the Constitution: objectives, method and results). Riigikogu Toimetised 1:65–76.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Latvia – A Bridge Between Traditions and Modernity

Kristīne Krūma and Sandijs Statkus

Abstract The Latvian constitutional system is based on the principle of State continuity after the Soviet occupation, and this is reflected in the reinstatement of the 1922 Constitution (Satversme). Unlike other constitutions in the post-communist area, it is characterised as a laconic and predominantly procedural constitution. However, important amendments were introduced in 1996 and 1998, establishing the Constitutional Court and introducing a catalogue of fundamental rights. The constitutional culture has been influenced by German traditions in constitutional jurisprudence, and the adjudication of legislation on substantive grounds has been stringent. This is particularly evident in the annulment of about 40% of measures reviewed in the context of the economic crisis (2009–2011). Of particular interest is the constitutional adjudication of the IMF-mandated drastic austerity measures, including a law that envisaged a notable 70% cut in the payments to pensioners. The Constitutional Court stood out by virtue of strong protection of fundamental rights and the principle of legitimate expectations, with similarities to the approach subsequently taken by the Portuguese Constitutional Court. Additionally, the Constitutional Court underlined that taking international loans is an important matter of public life which must be decided by the legislator, and that the government cannot restrict fundamental rights by assuming international obligations. However, measures such as the European Kristīne Krūma (deceased) was at the time of writing Prorektor of the Riga Graduate School of Law. An In Memoriam note has been included in the present book.

Sandijs Statkus is Adviser at the Constitutional Court of Latvia. e-mail: sandijs.statkus@satv.tiesa.gov.lv.

We would like to thank the Max Planck Institute of International and Comparative Law in Heidelberg and Prof. Armin von Bogdandy, and the Centre for Migration Law of Radbound University (Nijmegen) and Prof. Kees Groenendijk for their most useful help and assistance during the preparation of this report.

All websites accessed 15 October 2015. Text submitted 23 April 2015.

K. Krūma
Riga Graduate School of Law, Riga, Latvia

S. Statkus (✉)
Constitutional Court of Latvia, Riga, Latvia
e-mail: sandijs.statkus@satv.tiesa.gov.lv

Arrest Warrant or Data Retention Directive have not been subject to a constitutional debate. The Constitution contains a range of EU amendments.

Keywords The Constitution of Latvia • Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation • The Latvian Constitutional Court
Constitutional review statistics and grounds • Fundamental rights and general principles of law • European Arrest Warrant • Data Retention Directive
IMF austerity programmes • The principle of legitimate expectations and social rights • Parliamentary reservation of law • The role of courts in EU law to ensure compliance • Referendum • Sovereignty • Supremacy

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1–1.1.2 The role of the Satversme (the Constitution; hereinafter the Latvian word Satversme will be used) in the Latvian legal order is twofold. First, it has a strong symbolic role. It was adopted in 1922 and regained de facto force upon the restoration of independence.¹ The backbone of the Satversme has had only minor amendments. However, it has been supplemented with several important articles. For instance, in 1996, a provision on the Constitutional Court; in 1998, Chapter 8 which includes human rights and freedoms; and in 2003, amendments on EU membership were inserted in the Satversme.

Secondly, the Satversme is the fundamental document that addresses primary institutional and procedural issues. The key elements of the Satversme can be summarised as follows: protection of the fundamental principles and values of democracy and the rule of law; the functioning of the parliamentary democracy; guarantees for national sovereignty;² protection of fundamental rights and freedoms;³ and the functioning of the division of powers⁴. In terms of the constitutional priorities in practice, it should be noted that more than 80% of all cases reviewed by the Constitutional Court have concerned provisions of Chapter 8 on fundamental rights.

¹ The Satversme was drafted at the time when the authoritarian regime of Czarist Russia was collapsing. The independence of Latvia was proclaimed on 18 November 1918, just one month before the end of the First World War. There was an ongoing civil war in Russia in 1918, and part of Latvia was occupied by Germany. The complex geo-political situation allowed for the people of Latvia to claim their right to self-determination. At the time, the drafters were inspired by the constitutions of France, Switzerland, Finland, the UK, the US and other states. However, the main example was the Weimar Constitution (Weimarer Verfassung), which was in force in Germany from 1919–1933. References were also made to Russian imperial regulations and legal practice. See the Decisions of the Administrative Department of the Senate from 1922.

² See also Constitutional Court Judgment in Case No. 2008-35-01 of 7 April 2009, para. 14.

The Constitutional Court has recognised that the Satversme is essentially a short and laconic yet complex document, i.e. no provision, part or even single word of the Satversme may be regarded as superfluous, because such an interpretation would compromise its structure.⁵

During the initial years after its establishment in 1996, the Constitutional Court relied extensively on a comparative approach to rulings of other constitutional courts. Since regaining independence, Latvia's constitutional culture has been influenced by German traditions in constitutional jurisprudence. The Constitutional Court has also referred to the constitutional provisions and case law of Poland, Canada, USA, Lithuania, the Czech Republic, Slovenia, Finland, Spain and Portugal.⁶ However, this practice has recently changed.

The Court now takes a more careful approach when invoking different international treaties and, when referring to the practice of international courts, attention is paid to the facts of the case, with special caution taken when referring to soft law instruments. For instance, in a case relating to the Civil Procedure Law, the Court stated:

In resolving various issues in the Latvian legal system, the legal regulation of other states cannot be applied directly, except if the law so explicitly provides. Comparative analysis always requires that the different legal, social, political, historical and systemic context be taken into account.⁷

At the same time the Court has remained open to other international law sources, such as the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).⁸

According to the Satversme, the Parliament (Saeima) is vested with the most power. Only the people of Latvia have the right to vote for dissolution of the Saeima upon the initiative of the President. In the context of this project it is important to note that legislative power is vested in the Saeima (Art. 64 of the Satversme) and the people. According to Chaps. 2 and 5, the Saeima is the main institution in relations with other constitutional bodies. This means that the Saeima

³ According to the Constitutional Court, the provisions of Chap. 8 establish a threefold obligation: to respect, to protect and to fulfil individual rights.

⁴ The Constitutional Court has derived this principle by interpreting Art. 1 of the Satversme. This principle ensures balance and mutual control which fosters temperance of power. Judgment in Case No. 03-05(99) of 1 October 1999, para. 1.

⁵ Judgment in Case No. 2005-12-0103 of 16 December 2005, para. 17.

⁶ See Cases No. 2009-11-01; 2007-01-01; 2002-08-01; 2002-08-01; 2002-21-01; 2002-20-0103.

⁷ Judgment in Case No. 2012-06-01 of 1 November 2012, para. 13.3.3. See also Judgments of the Constitutional Court in Cases No. 2007-01-01 of June 2007, para. 24.1., and No. 2010-51-01 of 8 June 2007, para. 17.

⁸ For details see Mits 2010, pp. 127–188.

is the body that is directly democratically legitimised to take decisions on the most important issues for Latvia. No other institution can limit the powers of the Saeima, which has many instruments at its disposal to influence other institutions.

1.2 The Amendment of the Satversme in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1–1.2.4 Amendment procedure and constitutional amendment referendums

The rules on amendment of the Satversme are established in Art. 76, which provides: ‘The Saeima may amend the Satversme in sittings at which at least two-thirds of the members of the Saeima participate. The amendments shall be passed in three readings by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members present.’⁹

Further, Arts. 74 and 79 of the Satversme provide that the electorate has direct legislative power if at least a one-half of the voters who participated in the last parliamentary elections vote in a referendum. Art. 78 of the Satversme provides that voters comprising not less than one-tenth of the electorate have the right to submit a fully elaborated draft of an amendment to the Satversme or of a law to the President, who shall present it to the Saeima. If the Saeima fails to adopt such draft without amendments as to its content, the draft shall be submitted to a national referendum. The draft is deemed to be adopted if at least one-half of those who participate vote in favour. Thus, both the Saeima and the people are the main decision-makers when there is a need to amend the Satversme.

There are several provisions of the Satversme which cannot be adopted without the consent of the people of Latvia. According to Art. 77 of the Satversme, if the Saeima amends, inter alia, Arts. 1, 2, 6¹⁰ or 77, the amendments come into effect only if confirmed by a referendum. According to Art. 79, an amendment to the Constitution submitted to a referendum shall be deemed adopted if at least one-half of the electorate votes in favour. This means that the fundamental principles of democracy enshrined in Art. 1 as well as the principle of sovereignty provided for in Art. 2 of the Satversme are afforded particular protection.¹¹

EU amendments The fundamental articles of the Satversme (i.e. Arts. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 and 77) have not been amended, neither upon accession to the EU nor subsequently upon amendment of the EU Treaties. The remaining text of the Satversme has been amended on two occasions, with regard to three subject areas in order to comply with EU law: in 2003 upon accession to the EU, and in 2004 to comply with the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) and to ensure the electoral rights of EU citizens.

⁹ For this and further quotes, the official translation of the Satversme is used. Available at <http://www.vvc.gov.lv>.

¹⁰ ‘The Saeima shall be elected in general, equal and direct elections, and by secret ballot based on proportional representation.’

¹¹ See also the next Section below.

Questions pertaining to the EU in the constitutional context have also been debated at least twice, at the time of the draft Constitutional Treaty and ratification of the Lisbon Treaty as well as when accession to the eurozone was approaching, in connection with the stronger role provided for the EU on the basis of the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union.¹²

The first amendments were introduced in the Satversme on 8 May 2003. Article 68 of the Satversme, which provided that ‘[a]ll international agreements, which settle matters that may be decided by the legislative process, shall be ratified by the Saeima’, was supplemented with the following provisions:

Upon entering into international agreements, Latvia, with the purpose of strengthening democracy, may delegate a part of its State institution competences to international institutions. The Saeima may ratify international agreements in which a part of State institution competencies are delegated to international institutions in sittings in which at least two-thirds of the members of the Saeima participate, and a two-thirds majority vote of the members present is necessary for ratification.

Membership of Latvia in the European Union shall be decided by a national referendum, which is proposed by the Saeima.

Substantial changes in the terms regarding the membership of Latvia in the European Union shall be decided by a national referendum if such referendum is requested by at least one-half of the members of the Saeima.

Article 79 which provides for the procedure for approving amendments to the Satversme by referendum¹³ was also supplemented to provide for a special requirement in the case of accession to the EU or subsequent EU Treaty amendments:

An amendment to the Satversme submitted for national referendum shall be deemed adopted if at least half of the electorate has voted in favour. A draft law, decision regarding membership of Latvia in the European Union or substantial changes in the terms regarding such membership submitted for national referendum shall be deemed adopted if the number of voters is at least half of the number of electors as participated in the previous Saeima election and if the majority has voted in favour of the draft law, membership of Latvia in the European Union or substantial changes in the terms regarding such membership.

When amending the Satversme, the drafters also had to take into account the provisions of Art. 73, which provides:

The Budget and laws concerning loans, taxes, customs duties, railroad tariffs, military conscription, declaration and commencement of war, peace treaties, declaration of a state of emergency and its termination, mobilisation and demobilisation, as well as agreements with other nations may not be submitted to national referendum.

¹² The treaty entered into force on 1 January 2013. See, http://www.eurozone.europa.eu/euro-area/topics/treaty-on-stability,-coordination-and-governance-\(tscg\)//). See also Sect. 2.7.

¹³ The general rule is included in Art. 76, which provides that the Satversme can be amended by the Saeima in sittings attended by two-thirds of the Members of Parliament. Amendments must be adopted in three readings by a two-thirds majority of those present.

Therefore, the Satversme does not allow for a referendum to be held on an international treaty. Nevertheless, Arts. 68(4) and 7(2), which allow for a referendum in the case of substantive changes in EU membership, can be qualified as lex specialis in relation to Art. 73.

The amendments to the Satversme of 8 May 2003 and the subsequent further amendments of 23 September 2004 were adopted in accordance with the procedure envisaged in the above-mentioned Art. 76 of the Satversme (i.e. by the Saeima). The amendments to the Satversme of 8 May 2003 were adopted by an affirmative vote of 88 Members of Parliament (MPs) out of 100 (there were no votes against or abstentions). The amendments of 23 September 2004 were adopted by 74 MPs voting in favour (there were no votes against and only one abstention).

By way of a summary of the amendments, first, Art. 68 allows for the delegation of competences only ‘with the purpose of strengthening democracy’. Therefore, a delegation of competences to another state or a non-democratic international institution would be contrary to the Satversme. In this context it is important to establish to what extent competences are delegated or exercised, and whether Latvia remains entitled to withdraw from arrangements which no longer correspond to the initial delegation. The competence to control the compatibility of any delegation with the Satversme lies with the Constitutional Court.¹⁴

Secondly, Art. 68(2) provides that international treaties providing for delegation of competences should be confirmed by the Saeima with a qualified majority in sittings where at least two-thirds of the MPs participate.

Thirdly, Art. 68(3) states that people have the right to decide not only on joining the EU but also on withdrawal from it. Moreover, the procedure for withdrawal should be identical to the procedure for joining the EU. The three paragraphs of Art. 68 viewed together clearly formulate that a referendum on Latvia’s participation in any other international organisation is not necessary. Such membership can be decided by the Saeima alone.

Fourthly, according to Art. 68(4), the people can decide on significant changes in the conditions of membership in the EU if so requested by at least one-half of the Saeima MPs. This allows for it to be established whether the people think that the constitutional structure of the EU is being significantly changed. At the same time, it ensures that referendums are held on substantively important EU issues only.¹⁵

¹⁴ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2008-47-01 of 28 May 2009, para. 11. The Court referred, inter alia, to the Preamble of the 2001 Framework Decision of the Council of the European Union 2001/500/JHA on money laundering, the identification, tracing, freezing, seizing and confiscation of instrumentalities and the proceeds of crime, in which the Council, noting that serious forms of crime increasingly have tax and duty aspects, calls on Member States to provide full mutual legal assistance in the investigation and prosecution of this type of crime, and further recalls that money laundering is at the very heart of organised crime and should be rooted out wherever it occurs. The Court also referred to the Preamble of Directive 2005/60/EC and Directive 2006/70/EC.

¹⁵ See annotation to the draft law on amendments to the Satversme, Reg. No. 158, submitted to the Saeima on 31 January 2003. <http://helios-web.saeima.lv/saeima8/reg.likpri>. See also Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2008-35-01 of 7 April 2009, para. 19.4.

Thus, procedurally, it is the responsibility of the Saeima to decide on the significance of further amendments to the Treaties for the membership of Latvia in the EU. Article 68 requires a significant threshold for a positive decision in the Saeima. Through the textual, historical and systemic interpretation of Art. 68(4), the Constitutional Court has concluded that a referendum on substantive changes to EU membership is non-obligatory, i.e. it depends on the affirmative vote in the Saeima.¹⁶ The Constitutional Court has noted that although such exercise of the rights of the people provides for certain procedural pre-conditions, the Constitutional Court may not reassess the constitutionality of certain norms of the Satversme because such assessment does not fall within its jurisdiction.¹⁷ According to the annotation to the amendments, Art. 68(4) does not allow for a referendum to be called in the case of insignificant amendments to EU membership conditions or in the case of transposition of EU legislative acts other than treaties (e.g. directives, regulations and decisions).¹⁸ However, since accession to the EU, MPs have not requested that a referendum be called on the grounds of significant changes in EU membership requirements.

The second set of amendments was adopted on 23 September 2004 and concerned Arts. 98 and 101 of the Satversme. Article 98 was supplemented with a sentence to bring the Satversme in line with the commitments undertaken in relation to the EAW. This Article now provides that ‘... A citizen of Latvia may not be extradited to a foreign country, except in the cases provided for in international agreements ratified by the Saeima if by the extradition the fundamental human rights specified in the Constitution are not violated’.

The amendment of Art. 98 was based on Council Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA of 13 June 2002 on the European Arrest Warrant and the Surrender Procedures between Member States.¹⁹ Since Art. 98 of the Satversme prohibited extradition, it was necessary to adopt amendments to comply with EU law. Since the amendments were adopted in the Constitution, there has been no opportunity for the Constitutional Court to express its views on the constitutionality of this Article. Moreover, the Constitutional Court has repeatedly held that it should not be considered as the Court entitled to review the interpretation and application of the law by ordinary courts. Therefore, the only potential avenue for judicial contestation of a ruling of an ordinary court for a person facing extradition is the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR).²⁰

¹⁶ Judgment in Case No. 2008-35-01 of 7 April 2009, para. 19.

¹⁷ Ibid., para. 17.

¹⁸ Supra n. 15.

¹⁹ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

²⁰ See Sect. 2.3.

Article 101 of the Satversme was supplemented to provide for the right of EU citizens to participate in local elections. It now provides as follows:

Local governments shall be elected by Latvian citizens and citizens of the European Union who permanently reside in Latvia. Every citizen of the European who permanently resides in Latvia has the right, as provided by law, to participate in the work of local governments. The working language of local governments is the Latvian language.

The amendments were based on Art. 22(1) TFEU [Art. 19 TEC], which provides that every citizen of the Union residing in a Member State of which he is not a national shall have the right to vote and to stand as a candidate at municipal elections in the Member State in which he resides, under the same conditions as nationals of that state.²¹

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 There have been no amendments that directly address the supremacy and direct effect of EU law. The rules on these matters have been spelt out in the Law of Administrative Procedure and further dealt with by the Supreme Court and Constitutional Court.

The Constitutional Court has stated as follows in relation to the EU:

Upon ratification of the Treaty on Accession of Latvia to the European Union, European Union law became an integral part of the Latvian legal system. Therefore, legal acts of the European Union and interpretation provided by the case law of the European Court of Justice must be taken into account when applying national law.²²

Thus, the Saeima cannot adopt legal acts which are contrary to its international obligations, including EU obligations. If the Saeima establishes that its international obligations do not comply with obligations under EU law, it must do all that is necessary to remedy the situation. Thus, EU law has become an integral part of the Latvian legal system.

The Constitutional Court has pronounced that Art. 68 of the Satversme prescribes that Latvia must implement its international obligations. According to the Satversme, the Law on International Agreements of the Republic of Latvia and the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, in any specific case where there is a conflict between international obligations undertaken by Latvia and national norms, international norms must be applied. Upon accession, Latvia delegated part of the competences of its institutions and undertook obligations derived from the

²¹ Annotation to the draft law ‘Amendments to the Satversme of the Republic of Latvia’, reg. No. 571, submitted 20 May 2004, available at http://helios-web.saeima.lv/saeima8/reg_liaprj.

²² Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2004-01-06 of 7 June 2004, para. 7 and in Case No. 2007-11-03 of 17 January 2008, para. 24.2.

EU Treaties. These obligations, inter alia, require the application of EU law in the Latvian legal system. In addition, international obligations which have been confirmed by the Saeima are also binding on the Saeima, which therefore must not adopt legal acts which contradict such international obligations.²³

All in all, the application of EU law is essential for the successful functioning of the EU and stems from the Art. 4(3) TEU principle of sincere co-operation to which Member States have adhered. Alongside the rhetoric through which they threaten to declare that EU law is not applicable, the constitutional courts often facilitate better compliance with EU law by placing the legislative and constitutional amendments necessary to guarantee full application of EU law, in compliance with the constitution, on the agenda of political bodies.²⁴ Notwithstanding the Simmenthal mandate, constitutional courts are comfortable with subjecting the full application of EU law to constitutional reservations, based on concerns regarding fundamental rights protection, ultra vires action by the EU institutions and respect for constitutional identities. These are articulated as warnings according to which the full application of EU law might be limited in cases where EU measures contravene fundamental constitutional principles. These, however, have remained at the level of obiter dicta.²⁵

In the case of Treaty amendments, the approach adopted by the Constitutional Court is based on a three step test: (1) whether the international treaty involves the delegation of competences; (2) whether there has been an infringement of fundamental values at the constitutional level; (3) whether a constitutional procedure for legitimisation of the amended Treaty within the national legal order has been observed.

1.3.2–1.3.3 The approach adopted by the Constitutional Court to the delegation of sovereignty is as follows:

The Constitutional Court recognises that the State of Latvia is based on fundamental values such as human rights and fundamental freedoms, democracy, the sovereignty of the State and its people, the division of powers and the rule of law. The State is obliged to guarantee these values and they cannot be infringed by amending the Satversme by law. Therefore, the delegation of competencies cannot violate the rule of law and the basis of an independent, sovereign and democratic republic. Likewise, the EU cannot affect the rights of citizens to decide upon the issues that are essential to a democratic State. Article 2 of the Satversme provides not only for the right to ‘the final say’ but also for an obligation to assess the membership conditions of an international organisation as such. In this context, the right to ‘the initial say’ seems even more important.²⁶

²³ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2004-01-06 of 7 June 2004, para. 7.

²⁴ Piqani 2012, p. 147.

²⁵ Ibid., pp. 155–156.

²⁶ Judgment in Case No. 2008-35-01 of 7 April 2009, para. 17. The case was brought by a group of voters claiming that the ratification of the Lisbon Treaty should be subject to a referendum. They claimed that the fact that the Saeima refused to organise a referendum violated their rights provided in Art. 101 of the Satversme. The applicants also argued that Art. 2 of the Satversme was infringed. The Court’s judgment includes a detailed discussion of a number of provisions introduced by the Lisbon Treaty within the context of Art. 2 of the Satversme. See paras. 16 and 18.1 of the Judgment. The Court noted: ‘Already prior to World War II, in international law analysis of the

Therefore, it can be argued that the very notion of sovereignty itself has not been re-interpreted. Sovereignty has always been associated with the capacity to exercise external and internal powers subject to sovereign values. Values attach a normative character to sovereignty reflecting the views dominant in society.

1.3.4 There is no provision in the Satversme providing for its supremacy expressis verbis. However, this can be inferred from the practice of the Constitutional Court and Supreme Court as well as from the legal doctrine.

Neither the Constitutional Court nor the Supreme Court have dealt with any case where the supremacy of EU law has been addressed in relation to the Satversme. It is therefore difficult to construct such a theoretical case. However, since the Satversme is predominantly a procedural constitution, no apparent conflicts with EU law arise. Specific cases of newly delegated competences (abstract control) in the case of Treaty amendments or violations of individual rights (individual or abstract control procedure) might give rise to issues of supremacy in the Constitutional Court.

The Constitutional Court has declared that with regards to domestic acts (including ratified treaties), the place of a particular provision in the legal hierarchy is determined by its legal force, which depends on the institution that has adopted it and the procedure that was followed. The higher the democratic legitimacy of the institution and the higher the required majority for adoption, the higher the rank of the provision. A higher threshold has been set for the cases for which the Satversme was amended.²⁷ Therefore, laws adopted pursuant to the procedure prescribed in Arts. 77 and 79 of the Satversme have a higher legal rank than ordinary laws.²⁸

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 Democratic control of EU matters is primarily exercised by the Saeima and its European Affairs Committee. The Saeima participates in EU decision-making pursuant to the Law on Procedure of the Saeima. Chapter VII¹, ‘Participation of the Saeima in the EU’, provides that the European Affairs Committee is responsible for participation in EU affairs, except in cases where the Saeima has decided otherwise. For instance, the European Affairs Committee reviews the positions of Latvia prepared by the Cabinet of Ministers. The Commission is also entrusted with legal consequences that arise when a State undertakes international obligations, sovereignty was treated as the exercise of sovereign rights rather than a restriction thereof. The Permanent Court of International Justice rejected the view that the conclusion of any such treaty according to which a State undertook to perform or refrain from performing certain acts would mean this State’s abandonment of its sovereignty. At the same time, the right of entering into international engagements is an attribute of State sovereignty (Affaire du Vapeur “Wimbledon”, CPJI Ser A 01 15, 1923, 25).

²⁷ See above in relation to the amendment procedures established in Arts. 76 and 79.

²⁸ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2007-10-0103 of 29 November 2007, para. 56.

notifying the EU institutions of the Latvian position on legislative proposals and with transferring documents to other Saeima Committees. There are no other formal rules on the participation of the Saeima in EU affairs. In practice, the procedure is decided by the Committee at the time a new Saeima is elected. The Latvian Members of the European Parliament as well as experts are invited to attend meetings of the Committee. The European Affairs Committee relies on its own information as well as on information from the Cabinet of Ministers. Co-operation is most active when a long-term budget of the EU is debated.

1.4.2 The rules on referendums regarding constitutional amendments and EU membership have been outlined in Sect. 1.2. The EU referendum was not a constitutional amendment referendum, but rather a referendum relating to membership in the EU under the fourth paragraph of the amended Art. 68. Two observations can be made about the results of the referendum. First, since 1990 there have been eight referendums in Latvia.²⁹ The referendum in 2003 was the only referendum on EU issues. Of all the referendums held since 1990, the referendum on EU membership had the highest rate of participation, at 71.49% of all eligible voters.³⁰ Secondly, the polarisation between the voters participating was also the highest: EU membership was supported by 66.97% of voters, but 32.26% voted against (0.77% votes invalid). In five of the other referendums, more than 94% of the voters voted for the submitted proposal.³¹ The most controversial was the referendum of 1998 on liberalisation of the Citizenship Law, in which 44.98% of voters voted against liberalisation and 52.54% were in favour.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.3 The amendments to the Satversme before accession to the EU were subject to wide public and political debate, which was followed by a pre-referendum campaign. The debate focused on different aspects of the accession. For instance, questions on the need to amend Art. 2 of the Satversme (on sovereign powers being vested in the people) were posed not only by voters but also by ²⁹ In 1998 on amendments to the Citizenship Law; in 1999 on amendments to the Law on State Pensions; in 2007 on amendments to the Law on National Security and Law on State Security Institutions; in 2008 on amendments to the Satversme and amendments to the Law on State Pensions; in 2011 on dissolution of the Saeima; in 2012 on amendments to the Satversme (concerning Russian as a state language). See <http://cvk.lv/pub/public/27094.html>.

³⁰ For instance, the turnout in the 1998 referendum was 69.16%; in 2007 – 42%; in 2008 – 42% (for amendment of the Satversme) and 22.9% (on the Law on State Pensions); in 2011 – 44.73%, but in 2012 – 71.13%. For comparison, in the elections to the European Parliament, the turnout was 41.43% of eligible voters (2004) and 53.69% (2009).

³¹ In 1999 – 94.17% voted for repeal of the Law; in 2007 – 96.49% voted for repeal of the Law; in 2008 – 96.78% voted for amendments to the Satversme and 96.44% voted for adoption of the amendments of the Law; in 2011 – 94.3% voted for dissolution of the Saeima.

scholars.³² Different views were also expressed in the legal doctrine on the notion of sovereignty and on the content of Art. 2 of the Satversme in relation to EU membership.³³ The dominant view was that sovereignty had not been lost or lessened; quite the opposite – by becoming a member of the EU, Latvia had exercised its sovereignty.

However, there were also other proposals. For instance, professor Ineta Ziemele suggested that the amendments that were introduced to Art. 68 of the Satversme might not be sufficient because they did not ensure parliamentary control over EU activities. She argued that the lack of control might raise problems in the context of division of powers and the legitimacy of the laws applicable in Latvia. The alternative proposal was that all international treaties and EU legislative acts which address legislative issues should be approved by the Saeima. Thus, not only would EU law be recognised explicitly in the Latvian legal system but also the Saeima would preserve parliamentary control. Ziemele also suggested adding Art. 117 to the Satversme, which would provide that ‘[t]he state protects the rights of EU citizens in accordance with the legislative acts of the EU’. It was argued that this would mean that lawmakers would not have to make amendments to Chapter 8 of the Satversme, even though the rights of EU citizens are constantly increasing and developing.³⁴ None of the proposals were adopted.

The political argument was raised that Latvian independence can be properly ensured only by accession to the EU.³⁵ Moreover, based on the results of pre-accession monitoring, there were hopes and worries that non-citizens might potentially be granted the status of EU citizen.³⁶

Already in 2003, the position of the Constitutional Court towards EU accession was that EU norms are compatible only with a national legal system that corresponds to the requirements set for a democratic state based on the rule of law.³⁷ In this sense the Court signalled adherence to the so-called reverse-Solange approach.

The role of constitutions will be discussed further in the final section of the report (Sect. 4), with the suggestion that greater focus ought to be on redefining sovereignty and democracy at the transnational level.

³² Buka 2000; Meļkis 2000; Pleps 2003.

³³ Various proposals were debated in two well-attended conferences of lawyers and experts organised by the Institute of Public Law, on ‘The place of EU law in the Latvian legal system and solutions in cases of collision of norms’ (2006) and ‘The core of constitutional sovereignty’ (2007). Conference materials are on file with the authors and available only in Latvian.

³⁴ Ziemele 2004, pp. 69–70.

³⁵ See the speech of the Latvian President Vaira Vike-Freiberga on 29 May 2003 during the parliamentary debates. <http://www.am.gov.lv/lv/Jaunumi/Runas/2003/2714/>.

³⁶ Krūma 2004, pp. 33–53.

³⁷ Judgment in Case No. 2002-18-01 of 5 March 2003, para. 6. Latvia concluded an association agreement and received an official invitation to join the EU. Therefore, the laws should be brought in line and political reforms implemented to ensure that Latvia can integrate into the EU. In relation to the elections to the European Parliament, the common principles set out in the EC Treaty should be observed.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1; 2.1.3 Chapter 8 on human rights consists of twenty-seven articles on civic and political rights as well as social, economic and cultural rights. Moreover, other human rights can be derived from other articles of the Satversme.³⁸

General principles have not been codified in the Satversme as such. However, there are a considerable number of judgments of the Constitutional Court in which the Court has derived constitutional principles on the basis of the term ‘democratic republic’ enshrined in Art. 1 of the Satversme. Over the years, more than thirty principles have been declared to have a constitutional rank. For instance, the concept ‘rule of law’ is not expressis verbis mentioned in the Satversme. However, it has been identified by the Constitutional Court as one of the principles enshrined in Art. 1 of the Satversme under the term ‘democratic republic’. Other principles include the division of powers, proportionality, legal certainty (legal expectations) and good governance.

The rights enshrined in the Satversme as well as the principles derived from it are directly applicable, i.e. any court can rely on the provisions of the Satversme irrespective of the provisions of the specific law. The Supreme Court has in administrative cases and civil cases acknowledged that the Satversme should be directly applicable.³⁹ For instance, if a person considers that his or her rights of defence envisaged in Art. 92 have been breached, the person has a right to claim compensation by submitting a claim to the court of general jurisdiction.⁴⁰

It can be argued that democratic control is exercised also by the judicial institutions to which individuals and legal persons can submit complaints. In the case of the regular courts, such complaints have resulted in preliminary rulings to the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) or cases referred to the Constitutional Court. Individuals have also turned to the Constitutional Court directly to contest, inter alia, either the constitutionality of a provision of law or other act transposing a directive, or non-compliance with the rules of EU law.⁴¹

³⁸ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2002-08-02 of 23 September 2002, and in Case No. 2002-18-01 of 5 March 2003. Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-111-01 of 22 March 2010, para. 19.

³⁹ For instance, Department of Civil Cases of the Supreme Court, SKC 12/2009, 29 April 2009 (not publicly available) and Department of Administrative Cases of the Supreme Court, SKA-68/2013, 22 February 2013, para. 9, available at <http://www.tiesas.lv/februaris-10>.

⁴⁰ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2001-07-0103 of 5 December 2001, para. 1.

⁴¹ In other cases, the Court has adopted a usual fundamental rights test: (1) whether the provision has been adopted by law; (2) whether it has a legitimate objective; (3) whether it complies with the principle of proportionality (necessary to achieve the legitimate aim; appropriate to achieve that aim and whether there are alternative, less burdensome measures to achieve the aim in an equally

2.1.2 Article 116 allows for limitations to individual rights. It provides:

The rights of persons set out in Articles ninety-six, ninety-seven, ninety-eight, one hundred, one hundred and two, one hundred and three, one hundred and six, and one hundred and eight of the Constitution may be subject to restrictions in circumstances provided for by law in order to protect the rights of other people, the democratic structure of the State, and public safety, welfare and morals. On the basis of the conditions set forth in this Article, restrictions may also be imposed on the expression of religious beliefs.

However, this norm covers only one-third of the fundamental rights enshrined in the Satversme. Indeed, there are certain fundamental rights which are not subject to restrictions, e.g. the prohibition of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment (Art. 95), the prohibition of censorship (Art. 100), the prohibition of forced labour (Art. 106) and the prohibition of racial discrimination.

At the same time this does not mean that other fundamental rights that are not mentioned in Art. 116 cannot be limited. The Constitutional Court on a number of occasions has acknowledged that although the Satversme does not explicitly provide for cases in which other rights not mentioned in Art. 116 can be restricted, this does not mean that they are absolute. The provisions of the Satversme must be interpreted systematically. This means that if Art. 116 were not applied, this would jeopardise the rights of other persons. The assumption that fundamental rights not mentioned in Art. 116 cannot be subject to restrictions would be contrary to both the rights of other persons enshrined in the Satversme as well as other provisions of the Satversme.⁴²

As will be seen in Sect. 2.6, the Constitutional Court has clarified that it assesses the validity of restrictions of civil and political rights as well as social rights on the following criteria: the restrictions must be determined by law, pursue a legitimate aim and comply with the principle of proportionality.⁴³

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 No specific issues with regard to the balancing of fundamental rights and economic freedoms have arisen in Latvia. Neither the Constitutional Court nor the Supreme Court have dealt with any cases where the supremacy of EU law has been addressed in relation to the Satversme. Therefore, it is difficult to construct such a theoretical case. By reference to values common to Latvia and the EU, e.g. the rule of law, democracy and human rights, such a collision between the Satversme and effective way). For instance Case No. 2008-34-01 of 13 February 2009, paras. 16–24 and Case No. 2009-85-01 of 30 March 2010, para. 17.

⁴² Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2002-04-03 of 22 October 2002, para. 2 and in Case No. 2004-10-01 of 17 January 2005, para. 7.2.

⁴³ Mits 2013, p. 19.

EU law is difficult to imagine. It has been accepted that the human rights chapter of the Satversme cannot provide for lower protection in comparison to internationally binding legal acts. Any conclusion to the contrary would run counter to Art. 1 of the Satversme and the rule of law it enshrines.⁴⁴

As was shown in Sect. 1.3.1, the Constitutional Court has in general developed and strengthened interpretation to the benefit of EU law. It has been acknowledged that EU legal acts and CJEU interpretation, as far as they do not encroach upon the fundamental principles of the Satversme, should be taken into account in order to prevent conflicts between Latvian and EU law. When interpreting Latvian law, EU law and its interpretation by the CJEU must be taken into account.⁴⁵

For instance, in a case on the Freeport of Riga in which substantial financial interests were involved, the EU's environmental standards were invoked to declare that territorial planning which aimed at business promotion in certain areas would be in breach of Latvia's obligations under EU law. The Constitutional Court declared that '[w]hen assessing a legitimate objective, it is necessary to take into consideration the obligations of Latvia as an EU Member State'. The Constitutional Court also stated:

Moreover, upon ratification of the Treaty on Accession of Latvia to the European Union, European Union law has become an integral part of the Latvian legal system. Therefore, legal acts of the European Union and interpretation provided by the case law of the European Court of Justice must be taken into account when applying national law. The same applies to laws on land use planning and protection of the environment.

and

... Latvian law must be interpreted so as to avoid any conflicts with the obligations of Latvia towards the European Union, unless the fundamental principles incorporated in the Satversme are affected.⁴⁶ [emphasis added]

For instance, in a case concerning application of the 1965 Convention on Facilitation of International Maritime Traffic, the Constitutional Court pronounced:

Thus it follows from the above laws and international obligations, undertaken by the Republic of Latvia when ratifying the Vienna Convention, that in each particular case, if there arises a discrepancy between international legal norms, ratified by the Saeima and national legal norms of Latvia, the international legal norms shall be applied. Moreover, the ⁴⁴ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2005-02-0106 of 14 September 2005, para. 10. See also Sects. 2.6 and 2.7.

⁴⁵ See, for instance, Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2007-11-03 of 17 January 2008, para. 25.4 and No. 2011-17-03 of 2 May 2012, para. 13.3. In these cases the Court interpreted copyright and environmental assessment regulation on the basis of provisions of Directive 2001/29/EC and Directive 92/43/EEC as well as the case law of the CJEU.

⁴⁶ See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2007-11-03 of 17 January 2008, paras. 24.2. and 25.4., available at http://www.satv.tiesa.gov.lv/upload/judg_2007_11_03.htm. Thus, also with regard to the Natura 2000 territories, the requirements of the directives transposed by Latvia and the interpretation of the directives established in the case law of the European Court of Justice should be observed.

international obligations, undertaken by Latvia on the basis of international agreements, confirmed by the Saeima, are binding also on the Saeima itself. It may not adopt legal acts, which contravene the above obligations. ... Any person applying legal norms, including a court, when establishing a discrepancy between an international legal norm and a national legal norm of Latvia, shall apply the international legal norm. ... When applying the legal norms of the European Union (Community) the institution and the court shall take into consideration the jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice.⁴⁷

Similarly, according to Art. 15(4) of the Law on Administrative Procedure, EU law is applicable according to the hierarchy of normative acts. When applying EU law provisions, the relevant institution or court must observe the case law of the CJEU. The Supreme Court has held that CJEU rulings must be applied when interpreting provisions through historical and systemic interpretation.⁴⁸ The same approach has been adopted by the Supreme Court in civil law cases. It has for example interpreted labour law in accordance with Directive 91/533/EEC in relation to the obligation to inform an employee of termination of a contract in writing.⁴⁹

At the same time, in a case concerning the prevention of laundering of the proceeds from crime and financing terrorism and the interpretation of the Directive 2005/60/EC and Directive 2006/70/EC, the Constitutional Court has stated that the Court should verify whether interpretation of the CJEU is indispensable:

[E]ven if the Court of Justice were to conclude that Directive 2005/60/EC requires refraining from the execution of transactions for a certain period after the persons subject to the law have reported to the Control Office, this would not affect the outcome of the case because the Constitutional Court should verify compliance of the established procedure with the Satversme.⁵⁰

Systems might overlap but be capable of compatibility. This is even more true since the adoption of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights as a legally binding instrument. Consequently, the overlapping systems develop over time through the process of judicial discourse and without predetermined finality.⁵¹

⁴⁷ See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2004-01-06 of 7 July 2004, paras. 6 and 7 of reasons, available at <http://www.satv.tiesa.gov.lv/?lang=2&mid=19>.

⁴⁸ Judgment of the Supreme Court in Case No. SKA-216 of 23 November 2004, para. 10. Judgments and decisions of the Department of Administrative Cases of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Latvia, Riga: Tiesu namu Aģentūra, 2005, pp. 571–579; Judgment of the Supreme Court in Case No. 162/2007 of 10 May 2007, para. 8.

⁴⁹ Civil Department of the Supreme Court, Judgment in Case No. SKC-388/3012 of 4 April 2012, para. 11. Not published.

⁵⁰ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2008-47-01 of 18 May 2009, para. 15.2. The English translation is available at the Court's website at http://www.satv.tiesa.gov.lv/upload/judg_2008_47_01.htm.

⁵¹ Krūma 2009, p. 155.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1–2.3.6 There has been no public debate on the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision or the EU Data Retention Directive⁵² in Latvia. A few articles have been published on the EAW, but they have been quite positive. Moreover, the amendments to the Satversme (see Sect. 1.2) might be why the EAW has never been contested before the Constitutional Court.

The provisions of Art. 92 of the Satversme have served as a basis for the Constitutional Court to identify principles such as nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege and ne bis in idem, ubi ius ibi remedium in the domestic context in areas not related to the EAW.⁵³ The articles providing for defence rights in the Latvian Constitution are as follows:

Article 92

Everyone has the right to defend his or her rights and lawful interests in a fair court. Everyone shall be presumed innocent until his or her guilt has been established in accordance with law. Everyone, where his or her rights are violated without basis, has a right to commensurate compensation. Everyone has a right to the assistance of counsel.

Article 94

Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one may be deprived of or have their liberty restricted, otherwise than in accordance with law.

The more detailed regulation arising from Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA is enshrined in Chaps. 65 and 66 of the Law on Criminal Procedure. According to Art. 714(4) of the Law, a person cannot be extradited if the crime in question is not punishable in Latvia or has not been committed in the state which requests extradition. A person also cannot be extradited to a country which does not recognise the behaviour in question to be criminal.

According to defence lawyer Aldis Alliks, there are insufficient guarantees in Art. 715(3⁽¹⁾) of the Law, which does not allow for sufficient protection for a person convicted in another EU Member State in absentia. The provision allows a convicted person to become acquainted with the ruling but does not provide the right to defence. Alliks has also noted that when adopting this Article, Latvia did not make use of the freedom of action envisaged in Art. 2 of Framework Decision 2009/299/TI amending decisions 2002/584/JHA, 2005/214/JHA, 2006/783/JHA, 2008/909/

⁵² Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁵³ Judgments of the Constitutional Court in Cases No. 2008-09-0106 of 16 December para. 4.2., No. 20120-02-0106 of 18 October 2012, para. 11.2., No. 2004-06-01 of 11 October 2004, para. 21.

JHA and 2008/947/JHA.⁵⁴ Aside from this there have been no major problems in applying the EAW.⁵⁵

The Public Prosecutor has informed the Experts that Latvia does not verify the evidence in an EAW case but only requests a comprehensive description of the crime committed. There are also on-going debates on the need to ensure the assistance of a lawyer before a person is extradited and to compensate a person for expenses related to his or her return trip home if the person is found innocent.⁵⁶

Latvia provides consular assistance, which is an obligation derived not only from the Satversme but also from the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. This assistance is evidenced by the practice of the consular institutions.⁵⁷

The effectiveness of the EAW largely depends on mutual trust between the courts and the EU Member States regarding the judicial systems and the protection of the fundamental rights of persons who are extradited when they are in custody.⁵⁸ Latvia has had differing experiences in this respect. For instance, a number of Latvian citizens have been subject to trials in the UK and Ireland for serious crimes. At the same time, an Austrian court refused to extradite a Latvian citizen who had been accused of serious crimes. He was placed under arrest in Latvia and subsequently released and ordered not to leave the country. Nevertheless, he fled to Austria, which refused to extradite him on the grounds of his health.⁵⁹

Since all EU Member States are parties to the ECHR and the EU is about to accede to the ECHR, the application of the EAW could be based on the principles established by the ECtHR.⁶⁰ Moreover, implementing fundamental rights monitoring as suggested by the European Commission and the Council of Ministers in ‘[a]n EU internal strategic framework for fundamental rights: joining forces to achieve better results’ could help increase mutual trust and streamline fundamental rights practices.⁶¹

⁵⁴ OJ L 81/24, 27 March 2009.

⁵⁵ Information provided by defence lawyer Aldis Alliks, 2 September 2014. Issues related to the EAW were discussed by judges during a conference in 2013. See Plaksins 2013.

⁵⁶ An e-mail exchange between the Experts and Ms. Una Brenča, Chief Prosecutor of the Division of International Co-operation, Department of Functional Analysis and Management, 30 September 2014.

⁵⁷ CARE, Citizens Consular Assistance Regulation in Europe. Report on Latvia http://www.careproject.eu/database/browse_euc.php# and consolidated report available at <http://www.careproject.eu/images/stories/ConsularAndDiplomaticProtection.pdf>. This contains information on Latvian practice on consular assistance to Latvian citizens and non-citizens abroad.

⁵⁸ See Decision of the Chamber of the Constitutional Court on Applications 72/2013, 73/2013, 74/2013 on 31 May 2013, 138/2013 on 31 July 2013, as well as Judgment of the ECtHR Čalovskis v. Latvia, no. 22205/13, 24 July 2014.

⁵⁹ For details see http://www.tvnet.lv/zinas/kriminalzinas/495427-kukuldosana_apsudzetais_vaskevics_joprojam_arstejas_austria.

⁶⁰ See, for instance, Judgment of the ECtHR in Čalovskis v. Latvia, supra n. 58, paras. 129–133 and 155–158. The case has been appealed to the Grand Chamber.

⁶¹ See European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA) Annual Report 2013. Luxembourg 2014. http://fra.europa.eu/sites/default/files/annual-report-2013-focus_en.pdf.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 Issues related to the Data Retention Directive have not been discussed in Latvia, and there is no information on any related court cases. The implementation of the Directive has also not been contested in the Constitutional Court. In terms of the constitutional provisions, Art. 96 provides that '[e]veryone has the right to inviolability of his or her private life, home and correspondence'.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 No issues regarding unpublished or secret legislation have arisen in Latvia. The Constitutional Court has discussed the issue of unpublished documents serving as a basis for austerity measures and the unavailability of the records of the negotiations with the IMF and the EU.⁶² However, since legislation implementing the agreed measures was adopted in accordance with the required legislative procedure, there are no grounds to delve further into this issue (see in greater detail Sect. 2.7).

If there were a case involving unpublished or secret legislation, the Constitutional Court would have to pronounce that the norm had not been established by law and was ultra vires, as an important aspect of the principle of the rule of law.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

General principles of law are applied on the basis of the same methodology as written norms. However, if an individual applies to the Constitutional Court, he or she must show that there has been a prima facie breach of a fundamental right provided in Chap. 8 of the Satversme. According to the Law on the Constitutional Court, a case cannot be initiated on the basis of an individual application solely based on a principle derived from Art. 1 of the Satversme. In more than one-half of such cases (that refer to Art. 1), reference has been made to the principle of legitimate expectations in combination with a fundamental rights provision. The main objective of the principle of legitimate expectations is to protect the rights of a person in cases where provisions of law might potentially cause a deterioration of the situation of the individual.⁶³

⁶² Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009, paras. 26 and 30.1.

⁶³ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2006-04-01 of 8 November 2006, para. 21. Another article on the basis of which several principles have been derived is Art. 92 (right to a fair trial).

The principle of legitimate expectations was central to the pensions cases concerning cuts imposed due to the financial crisis, which will be explored in Sect. 2.7.

It may be worth noting that in the Estonian Sugar case mentioned in the Questionnaire, the Latvian government intervened and supported some of the claims regarding the breach of the general principles of law by the imposition of the EU fine. The Latvian Government in particular raised the issue of the breach of legitimate expectations⁶⁴ and the breach of defence rights in contesting the EU fine calculations,⁶⁵ and pointed out that the objective of EU Regulation 60/2004, rather than burdening the state budgets of the new Member States, was to burden the budgets of undertakings that had bought sugar for speculative purposes. Upon examining how the Commission calculated the subsequent fine set out in Regulation 832/2005, the Latvian Government was concerned that it was impossible to achieve the objectives of Regulation 60/2004.⁶⁶

However, EU law has enhanced the protection of property rights in cases concerning bank insolvency where EU law has played an important role. For instance, in a case on protection of the property rights of minority shareholders, the Constitutional Court had to address the principles derived from Directive 77/911/EEC.⁶⁷ The Court noted that EU membership does not mean that norms included in the directive will in all cases influence the scope of the fundamental rights included in the Satversme. It further stated:

In the present matter, it is necessary to take into account the special character and place in commercial law of Directive 77/91/EEC as an instrument establishing minimum standards for protection of shareholders' rights. Article 25 and Article 29 of the above mentioned Directive have been elaborated taking into account the protection of the fundamental rights of shareholders effected in the Member States.

and

It has already been indicated that Article 105 of the Satversme shall be interpreted in conjunction with the obligations of Latvia as a Member State of the EU and particularly in conjunction with Directive 77/91/EEC. The Constitutional Court has already concluded that there is no appeal against judgments of the Constitutional Court; therefore the Constitutional Court will verify whether the Court of Justice has already interpreted the above mentioned issue, whether that which has been established in the Directive is clear enough not to cause any reasonable doubt, and whether it is necessary to request a preliminary ruling from the CJEU.⁶⁸

⁶⁴ Paragraph 28; Case T-324/05 Estonia v. Commission [2009] ECR II-03681, paras. 351–352.

⁶⁵ Ibid., para. 349.

⁶⁶ Ibid., para. 345.

⁶⁷ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-71-01 of 19 October 2011.

⁶⁸ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2008-47-01 of 28 May 2009, paras. 13.3 and para. 24, with reference to several CJEU rulings including in Case C-441/93 Pafitis and others [1996] ECR I-01347, paras. 24, 38 and 39.

At the same time the Constitutional Court concluded that international norms do not prohibit the Member States from establishing a higher level of protection of rights in their constitutions, and there is no need to ask for a preliminary ruling.

Thus, application of EU law and its principles occurs in specific contexts, but the Constitutional Court has repeatedly emphasised that national standards can offer higher protection.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1–2.7.3 Austerity programme In 2009, Latvia was hit by an economic crisis, which was partly exacerbated by the bankruptcy of a systemically important bank in Latvia that had significant external exposure.⁶⁹ In addition there was extensive use of bank loans and overspending of public funds in different areas of governance. In the aftermath of the crisis, the Constitutional Court was flooded with a number of constitutional claims, which have been labelled as ‘crisis cases’. During 2009–2011, the Constitutional Court adopted more than 25 such judgments.⁷⁰ These cases concerned a wide variety of issues, such as the reduction of pensions,⁷¹ indexation of pensions during the crisis,⁷² reduction of benefits for parents of new-born children,⁷³ reduction of food rations for inmates,⁷⁴ the sale of pledged immovable

⁶⁹ For a discussion of the economic crisis and its escalation see Mits 2013 and Aslund and Dombrovskis 2011. On the role of the bankruptcy of a major systemic bank in Latvia with significant external exposure as a reason facilitating economic crisis, see http://www.reverta.lv/files/PDF%20finansu/2008_parskats/2008_5_lv.pdf.

⁷⁰ See n. 69. During that time, the financial deficit of the consolidated state budget reached 643 million EUR or approximately 3.5% of the Gross Domestic Product, and the prognosis was that the deficit might reach 1.8 billion EUR or approximately 9.5% of the Gross Domestic Product by the end of 2009. As a consequence, both the performance of the functions of the state and the possibility of economic recovery in the foreseeable future were put at risk. The state was compelled to turn to international institutions in order to obtain loans for the stabilisation of the economic situation and the financial system of the Republic of Latvia. The loans were conditional on a reduction of state budget expenditures by more than 700 million EUR. Consequently, the budget for the year 2009 had to be modified, reducing expenditures in this amount. Other alternatives for cutting expenditure, such as devaluation of the national currency, were regarded as unacceptable. With the adoption of the impugned provisions, the planned social insurance special budget for the year 2009 was more than 88 million LVL.

⁷¹ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009. See also Case No. 2009-76-01 of 31 March 2010, Case No. 2009-88-01 of 15 April 2010, and Case No. 2009-86-01 of 21 April 2010. See also Judgment in Case No. 2010-29-01 of 18 February 2011.

⁷² Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-08-01 of 26 November 2009.

⁷³ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-44-01 of 15 March 2010.

⁷⁴ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-69-03 of 9 March 2010.

property at auction,⁷⁵ state aid to producers of bio-fuels,⁷⁶ review of compensation in cases of invalidity,⁷⁷ reduction of subsistence benefits for children,⁷⁸ introduction of a capital gains tax for deposits in banks and private pension funds,⁷⁹ reduction of compensation for workers in cases of insolvency,⁸⁰ support for credit institutions in cases of crisis⁸¹ and the reduction of judges' remuneration.⁸² To summarise, most of the cases related to the reduction of payments from the state budget, and problems triggered by the crisis related to differences in the formerly applicable rules and the new rules adopted in reaction to the crisis.⁸³

In the context of the 'crisis cases', the Constitutional Court reviewed more than sixty laws adopted by the Saeima or regulations adopted by the Cabinet of Ministers with regard to their compliance with the Constitution. However, only 40% were declared unconstitutional. This is the same percentage as, for instance, during 2011–2015.⁸⁴ This can be explained by the fact that in crisis situations, the legislature and executive are given more freedom of action in relation to measures which aim to stabilise the financial situation. The overall aim of such measures is to ensure the well-being of the society at large. Even in the cases in which a regulation was declared unconstitutional, the Court gave the legislature a considerable time limit to remedy the situation, considering the financial consequences of its rulings. For instance, in Case No. 2009-43-01, it was acknowledged that withheld pensions should be compensated for within five and a half years after the adoption of the judgment.⁸⁵ In Case No. 2010-12-03, it was established that producers of bio-fuels should receive compensation within four years after adoption of the judgment.⁸⁶

At the same time it should be mentioned that the financial consequences of some of the judgments were important for the state budget.⁸⁷

⁷⁵ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-08-01 of 24 November 2010.

⁷⁶ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-12-03 of 27 October 2010.

⁷⁷ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-17-01 of 29 October 2010.

⁷⁸ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-18-01 of 10 January 2011.

⁷⁹ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-59-01 of 13 April 2011.

⁸⁰ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-69-01 of 10 June 2011.

⁸¹ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-71-01 of 19 October 2011 and Case No. 2010-60-01 of 30 March 2011.

⁸² For instance Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-11-01 of 18 January 2010 and Case No. 2009-111-01 of 22 June 2010.

⁸³ Skudra 2010, pp. 41–43.

⁸⁴ As of 20 December 2011, the Court has reviewed 82 norms in 50 cases. Of these norms, 32 were declared unconstitutional (39%).

⁸⁵ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009, para. 35.3. See Sect. 2.6.

⁸⁶ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-12-03 of 27 October 2010, para. 17.

⁸⁷ For instance, to apply the Judgment in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009, approximately 105 million EUR were required from the state budget. See <http://www.apollo.lv/zinas/saeima-nolemj-ietureto-pensiju-dalu-atmaksat-aprili/440829>. This constituted about 2% of the income planned for the 2010 budget.

Pensions cases One case that should be described in detail is the leading case on the reduction of pensions, which was linked to issues of global and EU financial governance. The petitions in this case affected a very large segment of the population. These cases also stood out due to the interpretation of the Court regarding the justiciability of economic and social rights, and decisions on international loans.⁸⁸ The case was prompted by the Law on Disbursement of State Pensions and State Allowances in the Period 2009–2012. According to the Law, the total amount of payments to be paid out to pensioners had to be cut by 10%, which resulted in a notable 70% cut in the payments to pensioners who continued to work.⁸⁹ The Constitutional Court dealt with the constitutionality of the law in the light of Arts. 1 (democracy and legitimate expectations), 91 (principle of equality), 105 (property rights) and 109 (social security rights) of the Satversme.⁹⁰ The main question was to what extent the contested provisions fell within the scope of Art. 109 of the Satversme and its social guarantees. Article 109 of the Constitution provides that '[e]veryone has the right to social security in old age, for work disability, for unemployment and in other cases as provided by law'. The Court noted that the principles derived from Art. 1, i.e., legitimate expectations and proportionality, might have a different meaning depending on the area of regulation. This might limit the control exercised by the Constitutional Court and the freedom of action exercised by the Saeima.⁹¹ The same applies in relation to Art. 91, with regard to which the Constitutional Court has repeatedly stated that when ascertaining whether any legal provision of the Law on State Pensions contradicts the principle of equality, one has to take into account the area that the impugned provision falls into. The principle of equality usually applies along with other fundamental rights, especially because often a case cannot be adjudicated on the basis of this principle alone. The rights established in Art. 91 of the Constitution are 'relative'. Namely, although they stipulate equal treatment, they do not reveal the nature of such treatment.⁹²

Although the Constitutional Court has stated that the right to receive a pension is deemed a property right, when determining whether a legal provision complies with Art. 105, one has to take into account whether the case falls rather into the area of social rights (Art. 109). In cases involving social rights, Art. 105 does not offer the same protection as in cases involving the restriction of property rights in their 'classic' sense.⁹³ The Constitutional Court acknowledged that a wide freedom of ⁸⁸ Mits 2013, pp. 13 and 11–53. See also Sects. 2.7 and 3.5.

⁸⁹ Article 9 of the Disbursement Law obliged the Cabinet of Ministers to reconsider the validity of the disbursement restrictions stipulated by this law twice a year and to submit to the Saeima either a report concerning the continuation of the restrictions, or, in the case of need, a draft law concerning their full or partial revocation accordingly.

⁹⁰ See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009.

⁹¹ See for instance Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2006-04-01 of 8 November 2006, paras. 15.2 and 15.3.

⁹² Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2005-08-01 of 11 November 2005, paras. 5 and 6.1 and Judgment in Case No. 2006-04-01 of 8 November 2006, para. 15.

⁹³ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2007-01-01 of 8 June 2007, paras. 20 and 21.

action should be granted to the state in respect of property rights in the area of social rights. The Constitution does not guarantee a specific amount of pension. However, Art. 109 of the Constitution provides for more guarantees in the social field.⁹⁴

The Court referred to the international commitments of Latvia.⁹⁵ Among others, the Court referred to Art. 9 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights⁹⁶ and the ECHR.⁹⁷ It concluded that the reduction of the pension disbursement amount prescribed by the impugned legal provisions had to be considered in the context of the principles derived from Art. 1 of the Satversme and Protocol 1, Art. 1 of the ECHR, taking into account both the protection of property rights and the Latvian pension system.

The methodology applied by the Court was the same as applied to determine the validity of restrictions of civil and political rights: the restriction must be determined by law, pursue a legitimate aim and must comply with the principle of proportionality.⁹⁸

At the same time, the Constitutional Court acknowledged that the political dimension of decisions taken by the state concerning the enactment of social rights is usually significant. Decisions in this area are made not so much following legal considerations as political ones.⁹⁹ In the area of social rights, it is not always possible to draw an exact dividing line between legal and political considerations, and the Constitutional Court should refrain from judging political matters, for this is primarily the area of authority of a democratically legitimated legislator.⁹⁹

The Court acknowledged that on the one hand, the implementation of fundamental rights depends on the resources at the disposal of the state and society. The state should be allowed wide freedom of action when deciding matters relating to ⁹⁴ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2007-03-01 of 18 October 2007, para. 11. Article 89 of the Constitution, stating that the State shall recognise and protect fundamental human rights in accordance with the Constitution and international agreements binding upon Latvia. This article clearly shows the constitutional legislator's intention to harmonise the constitutional provisions concerning human rights with the international regulation of human rights; Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2007-24-01 of 9 May 2008, para. 11.

⁹⁵ UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment No. 19. The right to social security, E/C.12/GC/19 4 February 2008, para. 11. Limburg Principles on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, U.N. Commission on Human Rights, U.N. ESCOR, 43d Sess., U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1987/17. Even if a country has a substantial deficiency of financial resources, it is obliged to protect the weakest members of the society (see UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment No.3). The nature of States parties obligations, E/1991/23 14 December 1990, para. 12; UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, General Comment No. 6. The economic, social and cultural rights of older persons, E/1996/22 8 December 1995, para. 17.

⁹⁶ The ECtHR adjudicates on matters pertaining to social security and social assistance in the light of property rights as they are interpreted in Protocol 1, Art. 1 of the Convention. See ECtHR Judgment in Stec and Others v. the United Kingdom [GC], nos. 65731/01 and 65900/01, § 51, ECHR 2006-VI; and Moskal v. Poland, no. 10373/05, § 61, 15 September 2009.

⁹⁷ Mits 2013, p. 19.

⁹⁸ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2006-04-01 of 8 November 2006, para. 16.

⁹⁹ Ibid.

social rights. In certain cases, an economic crisis can develop to the point where freedom of action must be granted to the legislator to enable the implementation of remedial measures – even if the latter might infringe on the fundamental rights established by the Satversme.¹⁰⁰ The impugned provisions were adopted in circumstances of rapid economic decline in Latvia. State budget revenues were decreasing and unemployment was growing, bringing about an increase in social insurance expenditure. In the second quarter of 2009, Latvia underwent the most rapid economic decline in the European Union.¹⁰¹ The austerity measures hit many sectors, and public expenditure was cut by 25%, including wages in the public sector. Latvia had to borrow some 7.5 billion EUR.

However, on the other hand, the state is not entitled to refuse to enact measures to protect the core rights related to social protection in the Constitution. In this case the rights are not just declaratory, and their protection has a constitutional value in Latvia.¹⁰² The Constitutional Court pointed out that even if the state reduces the pension disbursement amounts for a period of time in a situation of rapid economic recession, there is still a definite body of fundamental rights from which the state cannot derogate. In this context, it is essential to determine whether the substance of the right of pension recipients to social security has been infringed.¹⁰³ In its judgments, the Constitutional Court has repeatedly adjudicated the constitutional compliance of legal provisions pertaining to social rights, affirming that the state is responsible for the system of social and economic protection and its

¹⁰⁰ In this context, the Court referred to the concurring opinion of judge Thomassen in Kjartan Ásmundsson v. Iceland, no. 60669/00, ECHR 2004-IX.

¹⁰¹ Thus, for instance, the revenues of the consolidated state budget during the first six months of 2009 were 15% lower than those of the same time period in 2008. The Ministry of Welfare indicated that the actual expenditures of the social insurance special budget were approximately 122 million EUR higher than revenues during the first six months of 2009. At the same time, the rapid increase of wages during the preceding years had brought about an increase in the expenditures of the social insurance special budget. At the same time, the expenditures of the consolidated state budget during the first six months of 2009 were 7.2% higher than those of the same time period in 2008. The drop in the Gross Domestic Product in comparison with the first six months of 2008 was 18.7%. Concerning the need to balance the revenues and expenditures of the social security system, the Saeima indicated that, as a result of the economic crisis, wages had decreased and unemployment increased. Consequently, the social insurance special budget revenues dropped. The number of socially insured persons had also decreased by 12.3%. The drop in revenues persisted also in the third quarter of 2009, reaching 18.4%. See <http://www.csb.gov.lv/csp/content/?cat=244>. The projected amount of the Government's external debt for the second half of 2009 was approximately 33.2% of the Gross Domestic Product, and it had increased by approximately 70% over 2008, see http://ec.europa.eu/economy_finance/pdf/2009/autumnforecasts/lv_en.pdf. See also Sect. 2.7.

¹⁰² Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2000-08-0109 of 13 March 2001.

¹⁰³ See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009, para. 31, and ECtHR Judgment in Kjartan Ásmundsson v. Iceland, supra n. 100, para. 39. See also notes 73–75.

maintenance.¹⁰⁴ When altering the social security system, the legislator is bound by constitutional guarantees. The Court noted that the haste in the preparation and adoption of the impugned provisions, as well as the fact that the public had not been duly and timely informed prior to the adoption of these provisions, should be viewed negatively.¹⁰⁵

The Constitutional Court held that a pension disbursement reduction can have a legitimate end – to solve financial problems in the social budget. There is a need to preclude a deficit in the state pension budget as well as a need to ensure that pension disbursements continue in the future.¹⁰⁶ The Court noted that the sustainability of the pension system is closely related to the overall economic situation in the state. Thus, in circumstances of major economic recession, the legislator should act as swiftly, concertedly and decidedly as possible. However, the economic situation in the state, or the need to reduce the budget deficit, in the absence of other legitimate ends, cannot serve as an overarching justification for the state to restrict rights that have previously been granted.¹⁰⁷ Therefore, the task of the Court was to determine whether the impugned provisions were reasonable and brought about a short-term or long-term satisfaction of needs as well as whether the provisions in question were transparent and had been made public.¹⁰⁸

The Saeima and the Cabinet of Ministers repeatedly referred to the liabilities to international creditors as one of the reasons for the adoption of measures to reduce pensions. On 19 December 2008, a Stand-By Agreement was made between Latvia and the IMF. On 20 January 2009, a Memorandum of Understanding between the EU and Latvia was concluded, which was followed by a Loan Agreement between the EU, Latvia and the Bank of Latvia.¹⁰⁹ However, the information presented to the Court was contradictory on the question of to what extent international creditors had specifically asked for pensions to be cut.¹¹⁰

¹⁰⁴ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2001-11-0106 of 25 February 2002, para. 1 and Case No. 2005-19-01 of 22 December 2005, para. 9.

¹⁰⁵ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-08-01 of 26 November 2009, para. 17.2.

¹⁰⁶ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2001-12-01 of 19 March 2002, para. 2. Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2005-08-01 of 11 November 2005, para. 8 and Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009, para. 27.2.

¹⁰⁷ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009, para. 27.2. The decrease of budget expenditures reached by means of the impugned provisions was approximately 17.4% or one-sixth of the total reduction of the consolidated state budget.

¹⁰⁸ Ibid., para. 29.2. See also Langa 2009, p. 33.

¹⁰⁹ See also Mits 2013, pp. 14–15.

¹¹⁰ See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009, para. 30.2.2. The Ministry of Welfare explained that the Disbursement Law Draft had to be drawn up in a limited period of time, and it was not possible to consider alternatives due to a lack of time. The Cabinet of Ministers, in turn, explained that debates concerning the required reduction of the state budget of over 700 million EUR were extremely difficult. Other alternatives to the reduction of pensions were considered in these debates. Yet, as a result, an agreement was reached only with regard to one specific solution. Moreover, it would not be rational to discuss other solutions during

The Constitutional Court established that the original documents related to the receipt of the international loans did not contain information that could be associated with a requirement to adopt the impugned provisions.¹¹¹ Although the international creditors prescribed the main goals to be achieved by the state, the choices of the most suitable and appropriate means for attainment of these objectives were left to the state's own discretion. Moreover, the obligations undertaken by the Government with respect to the international creditors as such did not justify the adoption of provisions in breach of fundamental rights.

The Court noted that the budget deficit was associated with excessively generous parental allowances and inappropriately regulated sickness benefits (leading to overcompensation in some cases). Moreover, there had been an outflow of large amounts of social security funds to social groups that cannot be deemed as disadvantaged or low-income.

The Court did not discuss the nature of the Stand-By Arrangement and Memorandum of Understanding and avoided qualifying them as international treaties. It rather focused on the constitutional division of powers.¹¹²

In relation to the competence to conclude agreements on state loans, the Court noted:

[The] principle of separation of powers delimits the authority of the Cabinet of Ministers. In accordance with this principle, the Constitution confers the lawmaking powers – namely, the powers to decide the most important matters for the state – to the Saeima in particular, and, in individual cases, to citizens of the Republic of Latvia. ... Although the Cabinet of Ministers is entitled to adopt regulatory enactments, the latter are not permitted to contain such provisions that cannot be deemed as aids for the implementation of the provisions of the law.¹¹³

Thus, the Saeima is obliged to decide all the most important matters of the State and public life by itself through legislation. Furthermore, the first part of Article 68 of the Constitution prescribes that all international agreements, which settle matters that may be decided by the legislative process, shall require ratification by the Saeima.¹¹⁴ the drafting of the Disbursement Law also because the budget deficit reduction had to be settled immediately. However, the Court established that other alternatives existed. See n. 98.

¹¹¹ See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in the Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009 para. 30.1. At the same time, in para. 7.2 of the Supplementary Memorandum of Understanding between the European Community and the Republic of Latvia of 13 July 2009, Latvia pledged to reduce the pension expenditure by 10% for non-employed pensioners and by 70% for employed pensioners. With reference to the commitment between the IMF and the Republic of Latvia, the same pledge was included in the Economic Stabilisation and Growth Revival Programme for Latvia adopted by the Saeima on 16 June 2009 (para. 5.2). No evidence that the specific law was required by the IMF and the EU – for instance, in the negotiation minutes – was submitted to the Constitutional Court.

¹¹² See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009 para. 30.1. See Mits 2013, pp. 28–29 for a more detailed analysis. See also Sects. 3.5 and 3.6 of this report.

¹¹³ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009, para. 30.1.

¹¹⁴ Ibid.

Therefore, according to the Court, the budget is among the most important areas in which the Saeima exercises its parliamentary control over actions of the Government. Other institutions can take decisions that decisively affect the state budget only in the cases provided in the Satversme or if consent is given by the Saeima and the fundamental principles of a democratic state are observed.¹¹⁵

The Constitutional Court recognised that the matters dealt with by the Cabinet of Ministers in order to enter into the respective commitments with the international creditors were sufficiently important for the state and public life to be decided through legislation by the Saeima.¹¹⁶ The Constitutional Court maintained that the fundamental decision to take an international loan and the terms and conditions thereof are to be deemed as an important and significant matter of state and public life, and that, in accordance with the procedure established by the Satversme, they must be decided by the legislator. According to the Court, the Cabinet of Ministers cannot restrict fundamental rights enshrined in Art. 109 of the Constitution by assuming international obligations. The Saeima is still under an obligation to provide authorisation for the Government in matters of such fundamental importance. This authorisation can be given post factum. A decision of the Saeima is only required if an agreement is recognised as an international treaty in the meaning of Art. 68(1) of the Satversme. In other cases the Saeima is free to choose the form of authorisation.¹¹⁷

The Constitutional Court established that neither the Cabinet of Ministers nor the Saeima had conducted an objective and well-weighed analysis regarding the consequences of the adoption of the impugned provisions or regarding other, less restrictive means for the attainment of the legitimate end. The annotation to the Draft of the Disbursement Law also indicates that no consultations with experts ever took place.

This led the Court to conclude that no alternatives were properly considered, for it was simply impossible to draft other adequate proposals in such a short period of time. Similarly, it was impossible to give careful and detailed consideration to such major issues as the potential economic effect and social consequences of these alternative solutions within the space of a few days.¹¹⁸ Consequently, the ¹¹⁵ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2011-11-01 of 3 February 2012, para. 10.

¹¹⁶ See, however, the Letter of the Minister for Justice of the Republic of Latvia to the European Commission, Annex 3 to the Loan Agreement between the European Community and the Republic of Latvia of January 2009. In his letter the Minister formally noted that the commitments entered into by Latvia are taken in accordance with the Satversme. http://ec.europa.eu/latvija/documents/pievienotie_faili/29.01.09.la.doc.

¹¹⁷ Mits 2013, p. 30. This interpretation has been subsequently confirmed by the Saeima. The Court itself remains very general in the judgment about the form of authorisation required, with Mits describing the alternatives that the Saeima can use according to guidelines provided by the Court. These are an announcement indicating the international lenders' restrictions on the amount of the loan and its spending, or a report by the Minister of Finance explaining the provisions of the loan.

¹¹⁸ It is acknowledged in the legal doctrine that delay, unpredictability and inconsistency in the exercise of state power prove that measures carried out and implemented by the state have led to a

Constitutional Court had no grounds to deem the alternative solutions – which lacked the necessary justification and analysis of economic and social consequences – to be sufficiently well-considered alternatives to the impugned provisions.¹¹⁹

The ESM Treaty There was debate whether a referendum was needed for ratification of the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty), in which experts were involved.¹²⁰ The experts concluded that the role of the European Commission had been strengthened but that it had not been accorded new competences and its powers were limited to making recommendations and suggestions. Further, the competences of the CJEU did not exceed those set out in the TEU and TFEU. Experts also concluded that Latvia had already transferred competences to the EU in the area of economic policy upon ratifying the Lisbon Treaty. Moreover, Art. 2 of the ESM Treaty provides that it is applicable in line with EU Treaties.¹²¹ Therefore, the experts found that there were insufficient arguments to conclude that the ESM represents substantive changes in the conditions of Latvia's membership in the EU and, consequently, the Saeima could ratify the Treaty without calling for a referendum. Ultimately, a political compromise was reached with the opposition parties, and the Treaty was ratified according to Art. 68(2) of the Satversme. No further debates have taken place.¹²²

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1–2.8.6 The Constitutional Court has never requested a preliminary ruling from the CJEU. Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court has referred to EU law and the case law of the CJEU often, especially in environmental cases. It can be argued that the position of the Court is that the different systems can overlap and interact, violation of the principle of proportionality – see Harris et al. 2009, p. 676. The ECtHR has also stated that ‘uncertainty – be it legislative, administrative or arising from practices applied by the authorities – is a factor to be taken into account in assessing the State’s conduct. Indeed, where an issue in the general interest is at stake, it is incumbent on the public authorities to act in good time, in an appropriate and consistent manner’ (Broniowski v. Poland [GC], no. 31443/96, § 151, NS 184, ECHR 2004-V).

¹¹⁹ Constitutional Court Judgment in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009. See also the Amendment to the Law on State Pension and State Allowance Disbursement in the Period from 2009 to 2012 adopted on 17 September 2009 and the annotation to this draft law <http://titania.saeima.lv/LIVS/SaeimaLIVS.nsf/0/CDF73564B79BB4E3C225761F004BE61E?OpenDocument>.

¹²⁰ See Opinion of the Council of Independent Experts on International and European Law on the question of the Treaty on stability, co-ordination and management in economic and monetary union from the point of view of EU law and the Satversme, 20 March 2012. Available in Latvian at <http://www.mfa.gov.lv/nep-atzinums%20nr%201-20-mar-2012.pdf>.

¹²¹ It should be noted that the expert analysis was to a large extent similar to the analysis by the CJEU in Case C-370/12 Pringle [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:756.

¹²² See also Sect. 3.5.

without mutual hierarchical subordination.¹²³ On two occasions the Court has verified the necessity to submit a request for a preliminary ruling to the CJEU. In case No. 2008-47-01, the Court acknowledged that the provisions of Directive 2005/60/EC (the Third Money Laundering Directive) are sufficiently clear and there are no doubts about their interpretation (acte clair). In case No. 2010-71-01, the Court concluded that the outcome of the case would not depend on the interpretation of the Directive in question.¹²⁴

However, both the Administrative and Civil Law Departments of the Supreme Court have asked for preliminary rulings on a number of occasions. According to the Ministry of Justice, as of 25 August 2014, Latvian courts have requested 32 preliminary rulings. Most of the cases have concerned the following areas: co-operation in civil matters, customs, Justice and Home Affairs, taxes (including the activities of the State Revenue Service – 16 cases) and social policy. In addition, the Government has intervened in several cases such as the Sugar Saga cases, a case on notaries and cases on EU citizenship.

The general position of the Constitutional Court is that: (a) Latvia should observe its international obligations and (b) Latvia is allowed to offer a higher standard of protection of fundamental rights.

In terms of data regarding constitutional review by the Latvian Constitutional Court, in total 246 judgments have been adopted by the Court from its establishment in 1996 until 21 August 2014. As noted above, about 80% of the case law of the Constitutional Court of Latvia concerns Chapter 8 on fundamental rights. One of the main grounds for review is the right to a fair trial (access to justice) set out in Art. 92 of the Satversme. The constitutionality of a norm in relation to Art. 92 has been reviewed in 48 Constitutional Court judgments as of 21 August 2014. Only Art. 91 (equality and non-discrimination) has served as a basis more frequently, in 81 judgments. The third most frequently invoked ground is Art. 105 (property rights), which has been under consideration in 45 cases. Further, as noted above, in more than one-half of the individual applications that refer to Art. 1, reference has been made to the principle of legitimate expectations in combination with some other fundamental right.

The question remains to what extent the accession of the EU to the ECHR would affect national case law. The precise conditions for the EU's accession to the ECHR remain uncertain, especially in the context of the division of competences between the CJEU and the ECtHR. Therefore, it is difficult to come up with a conclusive answer on whether the governments acting within the EU framework would be under a shield. Moreover, one should also closely follow further developments initiated by the Commission on extensive fundamental rights monitoring in all EU Member States.¹²⁵

¹²³ MacCormick 1993, p. 9.

¹²⁴ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2008-47-01 of 28 May 2009, para. 15.2 and No. 2010-71-01 of 19 November 2011, para. 24.

¹²⁵ European Commission presents a framework to safeguard the rule of law in the European Union, 11 March 2014, IP/14/237. Available at http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-14-237_en.htm.

As argued by Nollkaemper, to the extent that international law becomes part of the European legal order, the application of ‘Europeanised’ rules of international law is no longer only a function of the combination of weak principles of international law and constitutional law, but becomes a matter of EU law proper, notably with a view to its uniform application and interpretation.¹²⁶

This raises doubts whether national courts are the best agents to transpose European values in the domestic legal order. Nollkaemper suggests that a preliminary problem for considering national courts as an institutional force that can help to secure compliance is the fact that these courts are organs of the very critics that they are to control.¹²⁷ Instead, in EU law the primary task for the courts is to ensure compliance, which should be distinguished from implementation and enforcement.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 No further significant issues have arisen in Latvia with regard to constitutional rules and EU law.

With regard to systemic aspects in the protection of fundamental rights and the rule of law in the EU Member States, the following further observations are of relevance. The procedurally limited possibilities to apply Art. 2 TEU and Art. 7 TEU as well as Art. 51 of the Charter of the Fundamental Rights to purely internal situations raises the role of the national courts especially in areas that do not fall within EU competence but where there is a risk of violation of fundamental rights.

The question remains to what extent the EU is entitled to carry out such human rights monitoring. The EU remains procedurally ill-equipped to monitor respect of the fundamental values on which it prides itself on being based.¹²⁸ As argued by Sarooshi, it is true that a state that transfers its powers to an international organisation does not confer its powers in toto on the organisation. The precise degree is difficult to measure.¹²⁹ The difficulty in finding the right balance lies in finding the right relationship between the EU institutions, the CJEU and national constitutional courts.

The comparative studies conducted so far reveal that although the procedural powers, modes of legal reasoning and conceptions of the role of the judiciary in the constitutional system vary, the judiciaries of various EU Member States have so far reacted similarly to the reforms of the EMU, by significantly expanding their powers to review and even to pronounce certain measures as void.¹³⁰ Therefore,

¹²⁶ Nollkaemper 2012, p. 159.

¹²⁷ For a critical assessment see Nollkaemper 2012, pp. 162–168.

¹²⁸ Editorial Comments, ‘Fundamental rights and EU membership: Do as I say, not as I do!’ (2012) CML Rev. 49, 481–488, 487–488.

¹²⁹ Sarooshi 2007, pp. 69 and 120–122.

¹³⁰ Fabbri 2014, pp. 103–104.

there is no risk that the new measures adopted under the intergovernmental approach might affect the competence of national judiciaries.

At the same time, some scholars claim that judicial involvement in the fiscal domain raises a number of constitutional concerns. Federico Fabbri argues that political branches have greater expertise and instrumental capacity than courts to make decisions in fiscal matters. Political process is better able to represent the voice of the people. Although the EU needs to improve its legitimacy and democracy, this requires elaborating the accountability of the EU political process, rather than increasing review and interference by courts.¹³¹

Other authors claim that the crisis which hit the EU was not only financial but, most importantly, it touched upon the functioning principles of the Union as set out in Art. 2 TEU, including the principle of the rule of law. For instance, Cesare Pinelli convincingly argues that the values mentioned in Art. 2 TEU are based on the presumption that they are common to the Member States and constitute the foundation of the EU.¹³² Commentators attribute great importance to weakness in the rule of law for the extent of the economic crisis. Due to endemic corruption, weak institutional capacities or insufficient resources at the administrative or judicial levels, compliance with EU standards is seriously questioned.¹³³ Commentators have addressed the issue of systemic deficiency in the rule of law. Public authorities must act in accordance with constitutional norms, including fundamental rights, and general rules that have been laid down by superior organs, usually a parliament. The deficient rule of domestic law automatically translates into a deficient rule of EU law.¹³⁴ In this context, creating a mechanism for establishing the concept of systemic deficiency neither creates new obligations for the Member States nor expands the EU's field of action.¹³⁵

There have already been a number of proposals tabled for appropriate mechanisms, such as reinvention of the 'Copenhagen Criteria',¹³⁶ and introducing a more comprehensive co-operation and verification mechanism, following the practice of ¹³¹ Ibid., pp. 104–105.

¹³² Pinelli 2012, p. 8.

¹³³ Von Bogdandy and Ioannidis 2014, pp. 59 and 75. See also (2013, October 4) EU seeks greater role in policing national democracies. The Oxford Analytica Daily Brief; and Butler 2012.

¹³⁴ Von Bogdandy and Ioannidis 2014, pp. 63–64.

¹³⁵ See von Bogdandy and Ioannidis 2014, pp. 63–64 and 67, and von Bogdandy et al. 2012, pp. 507–508. In certain cases domestic fundamental rights violations would come within the ambit of Union law. Those would be cases where violations would affect the 'substance of EU citizens' rights', thus depriving the substance of its practical meaning (substance of rights according to C-34/09 Ruiz Zambrano [2011] ECR I-01177).

¹³⁶ See Ralli, E. (2014, January 14). Proposal for a new 'Copenhagen mechanism' to ensure compliance with EU values and accession criteria. New Europe. <http://www.neurope.eu/article/meeps-set-enhance-protection-human-rights>. See European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights, Annual report 2013, 'An EU internal strategic framework for fundamental rights: joining forces to achieve better results', pp. 7–20. http://fra.europa.eu/sites/default/files/annual-report-2013-focus_en.pdf and supra n. 125. For critical remarks on the lack of ongoing human rights monitoring, see Albi 2009, p. 47.

the World Bank and the IMF which make access to their funds contingent upon building more efficient state institutions, and which would be capable of generating confidence in the rule of law.¹³⁷

As noted by Oscar Schachter, the critical fact is that so far, states alone have provided the structures of authority needed to cope with the claims of competing societal groups and to provide the public justice that is essential to social order and responsibility.¹³⁸ In general, there is a deficit of common institutions which could ensure equal protection of the law above the national level. Therefore, there is an inevitable need for multi-issue transnational regulation in the EU.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1–2.10.2 The Constitutional Court has referred to common constitutional traditions on several occasions. For instance, in a case on elections, it referred to the Code of Good Practice in Electoral Matters adopted by the Venice Commission. The notion has further been used to interpret Art. 101 of the Satversme.¹³⁹

The Constitutional Court has also referred to common EU values in environmental cases. For instance, it has stated that:

According to European Union law, obligations of Latvia regarding conservation of the environment are a part of the common responsibility of the Member States, because the nature of Latvia is a part of the common heritage of the entire European Community. Latvia has no legal basis to make alterations to these territories, because this would hinder attainment of the objectives established in the directives of the European Union ...¹⁴⁰

For the purposes of this project it may be noted that the independence of the judiciary is a general principle of law, as all major legal systems appear to formally embrace the principle.¹⁴¹ Respect for this principle is also crucial for ensuring that the principle of the rule of law is preserved at both EU and national level.

It should be noted that there are differences between the constitutional traditions of EU Member States. Even where common terminology is used, the meaning of the terms may be different. Moreover, rulings of the ECtHR have demonstrated that there may be conflicts between national courts and the ECtHR. Therefore, the broad

¹³⁷ Von Bogdandy and Ioannidis 2014, pp. 63–64 and 87–88. Something resembling this is currently provided in the European Financial Stability Facility and the European Stability Mechanism.

¹³⁸ Schachter 1998, pp. 22–23.

¹³⁹ See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-45-01 of 22 February 2010, para. 9. See also http://www.venice.coe.int/webforms/documents/?pdf=CDL-AD\(2002\)023rev-e023rev-e).

¹⁴⁰ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2007-11-03 of 17 January 2008, para. 25.4, with extensive references to CJEU case law in this field.

¹⁴¹ Nollkaemper 2012, p. 167.

concepts enshrined in Art. 2 TEU represent a challenge for the EU in terms of finding exact definitions in the future.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 As noted above in Sect. 2.7, the Constitutional Court has concluded that international norms do not prohibit the establishment of a higher level of protection at the national level.

According to Art. 89 of the Satversme, the state protects human rights in accordance with the Satversme, laws and international treaties binding for Latvia. The Court has concluded that this provision aims at achieving harmony between the provisions of the Satversme and international human rights obligations.¹⁴² The protection offered by the Satversme cannot be lower than that derived from international instruments, as this would violate the principle of the rule of law enshrined in Art. 1 of the Satversme. Therefore, when interpreting the Satversme, a harmonious solution should be sought.¹⁴³ In addition, it should be borne in mind that the Satversme can provide a higher protection of human rights than international human rights instruments.¹⁴⁴

The possibility of conflicts between norms under different regimes is inevitable. The EU Treaties form a special regime in international law, and they are subject to a generally accepted principle that when several norms bear on a single issue, they should, to the extent possible, be interpreted so as to give rise to a single set of compatible obligations.¹⁴⁵ The role of national courts in this context appears to be that of agents of compliance. This is best developed in the so-called transnational legal process theory, which in its explanation of compliance attributes considerable weight to the extent to which international law is incorporated in domestic legislation and given effect in the domestic courts. Apart from EU law, internal focus is particularly present with regard to human rights law.¹⁴⁶

It should also be noted that in certain cases, the EU offers a higher level of protection than national courts or the ECtHR. According to the Treaties, the CJEU

¹⁴² For instance, Judgments of the Constitutional Court in Cases No. 2003-04-01 of 27 June 2003, para. 1; and No. 2004-10-01 of 17 January 2005, para. 7.1.

¹⁴³ Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2004-18-0106 of 13 May 2004, para. 5.

¹⁴⁴ Judgments of the Constitutional Court in Cases No. 2001-06-03 of 22 February 2002, para. 3; and No. 2005-02-01-6 of 14 September 2005, para. 10.

¹⁴⁵ For definitions and groupings of special regimes see Fragmentation of International Law: Difficulties Arising from the Diversification and Expansion of International Law, International Law Commission, 58th session (13 April 2006) UN Doc A/CN.4/L.682, 65-101. and Conclusions of the work of the Study Group on the Fragmentation of International Law: Difficulties arising from the Diversification and Expansion of International Law (2006), UN Doc A/61/10, para. 251.

¹⁴⁶ Nollkaemper 2012, pp. 164–165.

should ensure that it preserves its role as the core guardian ensuring observation of the rule of law in the EU. In this context, for instance cases related to citizenship and immigration show the potential of EU law to address issues in a more efficient way.¹⁴⁷ The same can be said about market-related cases where service providers and companies move across borders.¹⁴⁸

In the context of the protection of fundamental rights, the national context should also be taken into account. For instance, from the Latvian perspective, at least two rulings of the ECtHR have been doubtful due to their insensitivity to the national legal situation. The courts should remain mindful of the specific circumstances of the cases before them from a historical and legal point of view.¹⁴⁹

Therefore, international courts not only face the problem of establishing their standards, but they should remain mindful of national and historical circumstances when evaluating each particular case. This makes the task of identifying common traditions and standards even more difficult.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1–2.12.3 Debates on constitutional values took place recently when the Saeima adopted the Preamble to the Constitution in 2014.¹⁵⁰ Although the Preamble mentions respect for human rights and the rights of minorities, it also emphasises that the Latvian identity has since ancient times been shaped by Latvians and Livs, and includes the Latvian language and human and Christian values. It also mentions freedom, equality, justice, work and family as the foundations of society. Reference to democratic development in Europe is also included.

If it were to happen that serious constitutional rights and values were affected by EU law, the Constitutional Court would have several options to reconcile any infringement of the Satversme with the risk of sanctions under the EU regime. First, the Court could request a preliminary ruling. Secondly, in our view, the Court could remedy the situation by interpretation and thirdly, it could rule that the national provision will lose its force at a future date.

In principle, the recommendation in the Questionnaire to suspend the application of EU measures if important constitutional issues have been identified by a number of constitutional courts, could be supported. However, the mechanism for ¹⁴⁷ The EU citizenship cases are well established, from e.g. Case C-184/99 Grzelczyk [2001] ECR I-06193 to the more recent Case C-34/09 Zambrano [2011] ECR I-01177.

¹⁴⁸ For instance, Case C-341/05 Laval [2007] ECR I-11767.

¹⁴⁹ See also Sect. 2.13. In the Latvian context, see Case of Slivenko v. Latvia [GC], no. 48321/99, ECHR 2003-X and Case of Andrejeva v. Latvia [GC], no. 55707/00, ECHR 2009. For details see Krūma 2014, pp. 392–395.

¹⁵⁰ The debates were reported by the weekly legal journal Jurista Vards, 8 July 2014, and 22 October 2013.

implementation of such a recommendation remains unclear. Moreover, the very existence and competence of the constitutional courts and constitutions vary. If such a recommendation is proposed, it should be focused and limited.

As noted in the results of a project led by Ronald Inglehart, the identification of values requires a detailed analysis which illustrates that people's beliefs play a key role in economic development, the emergence and flourishing of democratic institutions, the rise of gender equality and the extent to which societies have effective government.¹⁵¹ Therefore, if the EU is serious about identifying the content of the common constitutional values, a comprehensive exercise to determine the correct interpretation of the values mentioned in Art. 2 TEU is required.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.4 The question on the overall standard of protection is complex for a number of reasons. As argued by De Witte, the CJEU may decide to privilege the right to property, whereas one or another national court may want to give greater weight to the opposed right to privacy (or vice versa), and it is impossible to decide which of the courts is then offering a higher protection to fundamental rights.¹⁵²

In order to break away from domestic concepts, the best way forward for the Union would be to develop its own sovereign values that would be attached to the exercise of transferred sovereign powers.¹⁵³ In our opinion, the role of the EU should become stronger to ensure that the standard of protection of fundamental rights and the rule of law are not reduced in particular Member States. This has already incited a reaction from different EU institutions, including the CJEU, and academic literature. The focus is on the need to strengthen the EU's ability to intervene in purely internal situations in order to protect fundamental rights.

The most recent crisis situations in 2012 in different EU countries were not limited to the fields of employment or economic policies in general, but also concerned the political systems; social unrest, public protests, anti-migrant initiatives by political parties, decreasing trust in government or neighbouring states and violent expressions of extremist ideology were quite widespread.¹⁵⁴ There are areas in which some Member States have experienced setbacks in human rights

¹⁵¹ See Values Change the World. World Values Survey. <http://www.ifs.se/wp-content/uploads/2012/12/WVS-brochure-web.pdf>.

¹⁵² De Witte 2009, p. 44.

¹⁵³ Sarooshi 2005, p. 74. On the EU value system, see also Nijman and Nollkaemper 2007, p. 346.

¹⁵⁴ European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA), Fundamental rights: challenges and achievements in 2012, Annual Report 2012. Luxembourg 2013, pp. 19–22. See also (2013, October 4) EU seeks greater role in policing national democracies. The Oxford Analytica Daily Brief; and (2013, May 20) Hungary may prompt greater monitoring of democracy in EU. The Oxford Analytica Daily Brief.

protection, such as the controversial treatment of Roma, limitations on media freedom, discrimination of migrants in some of the new Member States, growing radicalism in Europe and the like.¹⁵⁵ Neither the constitutional courts nor any other courts have been able to offer sufficient mechanisms to cope with these systemic problems.

It should also be noted that there are certain rights for which the EU provides much higher protection than the ECtHR. One area which stands out is the right to family reunification and the rights of third country nationals who are long term residents.¹⁵⁶

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1–3.1.4 The rules of the Satversme and the relevant procedures have been explained in Part 1. In addition, the rules on the ratification of international treaties have been spelt out in the Law on International Treaties, while the hierarchy of sources of law is provided for in the Law on Administrative Procedure.

It is commonly thought that one of the key differences between EU law and public international law is that while in public international law the effect of a norm in the national legal order is determined by national law instead of international law, in EU law such effect is a matter of EU law instead of national law.¹⁵⁷

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 The classification of monism and dualism is not of major importance in Latvia. Scholars have rightly classified the Latvian case as de facto monism. The ¹⁵⁵ In relation to Hungary, see Editorial Comments, ‘Fundamental rights and EU membership: Do as I say, not as I do!’ CML Rev. (2012) 49, 481–488, 486. Pinelli 2012, p. 5. In relation to migrant workers see articles in the volume Isin and Saward 2013. Useful information on different human rights violations is also available on the website of the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance, available at http://www.coe.int/t/dgih/monitoring/ecri/activities/countrybycountry_en.asp. In relation to the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism for Bulgaria and Romania, see FRA Annual Report 2012, n. 154, pp. 22–23. See also European Agency for Fundamental Rights (2013) Racism, intolerance, discrimination: learning from experiences in Hungary and Greece, FRA Thematic Situation Report. <http://fra.europa.eu/en/publication/2013/racism-discrimination-intolerance-and-extremism-learning-experiences-greece-and>. See also Nielsen, N.J. (2014, January 15) Radicalism on the rise in Europe, EU commissioner says. EU Observer. <http://euobserver.com/justice/122735>.

¹⁵⁶ See for instance, Biao v. Denmark, no. 38590/10, 25 March (appealed to the Grand Chamber).

¹⁵⁷ Nollkaemper 2012, p. 168.

Satversme does not deal with issues of hierarchy. Domestic laws refer to situations of collision between international and national law, but judges tend to prefer to apply international law.¹⁵⁸

It should be noted that the general approach adopted by the Constitutional Court is one of consistent interpretation. The practice of consistent interpretation has great potential to secure compliance with European and international obligations.¹⁵⁹

The Latvian Constitutional Court supports the principle that national law should be interpreted in line with Latvia's international obligations. This also corresponds to the requirements of international law. In certain cases the Constitutional Court has recognised the direct effect of norms of international law.¹⁶⁰ The Court has stated that the text of the ECHR and the practice of ECtHR serve as means of interpretation on the level of constitutional law to determine the content and the scope of fundamental rights and the principle of the rule of law.¹⁶¹ The Court further has directly applied the International Convention on Elimination of Racial Discrimination, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

As argued by Nollkaemper, it appears that there remain fundamental differences between EU law and international law with respect to the principles that underlie the compliance-inducing role of national courts. The principles of EU law, with regard to supremacy, direct effect, consistent interpretation and state liability are more developed, more powerful and more embedded in national law.¹⁶² In this context, the EU has strengthened international law by proclaiming that its rules are binding for the EU.¹⁶³ Therefore, even if the Member States have been reserved in the application of international law, the EU is bringing international law into its scope of application. In this context, as Nollkaemper argues, international law becomes Europeanised.

The provisions of treaties and decisions of international organisations that are part of the legal order of the EU can acquire direct effect as defined by EU law, not international law. However, treaties are not entirely equated to internal EU rules, and the principle of direct effect as it applies to treaties is not identical to the principle as it applies to internal rules.¹⁶⁴ The CJEU itself has proclaimed that EU law should be interpreted in conformity with international law.¹⁶⁵

¹⁵⁸ Mits 2006, p. 429.

¹⁵⁹ Nollkaemper 2012, p. 180.

¹⁶⁰ See Case No. 2004-18-0106 of 13 May 2005, para. 5. See also Nollkaemper 2012, pp. 178–179.

¹⁶¹ See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2000-03-01 of 30 August 2000, para. 5 and Case No. 2001-08-01 of 17 January 2002, para. 3.

¹⁶² Nollkaemper 2012, p. 188.

¹⁶³ See Case C-286/90 Ankjagemyndigheden v. Poulsen and Diva Navigation [1992] ECR I-06019.

¹⁶⁴ Nollkaemper 2012, pp. 190–191. See also Case C-300/98 Dior and Others [2000] ECR I-11307, Case C-308/06 Intertanko and Others, [2008] ECR I-04057.

¹⁶⁵ Case 286/90 Ankjagemyndigheden v. Poulsen and Diva Navigation, supra n. 163.

It has been noted that ‘the cause of the weak position of general international law is a very significant diversity in the practices of states’.¹⁶⁶ This raises the question not only of the compatibility of national law with international and EU law, but also to what extent national law is capable of accommodating modern day realities, including the need of individuals to move and reside across borders.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1–3.3.2 According to the Satversme, referendums on international treaties are not allowed. The role of the Saeima is important; however, in practice the executive branch has more competence and knowledge. The position of the Constitutional Court is cautious, depending on the case at stake.¹⁶⁷

The question remains as to the form in which the delegation of powers takes place. In this context, there is a difference to be drawn between the inter-governmental and Community/Union methods. Under the first, national institutions still preserve substantive competence to authorise ratification.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 There have been no cases in which the Latvian courts have reviewed international measures directly. However, there have been cases where either the Constitutional Court or the legal doctrine have disagreed with the rulings of international bodies because they failed to respect national particularities.¹⁶⁸

The Latvian Constitutional Court took the lead in ensuring a smooth accession and the interpretation of national law in accordance with EU law already before accession. Art. 32(3) of the Law on the Constitutional Court provides that a contested norm loses its force upon adoption of a ruling declaring the norm to be unconstitutional. The law also allows the Court to decide on the moment at which the norm will lose its force, for which reasons must be provided. The Court has pronounced that it should ensure that its rulings bring about legal stability and clarity.¹⁶⁹ This specifically applies in cases involving substantive financial resources.¹⁷⁰

¹⁶⁶ Nollkaemper 2012, p. 194.

¹⁶⁷ See, for instance, Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2008-35-01 of 7 April 2009, available at http://www.satv.tiesa.gov.lv/upload/spriedums-2008-35-01_ENG.pdf.

¹⁶⁸ See for instance Slivenko v. Latvia, supra n. 149, and Andrejeva v. Latvia, supra n. 149. See also Communication No. 1621/2007, Raihman v. Latvia, CCPR/C/100/D/1621/2007, 30 November 2010.

¹⁶⁹ See Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2009-43-01 of 21 December 2009, para. 35.1. and Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2002-04-03 of 22 October 2002, para. 3.

¹⁷⁰ For instance, Judgment of the Constitutional Court in Case No. 2010-44-01 of 20 December 2010, para. 17, Case No. 2012-22-0103 of 27 June 2013, para. 19.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 The Latvian austerity programme can be considered an IMF success story. During the peak of economic growth in 2005–2008, the Government had taken a number of decisions to the detriment of long-term economic development. Even during the economic crisis, certain important structural reforms were not implemented, e.g. in the education, health, tax and other sectors. During the time of the crisis in 2008–2011, the IMF and the European Commission helped Latvia overcome the most immediate economic problems.¹⁷¹ It should also be noted that international organisations gave Latvia a timely warning that its economic policies would raise the risk of poverty in Latvia and called for this problem to be dealt with as soon as possible.¹⁷²

The main reason why the Constitutional Court questioned the IMF negotiation records, which was explored in greater detail in Sect. 2.7, was not because it was concerned about a lack of transparency on the IMF side, but rather because there was a lack of objective information from the Government on the scale of the crisis.

The Court referred to a number of studies which had indicated that there were shortcomings in the planning of state finances. The Court noted that several organisations had assessed the risk of poverty for the residents of Latvia.¹⁷³ Even during the time of economic growth, the funds allocated to social protection services were relatively scant in Latvia. Notably, the poverty risk among elderly people increased even during the time of economic growth.¹⁷⁴ However, the Court's mandate did not allow for it to intervene or to revise the macroeconomic approach and budget formation.

Thus, it has rightly been noted that the root causes of the crisis lay in unsustainable public finances. One of the main reforms adopted by both the Member States and the EU institutions since 2009 has been the introduction of tighter budgetary constraints. This approach was adopted already in the Stability and Growth Pact of 1997. The eruption of the euro crisis and the complex interconnection between sovereigns and banks revealed that it was easier on paper than in reality to let a country of the eurozone default without this producing a systemic

¹⁷¹ It should be noted, however, that the economy started to grow from 2010, but the EU and the IMF finalised their supervision only in 2014.

¹⁷² On the timely signals from the World Bank see http://www-wds.worldbank.org/external/default/WDSContentServer/WDSP/IB/2007/04/12/000020439_20070412105345/Rendered/PDF/384370LV.pdf. On IMF warnings earlier in 2012 see (2012, February 15) More people at risk of poverty – IMF report. The Baltic Times. <http://www.baltictimes.com/news/articles/30601/>.

¹⁷³ For example, Eurostat data of poverty risk groups due to old age for the year 2007 show that approximately 33% of persons over 65 are in the poverty risk group. See http://ec.europa.eu/employment_social/spsi/docs/social_inclusion/data_overarching_en.xls.

¹⁷⁴ Survey of European Union Statistics on Income and Living Conditions (EU-SILC). <http://www.csbl.lv/csp/content/?cat=471&id=5762>. See also Europe in Figures, Eurostat yearbook 2009, p. 256; Inequality of income distribution. <http://epp.eurostat.ec.europa.eu/tgm/table.do?tab=table&init=1&plugin=1&language=en&pcode=tsdsc260>.

effect on the stability of the eurozone as a whole. Hence, the EU institutions and the Member States endowed themselves with new mechanisms to face this challenge.¹⁷⁵ It should also be noted that the new mechanisms are based in the so-called intergovernmental rather than Community method, and the European Stability Mechanism is modelled on the International Monetary Fund. Thus, the inter-governmental approach has shown that the IMF model is suitable for controlling budget planning by the Member States.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 No major issues beyond those discussed in other parts of the report have arisen in Latvia.

4 Concluding Remarks

Human rights, including the rights of EU citizens, form an increasingly significant element of the EU's legal architecture. Article 2 of the TEU proclaims that the EU is founded on the common values of the Member States, i.e. respect for human dignity, freedom, democracy, equality, rule of law and respect for human rights, including minority rights. This was further strengthened by the Charter of Fundamental Rights becoming an integral part of the EU Treaties.

The fact that either part of the sovereignty or part of the national competences of the Member States has been delegated to the EU is a truism. However, this has not yet been confirmed by all of the Member States' constitutions and there is also no answer as to what consequences this has for the institutions which claim to have acquired these competences. The search for a definition of democracy at the EU level is not a new endeavour.¹⁷⁶ The need for a re-definition of supranational democracy has also been highlighted by legal scholars. For instance, the dynamics of the EU suggest that nationalism could gradually be replaced by so-called constitutional patriotism as suggested by Habermas. This entails the facilitation of solidarity between strangers. Values rooted in culture and history on the one hand, and judicial and political values on the other, should be set in balance. The procedural order in the EU should remain neutral to national identity and morality. Habermas rightly considers that a European constitutional patriotism could grow out of the constitutional principles and traditions stemming from the European level.¹⁷⁷

¹⁷⁵ Fabbrini 2014, pp. 68, 70–71 and 104.

¹⁷⁶ For instance, Fossum and Eriksen have offered three models, i.e. delegated democracy, federal democracy or cosmopolitan democracy. See Krüma 2009, p. 145.

Yet another direction of research has been highlighting the growing need to facilitate rules on the responsibility of international organisations. As argued in The Economist:

Some Europeans would like to put up carefully designed fences around the EU's still vast wealthy market. Others, including a growing number of populist politicians, want to turn their nations inward and shut out not just the world but also the elites' project of European integration. And a few – from among those same elites, mostly – argue that the only means of paying for Europe's distinctive way of life is not to evade globalisation but to embrace it wholeheartedly.¹⁷⁸

Discussion is warranted whether the level of national constitutions is really best suited for bearing responsibility for the actions of international organisations because the states have created them and provided them with the relevant powers. Therefore, this raises the question whether the primary focus should be on the effectiveness of national constitutions or the potential of international mechanisms.

In this context the framing of the questions is important. Are we discussing the 'erosion' of constitutionalism and 'waning' constitutionalism? Or are we rather embarking on the process of re-defining the meaning of sovereignty and democracy in a supranational or transnational context? The way in which the question is posed might change the perspective for providing answers.

Community law is 'successful international law, and ... is thus a possible horizon of international law, indicating the route that international law must follow if it is to move forward'.¹⁷⁹ The need for comprehensive monitoring of the human rights situation has been advocated since the beginning of 2000.¹⁸⁰

The EU's Fundamental Rights Agency has correctly noted:

Moreover, the political situation in the different EU Member States can no longer be seen as decoupled from that of their neighbouring states and the EU as a whole. Member States and the EU consist of an interdependent, semi-constitutional construction. In a system where judgments are handed down in one Member State but can automatically be executed in another, where asylum seekers are sent from state A to have their asylum procedure done in state B, or where persons are arrested in one Member State on the basis of an arrest warrant issued in another, the need for a shared set of core values is crucial in allowing all these mechanisms of exchange to be trustworthy. Against this backdrop, major challenges to the principles of democracy or the rule of law in one or more Member States are thus likely to have repercussions on the functioning of the EU as a whole.¹⁸¹

However, the question of the precise mechanisms and divisions of competencies remains. As long as Member States have a mistrust in the EU as an organisation

¹⁷⁷ Habermas 1995, pp. 255–281, as quoted by Guild 2004, p. 69.

¹⁷⁸ (2011, November 12) Starting into the abyss. The Economist, p. 3.

¹⁷⁹ Leben 1998, p. 298 as quoted by Nollkaemper 2012, p. 158.

¹⁸⁰ De Witte 2003.

¹⁸¹ For details see FRA Annual Report 2012, supra n. 154, p. 21.

capable of offering a proper standard of protection of fundamental rights and national agendas prevail over EU objectives, an effective system will not be in place. Therefore, the primary task is to build on mutual trust and respect for commonalities rather than to push forward national agendas. After all, the EU has been created to benefit Europeans rather than to create harm for national democracies and identities. In this sense the EU is better placed to do away with national sentiments which sometimes are deeply rooted in nationalism, local political agendas and an inability to cope with long-needed structural reforms of governmental management in the globalised world.

The Latvian case has illustrated that in certain cases external monitoring is exactly what is needed for a country to succeed in the long term. Local political agendas are not always capable of responding to global challenges in an adequate way. This was the case when Latvia was in the process of joining the EU in relation to the Citizenship Law, Language Law and Education Law, and this had been the case before Latvia had to opt for the austerity measures to fix its financial problems and shortcomings in the rule of law. The courts alone, without external expertise, would not have been capable of solving these problems.

References

- Albi A. (2009) Ironies in Human Rights Protection in the EU: Pre-Accession Conditionality and Post-Accession Conundrums. ELJ 15(1):46–69.
- Aslund A., Dombrovskis V. (2011) How Latvia Came Through the Financial Crisis. Petersen Institute for International Economics, Washington.
- Buka A. (2000) Par iespējamiem grozījumiem mūsu Satversmē (On possible amendments to the Satversme). Jurista Vārds 23:176 et seq.
- Butler I. (2012) The justice scoreboard: An effective mechanism to enforce respect for the rule of law? Open Society Foundation, 13 December 2012, <http://www.opensocietyfoundations.org/voices/justice-scoreboard-effective-mechanism-enforce-respect-rule-law>.
- De Witte B. (2003) The Impact of Enlargement on the Constitution of the European Union. In: Cremona M. (ed.) The Enlargement of the European Union. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 229–238.
- De Witte B. (2009) The Lisbon Treaty and National Constitutions. More or Less Europeanisation? In: Closa Carlos (ed.) The Lisbon Treaty and National Constitutions. Europeanisation and Democratic Implications, ARENA Report No. 3/09, RECON Report No. 9, pp. 25–48.
- Fabbrini F. (2014) The Euro-Crisis and the Courts: Judicial Review and the Political Process in Comparative Perspective. Berkley Journal of International law 32(1):64–105.
- Guild E. (2004) The Legal Elements of European Identity: EU Citizenship and Migration Law. Kluwer Law International, The Hague.
- Habermas J. (1995) Citizenship and National Identity: Some Reflections on the Future of Europe. In: Beiner R. (ed.) Theorising Citizenship. SUNY, New York, pp. 255–281.
- Harris D., O’Boyle M., Warbrick C. (2009) Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 2nd edn. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Isin E., Saward, M., (2013) Enacting European Citizenship. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.

- Krūma K. (2004) Stocktaking of EU Pre-Accession Monitoring Process, Citizenship Issues and Non-citizens in Estonia and Latvia: a Litmus Test for European Union Human Rights Policy. Baltic YIL 4:33–53.
- Krūma K. (2009) Constitutional Courts in the Europeanisation of National Constitutions. In Closa Carlos (ed.) The Lisbon Treaty and National Constitutions. Europeanisation and Democratic Implications, Arena Report No 3/09, RECON Report No.9, pp. 143–166.
- Krūma K. (2014) EU citizenship, Nationality and Migrant Status. An Ongoing challenge. Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Leiden and Boston.
- Langa P. (2009) Taking Dignity Seriously: Judicial Reflections on the Optional Protocol to the ICESCR. Nordic Journal of Human Rights 27(1):29–38.
- Leben C. (1998) Hans Kelsen and the Advancement of International Law. EJIL Vol. 9 (1998):287–305.
- MacCormick N. (1993) Beyond the Sovereign State. MLR 56(1):1–18.
- Mits M. (2006) Internationalisation of Public Law: the Case of Latvia. Revue Européenne de Droit Public 18(1):421–442.
- Mits M. (2010) European Convention on Human Rights in Latvia. Impact on Legal Doctrine and Application of Legal Norms. Media Tryck, Lund University.
- Mits M. (2013) Δικαιώματα του ανθρώπου (Legal benchmarks for lowering social protection in times of austerity. Lessons from Latvia). Επιθεώρηση ατομικών και κοινωνικών δικαιωμάτων (Human rights: Theory of civic and social rights) 57:11–53.
- Melkis E. (2000) Latvijas Republikas Satversme un Eiropas Savienība (The Satversme of the Republic of Latvia and the European Union). Likums un Tiesibas, 6:165–167.
- Nijman J., Nollkaemper A. (2007) Beyond the Divide. In: Nijman J., Nollkaemper A. (eds.) New Perspectives on the Divide Between National and International Law. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 341–360.
- Nollkaemper A. (2012) The Role of National Courts in Inducing Compliance with International and European Law – a Comparison. In: Cremona M. (ed.) Compliance and the Enforcement of EU Law. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 157–194.
- Pinelli C. (2012) Protecting the Fundamentals: Article 7 of the Treaty on the European Union and Beyond. Foundation for European Progressive Studies. <http://www.feps-europe.eu/assets/9a4619cf-1a01-4f96-8e27-f33b65337a9b/protecting%20the%20fundamentals.pdf>.
- Piqani D. (2012) The Role of National Constitutional Courts in Issues of Compliance. In: Marise C. (ed.) Compliance and the Enforcement of EU Law. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 132–156.
- Plaksins E. (2013) Eiropas Cilvektiesibu tiesas un Latvijas tiesu mijiedarbības aktualitātes (The importance of mutual co-operation between the European Court of Justice and National Courts). Bulletin of the Supreme Court 7:39–44.
- Pleps J. (2003) Kāds ir konstitucionālais pamats mūsu dalībai Eiropas Savienībā (What are the constitutional bases for EU membership). Jurista Vārds 23 (281), 24 (282), pp. 8–11.
- Sarooshi D. (2007) International Organizations and their Exercise of Sovereign Powers. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Schachter O. (1998), The Decline of the Nation-State and its Implications for International Law. Colum. J. Transnat'L. 36 (7) A:7–23.
- Skudra V. (2010) Par skats par Satversmes tiesas darbu starpkonferencu laika – 2009. un 2010. gada (Overview of the work of the Constitutional Court between the conferences in 2009 and 2010). Paper presented at the conference on ‘Principle of Legitimate Expectations in the Case Law of the Constitutional Court’, Daugavpils, Latvia, 10 September 2010.
- Von Bogdandy A., Ioannidis M. (2014) Systemic Deficiency in the Rule of Law: What it is, What has been done, What can be done. CMLR 51:59–96.

Von Bogdandy A., Kottmann M., Antpöhler C., Dickschen J., Hentrei S., Smrkolj M. (2012) Reverse Solange – Protecting the Essence of Fundamental Rights Against EU Member States. CMLR 49:489–520.

Ziemele I. (2004) Atsevišķu Latvijas Republikas Satvers grozījumu nepieciešamības pamatojums sakārā ar Eiropas Savienības tiesību integrāciju Latvijas tiesību sistēmā (Reasons for the need for certain amendments to the Satversme of the Republic of Latvia in view of the integration of EU law in the Latvian legal system). Likums un Tiesības 6(3):69–70.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitutional Experience of Lithuania in the Context of European and Global Governance Challenges

Irmantas Jarukaitis and Gintaras Švedas

Abstract The Lithuanian Constitution (1992) is described in the report as a typical revolutionary constitution, adopted after the collapse of a totalitarian regime. The Constitutional Court (CC) is a strong player both in terms of the protection of fundamental rights and as an arbitrator in political disputes. The report observes that due to their bitter historical struggle for statehood, Lithuanians have generally treated membership in the EU as a fundamental geopolitical choice. From this perspective, the Constitution is unique, as it was – in a self-standing constitutional act – extensively opened to the EU, whilst another constitutional act prohibits joining any union based on the former USSR. The CC has held that the Constitution establishes a constitutional imperative of EU and NATO membership. By and large, no critical constitutional debates have arisen in relation to EU and transnational law. Some exceptions include an (unsuccessful) request to hold a referendum on the adoption of the euro on the ground that the nature of the EMU had been changed by the ESM Treaty due to the extensive financial liabilities it might entail. The report notes that these discussions were overshadowed by events in Ukraine and geopolitical security concerns. The report also observes a lack of real discussion both in academia and in the public discourse concerning various issues decided at the EU

Irmantas Jarukaitis is Judge at the Court of Justice of the European Union; at the time of writing, Vice-President, Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania, and Associate Professor at the Faculty of Law, University of Vilnius. e-mail: Irmantas.Jarukaitis@curia.europa.eu.

Gintaras Švedas is Professor and Vice-Dean of the Faculty of Law, University of Vilnius. e-mail: gintaras.svedas@tf.vu.lt.

Irmantas Jarukaitis wrote Sects. 1.1.1–2.2.1 and 2.4.1–3.5.2. Gintaras Švedas wrote Sects. 2.3.1.1–2.3.6.

All websites accessed 12 November 2015. Text submitted 23 April 2015.

I. Jarukaitis (✉)

Court of Justice of the European Union, Luxembourg, Luxembourg
e-mail: Irmantas.Jarukaitis@curia.europa.eu

I. Jarukaitis · G. Švedas

University of Vilnius, Vilnius, Lithuania
e-mail: gintaras.svedas@tf.vu.lt level, which later have had a profound impact upon implementation at the national level (e.g. the Data Retention Directive), and calls for stimulating such discussion.

Keywords The Constitution of Lithuania • EU amendments in the Constitution
The Lithuanian Constitutional Court • Referendum • European Arrest Warrant and extradition statistics • Data Retention Directive • Adoption of the euro
ESM Treaty • Geopolitics and security • Lack of public and scholarly debate on EU issues • Parliamentary reservation of law regarding state loans • The principles of legal certainty, legitimate expectations and sound administration
Social rights and austerity • Property rights • Sugar Stocks cases • NATO

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania that is currently in force was adopted by way of a referendum on 25 October 1992. It was adopted after the re-establishment of the independence of Lithuania after fifty years of Soviet occupation. With the re-establishment of independence on 11 March 1990, there was an aspiration to emphasise the continuity of the Lithuanian state despite the Soviet occupation. Thus, when the Supreme Council of the Republic of Lithuania adopted the Act on the Re-establishment of the State of Lithuania on 11 March 1990, the next step was the adoption of the Law on the Reinstatement of the Validity of the Last Pre-war Constitution of the Then Independent Republic of Lithuania – the Constitution of 12 May 1938. Still, this was a purely symbolic act, since everybody understood that the political, legal and social environment was totally different than before World War II. Therefore, on the same day, the Supreme Council adopted a law which terminated the validity of the Constitution of 12 May 1938 and approved the Provisional Basic Law, which was applicable until the entry into force of the Constitution of 25 October 1992.

Thus, it might be said that there are certain symbolic elements of evolutionary character in the Constitution, especially given the fact that its Preamble explicitly mentions the Lithuanian Statutes (modern basic laws, adopted in the Middle Ages) and the earlier Constitutions of Lithuania¹ as sources of inspiration. However, in reality the Constitution of 25 October 1992 is a typical revolutionary constitution, adopted after the collapse of a totalitarian regime, similar to the constitutions of other Central and Eastern European states adopted after the fall of the Berlin Wall. It has a rigid, detailed legal character and establishes a constitutional court which plays a central role in ensuring the observance of the Constitution and the protection of constitutional fundamental rights. Furthermore, Art. 6 of the Constitution provides for its direct applicability.² Similarly to the constitutional courts in other Central and Eastern European states, the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania (CC) is a very strong player both in terms of the protection of fundamental rights and as an arbitrator in disputes between different branches of public (political) power.

¹ It should be noted that the Lithuanian-Polish Commonwealth stood at the forefront of modern European constitutionalism with the first modern European Constitution – the Constitution of 3 May 1791 of the Lithuanian-Polish Commonwealth, which was amended by the Mutual Pledge of the Two Nations of 20 October 1791. Due to historic circumstances (the Third partition of the Commonwealth), the Constitution was renounced two years later. After the establishment of the independence of Lithuania on 16 February 1918, the Republic experienced a short period with its own constitutional tradition, starting with a temporary constitution adopted in 1918, and ending with the Constitution adopted on 12 May 1938.

The Constitution is also a very important legal tool for performing the judicial functions of the courts of general competence and the administrative courts of Lithuania. These courts are very active in questioning the legality of acts of the Parliament and of the Government and referring cases to the CC. By doing so they contribute to the establishment of a de facto decentralised system of constitutional review, although, of course, de jure and de facto the CC has the sole responsibility for scrutinising the constitutionality of acts of the Parliament, the President and the Government.

1.1.2 The Constitution performs the traditional functions accorded to it by the classic constitutional doctrine.³ First of all, it is treated as a fundamental legal document, establishing the state of Lithuania. Chapter I of the Constitution ('the State of Lithuania') revolves around the notions of people's (national) and state sovereignty, democratic rule, limitation and separation of powers, supremacy of the Constitution and its direct applicability, the official state language (Lithuanian) and the symbols of the state. Chapter II ('The Human Being and the State') establishes the fundamental rights and freedoms of individuals, whereas Chapter III ('Society and the State') and Chapter IV ('National Economy and Labour') are reflections of the communal/societal aspects of the Constitution. The remainder (Chaps. V–XIII) deals primarily with the organisation and functioning of public power.

The jurisprudence of the CC and academic writings reflect the classic understanding of the Constitution: the Lithuanian people (nation) are the source of the Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land. The Constitution reflects the social contract – an imperative vision, a democratically accepted obligation by all of the citizens of Lithuania for the current and future generations to live according to the fundamental rules entrenched in the Constitution and to obey them in order to ensure the legitimacy of the governing power, the legitimacy of its decisions, as well as to ensure human rights and freedoms, so that harmony exists in society. The CC makes it clear that the Constitution is based on universal, unquestionable values, which are sovereignty belonging to the Nation, democracy, the recognition of and respect for human rights and freedoms, respect for the law and the rule of law, limitation of the scope of powers, the duty of state institutions to serve the people and their responsibility to society, public spirit, justice, and striving for an open, just and harmonious civil society and state under the rule of law.⁴

² 'The Constitution shall be an integral and directly applicable act. Everyone may defend his rights by invoking the Constitution'. The English translation of the Constitution quoted in this report is available on the website of the Seimas at http://www3.lrs.lt/pls/inter3/dokpaieska.showdoc_e?p_id=275302.

³ Jarašiūnas 2001, pp. 103–130; Šileikis 2005, pp. 52–71.

To sum up, the Constitution may be treated as a material reflection of the usual dimensions of constitutionalism:⁵ constitutionalism as a limit to public power, constitutionalism as a polity expression and constitutionalism as deliberation or, using the notion proposed by J. Raz, a ‘thick’ constitution.⁶

As regards the centre of gravity among these dimensions of the Constitution, attention should be drawn to the fact that Art. 1 speaks of Lithuania as an ‘independent democratic republic’. Thus, the independence of the state is placed before its democratic nature. Moreover, differently than in some other EU Member States, Chap. I of the Constitution is devoted not to fundamental rights, but to the state as a common good of the Lithuanian people. It seems that this sequence is not accidental given the bitter historic experience of the Lithuanian people and the fact that the Constitution was adopted at the time when the Soviet army was still in the country (the last Russian army troops left Lithuania on 31 August 1993). Given the very sovereignist language of the Constitution,⁷ the jurisprudence of the CC as well as the political culture and the general mood among the public, it could be said that the Constitution first of all gravitates to the reflection of the continuing statehood of Lithuania, although this does not mean that the other dimensions of the Constitution are less important.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 Lithuania’s membership in the EU has always been seen as more than participation in an economic union. Given their bitter experience and the struggle for the right to statehood over the last two centuries, Lithuanians have generally treated (and still treat) membership in the EU as a fundamental geopolitical choice between ‘the East and the West’. From this perspective the Constitution of Lithuania is unique, since it establishes explicit provisions on both the negative⁸ and the positive

⁴ Rulings of 25 May 2004; 19 August 2006; 24 September 2009; 24 January 2014; Decisions of 20 April 2010; 19 December 2012. Here and subsequently, the translations quoted are the English translations of the rulings, conclusions and decisions of the CC available at www.lrkt.lt.

⁵ For different dimensions of constitutionalism see, for example, Poiates Maduro 2004, Šileikis 2005, pp. 35–71 and Walker 2006.

⁶ For the notion of a ‘thick’ constitution see, in particular Raz 1998, pp. 152–193.

⁷ Albi 2001, pp. 437–440, Jarukaitis 2011, pp. 261–266.

⁸ The Supreme Council adopted the Constitutional Act on the Non-Alignment of the Republic of Lithuania to Post-Soviet Eastern Unions on 8 June 1992. The Act is a part of Lithuanian positive constitutional law and states, inter alia, that the Supreme Council shall resolve ‘To develop mutually advantageous relations with each state which was formerly a component of the USSR, geopolitical orientation (see further the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union (hereinafter CA). The first hint of the positive geopolitical orientation was established on 20 June 1996 when Art. 47 of the Constitution was amended in order to ensure its compatibility with the Europe Agreement.⁹

Just one month before the entry into force of the Europe Agreement, the Board of the Parliament decided to form an expert group to evaluate the necessity of any constitutional amendments with regard to the prospective accession of Lithuania to the EU. The expert group concluded that although there was no conceptual/fundamental obstacle in the Constitution to joining the EU, constitutional amendments were necessary in order to ensure a proper constitutional basis for such membership, and proposed concrete draft amendments.¹⁰ The Government officially submitted the proposed EU related amendments to the Constitution to the Parliament on 1 March 2001. However, in 2001 the Constitutional Amendments Commission decided that no constitutional amendments were needed, although it acknowledged that it might be necessary to return to the issue at a later date.¹¹

The new impetus for renewing public discussions concerning the EU-related constitutional amendments was provided by the establishment of the European Convention and the result of its activities, the Treaty Establishing a Constitution for Europe, which prompted the Parliament to form several new working groups.¹² Finally, on 2 October 2003, the Constitutional Amendments Commission decided that constitutional amendments establishing a constitutional basis for Lithuania's but to never join in any form any new political, military, economic or other unions or commonwealths of states formed on the basis of the former USSR' (translation by the author).

⁹ The Constitution adopted in 1992 totally precluded the right of foreigners to acquire land in Lithuania. However, once the Europe Agreement was signed in 1995, this prohibition was partially lifted and Art. 47 of the Constitution was supplemented with para. 2: 'Local governments (municipalities), other national entities as well as those foreign entities conducting economic activities in Lithuania which are specified by the constitutional law in compliance with the criteria of European and Transatlantic integration which the Republic of Lithuania has embarked on may be permitted to acquire into their ownership non-agricultural land plots required for the construction and operation of buildings and facilities necessary for their direct activities'.

¹⁰ The text of the constitutional amendments proposed by the expert group may be found in: Stojimas į Europos Sąjungą ir Konstituciją. Seminaro medžiaga 1999 06 29–30 d (Accession to the European Union and the Constitution. Materials of the seminar of 29–30 June 1999). Eugrimas, Vilnius, 2000, pp. 23–25. Basically, the proposed amendments included provisions concerning transfer of part of the competences of state institutions to the EU and the incorporation of EU law into the national legal system. It should also be noted that these draft amendments were discussed during an international seminar which took place in Vilnius in 1999. The comments of Lithuanian and foreign experts may be found in the above-mentioned book. By way of a summary, the majority of participants in the seminar shared the opinion that constitutional amendments were necessary.

¹¹ The Report of activities of the Commission of 2001 at http://www3.lrs.lt/pls/inter/w5_show?p_r=894&p_d=14315&p_k=1.

¹² Before the European Convention started, the Seimas decided to establish several working groups of experts, which had the task of formulating various suggestions to the Lithuanian members of the Convention as regards the issues discussed at the Convention.

membership within the EU were necessary. The Commission decided not to amend the main body of the Constitution but to proceed with a separate constitutional act, and agreed on the content of this constitutional act on 11 December 2003. A group of Members of Parliament formally submitted the draft amendments to the Constitution for deliberation in Parliament on 22 December 2003. Although several technical adjustments were made to the draft during the deliberations in Parliament, the form (a separate constitutional act), the structure (4 separate articles) and the essence of the content of the initial draft were retained. The Parliament followed the usual procedure (see Sect. 1.2.2) established in the Constitution for adoption of constitutional amendments and adopted the Law Supplementing the Constitution with the Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union and Supplementing Art. 150 of the Constitution on 13 July 2004.¹³ The amendments took effect as of 14 August 2004.

¹³ The Constitutional Act on Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union provides:

The Seimas of the Republic of Lithuania, executing the will of the citizens of the Republic of Lithuania expressed in the referendum on the membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union, held on 10–11 May 2003; expressing its conviction that the European Union respects human rights and fundamental freedoms and that the Lithuanian membership in the European Union will contribute to a more efficient securing of human rights and freedoms, noting that the European Union respects the national identity and constitutional traditions of its Member States, seeking to ensure a fully-fledged participation of the Republic of Lithuania in European integration as well as the security of the Republic of Lithuania and welfare of its citizens, adopts and proclaims this Constitutional Act:

...

1. The Republic of Lithuania as a Member State of the European Union shall share with or entrust on the European Union the competences of its State institutions in the areas provided for in the founding Treaties of the European Union and to the extent it would, together with the other Member States of the European Union, jointly meet its membership commitments in those areas as well as enjoy membership rights.
2. The norms of European Union law shall be a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania. Where it concerns the founding Treaties of the European Union, the norms of European Union law shall be applied directly, while in the event of a collision of legal norms, they shall have supremacy over the laws and other legal acts of the Republic of Lithuania.
3. The Government shall inform the Seimas of proposals to adopt acts of European Union law. As regards proposals to adopt acts of European Union law regulating areas which, under the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, are related to the competences of the Seimas, the Government shall consult the Seimas. The Seimas may recommend a position of the Republic of Lithuania in respect of these proposals to the Government. The Seimas Committee on European Affairs and the Seimas Committee on Foreign Affairs may, according to the procedure established by the Statute of the Seimas, submit to the Government the opinion of the Seimas concerning proposals to adopt acts of the European Union law. The Government shall assess the recommendations or opinions submitted by the Seimas or its Committees and shall inform the Seimas about their execution following the procedure established by legal acts.
4. The Government shall consider proposals to adopt acts of European Union law following the procedure established by legal acts. As regards these proposals, the Government may adopt decisions or resolutions for the adoption of which the provisions of Art. 95 of the Constitution are

There were discussions in Parliament on whether to adopt the CA by way of a referendum or to leave this to the Parliament. The latter option was chosen, although the adoption of the CA was preceded by a referendum with a question on whether Lithuania should accede to the EU.

Given the fact that the adoption of the CA de facto meant a revision of the entire Constitution (see Sect. 1.3.1), including its Chapter I (which may only be amended by way of a referendum (see Sect. 1.2.2)), one may wonder whether it would have been more appropriate to submit the adoption of the CA to a referendum.

It may be interesting to note that the CA was adopted and took effect after Lithuania's accession to the EU. The reasons for this delay are not clear, as both Lithuanian society in general and the political parties represented in Parliament widely supported Lithuania's membership in the EU. Academic writings have rightly pointed to the fact that the explicit constitutional basis for Lithuania's membership within the EU was missing for more than two months.¹⁴ Realising the risk of uncertainty and devaluation of the CA, the CC pre-empted doubts about the constitutionality of, for example, the application of EU regulations between 1 May 2004 and 14 August 2004, and decided to correct the faults of the political process by stating that Lithuania's membership in the EU '... is constitutionally confirmed by the Constitutional Act of the Republic of Lithuania 'On Membership of the Republic of Lithuania in the European Union' [emphasis added].

Finally, in order to remove inconsistencies between certain provisions of the Constitution and EU law, Arts. 47 and 119 were amended before Lithuania acceded to the EU.¹⁵

1.2.2 The CC makes it clear that the Constitution is an integral act, and all provisions of the Constitution are interrelated to the degree that the content of some provisions of the Constitution determines the content of other provisions. The provisions of the Constitution constitute a harmonious system and no provision of the Constitution can oppose its other provisions, because the nature of the Constitution as an act of supreme legal power and the idea of constitutionality imply that there are not, nor can there be, any gaps or internal contradictions in the Constitution.¹⁶

On the other hand, the Constitution establishes different procedures and requirements as regards its amendment, thus establishing a certain de facto internal hierarchy of its provisions. These procedures are rather rigid and require wide not applicable. (Some revisions have been made to the English translation available at http://www3.lrs.lt/pls/inter3/dokpaiseska.showdoc_e?p_id=275302 by the author).

¹⁴ Jarukaitis 2006a, pp. 395–396.

¹⁵ In order to secure the right of foreign nationals to acquire land in Lithuania, Art. 47 of the Constitution was amended twice before accession: in 1996 and in 2003 in order to ensure its full compatibility with EU fundamental economic freedoms. With regard to the right of EU citizens to participate in municipal elections, Art. 119 of the Constitution was amended on 20 June 2002, because originally this right was reserved for Lithuanian citizens only. For more details see: Jarukaitis 2006a, pp. 396–397.

¹⁶ Rulings of 25 May 2004; 13 December 2004; 28 March 2006.

support both among the public in general and among the political parties represented in Parliament, ensuring that the constitutional amendment procedure is above the ordinary political process.

First of all, according to Art. 148(1), ‘the provision of Art. 1 of the Constitution “the State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic” may only be altered by referendum if not less than three-quarters of the citizens of Lithuania with the electoral right vote in favour thereof’. The CC has recently ruled that Art. 1 of the Constitution consolidates the fundamental constitutional values – the independence of the state, democracy and the republic – which are inseparably inter-related and form the foundation of the State of Lithuania, as the common good of the entire society consolidated in the Constitution; they must not be negated under any circumstances. Further, the Court ruled that the principle of recognition of the innate nature of human rights and freedoms should also be regarded as a fundamental constitutional value that is inseparably related to the constitutional values – independence, democracy and the republic – which constitute the foundation of the State of Lithuania as the common good of the entire society consolidated in the Constitution; the innate nature of human rights and freedoms may not be negated either. Given the constitutional imperative to ensure that no amendments of the Constitution violate the harmony of the provisions of the Constitution or the harmony of the values consolidated by them, the Constitution does not permit any such amendment that would deny at least one of the above-mentioned constitutional values underlying the foundations of the State of Lithuania as the common good of the entire society, with the exception of the cases where Art. 1 of the Constitution would be altered (by a referendum with a three-fourths majority).¹⁷

Amendments of the Constitution concerning other chapters of the Constitution must be considered and voted in the Seimas (the Parliament of Lithuania) twice (of course, it may decide to submit them to a referendum as well, since Art. 9(1) of the Constitution stipulates that the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation shall be decided by referendum). There must be an interval of not less than three months between the votes. A draft law on amendment of the Constitution shall be deemed adopted by the Seimas if, during each of the votes, not less than two-thirds of the Members of the Seimas vote in favour.

1.2.3–1.2.4 Alongside the above-mentioned constitutional reforms related to Lithuania’s membership within the EU, Art. 125 of the Constitution was amended in 2006 by the Parliament. Before amendment, Art. 125 of the Constitution provided for the Bank of Lithuania’s ‘exclusive right to issue bank notes’, which was not in line with the rights of the European Central Bank. The Law amending Art. 125 of the Constitution was adopted on 25 April 2006, and it simply abolished Art. 125(2) of the Constitution.

The CC declared that the Law amending Art. 125 of the Constitution was adopted in breach of the essential procedural requirements of Art. 147 of the Constitution and annulled the law by its ruling of 24 January 2014. Still, the Court pointed out in the ruling that the Constitution establishes a constitutional imperative of positive geopolitical orientation (that is, membership in the EU and NATO), whereas the Preamble of the CA expressly speaks about the 'fully-fledged participation of the Republic of Lithuania in the European integration'. From this the Court deduced the constitutional obligation of Lithuania to participate as a fully-fledged Member State in the integration of the member countries into the EMU by adopting the common currency and conferring exclusive competence in the area of monetary policy to the EU.

¹⁷ Ruling of 24 January 2014.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The CA establishes explicit constitutional provisions concerning both the transfer (or trust, to be more precise) of part of the competences of state institutions to the supranational level (Art. 1 of the CA) and the incorporation of EU law into national law with (limited) recognition of its specific features (Art. 2 of the CA).¹⁸ Without any doubt, these provisions should be viewed and understood in the context of ongoing discussions and disputes concerning the concept of sovereignty (see Sect. 1.3.2).

Article 1 of the CA establishes a clear constitutional basis for transfer of part of the competences of state institutions to supranational institutions. It may be treated as the exception to the general rule, established in Art. 5 of the Constitution, according to which the exercise of public powers in Lithuania is reserved only for Lithuanian institutions. Thus, it opens the national constitutional order and, alongside the horizontal division of public powers, legitimates the vertical distribution of powers.

It can be said that Art. 1 of the CA adopts a classic approach as regards the exercise of public powers by the EU. In this respect it speaks about 'sharing or entrust of competences' and by doing so emphasises several aspects. First of all, the clause embeds the principle of conferral on which the EU is based at the national constitutional level. The term 'entrusts' ('patiki' in Lithuanian) is to some extent a synonym of the term 'confers', but it is more subtle, since it demonstrates that such conferral is not irreversible and the ultimate source of authority rests at the national level.¹⁹ In this regard, the provisions of Art. 1 of the CA are similar to the constitutional 'EU clauses' of those EU Member States which have chosen the so-called Belgo-German model, which refers to the transfer of competences instead of the limitation of sovereign powers (like, for example, the Constitution of Italy).

Article 1 of the CA performs several functions. First of all it should be related to the rationalising or defining function of the Constitution, since the Constitution organises and limits the exercise of public power. From this perspective the provisions of Art. 1 serve an integrative purpose, since they open the national constitutional order and allow the exercise of public powers by the EU institutions in the territory of Lithuania, which would not be possible without Art. 1. Of course, such constitutional permission triggers a mutation of other constitutional principles (like democracy (see Sects. 1.4.1 and 1.4.2), separation of powers, etc.).

¹⁸ For the wording of the Constitutional Act, supra n. 13.

¹⁹ On the other hand, the Preamble of the CA (rec. 4) expressly recognises the necessity of membership in the EU, since it establishes a connection between the security and welfare of citizens and participation in the EU.

At the same time, Art. 1 of the Act serves a defensive function. From this perspective it should be read in conjunction with the Preamble of the CA, which establishes certain basic presumptions and subtle constitutional imperatives or conditions for Lithuania's membership within the EU.²⁰ Attention should be drawn to the careful language of Art. 1. It speaks not about the renunciation or renouncement of public powers, but about Lithuania 'as a Member State' that 'shares and entrusts' certain competences. The object of such sharing and trust is not sovereignty per se or even 'sovereign powers', but only 'the competences of its State institutions'.²¹ To sum up, the principle of sovereignty, which serves as a basis for Lithuania's membership within the EU (because it could become an EU Member State only because it is a sovereign state from the point of view of public international law), also serves as a conceptual limit to further EU integration: from the point of view of the Constitution of Lithuania, without amendments to Art. 1 of the Constitution, it would not be possible to accept claims on the part of the EU not 'only' to autonomy, which Art. 1 of the CA clearly reflects, but to statehood. Further, the provisions of the Preamble of the CA may be seen as material limits to the exercise of public power also at the EU level.

Article 2 of the CA incorporates EU law into the national legal system, thus to some extent recognising the sui generis nature of EU law.²² Without any doubt from the point of view of the national Constitution, after the adoption of Art. 2 of the CA, the basis for the application of EU law rests, foremost, within the Constitution itself. This means that by adopting the CA the Parliament constitutionalised the principles developed by the European Court of Justice (ECJ), i.e. granting these principles special, constitutional treatment, but on the other hand, it rejected the idea that these principles stem from the nature of EU law itself, without the 'mediation' of the national Constitution. Consequently, the adopted CA makes the application of EU law and its specific features a matter of national constitutional law – which means that the Constitution instead of EU law by its very nature forms the basis for the application of EU law in Lithuania. This leads to some important consequences: EU law becomes part of the national legal system; all state institutions (national courts, other state institutions) have a duty to apply EU law and to interpret national law ‘in the light’ of EU law as a matter of Lithuanian constitutional law as well;²³ and the national courts have a constitutional right and duty to use the preliminary ruling procedure. At the same time, it serves a defensive function, since its mere existence rejects the idea of the absolute autonomy of EU law as developed by the ECJ. Moreover, the principle of primacy of EU law does not extend unconditionally over the Constitution of Lithuania (see Sect. 1.3.4).

²⁰ According to the Preamble of the CA, the Parliament adopts the CA 'expressing its conviction that the European Union respects human rights and fundamental freedoms and that the Lithuanian membership in the European Union will contribute to a more efficient securing of human rights and freedoms' and 'noting that the European Union respects the national identity and constitutional traditions of its Member States'.

²¹ See as well Šileikis 2005, pp. 49–51; Jarukaitis 2006b, pp. 25–26; Vaičaitis 2006, pp. 62–63; Jarukaitis 2010a, pp. 212–214.

²² Such conclusion follows from the fact that Art. 138(3) incorporates ratified international treaties into the Lithuanian legal order and adopts a monist approach with regard to public international law. Consequently, if EU law were to be treated as part of public international law, the provisions of Art. 2 of the CA would be redundant.

1.3.2 With regard to sovereignty as a theoretical concept and legal principle, two preliminary remarks should be made. First, it is clear that legal commentators do not agree on the content of the concept of sovereignty. The statement that disagreement and conflict are constitutive elements of the concept of sovereignty, leading to its description as an essentially contestable concept, seems to be quite accurate.²⁴ Secondly, taking into account its historic origins and later developments, there is no basis to equate sovereignty and the actual powers performed by a political community. Thus, the author of this report supports the ideas of those who define sovereignty as a sufficiently effective claim to ultimate power in the context of the sovereignty discourse, but nothing more.²⁵ Viewed from this perspective, the claim that EU Member states are sovereign is not under challenge, whereas the EU itself has never made such a claim.

Lithuanian authors recognise the relative character of the concept of sovereignty. Even before World War II one of most prominent professors argued that neither the external nor internal aspects of state sovereignty can be treated as absolute, since externally a state is subjected to international law, whereas internally state powers are subject to people’s needs.²⁶ Contemporary constitutional writings associate the concept of sovereignty with the following dimensions: the self-determination of the people of how to live and the right to establish their own state,²⁷ the right to make political constitutional decisions independently; the principal existence of the state as a member of the international community alongside other states;²⁸ as the ²³ The CC so far has not explicitly stated that the national courts have a constitutional duty to apply EU law; however, such duty can be clearly deduced from its recent ruling of 24 January 2014. The Supreme Court of Lithuania has taken this approach e.g. in Decision of 7 January 2008 in Case No. 3K-3-91/2008, and the SAC e.g. in Decision of 28 May 2007 in Case No. A6-238/2007 and Decision of 1 October 2010 in Case No. A858-1204/2010. For more details on the application of EU law in Lithuania see, for example, Jarukaitis 2010a, pp. 222–241; Jarukaitis 2010b, pp. 176–202.

²⁴ Besson 2004, pp. 15–16.

²⁵ For extensive analysis on the subject see, for example, Werner and De Wilde 2001; Walker 2003, pp. 19–32.

²⁶ Römeris 1995, p. 245.

²⁷ Jarašiūnas 2001, p. 496.

²⁸ Vadapalas 2002, pp. 14–15.

discursive form, through which a political community permanently expresses claims to the supreme public powers; ensuring the continuous identity and independent status of that political community.²⁹

The CC has so far been laconic on the content of the principle of sovereignty;³⁰ however, its practice confirms a close link between the principles of people's sovereignty, state sovereignty and democracy. In its recent ruling of 24 January 2014, it provided a more detailed approach as regards Lithuania's membership within the EU and the content of the CA. The Court considers membership within the EU to be a reflection of the geopolitical choice of Lithuania, which at the same time is a value choice: the Preamble of the CA clearly reveals that Lithuania's accession to the EU is based on an assumption of the structural compatibility of the fundamental values established in the Constitution with those on which the EU is founded. Additionally, membership within the EU is based on the belief that such membership ensures better preconditions for attainment of the constitutional imperatives established by the Constitution. Further, the CC has expressly stated that the CA establishes, inter alia, the constitutional grounds for the membership of Lithuania in the EU and that if such constitutional grounds were not consolidated in the Constitution, Lithuania could not be a full member of the EU. In the ruling, the Court made it clear that Arts. 1 and 2 of the CA may be amended only by way of a referendum, and established certain material limits to integration, related to the basic values of the Constitution (see Sect. 1.3.3).

1.3.3 The fundamental limit to the transfer of powers to the supranational level is established in Art. 1 of the Constitution, i.e. Lithuania must remain an independent democratic republic. Recently, the CC ruled that an inseparable link exists between the independence of the state, democracy, the republic and the innate character of human rights and freedoms.³¹ Therefore, the Constitution does not permit any amendments that would deny at least one of the above-mentioned constitutional values underlying the foundations of the State of Lithuania as the common good of the entire society. In order to overcome such a limitation, Art. 1 of the Constitution should be amended by a referendum as prescribed by Art. 148(1) of the Constitution.

Moreover, the sovereign (the people) is not absolutely free in exercising its powers to amend the Constitution. The CC stressed in its decision of 7 July 2014 that the principle of the rule of law is applicable to the procedure for amending the Constitution. The Court has deemed the pacta sunt servanda principle to be part of the constitutional principle of the rule of law, stating that the Constitution establishes the constitutional imperative to observe and fulfil international obligations

²⁹ Jarukaitis 2011, pp. 163–188.

³⁰ For example, in its ruling of 19 September 2002, the Court noted, that '[i]n Art. 1 of the Constitution the fundamental principles of the Lithuanian State are established: the Lithuanian State is free and independent; the republic is the form of governance of the Lithuanian State; state power must be organised in a democratic way, and there must be a democratic political regime in this country' (translation by the author).

³¹ Decision of 19 December 2012; Ruling of 24 January 2014.

correctly. The Constitution must not have and does not tolerate any gaps or internal contradictions. Consequently, the Constitution does not allow amendments that go against obligations undertaken under international or EU law. In order to introduce such amendments in the Constitution, the international or EU obligations would have to be modified or renounced under the procedures provided by international or EU law. To sum up, theoretically, core constitutional values (including the peoples'/state sovereignty) may be overcome, but the threshold is extremely high.

1.3.4 Commentators are quite unanimous in stating that the primacy of EU law does not extend automatically over the Constitution.³² Several arguments support such view. Article 7(1) of the Constitution provides that ‘any law or other statute, which is contrary to the Constitution shall be invalid’ and establishes the principle of supremacy of the Constitution over all other norms. Article 7 is in Chapter I of the Constitution, the provisions of which may be amended only by way of a referendum. The CA was not adopted by way of a referendum. Further, the travaux préparatoires of the draft CA and the deliberations in Parliament during the adoption of the CA point in the same direction.

It is also worth noting that there is no need to recognise the unconditional primacy let alone the supremacy of EU law over national constitutions, whether as a matter of the constitutional architecture of the EU³³ or as a matter of positive EU law, if one takes into account the constitutional identity clause in Art. 4(2) TEU.³⁴

The practice of the CC confirms that it is not ready to accept the unconditional primacy of EU law over the Constitution. In its ruling of 14 March 2006, the Court stated:

... the Constitution consolidates not only the principle that in cases when national legal acts establish the legal regulation which competes with that established in an international treaty, then the international treaty is to be applied, but also, in regard of European Union law, establishes expressis verbis the collision rule, which consolidates the priority of application of European Union legal acts in the cases where the provisions of the European Union arising from the founding Treaties of the European Union compete with the legal regulation established in Lithuanian national legal acts (regardless of what their legal power is), save the Constitution itself [emphasis added].

Although the ruling was interpreted by some authors as a declaration of the unconditional supremacy of the Constitution over EU law, such a conclusion is too extensive, since the Court did not rule explicitly on what the relationship between EU law and the Constitution is. It may be said that the Court simply decided to proceed on a case-by-case basis and to avoid any generalisations.

Such a thesis has been confirmed by the subsequent practice of the Court, which shows its readiness to ensure harmony between the Constitution and EU law. In its ruling of 21 December 2006, the Court took a step forward and, citing decisions of the Court of First Instance and the ECJ for the first time, noted that ‘[t]he Constitutional Court has stated several times that the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, as a source of legal interpretation, is important for the interpretation and application of Lithuanian law. The same should be said about the jurisprudence of the Court of First Instance and the European Court of Justice’ [emphasis added]. This statement may be treated as an explicit recognition of the impact EU law has on national law, including on the Constitution. Of course, it does not eliminate all grounds for a potential conflict, but indicates the Court’s willingness to do its best to avoid one.

³² Kūris 2004a, p. 36; Šileikis 2005, p. 143; Abramavičius 2006, p. 313; Jarukaitis 2010a, pp. 225–234.

³³ See, for example, Poiares Maduro 2003, pp. 74–102.

³⁴ See, for example, Jarukaitis 2014, pp. 575–620.

A further step in developing a friendly approach to EU law was taken on 8 May 2007 when the Court made a reference to the ECJ for a preliminary ruling concerning the interpretation of an EU directive, being one of the few national constitutional courts that has ever used this procedure.

After Lithuania had acceded to the EU, the CC recognised that the adoption of the CA may trigger the need to reinterpret the Constitution; indeed, the CC has already started to re-evaluate its practice developed before accession and to identify areas where reinterpretation of the Constitution is needed.³⁵

The ruling of 24 January 2014, in which membership within the EU was deemed to be a constitutional value and imperative based on the structural compatibility of the fundamental values of both the Constitution and EU primary law, should be viewed as a clear manifestation of a friendly approach to EU membership and obligations stemming from it. Furthermore, given the above-mentioned proviso ‘save the Constitution itself’ in the ruling of 14 March 2006 along with the core principles enunciated in the ruling of 24 January 2014, one may speculate that similarly to other constitutional courts of EU Member States, the CC has slowly and implicitly accepted the existence of ‘ordinary’ constitutional rules, which are more prone to impact by EU law, and the constitutional nucleus, which is more resistant to the influence of EU law.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 Article 3 of the CA regulates the involvement of the Seimas in the EU decision-making process and parliamentary control of the Government when it acts at the EU level.³⁶ The provisions of Art. 3 of the CA aim at ensuring a balance between the necessity to have a close involvement of the Parliament when the Government participates in the EU Council with the need to leave enough flexibility for bargaining so the Government can react to what is going on in the EU Council.

³⁵ For example, Ruling of 26 September 2006. For a more detailed description of the CC practice vis-à-vis EU law, see: Jarukaitis 2010a, pp. 225–234; Jarukaitis 2010b, pp. 182–189.

³⁶ For the wording of the text, see supra n. 13.

Detailed provisions implementing these provisions are established in Chap. 27¹ of the Statute of the Seimas, which has the force of law.³⁷

By way of a summary of the provisions, the Statute accords the main powers for parliamentary control to the European Affairs Committee and, in the field of the Common Foreign and Security Policy and other external issues, to the Foreign Affairs Committee, which are given the right to issue opinions on behalf of the Parliament. In some cases the Statute requires discussions to be held (for example, deliberations on the compliance of draft EU legal initiatives with the principle of subsidiarity) not in the European Affairs Committee but in the plenary session. The Government has a duty to inform the Seimas in writing of proposals to adopt EU legal acts and other relevant EU documents. Once the European Commission communicates its annual work programme, the specialised committees of the Seimas identify the priorities for the upcoming year in order to focus on the issues that are most relevant for Lithuania, and the finalised version of these priorities is submitted to the Government. The institution responsible for the preparation of the Lithuanian position concerning a proposal to adopt an EU legal act or other EU document has the obligation to submit the position to the Seimas immediately after its preparation, and no later than three days prior to the debate on this position in the EU institutions. At the executive level, the formation of the Lithuanian position is initiated and conducted through the LINESIS electronic platform, which records all the changes made in the Lithuanian position throughout its preparation.

Once received in the Seimas, the position is forwarded to the specialised committees and to the European Affairs Committee or the Foreign Affairs Committee. Having deliberated on a position, a specialised committee may either approve the position or propose amendments and review of the position; its position is communicated either to the European Affairs Committee or the Foreign Affairs Committee. The position is deliberated at a meeting of the European Affairs Committee or the Foreign Affairs Committee where the Prime Minister or the appropriate minister presents the position and answers questions; the conclusions of the specialised committees are presented and discussions on the position are held. The committee decides by consensus or by a vote whether it should, on behalf of the Seimas, state its opinion about the position. If so, the chair of the meeting proposes the wording of the opinion, and the opinion is adopted in a vote. Both committees may oblige a minister to maintain a parliamentary reservation during the deliberation of issues that are considered as highly relevant or relevant in the EU institutions. Art. 180¹⁷ establishes the obligation of the Prime Minister and ministers to submit an oral or written report on the fate of the Lithuanian position after the relevant meeting of the European Council or the EU Council.

Additionally, Art. 180⁶ of the Statute establishes a subsidiarity control procedure, according to which draft EU legislation is scrutinised by the specialised committees and their positions are submitted to the European Affairs Committee or the Foreign Affairs Committee. If one of these Committees decides that a draft EU law does not respect the principle of subsidiarity, it prepares a draft Seimas resolution with a reasoned opinion. The resolution is debated by the Seimas sitting in accordance with the special urgency procedure. If adopted, the Seimas resolution regarding the reasoned opinion is forwarded to the Government.

³⁷ The English translation of the Statute is available at http://www3.lrs.lt/pls/inter3/dokpaieska.showdoc!>p_id=473761.

To sum up, the system put in place seems to function rather effectively; there is quite a high degree of information exchange and harmonisation of positions between the Government and the Parliament. In practice, the Parliament's role in the EU decision-making process is quite important.

1.4.2 According to Art. 9 of the Constitution, the most significant issues concerning the life of the State and the Nation shall be decided by referendum. Article 4(5) of the Law on Referendums provides for a mandatory referendum concerning the participation of the Republic of Lithuania in international organisations ‘should this participation be linked with the partial transfer of the scope of competence of Government bodies to the institutions of international organizations or the jurisdiction thereof’.

Needless to say, Lithuania’s accession to the EU had a profound impact on the whole society, the state and the core constitutional principles of the national polity. Consequently, it was decided that a referendum would be held on EU accession once the Accession Treaty was signed. The referendum took place on 10–11 May 2003; a simple statement ‘I am for Lithuania’s membership in the European Union’ was submitted to a vote. Of citizens with the right to vote, 63.37% participated in the referendum, of whom a notably high 90% voted in favour of Lithuania’s accession to the EU. From the point of view of democratic legitimacy, the referendum was of utmost importance, especially because of the far-reaching consequences of EU membership.

This was the first referendum related to EU issues. There were calls to hold a referendum concerning the ratification of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe; however, ultimately it was decided that the Treaty would be ratified by Parliament.

Two unsuccessful referendum initiatives related to EU membership were promoted in 2013–2014. One concerned a proposed amendment of Art. 47 of the Constitution, aimed at restricting the right of foreigners to buy land in Lithuania.³⁸ The second initiative concerned the proposed amendment of Art. 125 of the Constitution and Art. 1 of the CA. The initiators proposed amending the Constitution in order to re-establish the right of the Bank of Lithuania to emit bank notes. The Central Electoral Commission refused to register the initiative, arguing that such amendments would not be compatible with the Constitution. The Supreme Administrative Court of Lithuania (hereinafter SAC), after verifying with the CC whether the Central Electoral Commission had such authority under the ³⁸ The referendum took place on 29 June 2014 and failed, as only 14.98% of eligible voters participated (instead of the required 50%).

Constitution,³⁹ supported the findings of the Central Electoral Commission on 18 July 2014.⁴⁰ The Court, relying inter alia on the jurisprudence of the CC, concluded that Lithuania has the obligation, stemming both from the Accession Treaty as well as from the Constitution, to introduce the euro. Therefore, in order to introduce the proposed amendments to the Constitution, prior amendment of the Accession Treaty would be needed.⁴¹

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.3 It is obvious that the above-mentioned constitutional amendments related to Lithuania's membership in the EU were necessary, because otherwise such membership would not be compatible with the Constitution (this argument is first and foremost addressed to provisions establishing the constitutional basis for the transfer of part of the public powers to the supranational level). One of the main functions of the Constitution – the establishment, organisation and limitation of public power – means that only the exercise of public power sanctioned by the Constitution is legitimate. Before the adoption of the CA, the exercise of public powers was reserved for national institutions only. Therefore, to legitimise the transfer of vast public powers to the supranational level, which itself triggered fundamental changes to some core constitutional principles (democracy, separation of powers, the rule of law, the role of the Constitution and constitutional review, etc.) an appropriate constitutional authorisation was needed. Otherwise, the gap between the text of the Constitution and the ‘real’ Constitution (that is, the actual modus vivendi within a national polity) would have become too wide, leading to a sharp decrease in the legitimacy of public power. There was a near-unanimous agreement among legal scholars in Lithuania before accession to the EU that EU related amendments were necessary; the main discussions revolved around the optimal form and content of such amendments. The expert groups that drafted the constitutional amendments analysed and took into account the experience of some of the ‘old’ Member States, which at that time had similar constitutional provisions.

Moreover, the Constitution is an anti-majoritarian act, established to protect the fundamental rights and liberties of the individual; therefore, given the overall constitutional architecture of the EU (Art. 4 of the TEU in particular), the Constitution should be treated as the guarantor of those rights despite the transfer of public powers to the supranational level.

³⁹ Ruling of the CC of 11 July 2014. The argument was presented, in the proceedings before the SAC, that Lithuanian law does not give the right to the Central Electoral Commission to refuse to register a referendum initiative, since such refusal would unduly restrict the constitutional right of self-determination. Therefore, the SAC decided to clarify this aspect and to refer the issue to the CC. The CC rejected this argument in its ruling and decided that the law establishing such right of the Central Electoral Commission does not contravene the Constitution of Lithuania.

⁴⁰ Ruling of the SAC of 18 July 2014 in Case No. R-858-11-14.

⁴¹ Lithuania joined the eurozone on 1 January 2015.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 One of the primary functions of the Constitution is to protect the fundamental rights and freedoms of individuals. According to Art. 18 of the Constitution, human rights and freedoms are innate. Although Art. 18 of the Constitution is not technically in Chapter I of the Constitution, which may be amended only by way of a referendum, the CC has ruled that the innate nature of fundamental rights and freedoms is inseparable from the other fundamental provisions of the Constitution established in Art. 1 (the independence of the state and democracy). Therefore, according to the CC, Art. 18 may be amended only by a referendum in which the supermajority envisaged for amendments to Art. 1 of the Constitution is required.⁴² Chapter II of the Constitution establishes traditional civil and political rights in detail. Pursuant to Art. 6(2) ('Everyone may defend his rights by invoking the Constitution') and Art. 30(1) ('[Any] person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to apply to [a] court'), constitutional rights and freedoms are directly enforced by the Lithuanian courts.

Although the principle of the rule of law (in Lithuanian 'teisinės valstybės principas') and its various manifestations (like legal certainty, legitimate expectations, etc.) are not explicitly enshrined in the Constitution (apart from the Preamble of the Constitution, which speaks of the Lithuanian nation 'striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and State under the rule of law'), the practice of the CC clearly confirms that the rule of law is a core structural principle penetrating all aspects of the Constitution and, as such, is justiciable in the courts (see Sect. 2.1.3).

2.1.2 The Constitution does not contain any specific provisions establishing general conditions under which restrictions of fundamental rights and freedoms may be imposed. However, different articles of the Constitution establish various grounds for derogation, for example, Art. 20 ('No one may be deprived of his freedom otherwise than on the grounds and according to the procedures which have been established by law'); Art. 22 ('Information concerning the private life of a person may be collected only upon a justified court decision and only according to the law'); Art. 25 ('Freedom to express convictions, to receive and impart information may not be limited otherwise than by law, if this is necessary to protect the health, honour and dignity, private life, and morals of a human being, or to defend the constitutional order'), etc. The CC has in its practice developed a general standard for limitations of fundamental rights and freedoms. According to the Court, under the Constitution, the restriction of fundamental rights and freedoms is permitted if all the following conditions are met: the limitation is imposed by a law adopted by Parliament; these restrictions are necessary in a democratic society in order to protect the rights and freedoms of other persons as well as the values established in the Constitution together with constitutionally important objectives; the restrictions must not deny the nature and essence of the rights and freedoms; and the constitutional principle of proportionality is observed.⁴³

⁴² Ruling of 24 January 2014.

2.1.3 The rule of law (a state governed by law) is treated as the cornerstone principle of the entire national constitutional system. Although not expressly established in any particular article of the Constitution, the principle transfuses many core provisions of the Constitution. These include Art. 1, ('The State of Lithuania shall be an independent democratic republic'); Art. 5(2) ('The scope of power shall be limited by the Constitution'); Art. 6(1) ('The Constitution shall be an integral and directly applicable act'); and Art. 7 ('Any law or other act, which is contrary to the Constitution, shall be invalid. Only laws which are published shall be valid').

Lithuanian authors are unanimous in treating the rule of law as an independent (constitutional) legal principle, which co-ordinates and determines the whole (constitutional) legal system; various elements of the principle are among the most important factors ensuring the proper unfolding of the Constitution.⁴⁴

The CC consistently points out that the principle of the rule of law is a universal legal principle upon which the whole Lithuanian legal system as well as the Constitution itself are based, and that the content of the principle is revealed in various provisions of the Constitution. It is construed as inseparable from striving for an open, just, and harmonious civil society and law-governed state, as promulgated in the Preamble of the Constitution. Along with other requirements, the principle also pre-supposes that human rights and freedoms must be ensured, that all state institutions exercising state power and other state institutions must act on the basis of and in compliance with the law, that the Constitution has supreme juridical force and that all legal acts must be in conformity with the Constitution.⁴⁵

The CC has in its practice identified different elements of the rule of law, which include the following: rules of general application must be established by laws passed by the Parliament; the supremacy of laws and hierarchy of different legal acts, which are all subordinated to the Constitution; the accessibility of legal provisions; legal certainty and the integrity of law; nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege; natural justice; due process of law; the independence and impartiality of judges and courts; legitimate expectations; proportionality; and the constitutional imperative to observe the public international law principle pacta sunt servanda.

⁴³ See e.g. Ruling of 14 March 2002.

⁴⁴ Kūris 2001, pp. 241–254; Šileikis 2005, pp. 198–210.

⁴⁵ For example, the Rulings of 23 February 2000, 11 January 2001.

As one may see, the principle has extensive content. The CC treats the principle as one of utmost importance for the systemic interpretation of various constitutional provisions, even if it has not been singled out as one of the core constitutional principles that can only be renounced under the Art. 148(1) procedure.⁴⁶ Furthermore, the principle itself is justiciable and applicants may challenge legal provisions as regards their compatibility with the principle. Recently, the CC went so far as to say that the rule of law binds the sovereign (that is, the people) itself in that it does not allow for the introduction of constitutional amendments that would contravene Lithuania's international obligations or obligations stemming from EU law. In order to introduce such constitutional provisions, international or EU obligations would have to be renounced or modified in a way that would not contradict the proposed amendments.⁴⁷

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 No constitutional issues have so far been raised in Lithuania with regard to the impact of EU economic freedoms on constitutional civil, political or social rights in court practice or in academic writings.

In the Expert's view, the ECJ has so far been careful to give the Member States wide discretion in this field (see, for example, the Schmidberger, Omega and Dynamic Medien judgments).⁴⁸ The Laval and Viking Line cases⁴⁹ are very specific and on their own should not be treated as a confirmation of the ECJ's approach that EU economic freedoms should generally be given priority over social rights. The Member States which intervened in these cases had very different views on the subject. It seems that at least in the Laval case, the outcome was to some extent predetermined by the existence of Lex britannia (i.e. the Swedish court practice, according to which there is no 'peace' if a collective agreement is concluded with a non-Swedish trade union) and the opaqueness of the negotiation process, especially for the economic entities that were not used to operating in the Member State in question. Further, the comparison of balancing economic with other rights at the national level and balancing EU economic freedoms with other rights at the EU

⁴⁶ Some authors argue that the rule of law is inseparable from other core constitutional principles: Šileikis 2005, p. 199.

⁴⁷ Ruling of 11 July 2014.

⁴⁸ Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659; Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609; Case C-244/06 Dynamic Medien [2008] ECR I-00505.

⁴⁹ Case C-345/05 Laval un Partneri [2007] ECR I-11767; Case C-438/05 The International Transport Workers' Federation and The Finnish Seamen's Union [2007] ECR I-10779.

level to some extent is not appropriate, since EU economic freedoms have an integrative function, thus by definition they seek to remove certain national restrictions. Finally, when the Lisbon Treaty came into force the legal landscape changed completely, with Art. 3(3) TEU explicitly noting the social orientation of the EU market economy, and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU (Charter) covering social rights as well.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 Article 31 of the Constitution states that ‘[e]very person shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to the procedure established by law and declared guilty by an effective court judgment’. A similar rule is contained in Art. 44 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (CCP): ‘Anyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty in accordance with a procedure prescribed by this Code and established by an effective court judgment.’ In addition, Art. 2 of the CCP prescribes that ‘[e]very time when elements of a criminal act are discovered, the prosecutor and the institutions of pre-trial investigation shall, within the limits of their competence, take all measures provided for by law to conduct a pre-trial investigation and ascertain that the criminal act has been committed’.

The content of the presumption of innocence has been analysed in detail and in various contexts in the jurisprudence of the CC. For example, the presumption of innocence has a much broader content and cannot be attributed solely to criminal legal relations.⁵⁰ A further dimension of this principle, which was identified in the jurisprudence of the CC, is that [i]t is especially important that state institutions and officials follow the presumption of innocence, that public persons should in general restrain from referring to a person as a criminal until the guilt of the person in committing the crime is proven [pursuant to] the procedure established by the law and [the person is found] guilty by an effective court judgment, otherwise, human honour and dignity could [be] violated and human rights and freedoms could be undermined.⁵¹

On the other hand, the constitutional principle of the presumption of innocence has never been analysed by the CC in the context of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW).

Various aspects of the principle of the presumption of innocence (for example, ‘the burden of proof lies with state officials’; ‘any doubts are treated in favour of the defendant'; 'a conviction cannot be based on assumptions', etc.) have been analysed in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights,⁵² the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of Lithuania⁵³ and the theory of Lithuanian criminal procedure⁵⁴. On the other hand, according to the doctrine of Lithuanian criminal procedure, the content of the principle of presumption of innocence is not precise and determined, and there is no exhaustive list of cases and situations in which this principle has implications for making legal decisions.⁵⁵ At the same time, it should be emphasised that the compatibility issue between the EAW and the principle of the presumption of innocence (as well as other aspects of the constitutionality of the EAW) have not been mentioned either in the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court of Lithuania or in legal commentary in Lithuania. As the author of this part of the report has noted elsewhere, one of the reasons why the question of the constitutionality of the EAW has never been raised in the constitutional jurisprudence or judicial practice of Lithuania is that Lithuania did not participate in the drafting, development or adoption of the Framework Decision on the EAW,⁵⁶ but was required to implement it in national law in order to join the European Union.⁵⁷

⁵⁰ Rulings of 29 December 2004 and 25 November 2011 of the CC.

⁵¹ Ruling of 16 January 2006.

It is worth noting that there are some cases in Lithuanian jurisprudence where the advocates of the accused, against whom an EAW was issued, have appealed the extradition arguing that the presumption of innocence has been violated.⁵⁸ However, there are no court decisions refusing to surrender a person to a requesting state specifically because of violation of this principle.

In the opinion of the Expert, it is not as of yet possible to provide an accurate answer to the question whether the principle of the presumption of innocence can no longer fully be granted the same level of protection as prior to the entry into force of the EAW Framework Decision (EAWFD). Moreover, a court decision (concerning an EAW) is essentially a procedural decision that does not solve the question of the guilt of the surrendered person. The Expert has elsewhere expressed the opinion that 'the executing Member State should not control the procedural safeguards and respect for the rights of defence in the issuing Member State because all Member States are parties to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). Moreover, such control would in some sense defy the spirit of the

⁵² See ECtHR decisions Butkevicius v. Lithuania, no. 48297/99, ECHR 2002-II (extracts) and Daktaras v. Lithuania, no. 42095/98, ECHR 2000-X.

⁵³ Rulings of the Supreme Court of Lithuania in criminal cases No. 2K-218/2010; 2K-374/2010; 2K-393/2010; etc.

⁵⁴ Švedas and Merkevičius 2013, pp. 440–441; Goda et al. 2011, pp. 50–52; Jurka et al. 2009, pp. 106–115.

⁵⁵ Goda 2003, p. 92.

⁵⁶ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁵⁷ Švedas 2008, p. 66.

⁵⁸ The Court of Appeal of Lithuania ordered that the allegations in the EAW were 'sufficiently clear and ... without prejudice to the presumption of innocence'. See the Ruling of Court of Appeal of Lithuania of 26 October 2010, No. 1N-67/2010.

EU, as only such states, which inter alia ensure and safeguard human rights and freedoms, can become members of the EU'.⁵⁹

2.3.1.2 It should be noted that review of EAW requests is much more complex in Lithuania. First of all, the review of an EAW is carried out by a prosecutor from the Prosecutor General's Office. This review includes a systematic assessment of the following categories of information: (1) that the form of the EAW is properly constructed in that it bears the appropriate signatures and seals; (2) that the facts of the offence(s) in section (e) of the form are adequately completed; (3) that the facts and legal description of the offence(s) correspond to the double criminality requirement or that the offence set out is properly included in the FD list of 32 categories of crimes; (4) that the sentences mentioned (in a conviction under an EAW) match those handed down by the court; (5) that the identification evidence/information is deemed to be adequate; and (6) whether grounds for mandatory or optional refusal are apparent from the facts disclosed.⁶⁰

Additional ad hoc enquiries can be made by the prosecutor with regard to individual cases. For example, the Prosecutor General's Office has reported⁶¹ that it has on two occasions made enquiries of fact to the issuing Member States in two cases of an alleged alibi.⁶² In one case the issuing Member State, having reviewed the case and discovered that there was merit in the claim, withdrew the EAW. In the other case, the issuing Member State found the alibi to be false and the surrender proceeded.

Once a prosecutor from the Prosecutor General's Office verifies that an issued EAW meets all the listed requirements, the prosecutor submits an application regarding the requested person's surrender to the Regional Court of Vilnius in accordance with Art. 73 of the CCP.

Normally the courts follow the principle of a high level of confidence between Member States. For example, the Court of Appeal of Lithuania in ruling No. 1N-36/

⁵⁹ Švedas and Mickevičius 2009, p. 350.

⁶⁰ Article 9¹ of the Criminal Code has provided for some additional grounds for non-execution, which are not explicitly included in the FD: (a) a mandatory human rights clause; (b) an optional ground 'where the information contained in the EAW is insufficient to decide the surrender and the issuing judicial authority fails to provide it within the prescribed time limit'; (c) some listed grounds for refusal have been implemented more broadly than they are formulated in the FD, e.g. not only amnesty, but also pardon, etc.

⁶¹ Fourth round of mutual evaluations 'Evaluation of the practical application of the European Arrest Warrant and corresponding surrender procedures between Member States', Report on Lithuania by Multidisciplinary Group on Organised Crime (doc. 12399/2/07 REV 2 CRIMORG 134 COPEN 121 EJN 25 EUROJUST 45), p. 19.

⁶² The courts considered that in cases where (e.g.) alibi defences were raised, it would be prudent to make further enquiries to the issuing Member State. If such alibi evidence stood up to examination, the EAW was unlikely to be maintained and so the process could be terminated by the issuing Member State itself, thus preventing the surrender of a requested person in circumstances in which it would be contrary to the interests of justice to pursue the request. However, there have been no judicial refusals of EAWs on this ground. Report on Lithuania, supra n. 61, p. 22.

2007 of 30 August 2007, whereby J. M. was surrendered to Hungary, noted as follows:

Paragraph 10 of the Preamble of the FD on the EAW states that the mechanism of the EAW is based on a high level of confidence between Member States. Its implementation may be suspended only in the event of a serious and persistent breach by one of the Member States of the principles set out in Article 6 EU, determined by the Council pursuant to Article 7(1) EU with the consequences set out in Article 7(2) thereof. Such circumstances have not been identified and the implementation of the mechanism of the EAW has not been suspended.

In another ruling (No. 1N-4/2008, dated 8 January 2008), where by A.D. was surrendered to Estonia, the Court of Appeal held that [d]ifferently to requests for extradition, it is not required to provide the information substantiating the accusation in the case of requests to surrender under the EAW. Competent judicial authorities of the executing state have to trust the information received from the issuing judicial authorities and believe that it has been substantiated by specific data of the criminal case file. Therefore, the claims contained in the request expressed during the court hearing by A.D. to check the case information on the amount of narcotic substances and the facts [regarding validity of his] Russian visa, as well as the requests of the defence counsel to produce thorough evidence of guilt shall be refused.

In principle, the Regional Court of Vilnius must carry out the same review as the prosecutor. According to the Regional Court of Vilnius, the Court does not normally check for double criminality if the offence is on the list of the 32 criminal offences, and does not investigate the circumstances of the crimes or evidence of the guilt underlying an EAW.⁶³ For the issuing state it is enough to prove that according to its laws, the offence is on the list of the 32 criminal offences⁶⁴ and is punishable in the state by a custodial sentence or a detention order for a maximum period of at least three years. The court deciding on the EAW usually checks: (1) whether the EAW complies with the EAW form and content requirements; and (2) whether there are grounds on which transfer of the person to another EU Member State should be refused. Depending on the outcome of this check, the court will only verify that no mistakes have been made (for example, if the offence is on the list of 32 criminal offences although it should not be included in the list, given the description of the offence). In cases where a question as to whether a crime has been rightly ‘ticked’ as a ‘listed offence’ by the issuing authority arises, the prosecutor or court may ask for additional information from the issuing authority. An omission by the issuing authority may result in the non-execution of the foreign decision on the grounds of ‘not enough information’.

⁶³ Rulings of the Court of Appeal of Lithuania in criminal cases No. 1N-48/2008; 1N-4/2008.

⁶⁴ The question as to whether a crime is reasonably placed in a certain category is not elucidated in the national legal provisions. However, it may be presumed that if the executing authority were to discover that the legal description of a committed offence was manifestly incorrect and could not be described as one of the categories of ‘32 listed crimes’, it would be forced to take a negative decision on recognition of the issued EAW or other mutual recognition instrument. Thus, in practice, Lithuanian authorities usually require a full description of the offence even if it is a ‘listed offence’. For example, see Švedas and Mickevičius 2009, p. 344.

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 The principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege is set out in Art. 31 of the Constitution: ‘Punishment may be imposed or applied only on the grounds established by law’. Article 2 of the Criminal Code of the Republic of Lithuania states that

[o]nly a person whose act as committed corresponds to a definition of a ... crime or misdemeanour provided for by a criminal law shall be liable under the criminal law. Penalties, penal or reformative sanctions and compulsory medical treatment shall be imposed only in accordance with the law.

Concerns about the compatibility between the principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege and the EAW have still not been raised in Lithuanian legal practice or in CC case law.⁶⁵

It should be noted that in the negotiations on other EU instruments based on mutual recognition (e.g. the draft Framework Decision on the application of the principle of mutual recognition to custodial sentences, which initially did not provide for the rule on double criminality), Lithuanian representatives have usually been consistent in pursuing the position that double criminality (at least for crimes that do not fall into the category of the 32 ‘listed offences’) is a prerequisite for mutual recognition.

However, in the theory of Lithuanian criminal law, questions have arisen with regard to the compatibility of the principle of nullum crimen sine lege and withdrawal (abolition) of the rule of double criminality. It is worthy of note that with regard to the exception of the 32 ‘listed offences’, a question has been raised in the legal commentary as to whether exclusion from the rule of double criminality would be in conformity with the constitutional principles of equality of individuals before the law and their legitimate expectations, as well as with nullum crimen sine lege. Such a question arises in two situations: if Lithuania executes an EAW issued by another state (1) on the ground of an offence which is not fully (or partly) prohibited under the Lithuanian Criminal Code, e.g. in the case of counterfeiting and piracy of products, illicit trafficking in hormonal substances and other growth promoters, or (2) on the ground of any other of the 32 listed criminal offences, where the elements of such offence according to the laws of the requesting state lead to the criminalisation of a broader scope of actions than those covered by the Lithuanian Criminal Code. This theoretical conflict lies in the fact that Lithuania, by executing such an EAW, would be forced to apply coercive measures (e.g. detention, property seizure or other remand measures, etc.) provided for in criminal procedural law for an act that is not prohibited in Lithuania. In other words, if the act were committed in Lithuania, the person in question would not be subject to the coercive measures laid down in the law of criminal procedure and/or criminal law.⁶⁶

⁶⁵ See Sect. 2.3.1.1 for an explanation of the reasons for this tendency.

⁶⁶ Švedas 2008, pp. 67–68; Švedas 2010, pp. 944–945.

It should be noted that research shows that the identical constitutional problems (since the constitution does not allow for cooperation in relation to acts that do not constitute an offence in national criminal law) are faced by 25% of the Member States, and the identification of offences for which double criminality in the other Member State is no longer relevant is problematic in 92% of the Member States.⁶⁷

This theoretical conflict with the constitutional provisions can be disproved only by the CC. However, it has not yet heard any cases of this nature.

It should be noted that the question regarding the issue of retroactive amendment of substantive criminal law still has not emerged either in judicial practice or in the theory of Lithuanian criminal law.

The conclusion may be drawn by the Experts that the principle of nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege can no longer fully be granted the same level of protection as prior to the entry into force of the EAWFD (especially in accordance with the two previously-mentioned cases).

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 Article 31 of the Constitution states that '[a] person charged with the commission of a crime shall have the right to a fair public hearing of his case by an independent and impartial court'. This constitutional provision grants the accused person the right to participate in the court hearing.⁶⁸

Article 246 of the CCP provides for one case allowing in absentia proceedings (judgments) in Lithuania: 'The hearing in the court of first instance is conducted in the presence of the accused. The accused person must appear in court. Proceedings in the absence of the accused shall be allowed only if the accused is not in the Republic of Lithuania and avoids appearing in court'.⁶⁹ This exception is not absolute, as Art. 433 of the CCP provides that the trial is to be postponed if the case cannot be properly resolved without the presence of the accused.

Despite the quite rare application of Chapter XXXII (including Art. 433) of the CCP in practice and its exceptional nature in the CCP, there have been no theoretical discussions about in absentia proceedings (as well as EAW judgments in absentia) conflicting with constitutional provisions in Lithuania. On the contrary, in the doctrine of Lithuanian criminal procedure some proposals have been put forward to expand the grounds for proceedings in absentia in the context of the EAW; for example, to amend certain provisions of the CCP to legitimise the following institutes: judgments in absentia for misdemeanours, negligent crimes, and non-serious or semi-serious premeditated crimes.⁷⁰

⁶⁷ Vermeulen et al. 2012, pp. 127–128.

⁶⁸ Goda et al. 2011, p. 597.

⁶⁹ Translation by the author.

⁷⁰ Švedas 2008, p. 72.

It should be noted that Council Framework Decision 2009/299/JHA amending the in absentia trial rules set out in previous framework decisions⁷¹ has been transposed into the Lithuanian legal system by the amendments of the Criminal Code and CCP of 30 May 2013, using the same wording as in the relevant provisions of the Framework Decision.

The Experts draw the conclusion that the standard of protection remains at the same level in ordinary criminal proceedings and EAW proceedings in absentia. However, in EAW proceedings it is important to: (1) secure for a person convicted in absentia the right to review the case (pending against him) in his physical presence, and (2) ensure a real defence in such proceedings.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 Article 13 of the Constitution provides that ‘[t]he State of Lithuania shall protect its citizens abroad. It shall be prohibited to extradite a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania to another state unless an international treaty of the Republic of Lithuania establishes otherwise’.⁷²

Article 18 of the Law on Consular Statute provides as follows:

If a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania is being detained or is serving a sentence or is suspected of having committed a criminal act in a consular district, a consular officer shall ... contact or, where necessary, meet this person upon a justified request from him, his authorised representative, his spouse (cohabitee) or close relatives. Upon the request of a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania, a consular officer shall ascertain that the citizen has been provided with a defence counsel and other legal aid in accordance with the local laws and that he has been provided with a translator, and where necessary, arrange for the legal aid and translator to be provided. A consular officer shall, where possible, keep in contact with the citizen of the Republic of Lithuania who is serving a sentence of imprisonment and shall ascertain that the conditions of detention of the citizen of the Republic of Lithuania are not worse than those of the citizens of the host State.

A special safeguard for citizens and permanent residents is established in Art. 9¹ of the Criminal Code, which subjects surrender to the condition that the person against whom the issuing Member State has delivered a judgment will be returned to Lithuania to serve the custodial sentence at the request of the person surrendered or where the Prosecutor General’s Office of the Republic of Lithuania so requires. Lithuania has chosen not to enact domestic legislation to regulate such surrender of ⁷¹ Council Framework Decision 2009/299/JHA of 26 February 2009 amending Framework Decisions 2002/584/JHA, 2005/214/JHA, 2006/783/JHA, 2008/909/JHA and 2008/947/JHA, thereby enhancing the procedural rights of persons and fostering the application of the principle of mutual recognition to decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned at the trial, [2009] OJ L 81/24.

⁷² This constitutional provision has been established in the Constitution from the adoption of the Constitution by citizens of the Republic of Lithuania in the Referendum of 25 October 1992.

its own nationals, rather it relies upon the provisions of the 1983 Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons.⁷³

Article 51 of the CCP provides that the assistance of a defence lawyer is mandatory in the proceedings when deciding on a person's extradition or surrender to the International Criminal Court or under an EAW. Article 12 of the Law on State-Guaranteed Legal Aid provides that persons falling within the scope of Art. 51 are eligible for secondary legal aid regardless of their property and income levels.

These are the common rules regarding the assistance that Lithuania provides to all its citizens (inter alia extradited citizens or residents). The laws do not provide for the possibility to recover travel expenses.

According to the available information, there are no public or non-governmental organisations providing assistance to extradited persons in Lithuania. These questions generally belong to the duties of the consulate of the state. The Experts would support a recommendation to introduce a publicly funded state or non-governmental body to provide assistance to residents who are involved in trials abroad. However, this question should be the subject of an individual study on, for example, the competence of such body, etc.

There should be mention of the opposite side of the question – recovering the costs of the transfer process in EAW proceedings. The statistical data shows that the state has recovered the costs of the transfer process from 35 (2007), 14 (2008), 43 (2009), 20 (2010), 30 (2011) and 40 (2012) persons who have been transferred, corresponding to a sum of approximately 56 000 LTL to 264 467 LTL (~18 200–76 000 EUR) per year. This policy of the state has received a lot of criticism, because it unreasonably extends the definition of the costs of criminal proceedings and raises serious doubts about the compliance of this policy with human rights and freedoms standards and the statutory requirements of Lithuania.⁷⁴ The view that the recovery of the costs of the transfer process in EAW or extradition proceedings from transferred persons conflicts with, inter alia, the statutory requirements of Lithuania has been confirmed by the Court of Appeal of Lithuania. The Court of Appeal of Lithuania⁷⁵ has emphasised that the ensuring of costs for material/in-house provisions, health care, catering and other costs related to the maintenance of such persons shall be the responsibility of the state. Such provisions are established in Chapter XIV of the Punishment Enforcement Code of the Republic of Lithuania and in Section 5 of the Law on Detention of the Republic of Lithuania. The status of a person surrendered under extradition or transferred for criminal prosecution to the Republic of Lithuania is a detained person because a court order to impose a remand measure – detention – has been rendered in regard to him/her. It means that all costs related to the material/in-house provisions for this person are the responsibility of the state. ... Meanwhile other costs related to the execution of extradition are related to ⁷³ Report on Lithuania, supra n. 61, p. 23.

⁷⁴ Švedas 2008, p. 72.

⁷⁵ Ruling of the Court of Appeal of Lithuania of 1 June, 2012, No. 75/2012. Translation by the author.

Table 1 Statistics on the Operation of the EAW 2005–2011 in Lithuania

Data on the EAW	2005	2006	2007	2008	2009	2010	2011
EAWs issued^a	500	538	316	348	354	402	420
Transferred to Lithuania under an issued EAW^b	68	62	117	119	108	138	169
Sentenced persons transferred to Lithuania, including:	48	50	59	25	58	31	42
Imprisonment	31	22	42	10	38	21	29
Fine	10	13	14	7	11	5	2
Other penalty	7	15	3	8	9	5	11
Process terminated due to acquittal^c, amnesty, expiry of limitation period, reconciliation	6	7	5	–	7	2	1
Process terminated in the pre-trial investigation stage	12	3	11	15	5	6	14
Percentage of processes terminated because of acquittal, amnesty, expiry of limitation period or reconciliation	9%	11%	4%	0%	6%	1%	1%
Percentage of processes terminated	24%	16%	14%	13%	11%	6%	9% ^d

(Source Authors, on the basis of a variety of documents indicated in the footnotes in the Table)

^aData from the CEPS report noted in the Questionnaire

^bData from the Annual reports of the Prosecution Service of the Republic of Lithuania at <http://www.prokuraturos.lt/Veikla/Veiklosataskaitos/tabid/515/Default.aspx>

^cThe Experts were unable to obtain exact data on acquittals

^dIn 2012 this percentage was the lowest ever – 4% (191 persons transferred; 8 cases of termination) the activities of the state in the area of criminal justice. As it has already been mentioned, the ensuring of such costs is an obligation of the state, which may not be transferred to the person subject to prosecution. Thus, the extradition of R.E. to the Republic of Lithuania is one of the political functions to be financed by the state from its budget; hence, the extradition costs in this case may not be considered as procedural costs.

2.3.4.2 The statistics of the operation of the EAW in Lithuania are summarised in Table 1.

According to the data, there is an obvious trend indicating the increasing efficiency of EAWs year over year. The percentage of extradited persons who have been found innocent in the courts of first instance is approximately 1%. This is not extraordinary compared to the data on general domestic trials. Annually, 1–2% of all cases in the Lithuanian courts of first instance result in acquittal, as summarised in Table 2.

Compensation for individuals who have been extradited and subsequently found innocent could be provided on the grounds already provided for in the legislation of the Republic of Lithuania. Article 30 of the Constitution states that '[any] person whose constitutional rights or freedoms are violated shall have the right to appeal to [a] court. Compensation for material and moral damage inflicted upon a person shall be established by law'. These provisions are further elaborated in the Civil

Table 2 Accused found innocent in the courts of first instance

Data of the courts of first instance ^a	2010	2011	2012
Convicted	17322	16342	17472
Acquitted	227	294	405
Percentage	1,3%	1,8%	2,0%

(Source National Courts Administration, and Reports of the Prosecution Office of the Republic of Lithuania (Data from the National Courts Administration: <http://www.teismai.lt/lt/teismai/teismai-statistika/>; and Reports of the Prosecution Office of the Republic of Lithuania. <http://www.prokuratuos.lt/Veikla/Veiklosataskaitos/tabid/515/Default.aspx>))

^aIt is worth noting that the data is very similar compared to the outcomes of cases in the Lithuanian courts of all instances. See http://osp.stat.gov.lt/services-portlet/publication-file/4224/24_Nusikalstamumas_%202012.pdf

Code (Art. 6.272) and the Law on Compensation for Damage Inflicted by Unlawful Actions of Government and on Representing the State (Art. 4). According to these laws, both pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage resulting from unlawful arrest, conviction or detention shall be compensated, with a maximum limit of 10,000 LTL (2,900 EUR) for pecuniary and 5,000 LTL (1,500 EUR) for non-pecuniary damage in non-judicial order.

It must be noted that no precedents have been highlighted in the Lithuanian media with regard to compensation for damage to persons surrendered under an EAW and later found innocent in court.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1–2.3.5.3 No constitutional issues similar to those indicated in the questionnaire have arisen in the constitutional jurisprudence, court practice or legal commentary of Lithuania with regard to mutual recognition in criminal law and the abolition of the exequatur in civil and commercial matters.⁷⁶

Moreover, there have been no debates about the suitability of transposing mutual recognition from internal market matters to criminal and civil procedures either in the doctrine of criminal procedure or in the doctrine of civil procedure of Lithuania. No concerns have been expressed about a change in the role of the courts. In the opinion of Vytautas Nekrošius (a leading expert in the field of Lithuanian civil procedure), the abolition of the exequatur in civil and commercial matters has been accepted favourably in the doctrine of Lithuanian civil procedure.

2.3.5.4 The practical application of the EAW has revealed a serious problem with regard to issuing EAWs in Lithuania: until 2013 neither the prosecutors nor the courts applied a proportionality test.⁷⁷ During the fourth round of mutual evaluations,⁷⁸ prosecutors expressed the following concern:

⁷⁶ Regarding the reasons, see Sect. 2.3.1.1.

Under Article 2 of the CCP the prosecutor is obliged to prosecute all criminal acts and to take all steps and action under the law to prosecute an offender, domestically or otherwise. This provision was referred to by the Lithuanian authorities as the ‘principle of legality’. In application of this principle no proportionality test whatsoever is applied in issuing EAWs, although Lithuanian authorities informed the expert team that in practice in certain cases – in view of the resources used compared to the gravity of the criminal offence – they may choose not to issue an EAW in the first place but to exploit other possibilities to address the issue (such as MLA requests). This may explain, together with a rather strong criminal environment, why Lithuania issues around 500 EAWs per year. In per capita terms this is most probably the highest rate of issue of any Member State.

However, the situation changed significantly in 2013 after the adoption of amendments to Art. 69¹ of the CCP, which provides: ‘[the] Lithuanian Prosecutor General’s Office or the Regional Court, acting on a European arrest warrant ..., must evaluate whether the transfer of the person under the European Arrest Warrant is in line with proportionality and procedural economy, taking into account the nature and extent of the severity of the committed crime, as well as the personality of the suspect, accused or convicted person’. It should be emphasised that Lithuanian judges and prosecutors are of the opinion that control of the proportionality of EAWs is among the most important issues raised in recent years.

Moreover, the non-legally binding European Handbook on How to Issue a European Arrest Warrant, which provides guidance for improving the uniformity of the application of the EAW across the EU and includes the proportionality test amongst the factors to be examined by national authorities when issuing an EAW as well as alternatives to issuing an EAW, has also played a very important and positive role in this context.

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

Doubt has been expressed in the theory of Lithuanian criminal law with regard to the manner in which the EAWFD provisions were drafted, in particular whether they are in conformity with the requirements of Art. 13 of the Constitution, according to which a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania may be surrendered only in the cases specified in the international treaties concluded by Lithuania. Some authors (for example, Algimantas Čepas) claim that the EAWFD specifies that it has been adopted under para. 2(b) of Art. 34 TEU, whereby the EU Member States have delegated to the Council of the EU the power to adopt Framework Decisions, and that therefore, the grounds for surrendering Lithuanian citizens is the TEU as an international treaty.⁷⁹ Similar arguments have also been upheld by the Court of Appeal, which has concluded in one of its rulings⁸⁰ regarding the surrender of a Lithuanian citizen, M.M., to France under an EAW that ‘the surrender of persons under the European Arrest Warrant is provided for in an international treaty of the Republic of Lithuania, which has supremacy in respect of the rules of Art. 226 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of the Republic of Lithuania’.⁸¹

⁷⁷ Švedas and Mickevičius 2009, p. 354; Žižienė 2014, pp. 450–452. For similar problems in other Member States, see Weyembergh et al. 2014.

⁷⁸ Report on Lithuania, supra n. 61, p. 32.

On the other hand, such arguments raise certain doubts,⁸² because in cases of extradition the court directly applies the provisions of the international treaty on extradition of the Republic of Lithuania, the CC and the CCP,⁸³ whereas when deciding the issue of surrendering any person (including a citizen of the Republic of Lithuania) under an EAW, the court in fact applies only the provisions of the CC and the CCP. Nevertheless, the actual provisions of the CC and CCP continue to be applied as they stand and the aforementioned question of a constitutional nature can only be resolved by the CC if such a case is submitted to it.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 Article 22 of the Constitution protects the right to privacy and secrecy of communications as follows:

The private life of a human being shall be inviolable. Personal correspondence, telephone conversations, telegraph messages, and other communications shall be inviolable. Information concerning the private life of a person may be collected only upon a justified court decision and only according to the law.

It may be worth noting that by using the term ‘inviolable’, the provision is stricter than the equivalent provisions in the EU Charter and the ECHR that refer to ‘respect’ for private and family life, home and communications (Art. 7 of the Charter).

⁷⁹ Švedas 2004, p. 75.

⁸⁰ Criminal case No. 1N-11/2006.

⁸¹ Čepas and Švedas, pp. 84–85. Translation by the author.

⁸² Švedas 2008, p. 66; Švedas 2010, pp. 946–947.

⁸³ It should be noted that this practice of the courts has been held to be well-founded by the Supreme Court of Lithuania in para. 2 of the Senate’s Ruling No. 42 ‘On the practice of courts in applying international treaties of the Republic of Lithuania and the provisions of the Criminal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure, regulating the surrender of persons to foreign States or to the International Criminal Court’ of 29 December 2003, where it emphasised that in ‘deciding whether there are grounds and conditions to surrender the person to a foreign state ..., the Vilnius County Court shall follow international treaties, Art. 9 of the Criminal Code and Art. 71 of the Code of Criminal Procedure’ (translation by the author).

The adoption and implementation of the Data Retention Directive⁸⁴ in Lithuania has not raised any wide constitutional concerns neither in court practice nor at the political level. However, some commentators, including the author of the present report, supporting the views of the Art. 29 Data Protection Working Party established under Directive 95/46,⁸⁵ have voiced doubts as regards the compatibility of the then draft data retention framework decision, which later became the Data Retention Directive, both conceptually (that is, the regime itself: data retention versus data preservation) and regarding certain details (the scope of collectable data; the length of the retention period, the lack of judicial control, etc.).⁸⁶ These doubts were based both on the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR)⁸⁷ and of the CC.

The CC ruled in 2002 that the right to the inviolability of private life is not absolute. Under the Constitution, restriction of the constitutional rights and freedoms of the individual is permitted if certain conditions are observed (see Sect. 2.1.2).⁸⁸ The Court ruled that Art. 22 requires, inter alia, that the legislature establish by a law a procedure for collection of information about the private life of an individual. While the law must provide that information concerning the private life of an individual may be collected upon a reasoned court decision only,⁸⁹ the Court pointed out that the obligation on the part of operators to collect, store and provide all communications data to state institutions at their own expense is contrary to Arts. 22 and 23 of the Constitution (protection of the right to privacy and property).

The Directive was implemented by amendments to the Electronic Communications Law (Art. 65 and Annex I) by restating the relevant contents of the Directive and adding that the operators have to provide data to state institutions for free. Because of this, all of the constitutional concerns raised by the ECJ in the Digital Rights Ireland judgment as well as by the constitutional courts of some of the Member States in their respective decisions are also relevant for Lithuania. It could be said that the relevant provisions of the Law are clearly excessive and disproportionate and have failed to establish proper mechanisms for supervision, including judicial control. Additionally, they go against the ruling of the CC as regards the provision of data to state institutions for free. Therefore, the annulment

⁸⁴ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁸⁵ See Opinion 4/2005 of the Art. 29 Data Protection Working Party. http://ec.europa.eu/justice/policies/privacy/docs/wpdocs/2005/wp113_en.pdf.

⁸⁶ Jarukaitis et al. 2005, pp. 369–375; Štililis 2006, pp. 69–75.

⁸⁷ For example, Amann v. Switzerland [GC], no. 27798/95, ECHR 2000-II.

⁸⁸ Ruling of 23 October 2002.

⁸⁹ Ruling of 19 September 2002.

of the Data Retention Directive should trigger at least a review of the Electronic Communications Law, although hitherto no formal amendments have been tabled before the Parliament.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 Article 7(2) of the Constitution explicitly stipulates that only laws which are promulgated shall be valid. The CC treats this requirement as part of the principle of the rule of law. In its rulings of 11 January 2001 and 29 November 2001, the Court made it clear that law must not be secret; laws are not valid and must not be applied until they are officially published. It stressed that an essential element of the principle of the rule of law is that only published legal acts are effective; the constitutional requirement that legal acts must be published to have legal effect is an important precondition of legal certainty. Indeed the CC went so far as to state that all acts of the Government (of normative or individual nature) must be published; the Court annulled a provision of a law which provided that resolutions of the Government ‘in which legal norms are not established, amended or acknowledged as no longer valid’ need not be published as well as the contested decision of the Government that had not been officially published, as contrary to the principle of the rule of law.

The SAC has developed similar practice. Where it has faced the question of conformity of normative acts (e.g. municipality regulations, ministerial orders, etc.) to the laws or decrees of the Government and a review of legality of a certain act has been initiated, the court, after establishing that the contested act has not been properly published, has refused to initiate the case, stating that it does not have the competence to review the legality of non-existent acts (that is, the content of the act does not exist, since it was not published).⁹⁰

The SAC has also had to deal with the legality of individual acts that have been adopted on the basis of (not properly published) unpublished EU legislation. After clarifying with the Office of Publications that the relevant EU regulation had been properly published in Lithuanian only after the adoption of the contested administrative act issued by the customs authority by which an additional customs duty and a pecuniary fine were imposed on a company, the Court, relying on the ECJ Skoma-Lux judgment, annulled the contested measure.⁹¹

⁹⁰ For example, Ruling of 3 May 2012 in Case No. I⁴⁹²-30/2012.

⁹¹ Decision of 25 July 2011 in Case No. A⁴³⁸-305/2011.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation

2.6.1 No direct constitutional or similar challenges have been brought before the national courts concerning the national implementing measures for the EU transitional measures concerning agricultural stocks.

However, the Lithuanian Government was successful in challenging a Decision of the Commission concerning the obligation of the state to remove from the market all agricultural stocks which could not be considered as normal carryover stocks. Although it took the General Court five years to deliver the judgment, it annulled Commission Decision No. 2007/361/EC in 2012.⁹²

The practice of the CC reveals its readiness to annul market regulation measures on the basis of a violation of the prohibition of retroactive effect of legal acts,⁹³ or of the principles of proportionality,⁹⁴ legal certainty⁹⁵ or legitimate expectations,⁹⁶ although the principle of legitimate expectations has entered the CC's 'vocabulary' rather late, in response to legislative practice in the field of social issues, which itself was a reaction to the economic crisis of 1998–1999.⁹⁷ It can also be said that the Court in its jurisprudence uses more ECtHR than ECJ case law as a source of inspiration.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1–2.7.3 The ratification of the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) has mostly been discussed in Lithuania in the context of the introduction of the euro as of 1 January 2015. In order to introduce the euro, Lithuania had to join the ESM Treaty, which was done by a parliamentary law adopted on 18 December 2014. The explanatory memorandum that was submitted to Parliament with the draft ratification law treated the ratification of the ESM

⁹² Case T-262/07 Republic of Lithuania v. European Commission [2012] ECLI:EU:T:2012:171. The Court ruled that the Commission used the wrong methodology and was not able to show that the exports of surplus stocks actually took place or that other measures for eliminating the surpluses were taken, or that they were financed by the Community budget, i.e. it ruled that the Commission overstepped its wide discretion and violated provisions of the Act of Accession. From the point of view of this project, it may be worth noting that the Lithuanian Government's arguments were not formulated in constitutionalist terms.

⁹³ Ruling of 29 November 2001.

⁹⁴ Ruling of 14 March 2002.

⁹⁵ For example, Rulings of 17 March 2003; 31 May 2006.

⁹⁶ Rulings of 23 February 2000; 13 May 2005; 5 July 2007.

⁹⁷ Šileikis 2005, p. 254.

Treaty as an additional financial guarantee for the state financial system. There were some discussions both within the Parliament and in the general public concerning the far-reaching obligations undertaken under the ESM Treaty, but these discussions were to some extent overshadowed by events in Ukraine, since accession to the eurozone is viewed in Lithuania not only from the economic but also from the geopolitical perspective.

It should further be noted, that the SAC has had to deal with a case concerning the lawfulness of the refusal of the Central Electoral Commission to register an application from a referendum initiative group concerning amendment of the Constitution with regard to the (non)introduction of the euro in 2014. Similarly as in the case before the Polish Constitutional Tribunal, the extensive financial obligations under the ESM Treaty were mentioned as one of the secondary arguments, with the claim that the obligation to introduce the euro under the Accession Treaty had in fact been annulled since the conditions of participation had changed dramatically.⁹⁸

The different (constitutional) aspects of the ESM Treaty, Eurobonds and the Banking Union have not attracted the attention of Lithuanian legal scholars so far. In the Expert's opinion, as regards commitments under the ESM Treaty, two main, interrelated issues arise. The first concerns the intensity of solidarity desired at the EU level, since financial resources pooled under the ESM Treaty would be used for those in need (therefore Member States do not only undertake financial commitments, but they also receive guarantees). The second concerns democracy at the national level, since commitments under the ESM reduce the ability of the national parliaments to decide on spending.

The financial crisis is considered further below in Sect. 3.5.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 There are no statistics on the number of cases in which the applicants have requested a preliminary ruling regarding the validity of an EU legal measure in the Lithuanian courts. However, given the fact that applicants in Lithuania are still rather reluctant to rely on EU law, it may be assumed that the number of such requests is very low. In the majority of requests for a preliminary ruling to the ECJ, Lithuanian courts have raised questions regarding the interpretation and not the validity of EU acts. So far there has only been one request from the Vilnius District Administrative Court concerning the validity of various provisions of Regulation No. 73/2009/EU and the Commission Implementing Decision C (2012) 4391,

⁹⁸ See the Ruling of the SAC of 18 July 2014 in Case No. R-858-11-14. The Court rejected this argument and stated that the ESM Treaty may not be viewed as a factor modifying the obligations undertaken under the Accession Treaty without its formal amendment.

which was submitted to the ECJ on 4 March 2014 (Jakutis and Kretingalės kooperatinė ŽŪB, C-103/14).⁹⁹

2.8.2–2.8.5 Looking at the latest ECJ case law that has been developed after the entry into force of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and the methodological approach of the Court in these cases,¹⁰⁰ it is difficult to draw the definite conclusion that the ECJ standard of judicial review is clearly lower than that performed by the Lithuanian courts. Admittedly, the Sugar quotas case law raises certain questions as regards the intensity of judicial review; however, in the Expert's view, this may to some extent be explained by the transitional (one-off) nature of the contested measures. On the other hand, the CC has also exhibited certain self-restraint in the evaluation of measures which involve complex policy choices.

The CC jurisprudence reveals different approaches in terms of the intensity of judicial review depending on the content of the contested legal provisions. Where the CC has been faced with questions related to ex ante economic (or other) policy formation or implementation, it has demonstrated judicial self-restraint: the CC has emphasised the wide discretion of political institutions, which means that from the point of view of the principle of proportionality, the Court has used the test of manifest error, instead of rigorous scrutiny. Still, the Court has been certain to check whether the contested provisions are in line with the general principles of law.¹⁰¹ This approach is similar to that of the ECJ when it is called upon to evaluate decisions involving political, economic and social choices.¹⁰²

⁹⁹ The request related to the question of differences in direct payments to farmers of the 'old' and 'new' Member States and the conformity of various provisions of Regulation No. 73/2009 establishing common rules for direct support schemes for farmers under the common agricultural policy and the Commission Implementing Decision C(2012) 4391 final with the Accession Treaty and the general principles of EU law. The ECJ in its judgment of 12 November 2015 found no grounds affecting the validity of Regulation No. 73/2009, but declared the Commission Implementing Decision C(2012) 4391 of 2 July 2012 contrary to the 2003 Act of Accession. The Implementing Decision ordered, inter alia, the reduction of complementary national direct payments paid to Lithuanian farmers in 2012 if certain levels of direct payments were surpassed.

¹⁰⁰ For example, see Joined cases C-92/09 and C-93/09 Volker und Markus Schecke and Eifert [2010] ECR I-11063; Case C-236/09 Association Belge des Consommateurs Test-Achats and Others [2011] ECR I-00773; C-283/11 Sky Österreich ECLI:EU:C:2013:28; and Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

¹⁰¹ For example, in its Ruling of 31 May 2006, the Court found: 'Under the Constitution, the Seimas as the institution of legislative power and the Government as an institution of executive power enjoy very broad discretion to form and execute the economic policy of the state (each according to their competence) and to properly regulate economic activities by means of legal acts, by not violating the Constitution and laws, inter alia by not exceeding the powers established in them to the said institutions of state power and by following the requirements of the proper legal process which stems from the Constitution and the principles of a state under the rule of law, of separation of powers, of responsible governance, of protection of legitimate expectations and the principles of legal clarity, certainty and security' (translation by the author; emphasis added).

¹⁰² For example, Case C-289/97 Eridania [2000] ECR I-05409; Case C-127/07 Arcelor Atlantique and Lorraine and Others [2008] ECR I-09895.

In other cases, where the contested measures have been more an ex post reaction to various market failures (e.g. the establishment of exclusive rights in areas where a natural monopoly exists) or where the balancing of the freedom of business activities with other (societal) non-economic ends is involved, judicial review has been more intensive.¹⁰³ The CC has invalidated national provisions on various grounds: breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the grant of unlawful privileges,¹⁰⁴ non-respect of legitimate expectations and excessive restrictions on economic activities,¹⁰⁵ breach of proportionality¹⁰⁶ and the rights of consumers.¹⁰⁷

Thus, as a matter of the test applicable, it is not possible to say that the judicial review performed by the CC and the judicial review by the ECJ are conceptually different. Of course, when it comes to the evaluation of a particular situation, views may differ.

As regards the judicial review of EU legal acts or national acts implementing EU law at national level, Lithuanian commentators agree that judicial review of EU legal acts is not possible before the CC¹⁰⁸ or the SAC. The CC has never elaborated on this issue and de facto has never performed such control. In the Expert's opinion, such control is not possible due to the fact that the Constitution clearly defines the legal acts which may be subjected to constitutional control before the CC; these, according to Art. 105, are laws of the Republic of Lithuania, other acts adopted by the Seimas, and acts of the President and of the Government. There is no right of an individual constitutional complaint before the CC in Lithuania.

The CC in its practice has never differentiated between national acts depending on whether they implement EU law or not (again, there is no legal basis to do so). To date, when reviewing the constitutionality of national laws that implement EU law, the CC has taken 'the EU law dimension' into account by either referring questions for a preliminary ruling to the ECJ (see Sect. 1.3.4 above) or referring to EU law itself when interpreting the relevant provisions of the Constitution. After the Ruling of 24 January 2014, it appeared theoretically possible that the CC could rule that a national provision implementing EU law contravenes the Constitution, if the innate nature of human rights and freedoms would be negated. It could be argued that the principle of loyal co-operation would require that the CC address the ECJ first with regard to a challenge to the validity of the relevant EU provision.

¹⁰³ For example, in its Ruling of 26 January 2004 the Court noted that rights and freedoms, as well as the freedom of economic activity may be restricted on the conditions noted earlier in the report, and proceeded to note that '[t]he state and its institutions, having the discretion to establish the special legal regulation of alcohol production and the market, may not do so by choosing means so inadequate to the objectives sought, by which they would introduce the monopoly of production and the market of these products, [and] would groundlessly restrict the freedom of economic activity and fair competition' (translation by the author).

¹⁰⁴ Rulings of 20 April 1995; 17 March 2003; 26 January 2004.

¹⁰⁵ Ruling of 23 February 2000.

¹⁰⁶ Ruling of 14 March 2002.

¹⁰⁷ Rulings of 17 March 2003; 20 September 2010.

¹⁰⁸ Jarašiūnas 2004, p. 26; Namavičius 2004, p. 135; Kūris 2004a, pp. 199–200; Abramavičius 2006, p. 313; Jarukaitis 2010a, pp. 256–257.

2.8.6 So far there has been no judicial practice related to the question of equal treatment of persons depending on whether they fall within the scope of EU law or not. This might be because of the fact that as a rule, there would be no differentiation from the point of view of the Constitution or Lithuanian laws; the main dividing line is between persons having Lithuanian or EU citizenship and third country nationals.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 According to the CC, restrictions of fundamental rights and freedoms may be imposed only by laws adopted by Parliament. Further, the CC has explicitly stated in 2002 that the Constitution does not allow for the delegation of legislative powers from the Parliament to the Government.¹⁰⁹ Thus, Art. 1 of the CA is the only explicit exception to this prohibition in the sense that it legitimates the transfer of legislative powers to the Council and in doing so implicitly acknowledges that the ministers act as legislators in the Council. Such approach has not changed after Lithuania's accession to the EU. The only change has been the introduction of the fast-track procedure for the adoption of EU related draft law in the Statute of the Parliament, which aims to ensure the timely implementation of EU law.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1–2.10.2 In the Expert's opinion, the ECHR is the best reflection of the common minimum standard of protection of fundamental rights and freedoms within the Member States. Therefore, all the rights and general principles of law addressed in the Questionnaire may be treated as part of the common constitutional traditions.

With regard to promotion of the relevance of national constitutional traditions on the EU level, several aspects should be noted. National constitutional imperatives are of particular importance in the EU legislative process. In the Expert's view, these imperatives are addressed to all national institutions, including national governments which vote within the Council. It means, inter alia, that the national minister has the obligation to vote against a draft EU measure, which would, once adopted, create a conflict between the national constitution and EU law (except in situations where there are plans to modify the relevant constitutional provision).

¹⁰⁹ Ruling of 26 October 1995.

When interpreting and applying EU law, national courts refer to national constitutional provisions in their requests for preliminary rulings from time to time.¹¹⁰ Arguments related to national constitutional traditions submitted by the courts in references for preliminary rulings are welcome and should be promoted as an important tool for maintaining the relevance of national constitutional traditions in the discourse on human rights at the EU level.

As regards reflection of national constitutional traditions in ECJ judgments, several aspects should be noted. Bearing in mind the current number of Member States, it would be impossible to reflect on all of the relevant constitutional traditions in each judgment of the ECJ. If this is not possible, the question rises as to the methodology the ECJ should choose to identify which Member States' traditions would be considered, and the ECJ may be subjected to criticism on this point.¹¹¹ Further, extensive references to national legal traditions would usually relate to the interpretation of national law. It should also be noted that such comparative reflection should not be seen as an end in itself, but as a tool for finding optimal solutions to problems raised. Thus, in the Expert's opinion, the most appropriate tool for extensive reflections on national constitutional traditions are the opinions of the Advocates General.

Nevertheless there is one particular area which inevitably calls for a deeper analysis of national constitutional traditions and where direct references to national constitutional traditions are not only welcome, but necessary. These are cases where the Member States rely on Art. 4(2) of the TEU. Given the fact that the obligation to respect the national constitutional identities of the Member States extends to all EU institutions, including the ECJ, the Court has the obligation to respond to such arguments and to balance the imperative of EU law to respect national identity against other imperatives of EU law.¹¹²

¹¹⁰ See, for example, Case C-314/13 Peftiev and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:1645, which concerned the possible unfreezing of assets by a national institution that were needed for legal representation before the General Court. In the reference to the ECJ, the SAC noted that a literal interpretation of the relevant provisions of Regulation No. 765/2006 of 18 May 2006 concerning restrictive measures in respect of Belarus would not be compatible with the right to judicial defence, as guaranteed by Art. 47 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights, Art. 6 of the ECHR and Art. 30 of the Constitution of Lithuania. In its judgment the ECJ, although without mentioning the Constitution of Lithuania explicitly, broadly adopted the approach proposed by the SAC.

¹¹¹ The Expert has no doubt that 'internally' the ECJ undertakes such analysis of national constitutional traditions, however; this should not always be reflected in the text of the judgment.

¹¹² For example, Case C-391/09 Runevič-Vardyn and Wardyn [2011] ECR I-03787.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 With regard to higher or lower standards for human rights protection, one has to bear in mind what rights are involved. Commentators writing on the Melloni judgment have usually tended to emphasise the right of the suspected/accused/convicted person to a public hearing (which in fact the person in the main proceedings decided to waive). However, what about the rights of the victims of the crime (this question is of relevance especially taking into account the facts in the main proceedings, where the whole story began already in 1996!)? Should victims of crime be afforded lower standards of protection simply because of the fact that the suspected/accused/convicted person used his/her right of free movement under EU law, or should there be a balance between the two?

In the Expert's opinion, the ECJ judgment in Melloni is quite balanced, since the main emphasis was placed on the compatibility of the Framework Decision with the Charter and the responsibilities of the Member States: if they do not want to have a single set of rules, the requirement of unanimity in the Council ensures the right of the Member State to maintain a higher standard of protection. Thus, if there is no 'EU consensus' in the form of a piece of secondary EU law, Art. 53 remains relevant. Otherwise, in terms of legal logic it is quite difficult to come to some other conclusion than the ECJ: how could provisions of the Framework Decision, which were declared to be compatible with the Charter, not be applicable to the Member State which agreed to be bound by it, unless the Member State has claimed that it contravenes Art. 4(2) TEU, which was not the case?¹¹³ Moreover, the Charter itself does not oblige the Member States to provide for a higher standard in every situation. If the Framework Decision left discretion to the Member States to adopt a different ('higher') standard, what would be the purpose of adopting the Framework Decision?

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 There have been no wide public deliberations either at the time of adoption or at the time of implementation of the EAW Framework Decision and the EU Data Retention Directive in Lithuania.

2.12.2–2.12.3 Normally, democratic deliberations should take place before an EU measure is adopted. If the Member States envisage that an EU measure might trigger possible constitutional reforms or involve difficult value choices at the national level, they should take this into account by establishing a longer transposition period. As regards the national constitutional review of national implementing measures, the question is whether the constitutional issue is predetermined by the EU measure itself. If the answer is positive, there are no obstacles to using the preliminary ruling procedure in order to check the validity of the EU measure and to ask for the application of interim measures under Art. 279 of the TFEU. Thus, one has to differentiate between situations where the unconstitutionality of a national measure is predetermined by the unconstitutionality of the EU measure itself, and situations that concern purely ‘internal’/national unconstitutionality issues.

¹¹³ See Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107, paras. 62–63.

As for the permissibility of an ‘unconstitutionality’ defence in the course of infringement proceedings, this would be highly problematic from the point of view of the equality of the Member States and EU citizens. The only approximate legal basis for such a defence would be Art. 4(2) of the TEU with the argument that the EU measure violates the obligation to respect the national identity of the Member State; however, it would be difficult to explain why the Member State did not use the annulment procedure in order to contest the EU measure if it clearly violates the core values of the particular Member State. It would be also difficult to introduce any element of subjectivity in infringement proceedings, since this would open the door for other ‘innocent’ excuses (like failure to form a Government or to achieve the necessary majority in the national parliament, etc.).

2.13 Experts’ Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.2 The Expert is of the opinion that there is no basis to speak of the overall reduction of the standard of protection of fundamental rights or the rule of law which is predetermined by EU law. One of the exceptions to this general conclusion is the field of criminal law or, to be more precise, the abandonment of the double criminality rule for some categories of offences in the EAW Framework Decision. In other fields, in the majority of cases the problems lie at the level of implementation/application of EU law or in the national implementing measures. Moreover, the entry into force of the Charter of Fundamental Rights has been of utmost importance for providing the ECJ with an important tool to tackle problems related to the protection of fundamental rights.

In the Expert’s view, one of the most important things to do is to ensure true democratic deliberations before the adoption of an EU measure. To do so, national parliaments, NGOs and the academic community should all play a role.

Given the complexity of EU decision-making and the process of implementing EU law, ex-ante constitutional review of draft EU measures before the ECJ could be considered as an option to ensure the timely evaluation of possible constitutional concerns.

Finally, it seems that national (constitutional) courts have become more active in recent years in using the preliminary ruling procedure, which is a welcome development.

2.13.3–2.13.4 So far, Lithuanian courts have not raised any constitutional concerns before the ECJ. The question of national constitutional concerns is quite delicate, since in some cases (e.g. the EAW Framework Decision as regards the surrender of nationals) the adoption of the EU measures may explicitly or implicitly pre-suppose national constitutional reforms, and failure to implement such constitutional revisions could hardly be treated as a legitimate excuse for failure to implement EU law. On the other hand, if a Member State bases its defence on the national identity clause (Art. 4(2) of the TEU), the ECJ has the obligation to respond to this argument properly, as required by Art. 6 of the ECHR and the jurisprudence of the ECtHR.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1–3.1.4 Article 136 of the Constitution provides that ‘[t]he Republic of Lithuania shall participate in international organizations provided that this is not in conflict with the interests and independence of the State’. Additionally, Art. 135(1) of the Constitution states that ‘[i]n implementing its foreign policy, the Republic of Lithuania shall follow the universally recognized principles and norms of international law, shall seek to ensure national security and independence, the welfare of the citizens and their basic rights and freedoms, and shall contribute to the creation of the international order based on law and justice’.

These constitutional provisions were established in the original version of the Constitution, adopted in 1992, and are treated as the constitutional basis for Lithuania’s participation in international organizations other than the EU, for which the separate Constitutional Act was adopted. No formal amendments of Art. 135 or 136 have been tabled before the Parliament so far.

In 2011, the CC ruled implicitly that Art. 136 is the proper constitutional basis for Lithuania’s participation in NATO.¹¹⁴

In the Expert’s opinion, the current constitutional provisions are adequate and no amendments are needed.

¹¹⁴ Ruling of 15 March 2011.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 Under Art. 138(3) of the Constitution, international treaties ratified by the Seimas shall be a constituent part of the legal system of the Republic of Lithuania.

According to the jurisprudence of the CC, treaties that have been ratified by the Parliament have the force of law and may be directly applied in Lithuania. In the case of a conflict between a ratified treaty and a statute adopted by the Parliament (let alone lower sources of law such as governmental decrees, etc.), provisions of the treaty have priority. However, this rule is clearly not applicable to the Constitution itself, which has precedence over ratified treaties.¹¹⁵

In the legal commentary, the approach of the CC to international treaties is treated as monistic,¹¹⁶ since the provisions of treaties may directly generate rights for private persons at the national level. The ECHR has received special treatment, as the CC has explicitly acknowledged the impact of the ECHR on the Lithuanian legal system, including on the Constitution of Lithuania.¹¹⁷ It is also the source of international law that is most frequently applied by the Lithuanian courts.¹¹⁸

Of course, the process of globalisation has modified the interrelationship between the national and international levels of governance in various ways. Still, the concepts of monism and dualism remain relevant to the extent that they explain whether, as a matter of principle, provisions of international law are a source of law from the point of view of the national constitution, that is, whether private persons may defend their rights directly on the basis of international law in the national courts.

3.3 Democratic control

3.3.1–3.3.2 Article 67(16) of the Constitution envisages that the Parliament shall ratify and denounce international treaties and consider other issues of foreign policy. Article 138(1) lists the categories of international treaties which require ratification by the Parliament. These include treaties on the participation of the Republic of Lithuania in universal international organisations and regional international organisations; multilateral or long-term economic treaties; treaties regarding alteration of the state boundaries, defence of the state, peace treaties and treaties on the use of force; political co-operation with foreign states; mutual ¹¹⁵ See, for example, Ruling of 5 September 2012 of the CC; Judgment of 6 March 2014 of the SAC in Case No. R525-8/2014.

¹¹⁶ Vadapalas 1998, pp. 47–48 and 55–62; Vadapalas and Jarukaitis 2003, pp. 473–478; Jarukaitis 2006a, pp. 385–390.

¹¹⁷ Rulings of 8 May 2000; 29 December 2004; 15 November 2013; Kūris 2004b, p. 85–86.

¹¹⁸ Jarukaitis 2010b, pp. 176–195.

assistance treaties; and treaties on the presence and status of Lithuania's armed forces on the territories of foreign states. Laws as well as international treaties may also provide for other cases in which the Seimas must ratify an international treaty.

The Law on International Treaties, adopted by the Parliament in 1999, regulates the procedures for the conclusion of international treaties in detail. It establishes a traditional approach to the conclusion and execution of international treaties, where the right of initiative belongs to the executive branch and, once negotiated, treaties are submitted to the Parliament for ratification. The executive branch is also responsible for the implementation of concluded international treaties at the national level. Neither the Constitution nor parliamentary statutes establish specific provisions concerning the ex post involvement of the Parliament in the supervision of the execution of international commitments. Under the Statute of the Seimas, the committees of the Parliament may discuss any questions, including those related to international issues or commitments. In practice, the Parliament and its committees discuss international issues on a regular basis.

With the exception of Lithuania's accession to the EU, no referendums have hitherto been held as regards participation in international organisations or the conclusion of any particular international treaty. There are no legal obstacles to organising a referendum on international matters.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 Article 105 of the Constitution grants the CC the powers of ex ante review (by adopting an opinion) of international treaties as regards their compliance with the Constitution. These powers have been used once, when Lithuania decided to ratify the ECHR.¹¹⁹ There have so far been no instances of ex post constitutional control of an international treaty ratified by Lithuania with regard to compliance with the Constitution.

As already noted in Part I, the CC treats the pacta sunt servanda principle as part of the constitutional principle of the rule of law. Indeed, the CC has gone so far as to say that no constitutional amendments that fail to comply with international obligations undertaken by Lithuania may be adopted. However, the recent ruling of the CC which declares that pursuant to the Constitution, the innate nature of human rights and freedoms may not be negated, may theoretically be treated as a possible ground for challenging international commitments that contravene this requirement.

¹¹⁹ Opinion of 24 January 1995.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 The Constitution of Lithuania does not establish the principle of a social state explicitly. Nevertheless, both the CC¹²⁰ and Lithuanian commentators¹²¹ tend to speak about the principle of social solidarity and the social orientation of the Constitution.

Lithuania was hit by the economic crisis of 2008–2009 particularly badly, the reason being the global recession and the price bubble in the real estate sector. The cuts in the public sector (salaries in the public service, pensions and social allowances) were drastic. Nevertheless, the Government decided to borrow from markets rather than from the IMF or other international institutions. One of the explanations for this decision was the argument that the conditions imposed by the IMF would reduce the ability of the Government to implement its own policies. Moreover, the probability of devaluation of the national currency also played its part.¹²² This decision of the Government received much criticism, because the interest rates in the international markets were much higher than those proposed by the IMF.¹²³ Later, the CC ruled that certain measures introduced during the crisis that reduced social benefits and pensions were unconstitutional.¹²⁴ Lithuania has not been subject to any EU or international bailout or austerity programme so far.

The constitutional discourse on this subject has not been developed in Lithuania. In the Expert's view, the social dimension of the Constitution first and foremost depends on the sound macro-economic policies of the state and its ability to compete on the European and global markets. The CC, relying on the principle of good governance, requires that all draft measures, the implementation of which would require extra state funding not envisaged in the budget adopted by the Parliament, should clearly indicate the source of necessary funding.¹²⁵ Further, relying on Art. 128 of the Constitution, according to which ‘[d]ecisions concerning

¹²⁰ For example, Ruling of 1 July 2013.

¹²¹ Kūris 2001, pp. 266–270; Šileikis 2005, pp. 210–214.

¹²² For more details on the subject, see, for example, http://www.networkideas.org/featart/apr2013/pdf/Kattel_Raudla.pdf; <https://euobserver.com/opinion/114419>.

¹²³ It should also be noted that the sharp decline in 2009–2011 was followed by a very brisk economic recovery during the last couple of years. According to the statistics, the Lithuanian economy exhibits one of the highest growth rates in the EU.

¹²⁴ For example, in the Ruling of 6 February 2012 the CC ruled, inter alia, that the reduction of social pensions for working persons contravenes Art. 48(1) of the Constitution, as ‘[e]ach human being may freely choose a job or business’; in the Ruling of 5 March 2013, the CC ruled that certain aspects of the reduction of maternity allowances were not in line with the principle of the rule of law (were not proportionate); in the Ruling of 1 July 2013, the CC ruled that the uneven reduction of the salaries of state officials, where the salary reductions of highly paid state officials were greater in comparison to those of persons who earned less, was not in line with Art. 29(1): ‘All persons shall be equal before the law’, Art. 48(1) ‘Each human being ... shall have the right ... to receive fair pay for work’ and the principle of the rule of law (proportionality principle).

¹²⁵ For example, Ruling of 13 December 2004.

[State loans] and other basic property liabilities of the State shall be adopted by the Seimas on the proposal of the Government', the CC implicitly expanded the principle of democracy to the extent that all decisions related to 'basic property liabilities', i.e. having significant financial implications on the state budget, have to be approved by the Parliament.¹²⁶

3.6 Conclusions

To conclude the Report, concerns related to the state of protection of fundamental rights or constitutionalism in general reveal the close interaction of the supranational and national levels. In the view of both Experts, there is no basis to speak of the overall decline in the standards of protection of fundamental rights or the rule of law which is predetermined by EU law. On the other hand, at least as regards Lithuania, analysis shows a lack of real discussion among the public concerning various issues decided at the EU level, which later have had a profound impact upon implementation at the national level (the adoption and implementation of the Data Retention Directive is one such example). Thus, there is a real need to stimulate both academic/analytic and public discussions about what is going on at the EU level. This would help to clarify national priorities and ensure the consistency of the actions of national institutions at the national and EU levels.

References

- Abramavičius A. (2006) Narystė Europos Sajungoje ir Lietuvos Respublikos Konstitucinio Teismo įgaliojimai (Membership in the European Union and the powers of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania). Konstitucinė jurisprudencija: 311–316.
- Albi A. (2001) The Central and Eastern European Constitutional Amendment Process in Light of the Post-Maastricht Conceptual Discourse: Estonia and the Baltic States. EPL 7:433–454.
- Besson S. (2004) Sovereignty in Conflict. European Integration Online Papers 8:15.
- Čepas A., Švedas G. (2008) Tarptautinė teisinė pagalba baudžiamosių byloose. Asmenų, įtariamų padarius nusikalstamą veiką, išdavimas baudžiamajam persekiojimui (ekstradicija, perdavimas Tarptautiniams baudžiamajam teismui arba pagal Europos arešto orderį). (International legal assistance in criminal cases. Surrender of suspected persons for criminal prosecution (Extradition, European Arrest Warrant, surrender to the International Criminal Court). Teisinės informacijos centras, Vilnius.
- Goda G. (ed.) (2003) Lietuvos Respublikos baudžiamojo proceso kodekso komentaras (1–220 straipsniai) (Commentary of the Code of Criminal Procedure of the Republic of Lithuania (Articles 1–220). Teisinės informacijos centras, Vilnius.

¹²⁶ For example, Ruling of 18 October 2000.

- Goda G., Kazlauskas M., Kuconis P. (2011) Baudžiamojo proceso teisė (Law of criminal procedure). Registrų centras, Vilnius.
- Jarašiūnas E. (2001) Konstitucijos teorijos pagrindai (The foundations of constitutional theory). In: Birmontienė T., Jarašiūnas E., Kūris E., Maksimaitis M., Mesonis G., Normantė A., Pumputis A., Vaitiekienė E., Vidrinskaitė S., Žilys J. (eds.) Lietuvos konstitucinė teisė (Constitutional law of Lithuania) Lietuvos teisės universitetas, Vilnius, pp. 103–131.
- Jarašiūnas E. (2004) Lietuvos Respublikos Konstitucija ir Europos integracija (The Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania and European integration). In: Konstitucija, nacionalinė teisė ir Europos teisė (The Constitution, national law and European law). Lietuvos Respublikos Konstitucinis Teismas, Vilnius, pp. 6–21.
- Jarukaitis I. (2006a) Lithuania. In: Kellermann A.E., Czuczai J., Blockmans S., Albi A., Douma W. (eds.) The Impact of EU Accession on the Legal Orders of New Member States and (Pre-) Candidate Countries. Hopes and Fears. T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 385–407.
- Jarukaitis I. (2006b) Adoption of the Third Constitutional Act and its Impact on the National Constitutional System. Teisė / Mokslo darbai 60: 22–37.
- Jarukaitis I. (2010a) Lithuania's Membership in the European Union and Application of EU law at National Level. In: Lazowski A. (ed.) The Application of EU Law in the New Member States: Brave New World. T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 209–241.
- Jarukaitis I. (2010b) Report on Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. In: Martinico G., Pollicino O. (eds.) National Judges and Supranational Laws: on the Effective Application of the EC Law and the ECHR. Europa Law Publishing, Groningen, pp. 167–204.
- Jarukaitis I. (2011) Europos Sąjunga ir Lietuvos Respublika: konstituciniai narystės pagrindai (The European Union and the Republic of Lithuania: The constitutional basis of membership). Justitia, Vilnius.
- Jarukaitis I. (2014) Respect for the National Identities of the Member States as the General Principle of European Union Law. In: Švedas G., Nekrošius V., Machovenko J. (eds.) Lithuanian Legal System Under the Influence of European Union Law. Vilnius University, Faculty of Law, Vilnius, pp. 576–620.
- Jarukaitis I., Civilka M., Lamanauskas T., Makauskaitė A. (2005) Elektroninių ryšių teisė (Electronic communications law). Eugrimas, Vilnius.
- Jurka R., Ažubalytė R., Gušauskienė M., Panomariovas A. (2009) Baudžiamojo proceso principai. (Principles of criminal procedure). Eugrimas, Vilnius.
- Kūris E. (2001) Lietuvos Respublikos Konstitucijos principai (Principles of the Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania). In: Birmontienė T., Jarašiūnas E., Kūris E., Maksimaitis M., Mesonis G., Normantė A., Pumputis A., Vaitiekienė E., Vidrinskaitė S., Žilys J. (eds.) Lietuvos konstitucinė teisė (Constitutional law of Lithuania). Lietuvos teisės universitetas, Vilnius, pp. 201–272.
- Kūris E. (2004a) Lietuvos Respublikos Konstitucija ir Europos teisės iššūkiai (The Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania and the challenges of European law). Justitia 6: 34–46.
- Kūris E. (2004b) Ekstranacionaliniai veiksniai Lietuvos Respublikos Konstituciniam Teismui aiškinant Konstituciją (Extranational factors affecting the interpretation of the Constitution by the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania). Teisė / Mokslo darbai 50: 50–93.
- Namavičius Z. (2004) Suverenitetas ir Europos Sąjunga (Sovereignty and the European Union). In: Konstitucinių teismų vaidmuo Europos Sąjungos kontekste (The Role of constitutional courts in the context of the European Union). Lietuvos Respublikos Konstitucinis Teismas, Vilnius, pp. 8–22.
- Poiares Maduro M. (2003) Europe and the Constitution: What if this is as good as it gets? In: Weiler J.H.H., Wind M. (eds.) European Constitutionalism Beyond the State. Cambridge University Press, 2003, pp. 74–102.
- Poiares Maduro M. (2004) How Constitutional Can the European Union be? The Tension between Intergovernmentalism and Constitutionalism in the European Union. Jean Monnet Working Paper 5/04: 1–53.

- Raz J. (1998) On the Authority and Interpretation of Constitutions: Some Preliminaries. In: Alexander L. (ed.) Constitutionalism. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, pp. 152–193.
- Römeris M. (1995) Valstybė ir jos konstitucinė teisė. II dalis. Konstitucinės institucijos. I tomas. Suverenitetas (The state and its constitutional law. Part II. Constitutional institutions. Vol. I. Sovereignty). Pradai, Vilnius.
- Šileikis E. (2005) Alternatyvi konstitucinė teisė (Alternative constitutional law). Teisinės informacijos centras, Vilnius.
- Štilis D. (2006) Privataus gyvenimo elektroniniuose ryšiuose ribojimas nusikaltimų tyrimo tikslais (Restrictions of private life in electronic communications for the purpose of criminal investigations). Jurisprudencija 9(87): 69–75.
- Švedas G. (ed.) (2004) Lietuvos Respublikos baudžiamojo kodekso komentaras. Bendroji dalis (1–98 straipsniai) (Commentary of Criminal Code of the Republic of Lithuania. General Part (Articles 1–98)). Teisinės informacijos centras, Vilnius.
- Švedas G. (2008) Kai kurios asmens perdavimo pagal Europos arešto orderį baudžiamajam persekiojimui teorinės ir praktinės problemas (Certain theoretical and practical issues of surrendering persons for criminal prosecution under the European Arrest Warrant). Teisė / Mokslo darbai 66(1): 8–18.
- Švedas G. (2010) The influence of the European Union Law on the Contemporary Lithuanian Criminal Policy. In: Konarska-Wrzosek V., Lachovsky J., Wojcikiewicz J. (eds.) Wezlowe problemy prawakarnego, kryminologii i politykikarnej (Basic problems of criminal law, criminology and criminal policy), Wolters Kluwer Polska, Warsaw.
- Švedas G., Merkevičius R. (2013) Presentation of national system of investigation, prosecution, evidence and procedural safeguards. Lithuania. In: Toward a Prosecutor for the European Union, vol. 1. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 405–448.
- Švedas G., Mickevičius D. (2009) Future of Mutual Recognition in Criminal Matters in the European Union: Lithuania. In: Vernimmen-Van Tiggelen G., Surano L., Weyembergh A. (eds.) The Future of Mutual Recognition in Criminal Matters in the European Union. Editions de l'Université de Bruxelles, Brussels.
- Vadapalas V. (1998) Tarptautinė teisė (Public international law). Eugrimas, Vilnius.
- Vadapalas V. (2002) Delimitation of Competences Between the European Union and the Member States: the Look from the Candidate Country. In: Melissas D., Pernice I. (eds.) Perspectives of the Nice Treaty and the IGC in 2004. Nomos, Baden-Baden, pp. 17–29.
- Vadapalas V., Jarukaitis I. (2003) Constitution of the Republic of Lithuania, International Law and Accession to the European Union. In: Segado F.F. (ed.) The Spanish Constitution in the European Constitutional Context. Dykinson L.R., Madrid, pp. 473–488.
- Vaičaitis V.A. (2006) The Republic of Lithuania. In: Kortmann C., Fleuren J., Voermans W. (eds.) Constitutional Law of 10 EU Member States: The 2004 Enlargement. Kluwer Law International, Oxford, pp. VI-1–64.
- Vermeulen G., De Bondt W., Ryckman C. (2012) Rethinking International Cooperation in the Criminal Matters in the EU. Moving Beyond Actors, Bringing Logic Back, Footed in Reality. Apeldoorn, Antwerp.
- Walker N. (2003) Late Sovereignty in the European Union. In: Walker N. (ed.) Sovereignty in Transition. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 3–32.
- Walker N. (2006) EU Constitutionalism in the State Constitutional Tradition. EU Working Papers. Law No 2006/21.
- Werner W.G., De Wilde J.H. (2001) The Endurance of Sovereignty. European Journal of International Relations 7: 283–313.
- Weyembergh A., Armada I., Brière C. (2014) European added value assessment – The EU Arrest Warrant: Critical Assessment of the Existing European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision. Research paper, Brussels.

Žižienė S. (2014) Abipusio pripažinimo principo Europos Sąjungos baudžiamojos teisėje prielaidos, įtvirtinimas ir veiksmingumas: Europos arešto orderis (Consolidation and effectiveness of the mutual recognition principle in European Union criminal law: The case of the European arrest warrant). In: Globalizacijos iššūkiai baudžiamajai justicijai (Globalisation Challenges for Criminal Justice). Registrų centras, Vilnius, pp. 443–456.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Romania – The Vagaries of International Grafts on Unsettled Constitutions

Bogdan Iancu

Abstract The report observes that – with context-driven caveats – the Romanian Constitution could be categorised as representing ‘legal’ or post-authoritarian constitutionalism. The report outlines weaknesses in Romanian constitutionalism, including issues that have necessitated the EU post-accession monitoring procedure. At the same time, it also documents a number of ways in which EU law has caused strain on the constitutional culture. In particular, it emerges that many of the key adverse impacts of EU law explored in the present research project were raised by Romanian courts. For example, the Romanian Constitutional Court was the first to annul the national law implementing the EU Data Retention Directive, and a lower instance court was the first, in Radu, to send a question about the presumption of innocence and liberty in the context of the automaticity of extraditions in the European Arrest Warrant system to the ECJ. The constitutional adjudication by the Constitutional Court is marked by a high proportion of annulments, especially on substantive grounds. The report also outlines the adjudication regarding the European Commission and IMF austerity programmes, social rights and the economic emergency regime. Regarding the discourse, the report makes insightful observations about the way the constitutional language and logic are changing through EU and transnational law, e.g. as regards the adaptation of the proportionality analysis from protecting the individual to benefitting commercial freedom. The report observes that the older methodological predilection for ‘simplistic legal positivism with a thin Marxist sauce’ (Czarnota) has been replaced by an equally simplistic and often instrumental internationalisation.

The author is Associate Professor (Comparative Constitutional Law and Constitutional Theory), University of Bucharest, Faculty of Political Science. e-mail: Bogdan.Iancu@fspub.unibuc.ro.

All websites accessed 5 October 2015. Text submitted 9 October 2015 with minor changes added on 7 February 2017.

B. Iancu (✉)

Faculty of Political Science, University of Bucharest, Bucharest, Romania
e-mail: Bogdan.Iancu@fspub.unibuc.ro

Keywords The Constitution of Romania • Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation • The Romanian Constitutional Court
 Constitutional review statistics and grounds • Fundamental rights and the rule of law • European Arrest Warrant • Radu, presumption of innocence and liberty
 Data Retention Directive and surveillance • Supremacy • Changing language of constitutionalism at the transnational level • Limitation of rights
 The principle of proportionality and Omega, Laval and Viking Line
 IMF and European Commission austerity and conditionality programmes, social rights and economic emergency • Parliamentary reservation of law
 Anti-corruption as a form of quasi-constitutional discourse • International arbitration treaties and public protests

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The current Constitution of Romania was adopted in 1991, two years after the collapse of state socialism, and was extensively revised in 2003, in prospect of the country's impending NATO membership (2004) and EU accession (2007).

Due to the fact that pre-totalitarian constitutional traditions were (correctly) perceived as fused at the hip with the monarchical form of government and since restoration of the monarchy was not a feasible option in the early 1990s, the post-communist fundamental law bears little resemblance (e.g. in terms of institutional framework) to the pre-WWII liberal-democratic experiences of the country under the Constitutions of 1866 and 1923.¹

Even though some general institutional choices were predicated by the Constitutional Committee upon the rationale of tradition and continuity,² for example the bicameral option and the names of the houses of Parliament (Chamber of Deputies and Senate), the actual composition and functioning of the two houses do not correspond to earlier Romanian parliamentary practices. In other crucial aspects, the break with the past is more apparent still: for instance, the 1990/1991 constituent assembly opted for a constitutional court, instead of reviving the early twentieth century tradition of judicial review by all the courts of general jurisdiction or by the High Court of Cassation and Justice.³

¹ Iancu 2015.

² See the synopsis of the committee debates on the matter in Iorgovan 1998, pp. 35–37 ('Cum s-a optat pentru un parlament bicameral' (How the option for a bicameral parliament was made)).

³ Judicial review was introduced in Romania at the beginning of the twentieth century, in 1912, by way of court judgments (the case of the 'Streetcar Company of Bucharest'), upon a reasoning similar to that of Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison. The Constitution of 1923 confirmed the solution but attributed the competence of judicial review to the highest court only (Court of Cassation in Joint Session).

Consequently, most provisions of the current fundamental law are adapted foreign transplants (for instance, semi-presidentialism). Many norm aggregations simply reflect the results of open-ended, post-communist ‘bricolage’.⁴ Rights and liberties were copied verbatim but somewhat haphazardly from various Western bills of rights and international documents, whereas some institutional choices were transplanted wholesale, without a clear idea of whether and how they would fit into the overall structure. In the case of the Ombudsman, for example, the office was provided for by the 1991 Constitution but was not established by an organic law until 1997; due to the lack of effective powers, the ‘Advocate of the People’ remained until very recently a purely decorative institution.

A boilerplate remark concerns alleged affinities between the French model and Romanian constitutional practice.⁵ On closer inspection, one can notice few functional similarities between the French Fifth Republic and the Romanian system. For instance, although a few of the President’s powers were initially inspired by the design of the French Constitution, Romanian semi-presidentialism is a much weaker form of its French institutional counterpart.⁶

With context-driven caveats regarding legal culture, one could categorise the Romanian Constitution under ‘legal’, post-authoritarian rather than ‘evolutionary’ constitutionalism (according to Besselink’s taxonomy as per the Questionnaire).

1.1.2 In the logic of the initial, pre-2003 version of the Constitution, the accent or centre of gravity fell on sovereignty and the organisation of the state. The Constitution opens (compare and contrast, for instance, with the structure of the German Basic Law) with an article on ‘The Romanian State’, described in the first paragraph as ‘a sovereign, independent, unitary and indivisible National State’, followed by provisions on ‘Sovereignty’ (Art. 2), ‘Territory’ (Art. 3), and ‘Unity of the People and Equality among Citizens’ (Art. 4). The first paragraph of the ‘eternity clause’ (Art. 152, ‘Limits of Revision’) shields the ‘national, independent, unitary and indivisible character of the Romanian State’ from subsequent amendments.

⁴ Cf. (expressivism, functionalism, bricolage) Tushnet 1999. By ‘bricolage’ I understand that, whereas some institutional choices reflected post-communist power imponderables, path dependencies and vested interests (for instance, the rule according to which 18 years of professional legal experience were necessary to qualify for a Constitutional Court appointment), many institutional choices (the Ombudsman) and norm aggregations (rights and liberties) were the result of insufficiently or partly theorised ‘borrowings’. But cf. Parau 2013: according to Parau, Romanian constitutionalism is a product of a self-conscious design of local legal elites who had learned to ‘think of themselves as an elite within a [transnational legal] elite’ (at p. 526).

⁵ Iorgovan, supra, passim. Even the Constitutional Court of Romania partakes occasionally of this widespread yet demonstrably erroneous opinion, see for instance, D.C.C. (Decision of the Constitutional Court) 683/2012 (M. Of. [Official Journal] No. 479 of 12 July 2012), for a reference to ‘the Constitution of France, which constituted the source of inspiration for that of Romania’.

⁶ On Romanian semi-presidentialism and its ambivalences, see Tănăsescu 2008 and Guțan 2010.

By the same token, the initial version of the fundamental law provided for a relatively weak Constitutional Court (its findings of unconstitutionality could be overridden by Parliament, by a two-thirds supermajority) and judiciary.

The 2003 amendments and constitutional practice have to a certain extent shifted the focus towards checks and balances, by way of entrenching the autonomy of certain key institutions from the political branches. For instance, by virtue of these amendments, the Constitutional Court, the Superior Council of the Magistracy and the Ombudsman acquired more prominent roles within the system. The position of the Superior Council of the Magistracy (SCM) as ‘guarantor of judicial independence’ (Art. 133(1)) was virtually insulated from all kinds of overt democratic-majoritarian control by way of appointments. Moreover, the institution was entrusted with all decisions concerning the career of ‘magistrates’ (i.e. both prosecutors and judges). Likewise, in the case of the Constitutional Court, the parliamentary override was eliminated, additional attributions were introduced (e.g. ruling on ‘conflicts of a constitutional nature between public authorities’, Art. 146 (e)) and procedural remedies were added (e.g. the Ombudsman can trigger concrete review by way of an exception of unconstitutionality raised directly before the Court, Art. 146(d)). Nonetheless, this realignment – in the context of an unsettled constitutional system and culture – is not necessarily devoid of ambiguities and tensions of its own. Although the changes can in principle and generally be categorised as conducive to the rule of law, checks and balances and fundamental rights, one has to take this description with a contextual grain of salt.⁷

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 In view of the expected accession to the EU in January 2007, the Constitution was amended by Law No. 429/2003 on the revision of the Constitution.

Title VI, ‘Euro-Atlantic Integration’, consisting of Arts. 148 (Integration into the European Union) and 149 (Accession to the North Atlantic Treaty) was included in the text in 2003, interspersed between the titles on the Constitutional Court and Constitutional Revision, respectively.

⁷ See Tănăsescu 2013, who argues that the increased powers of the Romanian Constitutional Court, particularly with respect to the exception of unconstitutionality, did not lead in practice to increased protection of the citizens’ fundamental rights, but rather served as the procedural backdrop for a power struggle between the Constitutional Court and the High Court of Cassation and Justice. See also Iancu 2010 and Tănăsescu 2011, who both argue that the empowerment of the Superior Council of the Magistracy after 2003 and its increasing alienation from any form of social or political control, albeit perceived and presented as ‘judicial independence’ guarantees, could also have detrimental consequences with respect to the rule of law, for instance due to hidden political or corporatist pressures.

Article 148 reads as follows:

- (1) Romania's accession to the constituent treaties of the European Union, with a view to transferring certain powers to community institutions, as well as to exercising in common with the other member states the abilities stipulated in such treaties, shall be carried out by means of a law adopted in the joint sitting of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, with a majority of two thirds of the number of deputies and senators.
- (2) As a result of the accession, the provisions of the constituent treaties of the European Union, as well as the other mandatory community regulations shall take precedence over the opposite provisions of the national laws, in compliance with the provisions of the accession act.
- (3) The provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) shall also apply accordingly for the accession to the acts revising the constituent treaties of the European Union.
- (4) The Parliament, the President of Romania, the Government, and the judicial authority shall guarantee that the obligations resulting from the accession act and the provisions of paragraph (2) are implemented.
- (5) The Government shall send to the two Chambers of the Parliament the draft mandatory acts before they are submitted to the European Union institutions for approval.⁸

Other amendments have concerned electoral rights and the acquisition of property. Article 16(4) protects the right of European citizens 'who comply with the requirements of the organic law' to elect and be elected 'to the local public administration bodies' (i.e. mayors and local or county council positions).⁹

Article 38 provides for the right (N.B!) of Romanian citizens to be elected to the European Parliament: 'After Romania's accession to the European Union, Romanian citizens shall have the right to elect and be elected to the European Parliament.'

Article 44(2) provides that '[f]oreign citizens and stateless persons shall only acquire the right to private property of land under the terms resulting from Romania's accession to the European Union and other international treaties Romania is a party to, on a mutual basis, under the terms stipulated by an organic law, as well as a result of lawful inheritance'.

Only supremacy is mentioned in the text, which does not mean that direct effect is not recognised.¹⁰ It has also been noted in the doctrine that, whereas the article requires the same supermajority for the parliamentary adoption of ratification legislation (of both the accession treaty and subsequent revisions of the constitutive treaties) as that mandated for constitutional amendments, the two procedures differ markedly. In the case of the ratification of EU treaties, the majority is computed on the basis of the total number of deputies and senators convened in a joint session of Parliament, whereas in the case of amendments, a two-thirds supermajority must be obtained in each house. If this is not achieved and the conference committee

⁸ Authorised translation on the website of the Chamber of Deputies, http://www.cdep.ro/pls/dic/site.page?den=act2_2&parl=6#t6c0s0sba148.

⁹ Article 16(4) 'After Romania's accession to the European Union, the Union's citizens who comply with the requirements of the organic law have the right to elect and be elected to the local public administration bodies.'

¹⁰ See Muraru and Tănăsescu 2008, comment on Art. 148 (Tănăsescu), pp. 1425–1441, at p. 1441.

procedure fails, a three-fourths majority in joint session is needed to adopt the amendment law.¹¹

1.2.2 The Constitution can be revised (subject to observing the limits of revision, according to Art. 152) by adopting an amendment law. The right of initiative belongs to the President on the proposal of the Government, one-fourth of the deputies or senators, or 500,000 citizens, provided that 20,000 signatures in support of the amendment are collected from at least one-half of the counties (including the Municipality of Bucharest) (Art. 150).

The bill has to be passed by each house with a two-thirds majority or by a three-fourths majority in joint session, should the conference committee procedure fail to build a consensus on a common draft of the bill. Once adopted, the revision law is submitted to a referendum, which must be organised within 30 days (Art. 151). The Constitutional Court decides on the constitutionality of revision initiatives (Art. 146(a) and Arts. 19–23 of Law No. 47/1992 regarding the organisation and functioning of the Constitutional Court) within ten days, upon receipt of the draft bill accompanied by the opinion of the Legislative Council, before the initiative is laid before Parliament. A finding of unconstitutionality must be supported by a two-thirds majority of the Court, i.e. at least six justices (Art. 21(1), Law 47/1992). The Court also decides ex officio on the revision law, within five days of its adoption. The competence of the Court includes the verification of both procedural forms and substantive elements concerning the limits of revision ('extrinsic' and 'intrinsic' constitutionality). In the case of a finding of unconstitutionality, the law is sent back to Parliament for reconsideration.

Amendments must be approved by referendum. In the case of the 'EU amendments' of 2003, massive absenteeism could have hampered the entire process, which would have been stalled by an eventual invalidation of the referendum. The 50% participation quorum was only met due to a last-minute extension of the poll to two days.

In 2013, the Referendum Law was amended and the quorum was reduced to a 30% participation rate and 25% validly cast ballots, numbers to be computed on the basis of the permanent electoral lists. Hypothetically, a constitutional revision could be approved by 12,5% of the registered voters. These changes have been applicable since 2014, one year after the publication of the 2013 amendments to the Referendum Law, according to a decision of the Constitutional Court that upheld the amendments but postponed the application of this new rule by one year.¹²

1.2.3 Article 148 and the provisions regarding rights were perceived in 2003 as sufficient legal bases for accession and integration.

Joint constitutional drafting committees of Parliament routinely co-opt legal scholars and experts, both at the stage of stakeholder and 'civil society' consultations, prior to committee debates ('Constitutional Forums') and at the drafting stage. The extent to which societal or academic advice is taken into consideration depends on political vagaries and imponderables, as does the selection process of academic committee memberships. Such consultative procedures are often window-dressing.

¹¹ Ibid., pp. 1431–1433.

¹² See D.C.C. 471/2013 (M. Of. No. 754 of 4 December 2013).

For instance, a 2008 presidential expert committee on constitutional revision co-opted academics (experts in political science and public law), charged with discussing the flaws of the constitutional system and proposing amendments. When a considerable number of the initial membership resigned, some of them making accusations of pressures to conform, the ‘defectors’ were quickly replaced and the committee’s work continued unabated. In the end, the incumbent President selected the recommendation that suited his institutional preferences and worldview predilections from the report. The writer of this report was appointed to a consultative academic committee attached to the parliamentary drafting committee, in the course of a recent (2013) parliamentary revision initiative. The comments initially made by the academics on drafts and minutes forwarded by the joint parliamentary committee were disregarded and, after a couple of weeks, the MPs broke communication and simply ignored the consultative expert body.

1.2.4 An amendment proposal initiated by the Presidency in 2011 sought to make marginal changes to Art. 148, introducing a new paragraph according to which the ratification of the accession of a new state to the Union would be ‘made by a law adopted by Parliament, with the majority of two-thirds of its members’. Another proposed change was the elimination of a paragraph in Art. 44, regarding ‘the presumption of lawful acquisition of property’, in a context where this clause was seen as impeding the fight against corruption and in particular the transposition of Framework Decision 2005/212/JHA¹³ on extended confiscation (see infra, Sect. 1.3.3). This project eventually got bogged down in the legislature, due to the lack of a clear supporting majority, more pressing agenda issues and, eventually, the change of government in early 2012.

The 2013 parliamentary revision proposal, initiated by the governing coalition, included some amendments related to EU membership. One of the proposed alterations was declaratory if not superfluous, concerning an additional paragraph in Art. 10 (International relations): ‘Romania is a Member State of the European Union.’

Another modification concerned the form of the second paragraph of Art. 148, which after amendment would have read: ‘Romania shall guarantee the application of EU law in the internal legal order, in accordance with the Act of Accession and other treaties concluded within the Union’ (emphasis added).

The revision also sought to ‘clarify’, to the detriment of the President, the constitutional deadlock concerning the country’s representation in European Council meetings. Article 91, which concerns presidential attributions in the field of foreign affairs, would have comprised an additional paragraph, reading as follows: ‘The President shall represent Romania in (sic!) European Union meetings and conferences (reuniunile Uniunii Europene) concerning foreign relations, the common security policy and the revision of the constitutive treaties.' Conversely, the proposal would have introduced a new paragraph to Art. 102 (Role and Structure of the Government), which read: 'The Government shall represent the country at all EU meetings, with the exception of those mentioned in Art. 91(1).' These two proposals were rejected by the Constitutional Court. In the case of the former, the argument of the Court rested on constitutional supremacy. The reasoning is relevant to this volume and worth quoting at some length:

¹³ Council Framework of 24 February 2005 on Confiscation of Crime-Related Proceeds, Instrumentalities and Property (2005/212/JHA) [2005] OJ L 68/49.

To establish a rule according to which EU law would apply without any qualification in the internal legal order, without distinguishing between the Constitution and subordinate legislation equates the subordination of [Romanian] constitutional law to the legal order of the EU. From this perspective, the Court notes that the fundamental law of the state – the Constitution – is an expression of popular will and cannot forfeit its binding force as a result of contradictory EU law. Accession to the Union does not affect the supremacy of the Constitution over the entire internal legal order.¹⁴

In the matter of European Council participation, the Court held in essence that the proposed changes, due to both faulty drafting and neglect of precedent, would have further confused the constitutional powers of the President and Prime Minister and fostered constitutional deadlocks.¹⁵

The revision law was not adopted, due to the numerous invalidations and recommendations to reformulate it made by the Court; furthermore, the government coalition was meanwhile dismantled, resulting in the absence of a parliamentary majority able to carry the vote.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 Supremacy of EU law is mentioned expressly in the Constitution, whereas direct effect is accepted by the Constitutional Court in practice as implied.¹⁶ Problems arose and a protracted constitutional battle ensued with respect to representation in the European Council (see e.g. above Sect. 1.2.4).

1.3.2 In its first decision touching on the transfer of sovereign powers to the EU (the decision concerning the constitutionality of the 2003 amendment law), the Constitutional Court stated:

¹⁴ D.C.C. 80/2014 concerning the proposal to amend the Constitution (M. Of. No. 246 of 7 April 2014), paras. 455–456 (citation of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal Judgment K 18/04 omitted).

¹⁵ Ibid., paras. 294–297 and 302–312.

¹⁶ See, for instance, D.C.C. 799/2011 (M. Of. No. 440 of 23 June 2011), noting that even though direct effect – unlike supremacy – is not specified in the Constitution (or in the revision bill at hand), the principle is constitutionally implied.

Member States have decided to exercise certain functions in common that traditionally pertained to the purview of national sovereignty. It is undeniable that in our age of globalised human concerns, intensified inter-state interactions and worldwide means of communication among individuals, the concept of sovereignty cannot be conceived as absolute and indivisible without incurring the unacceptable risk of international isolation.¹⁷

1.3.3 Article 152, regarding the limits of revision, rests on the premise of a core of unalterable constitutionality and could, at least in principle, form the basis for the emergence of a constitutional jurisprudence that would put the brakes on integration (just as the constitutional core established by the eternity clause of the German Basic Law has led to the jurisprudence regarding ‘identity control’, Verfassungsidentität). This supposition is however an academic exercise. As things stand at the moment, the Constitutional Court has taken a consistently ‘EU-friendly’ stance in terms of the actual results, albeit not necessarily in the evolution of its argumentation (see Sect. 1.2.4).

Further, legislation transposing the Data Retention Directive¹⁸ has twice been declared unconstitutional. In neither case was a preliminary reference sought; the first decision assailed the failure of the lawmaker to avail itself of the transposition leeway, whereas the second ruling followed the lead of the European Court of Justice (see Sect. 2.4).

A proposal to modify the Constitution in order to eliminate the ‘presumption of lawful acquisition of property’ from the text of Art. 44 (right of private property) was declared unconstitutional, although the Court hastened to add that nothing prevented the lawmaker from transposing the Justice and Home Affairs acquis (in particular the Framework Decision 2005/212/JHA on confiscation of crime proceeds, instrumentalities and property) at the level of ordinary legislation.¹⁹

1.3.4 As in the case of other Eastern European systems,²⁰ some early post-accession decisions evidenced a degree of unfamiliarity with the new jurisdictional setting. For instance, in a decision on an exception of unconstitutionality concerning a challenge to a state aid granted to small and medium-sized enterprises in the beer industry, the Court interpreted the direct effect of Arts. 87–89 EC Treaty and held that the principle of direct effect implied the use of different interpretive methods in domestic constitutional adjudication.²¹

¹⁷ D.C.C. 148/2003 (M. Of. No. 317 of 12 May 2003) (unless otherwise indicated, all translations are by the author). See generally, on the emerging ‘dialogue’ between the Romanian Constitutional Court and the Court of Justice of the European Union, Toader and Safta 2013.

¹⁸ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

¹⁹ Decision No. 799/17.06.2011 on the proposal to amend the Constitution, M. Of. No. 440 of 23 June 2011.

²⁰ Sajó 2004.

²¹ D.C.C. 59/2007 (M. Of. No. 98 of 8 February 2007).

Obversely, once the principles of ‘cooperative federalism’ were internalised, the balance shifted to a sort of categorical positivistic stance, according to which conflicts of competence and jurisdiction could not arise, since the two legal orders were clearly separated.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The constitutional amendment regarding parliamentary participation (Art. 148 (5)) was mentioned in Sect. 1.2. There are standing Committees on European Affairs in both the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate. Members of these committees are appointed by the houses, upon nomination by the parliamentary factions, negotiated according to the proportional breakdown of the parties’ parliamentary representation. The two bodies have symmetrical powers concerning the national legislative process (committee debates of draft legislation transposing EU directives) and EU lawmaking (reporting opinions concerning the application of the Subsidiarity Protocol back to the houses). In addition to their legislative functions, both committees hold advice and consent hearings regarding national appointments to EU institutions and the nomination of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and hold inquiries into the exercise of the country’s mandate and vote in the Council.²²

Law No. 373/2013 regarding the Relations between Parliament and the Government in the Field of European Affairs²³ regulates the procedure for exercising the national parliamentary prerogatives according to the second protocol to the Treaty of Lisbon, as well as the supervision of harmonisation, and the right of Parliament to be informed with regard to all appointments to EU institutions and to hold appointment hearings with respect to European Commissioner nominations.

1.4.2 Even though the 2003 revision did not exclusively concern the EU and NATO-related amendments (Title VII, Arts. 148–149 and the rights provisions), the revision was primarily presented to the citizenry as a prerequisite to European integration and was perceived as being focused on and linked with EU accession.

In the end, participation reached the 50% validity threshold only as a result of the extension of the poll by emergency ordinance, from one to two days. Out of the 55.7% of registered voters who did eventually turn out, 89.7% voted in favour of the amendments. This discrepancy between the lack of interest in going to the poll and quasi-unanimous approval of the revision (constitutionalism without a constitutional moment, as one might say) can be explained as a result or consequence of the top-down, hasty nature of the pre-accession negotiations and of an instrumental perception of integration. Accession as such, the desideratum of ‘returning to Europe’ was widely supported, yet people perceived themselves as having little voice and choice in the scope and pace of integration.

²² The membership and committee rules are available at <http://www.cdep.ro/pls/parlam/structura.co?idc=33>, <https://www.senat.ro/Comisie.aspx?Zi&ComisieID=4bdde3ad-f10b-4557-8527-0c6f36710843>. The procedures were adopted by parliamentary resolutions, Hotărârea Senatului Nr. 39/2014 privind modificare și completarea Regulamentului Senatului, M. Of. 473/27.06.2014, Hotărârea Nr. 11/2011 privind procedura de lucru și mecanismul decizional pentru exercitarea controlului parlamentar asupra proiectelor de acte legislative ale Uniunii Europene, în temeiul prevederilor Tratatului de la Lisabona privind rolul parlamentelor naționale, M. Of. Nr. 292/27.04.2011.

²³ Law No. 373/18.12.2013, M. Of. No. 820 of 21 December 2013.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 Even though it contains few clauses that are directly related to the EU, the Constitution has been considerably overhauled due to EU accession, albeit in less apparent ways.

For example, as a result of the pre-accession monitoring along the Copenhagen Criteria, the Superior Council of the Magistracy (SCM) was insulated in 2003 from almost any kind of meaningful political (democratic majoritarian) or social form of influence. The transplantation or rather importation of a version of the French-Italian high judicial council model, proffered by international bodies as a ‘best practice’ of judicial organisation,²⁴ was a direct consequence of pre-accession recommendations of the European Commission, coupled with a readily available ‘Ikea [institutional] model’²⁵. This understanding of judicial independence, which in the Romanian context encompasses, under the institutional umbrella of the SCM, both judges and prosecutors, has produced significant ripple effects in the functioning of the Romanian political-constitutional system. Likewise, the EU-induced, quasi-constitutional feature of anti-corruption policies and entrenched institutions has considerably influenced the actual functioning of the Romanian constitutional system. Moreover, Romania, together with Bulgaria, is under post-accession monitoring within the framework of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM). The European Commission reporting in the framework of the CVM started in 2012 to include a section on the constitutional system. Commission delegations have liaised more recently with the Constitutional Court. Furthermore, one can observe increasing cross-hybridisation and cross-citation between the European Commission and the Venice Commission in recent years.

All these factors, even though they cannot be subsumed under positive constitutional law (black letter law EU-clauses), have a significant impact on the context and operation of the domestic system. These changes will be further discussed below in Sects. 2.3.6 and 2.13.

1.5.2 Although the amendments are relatively numerous, some were poorly formulated. The limitations are to a certain extent due to a lack of foresight. For instance, in the matter of representation in the European Council, the constitutional conflict between the President and the Prime Minister could have been anticipated, given the bifurcated nature of the executive branch, a notorious characteristic of semi-presidential systems. The issue, like many other gaps in the fundamental law of Romania, was partly clarified by an interpretive gloss by the Constitutional Court. A narrow and contested 2012 ruling²⁶ attributed the competence to the President, based on the rationale that the office of ‘the head of state’ was constitutionally entrusted with preeminent attributions in the field of foreign affairs. According to this holding, the Prime Minister can only take part in European Council meetings in the President’s stead, on the basis of an explicit delegation by the latter.

²⁴ See Garoupa and Ginsburg 2009.

²⁵ Frankenberg 2010.

However, a subsequent majority decision muddled the 2012 ruling, by holding that the President has only a fettered discretion in the matter and, according to ‘the principle of loyal cooperation among state institutions’, he must take into account, in deciding whether to delegate this competence to the Prime Minister, certain objective criteria, such as i. the institution best placed in what concerns the topics on the agenda of a European Council meeting; ii. Whether the position of the President or the Prime-Minister is validated by a congruent standpoint of the Parliament; iii. the difficulties related to the implementation of European Council decisions.²⁷

1.5.3 The perception of the role of national constitutions vis-à-vis internationalisation is highly charged with normative presuppositions about the limits and scope of national constitutions, and indeed about the proper limits of delegation to international bodies. To wit, a Habermasian sees the state as a transitional instrument and would find little common ground on this matter with an advocate of purely administrative-regulatory supranational or international integration as coordination.²⁸ An inextricably linked question is whether traditional constitutional principles, norms and institutions can be translated outside their original environment, in order to offset and compensate displacements of decisional competence beyond the nation state.

In my view, national constitutions remain for now the primary locus of legitimacy and the main point of democratic decisional ascription. Hence, their role is, at least for the foreseeable future and at least as the primary legitimacy transmission belts, secure. This is not to deny the considerable pressures put on national constitutions by integration, especially in the crisis context of the current acceleration of EU-related developments.

²⁶ The court was divided by 5 to 4. As the dissenting justices noted, the phrase ‘head of state’, a notion on which the majority reasoning relied, cannot be found in the Constitution as such. D.C.C. 683/2012 (M. Of. No. 479 of 12 July 2012).

²⁷ ‘The political decision to delegate or not the competence to represent the country at European Council meetings must take into account these objective criteria, with a view to reaching consensus between the two authorities ... and must rest upon the constitutional principle of loyal cooperation.’ D.C.C. 449/2013 (M. Of. No. 784 of 14 December 2013).

²⁸ For the second position (regulatory nature of supranationalism), see the classical position by Majone 1996 and the more recent monograph by Lindseth 2010.

Constitutions and their safe-keepers, constitutional courts, with their focus on normativity and the ends of political community, also serve (or at least have the potential to serve) the important function of censoring and disciplining the supranational institutions, by constantly restating the normative questions about the kind of European constitutionalism that is feasible at any given juncture. According to Dieter Grimm, constitutional courts are even 'the only institutions that in the current configuration constitute a counterweight [Gegengewicht] to the democracy-averse mechanisms [demokratie-mindernden Mechanismen] which are at work within the EU' [emphasis added].²⁹

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Fundamental rights are codified in the Constitution. Title II (fundamental rights and freedoms) comprises a relatively long list of rights and liberties, without a clear analytical delineation according to subject-matter, so that social and economic rights defined as state duties to protect (Art. 35, right to a healthy environment) are interspersed between classical civil and political rights. Title III lists duties, namely faithfulness towards the country, the duty to defend the country, financial contributions and the prohibition of abuse of rights. Proportionality is defined in the text of the Constitution (Art. 53(2)).

The rule of law, human dignity and the free development of personality are protected as general constitutional principles; Art. 1(3) defines them as 'supreme values'.

2.1.2 Article 53 (restriction on the exercise of certain rights and freedoms) reads:

- (1) The exercise of certain rights or freedoms may only be restricted by law, and only if necessary, as the case may be, for: the defence of national security, of public order, health, or morals, of the citizens' rights and freedoms; conducting a criminal investigation; preventing the consequences of a natural calamity, disaster, or an extremely severe catastrophe.
- (2) Such restriction shall only be ordered if necessary in a democratic society. The measure shall be proportional to the situation having caused it, applied without discrimination, and without infringing on the existence of such right or freedom.

The principle of proportionality is methodologically understood as comprising the familiar steps (provided by law, legitimate objective, necessity and proportionality in the narrower sense (balancing)).

²⁹ Grimm 2014a, p. 47. See also Grimm 2014b.

2.1.3 The rule of law ('statul de drept') is mentioned as a 'supreme value' (Art. 1 (3)). Article 1(5) defines the principle of legality: 'the observance of the Constitution and its supremacy and of the laws is mandatory' (the two provisions are often interpreted in conjunction).

The term 'stat de drept' (neologism of French inspiration, État de droit) is sometimes used in the literature in conjunction or even interchangeably with the notion 'domnia legii' (the rule of law, in an ad litteram translation). However, the latter concept means (in its Romanian conceptual context) only legality, subordination of the state to the law.

The concept of 'stat de drept' is understood in the doctrine as encompassing not merely the supremacy of the Constitution and the principle of legality of administration but also qualitative-substantive criteria, such as stability and certainty, predictability, the duty to give reasons (not only for judicial decisions but also for administrative action) and proportionality.³⁰

The principle of the rule of law has been invoked as an argument in constitutional review. In Romania, there are two types of cases of constitutional review by the Constitutional Court: 'objections of constitutionality', which denote ex ante abstract review, and 'exceptions of unconstitutionality', which mean ex post concrete review.³¹ The rule of law is invoked in both types of cases.

However, the Constitutional Court refrained until relatively recently from encouraging or even lending credence to its use as a justiciable principle; it intimated that the rule of law was too grand a concept to have practical justiciable bite. For example, in rejecting an exception of unconstitutionality to a law ratifying a government ordinance concerning foreign currency transactions, the Court noted:

In what concerns the degree to which the impugned norm fulfils the exigencies of the rule of law principle ... the Court notes that the said principle defines the major objectives of state activity, as envisioned by what is customarily called the supremacy or rule of law (domnia legii), which means subordination of the state to legality, the existence of structures that allow law to censor political options, and within this framework enable the law to ponder the abusive or discretionary tendencies of state institutions. The rule of law guarantees the supremacy of the Constitution, the constitutionality of inferior legal norms, and the separation of powers, which are only to act within the bounds of law and more particularly within the limits of a law expressing the general will [emphasis added].³²

³⁰ See e.g. Balan 2015, pp. 99–112. Definitions and subsumed elements of the concept differ, as expected, from one author to another. But cf. Muraru and Tânărescu 2008, pp. 7–9 (statul de drept encompasses legality, fundamental rights guarantees, separation and balance of powers, access to justice).

³¹ The system of constitutional review is explained further in n. 76.

³² D.C.C. 70/2000 (M. Of. No. 334 of 19 July 2000). Emphasis added. The excerpt, while revealing of the earlier understanding of the principle, is obiter dicta; the main grounds for rejecting the exception was the existence of a prior decision which had held the provision constitutional.

The rule of law has been used sparsely by the Court, for instance as a complementary argument for affirming the erga omnes character of Constitutional Court decisions solving exceptions of unconstitutionality, namely the effect of constitutional decisions on the adjudication by referring courts of general jurisdiction.³³

However, more recently, the Constitutional Court has given more clout to rule of law guarantees, perhaps also as a result of institutional interaction and socialisation with international structures, such as the EU Commission and the Venice Commission in whose institutional discourses the rule of law concept looms large. The rule of law (and the principle of legality, Art. 1, Paras. (3) and (5)) was used as an argument to strike down, in its entirety, a 2015 legislative proposal which, ostensibly in anticipation of the draft EU Network and Information Security (NIS) Directive,³⁴ would have entrusted all policy and regulatory decisions in the field of informational security to the Romanian Intelligence Service. The NIS directive, proposed by the European Commission in 2013, has not yet been adopted and thus cannot be transposed. Therefore, this argument was an attempt to make a controversial domestic policy more palatable for a national audience, by reference to a presumptively respectable and unquestionable EU ‘standard’. No access to a court was provided in the bill. The Court declared the law unconstitutional on grounds of a breach of privacy rights, access to justice and due process, and legality (clarity, precision and predictability of the norm). It cited its decision 70/2000, adding this time that the principle of the rule of law is not purely procedural but also presupposes ‘a series of guarantees, including jurisdictional safeguards, to ensure the protection of rights and liberties by means of limiting the state’.³⁵

In the field of anti-corruption legislation, the rule of law argument was used by the Court to strike down a proposed amendment to the Criminal Code, which sought to shield appointed or elected officials from prosecution for misfeasance or abuse of office and corruption crimes by restricting the definition of ‘public servant’ to low-level civil servants. The Court reasoned that such an amendment would have hampered the fulfilment of international commitments (anti-corruption treaties ratified by the country prior to EU accession), the stability of state institutions and, by implication, the trust of the citizens in state institutions.³⁶

³³ D.C.C. 169/1999 (M. Of. No. 151 of 12 April 2000). The issue at stake was a divergence of opinion between the referring court and the Constitutional Court over the effect (inter partes or erga omnes) of concrete review (exceptions of unconstitutionality) decisions.

³⁴ <http://ec.europa.eu/digital-agenda/en/news/network-and-information-security-nis-directive>.

³⁵ D.C.C. 17/2015 (M. Of. No. 79 of 30 January 2015).

³⁶ ‘The Court appreciates that if such actions [corrupt or abusive behaviour by high public officials] would not be discouraged by way of criminal law, this would result in a breach of fundamental values sheltered by the Criminal Code, such as the rule of law, democracy, the supremacy of the Constitution and the observance of legality, which are proclaimed as supreme values by Art. 1(3) and (5) of the Constitution’ [emphasis added] D.C.C. 2/2014 (M. Of. No. 71 of 29 January 2014). Appeal to the rule of law was made also in D.C.C. 418/2014, (M. Of. 563 of 30 July 2014). The Constitutional Court interpreted a three-year disqualification to occupy the ‘same function’ applying to officials sanctioned for conflicts of interest or incompatibilities to mean ‘all elective offices’ and not just the same kind of elective office – mayor, deputy, senator or local or county

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 The balancing of fundamental rights with economic free movement rights has not raised constitutional issues in Romania so far, due to the relatively idiosyncratic economic circumstances of the country.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 The Constitutional Court has thus far rejected all exceptions of unconstitutionality regarding the transposition law, Law No. 302/2004.³⁷ It has stressed that the internal surrendering procedure meets all constitutional requirements and that all due process guarantees will be surely respected in the Member State requesting the extradition. The position of the Constitutional Court is that the executing court has no authority to rule on the merits of the measure taken by the judicial authority requesting the surrender. According to the Court, '[c]hallenges regarding the merits will be made in the Member State from which the warrant was issued, where all [fair trial] guarantees will be observed'.³⁸

The Court of Appeal of Constanța made a preliminary reference to the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) questioning the way in which the presumption of innocence might be infringed in the case of an automatic surrender for the purposes of prosecution, where the surrendered person has not previously been heard by the issuing judicial authorities.³⁹ The referring court asked whether deprivation of liberty and forcible surrender under a European Arrest Warrant (EAW), without the consent of the person, constitutes interference with the right to individual liberty on the part of the state executing the warrant, and whether such a forced surrender satisfies the requirements of necessity in a democratic society and of proportionality in relation to the objective actually pursued. The reference was councillor. A restrictive interpretation of the legal disqualification would have allowed, for instance, a mayor found ineligible to run in future parliamentary elections. The Constitutional Court found the law constitutional only if the disqualification was interpreted extensively (three year disqualification from running for any elective office).

³⁷ Law No. 302/28.06.2004 regarding judicial cooperation in criminal matters, amended and republished M. Of. 377 of 31 May 2011.

³⁸ D.C.C. 419/2007 (M. Of. No. 330 of 16 May 2007). See a study of the early rulings of the Court by Benke 2007; Benke noted 'the particular importance attached to the principle of mutual recognition of criminal judgments in the jurisprudence of the Romanian Constitutional Court'.

³⁹ Case C-396/11 Ciprian Vasile Radu [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:39.

based on Arts. 6, 48 and 52 of the EU Charter and Arts. 5 and 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). Constitutional rights were not mentioned in the preliminary reference. The question whether constitutional rights could be considered by the referring court, on the basis of Art. 20 in the Constitution, upon determining whether international law or the Constitution or national laws comprise more favourable provisions is fraught with jurisdictional and procedural difficulties. Conflicting views persist with respect to the question whether ordinary courts can rely on Art. 20 and consider autonomously which provisions (national or international) provide a more favourable treatment to a fundamental right; the prevailing opinion is that problems of constitutionality are a monopoly of the Constitutional Court⁴⁰ (see also Sect. 3.2.2). Thus, the referring court motivated the request for a preliminary reference exclusively on the basis of fundamental rights guarantees deriving from EU law (the Charter and general principles of EU law, which include the ECHR).⁴¹

The Grand Chamber of the CJEU found that Framework Decision 2002/584⁴² must be interpreted as meaning that the executing judicial authorities cannot refuse to execute a European Arrest Warrant issued for the purposes of conducting a criminal prosecution on the ground that the requested person was not heard in the issuing Member State before the arrest warrant was issued.

2.3.1.2 Preliminary review is granted by the courts of appeal; these are the courts which, according to the transposition law, are charged with deciding in first instance on the execution of European Arrest Warrants.

Whilst no statistical studies are available, examples of refusal to execute an EAW, grounded in breaches of fair trial guarantees, can be found in the practice of the appeal courts.⁴³

⁴⁰ The Romanian Constitution is fairly detailed in this respect; see, e.g. Art. 23 on individual freedom, paras. 1 and 11: ((1) Individual freedom and security of a person are inviolable; (11) Any person shall be presumed innocent till found guilty by a final decision of the court.); and Art. 21 on free access to justice, paras. 1 and 2: ((1) Every person is entitled to bring cases before the courts for the defence of his legitimate rights, liberties and interests. (2) The exercise of this right shall not be restricted by any law.). The ordinary judge can however direct problems of constitutionality only towards the Constitutional Court (by way of an exception) which in turn can refer them by a preliminary reference to the CJEU. No request for a preliminary reference has been made by the Constitutional Court of Romania (CCR) as of yet.

⁴¹ From a broader perspective, it is worth pondering whether these jurisdictional complexities and overlaps at the national level and the countervailing wide interpretive palette in terms of defining the source and scope of fundamental rights at the disposal of the CJEU do not lead to the neglect and erosion of rights provisions in the national constitutions. See, for an analysis of the way in which the current discursive shift towards rights protection under the Charter and the ECHR impacts negatively on national constitutional fundamental rights guarantees, the argument by Albi 2015.

⁴² Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁴³ For instance, Curtea de Apel Bucureşti, Secţia a II-a Penală, Sentinţa 225/F din 11 septembrie 2009 (EAW for the purposes of executing a foreign sentence; incidental recognition of the foreign

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 The principle of legality of incrimination is guaranteed by Art. 23(12) of the Constitution, according to which ‘[p]enalties shall be established or applied only in accordance with and on the grounds of the law’. According to the Constitutional Court, this provision entails the premise that the primary lawmaker, by parliamentary statute, or the delegated legislator (i.e. the Government, by means of an ordinance or an emergency ordinance) must legislate with clarity and not simply incorporate by reference and analogy subordinate normative instruments or administrative interpretations in the definition of a criminal offence.⁴⁴

Problems arose in the matter due to conflicting interpretations and the ensuing jurisdictional turf wars between the Constitutional Court and the High Court of Cassation and Justice. For instance, when a 2007 Constitutional Court decision declared the decriminalisation of libel and slander unconstitutional on the grounds of a breach of dignity, conflicting interpretations arose in practice. Some courts held that the consequence of the decision was the ‘abrogation of the abrogation’ and consequent re-criminalisation, whereas some courts deemed the decision inconsequential until such time as the lawmaker should decide to heed it and recriminalise defamation. Conflicting decisions by the Constitutional Court (2013, exception of unconstitutionality) and the High Court of Cassation and Justice (2010, recurs în interesul legii (extraordinary appeal on points of law)), with neither jurisdiction yielding to the other’s interpretation, did little to clarify this legal quagmire.⁴⁵

A more recent clash occurred in the context of the entry into force of the New Criminal Code, with divergent decisions over the interpretation of the lex mitior principle and its application to the so-called autonomous criminal law institutions (such as repeat offences, plurality of offences, statutes of limitations).⁴⁶ The High Court considered that, during the overlap, judges could combine provisions concerning the crimes and ‘autonomous institutions’ rules, in order to compute the judgment as a result of the citizen’s expressed desire to execute the sentence in Romania; refusal to recognise a judgment of the Tribunal de Grande Instance de Paris, due to breaches of fair trial guarantees: trial in absentia, lack of representation by either a private defence attorney or a court-appointed public defender); Curtea de apel Cluj, Secția penală și pentru cauze cu minori, Sentința nr. 14 din 3 martie 2014 a judecătorului de drepturi și libertăți (refusal to execute an EAW issued by the Trial Court of Badajoz, Spain, due to the lack of an internal arrest warrant and due to breaches of procedural fairness amounting to an infringement of the presumption of innocence).

⁴⁴ D.C.C. 363/2015 (M. Of. No. 495 din 6 iulie 2015), declaring unconstitutional a provision in Law 241/2015 on the prevention and punishment of tax evasion. Article 6 criminalised the non-remittance to the Government, within 30 days, of taxes withheld at the source. According to the reasoning, an insufficient definition of the term ‘tax or levy withheld at the source’ in the law or the Fiscal Code breached the principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, including the prohibition of extensive interpretation by analogy.

⁴⁵ D.C.C. 206/2013 (M. Of. No. 350 of 13 June 2013) (CCR); Decision of the HCCJ, Joined Sections, No. 8/18.10.2010, M. Of. No. 416 of 14 June 2011.

⁴⁶ D.C.C. 265/2014 (M. Of. No. 372 of 20 May 2014) (CCR); Decision No. 2/14.04.2014, High Court of Cassation and Justice, Section on Solving Problems of Criminal Law Interpretation.

sanctioning regime most favourable to the offender, whereas the Constitutional Court interpreted penal retroactivity to mean choosing the most favourable regime to the defendant, as established by either of the two codes taken as a whole.

The overall complexity entailed by the interpretation of the principle of legality of incrimination is not yet reflected in, and no jurisdictional conflicts have as of yet arisen with regard to, the interpretation of the EAW transposition law, due to the institutional reservations to deal with the matter of judicial cooperation. The Constitutional Court invariably rejects all exceptions of unconstitutionality concerning Law No. 302/2004; the High Court routinely orders the execution of warrants on appeal.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 The right to a fair trial is guaranteed under Art. 21 of the Constitution. Paragraph 3 reads: ‘All parties shall be entitled to a fair trial and a solution of their cases within a reasonable term.’ According to Art. 24, throughout the trial parties have the right to be represented by a court-appointed defender or a private lawyer. The general fair trial guarantee also implies ECHR standards since, the Romanian Constitution adopts a ‘monist-comparative’ solution with respect to human rights treaties, which means that the higher level of protection, domestic or international as the case may be, will be applied (Art. 20).

The Constitutional Court has interpreted Art. 21 to imply the principle of equality of arms in criminal law. For instance, a very recent decision declared unconstitutional an article of the new Criminal Procedure Code which authorised the rendering of rulings on granting revision relief (an extraordinary appeal) with the participation of the prosecutor but without citing the parties.⁴⁷ According to the new Criminal Procedure Code that entered into force on 1 January 2014 (Art. 466), a criminal trial can be reopened if the initial judgment resulted from an in absentia procedure. In absentia is defined as justified impossibility to take part in the proceedings and inability to notify the court of the matter or lack of citation or official notice. The term for introducing such action is relatively stringent, i.e. a month from the date of having knowledge of the conviction.

The European Court of Human Rights has ruled against Romania (violation of Art. 5) in a case involving the reopening of an in absentia trial, pursuant to surrender on the basis of an EAW. The former criminal procedure code did not provide for the possibility of the court to suspend the execution of the initial sentence after reopening the proceedings.⁴⁸

⁴⁷ D.C.C. 506/2015 (M. Of. No. 539 of 20 July 2015).

⁴⁸ Sâncraian v. Romania, no. 71723/10, 14 January 2014.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 Neither public nor private funding is available for covering the legal expenses of individuals surrendered pursuant to an EAW.

The rate of acquittal is well under the European average. Recurrent public debates have revolved around the somewhat higher percentage of acquittals in anticorruption cases (as compared with ‘regular’ criminal law trials), which, according to statistics and annual official releases of the National Anticorruption Directorate, levels around 9% yearly.⁴⁹

2.3.4.2 No official data or statistics of any kind exist regarding extradited individuals who have subsequently been found innocent.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 Not applicable.

2.3.5.2 Debates on the suitability of transposing mutual recognition from (ostensibly less problematic) internal market and regulatory matters to criminal law and civil and commercial disputes presuppose an internalisation of legal debates that have gradually, incrementally grappled with the legislative and judicial developments in ‘old Europe’, in slow lockstep with the evolution of practices.

Romania is a recent Member State where enthusiasm for accession was not yet been blunted by qualifications and reservations regarding the proper course of integration. By the same token, Romanian legal doctrine is still characterised by a strong positivistic penchant (and a relatively rudimentary strain of positivism). The ‘mechanical jurisprudence’⁵⁰ and doctrine entailed by this post-communist methodological propensity are not very useful in the context of sophisticated new practices, such as the emerging European ‘constitutionalisation’.

2.3.5.3 Concerns about the shift in the role of the judiciary have thus far not been adequately addressed, whereas the dearth of commentary on these issues is a ground for concern. More generally, few writings exist on the impact of Europeanisation on judicial culture.⁵¹

In the case of the younger generation of judges and scholars, the older methodological predilection for ‘simplistic legal positivism with a thin Marxist ⁴⁹ Official Press Release for 2014. <http://www.pna.ro/faces/comunicat.xhtml?id=5982>.

⁵⁰ This appears to be – in various degrees – a post-communist commonality; see, Kühn 2011.

⁵¹ For a welcome exception in the Romanian doctrinal landscape, see Guțan and Selejan-Guțan 2014.

sauce'⁵² has been replaced by or seasoned with an equally unselfconscious, simplistic and often instrumental internationalisation. That is to say that international documents, case law, developments, soft law and doctrine are cited in an often encomiastic and rather haphazard manner, without clear distinctions or an analytically disciplined assimilation ('internalisation') of the developments and practices concerned.

In the case of the judiciary as such, the openness towards dialogical incursions and international networking are coupled with an increasing isolation from all internal accountability mechanisms: in the name of judicial independence, the Superior Council of the Magistracy has been virtually isolated from all social or political levers of responsibility and, moreover, this original transposition of the French-Italian model has subsequently been progressively shielded by the Constitutional Court from future amendments (see Sects. 1.1.2 and 2.3.6).⁵³ A recent decision of the Constitutional Court rendered even a recall procedure, by virtue of which the Superior Council was accountable to the system as such, inoperative.⁵⁴

2.3.5.4 In the context of an increased use of EAW execution requests and the trivial matters at stake in some requests, the introduction of a proportionality test would be welcome.

2.3.6 EU Monitoring of Anticorruption Measures in Romania

Romanian criminal law and penal policy have been significantly influenced by pre- and post-accession conditionalities relating to anticorruption measures. One could safely say that anticorruption criminal policy functions almost as a quasi-constitutional phenomenon, insofar as it significantly affects both the operation of the political-constitutional systems as such, and patterns of institutional discourses and structures of justification.

The focus on anti-corruption as a determining criterion in the monitoring of the new Member States is a more general recent tendency of the Union⁵⁵ which may by virtue of a ratchet effect generate new EU constitutional vocabularies and institutional developments.⁵⁶ To wit, the Vice-President of the European Commission at the time, Justice Commissioner Viviane Reding, recently floated the idea of a post-accession new constitutional mechanism, analogous to the Copenhagen criteria. The Justice Commissioner supported her plan to solve the 'Copenhagen

⁵² Czarnota 2009, p. 179: 'The dominant type of legal theory under communism was simplistic legal positivism with a thin Marxist sauce.'

⁵³ D.C.C. 799/2011 (M. Of. No. 440 of 23 June 2011).

⁵⁴ D.C.C. 196/2013, regarding the exception of unconstitutionality of Art. 55, paras. (4) and (9) of Law No. 317/2004 on the Superior Council of the Magistracy (M. Of. No. 231 of 22 April 2013).

⁵⁵ Schrot and Bostan 2004. More generally, Szarek-Mason 2010.

⁵⁶ Generally, Sadurski 2012.

dilemma' (i.e. the non-democratic derailment of a Member State after accession) by reference to the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism for Romania and Bulgaria.⁵⁷ The proposal of squaring the circle between soft power and the 'nuclear option' of Art. 7 TEU (in Reding's words) by way of a 'post-Accession Copenhagen' is now under consideration in the European Commission and European Parliament. Whether or not it will be explicitly called so in the constitutive treaties, a European constitutional area (which includes quasi-constitutional vocabularies such as anti-corruption) has crystallised at the interface of national and international guarantees.

The post-accession CVM mechanism was initially scheduled to lapse after three years (in 2010) but has in the meanwhile been extended, seemingly indefinitely. The judicial reform and the related anti-corruption benchmarks have taken the upper hand in the monitoring. In the aftermath of a protracted domestic constitutional crisis in 2012, the European Commission has included general references to the 'Romanian constitutional system' as such in its biannual reports. This was supported with/based on the argument that judicial reform is related to the rule of law and, although not technically a part of the judicial system, the Constitutional Court and the Constitution are essential to the rule of law.

More concretely, anti-corruption policies are implemented in the field of penal policy by the National Anticorruption Directorate (NAD), a structure ostensibly subordinate to the General Prosecutor's Office Attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice (in the vernacular, it is still referred to by its former title, the General Prosecutor's Office of Romania). NAD has jurisdiction over mid- and high-level corruption, defined ratione materiae by the value of the bribe or prejudice that has to exceed 10,000 and 200,000 EUR, respectively. Ratione personae, the institution has jurisdiction over corruption crimes committed by enumerated categories of public officials, according to Law 78/2000 on the Prevention, Investigation and Sanctioning of Corrupt Acts. In practice, the office is fully autonomous, since the symmetrical modes of appointment and tenures of both the General Prosecutor and the Chief Prosecutor of the NAD in practice guarantee the functional independence of the anti-corruption prosecutorial office within the Public Ministry.⁵⁸

A wave of high-profile arrests and convictions have nearly captured the public sphere. There are neatly divided camps, on the one hand of detractors of anti-corruption prosecutions, which are perceived as politically motivated and/or a form of 'televised justice' and, on the other hand, supporters, who see anti-corruption policies and institutions as a panacea or – in the extreme version of the discourse – even a substitute for a corrupt political system.⁵⁹ The very autonomy of the structure, which is monitored effectively only by the High Council (itself a fully autonomous body), lends itself easily to speculative journalism about the ends and means of anti-corruption.

⁵⁷ 'Safeguarding the rule of law and addressing the "Copenhagen Dilemma": Towards a new EU mechanism', address by Viviane Reding, Vice-President of the European Commission, to the General Affairs Council, Luxemburg, 22 April 2013. http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_SPEECH-13-348_en.htm.

⁵⁸ Both the Chief Prosecutor of the NAD and the General Prosecutor of the Prosecutor's Office attached to the High Court of Cassation and Justice are appointed by the President, on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, upon receipt of the high judicial council's advisory opinion on the nominee. The term of office is three years, renewable once.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The Romanian Constitutional Court was first confronted with national legislation implementing the Data Retention Directive in 2009, prior to the annulment of the Directive by the Court of Justice.

The Romanian Constitutional Court ruled on an exception of unconstitutionality regarding Law No. 298/2008 and held that the open-ended authorisation to collect traffic data and ‘related data (date conexe)’ was a disproportionate infringement of the constitutional guarantees of the freedom of expression, the right to secrecy of correspondence and the general right to privacy.⁶⁰ Proportionality played a crucial role in the analysis, since Art. 53 on restriction of certain rights and liberties is the reference norm for assessing rights limitations.

The Court emphasised the way in which blanket retention of data affected the rights of the addressees of electronic or mobile phone communications: ‘[t]he rights to privacy of the addressee of a communication are thus exposed in the absence of any element of volition, as a result of someone else’s behaviour, without having the possibility to counter the latter’s bad faith or intention to harass or blackmail the addressee.’⁶¹ The Court also stressed the way in which blanket retention has a chilling effect on rights and inevitably creates a general climate of suspicion.

⁵⁹ A volume of interviews with anticorruption prosecutors, with the head of the National Integrity Agency and with a notorious NGO activist is entitled, revealingly, ‘I vote DNA’ (DNA is the Romanian acronym for Direcția Națională Anticorupție (National Anticorruption Directorate)). Ghinea 2012. In the meanwhile, one of the interviewees – the director of the integrity agency – has been indicted on corruption charges.

⁶⁰ The directly relevant provisions in the Constitution are those of Art. 28 on secrecy of correspondence ('Secrecy of the letters, telegrams and other postal communications, of telephone conversations, and of any other legal means of communication is inviolable.'), Art. 30(1) on freedom of expression ('Freedom of expression of thoughts, opinions, or beliefs, and freedom of any creation, by words, in writing, in pictures, by sounds or other means of communication in public are inviolable.'), and Art. 26 on private and family life ('(1) The public authorities shall respect and protect the intimate, family and private life.; (2) Any natural person has the right to freely dispose of himself unless by this he infringes on the rights and freedoms of others, on public order or morals.'). Note that the Romanian Constitution uses a stricter language than the Convention in terms of its definition of secrecy of correspondence (the right is defined as 'inviolable', whereas Art. 8 ECHR uses the milder term 'respect').

⁶¹ D.C.C. 1258/2008 (M. Of. No. 798 of 23 November 2009).

A new transposition law, Law 82/2012, brought before the Court by an exception of unconstitutionality, was struck down in July 2014 (the law was invalidated in toto).⁶² Law 82/2012 had purported to heed the prior constitutional ruling by making marginal or cosmetic changes to the impugned provisions (so that, for instance, ‘related data [date conexe] needed for the identification of the subscriber or user’ became, simply, ‘necessary data’). The Court noted that such amendments were not of a nature to alter its position, insofar as the provisions continued to be open-ended and the law did not seek to limit the number of individuals and officials with access to such data to the greatest degree possible.

In its reasoning, a unanimous Court stressed that:

[T]he infringement of fundamental rights regarding private and family life, secrecy of correspondence, and freedom of expression is very wide in its scope and reach [de mare ampioare] and must be considered extremely serious [deosebit de gravă], whereas the fact that such data are subsequently stored and used without informing the subscriber or registered user is of the nature to imprint in the consciousness of concerned individuals the feeling that their private lives are subject to constant surveillance [emphasis in original].⁶³

Interestingly, the 2014 ruling considered that implementation of the Directive concerns two stages, namely, blanket storage of data and use of the stored information, respectively. Only unsupervised access to data was deemed constitutionally suspect, insofar as privacy and secrecy of correspondence are concerned. According to the Court,

[T]he Court appreciates that the nature and specificities of the first stage, insofar as the lawmaker deems the storage necessary, does not in and of itself impinge upon the exercise of the right to private and family life or the secrecy of correspondence. Neither the Constitution nor Court precedents forbid preventive retention and storage, inasmuch as use of the data is accompanied by adequate safeguards and is not disproportionate in nature.⁶⁴

The structure of the reasoning, in this respect, tracks that of the annulment judgment of the CJEU.

A significant part of the 2014 ruling grappled with a peculiarity of recent Romanian legislation, i.e. the large scope of delegations to the intelligence services. Thus, the 2014 decision invalidated an authorisation to the intelligence services, which, according to the law, would have received a generous access to traffic data ‘concerning the prevention and combatting of threats to national security’. This mandate, the justices observed, unlike the request of a prosecutor (which must be sanctioned by the judge of rights and liberties), was not controlled by a court or indeed by any external body.

Moreover, whereas two national institutions, the Data Protection Agency (Autoritatea Națională de Supraveghere a Prelucrării Datelor cu Caracter

⁶² D.C.C. 440/2014 (M. Of. No. 653 of 4 September 2014).

⁶³ Ibid., para. 65 (emphases in original).

⁶⁴ Ibid., para. 60.

Personal (ANSPDCP)) and a regulatory agency (Autoritatea Națională pentru Administrare și Reglementare în Comunicații (ANCOM)) are nominally entrusted with the supervision of the way in which public service providers fulfil their legal obligations with respect to data retention, storage and access, and can impose sanctions (misdemeanour fines), the Court noted that ‘no authentic control mechanism exists, to ensure that such institutions permanently and effectively implement the law [i.e. in monitoring the public services providers]’.⁶⁵

In September 2014, a majority decision declared unconstitutional legislative provisions which introduced an obligation, incumbent upon service providers, to retain and store identification data pertaining to purchasers of prepaid SIM cards and users of open access internet services. The reasoning departs from the logic of the earlier ruling in July, insofar as in the paradigm of the newer decision blanket retention and storage as such (‘first stage’) are described as negatively affecting constitutional rights.⁶⁶ This volte face in argumentation was duly pointed out and criticised by the three dissenting justices.

In early 2015, a unanimous Court rendered a decision on a germane issue, declaring the Law on ‘Cybersecurity’ unconstitutional in its entirety. The impugned act would have in effect granted broad, almost unfettered supervisory discretion over data and internet network security policy to the Romanian Intelligence Service (SRI). The ‘Cybersecurity Law’ purported to ‘transpose’ avant la lettre the draft NIS Directive (see supra Sect. 2.1.3).⁶⁷

In early 2015, in the wake of this series of decisions of unconstitutionality concerning the legislation transposing the Data Retention Directive, the retention of identification data pertaining to purchasers of prepaid SIM cards, and the Law on ‘Cybersecurity’, the President of the Constitutional Court publicly accused the SRI of exerting undue pressure on the justices (i.e. to render constitutionality rulings). In response, the incumbent Director of the Romanian Intelligence Service, George Maior, charged the Court for its alleged lack of moral responsibility and good faith and subsequently resigned, arguing that the unconstitutionality decisions had crippled the pursuit of his institution’s objectives and mission and consequently the fulfilment of his own mandate as Director of internal intelligence.⁶⁸

In October 2015, another data retention law (also dubbed the ‘Big Brother Law’) was passed in Parliament. Law 235/2015 Amending Law 506/2004 On Personal

⁶⁵ Ibid., Para. 68.

⁶⁶ D.C.C. 461/2014, M. Of. No. 775 of 24 October 2014.

⁶⁷ An English translation of the decision can be found on the Court website, <https://www.ccr.ro/jurisprudenta-decizii-de-admitere>.

⁶⁸ Newscast, National Television, 25 January 2015. The Romanian Intelligence Service Puts More Pressure [on the Court]: George Maior Declares That He Will Know Whom to Point Out as the Main Culprit in the Case of a Catastrophe. http://stiri.tvr.ro/sri-mareste-pesiunea-george-maior-spune-ca-stie-pe-cine-va-arata-cu-degetul-in-caz-de-catastrofa_55586.html.

Data Processing and the Protection of Privacy in the Field of Electronic Communications⁶⁹ explicitly provides that all requests for traffic data, ‘made by prosecutors or state authorities with national defence or intelligence attributions’, have to be authorised by a judge; traffic, location or equipment identification data must be deleted or anonymised within three years at most. When a request from a court or prosecutor’s office or state authority with defence or intelligence attributions is made for such data, the obligation of service providers to store and preserve such data extends to a maximum term of five years from the date of the request or the date of the rendering of a final court judgment, respectively. This last ‘Big Brother’ law was prepared by extended consultations among party factions, under the patronage of the Presidency, and consequently passed by a landslide in Parliament. Thus, it was not challenged before promulgation, and the Ombudsman raised no direct exception of unconstitutionality before the Court. Nonetheless, the lack of an ‘abstract’ challenge leaves still open a possible ‘concrete’ challenge by exception of unconstitutionality raised by a party in the course of a future criminal trial, should the evidence issue from application of this law.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 Unpublished or secret measures would not pass the constitutional muster, insofar as they were normative in nature. In this respect, the curbing of Romanian Intelligence Service attributions by virtue of the ‘Cybersecurity Decision’ of 2015 is apposite. The reluctance of the Constitutional Court to sanction the incorporation by reference of administrative acts (e.g. ministerial orders and circulars) is also relevant in this vein.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 Not applicable.

⁶⁹ Law No. 235/2015, M. Of. No. 767 of 14 October 2015.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 Not applicable.

2.7.2 Not applicable.

2.7.3 Romania was subject to EU-related Balance-of-Payments (BoP) ‘economic emergency’ measures right after the onset of the sovereign debt crisis.⁷⁰ In 2009, the Council agreed to make medium-term financial assistance of up to 5 billion EUR available, in conjunction with a Stand-by Agreement with the IMF (in the amount of 11.4 billion SDR, approximately 12.9 billion EUR), with a further 2 billion EUR being provided by the World Bank (WB), the European Investment Bank (EIB) and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (EBRD) (the WB provided 1 billion under a Development Policy Loan, whereas the EBRD and the EIB provided 1 billion combined).

The measures agreed with the lenders did not single out pension or salary cuts (see, for instance, the Memorandum of Understanding with the European Commission of 23 June 2009, which recommended only foregoing scheduled salary increases and replacing departing public employees at a rate of 1 to 7).⁷¹ Yet the agreed budgetary and fiscal discipline targets were such that few alternatives to salary and pension cuts were available.

Law 329/2009⁷² was passed in furtherance of obligations undertaken by Romania through memoranda concluded with the European Commission and the IMF. It provided for a restructuring of public institutions (entailing also, under certain conditions, the firing of redundant public service employees), the rationalisation of public expenditures by 15.5% monthly reductions in October-December 2009, and the obligation of public employees drawing a pension higher than the average gross salary to opt between the pension and the salary.

The Constitutional Court was seized of the issue in abstract review, by virtue of an objection of unconstitutionality raised by the parliamentary minority. The objection identified various procedural and substantive flaws. In terms of procedural flaws, the complainants argued that the plea of necessity under Art. 53, under which the law had been adopted, did not conform to the constitutional conditions regarding the declaration and imposition of a state of emergency. This argument was important, since a national state of emergency on the ground of ‘defence of national security’ constitutes a legitimate purpose for restriction of rights according to Art. 53, which provides for the proportionality principle. According to the argument of the complainants, since the law was justified as an emergency measure, the requirements of Government Emergency Ordinance 1/1999 on the state of siege and the state of emergency should have been applied. Moreover, the parliamentary challenge was based on the reasoning that, according to Art. 93 (on emergency powers), the President should have instituted a state of siege or state of emergency and asked for parliamentary approval within five days at the latest. The Constitutional Court dismissed this objection to the austerity measures adopted under a plea of necessity, with the reasoning that the term ‘defence of national security’, as used in Art. 53, has a wider meaning than the term ‘state of siege or state of emergency’ envisioned by Art. 93. What is worthy of note is that the Court thus confirmed that restriction of rights in the context of an economic crisis qualifies as part of ‘defence of national security’ under Art. 53.

⁷⁰ I borrow the metaphor ‘economic emergency’ from Kilpatrick 2015. The term is apposite in the Romanian context, since dealing with a national emergency was the legitimate objective advanced as justification for the rights restrictions.

⁷¹ http://ec.europa.eu/economy_finance/assistance_eu_ms/romania/index_en.htm.

⁷² Law No. 329/05.11.2009 regarding the Restructuring of Public Institutions, the Rationalisation of Public Expenditures, the Support for the Business Environment and the Implementation of Memoranda of Understanding with the EU Commission and the International Monetary Fund.

A second procedural argument was less dramatic in nature. The complainants alleged that the law unlawfully presumed (in the case of restructuring) that a positive clearance would in fact be issued by the audit authority, the Court of Accounts.⁷³

The complainants additionally put forth a number of substantive objections, arguing that the law infringed the right to property (Art. 44) and the right to ‘labour and social protection of labour’ (Art. 41), insofar as it compelled publicly employed pensioners to opt between the two incomes. Further, the general prohibition of discrimination in Art. 16 was also invoked with regard to the firing criteria.

The law was upheld by a majority of the Court, except insofar as it covered ‘constitutionally entrenched offices and mandates’ (an interesting and perhaps not fully public-spirited exception). The majority opinion insisted upon the proportionality and especially the time limitation of most restrictions:

We must emphasise that the essence of the constitutional legitimacy of rights or liberties restrictions is the exceptional and temporary character of a measure. ... It falls upon the state to find solutions to counteract the economic crisis, by adequate economic and social policies. The reduction of public sector employees’ incomes cannot constitute, in the long term, a proportional measure. Contrariwise, the extension of such measure may result in unintended effects and disturb the good functioning of public institutions and state authorities.⁷⁴

There were three dissenting justices, who emphasised that the complainants were correct to raise the procedural argument regarding the requirement for the Court of Accounts to authorise cases of institutional reorganisation by means of government decree (Hotărâre de Guvern). Additionally, they stressed the substantively distinct levels of constitutional protection which ought to apply to pensions and public sector salaries, respectively. This minority caveat resurfaced in subsequent majority opinions.

⁷³ According to Art. 117(2): ‘The Government and Ministries may, on the authorization of the Court of Audit, set up specialised agencies in their subordination, but only if the law acknowledges the competence thereof.’

⁷⁴ D.C.C. 1.414/2009 (M. Of. No. 796 of 23 November 2009).

A series of constitutional decisions (Nos. 872, 873, 874) was rendered by the Constitutional Court on 25 June 2010 on conditionality-related austerity measures. The most prominent ruling was Decision 872/2010,⁷⁵ which resulted from an objection of unconstitutionality raised (referred) by the High Court of Cassation and Justice.⁷⁶ Law 118/2010 on Measures Necessary to Restore Budgetary Balance welded together a string of restrictions, among which were the reduction of pensions by 15%, a 25% public sector salary cut and a 15% diminution of unemployment benefits and child allowances. According to the High Court, the reductions were disproportionate and discriminatory, the reiteration of the restrictions in 2010 breached the principle according to which restrictions ought to be temporary in order to be considered proportionate, and was also – insofar as the cuts were applicable to the judicial system – in breach of judicial independence.

Most of the challenges were held by the Constitutional Court to be unfounded, either in proportionality review (salaries) or in principle. In the case of the argument regarding judicial independence, the Court insisted that judges ought to shoulder common burdens and that judicial independence comprises many elements, ‘none of which must be either neglected or absolutised’. Some challenges were rejected by the Court with the procedural reasoning that not all social benefits are protected constitutionally to begin with, and thus can be either granted or stripped at the legislative level.

However, the Constitutional Court upheld the challenge of unconstitutionality referring to the scheduled pension cut, with the argument that constitutional protection in Art. 47(2) and the special character of pensions, which are partly contributory in nature, shielded them from state interference. The state could not invoke hardship in defence of such measures, as the good husbandry of the social insurance budget is incumbent on the state. According to the Court, [T]he aim of the pension is to compensate during the passive life of the insured person the latter’s contribution to the State social security budget under the contributory principle and to ensure the means of subsistence of those who have acquired this right by law (contributory period, retirement age, etc.). Thus, the State has a positive obligation to take all means necessary to achieve that objective and to refrain from all conduct likely to limit the right to social security.

⁷⁵ D.C.C. 872/2010 (M. Of. No. 433 of 28 June 2010). An English translation of this ruling can be found on the Court website.

⁷⁶ In the Romanian system, the constitutionality of a law can be verified by the CCR in abstracto, ex ante, before promulgation (Art. 146(a)), subsequent to an objection of unconstitutionality raised by the President, the Speaker of either House, the Government, the High Court of Cassation and Justice, the Ombudsman ('Advocate of the People', Avocatul Poporului), 50 deputies or 25 senators, as well as ex officio on laws amending the Constitution. Laws and ordinances can be subjected to the Court by virtue of an exception of unconstitutionality, raised by parties in cases pending before courts or arbitration tribunals (or ex officio – as referrals – by the courts), as well as directly, by the Ombudsman (in the latter case, the term ‘exception’ is somewhat of a constitutional misnomer, since the Advocate of the People challenges the norm abstractly).

In terms of reasoning, although the tenor of the argument of the High Court in its referral was that pension would be a form of property under the Constitution and the ECHR, and although the Constitutional Court did cite in support of its own reasoning the well-known decisions of the Hungarian Constitutional Court from 1995 and 1997, the decision did not rest upon the argument that some parts of the social insurance scheme would be accorded ‘property-like protection’.⁷⁷ Article 44 (right to property) was not mentioned in the court’s reasoning. The finding of unconstitutionality with respect to pension reductions rested entirely on Art. 47(2) (living standard), which refers to the right to pensions in the same vein as the right to maternity leave, public health care, unemployment benefits ‘and other forms of public or private social securities’, generically referred to as ‘the right to social assistance, according to the law’.

Another referral from the High Court, adjudicated on the same day, concerned the 2010 Law Concerning some Measures with Respect to Pensions. The act sought, in the crisis context, to subject the so-called ‘special pensions’ (i.e. pensions of Members of Parliament, members of the military and diplomatic services, the judiciary, prison system, police, etc.) to the general legislative regime applicable to the contributory pension scheme. Whereas the austerity measures were generally upheld on the basis of the argument that such pensions were not calculated on the basis of the ‘contributory principle’ and were thus not constitutionally immune from changes, the rule seeking to eliminate the service pension of judges, prosecutors and ‘assistant magistrates’ of the Constitutional Court⁷⁸ was struck down. This seems somewhat paradoxical in the light of the Court’s previous ruling; the reasoning of the Court was that it would have infringed upon the principle of judicial independence and prosecutorial impartiality, as guaranteed by Arts. 124(3) and 132(1) of the Constitution.⁷⁹

In another decision rendered on the same date, Decision 874/2010,⁸⁰ the Constitutional Court adjudicated on a further objection regarding the Law on Measures Necessary to Restore the Budgetary Balance, raised by deputies and senators. The objection revisited in part the analytical structure of the High Court referral, previously addressed by Decision 872 (regarding the constitutional definition of emergency, the nature of acquired rights, the special status of pensions, etc.). An additional and somewhat eccentric argument in the MPs’ objection was that the salary cuts not only breached legitimate expectations but also imposed a levy on the public sector, analogous to a tax burden. The logic was that, should the cut be considered a form of taxation, this would lead to the conclusion that the ⁷⁷ For a scathing criticism of this argument in the Hungarian context (as ‘state socialism redux’), see Sajó 1995 and 1996.

⁷⁸ According to the Law on the Status of Magistrates 303/2004, judges and prosecutors benefit, at the age of 60, after 25 years of service, from a service pension, at the rate of 80% of their income (computed from gross salary and benefits) of the last month of service. Assistant magistrates of the Constitutional Court are assimilated to regular magistrates in terms of legal status.

⁷⁹ D.C.C. 873/2010 (M. Of. No. 433 of 28 June 2010).

⁸⁰ D.C.C. 874/2010 (M. Of. No. 433 of 28 June 2010).

general prohibition of discrimination in Art. 16 and the requirements contained in Art. 56(2) (fair distribution of the tax burden) were also breached, since private sector employees would contribute 16% of their revenue to the state budget whereas their counterparts in the public sector would suffer a burden of 41% of their income. Since the issues mirrored in good part those addressed in its prior decision, the Constitutional Court reiterated and refined the main tenets of its prior reasoning. First, emergency has an autonomous meaning in Art. 53. Here, the Court renewed its extensive references to IMF and EU Commission reports in order to substantiate the existence of an economic emergency. Secondly, all forms of social protection mentioned in the Constitution can be restricted if proportionality is observed. And thirdly, the right to a pension has a special status, which implies legitimate expectations that are opposable to the state and immunises this right from arbitrary governmental intrusions. Again, the Court refused to explain the special constitutional character of pensions by exclusive reference to contributiveness, i.e. in terms of a property-oriented justification. It held the pension cut to be unconstitutional solely by reference to Art. 47. Had the argument been formulated in terms of property, the extension of the unconstitutionality finding to the reduction of allowances paid for the attendants of disabled pensioners would have been difficult to justify, as such pensions and attendant allowances are based on need.⁸¹

The logic of the Court strikes therefore a mild ‘Solomonic’ chord in this respect, since the exclusive reliance on the ‘living standard’ guarantee of Art. 47 fails somewhat to explain the complete denial of protection to other rights enumerated in that article and affected by the austerity measures (maternity, unemployment benefits, etc.). Arguably, another Solomonic inconsistency of the austerity-related case law of the Constitutional Court is the use of the principle of judicial independence to single out and immunise the special pensions of magistrates from reduction (but not their salaries).

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Romanian courts (with the exception of the Constitutional Court, which has made no request for a preliminary ruling as of yet) have been increasingly active in making referrals to the CJEU. To date, 104 requests for a preliminary ruling have been made, originating from all jurisdictional tiers (Judecătorii, Tribunale, Curți de Apel, Înalta Curte de Casătie și Justiție).⁸² Out of these referrals, 29 are still pending and 75 have been finalised. Out of the latter, 32 resulted in preliminary rulings, 17 were rejected as inadmissible, another 17 were disposed of by reasoned order on the basis of Art. 99 of the Rules of Procedure and 9 were removed from the docket at the request of the referring court.

⁸¹ Ibid., ‘The Court also notes that according to Art. 54(a) of the Law No.19/2000, disability of first degree is characterised “by the total loss of working capacity, the capacity of self-help, self-conduction or spatial orientation, the disabled person requiring constant care or supervision from another person”. Therefore, the decrease by 15% of allowances of attendants for pensioners with disabilities of first degree, as well as establishing a pension-point value lower than the existent value to calculate the gross amount of attendant allowance, are contrary to Art. 47(1) of the Constitution, because the state failed to fulfil its obligation to take appropriate social protection measures.’

One can notice a steady increase in references over the last few years. Over half of the requests for preliminary references (57) have been registered with the Court of Justice during the past three years alone (the breakdown is: 12 since 1 January 2015, 38 in 2014, 17 in 2013, 13 in 2012, 14 in 2011 and 17 in 2010).

The subject matter of the cases runs almost the full gamut of prerogatives of the Union, e.g. from rights attached to European citizenship to the interpretation of the non-discrimination directive and the free movement of goods.

The first preliminary ruling on a Romanian reference, the Jipa case, concerned the question whether a Romanian restriction on travel for up to three years applicable to a citizen removed (because of being an illegal resident) from another Member State with which Romania had concluded a readmission agreement, would constitute a breach of EU citizenship-related free movement rights of citizens and their families.⁸³ The second, somewhat of a cause célèbre locally, concerned the conformity of a national pollution tax (in effect a first registration levy on cars), which indirectly burdened the owners of second-hand automobiles purchased in other Member States yet did not discourage the local purchase of second-hand vehicles of the same age and condition.⁸⁴

Until very recently, most of the references concerned exclusively the conformity of national legislation with EU law, namely, EU law and values were perceived and used as defences against national law and administrative actions. Nonetheless, this may change progressively, in lockstep with higher levels of familiarity with EU law, both in terms of judicial network socialisation and black letter law knowledge. For instance, the EAW reference of the Court of Appeals of Constanța (Ciprian Vasile Radu, referred to above in Sect. 2.3.1) sought to test the conformity of national law transposing the Framework Decision and the limits of the transposed normative act itself with the rights enshrined in the Charter and the ECHR (as ‘general principles’).

2.8.2–2.8.3 Over the past decade the Constitutional Court has acquired an increasingly prominent role within the Romanian constitutional system and adopted a more pronounced activist stance. These conjoined developments have resulted both from changes in the Court’s prerogatives as well as in the institutional make-up after the 2003 revision of the Constitution; these changes have led to a more unstable political system, the institutional dysfunctions of which the Court is often called upon to umpire.

⁸² A database and search engine for preliminary references and rulings is maintained by Euroquod, a working group of judges authorised by the Superior Council of the Magistracy and affiliated with the National Institute of Magistracy. The database and some statistical data are available at <http://www.euroquod.ro/ue/cereri/evidenta/>.

⁸³ Case C-33/07 Jipa [2008] ECR I-05157.

⁸⁴ Case C-402/09 Tatu [2011] ECR I-02711.

The shift is visible in quantitative terms (rates of annulment), albeit perhaps more apparent still in terms of the effect of Constitutional Court decisions in high-stakes constitutional conflicts, such as the governmental crisis of 2012. The activist positions of the Constitutional Court have also relied on and generated a higher degree of ‘transnationalisation’ of both jurisprudence and institutional networking.⁸⁵

In abstract (ex ante) control, the rate of annulment⁸⁶ is 41.70% in the preliminary review of laws (98 of 235 decisions), 57.14% in the case of ex officio review of constitutional revision initiatives (4 out of 7) and 39.47% in the case of standing orders of Parliament (15 of 38 decisions).⁸⁷

In concrete control (ex post review), the annulment rate is 2.46% (385 out of 15,654 decisions rendered).

Especially after EU accession, the number of exceptions of unconstitutionality⁸⁸ exploded, flooding the court with referrals from cases pending before the ordinary courts. Part of the explanation for this development lies in internal legislative inconsistencies and in the Court’s tendency to assert its prerogatives in jurisdictional battles with the ordinary judiciary. In this respect the Court was, as one commentator deftly put it, ‘a victim of its own success’.⁸⁹

The number of exceptions of unconstitutionality increased from under 500 before 2003 to 8,823 in 2009 and 4,750 in 2010, levelling again after 2011 (1,568, 888, 1,335 and 1,298 in 2012, 2013, 2014 and 2015, respectively).

⁸⁵ Politics and theory alike were polarised in their perspectives on the 2012 constitutional developments. See, for different interpretations of the crisis and the role of the Romanian Constitutional Court in the summer of 2012, Bianca Selejan-Guțan’s critical post, ‘The Illusion of the Romanian Constitution’, I-Connect, <http://www.iconnectblog.com/2012/12/the-illusion-of-the-romanian-constitution/> (and her book on the Romanian Constitution in context (Selejan-Guțan, 2016)) and the much more sympathetic reading of the issues in Perju 2015. See generally, in the European context, the comparative studies on Romania and Hungary in Sonnevend and Bogdandy 2015.

⁸⁶ Annulment in these statistics encompasses all forms of admission, i.e. full and partial annulment as well as ‘interpretive reservation’ (interpretation in conformity with the Constitution, analogous to the German verfassungskonforme Auslegung). The latter form of relief is in effect a doctrinal innovation by the Court, which leads to frequent doctrinal criticism with respect to the effect of an interpretive decision.

⁸⁷ The statistics are maintained (updated to July 2015) by the Court and available in English at <https://www.ccr.ro/Statistici-periodice>.

⁸⁸ On the difference between exceptions of unconstitutionality (ex post review) and ex ante, abstract review of objections of unconstitutionality see supra n. 76 and associated text.

⁸⁹ See the comparative graphs of abstract and concrete review on the Court website. Tănăsescu 2013, p. 17 notes also the inverse correlation between annulment and referral rates: ‘If in 2008 the success rate for exceptions was 3%, in 2011 it had reached the lowest ebb, at 0.7%, whereas in 2010 it had been 1.1%, namely, very weak. One would do well to compare these figures against the yearly average rate of 2.18%, measured for the twenty years of activity’ (translation by the author).

There are also EU influences that bear on this general phenomenon and explain the fluctuation in and the high number of exceptions. Until the criminal and procedure codes as well as the organic law of the Court were amended in autumn 2010 by Law 177/2010, exceptions were used by litigants as a dilatory strategy to reach the statute of limitations (prescription of criminal responsibility), since, pending a decision on the exception, the trial before the judge a quo was stayed whereas the term of prescription continued to run. The use of these tactics was castigated by the European Commission as a hindrance to successful anti-corruption policies, which in turn prompted an expedited legislative revision process.⁹⁰

2.8.4–2.8.5 German identity control case law was cited with approval; however it would be far-fetched to assert that the Court has taken an analogous position vis-à-vis EU law on the basis of the eternity provision of the Romanian Constitution. The Romanian Constitutional Court takes a Euro-friendly position, to the point of liaising with European Commission delegations monitoring the implementation of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism. Romanian legislation transposing the Data Retention Directive was declared unconstitutional on the grounds of an autonomous understanding of fundamental rights, based on the national Constitution.

2.8.6 Integration, especially in the case of a peripheral jurisdiction like Romania, induces significant pressures to conform. Romania is a latecomer to the Union and one of only two countries to join the EU with the post-accession caveat of the Cooperation and Verification Mechanism.

An anecdotal example would help illustrate this assertion. Prior to EU accession, the Constitutional Court was called upon to verify whether a governmental ordinance which prohibited hate speech, punishable by a prison sentence of up to five years, met the criterion of emergency. The question was not the substantive issue, namely, whether the promotion of fascist or xenophobic discourses ought to be incriminated. The problem before the Court was whether this should have followed the ordinary path of parliamentary adoption (in view of the fact that the ordinance incriminated hate speech with a stiff sentence and fundamental rights were at stake), rather than the ‘motorised’ procedure of an emergency governmental ordinance. Unlike parliamentary legislation, emergency ordinances are in essence executive decrees with the force of law: they are drafted without any debate, enter into force immediately after the Executive registers them with Parliament and are deemed to be automatically adopted should Parliament take no course in the matter within a certain timeframe.

The Constitutional Court held that the ‘extrinsic’ constitutional criterion of emergency was fulfilled, even though fundamental rights were regulated by what is in essence a governmental decree, given an urgent need to join the Union and the fact that a signal of conformity needed to be sent expeditiously.⁹¹ One could, contrary to the Court's reasoning, very well argue that the logic of defining emergency as a constitutional requirement for substitution of the parliamentary procedure in such terms trivialised and 'instrumentalised' the values at stake. Otherwise put, in the instrumental logic underlying the Court's reasoning, rights restrictions were justified as a fair bargain for EU accession, whereas a show of tolerance was considered necessary primarily for 'export' purposes.

⁹⁰ E.g. CVM Report of July 20, 2010, COM (2010) 401 final: ‘Exceptions of unconstitutionality continue to delay high-level corruption cases while a draft law eliminating the suspension of trial proceedings when unconstitutionality exceptions are raised still awaits adoption in the Parliament.’ Law No. 117 was adopted and promulgated a few months later (M. Of. No. 672 of 4 October 2010).

This attitude still pervades in public debates, doctrinal literature and the institutional positions of the judiciary. However, even though no thorough statistics are at hand, one can note some emerging dissonances. Judges at the lower Courts of Appeal seem, on the average, to be more autonomous in their assessment of EU-related measures than judges of the High Court, in terms, for instance, of their readiness to refuse the execution of an EAW on the grounds of a breach of constitutional/ECHR rights. On appeal, the High Court almost invariably decides to uphold the execution of a warrant.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 See infra 2.13.1–2.13.4. On the problem of fundamental rights restrictions through measures adopted by governmental decree, see Sect. 2.8.6.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 One usually finds that all traditions are somewhat idiosyncratic, the deeper one probes into the concrete meaning in a given context. This is not to deny patterns of commonality at the level of principles, but to underline the fact that commonalities must of necessity be pitched at a level that is oftentimes too abstract to help in the solving of concrete cases. To wit, all liberal constitutions adhere to the principle of judicial independence. A minimal core understanding of this principle is shared:⁹² judges must not be removed from office, unless by some form of impeachment or after criminal conviction and should hold tenure 'during good behaviour' (quandiu se bene gesserint). Nonetheless, the principle as such is of relatively little help in a myriad of minute questions that arise in practice, such as:

⁹¹ D.C.C. 67/2005 (M. Of. No. 146 of 18 February 2005): 'The prevention and combatting of incitement to national, racial or religious hatred correspond to the requirements of the European Union in the field, constituting at the same time a positive signal given by the Romanian state in terms of combatting racism, anti-Semitism and xenophobia. The efficiency of the signal depends on the urgency with which the state adopts the measures sanctioning such deeds.'

⁹² The only exception is constituted by judicial elections in US state constitutional law.

Are prosecutors to be considered magistrates and if so, how and to what extent should their situation be analogous to that of judges? Should a high judicial council be created and if so, what should its composition be? Does independence also imply a constitutional prohibition on the reduction of judicial revenues?

The same observation could be made with respect to the understanding of rights or even to rapidly expanding methodological frameworks such as proportionality analysis. This tension is obscured by the precatory reference in Art. 6(3) TEU to ‘rights result[ing] from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States’. The tensions with the logic of traditional constitutionalism are, however, laid bare by specific judgments of the CJEU. For instance, when it rules that human dignity is a legitimate limit to the free movement of services, subject to proportionality control, as in the Omega judgment,⁹³ or claims that an extended blockade would be a particular manifestation of a common constitutional understanding of the rights to assembly and free speech, as in Schmidberger, the CJEU speaks traditional constitutional language but uses the concepts very differently from and sometimes in order to counter traditional, nation state-bound constitutional understandings.⁹⁴ The Laval and Viking ‘adaptations’ of proportionality analysis and horizontal effect to the benefit of commercial freedom and to the detriment of trade unions, respectively, are also worthy of mention in this respect. Contrariwise, traditional constitutional logic places the burden on the state and gives the prima facie benefit of legitimacy to fundamental rights. Needless to say, this criticism does not presuppose wanton disregard of ‘constitutional traditions’ on the part of the CJEU. The Luxemburg Court does the best it is expected to do in the systemic and institutional logic of the current EU constitutional paradigm.

At a deeper level, the essentially embedded paradigm of national constitutional law, moored to history and experience as it inevitably is, coexists uneasily or in tension with the prospective and more rationalistic outlook of EU law.⁹⁵ The latter system integrates particles of constitutional information derived from the constitutionalist liberal tradition of the nation-state but it does so pragmatically and in an ad-hoc, unstructured manner.

2.10.2 The best protection of common constitutional traditions would in my opinion be jurisdictional in nature, i.e. either a procedural way of empowering national constitutional law by virtue of a presumption of conformity in cases of divergent national constitutional decisions or by a superimposed institutional umpire (an analogue of the French Tribunal des Conflits at the European level). For a (rebuttable) presumption of conformity to function, the voting procedure currently used by the European Court of Justice would need overhauling. As a first step, decision by unanimity would need to be replaced with majority voting. One could imagine a system in the logic of which a national constitutional court decision or – alternatively – an interpretation supported by a significant number of Member States' constitutional tribunals could only be rebutted by a supermajority of the CJEU.⁹⁶

⁹³ Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609.

⁹⁴ Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659.

⁹⁵ Haltern 2003.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 Deference is arguably, to use Jaffe's quip about standards of review in administrative law, a mere descriptive heuristic device or – to put it otherwise – a rough proxy for describing the 'spirit or mood in which judges should approach their task'.⁹⁷ Leaving aside the concrete circumstances of the Melloni case,⁹⁸ the answer of the Court of Justice to the higher standard guarantee under Art. 53 of the Charter was in point of principle that higher standards ought not to hinder the effectiveness of EU law. This is, however, oversimplifying a little, a paradox (or an oxymoron) equalled only by the notion that the Court could be externally controlled by another international court only insofar as that review guaranteed the autonomy of EU law as the Union judicatures interpret it.⁹⁹

The Court of Justice could only be induced to allow higher standards and to express more 'constitutional empathy' towards its national counterparts by way of a procedural, remedy – or conflict-related change in the constitutive treaties, to make more room for differences.

This remark dovetails with the argument made in the section above.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 Public debate on constitutional rights at the time of transposition was sparse to non-existent. In the case of data retention, the positions of the Romanian ⁹⁶ Analogous solutions have been suggested in comparative law, in order to break jurisdictional or competence-related ties. See for instance Adrian Vermeule's suggestion to solve the notoriously inconsistent jurisprudential quagmires related to the application of Chevron deference by recasting the Chevron doctrine. Vermeule recommended that the doctrine be institutionally reshaped as a voting rule by 'loading the [judicial decision-making] dice' 'say, by a six-three vote on the Supreme Court, or by a three-zero vote on a court of appeals panel'. Vermeule 1997, at p. 146.

⁹⁷ Jaffe 1951, p. 1236. Cf., similar, Shapiro 1983, p. 1490: 'Standards for judicial review are notoriously vague. The degree to which a court will substitute its judgment for an agency's is neither determined nor expressed by the formula it announces.'

⁹⁸ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

⁹⁹ Opinion 2/13 Opinion pursuant to Art. 218(11) TFEU [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2454.

Constitutional Court have been followed and covered in the press, also due to the fact that wiretapping and surveillance are constant topics in the public sphere (also as a result of anticorruption campaigns and the occasional leak of transcripts in the press).

2.12.2–2.12.3 A mechanism (either a procedural defence or a suspension/freezing of the transposition pending review) would be a welcome amendment to EU law. However, the way in which such a mechanism would be incorporated in the constitutive treaties is impossible to predict at the moment.

Conversely, to expect a more sympathetic institutional poise by the European Commission or the Court of Justice runs counter to the logic according to which the Union institutions function. For instance, deference to national constitutional law is at loggerheads with the insistence of the CJEU, from Simmenthal onwards, on treating all national legal provisions alike, irrespective of their status in the internal hierarchy of norms, and thus of treating national constitutional courts on a par with ordinary tribunals.¹⁰⁰ Moreover, this tendency is complicated by various national adverse effects, reinforcing, for instance, conflicts among national judicatures and manipulative attempts by both constitutional courts and supreme courts to question internal normative hierarchies through proxy jurisdictional wars, as revealed, for example, by the backdrop of the Melki and Abdeli judgment, i.e. an attempt by the Cour de Cassation to subvert the effect of the newly introduced ‘priority constitutional referral’ (and by implication the position of the Constitutional Council within the internal constitutional system).¹⁰¹

Any institutional changes of such amplitude would, however, need to take into account the complexity of the unintended consequences which are possible down the line. For instance, allowing national governments to use constitutional court judgments as a form of estoppel to infringement procedures could become (in Member States with weaker constitutional tribunals) an incentive to over-politicise the already politically conned constitutional judicial appointments at the national point of ascription.

2.13 Experts’ Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.4 A general caveat in terms of extrapolating from Romanian developments to general conclusions concerns the special status of Romania within the Union. The country is, alongside Bulgaria, subject to a relatively amorphous and ¹⁰⁰ Komárek 2014.

¹⁰¹ Joined cases C-188/10 and C-189/10 Melki and Abdeli [2010] ECR I-05667.

ambivalent¹⁰² form of post-accession monitoring by the European Commission, through the intermediary of the Mechanism of Cooperation and Verification.

That being said and although it is generally hard to argue about rights reductions in a complex counterfactual setting, the protection of constitutional rights in Romania has in my view suffered a setback (in some respects and in some dimensions) after accession in 2007. At the very least, one could argue that discrete processes have been unfolding which give legitimate cause for concern.¹⁰³

The ‘transnationalisation’ of discourses has set in motion patterns of conformity which are to a certain extent auto-logical (if one were to use Luhmannian jargon) or – in more pedestrian terms – very hard to account for in the paradigm of constitutionalism and constitutional law. In the name of judicial independence, for instance, the European Commission recommended, under the influence of the fashionable European Magistrates for Democracy and Freedom (MEDEL) template,¹⁰⁴ itself patterned on the French-Italian model, the entrenchment of an autonomous Superior Council of Magistracy, composed of judges and prosecutors elected by their peers. Romania has ended up having a council that has surpassed its Italian counterpart in autonomy, being in effect fully insulated from any kind of non-judicial control. Out of its 19 members, 14 are elected by their peers, and the elected members exercise most of the effective attributions of the Council in the two sections. Even though judicial independence, in this extreme form, exists nowhere outside Romania, the Constitutional Court has thwarted, in the name of ‘judicial independence’, all attempts to revise the Constitution in this respect, for instance a proposal to reduce the number of elected members and increase the number of political appointees (now there are only two ‘representatives of the civil society’ in ¹⁰² The Mechanism was scheduled to lapse in 2010 but has been extended in the meanwhile, seemingly indefinitely. In addition to the temporal ambivalence, there was a measure of ‘creative interpretation’ by the European Commission in terms of redefining the scope of its purview. Although the initial mandate concerned four ‘benchmarks’, formulated in ostensibly technical terms (some of them were fulfilled in the meanwhile: adoption of civil and criminal codes and procedure codes, the creation of an integrity agency, etc.), the scope of the CVM reporting has been expanded after 2012 to include references about the ‘Romanian constitutional system’ as such. Last but not least, the current relevance of the CVM mandate within the Union system is not very clear, due to political statements and general perceptions associating Schengen accession with the lifting of the CVM conditionality.

¹⁰³ I deal at more length with some of the matters discussed in this section in Iancu 2016.

¹⁰⁴ MEDEL (French acronym for Magistrats européens pour la démocratie et les libertés), a judicial association founded in 1985 at the initiative of ten professional associations drawn from six European countries, produced a draft Additional Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights in January 1993. The model statute (known as the ‘Palermo Declaration’) recommended, as a model of good practice, the creation of judicial councils composed of political (parliamentary) appointees and (at the rate of at least half the membership) of judges elected by their peers. MEDEL also recommended that the high judicial council should have extensive attributions with respect to budget, recruitment, administration of the judiciary and disciplinary measures. This model, reflecting Italian and French practice, was subsequently taken up by international organisations as a standard and expanded upon. See Garoupa and Ginsburg 2009, pp. 109 et seq.

the Council). The most recent decision on the matter does not even attempt an exercise in comparative constitutional law to substantiate its finding of unconstitutionality with respect to a proposal to modestly increase the number of ‘civil society’ members from two to four. The Commission went further in a recent CVM report and recommended in essence that Romania curb freedom of expression directed at judges and the high council: ‘The situation suggests the need for a review of existing rules, to ensure that freedom of the press is accompanied by a proper protection of institutions and of individuals’ fundamental rights as well as to provide for effective redress.¹⁰⁵ This argument could support the corollary that even political comments or critical media coverage of high-profile corruption cases would imperil judicial independence. Yet, an understanding of judicial independence that warrants restrictions of free speech to protect relatively powerful institutions fits uneasily in a rights-oriented constitutional paradigm, especially in a context where little transpires in the public sphere about the activity of the Council and its elected members. To wit, a civil society representative in the high council resigned from her position in 2012, accusing the high council of a lack of transparency and the by-passing of the Plenum by unilateral SCM leadership decisions (the two civil society representatives in the council take part and vote only in SCM Plenum meetings).¹⁰⁶ Another civil society member, while refraining from public comments, published a very critical article about the SCM reform and its actual functioning at the end of her mandate.¹⁰⁷

From what little transpires in the media, an argument for more institutional transparency and responsibility can be made. A recent case, publicised widely by the national press, concerned a woman who had been arrested by the National Anticorruption Directorate (she was accused of blackmailing the President of the High Court of Cassation and Justice), held for over six months in pre-trial detention,¹⁰⁸ convicted in first instance but subsequently acquitted on appeal. However, in the meanwhile, the acquittal judgment was quashed and the trial on appeal was reopened and retried by a different section of the Bucharest Court of Appeals, which ¹⁰⁵ COM (2013) 47 final, p. 4; emphasis added.

¹⁰⁶ Neagu, A. (2012, August 23) Georgiana Iorgulescu, reprezentant al societății civile, a demisionat din CSM: ‘Ceea ce s-a întâmplat în ultimele săptămâni a umplut paharul. Eu nu pot să iau parte la tot felul de jocuri de culise.’ (Georgiana Iorgulescu, civil society representative, has resigned from SCM: ‘I cannot take part in cabals (jocuri de culise), deferrals, decisions taken without consulting the Plenum and decisions taken unilaterally by the leadership.’). Hotnews.ro. <http://www.hotnews.ro/stiri-esential-13081356-georgiana-iorgulescu-reprezentant-societatii-civile-demisionat-din-csm-ceea-intamplat-ultimele-saptamani-umplut-paharul-nu-pot-iau-partetot-felul-jocuri-culise.htm>.

¹⁰⁷ Tănărescu 2011.

¹⁰⁸ Prior to indictment before the court, Art. 23(5) of the Constitution limits pre-trial detention to a maximum of 180 days (extendable by a judge by terms of 30 days). Once the person is on trial, preventive detention can be extended for up to 5 years or half of the maximum sentence, whichever term is shorter (Art. 239, Criminal Procedure Code).

convicted her to a three year suspended sentence.¹⁰⁹ In the last CVM report by the Commission, of January 2016, this incident is mentioned as an example of the High Court President being ‘personally’ subject to improper criticism by politicians [referring to a public letter of the President of the Senate to the President of Romania], whereas the case is impersonally described in a footnote as merely ‘referring to a person acquitted in first instance but in preventive arrest for 6 months’.¹¹⁰

A related and more general phenomenon in the Romanian context is generated by the transformation of anti-corruption into a quasi-constitutional vocabulary, by virtue of the EU CVM conditionality. Debates on high-level corruption cases have substituted public discussions on genuine political issues, whereas the technical jargon of criminal procedural law is not accessible to either the media or ordinary citizens. Unsurprisingly, the inherently technical nature of the proceedings and the quantitative logic of anti-corruption campaigns have contributed to conspiratorial explanations with respect to the ‘real’ master of anti-corruption prosecutions and to a deeply ideological connotation and polarisation of the camps.

Hazardous press statements, such as the affirmation by the current chief prosecutor of the NAD that the department was not a ‘Romanian NSA’ since ‘it has neither the manpower nor the resources’ [i.e. to be a local counterpart of the American National Security Agency] and that anticorruption could hardly be expected to solve the problems of the healthcare or education system ‘by arresting all doctors and teachers’, do little to quell such apprehension.¹¹¹

¹⁰⁹ The event was extensively covered by an extremely polarised press (along anticorruption/anti-anticorruption lines), so that the acquittal itself was described, for instance, as ‘the true judicial error’ (anticorruption press) Avram, L. (2015, June 24) Cazul Rarinca. De ce abia achitarea santajistei este o eroare judiciară (The Rarinca case: Why the acquittal of the blackmailer is the true judicial error) Adevărul. http://adevarul.ro/news/eveniment/cazul-rarinca-abia-achitarea-santajistei-eroarejudiciara-1_558ae67bcfbe376e3592d77a/index.html; and the conviction as ‘generalized judicial delirium’, Popescu, L. (2015, May 29) Apel catre avocati: donatii pentru Doamna Mariana RARINCA, victima nevinovata a unor magistrati (Appeal to members of the Bar: Donations for Ms. Mariana Rarinca, the innocent victim of certain magistrates). Lumea Justitiei. <http://www.luju.ro/opinii/editorial/apel-catrem-avocati-donatii-pentru-doamna-mariana-rarinca-victima-nevinovata-a-unor-magistrati> (blog post by a University of Bucharest Professor and Bucharest Bar attorney, widely disseminated and commented in the anti-anticorruption-inclined media). Needless to say, most of the public perceives these matters, as reflected in the mainstream media, in grossly and grotesquely oversimplified forms, which is a natural effect of the corruption-related ‘structural transformations of the public sphere’ (few, if any, have either the time or the knowledge necessary to read hundreds of pages of indictments and judgments every day).

¹¹⁰ Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism of 27 January 2016, COM (2016) 41 final, p. 4.

¹¹¹ In fairness, both assertions are qualified by the observation that wiretap warrants are issued by judges and that preventive measures are also needed. See e.g. ‘Keinesfalls. Dazu hätten wir keine ausreichenden Ressourcen, weder in puncto Personal noch bei der Finanzierung. Auch muss eine Erlaubnis von einem Richter vorliegen.’ (Not at all. For this we have neither sufficient personnel nor financial resources. Also, one needs a warrant issued by a judge.) ‘Unter anderem müsste es

A more general, related issue to flag up from the point of view of traditional constitutional law concerns the principle of separation of powers, which is also a central element of classic safeguards in criminal law. Since the SCM was constitutionally entrenched in 2003, the distinction between judges and prosecutors has become more and more blurred in practice, as both categories are designated as ‘magistrates’ and represented by the same corporatist body. The ‘insular’ form of constitutional autonomy gained by the SCM in the name of judicial independence has been described in a recent study as reinforcing ‘an absolute independence of the Romanian judicial system vis-à-vis the rest of the Romanian state structure’.¹¹² The initial division between the two categories of ‘magistrates’ (i.e. sitting judges and the prosecutors forming the Public Ministry) has been further obfuscated by the emphasis on anti-corruption policies and European Commission pressures for more ‘judicial independence’,¹¹³ which has come to denote not only the complete autonomy of the SCM but also – conversely – the quest to secure the highest number of convictions. In spite of an already idiosyncratically broad understanding of the systemic autonomy of the judiciary, the self-referential logic of judicial and prosecutorial ‘independence’ from social and democratic-majoritarian checks and balances continues to dominate unabated EU demands on the Romanian constitutional system. The last Commission report (of January 2016) recommends the use of future debates on constitutional change to ‘consolidate judicial independence at Constitutional level’, asks that criticism of judges and the judiciary by the press and politicians be curbed, and urges for a further reduction of the ministerial (i.e. political) role in nominating prosecutors for appointment to high positions. The report also advocates for the replacement of political prosecutorial appointments with ‘an independent system … settled in law, with the support of the Venice einen deutlicheren politischen Willen zur Bekämpfung der Großkorruption geben und mehr Präventivmaßnahmen – es kann nicht sein, dass die DNA alle Ärzte oder Lehrer verhaften muss, bevor wir gegen die Korruption im Gesundheitssystem oder im Bildungswesen vorgehen.’ (Among other things, political will is necessary to combat high corruption and in the field of preventive measures – it cannot be that the NAD must arrest all doctors and teachers before we proceed [preventively] to curb corruption in the education and health care systems.); Balomiri, L. (2014, August 12) Rumänien: ‘Gesetz ist mittlerweile für alle gleich’ (Romania: ‘The law has now become equal for all’). Der Standard. <http://derstandard.at/200004252427/Rumaenien-Gesetz-ist-mittlerweile-fuer-alle-gleich>.

¹¹² Dima and Tănasescu 2013, p. 123: ‘By reforming the SCM in 2003 and adopting Law No. 317/2004 a transition was made in the functioning of the Romanian legal system from total dependence to complete independence. But, like any other extreme, this absolute independence of the judicial system from the rest of Romanian state structures, including the citizens, is deleterious.’

¹¹³ See for instance the 2014 Cooperation and Verification Mechanism Progress Report of the European Commission for Romania, recommending that the SCM should be consulted in the course of future revision processes on all proposed constitutional amendments affecting judicial independence and suggesting that the Venice Commission and the EU Commission should be consulted and notified, respectively. COM (2014) 37 final, at p. 3.

Commission'. Moreover, in a country where judiciary salaries exceed considerably the emoluments of other public servants, the Commission deplores the fact that an instrument does not exist to offer 'financial or (sic!) legal help for magistrates seeking redress in court [for damages to their reputation or image caused by libellous or slanderous statements]'.¹¹⁴

None of this is to deny the constitutional value of an independent judiciary, in all aspects that traditionally concern judicial independence (immunities, institutional guarantees, financial security). Nonetheless, an exacerbated and abstract (uprooted) interpretation of constitutional concepts and institutions is also fraught with its own shortcomings and risks. Traditional constitutional logic is averse to the complete insulation of any branch of government from political, democratic, and social checks and balances.

In the context of the crisis, some tendencies and path dependencies of the European Union, towards 'governance without government' are naturally enhanced by the need to take swift action without much democratic or parliamentary debate.¹¹⁵ These phenomena should be countered by mechanisms that enhance participatory democracy, both in its direct and parliamentary form.

The position of national constitutional courts vis-à-vis the European Union also ought to be strengthened in ways that are, albeit 'dialogical', procedurally accountable and transparent.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1–3.1.2 See generally supra, Sect. 1.2.1. Article 10, which is also pertinent to the question, reads:

Romania fosters and develops peaceful relations with all the states, and, in this context, good neighbourly relations, based on the principles and other generally recognized provisions of international law.

3.1.3 No attempts at constitutional reform related to international law and global governance have been made to date.

3.1.4 See generally Sect. 2.13.4.

¹¹⁴ Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on Progress in Romania under the Co-operation and Verification Mechanism of 27 January 2016, COM (2016), pp. 3–4 and 16.

¹¹⁵ Scicluna 2014.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 Article 11 (international law and domestic law) provides that the state undertakes to perform its treaty obligations in good faith (para. 1), that treaties ratified by Parliament according to the law are part of domestic law (para. 2) and that should a treaty comprise provisions contrary to the Constitution, its ratification is possible after revision of the fundamental law (para. 3). According to Art. 146(b), the Constitutional Court verifies the conformity of agreements and treaties upon notification by either of the Presidents (Speakers) of the two Chambers of Parliament, 50 deputies or 25 senators.

3.2.2 According to Art. 20 (international human rights treaties), ‘[c]onstitutional provisions concerning the citizens’ rights and liberties shall be interpreted and enforced in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the covenants and other treaties Romania is a party to’. The article reads:

Constitutional provisions concerning the citizens’ rights and liberties shall be interpreted and enforced in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with the covenants and other treaties Romania is a party to.

Where any inconsistencies exist between the covenants and treaties on the fundamental human rights Romania is a party to, and the national laws, the international regulations shall take precedence, unless the Constitution or national laws comprise more favourable provisions.

Significant disagreement exists over the exact application of the latter provision and over the institutions competent (Constitutional Court, courts of general jurisdiction) to decide whether domestic law or international law comprises ‘more favourable provisions’. Such disagreement is inevitable, especially in the case of conflicts of rights, where ‘more favourable’ is inevitably in the balance.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 The Constitution uses the terms ‘agreement’ (Art. 146(b)), ‘treaties and other international agreements’), ‘treaty’ (Art. 11), ‘covenant’ or ‘regulation’ (Art. 20(2)) somewhat interchangeably. For example, Art 20(2) provides: ‘Where any inconsistencies exist between the covenants and treaties on the fundamental human rights Romania is a party to, and the national laws, the international regulations shall take precedence.’

Law 590/22.12.2003 on Treaties¹¹⁶ enumerates the treaties and agreements that must be ratified by parliamentary law (Art. 19); however, apart from treaties ‘concluded at state level’, other acts (inter-governmental agreements) can be ratified exceptionally by emergency ordinance, subject to ‘a well-founded justification of urgency'. Governmental legislation by emergency ordinance, albeit an exception in theory, dwarfs parliamentary legislation in practice, also due to the well-known difficulty of providing a normative definition of emergency that would be susceptible to enforcement by judicial review. The Government can also be authorised by way of ordinary delegation to ratify intergovernmental agreements, due to the fact that treaty ratification is not defined as being within the subject matter of organic legislation.¹¹⁷ The Romanian constitutional system divides legislation into ordinary (a residual category) legislation, which can be adopted by simple majority, and organic laws, which are passed in enumerated fields (Art. 73(3)) and must be adopted by an absolute majority.

¹¹⁶ M. Of. No. 23 of 12 January 2014.

Hence, the peculiarity of the Romanian constitutional system, governmental substitute lawmaking by emergency ordinance, also influences the field of treaty ratification, increasing the asymmetries of information, which tend to be characteristic of the field of foreign affairs.

The Senate serves as a 'decisional chamber' for the adoption of 'treaties and other international agreements and the legislative measures deriving from the implementation of such treaties and agreements'. This means that the ratification law is introduced in the Chamber of Deputies as the 'first notified chamber' and, should the 'reflection house' take no action within 45 days, the bill is automatically sent for adoption to the 'decisional house'.

3.3.2 A national referendum is mandatory for the approval of constitutional amendment laws and to impeach the President. The President may initiate a consultative national referendum on any 'matter of national concern' (Art. 90). According to Art. 12(1)(e and f) of the Referendum Law 3/2000, such matters initially included the conclusion, signature and ratification of 'international acts' of unlimited duration or for a period over ten years, as well as 'Euro-Atlantic integration'.¹¹⁸ According to the last amendment of the Referendum Law, the participation quorum now stands at 30%, with the validity quorum being 25% of the expressed ballots. No consultative referendum touching on international relations has been initiated as of yet.

On a related matter, according to Art. 74 (legislative initiative), popular initiatives may not relate to, inter alia, international affairs.

¹¹⁷ D.C.C. 105/1998 (M. Of. No. 263 of 15 July 1998).

¹¹⁸ The article as such was voided by DCC 567/2006 (M. Of. No. 613 of 14 July 2006). According to the Court, the organic law cannot add to the Constitution, and thus the right of the President is not qualified. Yet, in current (January 2017) political-constitutional debates, the issue of implicit limitations was raised in the context of a presidential proposal to submit a question relating to the possibility of a general pardon/amnesty law to a national referendum, upon the consideration that such measures are politically self-serving and impede the 'fight against corruption'. The president reformulated the initially proposed question, considering that an analogy would exist with the limits on popular legislative initiative, namely, amnesty, pardon, taxation and international relations. These were political statements, as of January 2017 no concrete proposal has been tabled.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 A treaty can be referred to the Constitutional Court upon notification by either Speaker, 50 deputies or 25 senators (Art. 146(b)). This competence was acquired by the Court by virtue of the 2003 amendments. The procedure has been dormant since its adoption: no international agreement or treaty has thus far been referred to the Court.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 See supra Sect. 2.7.3.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

In terms of areas where global governance has posed problems for Romania, there have been massive protests against the Romanian subsidiary of Gabriel Resources, a Canadian mining corporation. These protests led to the rejection by the Chamber of Deputies, in June 2014, of a special law (locally dubbed the ‘Roşia Montană Law’), which would have authorised intensive gold mining by cyanide leaching in the Apuseni mountains of Transylvania.¹¹⁹ Recently, in July 2015, the company announced that it would seek ICSID arbitration and claim 4 billion USD in damages from the Romanian state. Protests also took place in a number of counties against exploratory hydraulic fracturing for shale gas by Chevron.

Environmental NGOs, activists and a few press articles have linked these issues with the arbitration dangers and asymmetries of power and information linked with the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP).¹²⁰ The number of ¹¹⁹ http://www.cdep.ro/pls/proiecte/upl_pck.proiect?idp=13777.

¹²⁰ Smith, K. (2015, August 4). Corporate vampires have tried to suck $ 4 billion out of Romania, and with TTIP the UK could be next. The Independent. <http://www.independent.co.uk/voices/comment/corporate-vampires-have-tried-to-suck-4-billion-out-of-romania-and-with-ttip-the-uk-could-be-next-10435975.html>; Goişiu, M. (2015, August 5) Cazul Gabriel Resources vs. România în atenția întregii lumi (Gabriel Resources vs. Romania in the global limelight). România Curată, <http://www.romaniacurata.ro/cazul-gabriel-resources-vs-romania-in-atentia-intregii-lumi-anglia-ce-se-intampla-este-un-semn-inspaimantator-si-pentru-marea-britanie-canada-corporatiile-canadiene-ab/>.

signatures in support of the ‘Stop TTIP’ initiative has barely exceeded the ‘country quorum’ (Art. 7, Regulation 211/2011/EU¹²¹), probably due to insufficient coverage in the national media.¹²²

References

- Albi A. (2015) Erosion of Constitutional Rights in EU Law: A Call for ‘Substantive Co-operative Constitutionalism’ Part 1. Vienna Journal of International Constitutional Law 9(2):151–185.
- Balan M. (2015) Drept constituțional și instituții politice (Constitutional law and political institutions), Vol. I, Teoria generală a statului și a constituției. Constituția Română în context european (General theory of the state and of the constitution. The Romanian Constitution in the European context). Editura Hamangiu, București.
- Benke K. (2007) Mandatul european de arestare în jurisprudența instanțelor constituționale (The European Arrest Warrant in the case law of constitutional tribunals). Studia Universitatis Babeș-Bolyai-Iurisprudentia 1/2007:66–84.
- Czarnota A. (2009) On Post-Communist Transformation, Structural Corruption and dealing with the Past as a Constitutional Process. In: Iancu B., The Law/Politics Distinction in Contemporary Public Law Adjudication. Eleven International Publishing, Utrecht, pp. 169–185.
- Dima B., Tănăsescu E.S. (2013) ‘Puterea judecătorească’ (The judicial power). Revista de Drept Public, No. 1/2013:121–128.
- Frankenberg G. (2010) Constitutional Transfer: The Ikea Theory Revisited. ICON 8(3):563–579.
- Garoupa N., Ginsburg T. (2009) Guarding the Guardians: Judicial Councils and Judicial Independence. Am. J. Comp. L. 57:103–134.
- Ghinea C. (2012) Eu votez DNA! De ce merită să apărăm instituțiile anticorupție (I vote NAD! Why is it worth defending the anticorruption institutions). Humanitas, București.
- Grimm D. (2014a) Die Rolle der nationalen Verfassungsgerichte in der europäischen Demokratie. In: Franzius C., Mayer F., Neyer J. (eds.) Grenzen der europäischen Integration-Herausforderungen für Recht und Politik. Nomos, Baden-Baden, pp. 27–47.
- Grimm D. (2014b) Europa: Ja—aber welches? Merkur 12:1045–1058.
- Guțan M. (2010) Transplantul constituțional și obsesia modelului semi-prezidențial francez în România contemporană (I) (Constitutional transplant and the obsession over the French semi-presidential model in contemporary Romania). Pandectele Române (5):30–84.
- Guțan M., Selejan-Guțan B. (2014) (eds.) Europeanization and Judicial Culture in Contemporary Democracies. Ed. Hamangiu, București.
- Haltern U. (2003) Internationales Verfassungsrecht? Anmerkungen zu einer kopernikanischer Wende. AÖR 128:511–557.
- Iancu B. (2010) Post-Accession Constitutionalism with a Human Face: Judicial Reform and Illustration in Romania. EuConst 6:28–58.
- Iancu B. (2015) Separation of Powers and the Rule of Law in Romania: The Crisis in Concepts and Contexts. In von Bogdandy A., Sonnevend P. (eds.), Constitutional Crisis in the European Constitutional Area: Theory, Law and Politics in Hungary and Romania, Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 153–169.

¹²¹ Regulation No. 211/2011 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 February 2011 on the citizens’ initiative, [2011] OJ L 65/1.

¹²² <https://stop-ttip.org/signatures-member-states/>.

- Iancu B. (2016) Standards of “Good Governance” and Peripheral Constitutionalism: The Case of Post-Accession Romania. Forthcoming in: Febbrajo A., Corsi G. (eds.) Sociology of Constitutions: A Paradoxical Perspective. Ashgate, Aldershot.
- Iorgovan A. (1998) Odiseea elaborării Constituției-fapte și documente, oameni și caractere; - cronică și explicații, dezvăluiri și meditații (The constitution-making odyssey: Facts and documents, people and personalities; chronicle and glosses, disclosure and meditation). Editura Uniunii Vatra Românească, Târgu Mureș.
- Jaffe L. (1951) Judicial Review: ‘Substantial Evidence on the Whole Record’ Harv. Law Rev. 64:1233–1261.
- Kilpatrick C. (2015) On the Rule of Law and Economic Emergency: The Degradation of Basic Legal Values in Europe’s Bailouts. Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 35(2):325–353.
- Komárek J. (2014) National Constitutional Courts in the European constitutional democracy. ICON 12:525–544.
- Kühn Z. (2011) The Judiciary in Central and Eastern Europe: Mechanical Jurisprudence in Transformation? Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Leiden.
- Lindseth P.L. (2010) Power and Legitimacy: Reconciling Europe and the Nation-State. OUP, New York.
- Majone G. (1996) Regulating Europe. Routledge, London.
- Muraru I., Tânărescu E.S. (Coord.) (2008) Constituția României-Commentariu pe Articole (The Romanian Constitution annotated). Editura C.H. Beck, București.
- Parau C. (2013) Romania’s Transnational Constitution – A Tradition of Elite Learning and Self-Empowerment. In Galligan D.J., Versteeg M. (eds.) Social and Political Foundations of Constitutions. Cambridge University Press, New York, pp. 497–531.
- Perju V. (2015) The Romanian double executive and the 2012 constitutional crisis. ICON 13 (1):246–278.
- Sadurski W. (2012) Constitutionalism and the Enlargement of Europe. OUP, Oxford.
- Sajó A. (1995) Reading the Invisible Constitution: Judicial Review in Hungary. Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 15:253–267.
- Sajó A. (1996) How the Rule of Law Killed Hungarian Welfare Reform. East European Constitutional Review EECR 5(1):31–41.
- Sajó A. (2004) Learning Co-operative Constitutionalism the Hard Way: The Hungarian Constitutional Court Shying Away from EU Supremacy. Zeitschrift für Staats- und Europawissenschaften (ZSE) 2(3):351–371.
- Schrot P.W., Bostan A.D. (2004) International Constitutional Law and Anti-Corruption Measures in the European Union’s Accession Negotiations – Romania in Comparative Perspective. Am. J. Comp. L. 52:625–711.
- Scicluna N. (2014) Politicization without democratization: How the Eurozone crisis is transforming EU law and Politics. ICON 12:545–571.
- Selejan-Guțan, B. (2016) The Constitution of Romania: A Contextual Analysis. Hart, Oxford.
- Shapiro M. (1983) Administrative Discretion: The Next Stage. Yale LJ 92(8):1487–1522.
- Szarek-Mason P. (2010) The European Union’s Fight Against Corruption – The Evolving Policy Towards Member States and Candidate Countries. CUP, Cambridge.
- Toader T., Safta M. (2013) Dialogul dintre Curtea Constituțională a României și Curtea de Justiție a UE (The dialogue between the Romanian Constitutional Court and the Court of Justice of the European Union). Dreptul 12:129–162.
- Tânărescu E.S. (2008) The President of Romania, or: The Slippery Slope of a Political System. EuConst (1):64–97.
- Tânărescu E.S. (2011) Reforma Consiliului Superior al Magistraturii între analogia dreptului și nimicuri etice (The reform of the Superior Council of Magistracy between legal analogy and ethical trifles). Pandectele Române 2:19–28.

- Tănăsescu E.S. (2013) L'exception d'inconstitutionnalité qui ne dit pas son nom ou la nouvelle sémantique constitutionnelle roumaine. RevIntlDroitComp 4:1–35.
- Tushnet M. (1999) The Possibilities of Comparative Constitutional Law. Yale L.J. 108(6):1225–1310.
- Vermeule A. (1997) Mechanisms of Democracy: Institutional Design Writ Small, OUP, New York.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Bulgarian Constitutional Order, Supranational Constitutionalism and European Governance

Evgeni Tanchev and Martin Belov

Abstract Bulgaria's 1991 Constitution is regarded as a 'reactive constitution', reflecting the transition from totalitarianism to democracy. It aims to introduce a genuinely new political model based on different concepts about the individual and the state, with legally defensible human rights, and makes the Constitution a substantial part of enforceable law. Whilst there are issues in practice, including the need for the EU post-accession monitoring process, the approach to constitutional review emerges as stringent. During the period 1991–2006, in the 158 challenges against Acts of Parliament, the Acts were declared to be partially or fully unconstitutional in 79 cases, often on rule of law grounds. With regard to EU integration, the Constitution has been amended extensively. The report considers such amendments to be important, as otherwise the Constitution would lose its regulative force for citizens. The report identifies the paradox that while minor domestic changes need to pass strict constitutional amendment hurdles, the transfer of constitutional powers to the EU can be done by the easier procedure for ratification of treaties. There has been no significant debate in Bulgaria regarding EU measures such as the European Arrest Warrant. The slogan 'Brussels wills it!' has functioned as a key explanatory strategy. Nevertheless, the report recalls that under the Bulgarian Constitution a reduction of rights protection is legitimate only on limited grounds, and finds that higher integration goals and teleological excuses based on efficiency arguments could not justify a reduction of the standard of protection.

Evgeni Tanchev is Advocate General of the Court of Justice of the European Union; at the time of writing Professor of Constitutional Law, New Bulgarian University, Sofia, and Vice-President, Venice Commission of the Council of Europe. e-mail: etanchev@yahoo.com.

Martin Belov is Associate Professor of Constitutional and Comparative Constitutional Law, Faculty of Law, University of Sofia 'St. Kliment Ohridski'. e-mail: martinbelov@yahoo.com.

All websites accessed 31 October 2015. Text submitted 20 December 2014.

E. Tanchev (✉)
New Bulgarian University, Sofia, Bulgaria
e-mail: etanchev@yahoo.com

M. Belov
University of Sofia 'St. Kliment Ohridski', Sofia, Bulgaria
e-mail: martinbelov@yahoo.com

Keywords The Constitution of Bulgaria · Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation · The Bulgarian Constitutional Court
Constitutional review statistics · Fundamental rights and the rule of law
European Arrest Warrant · Data Retention Directive · Limitation of rights
European constitutionalism

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The 1991 Bulgarian Constitution was adopted at the beginning of the transition from totalitarianism to democracy. It is a reactive constitution¹ that marks a radical legal and political break-up from both of the previous stages of Bulgarian constitutional development – the period of constitutional monarchy (1879–1947) and the period of a Soviet-type people's democracy (1947–1991). Hence, it aims at introducing a genuinely new political model based on different concepts about the individual and the state. This new legal model lays down the foundations of legally defensible human rights and of the powers of state institutions, and makes the Constitution a substantial part of the valid and enforceable law. This can be regarded as a profound break from the old regime due to the fact that the previous 1947 and 1971 Constitutions were regarded more as political acts and declarations of intent for constitutional engineering² rather than as directly applicable legal acts.

The 1991 Bulgarian Constitution is both a cornerstone of the political system and the supreme source of law. The political and legal aspects of its nature are balanced. As a result, the current Bulgarian Constitution contains both legal principles, values and aims that serve as a channel of influence for the meta-legal normative systems,³ as well as detailed legal provisions that are enforceable in the courts.⁴

¹ Bogdanor 1988, pp. 7–9.

² For the constitutional engineering concept, see Sartori 1994.

³ The constitutional principles are cores of crystallisation around which the value system and the philosophy of the constitution are being developed. At the same time they act as channels for the introduction of meta-legal (philosophical, ethical, religious, economic, etc.) concepts and values into constitutional law. The reason is that they may serve as incentives for value-based legal argumentation by the courts as well as for legislation founded on constitutionally enshrined meta-legal categories. See Belov 2010, p. 193.

⁴ However, according to recent surveys, a substantial percentage of Bulgarian magistrates (judges and state prosecutors) consider the Constitution as meta-law that is above but also behind and away from the ‘real’ law – the parliamentary statutes and normative acts of the executive. Only 41.7% of the magistrates declare that they regularly apply the Constitution directly in pending cases whereas 40.2% of them would apply the Constitution if this were consistent judicial practice; 2.8% try to avoid its direct application and 5% never apply it directly. See Belov 2012, pp. 29–45.

The current Bulgarian legal and constitutional culture is a mixture of continental European, post-Soviet and, more recently, US influences. More precisely, moderate paternalistic views with regard to the role of the state and its relations with the citizens are intertwined with more recent liberal and even libertarian influences. This mixture enriches the Bulgarian constitutional culture, but also makes it rather eclectic. Hence, the non-cohesive amalgamation of quite different political concepts in the ideal constitution is one of the explanations for the dysfunctionality of the 1991 Constitution in political practice.

1.1.2 The 1991 Constitution combines the raison d'état (state oriented) dimension with the human rights and societal dimension. It tries to ascertain the value of the state's authority based on the principle of the people's sovereignty. The organisation of the state as an efficient machinery for social management is one of its key goals. The current Bulgarian Constitution establishes the normative background for the existence of all key state institutions as well as for the local self-government bodies.

The 1991 Constitution devotes special attention to the rule of law, the protection of human rights and the restriction of the activity of state institutions to their constitutionally established spheres of competence. Moreover, it contains extensive provisions on human rights and fundamental freedoms as well as the means for their protection. Thus, the constitutional goals and values of the authority, efficiency and responsiveness of the government on the one hand, and of limited and responsible government on the other hand, are balanced by the 1991 Constitution.

1.2 The Amendments of the 1991 Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 The 1991 Constitution of Bulgaria has been amended four times: in 2003, 2005, 2006 and 2007. The constitutional amendments were introduced in the context of, and with view to, the membership of Bulgaria in the EU, although not all of them directly concern EU matters.

Three groups of constitutional amendments can be identified. The first group concerns amendments which are directly related to the EU. The EU related constitutional amendments concern the integration clause (Art. 4 para. 3),⁵ the right of EU citizens and companies as well as of the citizens and companies of states with which Bulgaria has a special treaty on acquiring property over land (Art. 22 paras.

⁵ Article 4 para. 3, ‘The Republic of Bulgaria shall participate in the construction and the development of the European Union.’ All quotes are taken from the English translation of the Constitution of the Republic of Bulgaria available on the website of the National Assembly of the Republic of Bulgaria at <http://www.parliament.bg/en/const>, unless otherwise noted.

1 and 2),⁶ the compulsory parliamentary ratification by a two-thirds majority of the Members of Parliament (MPs) of treaties that transfer competences stemming from the Bulgarian Constitution to the EU (Art. 85 para. 1 p. 9 and para. 2)⁷ and the competences of the National Assembly for information and control over the activity of the Government on EU matters and on the EU level (Art. 105 paras. 3 and 4).⁸ Last but not least, the Constitution was amended to provide electoral rights for EU citizens in EU Parliament and local elections.⁹

In the context of EU-related amendments, one should also mention Art. 25 para. 4, according to which:

No Bulgarian citizen may be surrendered to another State or to an international tribunal for the purposes of criminal prosecution, unless the opposite is provided for by international treaty that has been ratified, published and entered into force for the Republic of Bulgaria.

This provision concerns both extraditions to the International Criminal Court in The Hague and the European Arrest Warrant (EAW).

The second group encompasses amendments which directly aim at reforming the judiciary. However, many of them were actually introduced in the context of Bulgaria's EU accession negotiations. Thus they are to some extent the result of the desire to satisfy the expectations of EU partners for improvement of the rule of law in Bulgaria. This second group of constitutional amendments include: the clarification of the functions of the state prosecutors' office; the establishment of a constitutional ground for the conduct of criminal investigations not only by state investigators who are magistrates but also by police officers; improvement of the system for the irremovability of magistrates and the replacement of their absolute immunity with functional immunity; the introduction of a mandate for the administrative heads of the courts, and state prosecutors' and state investigators' offices; the introduction of annual reports of the Supreme Court of Cassation, the Supreme Administrative Court and the Prosecutor General on the application of the law and on the activity of the courts, the prosecution office and the investigating bodies, which are submitted to the National Assembly by the Supreme Judicial Council; the constitutional provision of conditions for expiration of the mandate of

⁶ Article 22 para. 1, 'Foreigners and foreign legal entities may acquire property over land under the conditions ensuing from Bulgaria's accession to the European Union, or by virtue of an international treaty that has been ratified, promulgated and entered into force for the Republic of Bulgaria, as well as through inheritance by operation of the law.' Article 22 para. 2 'The law ratifying the international treaty referred to in para. 1 shall be adopted by a majority of two thirds of all members of the Parliament.'

⁷ Article 85 para. 1 point 9, 'The National Assembly shall ratify or denounce by law all international treaties which ... confer to the European Union powers ensuing from this Constitution.' Article 85 para. 2, 'The law ratifying the international treaty referred to in para. 1, item 9 shall be adopted by a majority of two-thirds of all members of the Parliament.'

⁸ The constitutional provisions regarding parliamentary control over the government on EU matters will be provided later in Sect. 1.4.

⁹ Article 42 para. 3, 'The elections for Members of the European Parliament and the participation of European Union citizens in the elections for local authorities shall be regulated by law.'

elected members of the Supreme Judicial Council and of the key competences of the Minister of Justice; and the establishment of an Inspectorate subordinated to the Supreme Judicial Council.

The third group of constitutional amendments is not thematically coherent and aims at improving different aspects of the Constitution. These include constitutional provisions for the national Ombudsman, which until 2006 was provided for only by an Act of Parliament, the competence of the Ombudsman to petition the Constitutional Court to declare unconstitutional any law which infringes human rights and freedoms, the provision of a separate budget for the National Assembly as well as a quorum for adoption of its Acts, some adjustments of the constitutional texts on the military forces reflecting the abolition of compulsory military service, the right of MPs to renounce immunity in writing and grant permission for the initiation of criminal proceedings against them, and the introduction of the competence of municipal councils to determine the rates of local taxes under conditions, by a procedure and within the framework established by law.

As for the timeline, the Bulgarian Constitution was amended after the initial period of transition to democracy and before accession to the EU. The fact that so many amendments were made in a very short period of time (from 2003 until 2007) could be interpreted as an indication of a lack of consistency in the ideas of the Members of Parliament and of their inability to generate sufficient political will for reforms. However, this was also a result of the wish of the constitutional legislator to use a step-by-step approach and to adjust the Bulgarian Constitution to the demands of EU law through the most cautious and non-radical manner.

That is why the method of constitutional gradualism¹⁰ has been used in the course of the EU adaptation of the 1991 Constitution. Although there were four waves of constitutional amendments that concerned a great number of constitutional provisions, almost all of them were incremental because they tackled matters of secondary importance. A typical characteristic of constitutional gradualism is a step-by-step adjustment of the written constitution to the demands of social life through testing the political, economic and social effects produced by constitutional reform. Overall, the reform of the 1991 Bulgarian Constitution was wide in range but generally did not touch upon the key principles and cornerstones of the institutional design.

The only radical and fundamental amendment that was introduced was the EU integration clause, which provides as follows: ‘The Republic of Bulgaria shall participate in the construction and the development of the EU’. Despite its modest, declarative and even decorative wording, this provision represented a profound structural change in Bulgarian constitutional statehood. This is due to the fact that it serves as a key element of the constitutional foundations for the primacy of EU law and for the addition of a new supranational layer of institutions above the national constitutional design. However, the change was not considered so far-reaching as to require the convening of the special constituent body, the Grand National ¹⁰ Tanchev and Belov 2008, pp. 3–19.

Assembly, which is envisaged for amendments that concern the form of territorial distribution of power (see below). This was confirmed by the Constitutional Court in Decision No. 3 of 2004¹¹ and, consequently, the amendment was adopted by the National Assembly (Parliament). The logic of this Constitutional Court decision is that the EU is not a federation. The Court further clarified that the form of the territorial distribution of power concerns only the internal aspect of the vertical separation of powers and not the external aspect which relates to participation in supranational organisations. There are a multitude of new supranational forms of distribution of public power, which are not limited to the federalist option. In the reasoning of the decision, the Court stated that the EU is neither a federation nor any other form of territorial structure of statehood. EU membership does not concern the territorial integrity of the state as one of the elements of the form of the territorial distribution of power The EU has no ambition to play the role of a federal state. Moreover, the Constitution for Europe cannot be interpreted literally as a constitution in the known legal sense. Consequently, all comparisons with the established legal order of a state are inadmissible at least in the context of an interpretative decision of the Constitutional Court.

On the other hand, despite the Court's ruling, it is obvious that the EU constitutes a new level in the hierarchy of public power with regard to the vertical polycentrism of power centres and institutional schemes. Moreover, there is an increasing trend to not limit public power to the notion and concept of state power. Hence, it could also be argued that the summoning of the Grand National Assembly was necessary. However, from the point of view of constitutional politics, recourse to the Grand National Assembly would have slowed down the speed of preparation for EU accession and could have even led to a long-term stalemate in the Bulgarian EU integration process.

1.2.2 The 1991 Bulgarian Constitution provides for a two-track amendment procedure. The first, difficult amendment procedure concerns key constitutional issues enlisted in Art. 158 of the Constitution. These include the adoption of a new Constitution, the substantial acquisition or loss of state territory and the ratification of international treaties for such territorial shifts, the amendment of the form of governance and the form of territorial distribution of power, the amendment of rules concerning the hierarchical status of international treaties and the direct effect of the Constitution, the irrevocability of human rights as well as changes to the model for constitutional amendment. These amendments can be adopted only by the Grand National Assembly. The form of governance and form of territorial distribution of power are key concepts since they represent the general models for the horizontal and vertical separation of powers (statuses, functions and competences) enshrined in the Constitution.

¹¹ Here and subsequently the cases can be accessed at the Court's website <http://constcourt.bg/acts>. The text of the judgments have been translated by the authors, as no English translations were available at the time of writing.

This procedure is rather difficult to accomplish because it requires the adoption of a decision for summoning the Grand National Assembly. It has to be adopted by the National Assembly by a qualified majority of two-thirds of all MPs, followed by dissolution of the ordinary Parliament and election of this special constituent assembly. Furthermore, the Grand National Assembly must adopt the proposed amendments by a two-thirds majority of all MPs, of whom there are 400 and not 240 as in the ordinary Parliament, in three readings on three different days.

The second amendment procedure is for other constitutional provisions and is to be carried out by the Parliament. The National Assembly must adopt the draft bill for constitutional amendment in three readings held on three different days with a three-quarters majority of all MPs. A constitutional amendment can be initiated by the President, or by one-quarter of the MPs, if the amendment is to be adopted by the National Assembly, or by one-half of the MPs in case of amendment by the Grand National Assembly.

The Bulgarian Constitution is considered rigid due to the fact that its most important provisions can be amended only by a special institution elected with the sole purpose of functioning as a forum of the pouvoir constituant. As previously mentioned, the decision to call elections to the Grand National Assembly has to be taken by the National Assembly by a two-thirds majority of all MPs. Thus, a very high degree of political consensus is required both for taking a decision to summon the Grand National Assembly and for the adoption of the constitutional amendments by this convent. Since 1990–1991, no Grand National Assembly has been summoned, notwithstanding the fact that such suggestions have been made from time to time by politicians and by some scholars. These appeals have pertained to both EU related proposals for constitutional amendment as well as to other aspects for possible improvement of the Constitution.

The border between the two types of provisions and constitutional amendment procedures is not as clear and stable as it might initially seem. This is due to the fact that the notions ‘form of governance’ and ‘form of territorial distribution of power’ can be rather vague in a theoretical and comparative perspective when it comes to their concrete institutional components. The abstractness of these concepts in combination with the right of the Constitutional Court to give an abstract interpretation of the constitutional provisions has shifted the demarcation line in a number of interpretative decisions. The concepts were first clarified by the Court as a precondition for amendment of the Constitution in the course of the preparation of Bulgaria’s EU accession. In Decision No. 3 of 2003, the Constitutional Court defined the ‘form of governance’ and ‘the form of territorial distribution of power’ very broadly by invoking the idea of change within the balance of government. Hence, all possible amendments and adjustments of the status, functions and competences of the Parliament, Government, President and Vice President, Constitutional Court, courts, state prosecutors’ offices and state investigators’ offices should be regarded as related to the form of statehood. On a strict interpretation of this decision, one could infer that most eventual constitutional amendments should be adopted by convening the Grand National Assembly.

However, one year later the Constitutional Court, in its Decision No 3. of 2004, ruled that none of the necessary amendments in the context of the EU accession of Bulgaria concerned the form of governance or the form of territorial distribution of power, and thus could be passed by the National Assembly instead of the Grand National Assembly. These potential amendments included the adoption by the EU institutions of acts with supranational, direct and universal effect; the right of EU citizens and companies to acquire land ownership in Bulgaria; the provision of EU citizenship and the consequences that stem from it; the competence of the National Assembly to exercise preliminary control over the drafting of acts of the EU before their adoption; the extradition of Bulgarian citizens to a foreign state or an international court under the conditions of a treaty; and the extension of the indicators for equality of Bulgarian citizens in accordance with the Charter on Fundamental Rights of the EU.

It is clear that in the light of Decision No. 3 of 2003, the granting of the direct and universal effect of EU acts and the extension of parliamentary control over the Government should have been deemed an amendment in the form of statehood. According to the decision, form of governance has to be interpreted extensively ... it must include the competences and functions of the state institutions insofar as the balance between them is concerned based on the observation of the main principles on which the state is founded – the people's sovereignty, supremacy of the Constitution, political pluralism, separation of powers, rule of law and judicial independence.

It is obvious that the direct and universal effect of EU acts concerns the issue of constitutional supremacy, whereas parliamentary control is a core issue of parliamentarianism and is an important dimension of the relations between the Parliament and the Government. However in the aftermath of Decision No. 3 of 2004, a set of constitutional amendments was adopted by the National Assembly, which mostly coincided with the issues addressed by the Constitutional Court. Hence, the easier constitutional amendment procedure was put into practice for the purpose of adjusting the Constitution to the needs of EU membership.

It is also of interest to note that the extremely restrictive position adopted in Decision No. 3 of 2003 was changed to some extent by Decision No 5. of 2005, by virtue of which many important and far-reaching amendments regarding the judiciary were declared to be amendments that do not pertain to the form of governance as long as they do not affect the constitutional balance of powers. Thus, the Constitutional Court opened the way for a reform of the judiciary through constitutional amendments that were adopted by the National Assembly. The reform of the judiciary concerned EU membership indirectly, as Bulgaria's EU entry was conditional on strengthening of the rule of law.

1.2.3 The background to the amendment is addressed in Sects. 1.2.1 and 1.5.1.

1.2.4 One area where, in the experts' view, the Constitution may need amendment is the provision of a clearer stance on the hierarchical status of EU law in the system of the sources of law. At the moment, the 1991 Constitution does not contain any direct provisions concerning this issue. The current situation allows for two different interpretations. The first is that EU law does not have supremacy over the Bulgarian Constitution because, as with international treaties, it ranks above all domestic legislation except the Constitution. The allocation of EU law on the level of international treaties is problematic not only because most EU law, i.e. secondary EU law, is not adopted in the form of an international treaty. If EU law is regarded as a system of international treaties, major problems could occur in the case of a collision between EU law and an international treaty adopted outside the EU.

The second interpretation might be that EU law has supremacy over all national sources of law, including the Constitution. Such reflection might be founded on the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) (e.g. Internationale Handelsgesellschaft)¹² and on the implicit suggestion that these cases are internally legitimised by the EU integration clause of the Bulgarian Constitution. However, such interpretation is problematic due to the lack of a clear normative basis in the text of the 1991 Constitution. The Constitutional Court has not addressed this matter.

The problem of the status of EU law in the hierarchy of norms also concerns the competence of the Bulgarian Constitutional Court to exercise control. According to the Constitution, the Constitutional Court can control the constitutionality of international treaties prior to their ratification, as well as the compliance of Acts of Parliament and of the President with international treaties and the general norms of the international law. There have been some cases in which the Constitutional Court has had to decide whether parliamentary statutes are in compliance with EU law. Hence, by admitting the cases, the Constitutional Court has implicitly assumed that EU law has the status of international treaties.

The relative indecisiveness of the Bulgarian Constitution regarding the issue of the hierarchical place of EU law in the Bulgarian legal system allows for its initial flexibility and openness towards the dynamic developments surrounding the issue of the delimitation between the national and supranational legal orders. However, it would be preferable if the Bulgarian Constitution were to explicitly provide the position of EU law in the system of sources of law and its relation to the Constitution itself and to international treaties.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The integration clause of the Bulgarian Constitution stipulates: ‘The Republic of Bulgaria participates in the construction and the development of the European Union’. The transfer of competences contained in the Constitution to the EU by international treaties has to be authorised by the parliamentary ratification of a statute adopted by a two-thirds majority of all MPs. Hence, the only procedural difference in comparison to other statutes through which the National Assembly ratifies international treaties, is the qualified majority.

¹² Case C-11/70 Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 01125.

Whilst the transfer of constitutional competences is usually an expression of the will of the constituent power, this would not appear to be reflected well in the type of procedure envisaged by the constitutional legislator, by the 2005 amendments, for the transfer of constitutional competences to the EU. Instead of procedures which involve the constituent power as in the case of a constitutional amendment, the transfer of constitutional competences to the EU is subject to the procedure applicable for the ratification of treaties, i.e. a procedure that is a manifestation of a constituted power albeit with higher procedural hurdles. Frequently, such transfer of competences may even result in a further transfer of sovereignty to the EU. The paradox is that while constitutional amendments concerning small adjustments and incremental reforms of provisions of secondary importance have to overcome higher procedural hurdles, the transfer of constitutional powers to the EU can be done much more easily. In other words, the introduction of constitutional amendments caused by internal considerations is much more difficult in comparison to the transfer of competences to the EU, even if in some cases summoning the Grand National Assembly might also be deemed necessary.

Additionally, the constitutional legislator has preferred to use the concept of transfer of competences and not of sovereignty or sovereign rights, which in terms of wording is a compromise that formally spares and preserves national sovereignty. However, the procedural safeguards for such transfer of constitutional competences are much lower in comparison to the procedural hurdles for constitutional amendment. This is rather problematic because the transfer of competences to the EU as well as the EU's increasing constitutionalisation influence the national constitution sometimes to a greater extent than the formal amendment of constitutional provisions that are of secondary importance.

As noted in Sect. 1.2.3, the Constitution does not contain any explicit provisions on the supremacy and direct effect of EU law. Different interpretations regarding the hierarchical relations between the Constitution and EU law can be used due to the lack of sufficient clarity on this issue. The constitutional restraint in regulating this subject matter has not been remedied by decisions of the Constitutional Court, which has only ruled that the supremacy, universal and direct effect of EU law does not touch upon the issue of the form of governance of Bulgaria. On the other hand, the silence of the Constitution can also be interpreted as tacit approval of the supremacy and direct effect of EU law based on the decisions of the CJEU, and as strategic waiting for clearer solutions to be taken on the European level.

1.3.2 The Bulgarian Constitutional Court has taken a very EU friendly stance towards the issue of transfer of sovereignty. The Constitutional Court ruled in the reasoning of Decision No. 3 of 2004 that ‘the amendment of the Constitution imposed by the necessity of its adaptation to the requirements of the full EU membership of Bulgaria does not infringe its sovereignty’. With reference to Art. 1, para. 2 of the Constitution, the Court ruled as follows:

All state power stems from the people. It is exercised by the people directly or through the institutions provided in the Constitution. Consequently the people can voluntarily delegate part of their sovereign rights through the National Assembly that is elected by them and in accordance with the requirements of an international treaty to which Bulgaria is party.

The accession of the Republic of Bulgaria to the EU became effective after the ratification of its accession treaty by the National Assembly. This ratification is an expression of the people's will. The EU membership that stems from it aims at protecting its state sovereignty and national security. The integration process is based on a shared exercise of sovereignties by virtue of which the Member States accomplish together some of their tasks and thus make a shared use of their sovereignties. The sovereignty of the Republic of Bulgaria is not in peril since the adoption of decisions and legal acts by the EU institutions with their supranational, direct and universal effect will be done with the participation of the Republic of Bulgaria.

This argumentation of the Bulgarian Constitutional Court clearly demonstrates that it understands the principle of state sovereignty and the principle of the people's sovereignty not in their absolute form, but rather in a modified and flexible version that are adaptable to the needs of EU integration. Thus, the Constitutional Court opened the way for the application of more modern concepts of sovereignty, such as the theory of pooling and sharing sovereignty.¹³

1.3.3 The Constitution explicitly tackles neither state sovereignty nor the eventually emerging allocation of sovereign competences at EU level. The Constitution pronounces the principle of the people's sovereignty and prohibits its usurpation by citizens, political parties, organisations or state institutions. Hence, it implicitly prohibits such usurpation also by EU institutions, EU officials and European political parties, although it is doubtful whether they could be subsumed under the above-mentioned categories. The historical and strictly textual interpretation should be replaced with teleological interpretation because it is obvious that the Constitution cannot serve as a safeguard against the usurpation of sovereignty by national political players while at the same time having no such function against European ones.

There is no extensive debate in Bulgaria regarding issues such as constitutional identity and judicial dialogue. The constitutional identity is an emerging issue in the Bulgarian scientific realm. There are articles tackling the issues of primacy and supremacy of EU law.¹⁴ In a recent study, Evgeny Tanchev delimits the scope of issues that should be deemed as falling within the scope of constitutional identity. Furthermore, he suggests that EU law prevails over domestic law (including the national Constitution) in areas of transferred sovereignty under the conditions that 'the national constitution is below the standard of EU law or national constitutional limitation exceeds or poses a higher restriction than EU law' and 'EU institutional law does not conflict with the national constitutional identity'.¹⁵

¹³ The pooling and co-existence of sovereignties that has been suggested as appropriate also in the Bulgarian case by some theorists. Tanchev 2003, pp. 281–282, especially with reference to MacCormick 1993, p. 16.

¹⁴ Drumeva 2009, pp. 101–102; Tanchev 2014, p. 69–75.

There is also no systematic jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on the limits of transfer of competences to the EU level of governance that would be at least to some extent comparable to that of the constitutional jurisdictions of some other EU Member States. The three above-mentioned decisions of the Bulgarian Constitutional Court are concerned more with the internal question of which institution of the Bulgarian constituent power is competent to adopt EU related constitutional amendments, rather than with delimiting lines between the national and supranational levels of governance.

The Constitution itself also does not impose any explicit substantial limits to the transfer of competences or even sovereignty to the EU. However, as was seen in Sect. 1.2.1, constitutional amendments pertaining to issues such as the supremacy of the Constitution, the form of governance and the form of territorial distribution of power can be adopted only by the Grand National Assembly. The Constitutional Court's jurisprudence on these has indicated the existence of a very thick 'red line': a potential change in the EU's nature would influence these key elements of Bulgarian constitutionalism and require the convening of the Grand National Assembly.

1.3.4 The supremacy and the direct effect of the Constitution are explicitly proclaimed in Art. 5, paras. 1 and 2 of the Constitution. According to Art. 5, para. 4, international treaties that have been ratified, published and have entered into force have the position immediately below the Constitution but prevail over all other domestic sources of law. The Constitution does not contain any provisions concerning the hierarchical status of EU law; one of the reasons for this silence is the fact that the supremacy of the Constitution can be amended, and the supremacy of EU law over the Constitution or international treaties can be proclaimed only by the Grand National Assembly. Summoning such Assembly was deemed to be very difficult in the pre-accession period, so the direct effect and primacy of EU law had to be based on an indirect constitutional dialogue between the Constitutional Court and the CJEU. The Bulgarian Constitutional Court has taken its pro-integration decisions bearing in mind the CJEU's jurisprudence on the supremacy of EU law. The Bulgarian Constitutional Court emphasises EU-friendly interpretation and generally seeks to avoid undermining EU law in practice. This is the case also with other Bulgarian courts.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The key issues regarding the competence of the National Assembly to participate in EU policy-making are regulated in the amended Art. 105, paras. 3 and 4 of the Constitution.¹⁶ The detailed rules are provided by Chap. XI of the Regulation for the Organisation and the Activity of the National Assembly (Regulation), and these broadly reproduce the provisions of the Protocol on the Role of National Parliaments in the European Union and the Protocol on the Application of the Principles of Subsidiarity and Proportionality. Although the provisions of the Constitution and of the Regulation formally enhance the role of the Bulgarian Parliament and upgrade the set of tools at its disposal for influencing governmental activity, the political practice does not differ from that in other Southern, Central and Eastern European Member States in which the domination of the national government over the national parliament in the EU decision-making process in terms of advantages in information, organisation, expertise and motivation is obvious.¹⁷

¹⁵ Tanchev 2014, p. 72.

The main rules in the Regulation are as follows. The Committee on EU matters and Control over EU Funds has the right to impose a parliamentary reservation on EU draft acts that are included in the Annual Working Program of the National Assembly on EU matters. The imposition of a parliamentary reservation may be initiated by this committee or by any other standing committee of the Parliament. The parliamentary reservation obliges the Government to refrain from expressing any statement regarding the act concerned in the Council of the EU during a certain term, until the National Assembly pronounces on this issue. The Regulation of the current 43th National Assembly provides that the Government cannot be restrained from acting by a parliamentary reservation during the third session of the preparatory body of the Council which is working on the draft EU legislation. In theory, this competence increases the role of the National Assembly in the decision-making process of the EU. However, it is of marginal importance in political practice.

There are several institutions that can perform control over the activity of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers and over the Prime Minister, the ministers and other executive power institutions regarding their planned or past activity in the EU. These are the plenum of the National Assembly, the standing parliamentary committees and, more precisely, the specialised permanent parliamentary Committee on EU Matters and Control over EU Funds, as well as individual MPs. There are two groups of instruments for parliamentary control. The first encompasses the general tools for parliamentary control over governmental activity: questions, interpellations, parliamentary inquiries and deliberations as well as votes of confidence and non-confidence. The second group includes specialised forms for EU related parliamentary control. Some of them concern a priori parliamentary control, whereas others result in a posteriori parliamentary control. The a priori control consists of ¹⁶ According to Art. 105, paras. 4 and 5 of the Constitution, '[t]he Council of Ministers shall inform the National Assembly on issues concerning the obligations of the Republic of Bulgaria resulting from its membership in the European Union. When participating in the drafting and adoption of European Union instruments, the Council of Ministers shall inform the National Assembly in advance, and shall give detailed account for its actions.'

¹⁷ Kiiver 2006, and O'Brennan and Raunio 2007.

the obligations of the Bulgarian Council of Ministers: to inform the National Assembly in advance about the duties of Bulgaria arising from its EU membership and regarding governmental activity in the course of the preparation and adoption of EU legal acts; to present the Annual program for Bulgaria's participation in the decision-making process of the EU for approval in Parliament; to send the drafts of EU legal acts as well as framework positions on such acts to Parliament and to inform Parliament of circumstances that warrant amendments to such positions. The draft acts of the EU which are submitted to Parliament by the Government are distributed to the standing parliamentary committees. Moreover, the Committee on EU Matters and Control over EU Funds carries out preliminary hearings of candidates proposed by the Government for EU positions.

Last but not least, the National Assembly carries out control of observation of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality in accordance with the above-mentioned EU Protocol. It participates in the mechanisms for evaluation of the execution of EU policies in the area of freedom, security and justice, in the political control of Europol and the assessment of the activities of Eurojust.

The Prime Minister is obliged to present a report to the plenary session of the National Assembly at the beginning of each six-month EU presidency period. It consists of a summary and assessment of the results of the previous presidency and of the tasks and expectations regarding the upcoming presidency of the EU. The National Assembly may ask the Prime Minister to also present the position of the Republic of Bulgaria in forthcoming meetings of the European Council.

The a posteriori parliamentary control consists in the obligation of the Government to introduce a report on the activity of the Government in the adoption of EU legal acts. This must include an explanation for any deviations from the initial Bulgarian position which have resulted in EU rules that differ from those set out in the initial position.

1.4.2 The Constitution does not provide for referendums on the Constitution, the EU or international treaties, but also does not prohibit them. The Direct Participation of Citizens in State Power and Local Self Government Act prohibits constitutional referendums on matters falling within the competence of the Grand National Assembly, but allows for such referendums concerning the competence of the National Assembly. In any case, these legislative provisions may raise doubts with regard to their constitutionality on the grounds that if only the principle of the people's sovereignty is taken into account, then the prohibition of some constitutional referendums is not possible. On the other hand, the permission for constitutional referendums falling within the competence of the National Assembly could be deemed unconstitutional because the Constitution itself creates a fully fledged model for its amendment that does not provide for a referendum. In addition, the Direct Participation of Citizens in State Power and Local Self Government Act allows for referendums for ratification of international treaties but prohibits referendums for their denunciation.

Consequently, it is possible that in the future a potential stalemate in Bulgarian EU integration could be overcome by a referendum or, on the contrary, a referendum might be used as a device for blocking a further deepening of Bulgaria's participation in EU integration.

Bulgaria was among the few European countries that did not hold an EU accession referendum. This is to some extent difficult to explain since, according to sociological public opinion surveys, Bulgarian citizens were very pro-European at the time of ratification of the Accession Treaty. Moreover, the problems that were experienced in other candidate countries that entered the EU through parliamentary ratification instead of direct democratic approval of the EU accession treaty did not exist in Bulgaria.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.2 The EU related amendments in the Bulgarian Constitution which were adopted during the period 2003–2007 have been neither very extensive nor negligible. Their moderate scope and content was predetermined by a desire to demonstrate and provide a degree of legal reform that was deemed absolutely necessary for the EU accession of Bulgaria, i.e. the EU integration clause, the permission of EU citizens to buy land and the provisions for parliamentary control over the EU related activity of the Government. In addition to the constitutional amendments that were directly related to EU accession and membership, other parts of the Constitution were also subjected to reform. These amendments were motivated by a desire to adapt the Bulgarian Constitution to the rule of law and democracy standards that were considered inevitable for EU membership in the framework of the Copenhagen Criteria.

Whereas the constitutional amendment procedure for some of the amendments would have been very tough, the need to convene a special body, the Grand National Assembly, was avoided through decisions of the Constitutional Court. These decisions not only enabled the creation of the necessary legal basis for the integration of Bulgaria in the EU but also opened the way for a reform of the judiciary which was and still is very high on the Bulgarian political agenda.

Along with the above-mentioned Constitutional Court decisions and the political will for EU accession and constitutional reform, the public debate among scholars, politicians and civil society activists also influenced the constitutional reforms. The constitutional culture in Bulgaria has never been prohibitive for radical, drastic and even dramatic constitutional amendments. The great political and legal turbulences that Bulgarian society experienced during the 1990s as well as the general permissive consensus for ‘more Europe’ in general and the EU as its most clear expression in particular, allowed for the unproblematic and rapid adoption of the constitutional amendments. In fact, there was almost no opposition to these amendments either in the scientific literature or in the political discourse. The fact that Bulgaria entered the EU at a relatively late stage made it possible for Bulgaria to use the experience of the older Member States as well as to take the acquis communautaire into account.

The driving force behind the constitutional amendments was the political will of the predominant part of the Bulgarian political elite and society to join the EU. All reform efforts were directly or indirectly aimed at the achievement of this key goal of Bulgarian society, which dominated the Bulgarian political agenda from the end of the 1990s. Some of the amendments were also to some extent a result of internal constitutional and political debates. This is particularly true for the constitutional reform of the judiciary. The debates were centred predominantly on several issues: the status of state prosecutors and state investigators in the system for separation of powers, the immunity of magistrates, the structural reform of the Supreme Judicial Council and the role of the Minister of Justice. These constitutional amendments were prepared in close cooperation with experts provided by the European Commission and the Venice Commission of the Council of Europe. The reforms were accompanied by extensive scientific and political debate.

1.5.3 The national constitutions will surely remain the key projection of national sovereignty, collective personal identity and political self-consciousness of the people in Europe for a very long time, and maybe even forever. Precisely because of this central aspect of their nature, national constitutions are also the only legitimate devices for opening statehood to supranational levels of public power. Hence, the so called ‘opening function’ of the constitution¹⁸ will constantly grow in importance because the constitutions will have to provide the central channel for EU law and international law influences, and will have to serve as the most prominent linkage between the multiple levels and spheres of governance.

If national constitutions were to be neglected, this would lead to an increased delegitimation of European and global governance. This is, on one hand, due to the fact that it would be difficult to re-establish the social preconditions for political cohesion and political obedience on the supranational levels that were necessary for the emergence and establishment of the constitutional civilisation of the nation state. On the other hand, the non-reflexivity of national constitutions regarding issues of EU, multilevel and global governance would diminish their regulative role.¹⁹ Thus, the nation states would be exposed to the results of the supranationalisation of policy making, the national political actors would be entrenched in ‘nested games’²⁰ while at the same time they would suffer from legitimacy and efficiency deficits.

Hence it is absolutely necessary for national constitutions to reflect the status quo and even to try to anticipate the tendencies that will emerge both with regard to the institutional infrastructure and the functional processes which are developing on the supranational levels of decision-making. The tacit approval of supranational constitutional and political novelties, i.e. by non-resistance on the part of the national constitutional legislators, constitutional and supreme courts, parliaments and governments could be just a tactical exercise but not a long-lasting attitude. Otherwise the national constitutions may well become obsolete, both ‘from above’ because they would impede common supranational projects and would turn into distorting relics from the past, and ‘from below’, due to the fact that they would lose their regulative and convincing force for the nations in general and the citizens in particular.

¹⁸ Klein 1983, pp. 21–22.

¹⁹ Grimm 2010, p. 4; Peters 2005 p. 41; Peters 2006, p. 580.

²⁰ The theory of the ‘nested games’ has been developed by G. Tsebelis. It is an attempt to create a model for explanation of the behaviour of constitutional institutions when they are embedded in a vertically intertwined hierarchy and/or network of institutional interactions between the subnational, national, supranational and non-state players. The idea is to conceptualise the predetermination of the political behaviour of the institutions on the lower levels as systemically influenced by the preferences of the institutions that are allocated on the upper levels of the territorial power scale. See Tsebelis 1990.

The democratic deficit of the EU, the development of negative phenomena such as deparliamentarisation, de-democratisation or even a ‘hollowing out of national constitutions’ can hardly be addressed on a national level as a mosaic solution on a case-by-case and state-by-state basis. The problems of the European representative democracy in the context of the existing degree of EU integration cannot really be resolved without a common and fully co-ordinated solution at EU level. Hence, attempts to reinforce and improve the standing of the national parliaments in relation to the national governments and the EU power machinery based on executive domination and ‘agencification’, will be doomed to failure.

If the degree of European integration were to remain at its current level, then a real representative system would have to be achieved at EU level. This aim requires the further parliamentarisation of the EU system, the establishment of a more functional party system and the strengthening of the role of the President of the EU Commission, whose legitimacy should be re-established on a more direct democratic basis.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 The Bulgarian Constitution contains an extensive Chap. II that is devoted to human rights and citizens’ duties. The constitutional provisions on human rights in Bulgaria have been inspired by international human rights standards. The most important sources of inspiration are the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Social, Economic and Cultural Rights and the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR). Hence, the UN and the Council of Europe have been the key international organisations that have influenced the constitutional drafting of human rights in Bulgaria, whereas the EU had not developed extensive human rights standards at the time of drafting the Constitution. Because the standard of constitutional proclamation of human rights was sufficiently high, there was no need for a thorough human rights reform later in the course of EU accession.

The 1991 Constitution provides for most civil, political, economic and cultural rights. It also includes constitutional duties. It contains all of the generations of human rights according to the theory of Vazak.²¹ Moreover, all four statuses of man and of the citizen that were proposed by G. Jellinek²² are incorporated in the Constitution.

In addition to Chap. II, the Constitution contains further human rights provisions. For example, key human rights and guarantees are provided in Chap. VI, ‘Judicial Power’. The Bulgarian Constitution is interpreted to implicitly include all of the classic general principles of law, such as legal certainty, protection of legitimate expectations, non-retroactivity, proportionality, the competence of state institutions, etc. Moreover, it also contains specific provisions for the key elements of due process of law, i.e. nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege praevia Art. 5(3)); right to appeal (Art. 122); right to be heard by a jury in the first instance in the most important criminal cases (Art. 123); right to defence (Art. 30(3) and (4), Art. 56 and Art. 122); right to a public hearing (Art. 121(3)) and procedural equality (Art. 121(1)). Most of these provisions are in the chapter on judicial power, some are in the chapter on human rights, while some are in the chapter on the main principles of the Constitution. The non bis in idem rule is provided by Art. 24 para. 1, point 6 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The human rights and general principles enshrined in the Constitution are in principle directly applicable and enforceable in courts. However, some are by their nature non-self-executing; such rights do not enjoy immediate judicial protection but they may serve as a source for legal argumentation for the courts. The Constitution proclaims its supremacy and direct effect. The courts and the state prosecutors are to suspend judicial proceedings and file a petition with the Supreme Court of Cassation, the Supreme Administrative Court or the State Prosecutor General in the case of the presumed unconstitutionality of an Act of Parliament. These three institutions have the right to petition the Constitutional Court, which is the only institution that can proclaim an act unconstitutional. Consequently, although constitutional rights are theoretically guaranteed by constitutional supremacy, in practice their observation by Parliament may be guaranteed by the ordinary courts only indirectly through the above-mentioned lengthy and complex procedure.

2.1.2 According to Art. 57 para. 1 of the Constitution, human rights are irrevocable. The rigidity of this declaration is however rather of political than of legal nature because the Constitution does not contain any unamendable provisions (eternity clauses). This is due to the fact that Art. 57 para. 1 of the Constitution can be amended or even abolished by the Grand National Assembly, although this would be very unlikely from a political and practical point of view.

²¹ Vazak 1984, pp. 837–850.

²² Jellinek 1905, pp. 105–125.

The irrevocability of human rights might be regarded as a limit to the transfer of power to the EU. However, it is a very broad limit which would not have any practical consequences, since a situation where human rights would be deemed revocable and would be abolished in EU law or in national law due to EU influence is rather unthinkable. The irrevocability of human rights is a very wide and vague limit also because it is not specific and addresses the abolition of human rights as a constitutional category. The Constitution provides for the irrevocability of the ‘basic’ rights. Thus, it perhaps presumes that these are actually classical human rights, i.e. civil and political rights. Consequently, amendments in the shape and scope of human rights design will generally not be understood as infringements of the irrevocability of human rights as a constitutional principle and as a limit to the transfer of powers to the EU.

Article 57 para. 3 of the Constitution allows temporary limitation of some constitutional rights in case of war, a state of emergency or state of siege by virtue of parliamentary statute adopted by the National Assembly. Several key civil rights such as the right to life, the prohibition of torture and other inhuman and degrading treatment, the right to personal freedom and integrity, the right to privacy and the freedom of conscience, thought and religion are excluded from the aspects of human freedom which may be limited.

Last but not least, Art. 31 para. 4 of the Constitution provides that limitations of the rights of the defendant which exceed the necessary degree for the due functioning of the criminal process, are inadmissible. This is a specific reflection of the proportionality principle in the context of criminal procedure that is explicitly provided by the Constitution.

2.1.3 The rule of law in its continental version of Rechtsstaat is one of the fundamental principles of the Bulgarian Constitution. It is explicitly enshrined in the Preamble as well as in Art. 4 para. 1. Moreover, the typical components of the rule of law are provided by the Constitution as well as by legislation. Human rights and most of their guarantees, such as constitutional and administrative justice, the ordinary and specialised courts, the prohibition of extraordinary courts, the Ombudsman, the limited version of indirect constitutional complaint via the national Ombudsman, the principle of the competence of state institutions (the principle that each state institution is to act only within its competence), the non-retroactivity of criminal and tax law, the key principles of due process, the supremacy of the Constitution, the primacy of international law over sub-constitutional legislation and of the Acts of Parliament over governmental and other executive acts are enshrined in Bulgarian constitutional law. There is no direct constitutional complaint, but its introduction has been a matter of long-standing discussion in the academic debate. The most important arguments in favour are that it would enhance the protection of constitutional rights and allow the Constitutional Court to develop human rights jurisprudence. The key argument against the introduction of a constitutional complaint is that it might lead to a case overload for the Constitutional Court.

The principle of the rule of law as provided by the Bulgarian Constitution and legislation is justiciable due to the direct effect of constitutional provisions and the fact that they are further developed and implemented by Acts of Parliament and the other sources of law. Of course the more concrete and self-executing the elements of the rule of law, the more applicable they are in lawsuits. This fact does not prevent the citizens and legal entities who are parties to a pending lawsuit from basing their arguments on more general stipulations grounded on the rule of law. There is no statistical data on how frequently the rule of law is used as an argument by applicants (in contesting legal acts) and by the courts (in exercising judicial review). However, one can suppose that in the different legal discourses there is a rather frequent use of the rule of law either as the core element of a general argumentative strategy or as an additional argument in support of the claim. Sometimes the argumentation is grounded not on the rule of law as a holistic concept but on one or more of its elements.

Access to courts and the right to judicial review are constitutionally entrenched and are regarded as core elements of the rule of law in Bulgaria. According to Art. 31 para. 1 of the Constitution, '[a]nyone charged with a crime shall be brought before a court within the time established by law'. According to Art. 30 para. 3 of the Constitution, '[n]obody can be detained for more than 24 hours without a permission of an institution of the judiciary. The institutions of the judiciary are informed for each detention from its very beginning'. Moreover according to Art. 120 para. 2 of the Constitution, '[c]itizens and legal entities shall be free to challenge any administrative act which affects them, except those listed expressly by the laws'. Last but not least, Art. 122 para. 1 of the Constitution grants all persons the right to legal counsel at all stages of a trial.

Article 5 para. 5 of the Constitution stipulates that all normative acts have to be published in the State Gazette (the Official Journal of Bulgaria) to be valid. They enter into force three days after publication except if they provide for some other vacatio legis. Legal certainty is a key principle of Bulgarian constitutional law. The central role in upholding this principle is played by the Supreme Court of Cassation and the Supreme Administrative Court, which can issue interpretative decisions in case of controversial or incorrect practice of the courts of first and second instance.

The retroactivity of criminal law is explicitly prohibited by Art. 5 para. 3 of the Constitution which stipulates that no one can be convicted for an action or inaction which at the time it was committed, did not constitute a crime. According to Art. 2 of the Penal Code, for any crime, the law that is in force at the moment it is committed, applies. If another law enters into force before the pronouncement of the sentence, the most favourable norm for the sentenced person must be applied. According to Art. 2 of the Administrative Offences and Sanctions Act, all actions or omissions that constitute an administrative offence, as well as their sanctions, have to be determined by law. Furthermore, Art. 3 of the same Act provides that the Act that is valid at the moment an offence is committed applies, except if a newer Act is more favourable for the offender. Moreover, the non-retroactivity of the tax and financial obligations of citizens is provided by tax legislation. The administration of criminal justice by analogy is prohibited in Bulgaria.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 The issue of balancing classic fundamental rights and economic free movement rights has barely been discussed in Bulgarian theory and political discourse.²³ From the available information it is very difficult to come to a scientifically verifiable conclusion as to whether the Bulgarian courts give priority to classical rights or EU economic freedoms. In general, the Bulgarian judicial discourse is relatively pro-human rights biased. This is the result of more than two decades of training of Bulgarian judges in a pro-human rights discourse. Hence, without any claim of accuracy, one can assume that in the case of a conflict, the protection of human rights would prevail over the guarantee of EU fundamental freedoms.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

With regard to the following sections regarding the European Arrest Warrant (EAW), it is important to note that the provisions on defence rights and guarantees as well as on judicial review and access to courts are notably strict, detailed and far-reaching in the Bulgarian Constitution, as outlined above in Sect. 2.1.3 on the rule of law. However, as will be seen in the following sections, there has been no real debate on how the European Arrest Warrant and other EU criminal law measures relate to these constitutional provisions.

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 It is a constant practice of the Bulgarian courts to refuse to pronounce on the substance of the case, including the issue of the innocence or guilt of a detained person who has to be surrendered on the basis of a European arrest warrant. The issue of the presumption of innocence is not considered as relevant if the person is handed over to the state that has issued an EAW for execution of a verdict that has already entered into force. In both cases, the state that has to guarantee the observance of the presumption of innocence is the requesting state because its courts are deciding the substance of the matter. The courts of the surrendering state just control the observance of the formal and procedural prerequisites for the legal accomplishment of the process.

²³ An exception is the chapter on Bulgaria in the Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress, Vol. 1, which was written by Alexander Kornezov. In his report he argues that the Bulgarian Constitutional Court is much more inclined than the CJEU to balance free movement rights with other constitutional rights. He grounds his argumentation on Decision No. 2 of 2011 of the Constitutional Court in which the Court proclaimed some provisions of the Bulgarian Personal Documents Act unconstitutional due to a disproportionate limitation of the right to free movement through constraints based on non-payment of tax duties serving as framework safeguards for some economic and social constitutional rights. Kornezov 2012, pp. 268–270. Although this suggestion is reasonable, we believe that the case law is still insufficient to make sound, justified and broader evaluations on the issue of the balancing of constitutional rights with EU law economic freedoms.

2.3.1.2 The predominant practice of the Bulgarian courts is to approve a European arrest warrant if the formal and procedural requirements are fulfilled. The Bulgarian courts do not evaluate the evidence gathered on the substance of the case. The claims of innocence that are sometimes made by the people that are subject to a European arrest warrant are deemed irrelevant. The Bulgarian courts do not refuse the execution of a European arrest warrant on the basis of such claims. On the basis of the jurisprudence of the Bulgarian courts, a conclusion can be made that they do not regard the European arrest warrants as infringing the presumption of innocence.

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 Most of the 32 crimes for which a European arrest warrant can be issued create a very high degree of danger for society. Hence, most of them are defined as criminal offences by the legislation of all EU Member States. Only a few of them possess the potential for incorrect interpretation by the Bulgarian courts due to the vagueness of the terms in which they are formulated. In practice, the Bulgarian courts subsume the broadly formulated offences for which the principle nullum crimen is excluded under the more concrete criminal offences provided by the Bulgarian Penal Code, so as to enable the issuing of European arrest warrants. In many cases the Bulgarian courts point out criminal offences under Bulgarian criminal law for which the person can be held criminally liable, although there are legally granted exceptions from the principle nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege by the Extradition and the European Arrest Warrant Act that implements the EAW Framework Decision.²⁴ The exceptions concern criminal activities which are directed against fundamental social values and interest that are common for all EU Member States. That is why it is very unlikely that there will be a great mismatch between the criminal legislation of the issuing and the executing state; it is also unlikely that the persons who are subject to a European arrest warrant are unaware of the fact that their actions or omissions possess a criminal character.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 In absentia judgments endanger the right to defence of the defendant. Personal participation in a judicial trial allows the defendant to give explanations, have the last word, present evidence, etc. Hence, with regard to the rule of law, it is highly recommendable that in absentia judgments be avoided as much as possible.

²⁴ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

The Bulgarian Extradition and European Arrest Warrant Act was amended in 2011 in order to allow the Bulgarian courts to reject the surrender of a person on the basis of a European Arrest Warrant which aims to execute a sentence of imprisonment or other type of detention that has resulted from a judgment pronounced in his or her absence. A prerequisite for such rejection is a lack of evidence that the person himself or herself caused the situation resulting in an in absentia judgment.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 The Bulgarian state does not provide legal or financial aid to its citizens or to persons who have permanent residence on its territory if they are surrendered on the basis of a European arrest warrant. There is only one NGO, the Association for Reintegration of Convicted Persons, which provides aid for the social reintegration of persons who are convicted either in Bulgaria or abroad. However, this organisation does not provide financial or legal aid for the defence of persons surrendered on the basis of a European arrest warrant in the issuing state. It is clear that the establishment of a state or non-state institution providing such aid would enhance the chances of persons who are transferred to another EU Member State on the basis of a European arrest warrant for a proper defence. However, due to financial reasons, it is not very likely that such an institution will be created any time soon.

2.3.4.2 There are no reliable statistics regarding the number of persons who have been extradited to another EU Member State on the basis of a European arrest warrant and subsequently acquitted by its courts. Hence, no comparison between the number of such persons and persons who have been acquitted by the Bulgarian courts can be made.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 The constitutional issues concerning the EU mutual recognition instruments have not been extensively discussed in Bulgarian legal theory. Indeed, Bulgaria's report on the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice for the FIDE 2012 Congress notes that '[I]aw enforcement in Bulgaria strongly supported the principle of mutual recognition in criminal matters' and finds that '[c]ompliance with the rights of the accused or defendant in accordance with differences in national legislation should not impede the achievement of cooperation in criminal matters'.²⁵ There has been no analysis regarding their compatibility with the principle of the rule of law and the human rights enshrined in the Bulgarian Constitution. There has also been no judicial practice on the constitutional dimension of the EU mutual recognition instruments.

²⁵ Panova and Kashumov 2012, p. 213 and p. 220.

The principles of effective judicial protection and the rule of law can no longer fully be granted the same level of protection as prior to the introduction of the mutual recognition rule in criminal law and the abolition of the exequatur in civil and commercial matters. This is caused by the status of the EU as a project in process of realisation and transition. The achieved degree of EU integration makes the introduction and practical use of EU mutual recognition instruments necessary. On the other hand, they are based on a presumption of equivalence and proximity of the legal systems of the EU Member States, which is far from reality at the present time.

2.3.5.2 There has been no debate in Bulgaria regarding the suitability of transposing mutual recognition from internal market matters to criminal law and civil and commercial disputes. As it has already been mentioned, such mutual recognition is necessary and even inevitable if EU integration is to keep its pace. However, this is rather problematic due to the mismatch between the legal presumptions on which EU law is grounded and the empirical social reality.

2.3.5.3 The shift in the function of the courts from providers of justice and peaceful resolution of conflicts to transmitters of justice and elements in the chains of trust and co-operation in the EU is to some extent a natural result of the rise of supranational constitutionalism and the need for enhanced and more formalised cooperation between different segments of the emerging Europe-wide judiciary system. Hence, this process will inevitably have to deepen, if EU integration is to remain at its current level. That is why it would be necessary to acknowledge the new roles performed by the courts and try to improve the substantial and not just the normative and formal proximity of the rule of law standards existing in the EU Member States.

2.3.5.4 The reinstatement of substantial judicial review of European arrest warrants would infringe the very essence of this institute for judicial cooperation. The provision of such review would institutionalise mutual suspicion regarding the equality of the rule of law standards applicable in all EU Member States. It would put into question the quintessence of the mutual recognition and co-operation instruments. That is why it would be better to abolish these instruments and the European arrest warrant in particular than to provide such institutional devices for mistrust. Another possible solution would be to try to gradually approximate the applicable judicial protection and the rule of law standard throughout the EU Member States.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The EU Data Retention Directive²⁶ was implemented in Bulgaria by amendments to the Electronic Communications Act which were introduced in 2010. There has been no extensive debate in Bulgaria on the constitutionality of these legislative provisions apart from the activity of some NGOs, e.g. Access to Information Program. There have been several decisions of the Sofia Administrative Court and the Supreme Administrative Court concerning the application of the provisions of the Electronic Communications Act in cases initiated by the above-mentioned NGO.

It has to be noted that two of these Decisions of the Supreme Administrative Court, No. 8786 of 16 July 2008 and No. 13627 of 12 November 2008, concern the abolition of articles of a decree for storage and distribution of information which had been issued by the Minister of Interior and the Chairman of the State Agency for Information Technologies and Communications. This decree had been issued prior to the implementation of the EU Data Retention Directive through the Electronic Communications Act. In its complaint, the Access to Information Program argued that some of the provisions of the decree contravened Arts. 32 and 34 of the Constitution concerning the right to private life, the freedom and secrecy of correspondence and other communications as well as Art. 8 of the ECHR.

The judgments were issued after the adoption of the EU Directive but prior to its implementation in the Bulgarian legal order by an Act of Parliament. Initially a chamber of three judges rejected the complaint in Decision No. 8786 of 16 July 2008. However, a chamber of five judges of the Supreme Administrative Court subsequently issued Decision No. 13627 of 12 November 2008. It abolished Art. 5 of the decree due to a lack of clarity regarding the safeguards for the right to defence, and against illegal interference with the right of citizens to private and family life. The Court based its latter decision on the argument that Art. 5 of the decree contravened the above-mentioned articles of the Constitution and the ECHR.

On 15 April 2014, the national Ombudsman petitioned the Constitutional Court to declare the provisions of the Electronic Communications Act (Arts. 250a to 250, 251 and 251a) that implement the EU Data Retention Directive unconstitutional. The Ombudsman claimed that these legislative provisions infringed the right to private life and the freedom and secrecy of correspondence and other types of communications which are enshrined in the Bulgarian Constitution. He argued that the above-mentioned articles of the Electronic Communications Act also infringed the primacy of international treaties as guaranteed by the Bulgarian Constitution because they contravened the Charter of Human Rights of the EU. The Ombudsman contested the constitutionality of the legislative provisions, and not their conformity with EU law, because the Bulgarian Constitution only grants the Ombudsman the right to approach the Constitutional Court with complaints regarding the unconstitutionality of Acts of Parliament and not on the ground of incompatibility with international treaties or EU law.

²⁶ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

The Constitutional Court accepted the case for examination by its Ruling of 12 June 2014. The Constitutional Court adopted Decision No. 2 of 2015 which declares the above-mentioned articles of the Electronic Communications Act to be unconstitutional. It has to be noted that the CJEU's decision of 8 April 2014 in cases C-293/12 and C-594/12²⁷ was used as a source of argumentation in front of the Bulgarian Constitutional Court. One can also presume that the annulment of the Directive and the declaration of the unconstitutionality of the national implementing Act might begin to serve as a criterion for the Bulgarian system in terms of the acceptability of blanket data retention. Hence, this might be the benefit that stems from this legislative turbulence in the domain of personal data protection.

With regard to the national constitutional provisions, Art. 32 para. 1 of the Constitution provides the following with regard to privacy: 'The privacy of citizens shall be inviolable. Everyone shall be entitled to protection against any unlawful interference in his private or family affairs and against encroachments on his honour, dignity and reputation'. According to Art. 32 para. 2, '[n]o one shall be followed, photographed, filmed, recorded or subjected to any other similar activity without his knowledge or despite his express disapproval, except when such actions are permitted by law'. The secrecy of correspondence is provided by Art. 34 paras. 1 and 2 of the Constitution as follows: 'The freedom and confidentiality of correspondence and all other communications shall be inviolable. Exceptions to this provision shall be allowed only with the permission of the judicial authorities for the purpose of discovering or preventing a grave crime.'

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 As noted in Sect. 2.1.3 on the rule of law, the Constitution stipulates that all normative acts have to be published in the State Gazette to be valid (Art. 5 para. 5). There is no domestic case law on the issue of secret or unpublished EU legislation in Bulgaria. Hence, the problem of whether this is in compliance with the Bulgarian Constitution has not yet emerged. Under the previous 1971 Bulgarian Constitution, some international treaties did not necessarily need to be published.²⁸

²⁷ Joined cases C 293/12 and C 594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

²⁸ According to Decision No. 7 of 1992 of the Constitutional Court, these international treaties were part of the Bulgarian legal system, but they enjoyed the supremacy and direct effect that is granted to international treaties and the generally recognised norms of international law only after their publication.

Unpublished or secret legislation infringes legal certainty and the legitimate expectations of citizens as well as of the holders of public office. It creates ‘legislative swamps’ with paths that are known only to the special circles of elites that have participated in the adoption of the secret legislation or are privileged to be informed about it. Secret legislation is to some extent a contradiction in itself, since the main purpose of all legislation is to create general and durable legal standards that have to be known by its addressees in order to enable them to behave in conformity with the law.

The decision of the Grand Chamber of the CJEU in the *Heinrich*²⁹ case resembles Decision No. 7 of 1992 of the Constitutional Court that has already been discussed above. It is unlikely that the Bulgarian Constitutional Court will use the arguments of Decision No. 7 of 1992 for legitimization of future secret or unpublished EU legislation. The reason is that Decision No. 7 of 1992 of the Constitutional Court had to resolve the issue of what was to be done with international treaties that were concluded under a very different political regime and the non-recognition of which might infringe the principle pacta sunt servanda and thus undermine the international credibility of Bulgaria. On the other hand, there is no legitimate ground to believe that there should be secret or unpublished EU legislation because both the EU and its Member States, Bulgaria included, are democratic regimes that observe the principle of the rule of law.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 There have been no cases relating to these issues in Bulgarian practice. However, as was seen above in Sect. 2.1.3 on the rule of law, these provisions are protected in the Bulgarian Constitution. Moreover, there are cases in which the Constitutional Court has used the principle of proportionality as an argument for declaring the unconstitutionality of legislative provisions that also concern EU measures.³⁰

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programs and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1–2.7.3 The Republic of Bulgaria is not a party to the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty). Hence its provisions are not relevant for Bulgaria at present. There has been no discussion about the constitutionality of the ESM Treaty or other proposed measures such as Eurobonds and the Banking Union.

²⁹ Case C-345/06 Heinrich [2009] ECR I-01659.

³⁰ Decision No. 2 of 2011 of the Constitutional Court.

So far Bulgaria has not been subject to an EU bailout or subsequent austerity programme. Hence, no constitutional issues have arisen with regard to democratic control, the rule of law, transparency, balancing the rights of citizens and residents with those of the international creditor community, or other aspects of a possible bailout programme.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1; 2.8.3–2.8.6 The Bulgarian courts have a reluctant approach to referring questions for preliminary rulings. The preliminary rulings that have been requested have predominantly concerned taxation issues. The right to submit a preliminary reference to the CJEU has been used mostly by the lower courts and especially by the administrative courts. The Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Cassation and the Supreme Administrative Court have still refrained from involvement in direct judicial dialogue with the CJEU. The Supreme Administrative Court has requested a preliminary ruling from the CJEU in only two cases.

It is very difficult to compare the trust in the CJEU and in the domestic courts. A typical attitude of Bulgarian society is that it trusts European institutions more than national institutions. But this is a very general assessment which is related much more to the Zeitgeist than to any reliable scientific data.

There have been very few cases in which the Constitutional Court has tackled issues concerning EU law and domestic legislation implementing EU law. In almost all of these cases, EU law has been used as the criterion for the annulment of potentially contravening domestic legislation. It is only in a case concerning the legislation implementing the EU Data Retention Directive that domestic legislation is being reviewed with regard to its constitutionality; however, at the time of writing in January 2015 this case is still pending in front of the Constitutional Court.

According to statistical data,³¹ during the period 1991–2006, 158 Acts of Parliament have been challenged for their constitutionality in the Constitutional Court. Of these, 79 have been qualified as fully in compliance with the Constitution, 40 have been declared partially unconstitutional and 39 have been declared fully unconstitutional. Moreover, 25 decisions of the National Assembly, 3 decrees of the President of the Republic and 4 international treaties have been subjected to a review of constitutionality in the Constitutional Court. The outcome of the proceedings has been as follows: 15 of the decisions of the National Assembly as well as all of the presidential decrees and all challenged international treaties were declared to be in compliance with the Constitution, 5 of the parliamentary decisions were declared partially unconstitutional and 5 of the parliamentary decisions were declared fully unconstitutional.

³¹ Modeva 1997, p. 573 and Modeva 2010, p. 825.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 No significant EU-related human rights issues have arisen in Bulgarian practice.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1–2.10.2 When tackling the issue of common constitutional traditions, one has to take into account that this term might denote very different things, such as constitutional and legislative grounds, the jurisprudence of the courts, the empirical behaviour of the people and the state institutions and the legal consciousness and constitutional culture. Moreover, there is a thin and a thick version of the common constitutional traditions. The thin version consists of the resemblance between the legal provisions enshrined in the valid sources of law of the compared constitutional systems. The thick version comprises also the ways these normative provisions are internalised in the thinking and behaviour of the legal subjects. Here one may differentiate between the political and legal culture of citizens and institutional memory, which sometimes results in path dependence.

The thin version of the common constitutional traditions might seem very wide in scope. Due to its formality and the fact that it is focused on the ‘law in books’, it might include the main principles of constitutional law – democracy, rule of law, separation of powers, sovereignty and to a lesser extent the welfare state, all civil and political rights, some of the social and economic rights and key principles governing the different branches of state power, especially when it comes to the judiciary. To some extent the breadth of these formal and normative aspects of the common constitutional traditions result in the thinness of this version. The integration processes that started after World War II gained momentum from the beginning of the 1980s and reached their culmination in the establishment of a quasi pan-European legal space after the fall of the Berlin Wall led to the production of a series of constitutional reforms at EU, international, national and even subnational level. The increased resemblance between the formal constitutional systems of the European states and the even greater similarity between the constitutional systems of the EU Member States is the result of this intense approximation effort, which was accomplished by international and EU institutions, by nation state bodies, by NGOs and by other institutional and non-institutional actors.

On the other hand, the thick version of the common constitutional traditions is based on the shared belief of the legal subjects – both office holders and citizens – that the constitutionally and legislatively enshrined rights, obligations, principles and institutions are justified and have to be observed and implemented in social and legal practice. In other words, the thick version of the common constitutional traditions comprises not only ‘the law in books’ but also ‘the law in action’.

An important problem lies in the question of who is competent and at the same time has the legitimacy to delimit the common constitutional traditions of the EU Member States in a legally binding and valid manner. The functioning of the courts as representative spokesmen of the community of citizens clashes with the classic issue of their democratic legitimacy deficit. Judicial dialogue is a practicable and intelligible method for delimiting the common constitutional traditions and thus of the constitutional consensus in European constitutionalism. The problem is that if the judicial dialogue and its results lack democratic acceptance, it cannot lead to a legally valid result which is sustainable in the long term. In such a case the passive ‘permissive consensus’ of the citizens is not sufficient in order to guarantee the development of a real or thick version of the common constitutional traditions.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 There has been no extensive discussion in Bulgaria on Art. 53 of the Charter and the issue of the application of stricter constitutional standards. We believe that Art. 53 of the Charter is a sufficient legitimization for the application of national human rights standards if they are higher than EU standards. It is true that national law, including national human rights law, should not serve as an instrument for undermining EU integration. However, the achievements not only of the distinct Member States or the ECHR but also of European constitutional civilization in general might be endangered if the EU and its institutions start to systematically diminish the standard of human rights protection with teleological excuses based on efficiency arguments.

It has to be taken into account that Art. 53 of the Charter is to some extent a product of the judicial dialogue between the CJEU and the national constitutional courts. It codifies an important principle in EU primary law, namely that the national standards for human rights protection must be respected by the EU institutions, and that EU standards should not be lower than these national standards. Furthermore, Art. 53 permits the application of higher national human rights standards. Hence, although the decision in the *Melloni*³² case has its logic in the context of the European Arrest Warrant, it gives rise to issues regarding its legitimacy in view of the principle of the rule of law.

³² Case 399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 There has been no intense debate in Bulgaria either regarding the adoption and implementation of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision or with regard to the EU Data Retention Directive. These key events concerning the rule of law in the EU were passively received by the politicians, the academia, the legal community and the broader public. This is due to the general EU-optimistic attitude in Bulgaria in the pre-accession period and in the first years after EU accession, as well as the typical affirmative stance on EU integration issues. In this sense, the slogan ‘Brussels wills it!’ has functioned as a key explanatory strategy.

Democratic deliberation is a phenomenon that does not predominantly depend on the legal infrastructure. If there is no censorship, information and media pluralism are guaranteed and communication rights are enshrined in the constitution and legislation, then the quality and quantity of democratic deliberation results to a great extent from the maturity of the society, the willingness of its citizens to engage in public debate and the variety and sufficiency of available information. Hence, a lack or insufficiency of democratic deliberation on EU issues in general or in Bulgaria in particular is much more a result of deficits in the social preconditions than in the legal framework. One general problem which needs a common solution is the national fragmentation of EU related deliberation and the nonexistence of a common European deliberative space.

2.12.2 The adequacy and good functioning of the constitutional review of EU matters will be evaluated differently depending on the attitude of the commentator on issues such as judicial dialogue, the legitimacy of constitutional justice as a medium between the national and supranational levels and the nature, teleology and future of the EU. A federalist approach would generally dismiss claims for more constitutional control. A moderate pro-European stance would try to reconcile and balance the need for preservation of the national institutions, interests and values enshrined in the constitutions and guaranteed by the constitutional courts with the demands of efficient and smoothly functioning EU integration. A more EU-reluctant approach would emphasise the need for sufficient time and discretion for the national institutions and in particular for the national constitutional courts to scrutinize EU measures and safeguard national sovereignty and interests.

2.12.3 The idea of suspending the application of and reviewing EU measures where important constitutional issues have been identified by a number of constitutional courts is an interesting one. Its great advantage would be that it would enhance the role of the national constitutional courts as direct guarantors of the national constitutional identity but also as the providers of indirect safeguards for developing EU integration in a way that would ensure respect for the key constitutional principles and values that fall within the scope of the common European constitutional traditions. The introduction of such a system might enhance the legality, legitimacy and efficiency of EU measures.

On the other hand, it might additionally increase the complexity of the EU decision-making schemes and thus might contribute to the structural and functional gridlock of the EU. Moreover, the rather modest and unsatisfactory results of the system for control of subsidiarity and proportionality by the national parliaments might to some extent be reproduced also in the context of constitutional control. Of course, here one has to take into account the institutional, functional, substantial and motivational differences between the two types of control performed by the national parliaments and the national constitutional courts. One can suppose that these differences would work in favour of control by the national constitutional courts because they are better equipped and prepared for such activity in comparison to the parliaments.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.2 It is very difficult to give a general assessment of whether EU integration has diminished or increased the protection of human rights. This is so because the influence of EU integration varies according to the different societal domains and the human rights that are supposed to serve as an instrument for the protection of specific interests and values. However, the objectives of EU integration should not serve as an excuse for an actual or potential reduction of the level of protection of human rights. A reduction is legitimate, as also pointed out in the Bulgarian Constitution, only in a state of war or a state of emergency and even then not all rights may be affected and the reduction should be accomplished in a proportionate manner. It is obvious that EU integration does not constitute such an extraordinary situation.

EU integration has produced certain negative effects on key constitutional principles such as the rule of law, democracy and the separation of powers. Some of them are side-effects that have emerged in the course of the establishment of the new constitutional infrastructure in Europe, others might and actually must be prevented, whereas a third group of negative factors stem from processes which are much deeper and broader than EU integration, such as globalisation, constitutional pluralism, disintegration of the nation state and the dismantling of cornerstone constitutional ideologies that were established in the earlier phases of the development of constitutional civilization.

Hence, reduction of the standard of human rights protection and infringements of the rule of law are in principle neither inevitable, nor should they be tolerated, even if they are legitimised by virtue of higher integration goals. The use of EU integration and its possible positive effects as an excuse for limiting the scope of people's freedom might result in a neopaternalistic European Leviathan.

The reduction of the standard of human rights protection is a result of different factors. These are the establishment of new arenas for policy-making which are difficult to subject to democratic control by the citizens and society through classical devices; the emergence of new areas of social activity and legal regulation which people are still not accustomed to; the focus on human rights infringements by states and the lack of sufficient attention to human rights infringements by international and supranational organisations such as the EU, and the durable Euro-optimism in the new EU member countries, in many of which people still believe that the EU is much more democratic and better based on the rule of law than are their own states.

The EU accession to the ECHR is a possible solution that could serve as a guarantee against human rights infringements by the EU institutions. However, there is the intrinsic danger of the emergence of contradicting practices by the European Court of Human Rights and the CJEU. If there emerges a significant disparity between the jurisprudence of these two courts and a divergent practice of the national constitutional courts, we will be confronted with an increasing pluralism of human rights standards that could be very difficult to co-ordinate. In addition, after a certain point of no return, the idea of judicial dialogue could also no longer contribute to the reconstruction of a consistent and sufficiently comprehensible and clear system of human rights.

The creation of a distinct European Constitutional Court in parallel to the already existing EU court system might create similar problems – divergent practice, differing standards for human rights protection, issues relating to legal certainty and equal treatment, etc. On the other hand, it may enhance the level of protection of human rights due to the development of a pro-human rights institutional ethos, logic and, over time, institutional memory. Moreover, it might serve as a check on and competitor of the CJEU.

The enhancement of the role of the national constitutional courts with regards to human rights protection cannot be a durable solution. It could produce divergences in practice and could tend to bring concerns stemming from the more or less specific context of a specific Member State's jurisdiction to the forefront. Thus, an institutional design with a reinforced national constitutional court would be recommendable from the viewpoint of protecting the human rights standards that have already been achieved and of compensating for loss of sovereignty, but would lead to the establishment of peaks and valleys in the geography of human rights protection in the EU. The stimulation of a proactive role for other national institutions, such as national parliaments and ombudsmen, in highlighting constitutional issues in European governance might be useful but cannot serve as a sufficient remedy for the diminishing level of human rights protection.

The achievement of a revised approach and enhanced responsiveness by the EU Courts would be a very recommendable way to proceed. It would not lead to an overburdening of the institutional scheme with an abundance of players in the field of human rights protection, would serve as a precondition for the establishment of co-ordinated and consistent practice and would be based on an already existing institution. Hence, the development of the CJEU as a constitutional court of the EU would be a positive trend.

2.13.3 No significant issues of constitutional importance have been raised by the Bulgarian courts in their preliminary ruling requests to the CJEU. The proposals for the usage of comparative method and for enhanced examination of the national constitutional traditions of the EU Member States by the CJEU are reasonable because they may lead to a more sincere development of a shared realm of European constitutional traditions in the field of human rights. Making the arguments of the parties and of the intervening governments fully available on the Court's website might not only increase the transparency of the constitutional courts' decision-making but might enrich the scope of legal argumentation and provide inspiration for arguments in future cases.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1–3.1.3 The Constitution provides for two ways to introduce international treaties into the Bulgarian legal order. The most important treaties must be ratified by the National Assembly, whereas less important ones (in the opinion of the constitutional legislator) have to be introduced by approval of the Council of Ministers by a decision.

The first group of international treaties are exhaustively enumerated in Art. 85 of the Constitution, according to which the National Assembly shall ratify and denounce the following treaties: treaties with political or military character; treaties concerning Bulgaria's participation in international organisations; treaties concerning amendment of the state boundary; treaties providing financial obligations for the state; treaties that provide for the participation of the state in international arbitration or international judicial dispute resolution; treaties concerning human rights; treaties concerning legislative measures and treaties that explicitly require ratification. Other treaties that do not fall into the scope of Art. 85 do not need parliamentary ratification and may be implemented by a governmental decree. It was seen above that in 2005, a new type of treaty was included in the list of treaties with compulsory ratification. These are treaties that transfer competences which stem from the 1991 Constitution to the EU.

The Constitution stipulates that treaties that are ratified by the National Assembly can be amended or denounced only through the procedure provided by the treaties themselves or in accordance with the generally recognised norms of international law. This constitutional provision is a safeguard for the principle pacta sunt servanda.

An additional guarantee for the same principle is the constitutional provision that treaties that contravene the Constitution and thus require its amendment can only be concluded after the completion of such amendment. The systematic interpretation of this provision in combination with the provision on the absolute supremacy of the Constitution, the primacy of treaties and the generally recognised norms and principles of international law over all sub-constitutional domestic legislation and the lack of any explicit provision regarding the relationship between the EU and domestic Bulgarian law, leads to the conclusion that the Constitution implicitly subsumes EU law under the category of international treaty or general principle of international law. This stance is the result not so much of a strategy to preserve national sovereignty but of the political and practical difficulty of summoning the Grand National Assembly, which is the only body that can reorganise the hierarchy of the sources of law with regard to the supremacy of the Constitution and the primacy of international treaties.

The EU is the only supranational organisation that is explicitly mentioned in the Constitution. The UN, Council of Europe, NATO, WTO and International Criminal Court are not explicitly mentioned. However there are constitutional provisions that have implicit relevance for the participation of Bulgaria in these forms of supranational and global governance. According to Art. 24 of the Constitution, the external policy of the Republic of Bulgaria should be based on the principles and norms of international law. This article, in combination with the primacy of treaties and the generally recognised principles of international law over all Bulgarian legislation except the Constitution, creates the legal foundation both for the participation of the state in international relations and for the strong influence of the international legal order in Bulgaria.

The 2005 constitutional amendment of Art. 25 para. 4 of the Constitution allowing for the extradition of Bulgarian citizens to other states and to international courts for the purpose of criminal prosecution on the basis of an international treaty that has been ratified, published and has entered into force for Bulgaria opens the way for the application of the European arrest warrant and for the recognition of the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court in The Hague.

Article 24 para. 2 of the Constitution imposes several objectives that have to be pursued and taken into account in the course of pursuing the external policy of Bulgaria. According to this constitutional provision, ‘the foreign policy of the Republic of Bulgaria shall have as its highest objective the national security and independence of the country, the well-being and the fundamental rights and freedoms of the Bulgarian citizens, and the promotion of a just international order’.

The Preamble of the Constitution contains the constitutional values that have to be upheld by public authorities. These values are: freedom, peace, humanism, equality, justice, tolerance, human rights, human dignity and security as well as the national and state unity of Bulgaria. Hence, these values might be interpreted as implicit limitations to the participation of the state in supranational and international policy-making and to the transfer of competences to supranational or international organisations.

However, there are no explicit substantial limits to the transfer of competences to supranational or international organisations. This is due to the fact that there are no unamendable clauses in the Bulgarian Constitution as well as no specific provisions regarding the eventual scope of the competences that might be transferred to supranational and international organisations. There are only procedural requirements, i.e. qualified majorities, parliamentary ratification or convention of the Grand National Assembly, that have to be fulfilled.

The Bulgarian Constitution was adopted after the fall of the communist regime in Bulgaria. The main objective of the constitutional legislator was to open the Bulgarian constitutional statehood to the international legal order without undermining state sovereignty. In order to achieve this balance, the Constitution provides, on the one hand, for a monistic system for the introduction of international treaties into the Bulgarian legal system, gives priority and direct effect to international treaties that have been ratified by Bulgaria, published and have entered into force over Bulgarian legislation, apart from the Constitution, and proclaims the desire of Bulgaria to participate in the development of a just legal order. Moreover, in the course of preparing for EU accession, the Bulgarian Constitution was amended so as to allow for the integration of Bulgaria in this supranational constitutional community.

On the other hand, the Constitution seeks to preserve the control of the National Assembly over the vertical transfer of power towards supranational and international organisations in its capacity as the presumed guarantor of the people's sovereignty and state sovereignty.

3.1.4 Comments on the role of the Constitution were provided above in Sect. 1.5.3.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 It has already been explained that according to Art. 5 para. 4 of the Bulgarian Constitution, international treaties that have been ratified pursuant to the Constitution, published and have entered into force for the Republic of Bulgaria are part of internal Bulgarian law. The ratification act is a formal one. It does not have its own normative content because its only purpose is to introduce the international treaty. Thus, the ratification act is just a device for investing international treaties with internal legal validity. Hence, the international treaty itself has direct normative force and is directly applicable. It has direct effect and prevails over contravening sub-constitutional provisions of Bulgarian law. This is due to the fact that the Bulgarian Constitution provides for a monist system for the introduction of international treaties into the national legal order.

The idea of the constitutional legislator was that the Constitution should prevail over international treaties because it is the core of crystallisation of national sovereignty. However, no institution of the constituted powers – neither the Parliament, nor the Government, the judiciary, the President, etc. – can violate the international obligations of Bulgaria because their acts will automatically be invalid due to the primacy of international treaties over the legal acts they adopt.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 The National Assembly is involved in the decision-making process concerning international treaties or international issues which are of crucial importance. The Parliament declares war and peace, gives permission for the sending and use of Bulgarian military troops abroad, for the stay and transit of foreign military troops on and through Bulgarian territory and approves the conclusion of state loan treaties. War can also be declared by the President if the Parliament is not in session and there is military aggression against the territory of the state or an urgent need to fulfil international military obligations. According to Decision No. 1 of 2003 of the Constitutional Court, if the National Assembly has given a general permission through ratification of an international treaty for the deployment and use of Bulgarian military troops abroad and for the stay and transit of foreign military troops on and through Bulgarian territory, the concrete subsequent orders for deployment of the military forces can be given by the Council of Ministers.

Apart from these key instances which concern military and financial matters, the National Assembly has no concrete competences for preliminary involvement in international policy making. The main actors in the negotiation and conclusion of international treaties are the Council of Ministers, the President, the Prime Minister, the foreign minister and, on some occasions, also other senior officials within the executive.

The National Assembly can always use the general instruments for parliamentary control in order to put pressure on the Government's external policy or to obtain information from the Council of Ministers for the participation of Bulgaria in the EU or international policy making. The Constitution does not permit the execution of secret international policy by the institutions of the executive power. Extensive parliamentary debates on governmental EU or foreign policy are not very frequent. They usually concern issues that are allocated high on the agenda of the political parties, i.e. the conclusion of international treaties with financial and strategic economic implications such as state loan and energy treaties. However, in principle, external policy making, including the initiation, preparation and conclusion of international treaties as well as their implementation, is dominated by the executive power institutions in general and the Government in particular.

This situation has been reinforced by the EU membership of Bulgaria, although this is not a Bulgarian peculiarity but rather a tendency that can generally be observed in all EU Member States. The participation of the National Assembly in EU policy making and its information and control competences relating to the Government as well as the international treaties that need parliamentary ratification for entry into force have already been discussed.

3.3.2 The accession or withdrawal from an international organisation or the ratification or denouncement of an international treaty has never been the subject of a referendum in Bulgarian history. Hence it is a tradition in Bulgaria that issues concerning the participation of the state in international relations are decided by the state institutions and not by the people, even if they concern crucial moments in the nation's destiny. The Constitution does not provide for referendums or popular initiatives concerning international issues, but also does not prohibit them. However, it has already been explained that the Direct Participation of the Citizens in State Power and Local Self Government Act allows for referendums for ratification but prohibits referendums on denunciation of an international treaty. It has to be taken into account that these are facultative and not compulsory referendums, which may be either imperative or consultative.³³

The intent of the legislator has not been to put the Bulgarian authorities in an embarrassing position by potentially having to withdraw from an international treaty or having to leave an international or supranational organisation. However, whether it is legitimate to allow Bulgarian citizens to directly decide the issue of joining international or supranational organisations but to prohibit the direct democratic decision of the issue of ending membership in such organisation is very doubtful from the point of view of the constitutional principle of democracy. This legislative decision is one-sided and does not take either representative or direct democracy seriously. It seeks to reconcile the logic that professional politicians and people's representatives can take more rational decisions when it comes to international and supranational politics with the logic that the sovereign people must have the chance to determine their own destiny, no matter what the result would be. The Direct Participation of the Citizens in State Power and Local Self Government Act would appear to presume, with a degree of paradox, that Bulgarian citizens are sufficiently mature to decide whether they want to ratify a treaty, but are less so with regard to possible dissatisfaction with that treaty leading to its denunciation. This situation becomes even more problematic from a democratic point of view if one takes into account the fact that no referendum has been held for either the NATO or EU membership of Bulgaria.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 International treaties are positioned above all domestic normative acts except the Constitution and the interpretative decisions of the Constitutional Court. The same is the situation with the case law of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. Hence, doubt regarding the application of an international treaty in a judicial or administrative process may only arise where there is doubt concerning its constitutionality. The 1991 Constitution provides for a preliminary control by the Constitutional Court of the constitutionality of international treaties before their ratification.

However, this control is not compulsory but facultative because it can be performed only following the initiative of one-fifth of the MPs, the President, the Council of Ministers, the State Prosecutor General, the Supreme Court of Cassation or the Supreme Administrative Court. If these institutions do not make use of their competence to request a review of the constitutionality of an international treaty by the Constitutional Court, then according to Decision No. 9 of 1999, they may initiate ex post constitutional review. However, some authors stipulate that ex post control by the Constitutional Court can be carried out only on the constitutionality of the ratification procedure, but not on the content of the international treaty itself.³⁴ The problem is that the Act of Parliament adopted for ratification of an international treaty is a formal act and does not reproduce the text of the treaty. Consequently, according to this logic, there is no other way to stop the application of an unconstitutional international treaty but to denounce the treaty through the same procedure that has been used for its introduction into the Bulgarian system, although this is unlikely to happen in reality.

³³ Belov 2009, pp. 422–507.

The pacta sunt servanda principle creates predictability in international relations. Thus, it is a guarantee for something resembling interstate rule of law which preserves the legitimate expectations of the states and their citizens. Hence, indirectly, the pacta sunt servanda principle is also a guarantee for the internal rule of law, especially if the international treaty concerns human rights as well as measures that have a more eminent impact on human welfare and behaviour. The importance of the pacta sunt servanda principle is increasing in the context of global governance at the beginning of the XXI century. No international or supranational co-operation is possible without it.

The activity of both the international and supranational courts and of the domestic courts could sometimes put the pacta sunt servanda principle into question. The practice of the courts may transform it from a rigid and clear obligation to observe international law into a vague and framework duty of general compliance with broad initial standards. On the one hand, the virtual amendment of the treaties by the supranational and international courts might profoundly change their initial scope and the meaning of their provisions in a way that cannot be predicted in advance. Moreover, the judicial ‘mastering of the meaning’ of treaty provisions may have a curving path or zig-zag trajectory and thus may lead to far-reaching shifts in the obligations the states initially intended to take. On the other hand, the national courts may take decisions for the non-application of international treaties in the national legal order of the respective state, i.e. due to their contradiction with the Constitution. Thus, the biased jurisprudence of the supranational, international and national courts may in the end produce ‘judicial battles’ and even ‘judicial wars’. These would barely be reconcilable with the principle of representative democracy and detrimental to the observance of pacta sunt servanda, legal certainty and thus, ultimately, the rule of law principles.

The jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg and of the CJEU, based on explicit judicial activism, allow for the virtual amendment of the treaties that these courts interpret and safeguard. The initial duties that the Member States of the Council of Europe and of the EU have undertaken have been transformed and further developed by these two supranational courts. Notwithstanding the many positive effects of their case law, the activist jurisprudence of the ECHR and especially of the CJEU may lead to the undermining of the principle that international treaties have to be concluded, ratified and amended by democratically elected institutions, the national parliaments and governments.

³⁴ Tashev 2004, pp. 64–65.

The non-application of international treaties by the national courts can also put the pacta sunt servanda principle in danger. Key decisions of the supreme and constitutional courts that proclaim the unconstitutionality of international legal standards or that declare that such standards endanger core constitutional and national values, are manifestations of national sovereignty. Hence the judicial dialogue that could possibly emerge out of a ‘case law ping-pong’ played by the supreme national, international and supranational jurisdictions is actually an expression of a fight for sovereignty. It serves to delimit the seemingly flexible but in fact still very important boundaries between the history and the future of the national and supranational political communities and the core and periphery of the constitutional consensus. Such dialogue raises concerns from the viewpoint of democracy, but is usually legitimised by arguments based in constitutional politics.

The non-observance of the pacta sunt servanda principle due to the non-application of provisions of international treaties by the ordinary courts would be problematic in several aspects. It would undermine the capacity of the political institutions of representative democracy – the parliaments and the governments – to dispose of the realm of discretion needed for the accomplishment of their tasks in international relations. Moreover, such judicial practice may be manifested in a diffuse, polycentric and creeping form, undermining legal certainty, the principle of legitimate expectations and the international obligations of states.

On the other hand, the protection of core constitutional values and principles by both the national courts and the international and supranational courts may serve as an important guarantee for the ethical, social and political integrity of the communities for whom the relevant courts are presumed to speak, and may represent a safeguard for human liberty and human rights. At a time when the legitimate channels for democratic representation are malfunctioning, countermajoritarian institutions such as the courts may play an important and even crucial role in the preservation and development of the constitutional consensus, the constitutional identity and personal prosperity. In such case, however, the rule of law will prevail over the separation of powers and democracy.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 The issues raised by these questions are not directly relevant for Bulgaria.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 The issues raised by these questions are not directly relevant for Bulgaria.

References

- Belov M. (2009) Пряка демокрация – национални и сравнителноправни аспекти (Direct democracy – National and comparative aspects). Sibi, Sofia.
- Belov M. (2010) Същност и типология на конституционния консенсус. В: Киров, Пл. (съст.) Национални и европейски измерения на съвременния конституционализъм (Concept and typology of the constitutional consensus). In: Kirov P. (ed.) National and European dimensions of the contemporary constitutionalism. St. Kliment Ohridski University Press, Sofia, pp. 188–224.
- Belov M. (2012) Източниците на правото в действие – правосъдието между позитивизма и реализма (The sources of law in action – the judiciary between legal positivism and legal realism). Savremenno Pravo 4:29–45.
- Bogdanor V. (1988) Constitutions in the Democratic Politics. Gower, London.
- Drumeva E. (2009) Primacy of the EU Law in the National Constitutional Space – Reflections. In: Pernice I., Tanchev E. (eds.) Ceci n'est pas une Constitution – Constitutionalisation without a Constitution? Nomos, Baden-Baden, pp. 101–102.
- Grimm D. (2010) The Achievement of Constitutionalism and its Prospects in a Changed World. In: Dobner P., Loughlin, M. (eds.) The Twilight of Constitutionalism? Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 4 et seq.
- Jellinek G. (1905) System der subjektiven öffentlichen Rechte. Mohr, Tübingen.
- Kiiver P. (2006) The National Parliaments in the European Union. Kluwer, The Hague.
- Klein E. (1983) The Concept of the Basic Law. In: Starck C. (ed.) Main Principles of the West German Basic Law. Nomos, Baden-Baden, pp. 21–22.
- Kornezov A. (2012) Bulgaria. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 259–283.
- MacCormick N. (1993) Beyond the Sovereign State. MLR 56(1):16 et seq.
- Modeva, M (1997) Таблица. В: Конституционен съд. Юриспруденция (1991–1996) (Tables. In: Constitutional Court. Jurisprudence (1991–1996)). Open Society Institute, Sofia.
- Modeva, M. (2010) Таблица. В: Конституционен съд. Юриспруденция (1997–2006) (Tables. In: Constitutional Court. Jurisprudence (1997–2006)). Open Society Institute, Sofia.
- O'Brennan J., Raunio T. (2007) National Parliaments within the enlarged European Union. From 'Victims' of Integration to Competitive Actors? Routledge, Abingdon.
- Panova P., Kashumov A. (2012) Bulgaria. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 213–220.
- Peters A. (2005) Global Constitutionalism Revisited. International Legal Theory 11:41 et seq.
- Peters A. (2006) Compensatory Constitutionalism: The Function and Potential of Fundamental International Norms and Structures. LJIL 19:580 et seq.
- Sartori G. (1994) Comparative Constitutional Engineering: An Inquiry into Structures, Incentives and Outcomes. Macmillan Press, Hounds Mills.
- Tanchev E. (2014) The Primacy or Supremacy of International and EU Law in the Context of Contemporary Constitutional Pluralism. In: Birmontiene, T. (ed.) Modern Tendencies of

- Constitutional Justice: the Relation Between National and International Law. Constitutional Court of the Republic of Lithuania, Vilnius, pp. 69–75.
- Tanchev E. (2003) Въведение в конституционното право (Introduction to constitutional law). Sibi, Sofia.
- Tanchev E., Belov M. (2008) Constitutional Gradualism: Adapting to EU Membership and Improving the Judiciary in the Bulgarian Constitution. EPL 1(1): 3 et seq.
- Tashev R. (2004) Обща теория на правото (General theory of law). Sibi, Sofia.
- Tsebelis G. (1990) Nested Games: Rational Choice in Comparative Politics. University of California Press, Berkley.
- Vazak K. (1984) Pour une troisième génération des droits de l'homme. In: Swinarski C. (ed.) Etudes et essais sur le droit international et sur le principes de la Croix-Rouge en l'honneur Jean Pictet. Kluwer, The Hague, pp. 837–850.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Croatia in the Perspective of European and Global Governance

Iris Goldner Lang, Zlata Đurđević and Mislav Mataiija

Abstract The report from the newest EU Member State – Croatia – explains that the constitutional system represents a break from the former socialist system, where the Constitution had been more ‘political’ and not directly applied in practice. The constitutional order is highly influenced by the German constitutional tradition, and the Constitutional Court often cites the German Constitutional Court. The Constitution has been amended with regard to the EU in a very extensive manner. No significant constitutional issues have arisen with regard to EU or international law. By way of some limited exceptions, trade unions and individuals unsuccessfully sought to contest austerity measures required as part of the EU Council’s excessive deficit proceedings in the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court has additionally adjudicated questions on whether referendums regarding privatisation of certain public services are permissible, given that the referendum outcome

Iris Goldner Lang is Jean Monnet Professor and Chairholder of the UNESCO Chair on Free Movement of People, Migration and Inter-Cultural Dialogue at the Faculty of Law, University of Zagreb. e-mail: igoldner@pravo.hr.

Zlata Đurđević is Professor of Criminal Procedural Law, Faculty of Law, University of Zagreb. e-mail: durdevic@pravo.hr.

Mislav Mataiija was at the time of writing Lecturer in European Public Law, University of Zagreb, and is at the time of publication a Member of the Legal Service of the European Commission (all views expressed are personal and the sections written by this author were written prior to commencement of work at the European Commission). e-mail: mislav.mataiija@gmail.com.

Iris Goldner Lang wrote Part 1 and Sects. 2.4–2.9. Zlata Đurđević wrote Sect. 2.3. Mislav Mataiija wrote Sects. 2.1–2.2, 2.10–2.13 and Part 3.

All websites accessed 30 May 2015. Text submitted 7 July 2015.

I. Goldner Lang (✉) · Z. Đurđević · M. Mataiija University of Zagreb, Zagreb, Croatia
e-mail: igoldner@pravo.hr

Z. Đurđević
e-mail: durdevic@pravo.hr

M. Mataiija
e-mail: mislav.mataiija@gmail.com

could lead to incompatibility with EU law. The increased cost of water in relation to a relevant EU Directive was the object of the first reference for a preliminary ruling from Croatia. With regard to the European Arrest Warrant (EAW), some legislative guarantees (such as the statute of limitations) were removed from an implementing law following severe criticism and the threat of financial sanctions from the European Commission. The move through the EAW system towards in absentia judgments has also led to some debate, given the historical experience with a high number of in absentia judgments during the 1991–1995 war and the subsequent finding that a vast majority of these trials had violated fair trial rights.

Keywords The Constitution of Croatia · Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation · The Croatian Constitutional Court
Constitutional review statistics · Fundamental rights and the rule of law
European Arrest Warrant · Statute of limitations and in absentia judgments
Excessive deficit proceedings · Austerity measures and social rights
Privatisation of public services · Referendum · Data Retention Directive

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 In the socialist system of the former Yugoslavia the Constitution could have been characterised as falling more into the second category of ‘political’ constitutions, as it was considered to be a set of ideopolitical principles which were not linked to legal practice and which were not supposed to be directly applied in practice.¹ This perception still persists to a certain degree today with regard to the Croatian Constitution, but it has undergone a slow, but visible change, particularly in the last couple of years, with the growing importance of both the Constitution and the Constitutional Court. Different branches of the government and other actors on the Croatian political scene, such as trade unions and diverse interest groups, are using the Constitution and the important position of the Constitutional Court to advance their political agenda.² However, outside the political forum, Croatian judges are still extremely reluctant to use or rely on the Constitution in their judgments.³

¹ Smerdel 2010, p. 6.

² E.g. for the applications of the Croatian Parliament to the Constitutional Court see Judgments U-VIIR-1159/2015, 8 April 2015 and U-VIIR-1158/2015, 21 April 2015, of the Constitutional Court, where the Croatian Parliament asked the Constitutional Court to determine whether it is constitutional to put questions on outsourcing and on giving highways in concession at national referendums (for the lowering of the referendum threshold, see the answer to question 1.2.3). On the other hand, former Croatian President Ivo Josipović stood for constitutional amendments in his 2013/2014 presidential campaign. See also the proposal for constitutional review initiated by nine trade unions as a response to Government austerity measures, discussed in more detail in the answer to question 2.7.3. (Judgment U-I-1625/2014 and others, U-I-241/2015, U-I-383/2015, U-II-1343/2015, 30 March 2015).

Croatian constitutional tradition is and will surely continue to be highly and predominantly influenced by the German constitutional tradition, as well as by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR). This influence is felt both at the level of constitutional provisions and of the judgments of the Constitutional Court. The latter is evidenced by the fact that by October 2013, the Constitutional Court had relied on the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in more than 1,000 of its decisions.⁴

In the context of constitutional amendments which have been made under the influence of the ECHR, two examples can be provided. First, Art. 16 of the Croatian Constitution was amended in 2000 by inserting a new paragraph providing for the principle of proportionality which was previously not included in the Constitution.⁵ As explained in the National Report provided by the Croatian Constitutional Court for the XVIth Congress of the Conference of European Constitutional Courts, this insertion was ‘predominantly the result of a [previous] judgment ... of the Constitutional Court ..., which was based on the principle of proportionality’ and in which the Constitutional Court ‘carried out the proportionality test as performed in the case-law of the ECtHR’.⁶ The other example is the 2000 constitutional amendment whereby Art. 29 on the principle of a fair trial was aligned to Art. 6(1) of the Convention.⁷

On the other hand, the influence of the German Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht, hereinafter BVerfG) is most visible in the judgments of the Croatian Constitutional Court, in which it often cites the relevant paragraphs of judgments of the BVerfG in Croatian and the original text in German. On the occasions that it finds it necessary to establish whether a common standard on a certain issue can be found in a number of signatory states to the Convention, the Constitutional Court performs a comparative overview.⁸

The influence of the BVerfG can be expected to continue to be felt in the reasoning of the Croatian Constitutional Court both in matters which are not related to EU law and in the context of the relation between Croatian constitutional law and

³ For a rare example of a Croatian judge who decided to initiate a constitutional review procedure and a critique of the formalistic reasoning of the Constitutional Court, see the Report by T. Ćapeta in ‘Member States’ Constitutions and EU Integration’ in the project coordinated by S. Griller, University of Salzburg, Hart, forthcoming in 2019.

⁴ National Report of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Croatia based on the Questionnaire for the XVIth Congress of the Conference of European Constitutional Courts, 2013, p. 18.

⁵ The Vice-president of the Croatian Constitutional Court, Dr. Snjezana Bagić, recently wrote her Ph.D. thesis on the principle of proportionality in the case law of the European courts and its impact on the case law of the Croatian courts; Bagić 2013.

⁶ National Report of the Constitutional Court of the Republic, n. 4, p. 14.

⁷ Ibid., p. 14.

⁸ Judgment U-I-295/2006 et al, 6 July 2011.

EU law. So far, there have been only two judgments where the Constitutional Court has invoked Art. 145 of the Croatian Constitution (which stipulates the relationship between national and EU law) by stating that ‘the Constitution is, by its legal nature, supreme to EU law’.⁹ One can expect future judgments of the Constitutional Court to take a more detailed stance on the relation between Croatian and EU law, as well as the further influence of the BVerfG in this segment of the Constitutional Court’s reasoning.

1.1.2 The Croatian Constitution lays importance on both of these areas. Title III, which encompasses 57 articles, in a very detailed way provides for the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. On the other hand, there are several provisions invoking sovereignty. Article 2, as the crucial sovereignty provision, provides that ‘[t]he sovereignty of the Republic of Croatia is inalienable, indivisible and non-transferable’ and that ‘[t]he Republic of Croatia may conclude alliances with other states, retaining its sovereign right to decide upon the powers to be so delegated and the right to freely withdraw therefrom’.¹⁰ Further, Art. 142 entitled ‘Association and Dissociation’, which was used as the legal basis for EU membership (as explicitly stated in Art. 143 of the Constitution), provides for the procedure for associating Croatia into alliances with other states. It also contains a provision explicitly prohibiting Croatian association in alliances which could lead ‘to a renewal of a South Slavic state union or to any form of consolidated Balkan state’.¹¹

1.2 The Amendment of Constitutions in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 Croatia acceded to the European Union on 1 July 2013. The act of accession was preceded by a lengthy and difficult process of accession negotiations. Croatia applied for EU membership on 21 February 2003, at the time when its Stabilisation and Association Agreement, signed in October 2001, was not yet in force. Having acquired candidate status in June 2004, accession negotiations were launched on 3 October 2005 and closed on 30 June 2011. The Accession Treaty was signed five months later on 9 December 2011. The constitutional amendment which paved the way for Croatian accession to the EU was adopted in June 2010 and was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 76/10 of 18 June 2010.

⁹ For the discussion of these judgments, in terms of the relation of national and EU law, see the answer to question 1.2.1. All translations of Croatian court judgments are by the authors.

¹⁰ All translations of the Constitution are from the English translation on the website of the Croatian Parliament. <http://www.sabor.hr/Default.aspx?art=2405>.

¹¹ Arguing that the crucial aim of this constitutional provision was dissociation from the former Yugoslavia, Sinisa Rodin suggested that a different legal basis for the transfer of powers to an international organisation or an association could be used for Croatian accession to the EU: see Rodin 2007, p. 23.

The constitutional amendment had a threefold role. First, it inserted a separate Chapter VII, entitled ‘European Union’, into the Croatian Constitution. The purpose of this chapter is to provide the legal grounds for Croatian membership in the EU and to regulate the status of EU law in the national legal order. The provisions of Chapter VII regulate the legal grounds for membership and the transfer of constitutional powers (Art. 143);¹² representation of Croatian citizens and institutions in the EU institutions and decision-making process (Art. 144);¹³ and the relationship of national and EU law (Art. 145);¹⁴ and they reiterate the rights of EU citizens (Art. 146).¹⁵ The amendment came into force on 1 July 2013, the date of Croatian accession to the EU.

¹² Article 143 of the Croatian Constitution, entitled ‘Legal Grounds for Membership and Transfer of Constitutional Powers’ provides:

‘Pursuant to Article 142 of the Constitution, the Republic of Croatia shall, as a Member State of the European Union, participate in the creation of European unity in order to ensure, together with other European states, lasting peace, liberty, security and prosperity, and to attain other common objectives in keeping with the founding principles and values of the European Union. Pursuant to Articles 140 and 141 of the Constitution, the Republic of Croatia shall confer upon the institutions of the European Union the powers necessary for the enjoyment of rights and fulfilment of obligations ensuing from membership.’

¹³ Article 144 of the Croatian Constitution, entitled ‘Participation in European Union Institutions’, stipulates:

‘The citizens of the Republic of Croatia shall be directly represented in the European Parliament where they shall, through their elected representatives, decide upon matters falling within their purview.

The Croatian Parliament shall participate in the European legislative process as regulated in the founding treaties of the European Union.

The Government of the Republic of Croatia shall report to the Croatian Parliament on the draft regulations and decisions in the adoption of which it participates in the institutions of the European Union. In respect of such draft regulations and decisions, the Croatian Parliament may adopt conclusions which shall provide the basis on for the Government’s actions in European Union institutions.

Parliamentary oversight by the Croatian Parliament of the actions of the Government of the Republic of Croatia in European Union institutions shall be regulated by law.

The Republic of Croatia shall be represented in the Council and the European Council by the Government and the President of the Republic of Croatia in accordance with their respective constitutional powers.’

¹⁴ Article 145 of the Croatian Constitution is cited in the answer to question 1.3.1.

¹⁵ Article 146, entitled ‘Rights of European Union Citizens’ stipulates:

‘Citizens of the Republic of Croatia shall be European Union citizens and shall enjoy the rights guaranteed by the European Union acquis communautaire, and in particular:

- freedom of movement and residence in the territory of all Member States,
- active and passive voting rights in European parliamentary elections and in local elections in another Member State, in accordance with that Member State’s law,
- the right to the diplomatic and consular protection of any Member State which is equal to the protection provided to own citizens when present in a third country where the Republic of Croatia has no diplomatic-consular representation,
- the right to submit petitions to the European Parliament, complaints to the European Ombudsman and the right to apply to European Union institutions and advisory bodies in the Further, the 2010 Constitutional amendment was necessary in order to satisfy certain EU membership requirements, and a number of constitutional provisions were amended for this purpose.¹⁶ Finally, the crucial amendment, which facilitated if not enabled Croatian accession to the EU, was the rule on the requirement of a referendum which had to take place as a necessary part of the accession procedure. Namely, for the positive outcome of a referendum, Art. 141 of the pre-2010 version of the Constitution, as the legal basis of accession,¹⁷ required the majority vote of all voters in Croatia. This strict rule was toned down in order to prevent the possible failure of the referendum. The wording ‘the majority vote of all voters in the state’ was thus changed to ‘the majority vote of all voters voting in the referendum’. The low turnout of only about 44% of eligible voters in Croatia at the referendum which took place on 22 January 2012 testified to the fact that the fear of not fulfilling the strict referendum requirement contained in the then Art. 141 had been reasonable. Out of all voters who took part in the referendum, more than 66% voted in favour of accession, which sufficed for a positive outcome.

1.2.2 The 2010 constitutional amendment followed the stipulated amendment procedure. Generally, amendments to the Croatian Constitution may be proposed by a minimum of one-fifth of the members of the Croatian Parliament, the Croatian President or the Croatian Government.¹⁸ Accordingly, on 1 October 2009 the Croatian Government proposed the 2010 constitutional amendment. Based on this proposal and the proposal submitted by members of the Croatian Parliament on 16 October 2009, on 30 April 2010 the Croatian Parliament adopted the Decision on the Commencement of the Amendment of the Constitution of the Republic of Croatia.¹⁹ Based on Art. 148(1) of the Constitution, such a decision must be Croatian language, as well as in all the other official languages of the European Union, and to receive a reply in the same language.

All rights shall be exercised in compliance with the conditions and limitations laid down in the founding treaties of the European Union and the measures undertaken pursuant to such treaties.

In the Republic of Croatia, all rights guaranteed by the European Union acquis communautaire shall be enjoyed by all citizens of the European Union.’

¹⁶ Amendments included the provisions on the position of the Croatian National Bank (Art. 53) and the State Audit Office (Art. 54), as well as the abandoning of the previous rule of a complete ban on extradition of Croatian nationals which now became possible in order to comply with the European Arrest Warrant (Art. 9).

¹⁷ There was no consensus on the question whether Croatian accession should take place on the basis of Art. 141 of the pre-2010 version of the Constitution (which regulated Croatia’s association in and dissociation from international alliances with other states) or based on the general provision of Art. 139 of the pre-2010 version of the Constitution (which regulated the conclusion of international treaties and which, together with the then Art. 86, contained a more lenient referendum rule requiring a majority vote of all voters who took part in the referendum). Finally, Art. 141 was taken as the legal basis for accession. For the discussion on possible constitutional bases for EU accession, see Rodin, supra n. 11; Čapeta 2008, pp. 1–3.

¹⁸ Article 147 of the Constitution (Art. 142 of the pre-2010 version of the Constitution).

¹⁹ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 56/10.

adopted by the majority of all Members of Parliament.²⁰ The decision to amend the Constitution has to be made by a two-thirds majority of all deputies.²¹ Within the framework of the 2010 constitutional amendment, such a decision was made on 16 June 2010, whereby 133 deputies voted for the amendment, four deputies voted against it and one abstained.

1.2.3 The Republic of Croatia is a rather young state, as its establishment as a sovereign and independent state dates back to 25 June 1991 when the Croatian Parliament passed a Constitutional Decision on the Sovereignty and Independence of Croatia²² – thus initiating the proceedings of dissociation from the other republics and from the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia – and the Declaration on the Establishment of the Sovereign and Independent Republic of Croatia.²³ On 22 December 1990, the Croatian Parliament passed the Constitution of the Republic of Croatia, which has undergone several revisions and amendments, and is still in force today.²⁴ The first amendment took place in 1997,²⁵ the second one in 2000²⁶ and the third in 2001.²⁷ The fourth amendment took place in 2010 and, as described in Sect. 1.2.1, its motif was the enablement and facilitation of EU accession.²⁸

The last constitutional amendment to date took place in 2013²⁹ as the result of a controversial national referendum on the inclusion in the Constitution of the definition of marriage as a union between a woman and a man. Namely, based on Art. 87(3) of the Constitution, the Croatian Parliament ‘shall call referendums’ on proposals to amend the Constitution, a bill or any such other issue as may fall within its purview ‘when so requested by ten percent of the total electorate of the Republic of Croatia’. Following a successful petition of the conservative, catholic initiative ‘In the name of the family’, which managed to collect the signatures of more than 10% of the eligible voters in Croatia, a referendum was held on 1 December 2013. The turnout was rather low, as only a little bit less than 38% of eligible voters took part in the referendum. However, the 2010 constitutional amendment had changed the referendum threshold from ‘the majority of all voters in Croatia’ to ‘the majority of all voters in the referendum’, for the purpose of securing Croatian accession to the EU. This constitutional amendment indirectly enabled a positive outcome in the 2013 referendum, as out of those who voted, 65% supported the amendment, which consequently led to the adoption of the 2013

²⁰ Article 143(1) of the pre-2010 version of the Constitution.

²¹ Article 149 of the Constitution (Art. 144 of the pre-2010 version of the Constitution).

²² Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 31/91.

²³ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 31/91.

²⁴ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 56/90.

²⁵ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 135/97.

²⁶ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 113/2000.

²⁷ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 28/2001.

²⁸ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 76/2010.

²⁹ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 5/2014.

constitutional amendment. For this reason the 2010 lowering of the referendum threshold, which had been passed in order to ensure Croatian accession to the EU, directly enabled and led to the 2013 constitutional amendment.³⁰

1.2.4 As explained previously, the EU-related amendment proposals did materialise in practice. There are currently no provisions of the Constitution that are considered to be in need of amendment in view of EU membership.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The transfer or delegation of powers to the EU Croatia is a monist state, based on Art. 141 of its Constitution.

Further, Art. 143(2) of the Croatian Constitution provides:

Pursuant to Articles 140 and 141 of the Constitution, the Republic of Croatia shall confer upon the institutions of the European Union the powers necessary for the enjoyment of rights and fulfilment of obligations ensuing from membership.

The supremacy and direct effect of EU law Article 145 of the Constitution, entitled ‘European Union law’, is the most important Constitutional provision in terms of application of EU law in the national legal order. It opens the Croatian legal order to EU law. It provides:

The exercise of the rights ensuing from the European Union acquis communautaire shall be made equal to the exercise of rights under Croatian law.

All the legal acts and decisions accepted by the Republic of Croatia in European Union institutions shall be applied in the Republic of Croatia in accordance with the European Union acquis communautaire.

Croatian courts shall protect subjective rights based on the European Union acquis communautaire.

Governmental agencies, bodies of local and regional self-government and legal persons vested with public authority shall apply European Union law directly.

Paragraph 1 provides for the principle of equivalent legal protection based on EU law and national law. Paragraph 2, which states that EU legal acts have to be applied ‘in accordance with the acquis communautaire’, indirectly lays down the application of the principles of EU law such as supremacy, direct and indirect effect. Paragraph 3 provides for the principle of direct effect of EU law and paragraph 4 enables administrative direct effect, meaning that not only national courts but also national administrative bodies have to apply EU law.

³⁰ For an analysis and a critique of the Croatia constitutional referendum defining marriage as a union between a man and a woman, see Orsolic Dalessio T. (2014, January 23) The Interplay of Direct and Indirect Democracy at Work: Croatia’s Battle Over the Rights of Same-Sex Couples. Jurist forum. <http://jurist.org/forum/2014/01/tina-dalessio-croatia-referendum.php>.

Indeed, in a recent judgment the Croatian Supreme Court made it clear that EU law forms part of the Croatian legal order and ‘must be applied, moreover it is superior to national law’. This duty to apply EU law concerns ‘all legal relationships that fall within the scope of application of European Union law, and that [take] place after the accession of the Republic of Croatia into the European Union’.³¹

However, all these principles and rules exist based on the interpretations of EU law provided by the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU). For this reason Art. 145 of the Constitution can be understood as being of a declaratory and not of a constitutive nature.

1.3.2 In the past almost two years following the Croatian accession to the EU and the 2013 Constitutional amendment, there have been only two judgments in which the Constitutional Court has referred to Art. 145 of the Croatian Constitution.³² However, the Court did so only in stating that it was not necessary to examine whether the issue disputed in the case complies with Art. 145 of the Constitution, due to the fact that the Constitution is, by its legal nature, supreme to EU law.³³ One could infer two conclusions based on this statement. First, if an issue is contrary to the Croatian Constitution, there is no need to address its compliance with EU law, as the Constitution is supreme to EU law. On the other hand, if an issue complies with the Croatian Constitution, it will be admissible based on the Constitution, regardless of whether the same conclusion would be reached based on EU law. In the latter example, the case might undergo an analysis of compliance with EU law, but the outcome of the compliance analysis would be irrelevant in the end due to the fact that compliance with the Croatian Constitution had already been established and the Constitution is supreme to EU law.

1.3.3 See the answers to questions 1.2.1, 1.3.1 and 1.3.2.

1.3.4 See the answers to questions 1.2.1, 1.3.1 and 1.3.2.

³¹ Revt 249/14-2, decision of 9 April 2015.

³² The numbering provided by the Constitutional Court is different (Art. 141c) from the one provided in the Official Gazette, which can create misunderstandings and errors. Thus, the numbering of the newly inserted articles, as provided in the Official Gazette 85/10 (Art. 143–146) does not match the numbering provided in the version published on the website and cited in the judgments of the Constitutional Court (Art. 141a–141c).

³³ Paragraph 46 of Judgment U-VIIR-1159/2015, 8 April 2015, of the Croatian Constitutional Court on the application by the Croatian Parliament to the Constitutional Court to determine whether the question proposed to be put at the national referendum on outsourcing is in conformity with the Constitution; Para. 60 of Judgment U-VIIR-1158/2015, 21 April 2015, of the Croatian Constitutional Court on the application by the Croatian Parliament to the Constitutional Court to determine whether the question proposed to be put at the national referendum on giving highways in concession is in conformity with the Constitution.

As regards EU-friendly interpretation, the previously cited Art. 145(2) of the Croatian Constitution implies the duty to apply basic EU law principles in Croatia, including the indirect or interpretative effect of EU law. Nevertheless, there have not yet been many judgments in which Croatian courts have interpreted Croatian law in light of EU law. However, a 2014 order of the Croatian Supreme Court needs to be singled out, also due to its importance and the politically controversial context of the case, which was also based on the *Pupino*³⁴ judgment. In its order the Supreme Court stated:

... for the achievement of the aims and the respect for the principles expressed by EU law, national courts are obliged to apply national law in light of the letter and spirit of EU provisions. This means that national law must in practice be interpreted as far as possible in light of the wording and purpose of the relevant framework decisions and directives, in order to thus achieve the result sought by those framework decisions and directives ... (as expressly stated in the judgment of the ECJ in Case 105/03 P of 16 June 2005). By acceding to the EU, the Republic of Croatia has also taken on the duty to act in such a way.³⁵

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The involvement of the Croatian Parliament in EU affairs is stipulated both by the Croatian Constitution and the Act on Cooperation of the Croatian Parliament and the Government of the Republic of Croatia.³⁶ Most importantly, the European Affairs Committee monitors the activities of the European Parliament in European affairs, adopts the Work Programme for considering the positions of the Republic of Croatia, and considers EU documents and the positions of Croatia on EU documents, with the authority to adopt conclusions thereon.³⁷

The European Affairs Committee of the Croatian Parliament is in charge of conducting parliamentary scrutiny and subsidiarity checks, but the process may be initiated by any Member of Parliament, parliamentary committee, parliamentary party group or the Government. In 2014 the European Affairs Committee issued one reasoned opinion in the context of a national parliamentary subsidiarity check procedure. In this reasoned opinion, issued on 6 October 2014, the Committee considered that the Proposal for a Directive amending Directives 2008/98/EC on waste, 94/62/EC on packaging and packaging waste, 1999/31/EC on the landfill of waste, 2000/53/EC on end-of-life vehicles, 2006/66/EC on batteries and accumulators and waste batteries and accumulators, and 2012/19/EU on waste electrical

³⁴ Case C-105/03 Pupino [2005] ECR I-05285.

³⁵ Order of the Supreme Court Kž-eun 5/14-4 of 6 March 2014.

³⁶ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 81/13.

³⁷ See the Report of the work of the European Affairs Committee for 2014. <http://www.sabor.hr/fgs.axd?id=42829>.

and electronic equipment,³⁸ did not comply with the principle of subsidiarity.³⁹ Both the European Affairs Committee and the Environmental Protection Committee considered that the Proposal did not take into consideration the existing differences among national systems of waste management which prejudiced a balanced development of the European regions. The reasoned opinion was issued within the required 8-week period from the date of the publication of the proposal. However, there were not a sufficient number of reasoned opinions to initiate the ‘yellow card’ procedure, as only the Austrian, Croatian and Czech parliaments issued reasoned opinions. However, the Juncker Commission has since withdrawn the Proposal.⁴⁰

Further, as part of the ‘political dialogue’, the Croatian Parliament sent three opinions to the European Commission in 2014 and received the Commission’s responses. The first one related to the application of the principle of subsidiarity in the legislative procedure, the second opinion was on the Proposal of a Regulation on the establishment of the European public prosecutor’s office,⁴¹ and the third concerned the Proposal of a Regulation amending Regulation 1308/2013 and Regulation 1306/2013 as regards the aid scheme for the supply of fruit and vegetables, bananas and milk in the educational establishments.⁴²

Apart from its role in the subsidiarity procedure and the ‘political dialogue’, the European Affairs Committee composes an annual parliamentary Work Programme which contains the list of EU acts that are to be scrutinised. The specialised parliamentary committees may propose draft acts from their area of responsibility to be included in the Work Programme. When a draft act, together with the corresponding Position of the Republic of Croatia, is delivered to the European Parliament, the relevant specialised committees may discuss them and send their opinions to the European Affairs Committee which may, by a majority of votes of its members, draw a Conclusion on the Position of the Republic of Croatia, on which the Government must base its actions in the EU institutions. So far, the Committee has not used this competence in practice.

1.4.2 Two of the referendums that have been held in Croatia have been directly or indirectly linked to Croatian accession to the EU. The first took place on 22 January 2012 and was part of the Croatian accession process. As explained in the answer to question 1.2.1, due to what proved to be a justified fear of a low turnout, the wording of the Constitutional provision previously requiring ‘the majority vote of all voters in the state’ had been amended to ‘the majority vote of all voters in the referendum’, which enabled a positive outcome of the accession referendum, despite the low turnout.

³⁸ COM(2014) 397 final.

³⁹ Reasoned opinion of the Croatian Parliament on COM (2014)397. <http://www.ipex.eu/IPEXL-WEB/dossier/files/download/082dbcc548cd77e10148e4f3bf0f181a.do>.

⁴⁰ Commission response. <http://www.ipex.eu/IPEXL-WEB/dossier/files/download/082dbcc54d4a5c3c014d4cc47c6b0237.do>.

⁴¹ COM(2013) 534 final.

⁴² COM(2014) 32 final.

The second referendum, discussed in the answer to question 1.2.3, on the inclusion in the Constitution of the definition of marriage as a union between a woman and a man, took place in 2013 and, even though it was not directly related to Croatian membership in the EU, its positive outcome was a direct consequence of the 2010 Constitutional amendment which changed the previously high Constitutional referendum threshold of ‘the majority of all voters in Croatia’ to ‘the majority of all voters in the referendum’. This 2010 Constitutional amendment of the referendum threshold, which was done in the context of securing Croatian accession to the EU, thus enabled a completely different Constitutional amendment not linked to EU membership.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.3 See the answer to question 1.2.1. As explained previously, the Croatian Constitution has a number of EU amendments. These are fairly extensive, and they were partly based on input from a working group of academics.⁴³

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 As was seen in Sect. 1.1.2, the Constitution regulates, in a detailed way, human rights and fundamental freedoms in title III, which encompasses 57 articles. Proportionality is a general requirement for governmental action limiting individual rights and freedoms (Art. 16). A specific rule prohibits the retroactive application of laws and other measures, except, as far as laws are concerned, in exceptional circumstances (Art. 90). More broadly, Art. 3 of the Constitution provides that ‘freedom, equal rights, national and gender equality, peace-making, social justice, respect for human rights, inviolability of ownership, conservation of nature and the environment, the rule of law and a democratic multiparty system are the highest values of the constitutional order of the Republic of Croatia’. Article 3 of the Constitution has been applied by the Constitutional Court (CC) on a number of occasions.

In addition, the Constitution contains specific and relatively detailed chapters on civil and political rights and economic, social and cultural rights.

All constitutional provisions, including the ones cited above, are in principle enforceable in courts. There is no doctrine according to which certain parts of the ⁴³ See Smerdel 2010, p. 4. See also Rodin 2007 and Rodin 2010.

Constitution are off limits to (some) courts. Nevertheless, the Constitution is almost never explicitly relied upon in adjudication, except in the practice of the Constitutional Court. There are two possible reasons for this. First, like in some other European legal systems, Croatian courts cannot disapply legislation or find norms unconstitutional in an individual case – if a court considers the legal norms in question to run counter to the Constitution, it must refer the case to the Constitutional Court.⁴⁴ The second reason is the legal culture: adjudication is largely seen as the application of laws. The Constitution, but also international agreements, case law, other sources of law as well as non-binding materials such as scholarly works, are very rarely used by ordinary courts, and have only been used by the Supreme Court in a few exceptional instances. In this respect, there is a strong divide between the Constitutional Court and other courts.

2.1.2 Article 16 of the Constitution provides:

Freedoms and rights may only be curtailed by law in order to protect the freedoms and rights of others, the legal order, and public morals and health. Any restriction of freedoms or rights shall be proportionate to the nature of the need to do so in each individual case.

2.1.3 Article 3 of the Constitution has been referred to above in Sect. 2.1.1. Article 3 and the principle of the rule of law have been relied upon by the Constitutional Court to impose general requirements on the legislator. Notably, the Constitutional Court has frequently pointed out that the legislator is authorised to independently regulate economic, legal and political relationships, but is required to respect the requirements imposed by the Constitution, and in particular those that ‘arise from the principle of the rule of law’ and the principle of legal certainty. Thus, the notion of the rule of law imposes general requirements on the legislator.⁴⁵

Some decisions of the Constitutional Court have fleshed out this notion. For example, the rule of law requires that laws are ‘general and equal for all’, that their consequences must be foreseeable by the addressees and also that they must conform to the legitimate expectations of the parties in each specific case to which they are applied.⁴⁶ This concerns not only formal legality and constitutionality, but controls substantive as well as procedural aspects,⁴⁷ and requires laws to be sufficiently determinate.⁴⁸ The separation of powers is an aspect of the rule of law, meaning that the legislator cannot intrude into the constitutionally defined powers and duties of the ‘highest State authorities’, such as the State Council for the Judiciary, the body in charge of judicial appointments.⁴⁹ The rule of law is also connected to the rule allowing only for the exceptional retroactivity of laws as

⁴⁴ Constitutional Act on the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Croatia ('Narodne novine' 49/02), Art. 37.

⁴⁵ U-I-659/1994 et al, 15 March 2000, para. 10.

⁴⁶ Ibid., para. 11.1.

⁴⁷ Ibid., para. 11.

⁴⁸ Ibid., para. 19.2.

⁴⁹ Ibid., paras. 12–13.

outlined above.⁵⁰ The requirements of the rule of law are thus said to be especially strict in relation to the transitional provisions of laws (especially those which regulate the retroactive application of such laws), which ‘best show the relationship of the legislator to constitutionally protected values and its respect for constitutional guarantees’.⁵¹ In that sense, the rule of law may even prevent the legislator from limiting or eliminating previously recognised subjective rights, insofar as such restrictions are not justified by a legitimate aim in the public interest.⁵²

The judgments of the ECtHR and, occasionally, of the CJEU, have been used in support of the Constitutional Court’s conclusions in this respect. For example, the Court cited the ECtHR judgment *Kozlica v. Croatia*⁵³ and the CJEU judgment *Tsapalos*⁵⁴ to support the general point that procedural rules in new legislation can be applied immediately to pending proceedings.⁵⁵ The requirement that laws must be available, sufficiently precise and foreseeable, and that any discretionary powers given to State authorities must be circumscribed, was supported by invoking the ECtHR rulings in Sunday Times and Silver and Others.⁵⁶

The right of access to courts is an aspect of what the Constitutional Court calls the ‘right to a court’, and is governed by Art. 29 of the Constitution, frequently cited alongside Art. 6 of the ECHR. Article 29 provides in its introductory clause that ‘[e] veryone shall be entitled to have his or her rights and obligations, or suspicion or accusation of a criminal offence decided upon fairly before a legally established, independent and impartial court within a reasonable period’. The analysis is usually conducted under this provision and not under a general principle of the ‘rule of law’, but the two are connected. The Court has pointed out that the ‘principle according to which recourse to a court must be possible is one of the generally recognised basic principles of law’.⁵⁷

Finally, the Constitution contains a general proportionality rule (Art. 16) according to which ‘freedoms and rights may only be curtailed by law in order to protect the freedoms and rights of others, the legal order, and public morals and ⁵⁰ U-I-4113/2008 et al, 12 August 2014, para. 22.

⁵¹ Ibid., para. 38.

⁵² Ibid., para. 64, ‘When [it] authorises the Croatian Parliament to directly and independently decide on the regulation of economic, legal and political relations in the Republic of Croatia “in accordance with the Constitution and laws”, the Constitution lays down a requirement that those “decisions” must respect basic constitutional values and take account of protected constitutional goods. In that sense, generally speaking, whenever it limits or eliminates previously recognised rights the legislator must have a legitimate aim in the public interest capable of justifying such a measure, and must also respect other requirements arising from the principle of the rule of law, legal certainty and legal predictability that were not raised when those rights were recognised.’

⁵³ Kozlica v. Croatia, no. 29182/03, 2 November 2006.

⁵⁴ Joined cases C-361/02 and C-362/02 Tsapalos and Diamantakis [2004] ECR I-06405 (case number incorrectly cited as Joined cases C-121/91 and C-122/91, another judgment which makes a similar statement).

⁵⁵ U-I-663/2011, 15 October 2014.

⁵⁶ U-I-659/1994 et al, 15 March 2000, para. 19.5.

⁵⁷ U-III/760/2014, 13 November 2014, para. 7.1.

health' (emphasis added), and Art. 31 provides that '[n]o one may be punished for an act which, prior to its commission, was not defined as a punishable offence by domestic or international law, nor may such individual be sentenced to a penalty which was not then defined by law'. Article 90 provides for the publication of 'laws and other regulations of government bodies' in the official journal and requires that ordinances of bodies vested with public authority 'be published in an accessible manner, in compliance with law' before their entry into force. Laws can enter into force no earlier than the eighth day after publication, except in exceptionally justified cases. See also the answer to question 2.5.1 below.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 As of yet, there do not seem to be any examples of a Croatian court addressing a conflict between the EU fundamental freedoms and constitutional rights. For that matter, the rapporteurs are not aware of any high-profile conflicts between the EU free movement rules and Croatian law adjudicated before the Croatian courts.

The approach of the Constitutional Court to the adjudication of national constitutional rights may, however, be relevant. For example, Art. 50(2) of the Constitution provides that '[f]ree enterprise and property rights may be exceptionally restricted by law for the purposes of protecting the interests and security of the Republic of Croatia, nature and the human environment and human health'. In reviewing the constitutionality of laws in this respect, the Constitutional Court has loosely followed the approach of the ECtHR. In a recent decision, it applied a test containing the following questions: (1) does the provision at issue interfere in addressees' property rights?; (2) does it have a legitimate aim?; (3) is it proportionate to the legitimate aim?; (4) does it impose an excessive burden to its addressees?; (5) does it have discriminatory effects?⁵⁸

In the majority of cases, the Constitutional Court tends to defer to legislative choices on issues related to freedom of entrepreneurship and property rights, at least as long as such measures are not discriminatory and do not violate rule of law guarantees such as predictability. One exception is a 2009 decision declaring certain provisions of the Retail Act on Sunday Trading to be unconstitutional.⁵⁹ First, the ban on Sunday trading with the aim of protecting workers failed the proportionality test, because the legislator cannot rely on the ineffective application of general labour law rules providing for minimum weekly rest as an argument for a specific working time regulation in retail trade. In addition, the detailed exemptions for certain categories of shops were held to violate Art. 49 of the Constitution (the 'equal legal status' of entrepreneurs on the market). The bar seems to have been set quite high here: the Court essentially found that the rules on exceptions were too detailed ('excessive normativism' in the Court's terms) which is inappropriate from the point of view of freedom of entrepreneurship, and that they violate Art. 49 of the Constitution because it could not be 'ruled out beyond any doubt' that the law resulted in the unequal treatment of different groups of traders.⁶⁰

⁵⁸ U-I-381/2014 et al, 12 June 2014.

⁵⁹ U-I/642/2009, 9 July 2009.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

The relevant provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of Croatia are:

Article 22

Human liberty and personality shall be inviolable.

No one shall be deprived of liberty, nor may such liberty be restricted, except when specified by law, upon which a court shall decide.

Article 24

No one may be arrested or detained without a written court order grounded in law. Such an order has to be read and presented to the person placed under arrest at the moment of said arrest.

The police authorities may arrest a person without a warrant when there is reasonable suspicion that such person has perpetrated a grave criminal offence as defined by law. Such person shall be promptly informed, in understandable terms, of the reasons for arrest and of his/her rights as stipulated by law.

Any person arrested or detained shall have the right to appeal before a court, which must forthwith decide on the legality of the arrest.

Article 25

...

Whosoever is detained and indicted of a criminal offence shall have the right to be brought before a court within the minimum time specified by law and to be acquitted or convicted within the statutory term.

A detainee may be released on bail to defend him-/herself.

Whosoever is illegally deprived of liberty or convicted shall, in compliance with law, be entitled to indemnification and a public apology.

Article 28

Everyone is presumed innocent and may not be held guilty of a criminal offence until such guilt is proven by a binding court judgment.

⁶⁰ Ibid., para. 11.2.

Article 29

Everyone shall be entitled have his or her rights and obligations, or suspicion or accusation of a criminal offence decided upon fairly before a legally established, independent and impartial court within a reasonable period.

...

Article 31

No one may be punished for an act which, prior to its commission, was not defined as a punishable offence by domestic or international law, nor may such individual be sentenced to a penalty which was not then defined by law.

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 In Croatia, criminal proceedings commence with the establishment of reasonable suspicion, which is a higher level of suspicion based on evidence and not only on indicia. Also, detention can be ordered only if there is reasonable suspicion that a person has committed a crime. Thus, in order to commence criminal proceedings or to order detention, it is necessary that a prosecutor and/or a judge verify on the basis of collected evidence that there is reasonable suspicion. The requirement of establishing reasonable suspicion based on evidence emanates from the presumption of innocence and protects the citizen from coercive state powers. The ECtHR has established that '[h]aving a 'reasonable suspicion' presupposes the existence of facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the person concerned may have committed the offence'.⁶¹

The problem with the presumption of innocence in the context of a European Arrest Warrant (EAW) surrender is that there is a possibility that the issuing state does not require the establishment of reasonable suspicion based on evidence for conducting a criminal prosecution but rather a lower level of suspicion and, secondly, that the executing state might not assess whether there is evidence that proves the existence of reasonable suspicion. Therefore, it is possible that a person could be arrested in order to be surrendered to another state without reasonable suspicion being established either in the issuing state or in the executing state. The comparative research shows that EU states have different thresholds for the application of arrest and detention as well as for the commencement of criminal proceedings. Also, the notion of the judicial authority empowered to issue an EAW is not interpreted in all Member States as being a judge, rather in some Member States this may be the prosecuting authority, administrative authority, ministry of justice or police. Therefore, it can be said that suspects in EAW proceedings are not granted the same level of protection emanating from the presumption of innocence as suspects in national criminal proceedings or in traditional extradition proceedings.

⁶¹ Stepuleac v. Moldova, no. 8207/06, § 68, 6 November 2007.

This issue has not been raised in the national case law or before the Constitutional Court.

2.3.1.2 According to the Croatian Law on the European Arrest Warrant,⁶² a hearing in front of a court panel of three judges is obligatory. The suspected person and his/her defence counsel have to be invited to this hearing. The appellate courts have on several occasions vacated first instance decisions due to a substantial violation of procedural rules in cases where the suspected person or his/her defence lawyer were not summoned or present at the hearing.⁶³ However, the Law envisages that the defence may present evidence but only related to the grounds for refusal to surrender prescribed by law. In many cases the defence has tried to convince the court that the suspect is innocent and has corroborated its claims with evidence. Nevertheless, the courts have continuously refused to assess the existence of reasonable suspicion. The courts have taken the following standpoint:

The European arrest warrant is an instrument of mutual judicial cooperation between the Member States of the European Union that is based on the principles of mutual recognition between Member States and effective cooperation, and contains a legal obligation and moral responsibility of the national courts of the Member State of execution to grant the surrender of the person requested, unless there are the few and expressly prescribed grounds for refusal to surrender (listed in Arts. 20 and 21 ZPSKS-EU). The existence of reasonable suspicion that the person sought committed the offence for which the surrender is requested is not among these grounds, and the court of the state of execution is not even entitled to question whether there is such a probability of committing a crime by the person sought, because it automatically derives from the fact that a European arrest warrant was issued against him/her.⁶⁴

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

Judicial abolishment of prescription of criminal prosecution justified by the abolition of the double criminality requirement

2.3.2.1 The Croatian judicial interpretation of provisions regarding the surrender of citizens for the 32 categories of crimes for which the rule of double criminality has been abolished, is to my knowledge original in the European judicial space and has subjected Croatian citizens to unequal treatment in comparison with other EU citizens. It was preceded by a legislative manoeuvre by the Croatian Parliament related to the implementation of the EAW immediately prior to Croatian EU accession.

⁶² Act on Judicial Cooperation in Criminal Matters with the EU Member States (OG 91/10, 81/13, 124/13).

⁶³ E.g. VSRH, Kž-eun 6/13-4, 9 August 2013; VSRH, Kž-eun 13/13-4 21, October 2013.

⁶⁴ VSRH, Kž-eun 17/14-4.

In Croatia the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant (FD EAW) was implemented by the Act on Judicial Cooperation in Criminal Matters with the EU Member States (AJCEU) adopted in July 2010 during the accession negotiations. Although the Act was adopted correctly from the perspective of EU law, the priority of the Croatian legislator was to fulfil a benchmark for closing Chapter 23 ‘Justice, freedom and security’ of the acquis communautaire and not to genuinely implement the EAW in practice. On 28 June 2013, three days before accession, the Croatian Parliament passed the extensive amendment of the AJCEU that established a new institutional and procedural framework for cooperation with EU Member States in criminal matters. Although this was a major problem for the Croatian courts and prosecutors who had to implement the new law in three days after it was passed, domestic and European political and public attention was focused on two amended provisions that allegedly violated EU law. One was the introduction of a temporal limitation on the EAW, which prevented authorities from surrendering anyone suspected of a crime committed before 7 August 2002. Under severe criticism and the threat of financial sanctions from the European Commission, the temporal limitation was removed on 1 January 2015. The second critical change was the transformation of the statute of limitations from a ground for optional non-execution of EAW into a ground for mandatory non-execution. The AJCEU expressly prescribes that the Court shall refuse an EAW if under domestic law the limitation period⁶⁵ for criminal prosecution or the enforcement of criminal sanctions has expired, and the act falls within Croatian jurisdiction under its own criminal law (Art. 20(2.7)). This amendment, which was exposed to criticism in Croatia but not from abroad, resulted in the infamous interpretation of the Croatian courts, which abolished the rule that the statute of limitations for criminal prosecution can bar the surrender of a person for an offence for which the rule on double criminality does not apply.

The Croatian Supreme Court has introduced the rule that in cases where the verification of double criminality is excluded (Art. 2(2) FD EAW), the verification of the statute of limitations is also excluded: ‘When executing an EAW, the court shall not apply domestic legal provisions regarding the statute of limitations for criminal prosecution, because the court does not verify double criminality’.⁶⁶ The explanation was that in order to determine whether there is a statute of limitations for the criminal offence in the executing state, it is necessary to establish jurisdiction or to determine which punishable criminal offence the act qualifies as according to the criminal law of the executing state. This means that double criminality would have to be verified, as ‘the statute of limitation is organically linked to the prescribed punishment for a criminal offence’ and therefore ‘the statute of limitations is an integral part of the concept of double criminality'.⁶⁷ This interpretation was also challenged in the Constitutional Court, which held that the surrender procedure is not a criminal procedure, but rather a sui generis judicial proceeding the aim of which is to enable criminal prosecution and not to decide on the guilt of the suspect. Therefore, the scope of potential constitutional complaints is very narrow and the Constitutional Court 'is not allowed to question the interpretations of domestic courts regarding domestic law and its application in concrete cases of surrender on the basis of an EAW, unless reasons are presented indicating that the assessment of the courts in a concrete case was "flagrantly and obviously arbitrary"'.⁶⁸

⁶⁵ The limitation periods are prescribed by the statutes of limitations, which set the maximum time period after the commission of an offence that criminal prosecution may be initiated or continued or that a criminal sanction can be enforced after the rendering of a final judgment.

⁶⁶ Kž-eun 11/13, 20 September 2013.

It is generally accepted in international and European law as well as in theory on mutual legal assistance that double criminality requires that the act constitute an offence under the law of both states (requesting and executing). Therefore, for determining whether the rule on double criminality permits extradition or surrender, it is enough to find the offence with the constituent elements that correspond to the behaviour which is criminalised in another state. In the theory on international legal assistance, a double criminality requirement is considered to be a substantive requirement while a statute of limitations is a procedural requirement for extradition. They are therefore different legal requirements of which the content is neither overlapping nor mutually exclusive, and thus both requirements have to be checked separately. This was also the interpretation of the Croatian courts in extradition procedures before the implementation of the EAW.⁶⁹ However, the Croatian Supreme Court has rightly pointed out that in order to find out whether the prosecution is time-barred, the executing state has to establish which offence according to its criminal law is relevant, for which prosecution could be barred, and this procedure presumes the verification of double criminality. The further question for EU law-makers is that if the executing state has to check the rule of double criminality in order to verify the statute of limitations in any case, why was the verification of double criminality abolished in the EAW procedure?

The generally accepted public opinion (from supporters as well as from critics) is that the interpretation of the Croatian courts was motivated by a desire to bypass the newly introduced implementing law, which made the statute of limitations for criminal prosecution a ground for mandatory non-execution. It is alleged that the aim was to enable the surrender of Josip Perković, a former Yugoslav and Croatian intelligence agent suspected of participating in the organisation of the murder of Stjepan Đureković, a Croatian emigrant in Germany, in Munich in 1983, for which Germany had issued an EAW.⁷⁰ However, in the meantime, this judicial interpretation has become established case law and e.g. it resulted in the recent surrender

⁶⁷ VSRH, Kž-eun 2/14-5, 17 January 2014; Kž-eun 8/14-4, 7 February 2014.

⁶⁸ U-III-351/2014, 24 January 2014.

⁶⁹ VSRH II-8 Kr-268/01-3, 16 May 2001; I KT-689/03-3, 29 July 2003.

⁷⁰ Josip Perković was surrendered to German authorities on 24 January 2014, and the criminal trial against him has commenced in October 2014.

of a person for acts of theft that were committed from 1985 to 1987, i.e. almost 30 years ago.⁷¹

This development in Croatia only deepened the further violation of the fundamental rights to legal security and equality of EU citizens that was prompted by the different implementation of the grounds for mandatory and optional non-execution of the EAW in the EU Member States. Already in 2007, the European Commission claimed that one of the weakest points in the implementation of the EAW was the provision on optional grounds for refusal. It was described as ‘a patchwork which is contrary to the Framework Decision’.⁷² Initially, the intention of the FD EAW was that the grounds for optional non-execution should be determined by judges and not the national legislator, and it was considered to be mistake if a Member State made a ground for optional refusal mandatory.⁷³ However, the reality is that 15 states have introduced the statute of limitations as a ground for mandatory non-execution of an EAW (Austria, Belgium, Czech Republic, Finland, France, Greece, Italy, Lithuania, Hungary, Malta, Netherlands, Germany, Slovenia, Slovakia, Sweden), and 12 states have introduced the statute of limitations as a ground for optional non-execution of an EAW (Bulgaria, Cyprus, Denmark, Estonia, Ireland, Latvia, Luxembourg, Poland, Portugal, Romania, Spain, United Kingdom).

Such varied implementation of the EAW has been accepted by the European Court of Justice in its Gasparini and Wolzenburg decisions. In the Gasparini decision, the Court stated:

Article 4(4) of the framework decision, ..., permits the executing judicial authority to refuse to execute a European arrest warrant inter alia where the criminal prosecution of the requested person is time-barred according to the law of the executing Member State and the acts fall within the jurisdiction of that State under its own criminal law. In order for that power to be exercised, a judgment whose basis is that a prosecution is time-barred does not have to exist.⁷⁴

In the Wolzenburg judgment, the Court went even further and held that when implementing grounds for optional non-execution of an EAW as mandatory or ‘[w]hen implementing Art. 4 of the Framework Decision..., the Member States have, of necessity, a certain margin of discretion’.⁷⁵

The different implementation and interpretation of grounds for non-execution of an EAW have resulted in the utterly unequal treatment of EU citizens depending on which state is executing an EAW. Germany and Croatia exemplify the two extremes. Croatia surrenders citizens in EAW proceedings for the 32 categories of ⁷¹ VSRH, Kž-eun 20/14-6, 15 April 2014.

⁷² Annex to the Report from the Commission on the implementation since 2005 of the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States [COM(2007) 407 final], p. 11.

⁷³ See EU Council report on the practical application of the European Arrest Warrant and corresponding surrender procedures between member states, 28 May 2009, 8302/4/09 REV 4, pp. 13–14.

⁷⁴ Case C-467/04 Gasparini and others [2006] ECR I-09199, para. 31.

⁷⁵ Case C-123/08 Wolzenburg [2009] ECR I-09621, para. 61.

offences without verifying double criminality or the statute of limitations. In Germany, the statute of limitations is a ground for mandatory non-execution, and the German Constitutional Court, Federal Court of Justice and appeal courts unitedly agreed that a person shall not be surrendered, notwithstanding whether he/she is a German citizen,⁷⁶ if prosecution is time-barred according to German law. Certainly the most famous decisions of the German courts not to extradite a person because of the statute of limitations is the refusal to extradite Sören Kama, a member of the Danish SS unit and a Dane who acquired German citizenship in 1956. Denmark had asked for his surrender on the basis of a European arrest warrant for the murder of a number of journalists in Copenhagen in 1943. In 2007, the appeals court in Munich decided that the surrender did not relate to a case of qualified murder (Mord), which is not subject to a statute of limitations, but rather to a case of ordinary manslaughter (Totschlag) and that therefore the prosecution was time-barred.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 The Croatian rapporteur for the questionnaire on the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice for the FIDE XXV Congress in 2012 stated that one of the major threats to defence rights in criminal proceedings arising from EU law was introduced by the 2009 Amendment of the FD EAW. According to the rapporteur, it is absurd to say that this FD has the aim of ‘enhancing the procedural rights of persons’ when its only aim is ‘fostering the application of the principle of mutual recognition to decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned at the trial’. The aim of fostering the principle of mutual recognition to decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned should be fulfilled without restricting the procedural rights of the defendant.⁷⁷

The ECtHR considers the right to be present at trial as an element of fair trial in the sense of Art. 6. of the ECHR, as it enables the realisation of other rights protected by Art. 6 (3.c, d and e). In general, trials in absentia are not acceptable, and thus criminal procedure is armed with various coercive instruments in order to secure the defendant’s presence. The ECtHR differentiates between a trial in absentia that results from the accused person’s free will,⁷⁸ and one which is the consequence of circumstances outside his/her control.⁷⁹ A waiver of the right to appear in person at the trial has to be unequivocally established, and this will not be the case where the accused person cannot reasonably foresee the consequences of

⁷⁶ OLG Karlsruhe Beschluss Az. 1 AK 102/11 vom 25. März 2013.

⁷⁷ Đurđević et al 2012, p. 251.

⁷⁸ Poitrimol v. France, 23 November 1993, § 30, Series A no. 277-A; Van Geyseghem v. Belgium [GC], no. 26103/95, § 29, ECHR 1999-I.

⁷⁹ Goddi v. Italy, 9 April 1984, Series A no. 76; Colozza v. Italy, 12 February 1985, Series A no. 89; Krombach v. France, no. 29731/96, ECHR 2001-II.

his/her absence at the trial.⁸⁰ In such a case, the accused has to be given the opportunity for a re-trial.⁸¹ The ECtHR has also stated that it is of capital importance that the accused appears, and that legislation has to be capable of discouraging unjustified nonappearance.⁸²

The requirements for execution of an EAW issued for the purpose of executing a custodial sentence following an in absentia trial, pursuant to the 2009 Amendment (Art. 4a FD EAW), do not satisfy either the ECHR standards or the Croatian standards. The FD EAW obliges the executing authority to surrender a person even if he/she was neither summoned in person and he/she has no right to a retrial.⁸³ The establishment of requirements for execution of an EAW for a trial in absentia is no longer under the jurisdiction of the executing state,⁸⁴ but rather of the issuing state, which simply ticks the relevant box in the form.⁸⁵ It is apparent that the execution of an EAW for the purpose of the surrender of a person convicted in absentia to serve a (final) custodial sentence without the possibility of a retrial puts the quality of justice in the EU at a lower level than standards recognised in ECtHR case law and in all states, including Croatia, where a person tried in absentia has the right to ask for a retrial. The exclusion of the possibility of a retrial undermines the existing fundamental procedural rights and paves the way for possible miscarriages of justice.

A trial in absentia in Croatia is considered to be contrary to the defendant's right to a fair trial and rights of defence, such as the right to be informed of the accusation, to be heard by the judge and to examine witnesses. Therefore, the Croatian Criminal Procedure Act guarantees a person sentenced in absentia the right to a retrial in his/her presence.⁸⁶ Furthermore, in proceedings for the execution of a foreign judgment according to the rules of mutual legal assistance in criminal matters, the national judge may examine whether the fundamental rights to be heard and to defence were respected.⁸⁷

⁸⁰ Harris et al. 2009, p. 142.

⁸¹ Ibid.

⁸² Lala v. the Netherlands, 22 September 1994, Series A no. 297-A; Pelladoah v. the Netherlands, 22 September 1994, Series A no. 297-B; Van Geyseghem v. Belgium [GC], no. 26103/95, ECHR 1999-I.

⁸³ See Morgan 2005, p. 207.

⁸⁴ Article 5(1) of the FD EAW, which laid down the rule that surrender of a person shall be subject to the issuing State giving 'adequate' assurances that the person will have an opportunity to apply for a retrial of the case, was deleted by the 2009 Amendment.

⁸⁵ See Open Europe Briefing note: EU strengthens trials in absentia – Framework Decision could lead to miscarriages of justice, 2008. <http://archive.openeurope.org.uk/Content/documents/Pdfs/tia.pdf>.

⁸⁶ Article 497(3) Criminal Procedure Act (Official Gazette No. 152/08, 76/09, 80/11, 91/12 – The decision of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Croatia, 143/12, 56/13, 145/13).

⁸⁷ Article 4 of the Act on Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters (Official Gazette No. 178/04).

Additionally, the European legislator should have been warned by, and learned a lesson from, the Croatian experience twenty years ago with trials in absentia that shows that they may be perilous for fair trial rights. From the early 1990s, the Croatian courts rendered a high number of judgments in absentia for war crimes committed on the territory of Croatia during the war from 1991 to 1995, against Croatian Serbs, most of whom had fled to Serbia. Later, the international community and Croatia recognised that many of these trials violated fair trial rights and the rule of law. Unprofessional and biased criminal proceedings were manifested through unsubstantiated and incorrectly written indictments, the passiveness of defence lawyers, the failure to submit appeals and so on. Croatia has paid a very high price on the international level, and even higher domestically because of the errors that were made in the prosecution of war crimes.⁸⁸ The revision of these proceedings became one of the benchmarks for EU accession. In order to correct the illegal judgments, Croatia took a series of legislative and concrete measures. Thus, up to the end of 2010, the State Attorney's Office reviewed all the convictions made in absentia from the 1990s (465) and found that 20% (93) of the judgments were groundless, and therefore requested the reopening of the case. Reopening was permitted in all cases and the vast majority of these judgments were repealed (80%). In addition, although the Croatian Criminal Procedure Act prescribed the right to a retrial for any person tried in absentia, at the request of the European Union, in 2008 the right of persons convicted in absentia to apply for a retrial without returning to Croatia was introduced in the Croatian Criminal Procedure Act. Now, however, the EAW procedure requires the Croatian legislator and courts to give up the high procedural rights standards of persons tried in absentia, and requires the surrender of a person tried in absentia without establishing that the person will be entitled to a new trial in the requesting country.

The implementation of Art. 4a of the FD EAW in Croatia shows that the errors in the implementing law will further weaken defence rights and fair trial guarantees in trials in absentia. The Croatian implementing law establishes that it is sufficient for execution of an EAW that the requested person was represented at the trial by a defence lawyer appointed by the person concerned or by the requesting state.⁸⁹ The additional condition that the person had to be aware of the scheduled trial was mistakenly omitted.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 In Croatia, the state does not provide any kind of assistance to its surrendered citizens beyond standard consular assistance, and there is no public or non-governmental organisation that provides assistance to them.

⁸⁸ Hrvatin (2010).

⁸⁹ Article 21(2)(2) of the AJCEU.

2.3.4.2 As Croatia only acceded to the EU on 1 July 2013, there are no final judgments regarding persons who have been surrendered to another EU state.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1–2.3.5.2 See Sect. 2.3.2.

2.3.5.3 In the case explained in Sect. 2.3.2, the only role of the Croatian courts was to be actors of loyal co-operation, efficiency and trust. They have expressly assumed this role themselves. By way of examples from court decisions:

To achieve the goals and to respect the principles expressed in EU law, national courts are bound to apply national law in the light of the letter and spirit of EU law. This means that national law must be interpreted in the application as much as possible in the light of the wording and the purpose of relevant framework decisions and directives, in order to achieve the result pursued by such framework decisions and directives;⁹⁰

Criminal proceedings in another state have priority over criminal proceedings conducted before a Croatian court;⁹¹

The European arrest warrant is an instrument of mutual judicial cooperation between the Member States of the European Union that is based on the principles of mutual recognition between Member States and effective cooperation, and contains a legal obligation and moral responsibility of the national courts of the Member State of execution to grant the surrender of the person requested, unless there are the few and expressly prescribed grounds for refusal to surrender.⁹²

2.3.5.4 The opinion of the author is that a proportionality test should be introduced. The author does not recommend the reinstatement of verification of sufficient evidence that an offence has been committed.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The Data Retention Directive has not raised constitutional issues in Croatia. This is probably, at least partly, due to the fact that Croatia acceded to the EU only recently so that the implementation of the Directive in the Croatian legal system took place as part of the process of alignment of the national system with the acquis. Probably for this reason, the Directive was not viewed separately or ⁹⁰ VSRH, Kž-eun 5/14-4, Kž-eun 14/14-4.

⁹¹ County court in Varazdin, Kv-eun 2/14, 9 January 2014.

⁹² VSRH, Kž-eun 17/14-4.

differently from other, less controversial EU measures which required amendments of national legislation. Discussion started only upon the annulment of the Directive on 8 April 2014. Logically, the central point of the discussion at that point was not the constitutionality of the Directive but the effects of its annulment on Croatian rules which regulate data retention in Croatia. The Ministry of Foreign and European Affairs asked the Department of European Public Law of the Faculty of Law of the University of Zagreb for a legal opinion in the matter, as there was well-founded concern that certain national norms could be contrary to EU law for the same reasons provided by the Court of Justice in its judgment in Joined Cases C-293/12 and C-594/12.⁹³

Further, the Ministry gathered the analyses of different national bodies in charge of data retention. Each body had to analyse national rules within its competence in terms of the compatibility of such rules with the four criteria set by the judgment of the Court of Justice. In its analysis, the Ministry of Maritime Affairs, Transport and Infrastructure identified the provisions of the Law on Electronic Communications which need to be amended, and it is expected that this will be taken into account when the Law, which needs to be aligned with the new Directive 2014/61 of 15 May 2014 on measures to reduce the cost of deploying high-speed electronic communications networks, is amended. Also, the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Act from December 2014 narrowed down the cases in which it is possible to conduct checks to determine whether communications have taken place, allowing for such checks only in relation to criminal offences for which the prescribed sentence is more than five years of imprisonment.

The relevant constitutional provisions provide as follows:

Article 34

The home is inviolable.

...

Article 35

Respect for and legal protection of each person's private and family life, dignity, reputation shall be guaranteed.

Article 36

The freedom and privacy of correspondence and all other forms of communication shall be guaranteed and inviolable. Restrictions necessitated by the protection of national security and the conduct of criminal prosecution may be prescribed solely by law.

Article 37

The safety and secrecy of personal data shall be guaranteed for everyone. Without consent from the person concerned, personal data may be collected, processed, and used only under the conditions specified by law.

⁹³ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

Protection of data and oversight of the operations of information systems in the state shall be regulated by law.

The use of personal data contrary to the express purpose of their collection shall be prohibited.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 Article 90 of the Croatian Constitution provides that laws and other regulations of government bodies as well as ordinances of bodies vested with public authority have to be published in the Official Journal of the Republic of Croatia (Narodne novine) before their entry into force. In judgment U-II-296/2006 of 27 October 2010, the Constitutional Court reviewed the constitutionality of the Decree on the Internal Structure of the Ministry of the Interior, which came into force in 2001, but had not been published in Narodne novine and was marked as a ‘state secret’. The Constitutional Court ruled that a decree cannot be a ‘state secret’ and, therefore, cannot be exempt from the obligation to be published in the official journal. The Constitutional Court stated that any other conduct is contrary to both Art. 90 of the Constitution and to the rule of law and the principle of legal certainty. The Court, therefore, ruled that the Decree had to be published in Narodne novine and ordered the Croatian Government to ensure such publication within 90 days of the publication of the Court’s decision.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 No such issues have yet arisen in Croatia in relation to EU measures, which is primarily due to Croatia’s relatively short EU membership.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 Croatia has not signed the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) due to the fact that Croatia is not a euro area state. It has also not signed the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union (Fiscal Compact) due to the fact that the Fiscal Compact was signed before Croatian accession to the EU. For this reason, the Croatian position vis-à-vis the Fiscal Compact is unique in comparison to all other

EU Member States and remains open. The Croatian Government has, so far, not given any official position in respect of possible signature of the Fiscal Compact in the future.

2.7.2 There has not been any public discussion about the constitutionality of other proposed measures. This is (probably) due to the fact that Croatia has decided not to enter the banking union prior to adopting the euro. Therefore, there is no additional financial exposure for Croatian citizens above other costs associated with EU membership.

2.7.3 Croatia has not been subject to any EU bailout or subsequent related austerity procedures which would initiate a strong negative reaction in the state. However, as all other EU Member States, Croatia is subject to economic governance procedures, which require the adoption of policies and measures recommended by the Council. Excessive macroeconomic imbalances identified by the Commission led to strong policy recommendations for Croatia. The Excessive Deficit Procedure, initiated on 28 January 2014, obliges Croatia to correct its excessive deficit by the end 2016.⁹⁴ The EU recommendations are mostly in line with domestic policy priorities – fiscal consolidation and return to a path of sustainable growth. Croatia is adhering to these recommendations. In this context, the Croatian Government has not (yet) imposed aggressive austerity measures which would disproportionately hurt Croatian citizens. So far, only modest measures have been taken, the most visible being the adoption of two laws of temporary character: the Law on the Denial of Payment of Certain Material Rights to Employees in the Public Service,⁹⁵ in force as of 31 March 2015, and the Law on the Denial of the Right to Increase Salaries Based on Seniority,⁹⁶ in force as of 1 April 2014. The former act denies public servants the right to a 2015 Christmas bonus and the regress for using annual leave in 2015, while the latter denies the right to increase the coefficient for the complexity of work in the public service based on the number of years of service. The latter act was subjected to a constitutional review procedure initiated by nine trade unions and a number of Croatian citizens. In its judgment, dated 30 March 2015, the Constitutional Court rejected the proposal and declared that denial of the right to increase salaries based on seniority is in accordance with the Croatian Constitution.⁹⁷ The Court based its judgment on the argument that ‘there are imperative reasons of public interest which justify its application (correction of excessive deficit in accordance with the Council recommendations)’.⁹⁸

⁹⁴ The Excessive Deficit Procedure was initiated at the Economic and Financial Affairs Council meeting on 28 January 2014, based on Council decision 17908/13, dated 21 January 2014, establishing the existence of an excessive deficit in Croatia, and Council recommendation 17904/13 dated 21 January 2014.

⁹⁵ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 36/15.

⁹⁶ Official Gazette of the Republic of Croatia 41/14, 157/14 and 36/15.

⁹⁷ Judgment U-I-1625/2014 and others, U-I-241/2015, U-I-383/2015, U-II-1343/2015, 30 March 2015.

⁹⁸ Ibid., para. 66.

Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court warned that potential further extension of the application of the law in question could turn the measure into a permanent one, which would raise the question of the functioning of the rule of law and the principle of legal certainty and could call the citizens' confidence in public authority into question.⁹⁹ If further austerity measures are introduced, further constitutional review procedures can be expected.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Due to its relatively recent EU membership, there have so far only been a few preliminary references from Croatia, all dealing with the interpretation of EU law. Two of them concern public notaries in the context of judicial cooperation in civil matters,¹⁰⁰ two deal with EU rules on consumer credit,¹⁰¹ and one with the price of water consumption in the context of the EU water policy.¹⁰²

There are also four actions for damages, dealing with similar issues, which are currently pending before the General Court,¹⁰³ as well as an action for annulment initiated by the ferry port Split asking for the annulment of a Commission decision¹⁰⁴ stating that the measure subject to the complaint does not constitute state aid within the meaning of Art. 107(1) TFEU.¹⁰⁵

2.8.2 There has been no public debate on the standard of review of the EU Courts in Croatia.

2.8.3 The Croatian Constitutional Court has in certain instances taken a rather vigorous approach to the review of constitutionality of Croatian legislation. In the most recent controversial case the Constitutional Court suspended the new Family Law.¹⁰⁶

⁹⁹ Ibid., para. 67.

¹⁰⁰ Case C-484/15 Zulfikarpašić [2017] ECLI:EU:C:2017:199 and C-551/15 Pula Parking [2017] ECLI:EU:C:2017:193.

¹⁰¹ C-511/15 Horžić and C-512/15 Pušić [2016] ECLI:EU:C:2016:787.

¹⁰² C-686/15 Vodoopskrba i odvodnja [2016] ECLI:EU:C:2016:927. This reference follows on an earlier one, from the same court, on the same issue, which was inadmissible since the facts preceded accession (C-254/14 VG Vodoopskrba [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2354).

¹⁰³ Case T-108/14 Burazer and Others v. European Union; Case T-109/14 Škugor and Others v. European Union; Joined Cases T-546/13, T-108/14 and T-109/14 Šumelj and Others v. European Union [2016] ECLI:EU:T:2016:107; Case T-507/14 Vidmar and Others v. European Union [2016] ECLI:EU:T:2016:106.

¹⁰⁴ C(2013) 7285 final.

¹⁰⁵ Case T-57/15 Trajektna luka Split v. Commission [2016] ECLI:EU:T:2016:470.

¹⁰⁶ Decision of the Constitutional Court U-I-3101/2014, U-I-3173/2014, U-I-3264/2014, U-I-6341/2014, U-I-6401/2014, U-I-6541/2014, U-I-6701/2014, U-I-6907/2014, U-I-7133/2014 of 12 January 2015.

Based on the statistical data available to the rapporteurs, out of the total number of cases received by the Croatian Constitutional Court in 2014, 19.5% were proceedings to review the constitutionality of laws, while 14.8% were proceedings to review the legality of other regulations. The majority of cases, i.e. 62.7% were constitutional complaints regarding violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution. Interestingly – when compared to 2011, 2012 and 2013–2014 is marked by a visible increase in the percentage of cases involving review of the constitutionality of laws and the legality of other regulations. In the total number of cases received by the Constitutional Court in 2011, 6% were reviews of the constitutionality of laws, while there were only 2% of such cases in 2012 and 3.6% in 2013. Similarly, in 2011 only 2% of cases were reviews of the legality of other regulations, while in 2012 such cases represented only 1% of the total, and in 2013 they represented 2.4% of the total. On the other hand, the percentage of constitutional complaints relating to violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution decreased in 2014 when compared to the percentages in 2011, 2012 and 2013. In 2011 such complaints represented 88% of the total, in 2012 they amounted to 91%, and in 2013 they represented 89% of the total number of cases before the Constitutional Court.

Out of the total number of 5,820 cases for review of the constitutionality of laws launched in the Constitutional Court between 1991 and the end of 2014, the application was rejected in 5,354 cases, while in 466 cases a law or some of its provisions were repealed. On the other hand, in the period from 1991 until the end of 2014, the Constitutional Court reached 3016 decisions on the review of the legality of other regulations. Out of 3,016 cases, 2,778 applications for review were rejected, while in 238 cases a regulation or some of its provisions was repealed.

2.8.4 There have not yet been any judgments in Croatia in which the national constitutional court or supreme court would have reviewed measures that implement EU legislation, nor have there been any such doctrinal statements or debates.

2.8.5 Not applicable.

2.8.6 The issue of equal treatment of citizens falling under the scope of EU law and falling under the scope of domestic law has not (yet) arisen in Croatia.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1. Issues such as those described in this question have so far not arisen in the context of the implementation of EU law in Croatia, at least to the knowledge of the rapporteurs. If they were to arise, the constitutional disciplines described in the answer to question 2.1.3 would be relevant.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1–2.10.2 ‘Common constitutional traditions’ are generally recognised values that can be accepted by a supranational adjudicator without attracting controversy or opening fissures with the constitutional orders of the Member States. Formulated at a sufficient level of generality, many aspects of the constitutions of the Member States could be described as such. In our view, it is neither possible nor desirable, and it actually misses the point of the whole exercise, to formulate a catalogue of ‘core’ rights and principles that qualify and others that do not. ‘Common constitutional traditions’ are primarily a vehicle for judicial dialogue and pluralism, enabling European and national constitutional courts to engage in dialogue beyond the controversies of simple supremacy of EU law, and without retrenching themselves in national categories. They are not meant to differentiate ‘important’ from ‘unimportant’ constitutional rules.

Interestingly, whereas ‘common constitutional traditions’ were initially used by the CJEU as an integration tool – building up European fundamental rights protection as a guarantee of the legitimacy of EU law – today’s debates on ‘constitutional identity’ seem to pull in the opposite direction.¹⁰⁷ Yet both seem to be a way of reinforcing judicial dialogue, and there is some promise in that. In that light, the increased reliance of national constitutional courts on preliminary references would certainly be made more fruitful by including references to national constitutional law, without however framing them as ‘ultimatums’.

For a possible indication of the Croatian Constitutional Court’s approach to these issues, see the discussion of its comparative approach in the answer to question 1.1.1.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 As a general proposition, both the ECHR and the EU Charter allow Member States to protect a particular fundamental right to a higher degree. In reality, of course, rights tend not to be adjudicated in isolation, but in cases of conflict with other rights or legitimate interests. The problematic issue is precisely how to deal with conflicts between two different fundamental rights, or between a fundamental right and a rule of EU law. Can a higher national standard prevail over supranational norms in some cases? Can a national constitution protect, for example, the right to privacy more if that means that it protects freedom of expression less than the EU/ECHR benchmark provides? The CJEU *Melloni*¹⁰⁸ decision would argue against such an interpretation, even when the EU norm is not in itself a fundamental right, at least as long as we are not talking about a trivial or purely technical EU provision.

¹⁰⁷ See Millet 2014.

¹⁰⁸ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

In Croatia, there does not seem to have been much debate on these issues. The Constitutional Court rarely deals with EU law in any depth, but it tends to rely heavily on the case law of the ECtHR. It often reproduces, in applying national constitutional law, the legal tests developed by the ECtHR in the context of analogous provisions of the Convention. In doing so, it usually does not discuss whether the standard of protection in Croatian law could or should be higher or lower. It even employs the ECtHR language of granting a margin of appreciation to national legislators when simply addressing the Croatian legislator.

Some good examples include several Constitutional Court decisions on extradition proceedings and the right to a fair trial, in which the Court found no violation of constitutional rights by relying largely on ECtHR case law, even though the latter was developed in the context of a general unavailability of Art. 6 ECHR in (administrative) extradition proceedings (i.e. the ECtHR doctrine was developed to expand Art. 6 protection but was used by the Constitutional Court to narrow protection under the Croatian Constitution).¹⁰⁹ The Constitutional Court cited the *Soering v. UK*¹¹⁰ argument that extradition is usually not an issue under Art. 6, unless a petitioner has suffered a flagrant denial of a fair trial in the requesting country. Also, the court relied on a definition of the concept of flagrant denial of a fair trial in *Ahorugeze v. Sweden*¹¹¹ to support its finding of no violation. There is nothing in the Croatian constitutional provisions that would suggest that only ‘flagrant denials of a fair trial’ fall under the relevant constitutional provisions. Therefore, these cases would seem to be good candidates for establishing a higher level of protection than the one granted by the ECHR. Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court did not venture into that discussion.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 Both developments referred to in this question took place before Croatia’s accession to the EU and did not lead to a significant debate at the time, even though there was considerable academic discussion about the EAW. More generally, there was extensive debate on the EAW immediately upon Croatia’s accession, but this was not really principled deliberation, rather, it concerned the politically salient issue of EAWs against former Yugoslav-era intelligence agents and whether Croatian legislation could prevent the execution of those EAWs, in potential violation of EU law.¹¹² As for the Data Retention Directive, there has been some public discussion on whether or not data must be, may be or cannot be retained in the aftermath of the decision of the CJEU in Digital Rights Ireland,¹¹³ i.e. before Croatian legislation is harmonised with the Court's interpretation of the requirements of EU privacy rules. As in other Member States, there seems to be some confusion on the part of Croatian authorities on how to deal with a situation where the implementing legislation that the EU Commission previously insisted on is now considered to be contrary to EU law (see also the answer to question 2.4.1).¹¹⁴

¹⁰⁹ See, most recently, U-III-1358/2014, 17 April 2014, para. 6.

¹¹⁰ Soering v. the United Kingdom, 7 July 1989, Series A no. 161.

¹¹¹ Ahorugeze v. Sweden, no. 37075/09, 27 October 2011.

2.12.2–2.12.3 The first suggestion is intuitively attractive, but there seem to be many practical or institutional problems. While some constitutional courts may object, other Member States may have already implemented EU measures or may have themselves faced legal challenges for violating them. Such a mechanism might therefore affect certain legitimate expectations of private parties and create legal uncertainty, especially if it would lead to suspending the application of EU law. Another problem is who exactly should suspend and/or review the EU measure. In our view, while the Commission or even relevant national authorities could usefully analyse and report on a measure, and while the Commission could file a legislative proposal, it should ultimately be for the EU legislator to decide that an EU measure should be suspended or changed. Perhaps something like a 'yellow card' procedure for legislative proposals could be sensible – if numerous constitutional courts were to consider a piece of EU legislation to be unconstitutional, it should be reviewed by the EU legislator. Whether and how this could be operationalised is a different matter – in all likelihood, given the diversity of national judicial systems and the unpredictability of judicial review, it is hard to imagine a formal procedure. Finally, of course, it is for the CJEU to ensure the conformity of EU law with fundamental rights, and constitutional courts – individually – are always free to take that road, which can in fact lead to the suspension of the application or review of an EU measure.

As for the second suggestion, it should not be supported. It has in fact already been rejected by the CJEU on numerous occasions, not least in Simmenthal,¹¹⁵ and more recently in Küçükdeveci:¹¹⁶ national rules on constitutional review cannot detract from the binding nature of EU law. The fact that a Member State has delayed implementation because of constitutional review could at best be taken into account when addressing the gravity of an infringement or deciding on sanctions.

¹¹² See (2013, August 27) Justice row over arrest warrant sours EU-Croatia ties. BBC news. <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-23847788>.

¹¹³ Supra n. 93.

¹¹⁴ See Srdoč, S. (2014, July 23). Podaci o komunikaciji Hrvata zadržavaju se unatoč presudi europskog suda (Croatian's communications data retained despite of European Court judgment). Tportal. <http://www.tportal.hr/vijesti/svijet/343337/Podaci-o-komunikaciji-Hrvata-zadrzavaju-se-unatoc-presudi-europskog-suda.html>.

¹¹⁵ Case 106/77 Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v. Simmenthal (1978) ECR 00629.

¹¹⁶ Case C-555/07 Küçükdeveci [2010] ECR I-00365.

Some space for domestic constitutional processes could, in that sense, be also created in the context of infringement proceedings (with regard to question 2.12.2). On the other hand, with the average duration of infringement proceedings currently at 27 months and the average period Member States take to comply with CJEU findings of an infringement (not necessarily covering further CJEU proceedings on sanctions) at 20 months,¹¹⁷ infringement proceedings are hardly lightning-fast.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 Insofar as it is possible to generalise, EU accession seems to have bolstered, rather than weakened the protection of fundamental rights in Croatia (see however the remarks in Sect. 2.3). On the level of legislation protecting fundamental rights, EU accession has led, e.g. to far better and more detailed anti-discrimination rules, as well as the formation of institutions in charge of the protection of fundamental rights (such as the Ombudspersons for gender equality and children's rights). At the same time, though not necessarily as a consequence of accession, the ECHR has become a much more widely used instrument in the adjudication of constitutional rights, at least in the case law of the Constitutional Court (see above).

Broadly speaking, the encounter with EU and ECHR fundamental rights has improved, rather than diminished the legitimacy of the Constitutional Court in adjudicating fundamental rights. In addition, there seems not to have been any pronounced conflicts between Croatian constitutional rights and EU law, at least not yet. Such a conflict could of course happen.

2.13.2 Not applicable.

2.13.3–2.13.4 The case of the EAW has been debated in detail in other sections of this Report. Double criminality, similarly as in Advocaten voor de Wereld,¹¹⁸ has been a salient issue, albeit not in the sense of a direct conflict with fundamental rights, but as a way of re-interpreting a seemingly mandatory ground for refusal to execute an EAW.

There have, however, been no constitutional conflicts between Croatian and EU law, as of yet. EU law seems, for the time being, largely 'off the radar' for the Croatian Constitutional Court, in contrast to the frequent references to the judgments of the ECtHR.

More broadly, the likelihood of conflict, but also of cooperation and dialogue, in the adjudication of fundamental rights has increased along with the expansion of EU law across policy fields and territorially, with EU enlargement. National constitutions and EU law now intersect at a wider variety of points. The direct effect of third-pillar law and the broader ability to refer to the CJEU will certainly add to this.

¹¹⁷ See http://ec.europa.eu/internal_market/scoreboard/performance_by_governance_tool/infringements/index_en.htm.

¹¹⁸ Case C-303/05 Advocaten voor de Wereld [2007] ECR I-03633.

This has already had its consequences in EU law. The debate on national constitutional identity can be read in the light of an increasing encounter with national constitutional rights. This debate has not yet had a major impact in Croatia. Some academics have suggested possible changes to the interpretation of constitutional provisions, or a richer understanding of constitutional disciplines in terms of ‘constitutional identity’, rather than new amendments to the constitutional text. Smerdel, for example, has argued that ‘full membership accentuates the importance of a well justified theoretical position on the part of the Croatian legal community, towards the issues of its constitutional identity within the compound community of states’.¹¹⁹

More generally, the recent CJEU opinion on accession to the ECHR could also be seen as a way of protecting the dialogue with national constitutional systems. From the point of view of the national courts, the recent trend of constitutional courts referring to the CJEU can also be seen in this light.

Perhaps EU law is only in the very early stages of a development similar to what took place with the introduction of fundamental rights through CJEU case law as a response to *Solange*¹²⁰ in the 1970s. More concrete mechanisms of accommodation for national constitutional rights may emerge. Beyond salutary statements, not much has been developed so far – Melloni being a good example of a judgment that seemingly pays tribute to national constitutional rights but reverts to the supremacy of EU law. This could also be understood in the context of relatively weak implementation of the EAW in the Member States, and perhaps a fear of further fragmentation in a nascent area of EU policy. The case law may develop in different directions, but what seems clear is that judicial dialogue between the CJEU and national courts, especially with a fundamental rights dimension, must be further developed. In practice, the CJEU is likely to include more detailed references to national constitutional rights in its judgments.

Recent developments such as the expansion (and deepening) of EU law in domains such as criminal law, foreign affairs and third-country migration, the process of EU accession to the ECHR and the complex relationship between the ECtHR and the CJEU, as well as the increasingly high-profile dialogue between the CJEU and the highest national courts, will necessitate a level of accommodation both on the national and EU level. The CJEU is likely to take national courts and their concerns more seriously in its judgments. More general procedural reforms like introducing dissenting opinions do not seem probable, but increasing judicial dialogue is likely to affect the nature and quality of its reasoning.

¹¹⁹ Smerdel 2014, p. 516.

¹²⁰ BVerfGE 37, 271 (Solange I); BVerfGE 73, 339 (Solange II); Case 11-70 Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 01125.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1–3.1.2 The Constitution (Arts. 139 and 140) provides that treaties may be concluded, depending on their nature and content, by the Parliament, the President of the Republic or the Government. The Parliament ratifies treaties that require laws or legislative amendments, those of a ‘military and political nature’, and those that give rise to financial commitments. The President signs the documents of ratification, accession, approval or acceptance of treaties ratified by the Parliament. Treaties not subject to ratification by the Parliament are concluded by the President on a proposal by the Government, or by the Government. If a treaty grants an international organisation or alliance powers derived from the Constitution, the ratification by the Croatian Parliament is by a two-thirds majority of all deputies. There are separate rules for the entry into associations and alliances with other states, which ultimately require the approval of two-thirds of all deputies in Parliament, as well as a positive outcome of a referendum (Art. 142).

The only provisions of this nature that contain some references to values and objectives are those that pertain to the European Union. Article 143 provides that, in the EU, Croatia will ‘participate in the creation of European unity in order to ensure, together with other European states, lasting peace, liberty, security and prosperity, and to attain other common objectives in keeping with the founding principles and values of the European Union’.

3.1.3–3.1.4 EU accession has been the only event in recent history to have provoked a significant debate on the relationship between the Constitution and transnational or global governance. This has resulted in new constitutional provisions (see Sect. 1.2).

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 The application of treaties is governed by Art. 141 of the Constitution:

International treaties which have been concluded and ratified in accordance with the Constitution, published and which have entered into force shall be a component of the domestic legal order of the Republic of Croatia and shall have primacy over domestic law. Their provisions may be altered or repealed only under the conditions and in the manner specified therein or in accordance with the general rules of international law.

Some constitutional provisions refer to international law other than treaties. Article 2, for example, provides that ‘the Republic of Croatia, in accordance with international law, shall exercise sovereign rights and jurisdiction over the maritime zones and seabed of the Adriatic Sea outside its state territory up to the borders of neighbouring countries'. Article 31 provides that 'no one may be punished for an act which, prior to its commission, was not defined as a punishable offence by domestic or international law' and that the statute of limitations shall not apply to 'those not subject to the statute of limitations under international law'.

3.2.2 The split between monism and dualism can be seen as describing two deeply opposed understandings of international law and national sovereignty. On the other hand, the two notions may not be much more than two techniques by which international law is given effect in national legislation. The real test of the openness of a legal order to international law, in our view, should rather take place before courts and administrative bodies.

Legal commentary is largely committed to the view that Croatia accepts monism, citing the clear constitutional provisions cited above. Doctrine also tends to hold the view of a Kelsen-like hierarchy of legal sources, with the Constitution superior to international law and international law superior to legislation. On the other hand, some sources of international law, and in particular the ECHR, are held in higher esteem. The President of the Constitutional Court has, for example, written that 'the case-law of the Croatian Constitutional Court shows that international treaties actually enjoy a quasi-constitutional status in the Croatian constitutional legal order: international treaties do not formally have the power of a constitutional law, but nevertheless their role is the same as that of the Constitution because they serve as standards for the review of the national legislation, in particular of the acts of Parliament'.¹²¹ The Constitutional Court has indeed found that a law violating the Convention is also contrary to the principle of the rule of law contained in Art. 3 of the Constitution, as well as to the principle of legality (Art. 5) and the principle of legal monism.¹²²

Others have noted that, in practice and depending on the area of law in question, the principle of monism is not always strictly followed and is sometimes combined with a dualist understanding.¹²³ Indeed, empirically speaking, it is quite rare for courts, especially if the Constitutional Court is taken out of the picture, to make any use of international law whatsoever.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 For the involvement of the Parliament in ratification, see above. The Act on the Conclusion and Execution of International Treaties¹²⁴ does not foresee a specific role for Parliament in the negotiation stage. The negotiation is conducted by a delegation that is named by the President or by the Government. The Parliament

¹²¹ Omejec 2009, p. 2.

¹²² Ibid., p. 11.

¹²³ Rudolf 2014, p. 569.

¹²⁴ Zakon o sklapanju i izvršavanju međunarodnih ugovora (Narodne novine 28/1996).

does, however, have a role in scrutinising the execution of a treaty: the Government is required to report on the execution of a treaty upon the Parliament's request. A special and much more detailed law regulates the involvement of the Parliament in European Union issues (for details, see the answer to question 1.4.1).

3.3.2 Only the EU Accession Treaty has been subject to a referendum, as per specific constitutional requirements (see Sect. 1.2).

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 There are no explicit constitutional provisions of any kind regarding the judicial review of international law. The Constitutional Court's authority extends to laws and other national measures. Indeed, the Constitutional Court considers substantive challenges to international treaties as inadmissible,¹²⁵ but it is unclear whether this extends to challenges to laws on the ratification of treaties.¹²⁶ In practice, there have not been many challenges to provisions of international law, and certainly not high-profile ones. In time, this may change, as EU accession exposes Croatia to a greater variety of sources of transnational law in a broader range of domains.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 See the answer to question 2.7.3.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 No significant issues have arisen in Croatia.

References

- Bagić S. (2013) The principle of proportionality in the case-law of European courts and its impact on the case-law of the Croatian courts. Doctoral dissertation, University of Zagreb.
 Ćapeta T. (2008) Ustavne promjene i clanstvo u EU (Constitutional amendments and membership in the EU). Informator 5646:1–3.

¹²⁵ Omejec 2009, p. 12.

¹²⁶ Ibid., pp. 13–15.

- Durđević Z., Goldner Lang I., Munivrana Vajda M. (2012) Croatia. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 235–259.
- Harris D.J., O'Boyle M., Warbrick C. (2009) Law of the European Convention on Human Rights. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Hrvatin B. (2010) Presentation by the President of the Supreme Court of the Republic of Croatia at the international conference ‘Assessing the Legacy of the ICTY’, The Hague, 23–24 February 2010.
- Millet F.-X. (2014) How much lenience for how much cooperation? On the first preliminary reference of the French Constitutional Council to the Court Of Justice. CML Rev. 51:195–218.
- Morgan C. (2005) The European Arrest Warrant and Defendant's Rights: An Overview. In: Blekxtoon R. (ed.) Handbook on the European Arrest Warrant. T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 195–208.
- Omejec J. (2009) Legal Framework and Case-Law of the Constitutional Court Of Croatia in Deciding on the Conformity of Laws With International Treaties' Report CDL-JU(2009)035. European Commission for Democracy Through Law (Venice Commission), The Constitutional Court of Montenegro and OSCE.
- Rodin S. (2007) Regulatorna autonomija država članica i ustavna osnova za pristupanje RH Europskoj uniji (Regulatory autonomy of Member States and the constitutional basis for Croatia's accession to the European Union). In: Barbić J. (ed.) Pristupanje RH Europskoj uniji (Accession of the Republic of Croatia to the European Union). HAZU, Zagreb, pp. 247–277.
- Rodin S. (2010) Pravo Europske unije i pravni poredak Republike Hrvatske nakon 20 godina hrvatskog Ustava (European Union law and the legal order of the Republic of Croatia 20 years after the Croatian Constitution). Opatija Inter-University Centre of Excellence Working Paper H2/2010.
- Rudolf D. (2014) Zajednička sigurnosna i obrambena politika Europske unije prema Lisabonskom ugovoru (EU common foreign and security policy according to the Lisbon Treaty). Zbornik radova Pravnog fakulteta u Splitu 51:557 et seq.
- Smerdel B. (2010) Ustav RH nakon ustavnih promjena (The Constitution of the Republic of Croatia after constitutional changes). Hrvatska pravna revija 1 et seq.
- Smerdel B. (2014) In Quest of a Doctrine: Croatian Constitutional Identity in the European Union. Zbornik Pravnog fakulteta u Zagrebu 64:513 et seq.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Part V

Traditional or Hybrid Legal Constitutions: Combining Strict and Flexible Aspects, e.g. an Older or ECHR-Based Bill of Rights

The Constitution of France in the Context of EU and Transnational Law: An Ongoing Adjustment and Dialogue to Be Improved

Laurence Burgorgue-Larsen, Pierre-Vincent Astresses and Véronique Bruck

Abstract In terms of the French constitutional culture, the Constitution (of the Fifth Republic), adopted in 1958, grew out of specific circumstances relating to the previous regime, with the aim to ensure the primacy of the executive. Fundamental rights protection emerged later and is mainly based on the ECHR; the main domestic instrument is the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen. The possibility for individuals to challenge the constitutionality of legislative provisions that violate their rights was introduced by a constitutional amendment of 2008 establishing ex post control of constitutionality. Judicial review is regarded as deferent to the political institutions. With regard to EU law, the Constitution has extensively been amended, typically following a finding by the Constitutional Council that a new treaty affects ‘the essential conditions for the exercise of national sovereignty’. The report observes a reluctance of French institutions to fully participate in a dynamic dialogue with the EU integration process. Although this has recently changed with a more constructive approach on the part of the Constitutional Council, the report observes deficiencies in democratic Laurence Burgorgue-Larsen is Professor of Public Law at the Sorbonne Law School, University Paris 1 (Panthéon-Sorbonne). e-mail: laurence.burgorgue-larsen@univ-paris1.fr.

Pierre-Vincent Astresses is a Ph.D. candidate at the Sorbonne Law School, University Paris 1 (Panthéon-Sorbonne); at the time of writing, teaching assistant at the University of Lorraine. e-mail: pierre-vincent.astresses@malix.univ-paris1.fr.

Véronique Bruck is a Ph.D. fellow and teaching assistant at the Sorbonne Law School, University Paris 1 (Panthéon-Sorbonne). e-mail: veronique.bruck@univ-paris1.fr.

All three are affiliated to the Research Institute in International and European Law of the Sorbonne (IREDIES).

All websites accessed 20 November 2014. Text submitted 4 March 2015.

L. Burgorgue-Larsen (✉) · P.-V. Astresses · V. Bruck Sorbonne Law School, University Paris 1 (Panthéon-Sorbonne), Paris, France e-mail: laurence.burgorgue-larsen@univ-paris1.fr

P.-V. Astresses
e-mail: pierre-vincent.astresses@malix.univ-paris1.fr

V. Bruck
e-mail: veronique.bruck@univ-paris1.fr deliberation and the reluctance to push for a solid fundamental rights protection in the EU. The report advocates a so-called pro homine clause, which has been considered in France, to guarantee that the individual would always benefit from the highest level of protection, whether it is provided for by European, international or national instruments. The report also notes a more general concern amongst a part of the French population about a barefaced economic liberalism in the EU and its effect of deteriorating their living conditions.

Keywords The French Constitution of the Fifth Republic · Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation · The Constitutional Council · Constitutional review · Fundamental rights and the ECHR · European Arrest Warrant and the time limits for appeals · Data Retention Directive and implementation by a governmental regulation · Judicial dialogues · Judicial deference · Sovereignty · Supremacy · Referendum · Koné · International extradition treaties and political offences · Pro homine clause

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The French Constitution of 4 October 1958 grew out of a ‘set of circumstances’¹ which include the following. First, in 1958, Algeria was a French department in crisis due to the outbreak of an insurgency at the end of 1954. This war revealed flaws in the Constitution of the Fourth Republic, and led to the birth of the Constitution of the Fifth Republic. The regime did not have the necessary institutional strength to deal with the consequences of the insurgency. Politically, the regime was unable to forcefully assert that the Fourth Republic could come out of such a crisis. As regards the economy, mention should be made of the numerous difficulties successive Governments encountered in voting the budget.

Secondly, these developments resulted in conflicting relationships between the Government and Parliament and help to explain the agony of the Fourth Republic. This Republic was characterised by a weak Constitution, in which ministerial crises and governmental instability reigned without apparent remedy. In other words, Parliament was all-powerful and it determined the Government’s birth and survival. From the mid-1950s, most politicians were convinced that a major revision of the Constitution was needed in order to put an end to the gradual paralysis of the decision-making mechanisms.

Finally, the birth of the Fifth Republic can also be explained by the coup de grâce delivered by General De Gaulle. In his 16 June 1946 Bayeux Speech, General De Gaulle showed his hostility towards a regime such as the one established by the

¹ Carcassonne 2013, p. 17 (as translated by the authors).

Fourth Republic. Thus, his lack of support for the Fourth Republic in 1958 was not a surprise. A number of Gaullists worked for the return of De Gaulle, notably providing him with the support of the army. By succeeding in presenting himself as the providential man for the French people, his intervention became increasingly essential.

Thus, the Constitution of the Fifth Republic is the result of an ‘adjustment of the previous regime’.² The current Constitution is characterised by a real parlementarisme rationalisé: by disciplining the legislative power, the Government has the necessary means to carry out its mandate.

1.1.2 According to Art. 16 of the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, ‘any society in which no provision is made for guaranteeing rights or for the separation of powers, has no Constitution’.³ Pursuant to this fundamental provision, the Constitution sets up a separation of powers between the legislature, the executive and the judiciary (horizontal separation of powers) on the one hand, and between the state and sub-national entities (vertical separation of powers) on the other. It also guarantees the rights and freedoms of the people, ensuring effective protection as a corollary.⁴

Title 1 of the Constitution deals with sovereignty. Although some provisions relate to organisation of the state, they are not essential. Nevertheless, the constituent power initially wished to avoid repeating the mistakes of previous regimes, and therefore sought to ensure the primacy of the executive over the legislative power by giving specific attention to the rules governing the separation of powers. Originally, the space reserved for the protection of rights and freedoms seemed to be secondary. It was not until a decision of 16 July 1971 delivered by the Constitutional Council that the situation evolved.⁵ According to the Liberté d'association ruling, the Constitutional Council acknowledges the constitutional value of the Preamble of the Constitution and, in doing so, to the texts that are referenced in this Preamble – the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, the Preamble of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic and, more recently, the Charter for the Environment. In this way, the control of constitutionality is exercised against the yardstick of the bloc de constitutionnalité, i.e. a set of norms at the top of the hierarchy of norms. Thus, as it has been commented, ‘the Constitutional Council changes ... roles: it is not only the regulator of the activities of the public powers, it especially becomes, according to the usual wording, the guardian of rights and freedoms against the legislative will of a governmental majority’.⁶ The constitutional amendment of 23 July 2008 took a step in this direction, and can be ² Ibid., p. 19 (as translated by the authors).

³ As translated on the Constitutional Council’s website. <http://www.conseil-constitutionnel.fr/conseil-constitutionnel/english/constitution/declaration-of-human-and-civic-rights-of-26-august-1789.105305.html>.

⁴ Gicquel 2013, p. 57.

⁵ Constitutional Council, 16 July 1971, Loi complétant les dispositions des articles 5 et 7 de la loi du 1er juillet 1901 relative au contrat d'association, Decision No. 71-44 DC.

⁶ Rousseau 2013, p. 36 (as translated by the authors).

considered from that day forward as proof of the prominent place of the protection of rights and freedoms in the French constitutional order. This constitutional amendment introduced an ex post control of constitutionality, the so-called priority preliminary reference mechanism on issues of constitutionality, into French constitutional law, allowing individuals to challenge the constitutionality of provisions violating their rights.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 In France, the Treaties establishing the European Communities were ratified by the President of the Republic with the consent of Parliament in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Constitution of the Fourth Republic.⁷

Starting with the Treaty on the EU and the subsequent constitutional amendment of 1992, the French Constitution has been regularly amended with a view to ‘authorise the process of European integration and to strengthen the control of the French Parliament over the activities of the European Union’.⁸ To date there have been seven constitutional amendments more or less linked with the development of the European construction, the content of which will be explored in greater detail in Sect. 1.2.3. By way of a summary, the amendments are as follows:

- The Constitutional Law of 25 June 1992 related to the Treaty of Maastricht created a new title entitled ‘On the European Communities and the European Union’, adding Arts. 88-1 to 88-4 to the Constitution;
- The Constitutional Law of 25 November 1993 related to international agreements in the field of asylum concerning the Schengen Agreement created Art. 53-1 of the Constitution;
- The Constitutional Law of 25 January 1999 related to the Treaty of Amsterdam changed some provisions in Arts. 88-2 and 88-4, and added a second paragraph to Art. 88-2 of the Constitution;
- The Constitutional Law of 25 March 2003 related to the European Arrest Warrant further amended Art. 88-2 of the Constitution (see below Sect. 2.3.2);
- The Constitutional Law of 1 March 2005 related to the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe created Art. 88-5 and changed Art. 88-1 of the Constitution;
- Finally, the Constitutional Laws of 4 February 2008⁹ and 23 July 2008,¹⁰ adopted several months apart, close this list.

⁷ Rideau 2010, p. 1224.

⁸ Boyron 2013, p. 220.

⁹ Constitutional law No. 2008-103 of 4 February 2008 modifying Title XV of the Constitution.

¹⁰ Constitutional law No. 2008-724 of 23 July 2008 to modernise institutions of the Fifth Republic.

It should be borne in mind that Art. 53-1 of the Constitution, which refers to agreements with European states in the field of asylum, does not concern the EU amendments listed above, contrary to a large number of provisions contained in Title XV.

Title XV, entitled ‘On the European Union’, currently reads:

Article 88-1: The Republic shall participate in the European Union constituted by States which have freely chosen to exercise some of their powers in common by virtue of the Treaty on European Union and of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, as they result from the treaty signed in Lisbon on 13 December, 2007.

Article 88-2: Statutes shall determine the rules relating to the European arrest warrant pursuant to acts adopted by the institutions on the European Union.

Article 88-3: Subject to reciprocity and in accordance with the terms of the Treaty on European Union signed on 7 February 1992, the right to vote and stand as a candidate in municipal elections shall be granted only to citizens of the Union residing in France. Such citizens shall neither hold the office of Mayor or Deputy Mayor nor participate in the designation of Senate electors or in the election of Senators. An Institutional Act passed in identical terms by the two Houses shall determine the manner of implementation of this article.

Article 88-4: The government shall lay before the National Assembly and the Senate drafts of or proposals for European Community and European Union acts as soon as they have been transmitted to the council of the European Union.

In the manner laid down by the rules of procedure of each House, European resolutions may be passed, even if Parliament is not in session, on the drafts or proposals referred to in the preceding paragraph, as well as on any document issuing from a European Union Institution.

A committee in charge of European affairs shall be set up in each parliamentary assembly.

Article 88-5: Any government bill authorizing the ratification of a treaty pertaining to the accession of a state to the European Union shall be submitted to referendum by the president of the republic.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, by passing a motion adopted in identical terms in each House by a three-fifths majority, Parliament may authorize the passing of the bill according to the procedure provided for in paragraph three of article 89.

[Article 88-5 is not applicable to accessions that result from an Intergovernmental Conference whose meeting was decided by the European Council before July 1, 2004].

Article 88-6: The National Assembly or the Senate may issue a reasoned opinion as to the conformity of a draft proposal for a European Act with the principle of subsidiarity. Said opinion shall be addressed by the President of the House involved to the Presidents of the European Parliament, the Council of the European Union and the European Commission. The Government shall be informed of said opinion.

Each House may institute proceedings before the Court of Justice of the European Union against a European Act for non-compliance with the principle of subsidiarity. Such proceedings shall be referred to the Court of Justice of the European Union by the Government.

For the purpose of the foregoing, resolutions may be passed, even if Parliament is not in session, in the manner set down by the Rules of Procedure of each House for the tabling and discussion thereof.

Article 88-7: Parliament may, by the passing of a motion in identical terms by the National Assembly and the Senate, oppose any modification of the rules governing the passing of Acts of the European Union in cases provided for under the simplified revision procedure for treaties or under judicial cooperation on civil matters, as set forth in the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, as they result from the treaty signed in Lisbon on December 13, 2007.¹¹

1.2.2 A distinction must be drawn between the normal constitutional amendment procedure provided by Art. 89 of the Constitution, and a procedure, developed on the basis of Art. 11, that is not expressly laid down in the text of the Constitution.

In the light of Art. 89, the right of initiative is shared and belongs to the President of the Republic on a proposal from the Prime Minister (hereinafter Government Draft), as well as to parliamentarians (hereinafter MP Draft). An initiative requires a vote in identical terms by the National Assembly and the Senate, which is followed by an approval stage. A referendum is compulsory in the case of an MP Draft. The situation is different in the case of a Government Draft, where the President of the Republic has a choice. He can decide to adopt a constitutional amendment either by referendum, or he can submit it to Parliament convened in Congress, i.e. a joint session of both Houses. In this latter scenario, the bill is approved if it is supported by a three-fifths majority of the votes cast.

Out of a total of 24 constitutional amendments undertaken since 1958, 22 have been approved pursuant to Art. 89 of the Constitution. It should also be noted that 21 constitutional amendments have been ratified in Congress. The seven constitutional amendments linked with the European construction have been adopted under Art. 89 of the Constitution and approved by Congress.

The controversial use of Art. 11 of the Constitution is noteworthy in this respect. The latter allows the President of the Republic to submit a bill on several matters to a referendum. This procedure provides the President of the Republic with the advantage of circumventing potential parliamentary opposition. Although it was used twice by General De Gaulle in 1962 and 1969, Art. 11 should nonetheless not be considered as an appropriate procedure for amending the Constitution.¹²

1.2.3 By way of background to the EU-related constitutional amendments, the Constitutional Law of 25 January 1999 enabled France to ratify the Treaty of Amsterdam after the Constitutional Council found the Treaty to be unconstitutional. In a decision of 31 December 1997, the Constitutional Council, seized by both the President of the Republic and the Prime Minister, indicated that several provisions of the Treaty of Amsterdam – in particular those providing for the transition from unanimity to qualified majority rule and for the procedure of co-decision for some measures related to asylum, immigration and the crossing of the internal and external borders of the Member States – ‘affect the essential conditions for the exercise of national sovereignty' and must therefore be declared unconstitutional.¹³

¹¹ As translated on the Constitutional Council’s website. Available at: <http://www.conseil-constitutionnel.fr/conseil-constitutionnel/english/constitution/constitution-of-4-october-1958.25742.html>.

¹² Pierré-Caps 1998, pp. 412–416. For an overview of this controversy, see Fekl 2008, pp. 43–49.

In order to ratify the Treaty of Amsterdam, the Government Draft allowed for transfers of competence regarding the free movement of persons. The draft was passed by Parliament in identical terms and approved in Congress by 759 parliamentarians, whereas the required majority would have been attained with 522. It is noteworthy that the Government Draft only addressed the issues of unconstitutionality raised by the Constitutional Council. Some members of the National Assembly considered nonetheless that the draft needed to be expanded. A large number of amendments were proposed, including one adopted by a National Assembly Commission and approved by the Senate. This was amendment No. 19, aimed at revising Art. 88-4 of the Constitution to extend the obligations of the Government to inform the parliamentary assemblies.¹⁴ This parliamentary intervention brought to light the role played by Parliament in the constitutional amendment procedure, which cannot be reduced to a mere chamber of registration of the will of the executive power.

The Constitutional Law related to the European Arrest Warrant of 25 March 2003 enabled the transposition of the Framework Decision¹⁵ into French law. In an advisory opinion of 26 September 2002, the Council of State, seized by the President of the Republic (rather than the Constitutional Council, which confers a rather unique aspect on this constitutional amendment) was asked whether the transposition of the Framework Decision might collide with obstacles based on constitutional principles and rules. The Council of State declared this transposition to be in conformity with the constitutional rules, but noted that the Framework Decision did not seem to ensure the principle that the state ought to reserve the right to refuse extradition in respect of political offences.¹⁶ In order to allow for the adoption of the rules on the European Arrest Warrant (EAW), a Government Draft was tabled in Parliament, passed in identical terms and approved in Congress by 826 parliamentarians (the minimum required was 525 votes).

The Constitutional Law of 1 March 2005 aimed at bringing the Constitution in line with the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe. By way of background, in a decision of 19 November 2004, the Constitutional Council, seized by the President of the Republic, declared that a constitutional amendment was necessary on the grounds that some provisions hindered the essential conditions for the exercise of national sovereignty and that the new prerogatives granted to Parliament by the Treaty, in respect of subsidiarity and the simplified revision procedure, called

¹³ Constitutional Council, 31 December 1997, Traité d'Amsterdam modifiant le Traité sur l'Union européenne, les Traités instituant les Communautés européennes et certains actes connexes, Decision No. 97-394 DC.

¹⁴ National Assembly, Report on the constitutional amendment bill modifying Art. 88-2 of the Constitution, No. 1212, 20 November 1998, available at: <http://www.assemblee-nationale.fr/11/rapports/r1212.asp>.

¹⁵ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

¹⁶ Council of State, 26 September 2002, Advisory opinion No. 368-282.

for the intervention of the constituent power to implement them into French law. Based on this decision and with a view to overcoming the unconstitutional provisions identified by the constitutional judge, a Government Draft was tabled in Parliament, passed in identical terms and approved in Congress by 730 parliamentarians (with the required minimum having been 478 votes).

It should, however, be noted that this constitutional amendment ‘partially remained in suspension’.¹⁷ Indeed, the Constitutional Law basically consisted of two parts: one establishing the participation of France in the European Union and one creating the duty to hold a referendum for the accession of any new state to the European Union after Croatia. This provision is not a consequence of the decision of the Constitution Council, but purely aims to ‘reassure French people about the prospect of a potential accession of Turkey by enabling them to decide ultimately on this accession’.¹⁸ Legal doctrine voiced criticism with regard to this provision.¹⁹ Secondly, the Constitutional Law provided for a new wording of the dispositions contained in Title XV of the Constitution, notably including two articles allowing the Parliament to exercise the new rights recognised by the Treaty. These modifications were conditional on the ratification of the Treaty, which was submitted to a referendum. As the Treaty was rejected, this part did not see the light of day.

The Constitutional Law of 4 July 2008 enabled France to ratify the Treaty of Lisbon. In a decision of 20 December 2007, the Constitutional Council, seized by the President of the Republic, took the same position as reached in its previous decision related to the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe. Given that some provisions hindered the essential conditions for the exercise of national sovereignty and new prerogatives granted to Parliament called for the intervention of the constituent power, the constitutional judge declared that the ratification of the Treaty must be preceded by an amendment of the Constitution.²⁰

In order to ratify the Treaty of Lisbon, a Government Draft was tabled with amendments of a scope beyond the observations expressed by the Constitutional Council. The draft was passed in identical terms and approved in Congress by 560 parliamentarians, whereas the required majority would have been attained with 445.

Finally, the Constitutional Law of 23 July 2008 aimed at modernising the institutions of the Fifth Republic by improving the control of the executive power, strengthening the powers of Parliament and allocating new rights to citizens. This constitutional amendment was unusual in the sense that it was the only amendment to be adopted spontaneously, without being a consequence of a decision of the Constitutional Council or an advisory opinion of the Council of State.²¹ The Constitutional Law was narrowly approved in Congress by 539 parliamentarians

¹⁷ Rideau 2010, p. 1238 (as translated by the authors).

¹⁸ Dero-Bugny 2009, pp. 1957–1958 (as translated by the authors).

¹⁹ Ibid., pp. 1956–1963. See also Carcassonne 2013, p. 386.

²⁰ Constitutional Council, 20 December 2007, Traité modifiant le traité sur l'Union européenne et le traité instituant la Communauté européenne, Decision No. 2007-560 DC.

²¹ Rideau 2008.

(the minimum required was 538 votes). The amendment further enhanced the involvement of the Parliament in the EU decision-making process. Indeed, the Government's duty to inform Parliament was extended by deleting the sole reference to provisions of legislative nature. As a consequence, Parliament may scrutinise any future EU act, regardless of its content. Moreover, this constitutional amendment softens the duty to hold a referendum for the accession of any new state to the EU. Henceforth, Parliament may authorise accession according to the procedure applicable for adoption of a Government Draft to amend the Constitution.

1.2.4 Strictly speaking, there are no EU-related amendment proposals that have not materialised in practice. It is however possible to evoke the particular case of the ratification of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe. Most of the approval process in Congress for the Constitutional Law aimed at bringing the French Constitution in line with this Treaty had been completed. However, in order to complete ratification, the President of the Republic decided to submit the Government Bill to a referendum of the French people. On 29 May 2005, 55% of voters responded 'No' to the question: 'Do you approve the bill authorising the ratification of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe?'. Several more and less rational arguments have been offered to explain this failure. For part of the population, the EU is considered as a cause of their deteriorating living conditions and the expression of an economic liberalism they fear. Moreover, the very expression 'European Constitution' has opened a Pandora's Box, spreading fears of a general loss of national sovereignty. There are also external considerations, such as the Turkish accession issue. Despite the introduction of a duty to hold a referendum for any future accession of a state to the EU in the constitutional text, fear of Turkish accession undoubtedly had an impact on the outcome of the referendum.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1–1.3.4 It seems appropriate to us to give a single response to the questions in this sub-section.

With a view to European integration, the French Constitution has been significantly adjusted in order to allow transfers of competences to the European Communities and the European Union. In this regard, Art. 88-1 is now viewed as the 'basis for participation in the European Union and transfers of competences'.²² The consent for these transfers is considered to be at a basic level, beyond which all new transfers of competences that are not covered by this provision call for a constitutional amendment. The role of the Constitutional Council appears essential. Based on the relevant case law of the constitutional judge, its position can be outlined as follows. First of all, the relevant case law is cited to recall the ²² Ibid. (as translated by the authors).

constitutional provisions related to the principle of national sovereignty. The constitutional judge then typically sets out the ability of France to consent to limitations of sovereignty.²³ In other words, such a limitation exists, particularly in the light of the participation of France in the European Union, as integrated into the French Constitution through its now omnipresent Art. 88-1. In its case law prior to 1992, the constitutional judge used to draw a distinction between limitations of sovereignty which were allowed, and transfers of sovereignty which were not. In a decision of 9 April 1992 on the Treaty of Maastricht, as well as in subsequent decisions, the constitutional judge abandoned this rather theoretical distinction.²⁴

However, this is far from giving blanket approval to any transfers of competences. The Constitutional Council holds that respect for national sovereignty does not preclude France from consenting to transfers of competences, with the requirement that there be no contradictory constitutional provisions and so long as such transfers do not constitute a breach of the ‘essential conditions of the exercise of national sovereignty’.²⁵ To test this, the constitutional judge looks at the matter under review, the extent of the transfer as well as the safeguards protecting the exercise of sovereignty. Put in another way, as Boyron has clearly stated, the test of ‘the essential conditions of the exercise of national sovereignty’ has therefore two aspects: a substantive one – whether the subject matter of the transfer compromises national sovereignty – and an institutional one – whether the institutional design still guarantees the exercise of sovereignty. This two-stage reasoning helps the Council identify the concrete implications of transfers or limitations of competences and avoid vague theoretical pronouncements.²⁶

The primacy of EU law over national law has to be considered from two different points of view. On the primacy of EU law over French law, there is indeed no longer any debate.²⁷ The relationship between EU law and the Constitution is, however, to be defined in a different way. In this context, both the Council of State²⁸ and the Court of Cassation – especially in its Fraisse ruling²⁹ – have rejected the primacy of international norms, including EU law, over the Constitution. However, the way in which the Fraisse ruling is commonly understood may be nuanced. While the Court of Cassation explicitly rejected the primacy of international commitments in general over the Constitution, the Court of Cassation only concluded that the right relied on by the applicant did not fall within ²³ Paragraph 15 of the Preamble of the 1946 Constitution states that ‘[s]ubject to reciprocity, France shall consent to the limitations upon its sovereignty necessary to the organisation and preservation of peace’.

²⁴ Boyron 2013, p. 220.

²⁵ Rideau 2010, p. 1230.

²⁶ Boyron 2013, p. 222.

²⁷ Court of Cassation, 24 May 1975, Société des cafés Jacques Vabre, No. 73-13556; Council of State, 20 October 1989, Nicolo, No. 108243.

²⁸ Council of State, 30 October 1998, Sarran et Levacher, No. 200286, 200287.

²⁹ Court of Cassation, 2 June 2000, Fraisse, No. 99-60274.

the scope of Community law. It is not clear how the Court of Cassation would have reacted if the alleged right had fallen within this scope.³⁰

For the constitutional judge, the French Constitution is the supreme norm in the domestic legal order, which is clear from the decision of the Constitutional Council on the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe.³¹

The case law of the Constitutional Council in relation to the transposition of EU directives is important in this regard. In a 2004 decision, the Constitutional Council considered that the transposition of directives into internal law results from a constitutional requirement, but added that a conflict with an ‘express clause of the Constitution’ can constitute an obstacle.³² Two years later,³³ the Constitutional Council rephrased this reservation in response to criticism of the previous wording.³⁴ Thus it held that transposition results from a constitutional requirement unless it is in contradiction with ‘a rule or a principle inherent to the constitutional identity of France, except when the constituent power consents thereto’. The Council of State shares this view.³⁵ The scope of the constitutional identity is not easy to define. Most legal scholars mention the principle of religious neutrality (the famous French laïcité), without further clarification. The above development in the case law can be considered as a reaffirmation of the primacy of the French Constitution over EU law for two reasons. First, the duty to transpose directives, and thus the primacy of EU law over national law, is based on Art. 88-1 of the French Constitution. The place of the Constitution at the top of the Kelsenian pyramid of norms is not called into question. Secondly, the reservation as formulated by the constitutional judge provides the constitutional judge with the possibility to set aside the primacy of EU law, and in so doing to stress the ‘kingdom of the Constitution’.³⁶

Finally, the IVG case law of the Constitutional Council should be mentioned.³⁷ Since this decision, the constitutional judge has held that assessing the compatibility of Union law with French law is not a matter of constitutional control, and has left this control to the ordinary courts. However, this does not mean that the judge sits

³⁰ Roux 2010, p. 265.

³¹ Constitutional Council, 19 November 2004, Traité établissant une Constitution pour l'Europe, Decision No. 2004-505 DC. See also, for example, Constitutional Council, 20 December 2007, Traité modifiant le traité sur l'Union européenne et le traité instituant la Communauté européenne, Decision No. 2007-560 DC; Constitutional Council, 3 December 2009, Loi organique relative à l'application de l'article 61-1 de la Constitution, Decision No. 2009-595 DC.

³² Constitutional Council, 10 June 2004, Loi pour la confiance dans l'économie numérique, Decision No. 2004-496 DC.

³³ Constitutional Council, 27 July 2006, Loi relative au droit d'auteur et aux droits voisins dans la société de l'information, Decision No. 2006-540 DC.

³⁴ Burgorgue-Larsen 2011, p. 216.

³⁵ Council of State, 22 February 2007, Société Arcelor Atlantique et Lorraine, No. 287110.

³⁶ Camby 2004, p. 888 (as translated by the authors).

³⁷ Constitutional Council, 15 January 1975, Loi relative à l'interruption volontaire de la grossesse, Decision No. 74-54 DC.

in an ivory tower, totally impermeable to EU law. In this regard, the so-called Melki saga is evidence of a conciliatory attitude towards EU law. Indeed, after the Court of Cassation requested a preliminary ruling but before the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) responded as to whether the French priority preliminary ruling procedure on the issue of constitutionality violates EU law, the constitutional judge attempted to give an interpretation of this new French mechanism that would not conflict with EU law principles, and was successful.³⁸

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The power of Parliament relating to the EU decision-making process has increased following a number of constitutional modifications enshrined in Arts. 88-4 to 88-7 of the Constitution.

On the one hand, the Government has a duty to inform Parliament, which has steadily increased. Indeed, the Government must lay before the National Assembly and the Senate EU drafts or proposals for acts, whether or not they are legislative acts,³⁹ on which these Assemblies may adopt a so-called European resolution. Although Parliament is ever more involved in the EU decision-making process, the normative value of such resolutions remains weak. Thus, as Professor Carcassonne has pointed out, ‘even though their content clearly indicates to the executive power the position of one Assembly on the subject ..., they have no legal effects, and are not in the nature of a mandatory instruction sent to the Government’.⁴⁰

On the other hand, two other provisions introduce new rights for the parliamentary assemblies. First, Parliament checks respect of the subsidiarity principle. For this purpose, the French Parliament can pursue a direct dialogue with the European Parliament, the Council of the European Union and the European Commission by issuing a reasoned opinion as to the conformity of the relevant proposal for a European act with the subsidiarity principle. Moreover, if a European act breaches the subsidiarity principle – or is suspected of doing so – the French Parliament can bring an action before the ECJ.⁴¹

Finally, under Art. 88-7 of the Constitution, Parliament is granted the possibility to oppose the modification of rules governing the passing of certain EU acts by reference to the simplified procedure or to judicial cooperation in civil matters, by means of adopting a motion voted by both Assemblies in identical terms.

The role that could be played by Parliament in any future accession of a state to the EU should also be underlined. In order to short-circuit the duty to hold a ³⁸ Constitutional Council, 12 May 2010, Loi relative à l'ouverture à la concurrence et à la régulation du secteur des jeux d'argent et de hasard en ligne, Decision No. 2010-605 DC.

³⁹ Jacqué 2014, p. 231.

⁴⁰ Carcassonne 2013, p. 384 (as translated by the authors).

⁴¹ Ibid., p. 289.

referendum, the constitutional amendment of 23 July 2008 provides that Parliament may issue authorisation for any accession by passing a motion adopted in identical terms by a three-fifths majority.

1.4.2 Since the adoption of the Constitution of 4 October 1958, nine referendums have been held. Three of them have stood out due to their European subject matter.

The first such referendum was held on 23 April 1972, in order to authorise the accession of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom to the European Communities. The explanation for the choice to submit these accessions to popular approval may be found in the conflicting relationships reigning between France and the United Kingdom at that time, after the first accession attempt had been refused by General De Gaulle in 1961. French voters were asked whether they approved of Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom joining the EEC. The wishes of President Georges Pompidou in favour of massive support were apparently heard, as the accession of these states was approved by some 60% of the votes. It should be mentioned that the use of Art. 11 of the Constitution in this context was contested in French legal doctrine according to which this accession did not alter the functioning of French institutions.⁴²

In 1992, France was one of the few Member States that chose a referendum in order to ratify the Treaty of Maastricht. On 20 September 1992, the Treaty was narrowly approved with 51% of the votes. A lack of consensus within the French political class may explain the nearly tied result. The boundaries were clearly set between those who considered the ratification to be necessary for a step further in the integration process, and those who understood ratification as a step towards a loss of national sovereignty and galloping economic liberalisation.

In 2005, France was again one of the few Member States to require a referendum for ratification of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe. A favourable consensus seemed to reign this time within the political class, apart from some deviant voices coming from traditional parties and the classic hostility coming from the radical left and right. Although a positive result had been expected, the No side collected some 55% of the votes at the referendum organised on 29 May 2005. The reasons for this failure have already been identified. Some were recurrent, such as a loss of national sovereignty and barefaced economic liberalism.

To predict whether future referendums will be organised is a bit like staring into a crystal ball. It should, however, be stressed that in principle any new accession of a state to the EU is to be approved by a referendum, as already explained above. While this requirement has been moderated by the constitutional amendment of 23 July 2008, it remains entirely possible.

⁴² Dero-Bugny 2009, p. 1957.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 Most of the constitutional amendments related to the EU in France have been the consequence of judicial decisions. Professor Rideau has summed up the situation as follows: ‘A total of five constitutional amendments out of seven are due to decisions of the Constitutional Council, one was considered as necessary following an advice of the Council of State, only the last one [the constitutional amendment of 23 July 2008] was adopted spontaneously’.⁴³ Traditionally, if a competent judicial body identifies inconsistencies between the French Constitution and an EU Treaty, the constituent power puts an end to this conflict by proceeding with a constitutional amendment.

Such a technique is only effective with a flexible Constitution. It is thus necessary to highlight the link between the frequency of constitutional amendments in this context and the ease with which the Constitution can be amended.

It is difficult to assert that the opinion of legal scholars has been taken into account. It is however possible to mention a plausible exception. The constitutional amendment of 25 March 2005 introduced the duty to hold a referendum on any further accessions of a state to the EU into the constitutional marble. This provision, which provides a good example of the ‘inclusion of politics into the legal field’,⁴⁴ incited the wrath of a significant proportion of legal scholars, as emphasised above. The constitutional amendment of 23 July 2008 came to soften this duty by providing for parliamentary authorisation under certain conditions. In this respect, it is not unreasonable to think that the legal doctrine may have had an impact on this adjustment.

1.5.2 Not applicable.

1.5.3 It is imperative that constitutional norms gradually adjust to the progress of the European construction, while nevertheless ensuring that Parliament does not see its role reduced to a minimum. Overall, we find that the French Constitution responds to these goals satisfactorily.

In France, the constitutional amendments in relation to the growing impact of EU law can be understood by the role played by the Constitutional Council. Indeed, when the constitutional judge finds an incompatibility between an EU Treaty and the French Constitution, the constituent power is expected to correct it. It is in this way that all European treaties negotiated since the Treaty of Maastricht have required an amendment of the Constitution, with the exception of the Treaty of Nice.

In this context it may be worth mentioning that there has been a long-standing proposal to introduce a ‘general Europe clause’ in the Constitution. Such a provision would be consistent with the previous observation. Professor Carcassonne has set out the problem in the following terms: as ‘France has clearly made its choice

⁴³ Rideau 2008.

⁴⁴ Dero-Bugny 2009, p. 1956 (as translated by the authors).

[to participate in the EU], would it not be better to put this in the Constitution once and for all?”.⁴⁵ However, as Professor Carcassonne has also pointed out, the psychodrama of the failure of the ratification of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe has disturbed the apparent quietude around the EU. To this day the proposal continues to be part of a long-running story. We fully share the opinion of Professor Carcassonne that ‘when the situation is stabilised, there will still be time to ... introduce the “general Europe clause”. Until then, Europe merits some hesitation in Versailles or some referendums, even if they are not successful.⁴⁶

Another proposal, which will be further explained in Part 3 (Sect. 3.1.4), may also be worthy of mention here. It relates to the introduction of a pro homine clause in the Constitution, which aims to guarantee an extensive protection of human rights to every individual.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 The Preamble of the French Constitution contains a direct reference to the protection of fundamental rights by proclaiming recognition of the rights enumerated by the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789, the Preamble of the 1946 Constitution and the 2004 Charter for the Environment. Even though they are not formally incorporated in the Constitution, these rights have a constitutional rank. Indeed, the Constitutional Council declared in its 1971 Liberté d'association decision that it conceived itself as the guardian of fundamental rights,⁴⁷ and thus deployed the full potential of the reference contained in the Preamble. These guarantees are developed by a case law that has manifestly been inspired by the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR).

Protection is not limited to the rights contained in the aforementioned instruments, since the Constitutional Council also declared that it would protect the principes fondamentaux reconnus par les lois de la République (fundamental principles recognised by the laws of the Republic), which receive constitutional rank by virtue of the recognition of their particular importance by the judge. Other general principles, such as proportionality, are elements of the judicial review performed by the constitutional judges. As the French Republic has opted for a concentrated constitutionality control, it is the Constitutional Council that enforces these rights. Since the 2008 revision of the Constitution, this type of control is triggered either before the entry into force of a legislative act, if 60 members of the Senate or the Parliamentary Assembly or the President of the Republic seize the Council, or a posteriori, if a citizen invokes the violation of his rights as guaranteed by the Constitution during judicial proceedings.

⁴⁵ Carcassonne 2013, pp. 377–378 (as translated by the authors).

⁴⁶ Ibid., p. 378 (as translated by the authors).

⁴⁷ Constitutional Council, 16 July 1971, Loi complétant les dispositions des articles 5 et 7 de la loi du 1er juillet 1901 relative au contrat d'association, Decision No. 71-44 DC.

Furthermore, the Council of State can invalidate governmental and administrative acts if they violate constitutional rights without having any legislative basis. If such acts do have a legislative basis, a violation of fundamental rights can only be neutralised either by interpreting the act in conformity with the Constitution or a general principle of law, or with reference to violation of similar rights protected by a treaty. The Court of Cassation enforces constitutional rights as well as general principles of law in civil and criminal trials. General principles of law (which are to be distinguished from the category of ‘fundamental principles recognised by the laws of the Republic’) can be invoked against governmental or administrative acts, but not against statutory laws.

2.1.2 The relevant constitutional instruments expressly provide for some restrictions that can be imposed on rights, for example Art. 1 guaranteeing the principle of liberty and equality. However, absolute rights such as the right to life or the right not to be subjected to torture or inhumane or degrading treatment cannot be subject to exceptions.

A general principle can be derived from Art. 4 of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, which provides that ‘the exercise of the natural rights of every man has no bounds other than those that ensure to the other members of society the enjoyment of these same rights. These bounds may be determined only by Law.’⁴⁸

In practice, however, the Constitutional Council as well as the administrative, civil and criminal jurisdictions apply a relatively classical test to verify the adequate, necessary and proportionate character of a restriction, similar to the analysis conducted by the CJEU.

2.1.3 The French concept of État de droit is comparable to the rule of law.⁴⁹ It is firmly grounded in Art. 16 of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, which provides that ‘any society in which no provision is made for guaranteeing rights or for the separation of powers, has no Constitution’.

Since the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, dating from 1789, was incomplete, its Art. 16 became the basis for important evolutions. This was particularly true for the right to a fair trial and the procedural safeguards deriving from it, which the Constitutional Council found to be implicitly guaranteed by Art.

⁴⁸ As translated on the Constitutional Council’s website. Available at: <http://www.conseil-constitutionnel.fr/conseil-constitutionnel/english/constitution/declaration-of-human-and-civic-rights-of-26-august-1789.105305.html>.

⁴⁹ For a comparative analysis, cf. Heuschling 2002.

16.⁵⁰ This firmly established case law confirms the strong link between the concept of État de droit and the notion of justiciabilité or access to courts.

Laws come into force on the condition of their prior publication. Article 34 of the Constitution determines the matters that can only be regulated by statute, including the imposition of obligations, administrative charges or penalties and criminal punishments. While matters that are not included in the list set out in Art. 34 fall, according to Art. 37 of the Constitution, into the domain of regulations, the Constitutional Council sanctions cases of incompétence négative, that is, the failure of the legislative power to fully respect its competence as determined by Art. 34 by failing to provide sufficient guarantees to ensure the respect of individual rights.

The granting of constitutional rank to legal certainty has evolved implicitly through case law, as the Constitutional Council has progressively recognised derivatives of the principle of legal certainty: it has consecrated the principle of clarity and intelligibility of statutes,⁵¹ promoted codification as a tool for the rationalisation of legislation and censured non-normative provisions.⁵² Although the principle of non-retroactivity is a constitutional principle, there have been some problems in fully guaranteeing its effectiveness, especially concerning tax law. While the Constitutional Council does allow some limitations of the principle of non-retroactivity, a sufficient general interest is required to validate a retroactive provision. Furthermore, the French legislative power has sometimes tried to discard case law that it does not agree with by passing so-called validation laws, basically stating that an interpretation given by a judge has been erroneous. The Constitutional Council has accepted these laws on six conditions: (i) respect of the principle of separation of powers and res judicata; (ii) respect of the right to an effective remedy; (iii) respect of the principle of non-retroactivity of criminal sanctions; (iv) existence of a sufficient general interest or a constitutional obligation; (v) the validation law cannot be based on an unconstitutional law; and, finally (vi) rigorous definition of its scope.⁵³ Since the Zielinski case before the ECtHR sanctioned this French practice,⁵⁴ the Constitutional Council has applied a stricter control oriented towards legal certainty and the guarantee of fundamental rights.⁵⁵

⁵⁰ Constitutional Council, 20 January 2005, Loi relative aux compétences du tribunal d'instance, de la juridiction de proximité et du tribunal de grande instance, Decision No. 2004-510 DC.

⁵¹ Constitutional Council, 12 January 2002, Loi de modernisation sociale, Decision No. 2001-455 DC.

⁵² Constitutional Council, 29 July 2004, Loi organique relative à l'autonomie financière des collectivités territoriales, Decision No. 2004-500 DC.

⁵³ Cf., inter alia, Constitutional Council, 21 December 1999, Loi de financement de la sécurité sociale pour 2000, Decision No. 99-422 DC.

⁵⁴ Zielinski and Pradal and Gonzalez and Others v. France [GC], nos. 24846/94 and 34165/96 to 34173/96, ECHR 1999-VII.

⁵⁵ Valembois 2005.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 We have not found any relevant national case law on this issue. No preliminary ruling dealing with the balancing of fundamental rights with economic free movement rights has been sent to the ECJ by French courts. Nevertheless, it is entirely possible that this will happen in the near future.

Having said that, there is no doubt that such a balancing has raised constitutional issues. Over the years, the Court of Justice has faced several doctrinal criticisms that its rulings give prominence to economic aspects, which needless to say are inherent in the European construction, over fundamental rights. These assertions may not necessarily result from a permanent fanatical dogma of the CJEU, but rather from a case by case analysis. The reasoning of the CJEU, developed in Schmidberger,⁵⁶ is eloquent in this respect. In this case, the Court of Justice stated that the rights in question, the free movement of goods on the one hand and the right to demonstrate on the other hand, allow restrictions where these are justified. Thus, it has been noted that ‘as the rights at stake were derogable, the Court of Justice considered this as an opportunity to use the balance of interests technique and to check the respect of an appropriate balance between them’ in order to know if ‘an overriding requirement of protection of fundamental rights [is able to] justify restrictions imposed on the exercise of a fundamental freedom guaranteed by the Treaty’.⁵⁷ Such was the case here, which leads us to believe that the Court of Justice would listen to demands for an effective consideration of fundamental rights when faced with requirements resulting from the enjoyment of basic freedoms. However, another commentator has added certain nuances to this, since ‘it is reasonable to think that if the demonstration had been banned by the Austrian authorities on grounds of the respect of the principle of free movement of goods, the Court of Justice would have been sensitive to assessments made by the national authorities’.⁵⁸ More broadly, and as Professor Marguénaud has clearly stated, it is up to the Court of Justice to establish, in the light of the special circumstances of each case, the right balance between the interests in issue.⁵⁹

⁵⁶ Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659.

⁵⁷ Rigaux and Simon 2003, p. 16 (as translated by the authors).

⁵⁸ Belorgey and al. 2003, pp. 2150–2151 (as translated by the authors).

⁵⁹ Marguénaud 2003, pp. 773–774.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 There has been no substantial debate in France concerning the presumption of innocence and the European Arrest Warrant. The departure from the classical extradition procedure certainly implies a departure from a political to a judicial reasoning based on the principle of mutual trust, and thus to an increased tendency to accept arrest warrants. However, as we will explain in the next section, the Court of Cassation has also provided for the possibility to refuse to abide by an arrest warrant if there is a threat to the individual's rights.

2.3.1.2 In general, according to the principle of mutual recognition enshrined in the EAW Framework Decision, judicial review is minimal.⁶⁰ However, the Court of Cassation decided to provide for an additional guarantee when it declared that arrest warrants would be refused if the fundamental rights of the individual or the fundamental principles of Art. 6 TEU were violated.⁶¹

It should be noted, however, that the arguments of the applicant would have to be substantial, since simple allegations would be rejected. Furthermore, a judge's grounds for refusing the execution of an EAW could be strictly controlled by the Court of Cassation and should therefore be well developed. This can be illustrated by the case law of the criminal chamber, which censured the decision of an appellate court that had refused to surrender an individual prosecuted by Belgium unless its authorities guaranteed that he would be offered psychiatric care, a condition that is not included in the Framework Decision.⁶²

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 French judicial authorities as well as legal commentary have been particularly sensitive to the risk of a politicisation of certain types of offences. Indeed, a specific provision regarding the EAW had to be included in Art. 88-2 of the Constitution, worded as follows: 'Statutes shall determine the rules relating to the European arrest warrant pursuant to acts adopted by the institutions of the European Union.'⁶³ This is due to the fact that one of the 'fundamental principles recognised ⁶⁰ Chavent-Leclerc 2010, p. 33.

⁶¹ Thellier de Poncheville 2013 p. 292.

⁶² Court of Cassation, criminal chamber, 28 February 2012 – AJ pénal 2012. 425.

⁶³ As translated on the Constitutional Council's website. Available at: <http://www.conseil-constitutionnel.fr/conseil-constitutionnel/english/constitution/constitution-of-4-october-1958.25742.html#TitleXV>.

by the laws of the Republic' prohibits extradition on political grounds, a condition that is not included in the EAW Framework Decision, which has therefore been criticised by the Council of State.⁶⁴ Thus, there is indeed a risk that individuals prosecuted on political grounds will be extradited, which should be carefully monitored. To fully guarantee the respect of mutual recognition while at the same time substantially relying on this principle, the offences should be determined more precisely to ensure a uniform approach to the European arrest warrant.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 After the finding of a breach of Arts. 6(1) and 6(3)c) of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) by the European Court of Human Rights in the Krombach case,⁶⁵ France replaced its legislation on in absentia judgments with a more suitable procedure in the Perben II law of 9 March 2004.

Concerning the execution of a European Arrest Warrant by French authorities in the case of an in absentia judgment, recent case law stresses the vigilance of the Court of Cassation. Indeed, in one case an individual had been condemned in Florence to seven years in prison for a drug-related offence.⁶⁶ The accused had not been present at the trial because he had not been properly notified of the date and place of the hearing. The Italian authorities issued an EAW for the execution of the sanction, and assured that Italian criminal procedure would allow for the applicant to request a new trial. Although the applicant asserted that the possibility of a retrial was uncertain, the Court of Cassation confirmed the decision of the appellate court to execute the arrest warrant. Thus, the arguments of the applicant were examined seriously and the principle of mutual recognition came into play only after the Italian authorities had provided additional information.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 In France, individuals subject to an EAW can benefit from a state-appointed lawyer to challenge the warrant in court. We suggest that legal aid should be available in the state that receives the arrest warrant as well as the state to which the person risks being extradited.

2.3.4.2 To date we have not been able to gather sufficient statistical data on extraditions.

⁶⁴ Council of State, 26 September 2002, advisory opinion No. 368-282.

⁶⁵ Krombach v. France, no. 29731/96, ECHR 2001-II.

⁶⁶ Court of Cassation, criminal chamber, 15 October 2013 – AJ pénal 2014. 193.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 There have been no similar constitutional issues regarding the principle of mutual recognition.

2.3.5.2 There has been no thorough debate about a generalisation of the Cassis de Dijon principle of mutual recognition to criminal law and civil and commercial disputes. However, as the European Arrest Warrant as well as the mechanism of the Dublin Convention show, the principle of mutual recognition is at the centre of the new areas of EU law. This expansion, although a necessary step for further collaboration, cannot exclusively be met with enthusiasm. Indeed, NGO reports on matters such as the incarceration of asylum seekers and the state of detention facilities in other Member States clearly show that focusing exclusively on mutual recognition is not an adequate response to every scenario. Thus, before the principle of mutual recognition can be generalised, there would first need to be a thorough evaluation of the prevailing standards in all Members States, as well as regular screenings and an alert mechanism in case of a degradation of the relevant standards regarding criminal law and civil and commercial disputes. Member States should also have the right to refuse to respect or to suspend the principle of mutual recognition where there are sufficient grounds to do so (for example on the basis of NGO reports or case law regarding prevailing conditions in prisons or juridical proceedings).

2.3.5.3 In our opinion, the principle of mutual recognition certainly risks transforming the role of the judge into a more passive one. However, this transformation is not inevitable and should in any case not be easily accepted by the judges themselves. Continuous attention to NGO reports, requests for additional information by local authorities as well as the definition of general standards regarding the effective respect of human rights in the other Member States should ensure that loyal cooperation does not trump the protection of fundamental rights.

2.3.5.4 Although there have been no specific discussions about reintroducing national judicial review, the ability to refuse to surrender an individual on the grounds of a possible human rights violation should be included in the concept of the right to a fair trial.

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

One particularly important case regarding the right to an effective remedy has been widely discussed in France.⁶⁷ Jeremy F., a teacher who was criminally charged for child abduction after leaving the UK with an underage student, was the subject of a European arrest warrant addressed to the French authorities. Furthermore, the British authorities sought consent to surrender also with regard to new criminal proceedings for acts of sexual activity with a child under the age of 16. Although Arts. 27 and 28 of the EAW Framework Decision provide for a maximum period of 30 days to reply to an EAW, there were no precise rules as to the possibility of a suspensive appeal. Pursuant to Art. 88-2 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Council held that it had to determine whether the Framework Decision precluded national authorities from providing for such an appeal before addressing constitutional issues. The Grand Chamber of the CJEU⁶⁸ heard the case under the urgent preliminary ruling procedure and held that the wording of the Framework Decision did not preclude Member States from providing for a right to appeal. However, it also stated that ‘to ensure the consistent application and interpretation of the Framework Decision, any appeal with suspensive effect provided for by the national legislation of a Member State ... must, in any event, comply with the time-limits laid down in Art. 17 of the Framework Decision for making a final decision.’⁶⁹ Thus, the judgment of the CJEU hinted at practical difficulties that the Constitutional Council failed to address in its request for a preliminary ruling. The Constitutional Council concluded that the absence of any right of appeal in the given context was unconstitutional.⁷⁰

⁶⁷ See also Burgorgue-Larsen and Bruck 2014.

The case was immediately praised as an example for judicial dialogue. As a first gesture of judicial cooperation, this approach of the Constitutional Council must indeed be welcomed, as opposed to its usual refusal to go beyond a defensive attitude insisting on respect of the French constitutional identity.

However, one cannot but notice the limited consequences of the Constitutional Council’s request for a preliminary ruling for the evolution of judicial dialogue as well as for substantive EU law fostering human rights guarantees. First, the President of the Constitutional Council insisted on the very specific basis of the decision, i.e. Art. 88-2 of the French Constitution.⁷¹ In no way does the approach in Jeremy F. guarantee a more proactive use of Art. 267 TFEU in any other context than the EAW.⁷² Furthermore, the CJEU only accepted the request for the urgent procedure in light of the personal situation of Jeremy F.,⁷³ not because of the delays imposed on the Constitutional Council. Finally, although the brief period imposed on judicial authorities to take a decision makes it virtually impossible to provide for an appeal, the Constitutional Council purposely refused to question the validity of this EU provision. This restraint can be explained by the fact that the Constitutional

⁶⁸ Case C-168/13 PPU F. [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:358.

⁶⁹ Ibid., para. 74.

⁷⁰ Constitutional Council, 14 June 2013, Jérémie F., Decision No. 2013-314 QPC.

⁷¹ Debré 2013, p. 5.

⁷² Except perhaps for cases relating to the Constitutional Council’s aforementioned competence as an electoral judge.

⁷³ Case C-168/13 PPU F. supra n. 68, paras. 29–32.

Council does not consider itself as a judge concerned by Art. 267 TFEU.⁷⁴ It takes more than just one preliminary reference to participate in a constructive dialogue.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 In France, the constitutionality of Directive 2006/24⁷⁵ has not been challenged before the Constitutional Council. The Directive had to be implemented into national law by no later than 15 September 2007; for certain aspects the transposition deadline was extended until 15 March 2009. For once, France did not take long to transpose the directive. It has been noted that ‘the reason is that France still has a national legislative package dealing with data retention; the publication of the decree of 24 March 2006 is to be seen as a continued development’.⁷⁶ Thus, in France, Directive 2004/26 was transposed by decree. For this reason an action against the decree – a recours pour excès de pouvoir – was brought before the Council of State. In its ruling, delivered under the ambit of the Directive amongst other rules, the Council of State rejected the claims. The applicants notably relied on the principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, and on a disproportionate interference with the right to privacy. As regards the first ground, the Council of State stated that the duty to keep traffic data is based on precise rules, which deliberately exclude the retention of information on the content of communications exchanged; the decree distinguishes in a sufficiently clear and precise manner the categories of data which have to be stored, and those which have to be erased or made anonymous.

As regards the second ground, the Council of State stated that ‘the challenged decree does not affect the right to privacy in a manner that is disproportionate to the public security objectives pursued and does not consequently infringe the provisions of Art. 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights’.⁷⁷

It is difficult to clearly know what the position of the Constitutional Council would have been in a purely domestic context without the constraints of the EU legal order. It should be noted that in a domestic context, such national measure would be in the form of a statute, which would likely be challenged before the constitutional judge, who would check its conformity with the Constitution. A decision of the Constitutional Council of 22 March 2012 may hint at a likely

⁷⁴ Debré 2013, p. 5.

⁷⁵ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁷⁶ Lorrain and Mathias 2006, p. 36 (as translated by the authors).

⁷⁷ Council of State, 7 August 2007, Association des fournisseurs d'accès et de services internet, No. 293774 (as translated by the authors).

solution. In this particular case, the constitutional judge was asked to check the constitutionality of the Identity Protection Act. Two provisions were challenged from the viewpoint of the right to respect for private life. Under the first provision, the Act provided for the establishment of a database containing personal data in order to facilitate the collection and conservation of data required for the issuing of French passports and national identity cards. The second challenge provision of the Act enabled officers from the national police departments to gain access to the database for the purpose of preventing or punishing several offences, such as acts of terrorism. The reasoning followed by the Constitutional Council is interesting to the extent that it echoes the reasoning used by the Court of Justice in its Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger ruling.⁷⁸ In the view of the Constitutional Council, ‘the collection, registration, conservation, consultation and communication of personal data must be justified on grounds of general interest and implemented in an adequate manner, proportionate to this objective’. Having said that, the constitutional judge stated that the establishment of a database containing personal data pursues a general interest, since it notably improves the efficiency of the fight against fraud. However, ‘having regard to the nature of the data registered, the scope of this processing, its technical characteristics and the conditions under which it may be consulted, the provisions [under review] violate the right to respect for privacy in a manner which cannot be regarded as proportionate to the goal pursued’.⁷⁹ As a consequence, these provisions were ruled unconstitutional.

If we go back to the premise of a specific national measure dealing with the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks, the right to respect for private life, the right to freedom of expression and possibly the right to presumption of innocence could be raised by applicants. The constitutional judge could effectively protect these constitutional requirements.

However, we cannot fully guarantee that the approach adopted by the constitutional judge would be followed as such in this hypothetical case. Indeed, some decisions of the Constitutional Council are open to criticism with regard to the protection of human rights and freedoms. In this respect, the police custody saga serves as an example. Indeed, the constitutional judge declared some important challenged provisions to be unconstitutional, yet simultaneously stated that its finding of unconstitutionality would only take effect one year later.⁸⁰ This had not been the position adopted by the Court of Cassation.⁸¹ Thus it can be said that the Constitutional Council, unlike some of its European counterparts, frequently exercises excessive judicial restraint.

⁷⁸ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

⁷⁹ Constitutional Council, 22 March 2012, Loi relative à la protection de l'identité, Decision No. 2012-652 DC.

⁸⁰ Constitutional Council, 30 July 2010, M. Daniel W., Decision No. 2010-14/22 QPC.

⁸¹ Court of Cassation, 15 April 2011, No. 10-30316; 10-30242; 10-17049.

In any case, it is not unreasonable to think that if the French constitutional judge were to check the constitutionality of such a national measure, the judge would without much difficulty conclude that a legitimate general interest exists, but that some provisions cannot be regarded as proportionate to the goal pursued. It would remain to be seen whether this finding of unconstitutionality would take effect immediately or at a later time.

Finally, there are grounds to question whether all French legislation respects EU law, since the Directive has been declared invalid by the CJEU. In a communication, the French Data Protection Authority (CNIL) stated that ‘competent authorities have to examine in full detail the impact of the ruling of the CJEU on national law’.⁸² In any event, the French legislation is fragile, for example because it provides for a blanket rule on the retention of data.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 It is worth noting that the CJEU ruling on Heinrich did not lead to controversial discussions within French legal doctrine.⁸³ This may be explained by the fact that the solution proposed by the Court of Justice in this case is not that different from the French practice on this matter. As Dupont-Lassalle has stated, ‘the failure to publish an act makes it unenforceable. This is the traditional approach in the case law of the French Council of State’.⁸⁴ The Council of State, in a decision delivered on 24 February 1999, confirmed this analysis:

In the absence of a decision by the government which prescribes the immediate application of the order, the publication of the act in the Official Journal of 30 November 1996 could not have brought about its entry into force by 30 November 1996 at noon. However, the measures envisaged by this order had also been made public on 29 November 1996 by a communiqué. In the circumstances in question, both in view of the urgent nature of the measures and of their subject, this type of publication made them immediately enforceable.⁸⁵

More broadly, as Bobek has stated, in France ‘the publication of legislation is a condition for its enforceability, but not for its validity’. According to Bobek,

[t]he condition for the validity of an act is its promulgation by the President of the Republic, not its publication. The publication is just a necessary condition for the latter imposition of an obligation on the individual on the basis of the act (opposabilité). Even if not published ⁸² CNIL, ‘La directive 2006/24/CE contraire aux articles 7 et 8 de la Charte des droits fondamentaux de l’Union européenne’, 18 avril 2014, available at: <http://www.cnil.fr/nc/linstitution/actualite/article/article/la-directive-200624ce-contraire-aux-articles-7-et-8-de-la-charte-des-droits-fondamentaux-de-lun/> (as translated by the authors).

⁸³ Case C-345/06 Heinrich [2009] ECR I-01659.

⁸⁴ Lassalle 2009, p. 11 (as translated by the authors).

⁸⁵ Council of State, 24 February 1999, Alain X, No. 188154 (as translated by the authors).

in the Journal Officiel, the act is valid by virtue of its promulgation. It is binding upon the public administration and administrative acts adopted on its basis are lawful, although they cannot be enforced against an individual (ne sont pas opposables).⁸⁶

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 We have not found any relevant case law with regard to the standard of protection of property rights, legal certainty, legitimate expectations, non-retroactivity or proportionality in France in relation to EU measures.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1–2.7.2 In France, the ratification of the Treaty establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) has been less controversial than in other states. A bill was presented to the National Assembly on 8 February 2012 by the Government, which had opted for an accelerated procedure. The bill stresses that ‘this Treaty does not affect the essential conditions for the exercise of national sovereignty: it does not lead to transfer of competences and does not limit the sovereignty of Member States’.⁸⁷ The discussion held before the parliamentary bodies, particularly before the National Assembly, has been rightly qualified as ‘heated’.⁸⁸ Members of Parliament (MPs) mainly debated the necessity of the Treaty, as opposed to the financial implications at stake, which were largely ignored. A handful of MPs of the extreme left expressed their concerns to the National Assembly about an unacceptable questioning of national sovereignty and a democratic regression,⁸⁹ without this being discussed further. A motion to reject the Treaty was refused by a large majority. Ultimately, an overwhelming majority passed the bill both in the National Assembly and the Senate.

Some developments regarding the ratification of the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union can be mentioned insofar as this Treaty was brought in front of the Constitutional Council

⁸⁶ Bobek 2009, pp. 2081–2082.

⁸⁷ Draft law authorising ratification of the Treaty establishing the European Stability Mechanism, No. 4336, available at: <http://www.assemblee-nationale.fr/13/projets/pl4336.asp>.

⁸⁸ Demunck 2012 (as translated by the authors).

⁸⁹ To that effect, see the statements of both Mr. Brard and Mr. Lecoq in the course of the discussion in open session held on 12 February 2014 available at: <http://www.assemblee-nationale.fr/13/critique/2011-2012/20120133.asp>.

before the relevant law was drafted. In a decision of 9 August 2012, the constitutional judge, seized by the President of the Republic, stated that the ratification of the Treaty did not necessitate a constitutional amendment.⁹⁰ Two points deserve to be highlighted. On the one hand, as regards the rules on balanced public finances, the Constitutional Council indicated that respect of the rules on budgetary discipline did not affect the essential conditions for the exercise of national sovereignty – especially since France already had the duty to respect such rules by virtue of the Treaty of Maastricht. On the other hand, as regards the application in national law of the rules on balanced public finances, the Constitutional Council examined the option laid down in Art. 3(2) of the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance, according to which these rules shall come into force ‘through provisions of binding force and permanent character, preferably constitutional, or otherwise guaranteed to be fully respected and adhered to throughout the national budgetary processes’. The foregoing shows two diametrically opposed consequences as to the need to amend the Constitution: in the first case an amendment of the Constitution is necessary; in the second case, it is not required.⁹¹

2.7.3 France has not been subject to a bailout and austerity programme.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Based on the data available in French official sources, it has not been possible for us to identify the number of cases in which applicants have requested a preliminary ruling with regard to the validity of an EU measure since 2001.

From 2006 to the time of writing in January 2015, thirteen preliminary rulings on validity have been sent to the CJEU by French courts. Among these, two cases have been struck off the register of the Court of Justice.⁹² In one case the CJEU held that the action was manifestly inadmissible,⁹³ and in a further case the CJEU found that it clearly did not have jurisdiction to reply to the questions referred by the Prud'homie de pêche of Martigues.⁹⁴ Nevertheless, it should be noted that the validity of a Directive was questioned in four cases,⁹⁵ the validity of a Regulation

⁹⁰ Constitutional Council, 9 August 2012, Traité sur la stabilité, la coordination et la gouvernance au sein de l'Union économique et monétaire, Decision No. 2012-653 DC.

⁹¹ For more information on this ruling, see Oliva 2012; Roux 2012; Levade 2012.

⁹² Joined cases C-411/09 to C-420/09 Tereos [2010] ECLI:EU:C:2010:156, and Case C-618/12 Société Reggiani [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:211.

⁹³ Case C-368/12 Adiamix [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:257.

⁹⁴ Case C-109/07 Pilato [2008] ECR I-03503.

⁹⁵ Case C-127/07 Arcelor Atlantique and Lorraine [2008] ECR I-09895; Case C-59/11 Association Kokopelli [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:447; Case C-618/12 Société Reggiani [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:211; Case C-157/14 Neptune Distribution ECLI:EU:C:2015:823.

was questioned in six,⁹⁶ and the validity of a Decision of the European Commission was questioned in three of the cases from this period.⁹⁷ It is important to first highlight that only one reference regarding validity was truly initiated by an individual⁹⁸ and secondly, that only one EU measure, namely a decision of the European Commission, has been declared invalid by the CJEU. Of the thirteen preliminary rulings on validity identified, two merit particular attention.

First, in Arcelor, Directive 2003/87 establishing a scheme for greenhouse gas emission allowance trading within the Community⁹⁹ was under challenge. Although the preliminary ruling of the Council of State did not have the effect of declaring Directive 2003/87 invalid, it is noteworthy that the equal treatment principle was involved.¹⁰⁰ In this particular case, a company seized the Council of State for annulment of the decree transposing the Directive. Pursuant to the decree, the scheme for greenhouse gas emission allowance trading was applicable to installations in the steel sector, but not to aluminium and plastic companies. The Council of State referred a question on validity on the grounds of the equal treatment principle to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling. As Professor Simon has explained, ‘the difficulty lay in the fact that in EU law, the general principle of equality of treatment includes the prohibition of different treatment in identical situations and of an identical approach to different situations, whereas the French principle, as interpreted on the basis of the relevant constitutional provisions, does not preclude an identical approach to different situations’.¹⁰¹ This was unproblematic. The Court of Justice simply noted in this regard that ‘the reference for a preliminary ruling therefore relates solely to the question whether the Community legislature breached that principle by applying unjustifiable different treatment to comparable situations’.¹⁰² In response to the preliminary ruling, the CJEU first noted that steel, aluminium and plastic companies faced similar situations and, secondly, that the difference of treatment between them is likely to involve a disadvantage for steel companies. However, the Court of Justice found that this difference of treatment can be justified. Thus, ‘by opting, at least in the initial phase, for a sector-specific ⁹⁶ Case C-109/07 Pilato [2008] ECR I-03503; Case C-466/06 Société Roquette Frères [2008] ECR I-00140; Joined cases C-175/07 to C-184/07 SAFBA [2008] ECR I-00142; Joined cases C-362/07 and 363/07 Kip Europe [2008] ECR I-09489; Joined cases C-411/09 to C-420/09 Tereos [2010] ECLI:EU:C:2010:156; Case C-348/11 Thomson Sales Europe [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:169.

⁹⁷ Case C-333/07 Regie Networks [2008] ECR I-10807; Case C-368/12 Adiamix [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:257; Case C-202/14 Adiamix SAS [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2420.

⁹⁸ Case C-109/07 Pilato [2008] ECR I-03503.

⁹⁹ Directive 2003/87/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 October 2003 establishing a scheme for greenhouse gas emission allowance trading within the Community and amending Council Directive 96/61/EC, [2003] OJ L 275/32.

¹⁰⁰ Council of State, 8 February 2007, Société Arcelor Atlantique et Lorraine, No. 287110.

¹⁰¹ Simon 2009, p. 14 (as translated by the authors).

¹⁰² Case C-127/07 Arcelor Atlantique and Lorraine [2008] ECR I-09895.

differentiation ... the Directive has not breached the principle of equal treatment guaranteed as a general principle of Community law'.¹⁰³

Lastly, the preliminary ruling sent by the Administrative Court of Appeal of Lyon¹⁰⁴ deserves mention with regard to the result reached. In this particular case, the applicant company claimed a refund of sums it had paid under the heading of a tax levied in order to finance an aid scheme in favour of local radio stations. The applicant company alleged that the decision of the European Commission (State aid No N 679/97 – France), in which the Commission decided not to raise any objections against this aid scheme, was invalid. Seized of this issue, the Court of Justice stated that the tax under examination formed an integral part of the aid scheme which that charge was intended to finance.¹⁰⁵ As a consequence, the contested decision was invalid.¹⁰⁶

2.8.2 As we have previously explained, the French Constitutional Council is not known for a particularly activist approach. However, we still think that a number of cases – challenging the EU Returns Directive¹⁰⁷ and the Dublin Regulation¹⁰⁸ – show a certain reluctance by the CJEU to fully play its role as a guardian of fundamental rights. This is especially true for the naïveté with which the Court of Justice appears to ignore the practical impact of directives, and validates them based on a general reference to the respect of fundamental rights. Instead, the Court of Justice could adopt a strategy similar to the doctrine of incompétence négative in French law, that is, it should sanction the EU legislator for failure to provide for sufficient guarantees for the protection of fundamental rights in order to ensure that the application of a directive or regulation and of the principle of mutual recognition respects the Charter of Fundamental Rights.

2.8.3 As we have previously stated, French judges are not known for a particularly vigorous approach to fundamental rights protection, unlike some of their European counterparts. However, there are some unique instruments, such as the ‘fundamental principles recognised by the laws of the Republic’ that are welcome signs of a will to guarantee rights corresponding to core values. Furthermore, the administrative jurisdiction, which is also an advisor to the executive, is stereotypically considered to be more deferential than the judiciary. Indeed, Art. 66 of the Constitution only mentions the judicial authority as the guarantor of fundamental

¹⁰³ Simon 2009, p. 15.

¹⁰⁴ Administrative Appeal Court of Lyon, 12 July 2007, Régie Networks, No. 06LY01447.

¹⁰⁵ Case C-333/07 Regie Networks [2008] ECR I-10807.

¹⁰⁶ Idot 2009, pp. 37–38.

¹⁰⁷ Directive 2008/115/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 16 December 2008 on common standards and procedures in Member States for returning illegally staying third-country nationals, [2008] OJ L 348/98.

¹⁰⁸ Regulation (EU) No 604/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 26 June 2013 establishing the criteria and mechanisms for determining the Member State responsible for examining an application for international protection lodged in one of the Member States by a third-country national or a stateless person, [2013] OJ L 180/31.

rights. In the end, although there are sometimes divergent approaches due to jurisdictional dualism, there is no solid scientific data by which to measure the degree of vigour or deference of either one of these judges.

2.8.4 We refer to our previous explanations concerning the primacy of EU law as well as the various human rights requirements established in French case law.

2.8.5 Although the standard of review practised by the Constitutional Council is not particularly progressive and can at times, especially concerning fundamental rights, be rather deferential, the general standard of review by the CJEU still has to be criticised. Indeed, the fairly low level of national judicial review, combined with the presumption of equivalence established by the Bosphorus judgment of the ECtHR, result in a clear gap in judicial review. The review of the CJEU should fully honour its role as a guardian of the respect of human rights, an approach that should be combined with a non-deferential control by the ECtHR once the accession of the EU to the ECHR is completed.

2.8.6 A judgment delivered by the Council of State has provided some clarification on the issue of equality.¹⁰⁹ In the case in question, a decree of 1980 exclusively granted charge of all restoration work on classified monuments to the chief architects of historical monuments. France, warned by the European Commission of the lack of compliance of this provision with the freedom of movement, had to re-examine its position in a decree of 28 September 2008. The decree provided that restoration works on classified monuments belonging to public law persons other than the state or private persons could be carried out by architects from other Member States. In doing so, however, this provision excluded architects established in France. The Council of State found in favour of the applicant with a historical handling of the equal treatment principle, by which it pointed out that the difference in treatment had nothing to do with the purpose of the decree, and that there were no general interest reasons to justify it.¹¹⁰ It has been commented that, with the annulment of this provision on the basis of the equal treatment principle, the Council of State has drawn the necessary conclusions from the gradual shift of the Court of Justice towards a reduction of purely internal situations and towards the suggestion sent to the national courts to impose sanctions in cases of reverse discrimination pursuant to the equal treatment principle as enshrined in the national constitutional or administrative law.¹¹¹

¹⁰⁹ Council of State, 6 October 2008, Compagnie des architectes en chef des monuments historiques, No. 310146.

¹¹⁰ Iliopoulou and Jauréguiberry 2009, pp. 132–144.

¹¹¹ Simon 2008, p. 1 (as translated by the authors).

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 Two points should be stressed. First, use by the Government of the procedure of delegated legislation in order to implement directives in due time has to be mentioned. This procedure, which is provided for by Art. 38 of the French Constitution, is an exception to the provisions of Art. 34. It empowers the Government to ‘ask Parliament for the authorization, for a limited period, to take measures by ordinance that are normally the preserve of statute law’. Ordinances ‘shall come into force upon publication’, but Parliament is not totally bypassed since the ordinances ‘shall lapse in the event of failure to table before Parliament the Bill to ratify them by the date set by the Enabling Act’. Secondly, directives may also be implemented by decree. This was the case, for example, with transposition of the EU Data Retention Directive 2006/24. While transposition of such a Directive by decree may, at first sight, seem misguided in view of the distinction drawn by the French Constitution between matters that fall under Arts. 34 and 37 of the Constitution (regulating matters that can only be dealt with by parliamentary statute), this choice is easily understood if one takes into account the fact that France already had a body of national legislation on the matter before the transposition (see Sect. 2.4). Therefore, the Directive was perceived not as an act imposing a duty to create legislation ex nihilo, but as a means to specify existing legislation.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 There has indeed been ‘a shift away from the national to the European context’. However, we believe that the ‘European consensus’ approach of the ECtHR is different due to the underlying conceptualisation of both legal systems. Indeed, the case law describing the EU as an autonomous legal order, integrated in the legal orders of the Member States, leads the way for the logical consequences in terms of the choice of the relevant ‘common constitutional traditions’. As the CJEU has stated in its Internationale Handelsgesellschaft judgment, ‘the protection of such rights, whilst inspired by the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, must be ensured within the framework of the structure and objectives of the Community’. ¹¹² This clearly explains the reason for the shift from the national to the European context. In our opinion, the cardinal features of the common constitutional traditions are already enshrined in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU (Charter). The next step is for the CJEU to develop them in dialogue with national judges. However, in the context of EU law, the highest possible level of protection is not a question of common constitutional traditions, but rather of a stricter and more progressive judicial review by the CJEU. The reaction of the ¹¹² Case 11-70 Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 01125, para. 4.

CJEU in the Data Retention case shows that it is perfectly capable of defending fundamental rights by referring solely to the Charter.

2.10.2 We do not agree that there is insufficient comparative law analysis, especially since the research division of the CJEU frequently accomplishes this task. Rather, as previously explained, the CJEU simply chooses the standards it deems most appropriate for the EU legal order. In order to achieve a clear shift to higher standards of fundamental rights protection, the CJEU needs to fully understand its role in a post-Charter era and conceive this role as essential to an integration process that has ceased to be purely economic in nature.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 Although there have been no specific national cases regarding Art. 53 of the Charter, the Melloni judgment¹¹³ in itself is reason enough to be critical of the approach of the CJEU. We believe there should be no opposition to stricter national standards, as well as tolerance towards Solange approaches by national judges in order to create a creative dynamic between the CJEU and national courts that will ultimately be beneficial to the protection of rights throughout the EU.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 Political debates on the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision and on the EU Data Retention Directive were very limited, if not virtually nonexistent. The French situation thus unfortunately echoes the concerns of Fair Trials International.

According to the Council of State, a constitutional amendment was needed to introduce the EAW into French law. Based on the minutes of the proceedings in Parliament, it is apparent that the MPs preferred to simply follow the recommendations made by the Council of State, without engaging in a deeper discussion on constitutional rights. As the Robert Schuman Foundation has rightly stressed, this constitutional amendment ‘went largely unnoticed by the general public’.¹¹⁴

As mentioned above in Sect. 2.4, Directive 2006/24 was transposed into French law by decree, thereby denying Parliament of a potential democratic debate. Thus, one can hardly blame Parliament for its lack of activism. However, whenever democratic review is possible, Parliament should not lose sight of its mandate to represent the People, and should not get involved in political squabbles. Democratic control is effective only if it is carried out conscientiously. Finally, some associations and authorities (such as the French Data Protection Authority) have an important warning role to play in supporting constitutional debate.

¹¹³ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

¹¹⁴ Boucher 2003 (as translated by the authors).

2.12.2 In our opinion, concerns do not lie in the existence of room for democratic deliberation as such (even if for example the number of requests for a preliminary ruling on the validity of EU measures sent by French courts to the Court of Justice is low, or that democratic deliberations are poorly developed), but in the real effectiveness that such a space offers. On the one hand, we have already stressed that very few EU measures have been held to be invalid by the CJEU (see Sect. 2.8.1). On the other hand, although regrettable, this can be explained by the requirements for the immediate implementation of EU measures, and for uniformity in implementation. Without a relative elasticity of these two requirements, any room for deliberation cannot be used beneficially.

2.12.3 In principle, we are supportive of a recommendation to suspend the application and carry out a review of EU measures, where important constitutional issues have been identified by a number of constitutional courts. Special attention should, however, be given to the conditions under which this could be applied.

First of all, there should be the requirement of an appropriate number of constitutional courts that raise a constitutional issue for an EU measure to be suspended, in order to avoid excessive threats of suspension but also the risk of the mechanism remaining inefficient if too many courts are required for a veto.

Another question to be addressed is whether suspension would have to be automatic once the necessary number of constitutional courts were involved. In our opinion, this would be unwise. It would also require consideration as to which institution, the European Commission or the Council, would have the right to initiate suspension, or if they would share this right.

In considering such a proposal, an important point to be discussed is whether the review of the EU measure would be a political review in the hands of the European Commission and the Council, or a judicial review before the Court of Justice. This second option would be preferable.

Finally, an intelligent coordination between this mechanism and the preliminary ruling procedure must be ensured, without diminishing the efficiency of the latter, which provides a direct, effective and essential dialogue between the national judge and the Court of Justice.

On the question of defences, if one bears in mind that the EU has an obligation to respect national and constitutional identities, the Commission should take a finding of unconstitutionality by a constitutional court into account as a valid defence. However, such a possibility would have to be subject to all necessary precautions so as to curb potential abuse.

It is up to the European Commission to assess which defences may justify failure to implement a directive, and the Commission should therefore elaborate an explicit analysis grid for this purpose. This analysis grid could in particular allow the European Commission:

- to identify reasons for suspension. The consequence of this would be a distinction between minor and essential issues;
- to determine the position of the competent authorities following a declaration of unconstitutionality in order to respect their European obligations;
- to check whether the respective constitutional court has used the preliminary ruling procedure in order to reconcile the requirements of EU law and of the national constitution.

It follows from the above that the European Commission should take a case-by-case approach instead of rejecting this defence consistently.

Finally, assuming that the European Commission would consider such defence to be valid, the defence should not exempt the Member State from its obligations, but should be taken into account in order to reduce the amount of any penalty imposed.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 As previously explained, we do share concerns about the reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights, especially due to the unnecessary self-restraint on the part of the CJEU.

2.13.2 There has indeed been a substantial and in our view unjustified reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights in the EU. However, this is certainly not an inevitable process but rather the consequence of an excessive focus on the autonomy of EU law, the integration process and the necessity of a uniform application of EU law provisions. A stricter control by the CJEU on matters related to fundamental rights as well as more dedicated national judges would help raise these standards.

Once the accession of the EU to the ECHR is completed, the Bosphorus presumption of equivalent protection should be abolished and a strict external control ensured. As we have previously noted, the CJEU should not only apply a stricter control but also engage in a dialogue with the national courts – which should also proactively question the interpretation or validity of relevant EU law provisions. Furthermore, national parliaments in collaboration with NGOs, national bodies for the protection of fundamental rights and ombudsmen should monitor the application of EU law and debate its impact on fundamental rights. We do not think that an EU Constitutional Tribunal will be necessary once the CJEU and the national courts engage in a dialectic dynamic that is not strictly focused on questions of primacy.

2.13.3 We agree with the criticism of an overly reluctant Court of Justice that is mostly concerned with defending the primacy of EU law, at the expense of human rights protection. The Court should make an effort to take the national points of view into account. One example of such dialogue is the previously mentioned Melki case, in which the Court engaged in direct dialogue with national judicial authorities. However, national judges also have a role to play.

Indeed, when the French Constitutional Council had the chance to seize the CJEU for a preliminary ruling request in the Jeremy F. case (see Sect. 2.3.6), it limited its question to the interpretation of the relevant dispositions. Its role at a European level would have been more constructive if, like the Spanish Constitutional Tribunal in the Melloni case, it had questioned the validity of the provision and thus engaged in a dynamic dialogue with the Court of Justice. Other judges should follow the Spanish example and opt for EU-wide vigilance to guarantee the respect of fundamental rights.

In our opinion, it is crucial to foster dialogue between the CJEU and the national judges in order to properly address national constitutional concerns. However, no tool can replace the necessity for the Court of Justice to apply a stricter standard of judicial review of EU measures.

2.13.4 As previously mentioned, national judges should be more proactive and question not only the interpretation but also the validity of EU law provisions and systematically address the CJEU in this regard, while other institutions should play their monitoring role more effectively and address difficulties encountered in the application of EU law provisions.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 All matters related to the international commitments of the French Republic (except its membership in the EU) are dealt with in Title VI of the Constitution. Article 52 provides that the competence to negotiate and ratify treaties lies with the President of the Republic, while emphasising that the President must be kept informed of all negotiations concerning treaties which do not need ratification. Although the competence of the French President is not exclusive, it should be noted that due to the particular configuration of the Fifth Republic, the influence of the President is predominant.¹¹⁵

However, as provided by Art. 53, the ratification of ‘peace treaties, trade agreements, treaties or agreements relating to international organization, those committing the finances of the State, those modifying provisions which are the preserve of statute law, those relating to the status of persons, and those involving the ceding, exchanging or acquiring of territory, may be ratified or approved only by an Act of Parliament'. The Act of Parliament referred to in Art. 53 entails authorisation to ratify, but is in itself an authorisation to ratify rather than the act of ratification itself, which is adopted by the executive.¹¹⁶

¹¹⁵ Isidoro 2009, p. 1306.

Article 53§3 provides for a supplementary condition, which can be viewed as a limit to transfers of competence, i.e. the necessity of a referendum for any proposal to cede, exchange or acquire territory. Furthermore, Art. 53-1§2 provides that although France can conclude agreements in the area of asylum, these agreements cannot deprive the French authorities of their right to examine any asylum case, regardless of whether they have competence in virtue of the agreements. Thus, France cannot consent to an international agreement that would lead to a relinquishment of this competence. However, the most important limit is set out in Art. 54, which provides that in the case of a finding of unconstitutionality by the Constitutional Council, a treaty cannot be ratified unless the Constitution is amended. In practice, the solution commonly adopted is a revision of the Constitution.

There are no formal guidelines as to the values and principles that ought to be upheld by states when participating in international cooperation. However, §14 of the Preamble of the 1946 Constitution – which is part of the set of provisions referred to in the control of constitutionality – provides that 'the French Republic, faithful to its traditions, shall respect the rules of public international law. It shall undertake no war aimed at conquest, nor shall it ever employ force against the freedom of any people'. Furthermore, the Preamble of the 1958 Constitution reaffirms the commitment of the French Republic to human rights. These provisions relating to peace and human rights could in theory lead a judge to perform a particularly strict review of certain treaties. However, this has not been the case until now, with affirmation of the respect for public international law having only led to the consecration in Art. 55 of the primacy of international law over national laws.

There is only one constitutional provision regarding an international institution, i.e. Art. 53-2 which authorises the Republic to recognise the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court (ICC) as defined by the Rome Statute.

3.1.2 Article 53-2 Article 53-2 providing for recognition of the jurisdiction of the ICC is the consequence of a declaration of unconstitutionality delivered by the Constitutional Council on 22 January 1999.¹¹⁷ As a matter of fact, the very objective of the ICC's jurisdiction was problematic, since it allows for prosecution of any criminal, regardless of the person's official capacity. Thus, it could apply to the French President, which was contrary to Art. 68 of the Constitution. However, since the ¹¹⁶ Burgorgue-Larsen 2009, p. 1316.

¹¹⁷ Constitutional Council, 22 January 1999, Traité portant statut de la Cour pénale internationale, Decision No. 98-408 DC.

French Constitution also declares its broader commitment to peace and human rights,¹¹⁸ the Constitution was amended as a pledge in the fight against impunity.

3.1.3 Along with the suggestion of a general reference to its commitment to the European Union, some scholars have highlighted the necessity of a general reference to the international commitments of France, particularly in the area of human rights. This proposition was in fact formally examined by a commission that was convened to identify potentially useful amendments to the preamble of the current Constitution, chaired by former minister and member of the Constitutional Council Simone Veil. However, in its report, the commission ultimately rejected the idea, since any special mention of European or international human rights law would create a specific constitutional obligation, giving the relevant treaties a privileged status.¹¹⁹ Furthermore, it was feared that such mention would force the Constitutional Council to examine the compatibility of laws with the European Convention on Human Rights, although it had consistently delegated this competence to the ordinary jurisdictions. Finally, the authors of the report have surmised that any special mention of European and international human rights law would deprive the French Republic of the ability to maintain its constitutional specificities. It should be noted, however, that the refusal of the Constitutional Council to examine the compatibility of laws with European law has been severely criticised by some scholars.¹²⁰

3.1.4 As previously stated regarding European Union law (see Sect. 1.5.3), a clause determining the principles and values governing the participation of the French Republic in international co-operation could be useful. Indeed, such a clause would have a particular resonance in the context of international law, which is currently less efficient than are EU treaties. However, it should again be noted that, although symbolically important, such a clause would risk having no concrete effects in practice, since it is not clear how a judge would evaluate and sanction the violation of such a broad guideline.

Nonetheless, one type of clause, the so-called pro homine clause, seems particularly appealing. The consecration of such a clause would guarantee that the individual would always benefit from the highest level of protection, whether it is provided for by European or international treaties or national legislation. As underlined by the Veil Commission, a provision of this type could entail major consequences regarding the control performed by the Constitutional Council, while clearly attributing a privileged status to human rights. As to the threats to France's constitutional specificities, it is the experts' opinion that such specificities should never trump the Republic's commitments to human rights, which would be the sole objective of the pro homine clause.

¹¹⁸ We refer to §15 of the 1946 Constitution.

¹¹⁹ Comité de réflexion sur le préambule de la Constitution, 'Redécouvrir le préambule de la Constitution: rapport au Président de la République', 2009, p. 54.

¹²⁰ For example Carcassonne 1999, pp. 93–100.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 In conformity with §14 of the Preamble of the 1946 Constitution, according to which France respects the rules of public international law, Art. 55 of the Constitution provides that ‘treaties or agreements duly ratified or approved shall, upon publication, prevail over Acts of Parliament, subject, with respect to each agreement or treaty, to its application by the other party’. Thus, there are three conditions to the primacy of treaties in domestic law: formal ratification or approval, publication and reciprocity. However, it should be noted that the condition of reciprocity has been abolished for European Union law¹²¹ as well as human rights treaties.¹²² However, the Council of State has found that customary law does not benefit from primacy.¹²³ Most importantly, it has stressed that no treaty or international agreement, including EU law, can be superior to the Constitution.¹²⁴

Whereas the Constitutional Council refuses to examine the conformity of domestic legislation to treaties and international agreements, arguing that this type of control falls foul of its competence¹²⁵ and should be exercised by courts of ordinary jurisdiction, the Court of Cassation as well as the Council of State have recognised the primacy of international treaties and agreements over domestic law, even law posterior to the agreement in question.¹²⁶ Concerning the application of treaties and with the exception of EU law provisions and the ECHR, which benefit from direct effect in the French legal order, the judge confronted with an international treaty will examine the nature of the invoked provision according to its precision, the intention of the authors, the general economy of the treaty as well as whether it may be directly applicable without an intermediate act.¹²⁷

3.2.2 According to the conditions determined by Art. 55 of the Constitution, a treaty or international agreement comes into force by virtue of its ratification and publication, without the need of its incorporation into the legal order by an act of domestic law. Thus, the French legal order identifies with the monist tradition. Formally, French law still insists on the absolute primacy of the Constitution. However, the constant practice of amending the Constitution rather than ¹²¹ Constitutional Council, 20 May 1998, Loi organique déterminant les conditions d’application de l’article 88-3 de la Constitution, Decision No. 98-400 DC.

¹²² Constitutional Council, 22 January 1999, Traité portant statut de la Cour pénale internationale, Decision No. 98-408 DC.

¹²³ Council of State, 6 June 1997, Aquarone, No. 148683.

¹²⁴ Council of State, Ass., 30 October 1998, Sarran et Levacher, No. 200286, 200287.

¹²⁵ Constitutional Council, 15 January 1975, Loi relative à l’interruption volontaire de la grossesse, Decision No. 74-54 DC.

¹²⁶ Court of Cassation, 24 May 1975, Société des cafés Jacques Vabre, No. 73-13556; Council of State, 20 October 1989, Nicolo, No. 108243.

¹²⁷ Council of State, Ass., 11 Avril 2012, GISTI et FAPIL, No. 322326.

abandoning a conflicting international treaty is a sign of a de facto primacy of international law.

Concerning the distinction between monism and dualism, the experts are not entirely convinced of its complete irrelevance. The disadvantage is a focus on purely formalistic criteria regarding the incorporation of international law. In this sense, doctrines such as pluralism seem better able to conceptualise the relations between legal orders and systems, as they allow both to cooperate in the elaboration of a solution. However, pluralism provides no clear criteria as to what solution should prevail in the end, since the international as well as the national orders have an equally legitimate standing. This conception falls short on the fact that international courts are established for a reason, which is to guarantee the existence of an external control over domestic law.

In our opinion, a more substantial criterion should prevail, i.e. the development of international co-operation which in a sense would strengthen the protection of human rights. This would lead to a monist approach with primacy of international law, with one important exception, i.e. the Solange-scenario. Indeed, since the fostering of international co-operation is not an end in itself but a path chosen to provide for a harmonised guarantee of fundamental rights, national authorities would be legitimate in their refusal to apply international or European law whenever this goal is threatened. However, this exception needs to be conditioned by two limitations: first, a general scope limited to a broader protection of human rights, and secondly, a willingness for dialogue with other national authorities as well as regional and international organisations and institutions in order to trigger a dialectic process allowing for the elaboration of a more adequate rule.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 According to Art. 52 of the Constitution, the President of the Republic has a negotiation competence that is shared with his Government, as well as in some cases with local authorities. Thus, the involvement of Parliament in the initial negotiation process is relatively minor. However, as stated before and according to Art. 53 of the Constitution, the consent of MPs is required for the ratification of ‘peace treaties, trade agreements, treaties or agreements relating to international organization, those committing the finances of the State, those modifying provisions which are the preserve of statute law, those relating to the status of persons, and those involving the ceding, exchanging or acquiring of territory’. It should be stressed that although MPs can debate at this stage, they cannot propose amendments. In the end, they generally vote for a single-article text simply stating consent to the ratification. Their last chance to intervene is if sixty members of the Senate or the Assemblée nationale seize the Constitutional Council to examine the conformity of the treaty with the Constitution. As explained above, a treaty can only validly come into force in the national legal order if there is no declaration of unconstitutionality or if such declaration is followed by an amendment of the Constitution.

3.3.2 The referendums organised in France have been related either to strictly domestic constitutional matters (such as the election of the President of the Republic by direct universal suffrage or the reduction of the presidency to a five year term), to the accession of independence of former colonies or to EU-related matters. None have concerned international organisations or treaties. However, this does not mean that referendums on treaties are banned, since Art. 11 of the Constitution expressly mentions treaties as a possible subject of a referendum.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 First of all, it should be mentioned that matters concerning diplomatic relations as well as the decision to negotiate a treaty or to refuse to do so cannot be subject to judicial review.¹²⁸ However, the validity of the ratification process, especially concerning the conditions of consent by Parliament for certain treaties, is examined by the Council of State¹²⁹ – although failure to abide by the Constitution is of course by no means a way for the state to be exonerated from international responsibility. As we have seen, a further option for judicial review of international treaties is to seize the Constitutional Council on the grounds of the unconstitutionality of some of its provisions, which would, however, in most cases lead to an amendment of the Constitution.

One particularly original technique (albeit rarely) used in France to refuse the application of an international treaty consists in stressing the necessity to abide by the principes fondamentaux reconnus par les lois de la République (fundamental principles recognised by the laws of the Republic). Indeed, although laws and treaties can trump general principles of law, the fundamental principles recognised by the laws of the Republic have constitutional rank, granting them primacy over treaties. A prominent example is the Koné case,¹³⁰ in which the Council of State refused to extradite an individual due to his being prosecuted for political reasons, with reference to said fundamental principles recognised by the laws of the Republic, although the extradition agreement between France and Mali had not addressed the issue. This can be seen as a concrete example of a best practice for a national Solange or Kadi approach focusing on the need to foster the protection of fundamental rights.

¹²⁸ Council of State, 16 November 1998, Lombo, No. 161188; Council of State, Ass., 29 September 1995, Association Greenpeace France, No. 171277.

¹²⁹ Council of State, 18 December 1998, SARL du parc d'activités de Blotzheim et SCI Haselaecker, No. 181249.

¹³⁰ Council of State, Ass., 3 July 1996, Koné, No. 169219.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 Besides a mention of social objectives in national policy in the Preamble of the 1946 Constitution as well as a general declaration according to which France is a ‘democratic and social Republic’ (Art. 1), there are no guidelines as to the social values that the Republic must uphold in its international cooperation. However, while this latter provision could theoretically be mobilised in a proactive strategy concerning European and international treaties, French judges have to date been quite reserved in their judicial review. Again, one could suggest a general clause guiding the international cooperation of France, but its effect in practice would be uncertain.

3.5.2 France has not been subject to a bailout and austerity programme.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 In our opinion, the combination of a general conception allowing for monism with primacy for international law, with the exception of a broader national human rights protection, would be a suitable solution to most difficulties that are likely to arise.

References

- Belorgey J.-M., Gervasoni S., Lambert C. (2003) Actualité du droit communautaire, Libre circulation des marchandises et manifestation sur un axe autoroutier international. Actualité Juridique Droit Administratif 40: 2150–2151.
- Bobek M. (2009) Case C-345/06, Gottfried Heinrich, Judgment of the Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) of 10 March 2009, nyr. CML Rev. 46:2077–2094.
- Boucher J. (2003) Le mandat d’arrêt européen et la constitution française. <http://www.robert-schuman.eu/fr/syntheses/0084-le-mandat-d-arret-europeen-et-la-constitution-francaise>.
- Boyron S. (2013) The Constitution of France. A contextual analysis. Hart, Oxford.
- Burgorgue-Larsen L. (2009) Article 53. In: Conac G., Luchaire F., Prétot X. (eds.) La Constitution de la République française. Analyses et commentaires. Economica, Paris, pp. 1308–1327.
- Burgorgue-Larsen L. (2011) France. The impact of European fundamental rights on the French Constitutional Court. In: Popelier P., Van de Heyning C., Van Nuffel P. (eds.) Human rights protection in the European legal order: the interaction between the European and national courts. Intersentia, Cambridge, pp. 211–236.
- Burgorgue-Larsen L., Bruck V. (2014) Dialogue in the Making: The Relationship between EU law, the ECHR and French Constitutional Law. In: Mezzetti L. (ed.) International Constitutional law. Giappichelli Editore, Turin, pp. 69–97.
- Camby J.-P. (2004) Le droit communautaire est-il soluble dans la Constitution? Revue du droit public et de la science politique en France et à l’Etranger 4:878–888.

- Carcassonne G. (1999) Faut-il maintenir la jurisprudence issue de la décision n° 74–54 DC du 15 janvier 1975? Les Cahiers du Conseil constitutionnel 7:93–100.
- Carcassonne G. (2013) La Constitution. Éditions du Seuil, Paris.
- Chavent-Leclerc A.-S. (2010) Le contrôle minimum de la Cour de cassation sur la décision de remise. Procédures 7:33–36.
- Debré J.-L., Simon D. (2013) Le Conseil constitutionnel et le droit de l'Union européenne. Europe 7:4–5.
- Demunck C. (2012, February 24) Mécanisme européen de stabilité: projet de loi de ratification adopté par l'Assemblée nationale. <http://www.dalloz-actualite.fr/>.
- Dero-Bugny D. (2009) Article 88–5. In: Conac G., Luchaire F., Prétot X. (eds.) La Constitution de la République française. Analyses et commentaires. Economica, Paris, pp. 1956–1970.
- Fékl M. (2008) Les révisions de la Constitution: stabilité et réformes de la norme fondamentale. Les Petites Affiches 138,43–49.
- Gicquel J.-E. (2013) La Constitution du 4 octobre 1958. Textes et commentaires. Lexis Nexis, Paris.
- Heuschling L. (2002) Etat de droit – Rechtsstaat – Rule of Law. Dalloz, Paris.
- Idot L. (2009) Remise en cause de la taxe parafiscale française sur les régies publicitaires. Europe 2:37–38.
- Iliopoulos A., Jauréguiberry A. (2009) La première condamnation d'une discrimination à rebours 1:132–144.
- Isidoro C. (2009) Article 52. In: Conac G., Luchaire F., Prétot X. (eds.) La Constitution de la République française. Analyses et commentaires. Economica, Paris, pp. 1297–1307.
- Jacqué J.-P. (2014) Droit constitutionnel et institutions politiques. Dalloz, Paris.
- Lassalle J. (2009) Publication. Europe 5:10–11.
- Levade A. (2012) TSCG et Constitution française: quand l'interprétation fait la compatibilité! Constitutions 4:575–580.
- Lorrain A.-C., Mathias G. (2006) Données de connexion: la publication du premier décret ou la première pierre d'un édifice encore inachevé. Revue Lamy Droit de l'immatériel 17:35–38.
- Marguénaud J.-P. (2003) La conciliation de la libre circulation des marchandises et des droits fondamentaux garantis par la Convention européenne des droits de l'homme. Revue Trimestrielle de Droit Civil 4:773–774.
- Oliva E. (2012) Le pacte de stabilité devant les juridictions constitutionnelles. Revue Française de Droit Administratif 6:1043–1057.
- Pierré-Caps S. (1998) Les révisions de la Constitution de la Cinquième République: temps, conflits et stratégies. Revue du droit public et de la science politique en France et à l'Etranger 2:409–431.
- Rideau J. (2008) La Constitution en 20 questions. Question n° 12. La construction européenne et la Constitution de 1958. <http://www.conseil-constitutionnel.fr/conseil-constitutionnel/francais/la-constitution/la-constitution-de-1958-en-20-questions/la-constitution-en-20-questions-question-n-12.17359.html>.
- Rideau J. (2010) Droit institutionnel de l'Union européenne. LGDJ, Paris.
- Rigaux A., Simon D. (2003) Entraves résultant d'actes de particuliers. Europe 8–9:15–16.
- Rousseau D. (2013) Droit du contentieux constitutionnel. LGDJ, Paris.
- Roux J. (2010) Droit général de l'Union européenne. Lexis Nexis, Paris.
- Roux J. (2012) Le Conseil constitutionnel et le traité sur la stabilité, la coordination et la gouvernance au sein de l'Union économique et monétaire: Busiris, rue de Montpensier. Revue Trimestrielle de Droit Européen 4:855–876.
- Simon D. (2008) Pourrait-on enfin en finir avec les discriminations à rebours? Europe 11:1–2.
- Simon D. (2009) Contenu du principe d'égalité. Europe 2:14–15.
- Thellier de Poncheville B. (2013) Consécration par la Chambre criminelle d'une cause autonome de refus d'exécution d'un mandat d'arrêt européen tirée du respect des droits fondamentaux. Revue Trimestrielle de Droit Européen 2:18–19.
- Valembois A.-L. (2005) La constitutionnalisation de l'exigence de sécurité juridique en droit français. LGDJ, Paris.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Belgian Constitution: The Efficacy Approach to European and Global Governance

Patricia Popelier and Catherine Van de Heyning

Abstract The Belgian Constitution dates back to 1831 but became more prominent with the introduction of the Constitutional Court in 1980. While initially tasked with adjudication of federal competences, the Court gradually turned into a fundamental rights court. The protection of fundamental rights is predominantly based on the ECHR. The Belgian constitutional system demonstrates a singular openness towards international influences and, in particular, the European integration project. A monist approach, adopted by the Supreme Court in 1971, ensures the smooth implementation and priority of international and EU law, whereas only few instruments exist to temper their impact on constitutional values and fundamental rights or to ensure legitimacy. The disintegration of the Belgian State weakened the concept of national sovereignty, referendums for the approval of treaties are unconstitutional, and ratification of a treaty is not subjected to specific requirements other than a majority vote in Parliament. Overall, the Belgian Constitutional Court gives evidence of a strikingly Europe-friendly attitude, in line with attitudes at the political level and in society. Consequently, both the Europeanisation of constitutional rights and the implementation of international and EU law that potentially restrict fundamental rights, hardly trigger public debate. This approach, however, may change in the future. Surveys demonstrate that confidence in the European integration project is in decline amongst young adults. In 2016, after the submission

Patricia Popelier is Professor of Constitutional Law and Head of the Government and Law Research Group at the University of Antwerp. e-mail: patricia.popelier@uantwerpen.be.

Catherine Van de Heyning is Professor of Human Rights at the University of Antwerp. e-mail: catherine.vandeheyning@uantwerpen.be.

Patricia Popelier wrote Parts 1 and 3, and Sect. 2.5. Catherine Van de Heyning wrote Part 2. All websites accessed 3 November 2015. Text submitted 19 December 2014, with limited updates in November 2018.

P. Popelier (✉) · C. Van de Heyning
University of Antwerp, Antwerp, Belgium e-mail: patricia.popelier@uantwerpen.be

C. Van de Heyning
e-mail: catherine.vandeheyning@uantwerpen.be of this paper, the Constitutional Court for the first time adhered to the constitutional identity doctrine, so far without further consequences. Also, it can be expected that the Constitutional Court would not easily accept external interference that would upset the delicate linguistic balances that are crucial for the stability of a divided Belgian State. Already, (Flemish) political parties are hesitant to join international treaties that they perceive as a threat to such balances.

Keywords The Constitution of Belgium • Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation • The Belgian Constitutional Court Europe-friendliness • ‘Efficacy’ approach • Constitutionalisation of the ECHR Europeanisation of constitutional rights • European Arrest Warrant Advocaten voor de Wereld, nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege/legality principle and access to the legally provided tribunal • Balancing of fundamental rights and market freedoms • Monism • Lack of public debate • Linguistic balances Constitutional review statistics • Absence of review of treaties • Constitutional challenge regarding independent regulatory agencies

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1–1.1.2 Belgium was created in 1830, when the southern region separated from the United Kingdom of the Netherlands. Its Constitution, enacted in 1831, built on the Constitution of the United Kingdom of the Netherlands, the French Charte octroyée of 1830 and the French 1791 Constitution. Only 10 percent of the Belgian Constitution could be considered truly novel.¹ Still, the Belgian Constitution was a model of liberal constitutionalism² that influenced subsequent constitutions in Greece, Spain, Italy, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, Prussia and Romania.³

The Belgian Constitution was drafted as a pragmatic constitution, devoid of a preamble. Underlying principles such as national sovereignty, representative parliamentary democracy, the separation of powers and the rule of law were not explicitly mentioned, but were made concrete in provisions that enumerated fundamental rights and organised the legislative, executive and judicial powers. Initially, the Constitution relied on the elected Parliament and expressed its mistrust of the executive. While it empowered courts to not apply executive acts that are contrary to higher law, it introduced constitutional review of parliamentary acts only in 1980 through the establishment of a Constitutional Court (then ‘Court of Arbitration’ to stress its initially limited competences). By then, the Supreme Court had already broken the inviolability of Acts of Parliament by empowering courts to review such acts in the light of directly applicable international law.⁴

¹ Gilissen 1968, pp. 897–910.

² Popelier and Lemmens 2015.

³ Gilissen 1968, p. 132; Alen 1984, pp. 897–910.

The Constitutional Court has gradually grown into a fully fledged human rights court that has constitutionalised the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and relies heavily on the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR). The Constitutional Court's power was initially limited to the competence to allocate rules between the federal state and the regional entities, but was widened in 1988 to include ensuring the equality clause and the clause protecting the rights and freedoms concerning education. While this situation lasted up to 2003 before Parliament conferred on the Court the right to directly review legislation for compatibility with fundamental rights and freedoms set out in the Constitution, this intervention only confirmed the powers that the Court had already assumed by linking the equality and non-discrimination clause with fundamental rights as protected by the Constitution or international treaties. The Court has now become an important actor in the constitutional field, providing individuals with an instrument to challenge Acts of Parliament which they consider as ignoring their interests.⁵ Although the Constitutional Court has in 21% of the cases found an Act of Parliament to violate the Constitution,⁶ Parliament has maintained confidence in the Constitutional Court.⁷

According to Art. 33 of the Constitution, all powers are derived from the 'Nation' as opposed to the 'People'.⁸ The idea of national sovereignty was inspired by French constitutional theory, and implied a functional concept of the right to vote. Only in 1893 did the Constitution introduce universal (plural) voting. This was gradually widened, with equal suffrage for men introduced in 1918 and extended to women in 1948. Moreover, whereas the idea of a 'Nation' presupposes the notion of a single and undivided country, the Constitution now recognises that Belgium is a multinational federation. It enumerates four linguistic regions, divides the federal Parliament into two language groups and requires linguistic parity in the federal Government. While these two evolutions seem to have emptied the concept of national sovereignty, Art. 33 is still referred to as a constitutional obstacle for the organisation of nation-wide referendums. Meanwhile, the Constitution does allow for local advisory referendums and, since 2014, for advisory referendums organised by the subnational Regions.

⁴ Cass. 27 May 1971, (1971) Pas. I, 886.

⁵ Empirical research shows that participation in both annulment cases and preliminary references is largely dominated by private parties, especially individuals, followed by interest groups and firms. See De Jaegere 2017, pp. 100–111.

⁶ De Jaegere 2017, p. 135.

⁷ It should be taken into account that violations mostly concern minor points, referring to small parts of the Act, whereas more fundamental pleas are rejected.

⁸ All translations of the Belgian Constitution are from the translation by the Legal Department of the Belgian House of Representatives, available at the website of the Constitutional Court, http://www.const-court.be/en/basic_text/belgian_constitution.pdf.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1–1.2.3 The Belgian Constitution prescribes a rigid amendment procedure, which involves the enumeration of articles to be amended, the subsequent dissolution of Parliament and the revision of the enumerated articles by a two-thirds majority in both chambers of the newly elected Parliament.

This procedure has been used four times for reasons of EU membership. Three categories of amendments can be distinguished in this respect: (1) articles providing a constitutional basis for, or reinforcing the legitimacy of, the transfer of rights;⁹ (2) articles inserted in order to bring the Belgian legal system into conformity with EU obligations¹⁰ and (3) articles regulating domestic issues with regard to or by linking them to European elections.¹¹ In what follows, they are listed in chronological order.

Article 34 was inserted in 1970 so as to retroactively provide for a legal basis for the accession of Belgium to supranational organisations in general.¹² The Belgian Constitution does not include a specific ‘Europe clause’. Article 34 of the Belgian Constitution stipulates in a general way that ‘the exercising of specific powers can be assigned by a treaty or by a law to institutions of public international law’.

Secondly, in 1993, on the occasion of the fourth state reform that turned Belgium into a federal state, three amendments were linked to the European integration project. In this process, for the first time, the term ‘supranational’ appeared in the Constitution.

According to Art. 196 of the Constitution, the federal legislative and executive powers can legislate in place of the federated entities (Regions and Communities) ‘in order to ensure the observance of international or supranational obligations’. The constituent power specifically had the infringement proceedings laid down in the EU treaties in mind.¹³ However, the provision does not give any indication as to how to distinguish ‘international’ from ‘supranational’ obligations. Also, the special majority law that implements Art. 169 does not provide for a different procedure for ‘supranational’ compared to ‘international’ obligations: in both cases, the federal authorities can only act as substitutes for a federated entity to comply with the judgment of an international or supranational court that has condemned the Belgian state for the non-observance of an international or supranational obligation committed by a Community or Region, on the condition that the federated entity was ⁹ Articles 34 and 168 Constitution.

¹⁰ Articles 8 and 196 Constitution.

¹¹ Articles 46, 117 and 168bis Constitution.

¹² By then, the Treaties establishing the European Steel and Coal Community, the European Economic Community and the European Atomic Energy Community had already been ratified. About the chronology of events, see Louis 1970, pp. 410–411 and Valticos 1984, pp. 13–15.

¹³ Now Arts. 258 and 260 TFEU. See Parl. Doc., Senate, Extraordinary Session 1991–92, No. 457/1, 2–3.

given a declaration of infringement and was involved in the entire procedure for the settlement of the dispute, including the procedure before the Court. In 2014, the special law was amended in order to simplify the substitution mechanisms in matters concerning the reduction of greenhouse gases in execution of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. In these matters, the federal authority can already act as a substitute if, for example, the European Commission declares an infringement in conformity with Art. 258 TFEU.

In 1993 as well, Art. 168 was inserted in the Belgian Constitution, granting the Houses the right to be informed of negotiations concerning any revision of the EU treaties.¹⁴ Article 168 gives evidence that the Constitution regards the EU treaties as special, as it leads to specific information obligations, whereas in the case of other treaties Parliament can only agree or disagree with the treaty after the negotiations have taken place. The constituent power aimed at giving greater legitimacy to the increasing transfer of powers to the European level.¹⁵ The Government promised to inform Parliament in a similar way regarding ‘treaties of the same nature’, which for example imply transfers of powers to similar supranational organisations,¹⁶ but this was never explicitly inserted in the Constitution. This promise has not gained much importance in practice. As an example of ‘treaties of the same nature’, the Government has referred to the Western European Union.¹⁷ This organisation, however, never carried much weight and was dissolved in 2011, with the EU having taken over its tasks.

Article 117, inserted in the course of the same fourth state reform, mentions the European Parliament, but only to secure a fixed legislative term for the parliaments of the federated entities, which, for the first time, were directly elected. According to this provision, community and regional parliamentary elections, as a rule, take place on the same day and coincide with European parliamentary elections.

A third phase occurred in 1998 when a provision was inserted in the Constitution in order to comply with the EU requirement, laid down in the Maastricht Treaty and EU directives, to give EU citizens the right to vote for municipality councils. As Art. 8 of the Constitution requires that a person have Belgian nationality for the exercise of core political rights such as the right to vote, the constitutionality of the ratification of the Maastricht Treaty was contested.¹⁸ In July 1998, the European Court of Justice (ECJ) established the failure to timely implement the EU directives regarding the right to vote and rejected the necessity to follow a rigid constitutional

¹⁴ A similar obligation is inserted in Art. 16 § 2 Special Majority Law on the Reform of the Institutions, this time in favour of the federated parliaments, if the treaty touches upon their competences.

¹⁵ Craenen 1993, p. 89 and Ingelaere 1994, p. 81.

¹⁶ Parl. Doc. Senate 1991–1992, 100-16/2, 16; Parl. Doc. House 1992–1993, 797/3, 9.

¹⁷ Parl. Doc. Senate 1991–1992, 100-16/2, 16.

¹⁸ This was already a point of critique in the advisory report of 6 May 1992 of the Council of State, Legislation Division, on the law regarding the approval of the Maastricht Treaty, Parl. Doc. House of Representatives, Extraordinary Session 1991–1992, 48-482/1, 70–71.

amendment procedure as a justification for non-compliance.¹⁹ The Constitution was revised in 1998 and implemented in 1999.²⁰ The third paragraph added to Art. 8 of the Constitution now allows Parliament to establish the right to vote for EU citizens ‘in accordance with Belgium’s international and supranational obligations’. According to a fourth paragraph, this right can be extended to Belgian residents who are not citizens of an EU Member State. Hence, the Constitution allows Parliament to give a right to vote to non-Belgian citizens, whether EU citizens or not, but the extent of this right to vote depends upon EU law. In other words, the Constitution restricts the powers of Parliament, but refers to the EU to decide upon the substantive limits: the right to vote can only be given to residents in Belgium who are not Belgian citizens, in so far as EU law obliges Belgium to confer this right to EU citizens.

Finally, Art. 168bis was inserted in the Constitution in 2012, stating that a special majority law is to determine special rules regarding the election of the European Parliament, with a view to protecting the ‘legitimate interests’ of French- and Dutch-speaking people in the former province of Brabant. This article should be read against the background of Belgian multinational conflict management. When Brussels-Halle-Vilvoorde, Belgian’s only electoral district across language borders, was split after decades of Flemish struggle, this provision ensured that francophone people in certain Flemish municipalities around the borders of Brussels could still vote for candidates on francophone electoral lists. The political parties wanted to insert this in the Constitution to secure it against actions before the Constitutional Court.²¹ As this article, along with other provisions required for the sixth Belgian state reform, was not mentioned in the list of constitutional articles that can be amended, a temporary provision was added to Art. 195 that lays down the amendment procedure. This provision allowed for constitutional amendment without prior dissolution of Parliament, but only to insert these articles and only during the one legislative session following the elections in 2010.

The same temporary provision enabled the amendment of Arts. 46 and 117, to provide that parliamentary elections at the federal level will also take place on the same day as the elections of the European Parliament, and that if the federal Parliament is dissolved before its term expires, the next term may not extend beyond the day when the election of the European Parliament following this dissolution is held. Article 46 of the Constitution, however, requires the adoption of a special majority law – and hence a new two-thirds majority and agreement in both language groups – for bringing the latter rule into force. At the same time, the regional parliaments may decide to choose another date for regional elections. Hence, the fixed five-year-term for the election of the European Parliament is now used to stabilise federal rather than regional legislatures.

¹⁹ Case C-323/97 Commission v. Belgium [1998] ECR I-04281.

²⁰ Law of 27 January 1999, Official Gazette 30 January 1999.

²¹ Parl. Doc. Senate 2011–2012, No. 5-1562/1, 2.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfers of Powers

1.3.1 Although Art. 33 of the Constitution states that ‘all powers emanate from the Nation’ and that these powers ‘are exercised in the manner laid down by the Constitution’, the sovereignty principle has never stood in the way of European integration. This was a project embraced by both the political and legal elites.

As mentioned in the previous section, Art. 34 of the Constitution provides for a constitutional basis for the transfer of powers to the European Union or other international or supranational organisations. A law adopted by an ordinary majority suffices to this effect. Until May 2014, the approval of both the House of Representatives and the Senate was required; since then, only the House of Representatives has this competence. No special procedural or substantive requirements apply apart from the obligation to inform Parliament. However, as EU treaties, as a rule, affect the federal and the federated entities, the approval of both the federal and the federated parliaments is required.²²

1.3.2–1.3.3 Where the Constitution remains silent on the subject of the relations between domestic and international legal norms, the Belgian courts have filled this void. Already in 1971, the Cour de Cassation (hereinafter Supreme Court) pronounced its milestone Franco Suisse Le Ski judgment, which established the primacy of self-executing international law over national law.²³ Although the case concerned EEC law and the judgment was a reply to the emerging ECJ case law pronouncing the primacy of EEC law, the Supreme Court gave primacy to all international law on the basis of a newly accepted monist theory. In the Orfinger case, the Conseil d'Etat, the Belgian Supreme Administrative Court (hereinafter Council of State) clarified that on the basis of Art. 34 of the Constitution, EU law also presides over the Constitution.²⁴ Through this article, EU law, including ECJ case law, becomes part of the domestic legal order. In turn, the Supreme Court invoked the ECJ’s Internationale Handelsgesellschaft judgment to recall that constitutional rights cannot call the validity of primary or secondary EU law into question.²⁵

The Constitutional Court also positions itself as a Europe-friendly court. It has no competence to directly review Acts of Parliament against the yardstick of international or supranational law, but does so indirectly, through the equality clause laid down in Arts. 10 and 11 of the Constitution, and by interpreting fundamental rights in conformity with similar treaty rights. It accepts the primacy of ²² Article 167, § 4 of the Constitution and Cooperation Agreement.

²³ Cass. 27 May 1971, (1971) Pas. I, 886.

²⁴ Council of State 5 November 1996, 62.922. This was confirmed in three other decisions of the same date: Gosse, Gerfa and De Baenst.

²⁵ Case C-11/70 Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 01125; Cass. 2 June 2003, No. S020039N, www.juridat.be.

international law over national legislation²⁶ and readily refers preliminary questions to the ECJ concerning both interpretation and validity issues.²⁷ In the period 2000–2014, the Constitutional Court referred to the ECHR in 32% of its judgments, to EU law in 10% and to other international law in 18% of cases.²⁸ Also, it quoted both ECJ and ECtHR case law in 9% and 14.3% of its judgments, respectively.²⁹

On the other hand, the Constitutional Court has assumed the power to review parliamentary acts giving assent to treaties.³⁰ In this way, it indirectly reviews the content of treaties against the Constitution. In the case of a violation, the parliamentary act cannot be applied, and the treaty is deprived of legal power within the domestic legal order. Although the Court had shown reluctance to also consider petitions challenging Acts providing for assent to an EC/EU treaty,³¹ Parliament has interfered to ensure the smooth implementation of EU law. As a result, the Constitutional Court no longer has jurisdiction to reply to preliminary references concerning an Act of assent to an EU Treaty or to the European Convention on Human Rights or its Protocols.³² Consequently, EU treaties cannot be challenged before the Constitutional Court through the Act providing for assent, except by way of an annulment request. In such case, however, specific time limits lessen the effectiveness of this option, as the request has to be lodged before the Court within 60 days after publication of the Act. Legal concerns regarding EU treaties can still be raised by the legislation division of the Council of State. The Government is obliged to ask the Council's independent expert advice, but is not bound by it.

Until now, the Constitutional Court has seemed to accept the supremacy of EU law over the Constitution without limitations. Although in doctrine its stance regarding secondary norms of EU law has been called ambiguous,³³ the Court has refused to consider the validity of an EU directive or regulation, or the law implementing such act, if Parliament does not dispose of discretionary leeway. It has considered the unity of the European Union and has referred to the ECJ if the validity of an EU act has been at stake.³⁴

What is noteworthy is the Care Insurance case, where the Constitutional Court invalidated a Flemish statute following a preliminary ruling of the ECJ even though this cut across the constitutional criteria for the distribution of powers between the ²⁶ It even regards itself explicitly as ‘a guardian of EU law’, see Const. Court No. 151/2003, 26 November 2003.

²⁷ It referred 24 preliminary questions to the ECJ in a period of 18 years (1997–2014). The frequency gradually increased, with four preliminary references in 2012 and in 2013.

²⁸ De Jaegere 2017, p. 186–190.

²⁹ Ibid.

³⁰ For the first time in Const. Court. No. 26/91, 16 October 1991.

³¹ Const. Court No. 76/94, 18 October 1994 (annulment request).

³² Article 26, § 1bis Special Majority Law on the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court applied this rule even before the provision came into force, Const. Court No. 3/2004, 14 January 2004.

³³ Cloots 2008, pp. 50–52.

³⁴ Const. Court No. 128/2009, 24 July 2009.

Belgian federal level and the federated communities.³⁵ However, the Constitutional Court, while claiming to fully abide by ECJ rulings, sometimes deviates in a silent or hidden way. In one case, the Constitutional Court ignored an ECJ ruling that restrictions of intra-Community trade require a specific analysis on the basis of scientific studies.³⁶ In the Money Laundering case, the Constitutional Court explicitly stated that it followed the ECJ ruling, according to which the Directive did not violate Art. 6 ECHR, but it accepted the implementing law only in so far as it was given a broader interpretation than the one provided by the ECJ.³⁷ A more explicit example is the Bressol case, in which the Constitutional Court openly disagreed with the ECJ on whether the financial implications of students from other Member States could justify measures restricting access to higher education on the basis of nationality.³⁸

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 Article 34 of the Constitution is a general enabling clause, which does not impose specific procedural requirements or substantive restrictions to a transfer of powers. A simple majority in Parliament suffices. If a treaty contains a provision that is contrary to the Constitution, ratification should be preceded by an amendment of the Constitution, which implies a renewal of Parliament and a two-thirds majority. In reality, however, this procedure is not followed and, as mentioned, Parliament has barred the possibility to refer a preliminary question to the Constitutional Court regarding the constitutionality of a parliamentary act giving assent to an EU Treaty or the ECHR.

Dual federalism, however, complicates the procedure. In Belgium, the federated entities ('Communities' and 'Regions') are treated as being at an equal level with the federal Government, and external relations are governed by the principle 'in foro interno, in foro externo'. As EU treaties are usually 'mixed treaties', comprising matters that in the national legal order belong to the field of competences of both the federal level and the federated entities, the approval of all federated parliaments is required. At the federal level, until May 2014, an ordinary majority in both the House of Representatives and the Senate was required. The Belgian constituent power did not seize the opportunity to transform the Senate into a more genuine chamber of the federated entities, to simplify the procedure and give federated parliaments the right

³⁵ Const. Court Nos. 33/2001, 13 March 2001 and 11/2009, 21 January 2009; Case C-212/06 Gouvernement de la Communauté française et Gouvernement wallon [2008] ECR I-01683. For a critical view regarding the ECJ's refusal to respect the institutional autonomy of federal Member States, see Verschueren 2011, pp. 211–223.

³⁶ Compare Case C-480/03 Clerens & bvba Valkeniersgilde v. Walloon Government Order of 1 October 2004 (unpublished), with Const. Court No. 28/2005, 9 February 2005.

³⁷ Const. Court No. 10/2008, 23 January 2008. More on this case in Popelier 2012, p. 84.

³⁸ Const. Court No. 89/2011, 31 May 2011, B.4.4.–4.5.

of approval only through the Senate. Instead, the constituent power unequivocally opted for a veto right for each subnational parliament, even the smallest amongst them, and denied the Senate the power to give approval to treaties. Theoretically, the Parliament of the German-Speaking Community could obstruct the coming into force of a European Treaty, even though, with 75,000 inhabitants, it represents less than 1% of the Belgian population.³⁹

Despite the functioning of an advisory committee on European Affairs composed of members of the House of Representatives as well as Belgian members of the European Parliament,⁴⁰ the involvement of Parliament in EU decision making is relatively weak. This was demonstrated in a study comparing parliamentary control capacity, based upon the strength of special parliamentary committees on European affairs, access to information and voting instructions.⁴¹

As mentioned, Art. 168 of the Constitution contains specific information obligations in the case of negotiations on a revision of the EU treaties. The subsidiarity mechanism following from the subsidiarity protocol⁴² is not enshrined in the Constitution. However, prior to this protocol, a special majority law inserted the obligation to inform regarding all normative acts of the European Commission and gave the federal and federated parliaments a right to give advice.⁴³

The federated parliaments are also involved in the subsidiarity procedure. The Belgian Declaration No. 51 holds that the term ‘national parliaments’ in the EU Treaties encompasses subnational parliaments in the Belgian legal order.⁴⁴ A co-operation agreement was signed by the eight chairs of the legislative assemblies in 2005, which was revised in 2008, and then again in 2017 in light of the latest state reform and the transformation of the Senate. A conflict may arise, as the reformed Senate no longer has powers in international and EU affairs,⁴⁵ whereas Art. 7 of the Protocol states that ‘in the case of a bicameral Parliamentary system, each of the two chambers shall have one vote’. According to the co-operation agreement, each federated parliament can submit a reasoned statement, and votes are cast in such a way that federal and subnational opinions are positioned next to one another, without fostering institutional dialogue.⁴⁶ The revised co-operation agreement does not differ in this respect.

1.4.2 The Belgian constitutional system does not allow for the organisation of nation-wide referendums. While the Constitution does not explicitly ban

³⁹ See Rimanque 2002, p. 76.

⁴⁰ Article 68 Rules of Regulation of the House of Representatives.

⁴¹ Raunio 2005, p. 324.

⁴² Protocol (No. 2) on the Application of the Principles of Subsidiarity and Proportionality.

⁴³ Article 92*quater* Special Majority Law on the Reform of the Institutions.

⁴⁴ Declaration No. 51 of the Kingdom of Belgium on the national parliaments, 17.12.2008, PB C 306, 287.

⁴⁵ One exception concerns Acts of Parliament that implement supranational or international obligations if the federated entities have failed to do so, based on Art. 169 Constitution.

⁴⁶ Popelier and Vandenbruwaene 2011, p. 223.

referendums, it is inferred from Art. 33, which refers to the ‘Nation’ as the source of all powers instead of the ‘People’, and which states that all powers are exercised in the manner laid down in the Constitution. Hence, referendums can only be held in so far as the Constitution allows for it. One nation-wide (advisory) referendum was held nevertheless, in 1950, concerning the position of King Leopold III after World War II. As this referendum aggravated the political crisis it was intended to resolve, nation-wide referendums are not only considered unconstitutional, but they are also regarded as a threat to the delicate balance between the two major language groups which constitute the divided Belgian state. The reason is that the outcome of a referendum may clearly demonstrate the cleavage between the Flemings and francophone people, while lacking the instruments to mitigate the differences.⁴⁷

The Constitution does explicitly allow for local advisory referendums and, since the recent sixth state reform, gives the right to organise advisory referendums to the federated Regions within their exclusive spheres of competence.⁴⁸ As EU treaties are mixed treaties, regional referendums regarding the approval of these treaties are excluded. Regularly, proposals are submitted in the federal Parliament aimed at enabling or requiring the organisation of referendums regarding the approval of (EU) treaties in general,⁴⁹ a particular EU treaty⁵⁰ or the accession of a (possible) new Member State.⁵¹ These proposals are initiated by members of various Flemish as well as francophone political parties, from left-wing to right-wing. Nevertheless, they are hardly ever discussed.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.2 Reasons for EU amendments Article 34, enabling the transfer of powers to international organisations, was inserted into the Constitution in 1970, in order to end ongoing debate on whether access to the European Communities was ⁴⁷ Popelier 2005, pp. 115–116.

⁴⁸ Article 39bis Constitution.

⁴⁹ Parl. Doc. House of Representatives 2010–2011, 53-999/1; 2007–2008, 52-794/1; 2007–2008, 52-332/1; 2004–2005, 51-1818/1; Senate 1995–1996, 1-295/1; 1995–1996, 1-293/1; 1995–1996, 1-161/1.

⁵⁰ Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance: Parl. Doc. House of Representatives 2011–2012, 2105/1; Parl. Doc. Senate 2011–2012, 5-1613/1; Treaty of Lisbon: Parl. Doc. House of Representatives 2007–2008, 52-591/1; 2007–2008, 52-584/1; Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe: Parl. Doc. House of Representatives 2003–2004, 51-317/1; 2003–2004, 51-297/1; 2003–2004, 51-281/1; 2003–2004, 51-1531/1; 1988–1989, 47-757/1; Senate 2003–2004, 3-950/1; 2003–2004, 3-282/1; 2003–2004, 3-250/1; Senate, 1988–1989, 595/1; Treaty of Amsterdam: Parl. Doc. House of Representatives 1997–1998, 1429/1; Parl. Doc. Senate 1997–1998, 2-889/1; Treaty of Maastricht: Parl. Doc. House of Representatives 1991–1992, 48-576/1; Parl. Doc. Senate 1991–1992, 1-440/1.

⁵¹ Turkey: Parl. Doc. Senate 2003–2004, 3-919/1; List of 12 countries: Parl. Doc. House of Representatives, 2000–2001, 50-1094/1; 1999–2000, 509/1.

in conformity with the Constitution. Several constitutional experts were of the opinion that joining a supranational Europe violated Art. 33 of the Constitution, which states that all powers emanate from the Nation and are exercised in the manner laid down by the Constitution.⁵² Other experts, along with the legislative chambers, argued that Art. 33 only referred to domestic issues and did not prevent the transfer of powers to international organisations.⁵³ The legislation division of the Council of State took a middle position, stating that the Constitution did not allow for the transfer of ‘essential prerogatives’ assigned to the national authorities.⁵⁴ The legislative assemblies, however, opted for a firm constitutional basis, considering the changing nature of modern international organisations.⁵⁵

Legality concerns also explain the insertion of a provision in Art. 8 of the Constitution, enabling the right to vote for non-Belgian citizens of the European Union. The Council of State had, on several occasions since 1980, pointed out that a constitutional amendment was required if non-Belgian residents were to be granted the right to vote for municipality councils.⁵⁶ Hence, unsurprisingly, the Council of State considered the law giving approval to the Treaty of Maastricht unconstitutional, as this Treaty introduced the right of every citizen of the Union residing in a Member State of which he is not a national, to vote and to stand as a candidate in municipal elections.⁵⁷ Parliament approved the treaty nevertheless, relying on the Government’s argument that implementation of the treaty required the issuing of a directive.⁵⁸ The Constitution was finally amended in December 1998, four years after the issuing of the directive.⁵⁹ The rigid procedure for constitutional amendments, requiring the renewal of Parliament, as well as disagreement regarding the extension of the right to vote to non-EU citizens residing in Belgium, explain this belated action.

⁵² See in particular the opinion by Dor G., Ganshof van der Meersch W.J., De Visscher P. and Mast A., Parl. St. House of Representatives 1952–1953, 696.

⁵³ See also Rimanque and Wouters 1998, p. 10. Both positions were reflected in the Council of State’s advice of 12 January 1953, Parl. Doc. House of Representatives 1952–1953, 163.

⁵⁴ Council of State, advice of 12 January 1953, Parl. Doc. House of Representatives 1952–1953, 163. For this reason, it considered that approval of the European Defence Community Treaty violated the Constitution, unless justified by an inescapable and urgent necessity. The same position was held in subsequent advice, but ignored by the political actors. For an overview, see Velaers 1999, p. 236.

⁵⁵ Commission Report, Parl. Doc. Senate 1969–1970, No. 275.

⁵⁶ Council of State, Advice of 22 October 1980, Parl. Doc. House of Representatives 1985–1986, 262/2, 3–10. For an overview, see Velaers 1999, p. 59.

⁵⁷ Advice of 6 May 1992, Parl. Doc. 1991–1992, 48-482/1.

⁵⁸ Parl. Doc. House of Representatives, Special Session 1991–1992, 48-482/1, 90. The Council of State refuted these arguments: Advice of 6 May 1992, Parl. Doc. 1991–1992, 48-482/1, 71.

⁵⁹ Council Directive 94/80/EC of 19 December 1994 laying down detailed arrangements for the exercise of the right to vote and to stand as a candidate in municipal elections by citizens of the Union residing in a Member State of which they are not nationals, [1994] OJ L 368/38.

1.5.3 The role of the Belgian Constitution in a multilevel environment Legal systems within the EU that are obliged to implement EU law in the domestic legal order are faced with the question of the extent to which limitations of power that follow from external sources can be accepted, while maintaining legitimacy within the legal order. Two main approaches can be discerned: an ‘efficacy approach’, which is predominantly occupied by the concern for efficient through-put of EU law, and a ‘legitimacy approach’, which is specifically concerned with providing legitimacy to inflowing EU law.⁶⁰ If a legitimacy approach is adopted, ideally, (a) the transfer of powers is submitted to special procedural and/or substantive conditions, (b) the precedence of EU law over the constitution is contested and (c) constitutional or supreme courts play the role of watchdogs over the constitution, assuming the power to ultimately delineate competences. If an efficacy approach is adopted, (a) the transfer of powers to the EU is allowed without special formal conditions, (b) the precedence of EU law over national law, including the constitution, is uncontested and (c) the judicial review of EU laws and treaties is constrained.

In Belgium, an efficacy approach clearly dominates. First of all, Art. 34 of the Constitution that allows for the transfer of powers does not impose specific conditions other than a law adopted by a simple majority (a). The precedence of EU law over the Constitution is uncontested (b) and the courts, including the Constitutional Court, are Europe-friendly (c). This is in line with the general approach towards European integration that Belgium has taken from the outset, along with other small countries such as the Netherlands and Luxembourg, because national interests in terms of both the economy and international relations have coincided with EU interests.⁶¹ Of course, public sentiment towards the European Union evolves, in which case an efficacy approach may harm the perceived legitimacy of the European project. Until now, Belgian citizens have still been positive about the EU and its democratic functioning, when compared to other citizens of the EU.⁶² A recent survey nonetheless reveals that support for the European integration project is decreasing amongst young adults.⁶³

The efficacy approach is somewhat undermined by the consequences of dual federalism, as every federated entity has to give assent to an EU treaty. The sixth state reform gave the opportunity for a more efficient procedure. As the Belgian Senate was transformed into a genuine chamber of the federated entities, it would have been sensible to simplify the procedure and give the federated entities the right of approval only through the Senate. In that case, the federated entities would have been denied a veto right, but they would still have been able to discuss a treaty

⁶⁰ Popelier 2014a, pp. 300–319.

⁶¹ Bribosia 1998, p. 32.

⁶² See the Belgian report for the Standard Eurobarometer 80, L'opinion publique dans l'Union européenne – Rapport National Belgique, fall 2013, http://ec.europa.eu/public_opinion/archives/eb/eb80/eb80_be_fr_nat.pdf.

⁶³ Elchardus and Te Braak 2014.

jointly, and veto the treaty under ordinary or specific majority requirements. By contrast, the Belgian constituent power opted for a more confederal approach and maintained the federated entities' veto rights, while depriving the Senate of its right of approval.⁶⁴

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 Fundamental Rights and General Principles of Law in the Belgian Constitution

2.1.1 The Belgian Constitution clusters the constitutional rights and freedoms in Title II Constitution titled 'on Belgians and their rights'.⁶⁵ This chapter is quite extensive as to the number and nature of constitutional rights entrenched therein, including the rights of the child and several social and economic rights (the right to education, work, housing). Certain classic fundamental rights included in the Constitution provide broader protection than analogous rights entrenched in international or regional treaties, e.g. prohibition of the imposition of pre-emptive measures which may hinder the enjoyment of specific rights and freedoms such as the right to enter into associations.⁶⁶

The Constitution provides for a number of general principles of law without, however, formally distinguishing between principles and rights. For example, the Constitution provides for the prohibition of retroactive legislation or punishment, or the legality principle (nulla poena sine lege) (Arts. 12 and 14 Constitution). Other general principles, such as the proportionality principle, legal certainty and legitimate expectations have not been entrenched in the Constitution.

Constitutional rights are enforceable in courts. First, the Constitutional Court provides centralised constitutionality review, by examining the compatibility of legislation with the constitutional rights entrenched in Chapter II of the Constitution and a given number of other constitutional rights. If the Court finds legislation to be incompatible, it annuls the legislation. Secondly, ordinary courts and administrative courts provide decentralised review. If they find secondary legislation to violate the Constitution or statutes to violate international treaties, they can disapply (not annul) the provisions in question or provide a constitutionally conforming interpretation of the legislation. The Act on the Constitutional Court regulates the interaction between the ordinary or administrative courts and the Constitutional ⁶⁴ On the Belgian confederal approach, compared to the UK centralist and the German federal approach, see Popelier 2014b, p. 17.

⁶⁵ A limited number of fundamental rights have been entrenched in other chapters, including rights concerning fairness in taxation (Arts. 170–171).

⁶⁶ Article 27 Constitution.

Court.⁶⁷ This Act provides for the rules applicable when these courts are obliged to make a reference to the Constitutional Court by means of a preliminary reference procedure.

2.1.2 There is no general limitation clause in the Belgian Constitution. Some specific provisions establishing constitutional rights provide for limitation clauses. The general approach to these limitations is that, in line with the rule of law, limitations to constitutional rights can only be provided by law.⁶⁸ For example, the Belgian Constitution provides for a limitation to the right of peaceful assembly, namely that it must be in accordance with the law.⁶⁹ As such, Parliament is given a wide discretion to regulate the conditions and criteria for peaceful assembly.

However, such limitations are not without restriction. First, in principle, preventive measures to the exercise of constitutional rights and freedoms are prohibited,⁷⁰ in order to ensure the broadest protection of personal freedom.⁷¹

For example, while Parliament may limit the right of peaceful assembly, it may not submit peaceful assembly to prior authorisation.⁷² In addition, certain material limitations have been entrenched in specific provisions. For example, the Belgian Constitution provides that no one can be deprived of his or her property except in the case of expropriation for a public purpose, in the cases established by law and in return for fair compensation remunerated beforehand.⁷³

2.1.3 The Belgian concept of the rule of law, influenced by the classic French notion as developed during the Enlightenment, focuses on protection against arbitrary power. This notion is articulated in formal as well as in material requirements to the exercise of power by government. The Belgian conception of the rule of law (état de droit) is currently understood as protection against the arbitrary use of power by public authorities by requiring that public power be exercised in line with the existing and applicable legal norms.⁷⁴

There is no separate category in the Constitution regarding the rule of law, nor a specific title. However, it is without any doubt that the Belgian polity and Constitution are based on this notion. First, the main principles of the formal concept of the rule of law are explicitly entrenched in the Constitution, in particular the separation of powers (Title III, Title IV, Title V). Secondly, the underpinning ⁶⁷ Special Act of 6 January 1989 on the Constitutional Court, Official Gazette 7 January 1989.

⁶⁸ Van Delanotte considers this an example of the immense trust the 19th century constitutionalists put in Parliament. Vande Lanotte and Goedertier 2010, p. 281.

⁶⁹ Article 26 Belgian Constitution.

⁷⁰ This notion is mentioned explicitly in Arts. 19, 24, 25, 26 and 27 of the Constitution. However, jurisprudence accepts that this prohibition is of general nature and applies in principle to all constitutional rights and freedoms. Wigny 1952, pp. 267–269 and Alen 1995, p. 499.

⁷¹ Wigny 1952, p. 269.

⁷² The only exception provided are gatherings in public space.

⁷³ Article 16 Belgian Constitution.

⁷⁴ Popelier 1997, p. 97; Dujardin et al. 2014, p. 367; Mast and Dujardin 1985, p. 23; Allen 1995, p. 12.

material criteria of this principle are also entrenched as specific rights in the Constitution, such as the equality of all persons before the law (Art. 10), the application of the law without discrimination (Art. 11) and the legality principle with regard to punishments (Art. 14).

Protection of the rule of law has been invoked before the Constitutional Court as a general principle of law of constitutional nature and, thus, the Constitutional Court has been asked to protect given rights read in the light of this general principle.⁷⁵

In several cases the Constitutional Court has reiterated that Belgium is governed by the rule of law and that such conclusion follows from the Constitution itself. The Constitutional Court has held that the Belgian polity is conceived as a state under the rule of law.⁷⁶ Consequently, the Constitutional Court has protected several legal principles and rights on the basis of protection of this notion, such as the legality principle and equality principle. In particular, the Constitutional Court has stated explicitly in several judgments that protection of the rule of law implies that public authorities are subjected to the law and, thus, government is to exercise power in line with the applicable legal norms.⁷⁷ The Constitutional Court additionally protects the material requirements of the rule of law, in particular the protection of constitutional rights and freedoms. The Court has held that protection of the rights of defence and the right to a fair trial ensue from protection of the rule of law by the Belgian legal order.⁷⁸

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights with Economic Free Movement Rights

2.2.1 Historic reasons explain the absence of systemic conflicts between the protection of fundamental rights and economic free movement rights in Belgium. For over 150 years, the Belgian Constitution played only a marginal role in Belgian case law, given that courts were not allowed to review legislation for compatibility with the Constitution.⁷⁹ While courts could provide for a constitutionally conforming interpretation,⁸⁰ the absence of constitutional review restricted the development of a true constitutional jurisprudential culture.

⁷⁵ E.g. Const. Court No. 41/201115, March 2011.

⁷⁶ Const. Court No. 151/200215, October 2002, para. B.3.2.

⁷⁷ Const. Court No. 151/2002, 15 October 2002, para. B.3.2.

⁷⁸ Const. Court No. 98/2008, 3 July 2008, para. B.7; Const. Court No. 77/2012, 14 June 2012, B.3.1.

⁷⁹ The inviolability of legislation was not explicitly provided in the Belgian Constitution or other legislation. However, in a judgment of 1849 the Supreme Court held that courts were not competent to review the constitutionality of legislation. Cass. 23 July 1849, Pas. 1849.

⁸⁰ The Supreme Court held that if several interpretations of legislation were possible, courts were to select the interpretation that conformed to the Constitution. Cass. 20 April 1950, Arr. Verbr. 1950.

Belgian courts were in contrast exposed to the law of the European Community and later of the European Union early on. Belgium was a founding father of the EC and, therefore, the economic free movement rights as developed by the European Community were adopted in the Belgian legal sphere well before the development of constitutional review. In consequence, courts have in general been lenient towards accommodating economic free movement rights, in particular the free movement of goods. Already in 1971, the Court of Cassation proclaimed that domestic law should be set aside when incompatible with directly applicable international law provisions, including European Economic Community rules.⁸¹ As a result, Belgian courts have interpreted domestic norms in line with EU law and, if such coherent interpretation has not been possible, have set aside these norms.

A jurisprudential discussion on the constitutional limits of the precedence of these economic free movement rights of EU pedigree is thus recent. Two evolutions in Belgian constitutional history have put the automatic acceptance of the primacy of EU law over domestic norms into question. First, the development of constitutional review by the establishment of the Constitutional Court awakened a constitutional consciousness within Belgian academic, judicial and political circles.⁸²

Secondly, during the last three decennia Belgium has swiftly transformed from a unitary state to a federal state whereby competences are divided between the federal state and the federated Communities and Regions.⁸³ The equilibriums between the federal state and the Regions and Communities are key to the functioning of the Belgian state and have been entrenched in the Constitution or in legislation of constitutional nature. Consequently, certain EU rules and ECJ jurisprudence touching upon these balances have sparked debate on the limits of the unconditional acceptance of the primacy of EU law.⁸⁴

Nevertheless, the interaction between the protection of constitutional rights and economic free movement rights is in general not considered as problematic. The Constitutional Court has adopted a pragmatic approach: if a conflict occurs between constitutional rights and economic free movement rights, the Court will engage in the discussion by sending preliminary questions to the ECJ requesting a decision on ⁸¹ Cass. 27 may 1971, Arr. Cass. 1971, 959.

⁸² As was explained in Sect. 1.1, the Belgian Constitutional Court was established in 1980 in order to guard the division of competences between the federal state and the regional entities. The competences of the Court were extended over the course of two decennia providing the Court with the competence to review legislation on its compatibility with the constitutional rights and freedoms entrenched in Title II of the Constitution. Finally, the original name of the Court, ‘the Arbitrage Court’, was replaced by ‘Belgian Constitutional Court’, in recognition of the evolution of the court from an arbiter between the federal state and regional entities to a fully fledged modern constitutional court.

⁸³ Supra Sects. 1.1 and 1.4.

⁸⁴ Such federal equilibrium was at stake in the only case where the Constitutional Court explicitly voiced critique on an ECJ judgment. See Const. Court No. 89/2011, 31 May 2011. At the same time EU law has been relied upon to mediate conflicts at the national level, in particular in regard to questions concerning federal conflicts. See Popelier and Voermans 2015, p. 106. More on this issue, see infra Sect. 2.8.1.

the compatibility between the free movement rights and EU fundamental rights. Thus, the potential conflict between a given right and an economic free movement right is not framed as a conflict between a constitutional right and a free movement right, but as a conflict between a (EU) fundamental right and a free movement right. As a result, the Constitutional Court avoids open conflicts between EU law and constitutional law. However, in the literature, certain scholars state that there are constitutional limits to the application of EU law in the Belgian legal order,⁸⁵ for example as regards the balancing of market freedoms and the right to strike or protest (see Sect. 2.6).

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1–2.3.5 The reception and enforcement of the European Arrest Warrant

The implementation of the EAW in Belgian law and its application The European Arrest Warrant (EAW) was implemented in Belgium in 2003.⁸⁶ The Belgian Parliament copied the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision (EAW Framework Decision) almost literally in the implementing act.⁸⁷ The EAW implied essential changes to the Belgian legislation concerning extradition that was applicable before the introduction of the EAW.⁸⁸ First, the Belgian law entrenched the principle of double criminality. A person could only be extradited if the offence for which extradition was requested was also accepted as an offence under Belgian law and was punishable in Belgium and in the requesting state by a prison sentence exceeding one year. The EAW meant that certain exceptions to this principle of double criminality had to be accepted. Secondly, the Belgian law provided that Belgian judges could refuse extradition if the person to be extradited held Belgian nationality. The EAW does not allow for such exception.

Some specifications were, however, introduced, in particular with regard to crimes for which the requirement of double criminality will continue to apply.⁸⁹ The Belgian law stipulates explicitly that abortion and euthanasia will not be considered manslaughter under the list of crimes for which the criterion of double criminality of the offence in the requesting state and Belgium are no longer required.

⁸⁵ Maintaining that the Constitutional Court considers the Constitution supreme Craig 2004, p. 37; Bribosia 1998, pp. 21–22; Bombois 2004, pp. 143–150. Highlighting that the Constitutional Court has not embraced such vision explicitly Popelier 2008, p. 48 and Beirlaen 1992, p. 150.

⁸⁶ Act of 19 December 2003 concerning the European Arrest Warrant, Official Gazette 22 December 2003 (EAW implementing act).

⁸⁷ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁸⁸ Act of 15 March 1874, Official Gazette 17 March 1874.

⁸⁹ Article 5 EAW implementing act, supra n. 86.

The EAW and constitutional challenges Given the essential changes imposed by the EAW on the Belgian system of extradition, it came as no surprise that the EAW, through implementation in Belgium, was tested before the Constitutional Court.

The first decision of the Constitutional Court on the EAW resulted from a procedure initiated by the NGO Advocaten voor de Wereld.⁹⁰ The NGO advocated that the absence of the double criminality (legality principle) requirement for extradition on the basis of an EAW violated the prohibition on discrimination and the right to equal treatment as stipulated in Arts. 10 and 11 of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court referred the question to the ECJ for a preliminary ruling, arguing that the absence of the double criminality principle in the implementing act followed directly from the EAW Framework Decision and, consequently, the question before the Constitutional Court raised an important point on the compatibility between the EAW Framework Decision and fundamental rights.⁹¹

In its 2007 judgment Advocaten voor de Wereld the ECJ decided on the preliminary questions referred by the Belgian Constitutional Court regarding the compatibility of the EAW Framework Decision and the legality and equality principles.⁹² The ECJ accepted that the Framework Decision was to respect fundamental rights, in particular those guaranteed in the ECHR and as they result from the constitutional provisions common to the Member States. For this reason, the Framework Decision should indeed respect the principle of the legality of criminal offences and penalties and the principle of equality and non-discrimination.⁹³ However, the ECJ decided that the Framework Decision complied with those principles.

As regards the legality principle, the ECJ held that this principle does not require the double criminality of offences, but only that legislation must clearly define offences and the penalties they attract.⁹⁴ The ECJ repeatedly emphasised that the Framework Decision by no means intended to harmonise the definition of offences among the Member States, but only to improve mutual co-operation in the field of extradition for the most serious crimes. It was not the intention of the Framework Decision to provide for the definition of offences and penalties, but merely to set the minimum criteria for those offences with regard to which the EAW applies. The Court found the Framework Decision to comply with this principle given that it only provides for extradition for those offences which are punishable in the issuing Member State ‘as they are defined by the law of the issuing Member State’.⁹⁵

⁹⁰ Const. Court No. 124/2005, 13 July 2005.

⁹¹ Both at the level of the Constitutional Court and the ECJ more technical judicial questions were raised concerning the competence to enact the Framework Decision and implementing act. However, for the purpose of this contribution, the focus has been put on the fundamental rights issues concerned.

⁹² Case C-303/05 Advocaten voor de Wereld [2007] ECR I-03633.

⁹³ Ibid., paras. 45–46.

⁹⁴ Ibid., para. 50.

⁹⁵ Framework Decision, supra n. 87, Art. 2(2).

The ECJ argued that the Framework Decision therefore only provides for extradition if the issuing state complies with the legality principle.⁹⁶

As for the equality principle, the ECJ held that the choice of the 32 categories of offences for which the double criminality principle does not apply was objectively justified on the basis of several features, including the seriousness of the offences in adversely affecting public order and safety.⁹⁷

Upon the return of the preliminary judgment of the ECJ, the Constitutional Court reverted extensively to the ECJ judgment, blending the reasoning of the ECJ with other arguments based on the preparatory works of the implementing act.⁹⁸ The Constitutional Court emphasised that the absence of the double criminality principle for certain categories of offences did not imply that there is no judicial control by the judicial authorities. The Court stated that the double criminality principle was replaced by other criteria.⁹⁹ The Court in particular referred to the criteria in the implementing act which define the cases in which the domestic authorities are even obliged to refuse extradition, such as compliance with the non bis in idem principle or age restrictions.¹⁰⁰ It held that in view of the above, there was no violation of the legality and equality principles.¹⁰¹ This judgment is a typical example of the approach of the Constitutional Court vis-à-vis ECJ judgments: the Court will extensively refer to the ECJ judgment, but will add its own reasoning based on its previous case law and parliamentary works, blending the EU contentieux with the domestic constitutional contentieux.

The implementing act was tested for a second time before the Constitutional Court in 2009.¹⁰² This case originated from a preliminary reference by an investigation court. The referring court questioned whether Art. 8 of the implementing ⁹⁶ Case C-303/05 Advocaten voor de Wereld, n. 92, paras. 52–53.

⁹⁷ Ibid., paras. 57–58.

⁹⁸ Const. Court No. 128/2007, 10 October 2007.

⁹⁹ Ibid., paras. B.17.1–B.17.2.

¹⁰⁰ Ibid., para. B.19.

¹⁰¹ In its reasoning the Constitutional Court considered the compatibility of the implementing act with the constitutional rights from the perspective of Art. 6 ECHR. However, in its original request, the NGO questioned the compatibility of the prohibition of the constitutional equality principles in the light of Art. 6 ECHR, but also the constitutional right to have access to the legally provided tribunal (Art. 13 Constitution) and the right to liberty (Art. 12 Constitution). In the reasoning of the Constitutional Court, these articles play no role and no distinct reasoning is provided on the basis of these provisions. More in general, the case law of the Constitutional Court on procedural rights is almost entirely developed on the basis of Art. 6 ECHR and not on the basis of Art. 13 of the Constitution. The same is true with regard to Art. 5 ECHR and Art. 12 of the Constitution.

¹⁰² Const. Court No. 128/2009, 24 July 2009. In contrast to the Advocaten case, this judgment did not follow an application for annulment by an NGO, but originated from a preliminary reference from an investigation court, i.e. a court that decides at the end of a criminal investigation whether the case will be referred to a court which can decide on the merits of the case. In this case, the referring court limited the preliminary reference to a question on the compatibility of the implementing act with the right to equality (Arts. 10 and 11 Constitution).

act violated the prohibition on discrimination and the right to equal treatment as stipulated in Arts. 10 and 11 of the Constitution. Article 8 of the implementing act provides that a judge cannot refuse the extradition of a person because the foreign judgment on the basis of which the European arrest warrant was delivered resulted from a trial in absentia.¹⁰³ The Constitutional Court decided again that the provisions of the implementing act followed directly from the European Framework Decision and for that reason referred the question to the ECJ.

In contrast to the Melloni case, the preliminary question by the Constitutional Court did not question the compatibility of extradition in the case of an in absentia trial as such.¹⁰⁴ The Belgian Constitutional Court merely asked whether extradition, in the case of an in absentia trial where the person concerned would have the opportunity in the requesting state to apply for a retrial, could be rendered conditional upon the return of the extradited person for the execution of the sentence. The ECJ in its judgment did not consider the case from a fundamental rights perspective.¹⁰⁵ The ECJ decided that the Framework Decision was to be interpreted in such manner as to allow for judicial authorities to render the extradition of a person conditional upon his or her return to the executing state to serve the sentence, if the sentence was imposed in absentia.¹⁰⁶

The Constitutional Court relied on the ECJ judgment when deciding the case, holding that the implementing act was to be interpreted so that judicial authorities could render the extradition conditional upon the return of the person extradited to serve the sentence if this person was convicted in absentia.¹⁰⁷ The Constitutional Court did, however, refer to applicable fundamental rights criteria, in particular the right to a fair trial and ECtHR case law, in deciding that the provision would not be compatible with the right to equal treatment unless it were interpreted as rendering the extradition conditional upon the return of the person to Belgium to serve the sentence in the case of an in absentia trial.¹⁰⁸ Again, the Constitutional Court closely followed the ECJ judgment but added its own reasoning.

2.3.1 Other Relevant Issues in Fundamental Rights and Criminal Law

The Belgian constitutional case law regarding criminal procedure clearly shows the dual impact EU law can have on fundamental rights protection: under certain circumstances EU law might limit the guarantees in domestic constitutional law while ¹⁰³ Const. Court No. 28/2011, 24 February 2011.

¹⁰⁴ Case C-306/09 I.B. [2010] ECR I-10341. For a discussion on in absentia trials, see the preliminary reference question from the Spanish Constitutional Court in Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

¹⁰⁵ There was no reference in the judgment to fundamental rights nor a wider discussion on the compatibility of extradition in cases involving in absentia trial and fundamental rights.

¹⁰⁶ Case C-306/09 I.B., supra n. 104, para. 61.

¹⁰⁷ Const. Court No. 28/2011, 24 February 2011, para. B.2.7.

¹⁰⁸ Ibid., para. B.5.

on other occasions EU law might actually improve the standards of protection. The Money Laundering Directive is an example of such limitation, while the so-called Salduz-Directive exemplifies the potential for upgrading standards of protection.

The implementation of the Money Laundering Directive¹⁰⁹ in Belgian law was highly contested due to the obligation for independent legal professionals, including lawyers, to report information in a listed number of circumstances. This clearly implied a limitation of the professional secrecy of lawyers. The protection of professional secrecy of lawyers is not explicitly set out in the Belgian Constitution. However, it is considered in Belgium as an elementary condition for ensuring the right to an equal and fair trial as protected under Art. 6 ECHR as well as the lawyer-client privilege as protected under Art. 8 ECHR. Therefore, the Belgian Bars asked the Constitutional Court to annul the domestic act implementing the Directive.¹¹⁰ The Constitutional Court referred a preliminary question to the ECJ asking whether the obligation for professionals in the financial sector to report potential money laundering by clients to official authorities, as introduced by the Directive, violated the constitutional prohibition of discrimination read in the light of Art. 6 ECHR.¹¹¹ Given that the Belgian implementing act almost entirely copied the text of the Directive, a finding by the Constitutional Court that the implementing act violates fundamental rights would imply that the Money Laundering Directive suffered the same flaws.

In its judgment Ordre des barreaux francophones et germanophone, the ECJ answered that the Directive establishing this obligation did not violate the constitutional right to non-discrimination read in the light of Art. 6 ECHR.¹¹² The ECJ indicated that sufficient guarantees had been provided in the Directive, given that the obligation to report is limited to the execution of certain transactions, essentially those of a financial nature or concerning real estate, and no obligation to report was provided where a lawyer is called upon to assist or represent a client before the courts.¹¹³

When the Constitutional Court was to decide the case after the ECJ judgment, it referred to the ECJ judgment, stating that the judgment had found that there was no violation of Art. 6 ECHR.¹¹⁴ However, the Constitutional Court proceeded to

¹⁰⁹ Directive 91/308/EEC of 10 June 1991 on prevention of the use of the financial system for the purpose of money laundering, [1991] OJ L 166/77 as amended by Directive 2001/97/EC of 4 December 2001, [2001] OJ L 344/76. The directive was implemented by the Act of 12 January 2004 amending the Act of 11 January 1993 relating to the prevention of the use of the financial system for the purpose of money laundering, Official Gazette 23 January 2004.

¹¹⁰ Given the federal structure of Belgium, the Bar of Lawyers is divided into a Dutch-speaking section, a French- and German-speaking section, and a Dutch-speaking section and French-speaking section in Brussels.

¹¹¹ Const. Court No. 126/2005, 13 July 2005.

¹¹² Case C-305/05 Ordre des barreaux francophones et germanophone and others [2007] ECR I-05305.

¹¹³ Ibid., paras. 33–35.

¹¹⁴ Const. Court No. 10/2008, 23 January 2008, para. B.5.2.

review whether the implementing act was compatible with Arts. 6 and 8 ECHR. The Constitutional Court had limited its preliminary question to the ECJ to the aspect of procedural rights, i.e. the compatibility with Art. 6 ECHR. It could therefore not rely on the ECJ judgment upon reviewing the compatibility with Art. 8 ECHR. The Court held that the implementing act did not violate the Constitution read in the light of Arts. 6 and 8 ECHR in so far as the act was interpreted as exempting lawyers from reporting information in the exercise of the essential activities of their profession.¹¹⁵ It maintained that this also applies to transactions listed in the Directive for which the reporting obligation is provided. It is unclear whether the refusal of the Constitutional Court to send another preliminary reference on compatibility with Art. 8 ECHR implied that the Court meant to emphasise its own authority to deal with such issues or, alternatively, whether the refusal was just a matter of pragmatics to ensure that the case would be decided within due time.¹¹⁶

The introduction of the so-called Salduz-Directive,¹¹⁷ in contrast, will result in a better standard of protection of fundamental rights in comparison to the current standard held by the Constitutional Court. This Directive provides for the right to the assistance of a lawyer during an interrogation by police and judicial authorities. The Belgian provisions regulating consultation and assistance rights prior and during interrogations limit the assistance of a lawyer during an interrogation to persons deprived of liberty.¹¹⁸ The Belgian Constitutional Court based its reasoning on the ECtHR jurisprudence to find that the limitation to persons in custody did not violate Art. 6 ECHR.¹¹⁹ The implementation of the Directive implied the extension of this right to all persons who are interrogated and thus improve the standard of protection of procedural rights currently held by the Constitutional Court to be compatible with Art. 6 ECHR.

The Total Belgium case of the Constitutional Court is a second example where a reference to EU law has had a positive effect on the protection of fundamental rights in criminal proceedings.¹²⁰ This case concerned the compatibility of the sanctions provided in Belgian law for evasion of taxes on mineral oils with the prohibition of disproportionate sanctions. The Act in question seriously limited the discretion of ¹¹⁵ Ibid., para. B.9.6.

¹¹⁶ However, in subsequent cases no similar approach was taken, suggesting that this judgment should not be regarded as a principled stance of defiance towards the ECJ case law.

¹¹⁷ Directive 2013/48/EU of the European Parliament and the Council of 22 October 2013 on the right of access to a lawyer in criminal proceedings and in European arrest warrant proceedings, and on the right to have a third party informed upon deprivation of liberty and to communicate with third persons and with consular authorities while deprived of liberty, [2013] OJ L 294/1.

¹¹⁸ Act of 13 August 2011 amending the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Act of 20 July 1990 on temporary custody, Official Gazette 5 September 2011, 56347. These provisions were introduced following the ECtHR Salduz jurisprudence Salduz v. Turkey [GC], no. 36391/02, ECHR 2008.

¹¹⁹ Const. Court No. 07/2013, 14 February 2013, paras. B.9.1.–B.9.2.

¹²⁰ Const. Court No. 81/2007, 7 June 2007.

judges to amend the fines provided in the Act, e.g. the judge could not adapt the fines mentioned to the circumstances of the case and take mitigating circumstances into account.¹²¹ Given that this Act implemented EU measures, the Constitutional Court relied on ECJ case law and found that the sanctions were to be effective but not disproportionate. The Constitutional Court in particular referred to the applicable article in the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, even though the Charter was not yet in force at the time of the judgment.¹²²

2.4 The Data Retention Directive and the Belgian Constitutional Order

2.4.1 The annulment procedure regarding the implementation of the Data Retention Directive 2006/24/CE¹²³ was still pending before the Constitutional Court at the time of the ECJ's judgment in the Digital Rights Ireland case.¹²⁴ The Directive had only been implemented on 30 July 2013¹²⁵ and, hence, the annulment procedure had been initiated only shortly before the ECJ's judgment.¹²⁶

The reason for this delay in implementation is of a less principled nature than was the case in Sweden. Belgium is in general slow in implementing directives and has already been penalised on numerous accounts by the European Commission for a lack of efficient and timely implementation. In reaction to threats by the European Commission to penalise Belgium for non-implementation of the Data Retention Directive, the Government speeded up the implementation of the Directive in the summer of July 2013. For this reason, the Government left only little time for debate or interventions by experts during the implementation by Parliament.

The former Belgian Deputy Prime Minister and public law professor Vande Lanotte had suggested that the judgment of the ECJ must not have consequences for the Belgian act, given that more guarantees for fundamental rights were entrenched in the implementing act.¹²⁷ This position was not followed by the Constitutional ¹²¹ Act of 22 October 1997 concerning the structure and the tariffs of taxes concerning mineral oil, Official Gazette 20 November 1997.

¹²² Const. Court No. 81/2007, 7 June 2007, para. B.9.2.

¹²³ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

¹²⁴ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-595/12 Digital Rights Ireland [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

¹²⁵ Act of 30 July 2013 concerning the amendment of Articles 2, 126 and 145 of the Act of 13 June 2005 on the Electronic Communication and Article 90decies of the Code of Criminal Procedure, Official Gazette 28 August 2013, 56109.

¹²⁶ The procedure had been initiated by the Belgian League of Human Rights and the Francophone and German Order of Lawyers on 24 February 2014.

¹²⁷ De Tijd 9 April 2014, available at www.detijd.be.

Court. Given that the Belgian act is almost a literal copy of the European Directive, in particular with regard to the provisions criticised by the ECJ, the Constitutional Court found the implementing act to be in violation of the right of privacy as protected by the Constitution, read in the light of EU fundamental rights and the ECHR. It explicitly mentioned that the implementing act violated EU fundamental rights for the same reason as stated by the ECJ.¹²⁸ Upon the annulment by the Constitutional Court, the Belgian legislator did not await a new European initiative but rather introduced a new Act in 2016. This Act still allowed for bulk retention of communication data but limited the access to such data for law enforcement. After the new ECJ judgment Tele2/Watson in which the ECJ found bulk retention of communication data to be in violation of the protection of personal data and privacy, it was expected that the Constitutional Court would once again strike down the Belgian Act. Instead, the Constitutional Court sent new preliminary questions to the ECJ implicitly criticising the Luxembourg case law by highlighting the importance of bulk retention for criminal investigations. The preliminary questions are a clear invitation for the ECJ to reconsider its position or at least provide some margin to the national courts.¹²⁹

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 The question of secret legislation by EU institutions has not risen in Belgium. Most probably, it would not be considered as binding upon individuals. According to Art. 190 of the Constitution, laws are not binding upon third parties until publication ‘in the manner described by the law’. This article is considered to articulate a more general principle of law according to which citizens can only be bound by laws if they have been properly published.¹³⁰ The Belgian Constitutional Court interprets this article in the light of the rule of law, to require that authorities make substantial efforts to ensure equal access to the law for each person.¹³¹ The duty to publish includes annexes with normative content.¹³² Also, legislative acts that simply refer to provisions in an EU directive do not comply with Art. 190 of the Constitution, if the directive has not been published in the Belgian Official Gazette.¹³³ While unpublished law cannot have any effect on third parties, it

¹²⁸ Const. Court No. 84/2015, 11 June 2015.

¹²⁹ Const. Court. No. 96/2018, 19 July 2018. Compare to Joined cases C-203/15 and C-698/15 Tele2 Sverige [2016] ECLI:EU:C:2016:970.

¹³⁰ See Velaers 2003, pp. 33–34.

¹³¹ Const. Court No. 106/2004, 16 June 2004. Confirmed in Const. Court No. 10/2007, 17 January 2007, however, without explicitly mentioning the ‘Rechtsstaat’ principle.

¹³² Council of State 22 October 1986, No. 27.050 (Fecosalab).

¹³³ Cass. 26 April 1990, Arr. Cass. 1989–90, 1115.

remains valid and can have consequences: an individual may claim rights conferred by an unpublished law, if he or she meets the conditions laid down in the act.¹³⁴

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 These issues have not been discussed at length in Belgian jurisprudence. This is not to say that market regulation has not impacted Belgian jurisprudence. However, in general a Euro-friendly stance has been taken towards EU measures concerning market regulation without fundamental constitutional issues concerning property rights or legal principles such as legal certainty being raised.

If such measures have been considered problematic from a constitutional stance, the issues raised have concerned the compatibility of market regulation with the constitutional provisions regarding the federal structure of Belgium and the checks and balances between the state, region and communities, or with social rights. For example, the balancing of the market freedoms and the right to strike or protest have been considered by certain scholars to fall below the domestic protection of the protection of these rights.¹³⁵

2.7 The ESM Treaty and the Belgian Constitutional Order

2.7.1–2.7.3 There has been limited discussion on the constitutionality of the Treaty establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) or other EU financial regulations following the economic and financial crisis.¹³⁶ In general, the ESM Treaty and other regulations have had only a limited impact on Belgian fundamental rights. During the implementation of the ESM Treaty constitutional arguments were absent from the discussions in Parliament. In general, these new norms did not result in public contestations due to the general Euro-friendly sentiments in Belgian society as well as the limited impact of the EU financial measures on Belgian law.

¹³⁴ Council of State 24 February 1987, No. 27.569 (vzw Centrale voor Socialistisch Cultuurbeleid); Council of State 20 November 1956, No. 5.374 (Depaepe).

¹³⁵ See Dorssemont and Jaspers 2007, pp. 2–14.

¹³⁶ A procedure launched against the act consenting to the ESM Treaty was dismissed by the Constitutional Court as inadmissible for procedural reasons. Const. Court. No. 156/2012, 20 December 2012.

2.8 Indirect Judicial Review and the Belgian Judiciary

2.8.1 The co-operation of Belgian courts with the ECJ in numbers As mentioned, Belgian courts generally adopt a Euro-friendly approach and, thus, Belgian courts regularly refer preliminary questions to the ECJ. For this reason, lawyers and other legal practitioners are well aware of the preliminary reference procedure and will frequently suggest preliminary questions in their legal briefs. In view of this practice, it should not be surprising that several workshops have been organised and publications written to instruct lawyers how to write preliminary questions and convince courts to send these preliminary questions to the ECJ.

As to quantity, the most remarkable feature of the approach by the Belgian judiciary is the number of preliminary references from the Belgian Constitutional Court. The Belgian Constitutional Court is one of the few constitutional courts that sends preliminary questions, and has sent the most preliminary questions of any constitutional court of an EU Member State.¹³⁷ At first, the Constitutional Court was hesitant to refer preliminary questions.¹³⁸ The Court sent its first preliminary question in 1997, hence more than a decade after its establishment. In this case the dispute originated from the different implementation of an EU directive¹³⁹ on the vocational training of general practitioners in the Flemish region and the other regions.¹⁴⁰ The underlying issue of this dispute was the different treatment between the federalised entities, which was politically highly sensitive. By sending a preliminary reference to the ECJ, the Constitutional Court to a certain extent ‘outsourced’ the politically sensitive issue.¹⁴¹

This first preliminary reference already gives an indication for a hypothesis why the Belgian Constitutional Court frequently refers preliminary questions to the ECJ. The composition of the Constitutional Court is based on a federalist logic whereby judges are picked from the different language groups on the basis of a ¹³⁷ On the remarkable position of the Belgian Constitutional Court, see Vandamme 2008, pp. 127–148.

¹³⁸ See Van Nuffel 2005, pp. 46–47.

¹³⁹ Council Directive 93/16/EEC of 5 April 1993 to facilitate the free movement of doctors and the mutual recognition of their diplomas, certificates and other evidence of formal qualifications, [1993] OJ L 165/1.

¹⁴⁰ Const. Court No. 6/97, 19 February 1997. The ECJ decided the case in Case C-93/97 Fédération Belge des médecins [1998] ECR I-04855. Final decision of the Constitutional Court in Const. Court No. 120/98, 3 December 1998.

¹⁴¹ The attraction to outsource such questions became very clear in the tobacco judgment of the Constitutional Court. The Belgian legislation on tobacco advertisement implementing European Directive 98/34/EC highly impacted on the Walloon sports industry, in particular Francorchamps Formula 1 races. The Constitutional Court in this case did not refer a preliminary question but decided the case itself relying on the applicable EU norms (See Judgment Constitutional Court 30 September 1999, No. 102/1999). However, the Constitutional Court was still reproached for rendering a ‘political judgment’. Popelier and Voermans refer to this judgment as a failed attempt to depoliticise the case by relying on EU law. Popelier and Voermans 2015, p. 106.

fixed division of the number of judges.¹⁴² In consequence, to avoid a deadlock vote between the judges or to find ‘external support’ for a decision on sensitive issues relating to federalism, it might appear appealing to the Constitutional Court to send a preliminary question to the ECJ.

Since 2003 the Constitutional Court has more frequently referred preliminary questions.¹⁴³ At the time of submission of this report, the Constitutional Court has referred 26 preliminary questions to the ECJ. The website of the Constitutional Court provides a separate section with all the preliminary questions, including references to ECJ judgments as well as the Constitutional Court’s referral judgment and final judgment.¹⁴⁴

The other courts also frequently refer preliminary questions. In total, Belgian courts have sent 739 preliminary references.¹⁴⁵ The Supreme Court has sent 90 preliminary references, the Council of State has sent 68 preliminary references and the other courts and tribunals have sent 553 preliminary references. Taking into account the relatively small population of Belgium, it is clear that Belgian courts refer preliminary questions more frequently in comparison to other EU Member States. The relatively small number of references by the highest courts in comparison to the lower courts cannot be attributed to a deferential approach of the highest courts. Rather, preliminary questions are in general already sent by the lower courts and thus these issues have in general already been resolved by the time the issues are presented before the highest courts.¹⁴⁶

2.8.2 The approach towards indirect judicial review The Belgian judiciary has been very open to indirect judicial review by the ECJ. With regard to the relationship between the Belgian highest courts and the ECJ, Belgian authors and judges have frequently labelled this relationship as harmonious or as a judicial dialogue.¹⁴⁷ When lower courts refer a preliminary question, they will in general simply apply the judgment of the ECJ regarding the preliminary question.

The Constitutional Court, however, will in general not limit itself to a referral to the ECJ judgment. Instead, the Constitutional Court will highlight the reasoning of the ECJ in the preliminary judgment, while adding its own reasoning to come to the ¹⁴² For another clear example of outsourcing and Belgian federalism, see the case concerning the social care insurance scheme. See Const. Court Nos. 33/2001, 13 March 2001 and 11/2009, 21 January 2009.

¹⁴³ This increase in cases is most probably due to the expansion of the Constitutional Court’s scope of review by Parliament in 2003 to the full Title II of the Constitution which includes the vast majority of constitutional rights and freedoms and the Constitutional Court’s new approach to interpreting constitutional rights in the light of international fundamental norms, in particular the ECHR (since the Const. Court No. 136/2004, 22 July 2004).

¹⁴⁴ See www.const-court.be.

¹⁴⁵ Court of Justice of the European Union, Annual report 2013, Luxembourg 2014, pp. 106–107. Available at www.curia.europa.eu.

¹⁴⁶ See extended analysis Van Nuffel 2010, pp. 1162–1169.

¹⁴⁷ Verrijdt 2012, pp. 89–100; Popelier 2012, pp. 73–98; Van de Heyning 2012, pp. 395–419.

same conclusion based on the parliamentary preparatory works and its own jurisprudence as well as the general jurisprudence of the ECtHR and the ECJ.¹⁴⁸

2.8.3 For constitutional review by, and statistical data of, the Belgian Constitutional Court, see Sect. 1.1. In particular, in the period 2000–2014, 73% of the cases were lodged by private parties: 45% by individuals and 28% by business entities. A breach of the Constitution was found in 31% of the judgments in the period 2009–2013 (279 out of 890 judgments): 26.5% in annulment procedures (65 out of 245 judgments) and 33% in preliminary decisions (214 out of 645 judgments).

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 EU law does not only pose challenges to the material protection of fundamental rights, but also to the procedural protection of fundamental rights, in particular protection by the Constitutional Courts. The Belgian system of constitutional rights protection has been challenged by the ECJ case law on the limits to the procedural autonomy of the Member States, sparking a constitutional crisis.

In 2008 the Belgian Parliament introduced a new procedural rule that determined whether ordinary courts were first to submit a preliminary question to the ECJ or the Constitutional Court if concerns arise regarding the compatibility of domestic legislation with a given fundamental right that is partially or fully protected in the Belgian Constitution and in an international treaty, in particular in EU law or the ECHR, in an analogous manner.¹⁴⁹ The introduction of this rule resulted from a Supreme Court case in which the Court held that it was under no obligation to pose a constitutional question where the constitutional issue concurred with a potential infringement of an equivalent international norm.¹⁵⁰ It was feared that in every case where a legal norm might conflict with a fundamental right protected analogously by the Constitution and international law, ordinary courts would directly review the compatibility between this provision and international law, circumventing their obligation to send a preliminary question to the Constitutional Court in case of conflict between legislation and the Constitution. Moreover, if the norm under scrutiny fell within the scope of EU law, ordinary courts could prefer to send a preliminary question to the ECJ rather than to the Constitutional Court, reducing the importance of the Constitutional Court. Therefore, the new procedural rule imposed the chronological priority of the constitutional preliminary question over the preliminary procedure before the ECJ: the ordinary courts were first to send a preliminary question to the Constitutional Court, but remained free to send the question to the ECJ afterwards.

¹⁴⁸ Examples have already been mentioned supra e.g. with regard to the EAW Framework Decision and the Money Laundering Directive. See Sects. 2.3.1–2.3.5 and 2.3.6, respectively. Whether or not this implies the acceptance of primacy of EU law or the Constitution is discussed supra Sects. 1.3 and 2.2 as well as infra Sect. 3.2.

¹⁴⁹ Special Act to Amend Art. 26 of the Special Act of 6 January 1989 on the Const. Court, session 2007–2008, No. 4-12/4, 12 June 2008. Available at: www.dekamer.be. On this act and the Belgian war of judges see Velaers 2012, pp. 323–342.

¹⁵⁰ Cass. 9 November 2004, No. 04.08949.N; Cass. 16 November 2004, No. 04.0644.N; Cass. 16 November 2004, No. 04.1127.N. Available at: www.juridat.be. On the 9 November 2004 case (Vlaams Blok judgment), see Gors 2005, pp. 509–519.

It was questioned whether this priority rule was compatible with EU law. In principle the Member States have extensive discretion with regard to procedural rules. However, when asked to review the compatibility of the French constitutional priority rule in the Melki case, the ECJ developed strict criteria for such priority rules.¹⁵¹ The ECJ held that such a priority rule violated EU law if it implied that judges would lose their discretion to refer preliminary questions when they doubted the compatibility of domestic legislation with EU law.¹⁵² This judgment meant a serious limitation of the procedural autonomy of domestic procedural law in the field of constitutional adjudication. It was questioned whether the Belgian priority rule would survive ECJ scrutiny in the light of the Melki judgment.¹⁵³ The ECJ was asked to review the compatibility of the Belgian priority rule with EU law. Given that the Belgian priority rule was the outcome of lengthy and highly sensitive discussions on the correct balance between the Supreme Court, the Council of State and the Constitutional Court, rejecting the rule as a violation of EU law would seriously undermine relations between the top Belgian courts. However, in Chartry, the ECJ refrained from deciding on the compatibility of the Belgian priority ruling since the underlying subject-matter of the dispute, i.e. taxation of activities carried out within the territory of Belgium, did not fall within the scope of EU law.¹⁵⁴ In the meantime, the Belgian Parliament amended the priority rule fully in view of the Melki case law.

This episode shows at least the potential for a conflict: whereas the domestic legislator intends to protect the prerogatives of the Constitutional Court, in particular the centralised review of legislation for compatibility with constitutional rights, the ECJ promotes the decentralised review of legislation in order to strengthen the effectiveness of EU law.

2.10 Common and Individual Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1–2.10.2 Several of the preliminary references sent by the Belgian Constitutional Court highlight the commonality of the constitutional concerns

¹⁵¹ Joined cases C-188/10 and C-189 Melki and Abdeli [2010] ECR I-05667. On this judgment see Dyevre 2012, pp. 318–322.

¹⁵² In this judgment the ECJ developed several requirements to guarantee the discretion of judges. See Velaers 2012, p. 332.

¹⁵³ It was argued that the Belgian priority rule fully complied with these criteria. Velaers 2012, p. 338.

¹⁵⁴ Case C-457/09 Chartry v. Belgium [2011] ECR I-00819.

among the constitutional and supreme courts of the Member States. For example, with regard to the preliminary references regarding the EAW, it was clear that several supreme and constitutional courts doubted the compatibility of this Framework Decision and the implementing acts with constitutional rights. While the framing of the constitutional rights might diverge from one country to another, many constitutional and supreme courts were confronted with questions on the compatibility of the EAW implementing acts and constitutional rights. As such, it comes as no surprise that a second constitutional court referred a preliminary question on the constitutionality of fundamental rights and the EAW Framework Decision.¹⁵⁵

The same is true for the Money Laundering Directive. In almost all European Member States the professional secrecy of lawyers is protected as an essential guarantee for the rule of law.¹⁵⁶ While this privilege might be interpreted in the different Member States in various manners, under different provisions – the right to a fair procedure and equality of arms, or the protection of privacy, or with different legal bases – constitutional law, ordinary law, jurisprudence or general principles of law, the concern has been shared by many of the highest courts in the European Union.¹⁵⁷

However, it is unclear whether addressing such issues from the perspective of common constitutional traditions would improve the reception of fundamental rights issues at the level of the ECJ. The examples mentioned not only show the commonality of certain fundamental rights concerns, but also the impact of the ECHR and the ECtHR case law. In both cases, the Belgian Constitutional Court did not so much rely on Belgian constitutional rights, but rather on the Constitution interpreted in the light of the Convention and ECtHR case law. In particular, ECtHR case law has ensured a common understanding of fundamental rights. As a consequence, a clash of EU law and common constitutional traditions often follows from a conflict between EU law and the ECHR. The Belgian Constitutional Court also frames its preliminary questions to the ECJ not as conflicts between EU law and constitutional rights, but as conflicts between EU law and the ECHR.

On the other hand, examples can be provided where a constitutional issue is particular to one or a limited number of Member States. In general, this particularity follows from the specific domestic state structure or historical and societal specificities. With regard to the Belgian context, it is without doubt that the language rights and language regulations following the federalisation of Belgium would be considered a constitutional issue that might trigger the Constitutional Court to revolt against EU law.¹⁵⁸ As such, the Belgian language rights as protected in the Constitution might be considered as the core of the Belgian constitutional identity.¹⁵⁹ Such conflict has not yet appeared.

¹⁵⁵ Case C-399/11 Melloni, supra n. 104.

¹⁵⁶ See The Bar of Brussels 2013. Discussion continues regarding to what extent this privilege is also applicable to in-house lawyers. See e.g. in favour Dutch Supreme Court 15 March 2013, LJN: BY6101, while against such extension UK Supreme Court R (Prudential plc & Anor) v. Special Commissioner of Income Tax & Anor [2013] UKSC 1.

¹⁵⁷ The implementation of the Money Laundering Directive did not result in additional preliminary references, but in the question appearing before the ECtHR in the Michaud case. This case originated from the French implementation of the Directive. Michaud v. France, no. 12323/11, ECHR 2012.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 There are two possible interpretations of Art. 53 of the Charter. According to the first interpretation, constitutional provisions providing for better protection of fundamental rights than provided by EU fundamental rights case law can limit the application of EU law in the domestic legal sphere.¹⁶⁰ This interpretation implies a limitation to the primacy of EU law.¹⁶¹ A second interpretation provides that national courts cannot be compelled to rely on the Charter in cases before them if domestic constitutional provisions or international agreements provide for better protection. As Advocate General Bot has stated: ‘Article 53 of the Charter also expresses the idea that the adoption of the Charter should not serve as a pretext for a Member State to reduce the protection of fundamental rights in the field of application of national law’.¹⁶²

The latter interpretation implies no limitation to the primacy of EU law. For this reason, it is without doubt that the latter interpretation will be preferred by the ECJ in view of the primacy doctrine as developed by the ECJ.

However, even in this more restricted interpretation of Art. 53 Charter, it can be expected that this provision will only scarcely be relied upon to resolve conflicts of different fundamental rights standards. Other provisions or interpretational tools appear more successful for providing a margin for the Member States to safeguard a higher level of protection, in particular the margin of discretion as well as the constitutional identity provision.¹⁶³ The underlying reason why such concepts are more attractive than the maximisation clause is that they do not require an assessment of which standard of fundamental rights protection is the highest, suggesting that the other standard is a lower standard of fundamental rights

¹⁵⁸ The importance of this issue is for example the reason why Belgium has not ratified the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities by the Council of Europe.

¹⁵⁹ On the constitutional identity, see Van de Heyning 2012, at pp. 198–202.

¹⁶⁰ Such interpretation was implied in the preliminary question of the Spanish Constitutional Court regarding the limitation to the EAW framework decision on the basis of a better protection of suspects in cases involving trials in absentia. Spanish Constitutional Court Auto 86/2011, 9 June 2011 (Melloni judgment).

¹⁶¹ It has been argued that this was by no means the intention of the drafters. See for an overview Ladenburger 2012, pp. 174–175.

¹⁶² Opinion of AG Bot, in Case C-399/11 Melloni [2011] ECLI:EU:C:2012:600, para. 133.

¹⁶³ Article 4 para. 2 TEU.

protection. Rather, these concepts imply the particularity of a given system for which in a given circumstance and to a limited extent an exception to EU law can be provided.

It is probably due to this reason that its equivalent in the Convention, namely Art. 53 ECHR, has only been referred to by the ECtHR in a limited number of cases.¹⁶⁴ The ECtHR developed the doctrine of the margin of appreciation to provide for some flexibility and room for manoeuvre for the Member States and courts to uphold a domestic standard of fundamental rights protection.

The maximisation provision has not been relied upon frequently in domestic case law either. In the Belgian case law, the Supreme Court has only on one occasion explicitly referred to Art. 53 ECHR to refute an objection against the application of the domestic interpretation of the right to a trial before an independent judge. It was held that the Belgian interpretation was stricter than the interpretation provided by the ECtHR. The Supreme Court relied upon Art. 53 ECHR to find that a national court could provide for stricter criteria than the ECtHR when reviewing the independence of a judge as protected under Art. 6 ECHR.¹⁶⁵

The Constitutional Court has made several references to Art. 53 ECHR with rather diverse outcomes.¹⁶⁶ In most cases the reference to this article has not had any impact on the actual judgment.¹⁶⁷ In one case the Constitutional Court relied on Art. 53 ECHR to decide that the provisions in the ECHR and international law on the right to marriage could not be interpreted so as to restrict the domestic legislator from extending the right to marriage to homosexual couples.¹⁶⁸ In another judgment the Constitutional Court held that a reference to Art. 53 ECHR could not be relied upon to extend the interpretation of an ECHR provision.¹⁶⁹ Finally, in a number of judgments the Constitutional Court held that Art. 53 ECHR implied that the domestic legislator was both to uphold the material interpretation of the legality principle as entrenched in the ECHR (legislative norms must be accessible and foreseeable) as well as the formal interpretation entrenched in the Belgian Constitution (interference of rights must be based upon a statute).¹⁷⁰ In these cases, the Court effectively relied on Art. 53 ECHR to combine constitutional and conventional protection in order to strengthen fundamental rights protection.¹⁷¹

¹⁶⁴ See on this issue Liisberg 2001.

¹⁶⁵ Cass. (2e k.) 11 December 1996, AR P.96.1460.F (Benaïssa/Dutroux).

¹⁶⁶ For an overview, see Popelier and Van de Heyning 2011, pp. 495–536.

¹⁶⁷ Const. Court No. 77/94, 18 October 1994; Const. Court No. 34/96, 15 May 1996; Const. Court No. 76/96, 18 December 1996; Const. Court No. 49/2001, 18 April 2001; Const. Court No. 33/94, 26 April 1994.

¹⁶⁸ Const. Court No. 159/2004, 20 October 2004.

¹⁶⁹ Const. Court No. 81/95, 14 December 1995. In this case the European Commission had explicitly stated that compulsory military service should not be regarded as forced labour under Art. 4 ECHR. The Constitutional Court stated that Art. 53 ECHR did not alter this finding.

¹⁷⁰ Const. Court No. 202/2004, 21 December 2004; Const. Court No. 131/2005, 19 July 2005; Const. Court No. 151/2006, 18 October 2006.

¹⁷¹ Popelier 2011, p. 166.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1–2.12.3 The stance of the public as well as the political class vis-à-vis EU law and the European Union more in general has been labelled in the literature as a permissive consensus.¹⁷² In general, political parties take a pro-European stance. Research shows that political parties vote in large majorities in favour of the ratification and implementation of EU norms.¹⁷³ Also, public debate regarding the limits of EU law in the Belgium domestic sphere is exceptional.¹⁷⁴ Consequently, the question whether EU law may restrict constitutional rights and values is only occasionally debated in view of a specific directive or new judgment of the ECJ, and in general, the debate is limited to human rights organisations or professional actors, such as the Belgian Bars of Lawyers in view of EU norms touching upon the protection of procedural rights. It appears that more political debate on the EU has emerged due to the financial and economic crisis and the budgetary measures taken by the EU.¹⁷⁵ In these discussions the central question is not so much whether more or less Europe is needed, but rather whether a more social or liberal approach should be taken. However, there is no conclusive research to date to support the claim that the renewed political interest in EU politics has also triggered public debate on EU issues and the limits of the EU. The 2014 barometer of the European Commission does not show an increased interest in European politics.¹⁷⁶ On the other hand, a high number of Belgian citizens replied that they agreed with the statement that economic reforms would be more effective if they were co-ordinated on the European level.¹⁷⁷ Thus, Belgian public opinion could be described as ‘EU-friendly but uninterested’.

Specifically with regard to the drafting of the EAW, there was only limited public engagement. However, several public actors did raise constitutional issues during the drafting process, in particular human rights institutions such as the ¹⁷² Whereas this position of permissive consensus changed in many Member States after the Maastricht Treaty, this position has not altered in Belgium. Bursens et al. 2010, pp. 16–22 and Beyers 1998.

¹⁷³ Bursens, et al. 2010, pp. 19–21.

¹⁷⁴ The permissive consensus in Belgium does not imply a great interest in EU issues in public debate. In general terms, research shows that public debate on EU issues or interest in EU politics is very limited, in contrast to domestic political issues. See Bursens 2002 and Eurobarometer of the European Commission 81, Tables of Results July 2014, p. 83. In this Eurobarometer the Belgian public scored very low on the question on whether one would discuss European politics with friends or relatives. Only 8% answered ‘frequently’ and 45% responded ‘never’. Belgium is among the lowest scoring countries of the EU on this issue.

¹⁷⁵ This is particularly true for the so-called six-pack measures of the EU. See e.g. (2012, March 8) Belgian minister vows to resist ‘ultra-liberal’ Commission. Euractiv. <http://www.euractiv.com/euro-finance/commission-reproached-tough-belgium-news-511398>.

¹⁷⁶ Eurobarometer of the European Commission 81, Tables of Results July 2014, p. 83.

¹⁷⁷ Standard Eurobarometer of the European Commission 81, Report July 2014, p. 62.

Human Rights League as well as the Belgian Bars of Lawyers. In general, the Belgian Bars have been very active with regard to the implementation of EU law in Belgian law when relevant to criminal proceedings and procedural rights.¹⁷⁸

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.4 On the basis of the Belgian experience, no univocal answer can be given to the question of whether EU law increases or decreases the standard of human rights protection. In certain cases, ECJ case law might result in a decrease, while in other cases in an increase, of fundamental rights standards at the domestic level.

In particular in the area of criminal proceedings, concern has been voiced regarding the impact of EU law, including ECJ case law, on the domestic level of protection of the procedural rights of suspects. Examples that have been mentioned above include the impact on the legal privilege of lawyers following adoption of the Money Laundering Directive and the procedural safeguards for suspects and accused persons following the introduction of the EAW.¹⁷⁹

In other areas of law, however, it has also been noted that EU law, including ECJ case law, has improved the level of protection. With regard to the Belgian legal order, this has particularly been the case with regard to age and gender discrimination. The Test-Achats case is a well-known example.¹⁸⁰ The EU Directive in question intended to end all discrimination on the basis of gender in the insurance sector.¹⁸¹ The EU, however, succumbed to pressure from the Member States to include a derogation in the directive allowing Member States to use gender as an actuarial factor for insurance services. The Belgian Parliament relied on this exemption when implementing the directive into Belgian law, allowing for insurance companies to use gender as a factor in calculating insurance premiums and benefits.¹⁸² The Constitutional Court was requested to decide on the compatibility

¹⁷⁸ The Belgian Bars have raised constitutional challenges regarding several domestic acts raising preliminary questions before the ECJ, most notably the Money Laundering Directive and more recently with regard to the introduction of VAT on legal fees. Const. Court No. 126/2005, 13 July 2005; Const. Court No. 165/2014, 13 November 2014.

¹⁷⁹ See Sects. 2.3.6 and 2.3.1–2.3.5, respectively.

¹⁸⁰ Other directives also had an important impact on the protection against discrimination on the basis of race or gender in Belgium, in particular Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000, establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation [2002] OJ L 303/16.

¹⁸¹ Council Directive 2004/113/EC of 13 December 2004 implementing the principle of equal treatment between men and women in the access to and supply of goods and services, [2004] OJ L 373/37.

¹⁸² Act of 10 May 2007 combating discrimination between men and women, Official Gazette 31 December 2007.

of this exemption with the prohibition on discrimination. The Court decided to refer a preliminary question to the ECJ.¹⁸³ The ECJ decided that Member States could not allow for derogations from the prohibition to use sex as an actuarial factor for insurance services, rendering the exemption in the directive invalid.¹⁸⁴ The Constitutional Court in consequence struck down the provision in the domestic act based on this exemption.¹⁸⁵

An interesting aspect of the impact of the ECJ on the standard set for constitutional rights is its harmonising effect on the case law of the Belgian Constitutional Court and Supreme Court. In the past both courts have frequently disagreed on the interpretation of certain constitutional provisions, resulting in divergent case law. It has been noted in the past that in this respect, supranational law has played the role of pacifier between the highest courts. In general this has implied that the Supreme Court has amended its case law in line with Constitutional Court case law, given that the Constitutional Court already interprets constitutional rights in line with the case law of the ECtHR and the ECJ.

While in previous cases the Strasbourg case law has played this role of pacifier, it was ECJ fundamental rights case law that most probably ended a divergence between the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court on the interpretation of the principle that no legal action can be instituted twice for the same cause of action (the non bis in idem principle) in criminal proceedings, if one of the two proceedings would be qualified under Belgian law as an administrative proceeding (e.g. fiscal or deontological matters). Whereas the Constitutional Court held – in line with the applicable ECtHR case law – that this principle applies whenever the underlying facts are identical or substantially the same,¹⁸⁶ the Supreme Court would only accept that this principle applies when the crimes for which the person was prosecuted were drafted in the same wording and mentioned the same constitutive elements.¹⁸⁷ The Supreme Court finally amended its case law in line with the Constitutional Court and ECtHR jurisprudence. The reason for this change is attributed to ECJ case law, in particular the Åkerberg Fransson case, in which the ECJ clearly stated that the non bis in idem principle applies in case of identical or substantially the same facts.¹⁸⁸ Following this line of case law of the ECJ, the Supreme Court finally altered its position.¹⁸⁹ This provides evidence of the persuasive power of ECJ case law as well as the harmonising effect this case law can have on domestic fundamental rights protection.

¹⁸³ Const. Court No. 103/2009, 18 June 2009.

¹⁸⁴ Case C-236/09 Association Belge des Consommateurs Test-Achats and others [2011] ECR I-00773.

¹⁸⁵ Const. Court No. 116/2011, 30 June 2011.

¹⁸⁶ Const. Court 29 July 2010, No. 91/2010 and Const. Court 19 December 2013, No. 181/2013.

¹⁸⁷ Supreme Court 24 January 2002, Supreme Court 11 January 2012 and Supreme Court 27 March 2013, available at www.cass.be.

¹⁸⁸ Case C-617/10 Åkerberg Fransson [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:105.

¹⁸⁹ Supreme court 17 June 2014, available at www.cass.be.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1–3.1.2 The enabling clause of Art. 34 of the Constitution, discussed in Part 1, is a general clause. It regulates the transfer of powers to all international organisations, not merely the European Union. It will be recalled that a simple majority in Parliament suffices, unless the treaty contradicts the Belgian Constitution, in which case a prior amendment of the Constitution is necessary before ratification. Also, in the case of ‘mixed treaties’, containing provisions within the spheres of competence of both the federal and the federated entities, the approval of all competent parliaments is required.

3.1.3–3.1.4 See also Part 1 for (unsuccessful) proposals to introduce treaty referendums. In addition to those mentioned above, scholars have regularly made proposals to simplify the constitutional amendment procedure in order to facilitate the ratification of treaties which contradict the Constitution.¹⁹⁰ Occasionally, this has been translated into a legislative proposal.¹⁹¹ The idea is to do away with the intermediate renewal of Parliament. This would reinforce the efficacy approach discussed above. These proposals, however, have never seriously been discussed in Parliament.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 The Constitution is silent about the position of international law in the domestic legal order, despite several efforts that have been undertaken since the 1950s to determine the relation between Acts of Parliament and the Constitution.¹⁹² As mentioned, a monist position, establishing the primacy of self-executing international law over national law, was opted for by the Supreme Court in its Franco Suisse Le Ski judgment.¹⁹³ By assuming the power to disregard Acts of Parliament, ¹⁹⁰ For an overview of advocates of this proposal, see Blero 2011, p. 43. Most recently: Van Assche 2012, p. 447.

¹⁹¹ E.g. Parl. Doc., Senate, 2010–2011, No. 5-281/1. The Council of State, Legislation Division, also supports this idea: Advice of 21 December 2004 of the general assembly, Parl. Doc. Senate 2004–2005, No. 3-1091/1, 532 and Advice of 18 January 2008 of the general assembly, Parl. Doc. Senate 2007–2008, No. 4-568/1, 343.

¹⁹² E.g. Parl. Doc. House, 1952–1953, No. 693, 54–55; Parl. Doc. House, 1959–1960, No. 374/1; Parl. Doc. Senate, 1978–1979, 476/2; Parl. Doc. House, 1978–1979, 519/4, 12; Parl. Doc. Senate, 1991–1992, 626/1.f.

¹⁹³ Cass. 27 May 1971, (1971) Pas. I, 886.

it tacitly amended the Constitution.¹⁹⁴ We recall that the case in point concerned EEC law, but the primacy rule was established regarding all international law. According to the Court, this is a general principle of law,¹⁹⁵ inherent to the ‘nature’ of international law. The Constitutional Court embraced this stance, adding that in the case of abstract review, the provisions do not have to be self-executing for a treaty to have primacy over a national statute or regulation.¹⁹⁶

More controversial is the question of whether international law also has precedence over the Constitution. As mentioned above, both the Supreme Court and the Council of State accept the precedence of EU law over the Constitution. The Supreme Court has also explicitly declared the primacy of the ECHR over the Constitution.¹⁹⁷ The Constitutional Court’s stance, however, is less clear. As mentioned in Part 1, the Constitutional Court has assumed the power to review laws giving assent to treaties against the Constitution, not only pursuant to annulment requests (which have to be lodged 60 days after publication of the Act of assent) but also in preliminary judgments.¹⁹⁸ This has given rise to heated debate in doctrine, as it was considered to detract from the traditional monist position.¹⁹⁹ Although the Constitutional Court, formally, assesses the Act giving assent, in reality it reviews the content of the treaty, as implemented in the domestic legal order through the Act of assent, against the Constitution. In a monist approach and from an international law perspective, judicial review is excluded once Belgium has ratified a treaty, with one exception based on Art. 46 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties: if the State’s consent to be bound by the treaty manifestly violated a fundamental internal rule regarding its competence to conclude treaties.²⁰⁰ In doctrine, the Constitutional Court’s approach was considered – and often applauded²⁰¹ – as giving precedence to the Constitution over international treaties. Other doctrine, while generally accepting the precedence of EU law, argues in favour of the precedence of constitutional law over other international law.²⁰² In reality, the Constitutional Court has never taken an explicit stance. When reviewing an Act giving assent to a treaty, it merely examines – from a constitutional, not an international point of view – whether Parliament’s consent, at the time of entry, was in conformity with the Constitution, which it considers a requirement for the treaty to ¹⁹⁴ Bossuyt and Verrijdt 2011, p. 356.

¹⁹⁵ Cass., 5 Dec. 1994, Arr. Cass., 1994, 1055.

¹⁹⁶ Const. Court No. 106/2003, 22 July 2003.

¹⁹⁷ Cass. 9 November 2004, (2005) Rev.belge de Dr. Const. 507; Cass. 16 November 2004 (2005) Rechtskundig Weekblad 387.

¹⁹⁸ For the first time in Const. Court. No. 26/91, 16 October 1991.

¹⁹⁹ Several scholars consider the Constitutional Court’s stance to be a return to a dualist approach, e.g. Van Assche 2012, p. 440.

²⁰⁰ Van Assche 2012, pp. 442–444; Velu 1992, p. 147.

²⁰¹ Bombois 2004, pp. 143–150; Bribosia 1996, p. 76; Brouwers and Simonart 1995, pp. 13–17; Lejeune and Brouwers 1992, p. 674; François 2005, pp. 261–266; Meersschaert 2003, p. 50; Naome 1994, p. 55.

²⁰² Alen 2007, pp. 105–113; Delpérée 2004, pp. 167–180; Jamart 1999, pp. 128–129.

take effect in the domestic legal order.²⁰³ Bossuyt, the former president of the Constitutional Court, has even argued that the Constitution as well as all highest courts (Supreme Court, Council of State and Constitutional Court) should avoid taking an explicit stance on the primacy of either constitutional or international law, to prevent a guerre des juges.²⁰⁴

It is striking that this debate has often been held in terms of monism and dualism, whereas in reality legal systems employ a more nuanced approach in between these extremes.²⁰⁵ Traditionally, proponents of a monist approach have adhered to a form of ‘progressive internationalism’, while dualism has been linked with the theory of state sovereignty.²⁰⁶ Today, the growing sympathy for a more dualist approach in Belgian doctrine does not necessarily express a nostalgic yearning for a lost sense of sovereignty. Rather, it aligns with concerns for the respect of domestic values and principles in a globalising world.

Meanwhile, the idea that supranational law and national constitutional law are part of one multilevel constitutional system and European and domestic courts should find some equilibrium through judicial dialogue, is slowly gaining ground in Belgian doctrine.²⁰⁷ In practice, however, judicial dialogue with the ECJ and the European Court of Human Rights is limited. On the one hand, the Belgian courts, including the Constitutional Court, readily implement and quote European case law and refer preliminary questions to the ECJ. The European Convention on Human Rights and the case law of the ECtHR have particular influence in the Belgian legal order. The Constitutional Court interprets constitutional rights in conformity with treaty rights, considering them an ‘inextricable unity’.²⁰⁸ While this concerns all international treaties and especially the UN fundamental rights treaties are often invoked, the ECHR is of special importance. The Constitutional Court regularly quotes Strasbourg case law, by which it feels bound,²⁰⁹ and once even waited for the Grand Chamber’s decision, in the Hirst case, before giving its own judgment.²¹⁰ On the other hand, the Belgian courts hardly ever criticise the European Courts’ rulings,²¹¹ even when they feel reluctant towards specific case law, such as the ²⁰³ Beirlaen 1992; Bossuyt 2012, pp. 427–429; Popelier 2007, pp. 228–238; Velaers 2008, pp. 112–116.

²⁰⁴ Bossuyt 2012, p. 427.

²⁰⁵ Franckx and Smis 2006, p. 123; Feyen 2008, p. 177.

²⁰⁶ Franckx and Smis 2006, p. 125.

²⁰⁷ Alen, Muylle and Verrijdt 2012, pp. 6–11; Bossuyt and Verrijdt 2011, pp. 365–366; Popelier 2012, pp. 73–99; Van Meerbeeck and Mahieu 2007, pp. 79–88.

²⁰⁸ For the first time in Const. Court No. 136/2004, 22 July 2004.

²⁰⁹ Alen et al. 2012, p. 25; Lavrysen and Theunis 2013, p. 354.

²¹⁰ Martens 2010, p. 352.

²¹¹ Alen et al. 2012, p. 16; Popelier 2012, p. 83. The Bressol case is a rare exception where the Constitutional Court openly disagreed with the ECJ on whether the financial implications of students from other Member States could justify measures restricting access to higher education on the basis of nationality, Const. Court No. 89/2011, 31 May 2011.

Salduz case law²¹² or the nationality requirement for enjoying social security allowances.²¹³ Most of the time, conversations with the European Courts are one-sided. As a result, the courts are not successful in bringing domestic arguments to the fore at the European level.²¹⁴

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 The Belgian Constitution does not provide for parliamentary participation in the conclusion of international agreements or the entry into international organisations, other than giving assent by a simple majority or, in the case of EU treaties, the information obligations mentioned above. The referendum ban, discussed in Part 1, also applies in the case of international treaties.

Apart from the occasional proposals mentioned above, submitting the conclusion of international agreements to a referendum and tightening democratic control are not on the agenda in academic or political circles. Instead, as mentioned, proposals to simplify the constitutional amendment procedure if constitutional amendment is necessary for ratifying a treaty, occasionally pop up.

Meanwhile, the requirement that, in the case of mixed treaties, all competent Parliaments have to give assent, has hindered the ratification of specific human rights treaties. Belgium has signed but not ratified both the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities and Protocol No. 12 ECHR, because these treaties did not get the approval of the Flemish Parliament. Flemish politicians fear that these treaties might thwart linguistic balances which they consider to be vital to the stability of the divided Belgian state.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 Belgian courts do not have the power to review treaties and measures adopted under international law. However, as mentioned above, the Constitutional Court reviews treaties indirectly, through the Acts giving assent to these treaties. Proponents of the monist tradition have criticised this practice for violating the pacta sunt servanda principle.²¹⁵ On the other hand, denying the Court the right to assess whether a treaty was in conformity with the Constitution at the time of its ratification would allow the Government to circumvent, with a simple majority in Parliament, fundamental rights and principles laid down in the Constitution.

²¹² Popelier 2012, p. 91.

²¹³ Alen et al. 2012, pp. 31–32.

²¹⁴ Popelier 2012, p. 99.

²¹⁵ Bossuyt 2012, p. 424; Velu 1992, pp. 101–102.

We recall that Parliament interfered by denying the Constitutional Court the power to answer preliminary references regarding Acts of Parliament giving assent to EU treaties and to the ECHR and its Protocols. The limitation to these European treaties was heavily criticised in doctrine as well as by the advisory legislation division of the Council of State.²¹⁶ Indeed, Parliament's argument that interference was necessary to safeguard stability in international relations does not justify the distinction from other international treaties. Instead, proposals were launched in doctrine to complement the current prior advice provided by the Council of State on the constitutionality of treaties with an optional (or even obligatory), prior and binding judgment by the Constitutional Court.²¹⁷ Such proposals, however, have never been considered by Parliament.

3.5–3.6 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution, and Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.5.1–3.6.1 While the effectiveness of institutions of global economic governance is debated in Belgian scholarship, the effects on constitutional protection of social welfare, constitutional rights and values seem more or less neglected. In literature, the proliferation of regulatory agencies that enjoy political independence has been discussed as an ‘international impulse’ trend that runs counter to domestic principles of representative democracy.²¹⁸ Again, the Constitutional Court seems to easily accept this if EU rules prescribe this type of independence. The Council of State has referred to the Constitutional Court the question of whether the conferring of broad powers to the Electricity and Gas Regulator (CREG), directly affecting citizens, violated the Constitution, as this agency’s board does not consist of Government members that are controlled by an elected Parliament. The Constitutional Court rejected the claim, arguing that the CREG’s decisions were submitted to full and independent judicial control by the judicial branch of the Council of State, and that the CREG was under the obligation to write an annual activity report for the Government, providing Parliament with a means of control. Interestingly, the Constitutional Court added that even if these arguments were not to be considered sufficient to justify the challenged Act in view of Arts. 33 and 37 of the Belgian Constitution, then the Act still found a basis in Art. 34 of the Constitution, which allows for a transfer of powers to supranational organisations, since the conferral of such powers to an independent agency was based on EU law.²¹⁹

²¹⁶ Council of State, Advice of 25 April 2000, Parl. Doc., Senate 2000–2001, No. 2-897/1, 26-30; Bombois 2004, pp. 154–155; Van Assche 2012, p. 441.

²¹⁷ Van Assche 2012, pp. 446–447.

²¹⁸ See in particular De Somer 2014.

²¹⁹ Const. Court No. 130/2010, 18 November 2010.

Critical comments did arise regarding the human rights issues following from the inclusion of persons on a terrorist blacklist and the sanctions following such listing, such as the freezing of bank accounts and a travel ban.²²⁰ The UN blacklist included three Belgians, including a couple suspected of financing Al-Qaida through the humanitarian organisation Global Relief Foundation. After more than two years, no evidence or criminal charges were brought against them. The Brussels Tribunal of First Instance therefore ordered the Belgian state to start the de-listing procedure. The Belgian state, however, was unable to obtain the removal of the Belgian couple from the blacklist. Eventually, the Human Rights Committee concluded that Art. 17 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Arts. 12 and 17 of the Optional Protocol to the Covenant had been violated.²²¹ In particular, it reproached the Belgian state for transmitting the couple's names to the Sanctions Committee, without waiting for the outcome of the criminal investigation that was initiated at the request of the Public Prosecutor's office. It admitted that the state was unable to remove the names from the list, but imposed upon the state the duty 'to do all it can to have their names removed from the list as soon as possible, to provide the authors with some form of compensation and to make public the requests for removal' and 'to ensure that similar violations do not occur in the future'.

Despite, on the one hand, the far-reaching implications of the procedure and sanctions on constitutional rights, and, on the other, the excavation of state sovereignty, there was no heated parliamentary debate on the subject. UN resolutions and EU acts were implemented through executive decrees. The Senate did initiate a debate regarding the subsidiarity and proportionality of an EU framework decision on combating terrorism, leading to some critical comments.²²² As for the specific case of terrorist blacklists, the Belgian example shows that even if domestic courts express human rights concerns and impose upon the state the duty to request de-listing, it is not within the power of the national authorities to actually secure constitutional rights.²²³ This is disquieting to say the least, and calls for discussion at the UN level.

References

- Alen A. (1984) Rechter en bestuur in het Belgische Publiekrecht (Judge and administration in Belgian Public Law). Kluwer, Antwerp.
- Alen A. (1995) Handboek van het Belgisch Staatsrecht (Manual of Belgian constitutional law). Kluwer, Antwerp.
- Alen A. (2007) De Grondwet, hoogste rechtsnorm? (The Constitution, supreme norm?). In: En hommage à Francis Delpérée. Itinéraires d'un constitutionnaliste, Brussels, Bruylant, pp. 105–113.

²²⁰ See amongst others, Dehert and Weis, pp. 242–259 and Dewulf and Paquée 1999, pp. 607–640.

²²¹ Human Rights Committee, Communication No. 1472/2006, 29 December 2008.

²²² Parl. Doc. Senate 2007–2008, 508/1.

²²³ See also Dewulf and Paquée 1999, 635.

- Alen A. (2012) Handboek van het Belgisch Staatsrecht (Manual of Belgian Constitutional Law). Kluwer, Deurne.
- Alen A., Muylle K., Verrijdt W. (2012) De verhouding tussen het Grondwettelijk Hof en het Europees Hof voor de rechten van de mens (The relation between the Constitutional Court and the European Court of Human Rights). In: Alen A., Van Nieuwenhove J. (eds.) Leuvense Staatsrechtelijke Standpunten: De Europese Dimensie in het Belgische Publiekrecht (Constitutional stances from Louvain: the European dimension in Belgian Public Law). Die Keure, Bruges, pp. 1–45.
- Beirlaen A. (1992) Omtrent de verhouding tussen het internationaal en het Belgische recht (About the relation between international and Belgian law). In: Présence du droit public et des droits de l'homme: mélanges offerts à Jacques Vélu. Bruylant, Brussels, pp. 141–151.
- Beyers J. (1998) Permissieve consensus, maatschappelijk debat en het draagvlak van de Europese Unie bij de Belgische maatschappelijke organisaties (Permissive consensus, public debate and foundation for the European Union among Belgian societal organisations). Res Publica 50:247–272.
- Blero B. (2011) L'article 195 de la Constitution, une pierre angulaire à retailer. In: De Becker A., Vandebosche E. (eds.) Eléments clés ou éléments charnières dans la Constitution. Die Keure, Bruges, pp. 1–57.
- Bombois T. (2004) La restriction des compétences de la Cour d'Arbitrage à l'égard des traités internationaux. In: Rasson-Roland A., Renders D., Verdussen M. (eds.) La Cour d'Arbitrage vingt ans après. Bruylant, Brussels, pp. 143–150.
- Bossuyt M. (2012) De verhouding tussen de Belgische Grondwet en verdragen (The relation between the Belgian Constitution and treaties). Revue belge de droit international 45: 423–430.
- Bossuyt M., Verrijdt W. (2011) The Full Effect of EU Law and Constitutional Review in Belgium and France after the Melki Judgment. EuConst. 7:355–391.
- Bribosia H. (1996) Applicabilité directe et primauté des traités internationaux et du droit communautaire. Revue belge de droit international 76:33–89.
- Bribosia H. (1998) Report on Belgium. In: Slaughter A.M., Stone Sweet A., Weiler J.H.H. (eds.) The European Court and National Courts – Doctrine and Jurisprudence. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 1–39.
- Brouwers P., Simonart H. (1995) Le conflit entre la constitution et le droit international conventionnel dans la jurisprudence de la Cour d'arbitrage. Cahiers de droit Européen 31:13–17.
- Brussels Bar (2013) Professional secrecy of lawyers in Europe. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Bursens, P. (2002) Belgium's Adaptation to the EU: does federalism constrain Europeanisation. Res Publica 54:549–598.
- Bursens P., Drieskens E., Van Hecke S. (2010) The Belgian Presidency: Driving in the EU's Back Seat. Swedish Institute for European Policy Studies, Stockholm, pp. 16–22.
- Cloots E. (2008) Het Grondwettelijk Hof en de toetsing van secundair unierecht aan fundamentele rechten (The Constitutional Court and the review of secondary Union law against fundamental rights). In: Alen A., Van Nieuwenhove J. (eds.) Leuvense Staatsrechtelijke Standpunten (Constitutional stances of Louvain). Die Keure, Bruges, pp. 17–54.
- Craenen G. (1993) België in het buitenland. De nieuwe regeling van de buitenlandse betrekkingen (Belgium and abroad. The new regulation of international relations). In: Alen A., Suetens L.P. (eds.) Het federale België na de vierde staatshervorming (Federal Belgium after the fourth state reform). Die Keure, Bruges, pp. 59–103.
- Craig P. (2004) The ECJ, National Courts and the Supremacy of EU law. In: Pernice I., Miccu R. (eds.) The European Constitution in the Making. Nomos Verlag, Baden-Baden, pp. 35–51.
- De Somer S. (2014) International and European Impulse with regard to the Creation of Autonomous Public Bodies: An Emerging Trend. UCL Journal of Law and Jurisprudence 3:58–86.
- Dehert P., Weis K. (2009) Europese terrorismelijsten. Beperkte rechtsbescherming (European terrorism lists. Limited legal protection). NJW 8:242–259.
- De Jaegere J. (2017) The deliberative performance of the Belgian Constitutional Court in a consociational system: an empirical analysis. Ph.D. thesis, University of Antwerp.

- Delpérée F. (2004) Autour d'un sanctuaire. In: Mélanges J. Van Compernolle. Bruxelles, pp. 167–180.
- Dewulf S., Paquée D. (1999) Protecting human rights in the war on terror: challenging the sanctions regime originating from resolution 1267. Neth. Q. Hum. Rts. 24:607–640.
- Dorssemont F., Jaspers T. (2007) Collectieve actie en vrij verkeer: eindigen grondrechten waar 'fundamentele vrijheden' beginnen? (Collective action and free movement: do fundamental rights end where 'fundamental freedoms' begin?). NJW 6:2–14.
- Dujardin J., Vandelanotte J., Goedertier G., Goossens J. (2014) Basisbegrippen publiekrecht (Basic concepts of public law). Die Keure, Bruges.
- Dyevre (2012) The Melki way: the Melki case and everything you always wanted to know about French judicial politics (but were afraid to ask). In: Claes M., Popelier P., De Visser M., Van de Heyning C. (eds.) Constitutional Conversations. Intersentia, Antwerp, pp. 309–321.
- Elchardus M., Te Braak P. (2014) Toekomstverwachtingen van jongvolwassenen – Rapport 6. De toekomstwensen en – verwachtingen betreffende de Europese Unie (Future perspectives of young adults). http://socipc1.vub.ac.be/torwebdat/publications/f2014_51.pdf.
- Feyen S. (2008) Verdragsrechtelijke inwerking (Legal effects of treaties). Chroniques de Droit Public 15:167–204.
- Franckx E., Smis S. (2006) Doorwerking van internationaal recht in de Belgische en Russische rechtsorde: een rechtsvergelijkende analyse (Legal effects of international law in the Belgian and Russian legal orders: a comparative analysis). In: Wouters J., Van Eeckhoutte D. (eds.) Doorwerking van internationaal recht in de Belgische rechtsorde (Legal effects of international law in the Belgian legal order). Intersentia, Antwerp, pp. 119–137.
- François L. (2005) Le recours à une philosophie du droit dans la motivation des décisions juridictionnelles. Journal des tribunaux 124:261–266.
- Gilissen, J. (1968) La Constitution belge de 1831: ses sources, son influence. Res Publica 107:107–141.
- Gors B. (2005) Une Cause de refus de renvoi préjudiciel: la primauté de la convention Européenne sur la constitution. Revue Belge de droit constitutionnel 12:509–519.
- Ingelaere F. (1994) De Europeesrechtelijke raakvlakken van de nieuwe wetgeving inzake de internationale betrekkingen van de Belgische Gemeenschappen en Gewesten (Interfaces of the new law on international relations of Belgian communities and regions with European law). S. E.W. 42:67–82.
- Jamart J.S. (1999) Observations sur l'argumentation: la primauté du droit international. Revue Belge de Droit Constitutionnel 6:109–136.
- Ladenburger C. (2012) European Union Institutional Report. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 141–215.
- Lavrysen L., Theunis J. (2013) The Belgian Constitutional Court: a Satellite of the ECtHR? In: Alen A., Joosten V., Leysen R., Verrijdt W. (eds.) Liberae Cogitationes: Liber Amicorum Marc Bossuyt. Intersentia, Antwerp, pp. 331–354.
- Lejeune Y., Brouwers P. (1992). La Cour d'arbitrage face au contrôle de la constitutionnalité des traités. Journal des tribunaux 112:670–676.
- Liisberg B. (2001) Does the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights Threaten the Supremacy of EU law?) L.L.M. Paper, Jean Monnet program 4/01, NYU School of Law, New York.
- Louis J.V. (1970) L'article 25bis de la Constitution Belge. R.M.C. 12:410–416.
- Martens P. (2010) L'influence de la jurisprudence de la Cour européenne des droits de l'homme sur la Cour constitutionnelle. Chroniques de droit public 17:350–358.
- Mast A., Dujardin J. (1985) Overzicht van het Belgisch Grondwettelijk Recht (Overview of Belgian constitutional law). Story-Scientia, Ghent.
- Meersschaert F. (2003) De ondraaglijke lichtheid van de Grondwet (The unbearable lightness of the constitution). Tijdschrift voor bestuurswetenschappen en publiekrecht, pp. 48–51.
- Naome C. (1994) Les relations entre le droit international et le droit interne belge après l'arrêt de la Cour d'arbitrage du 16 octobre 1991. Revue de Droit International et Droit Compare 87:24–56.
- Popelier P. (1997) Rechtszekerheid als beginsel voor behoorlijke wetgeving (Legal certainty as a principle of proper lawmaking). Intersentia, Antwerp.

- Popelier P. (2005) Do instruments of direct democracy meet standards of democratic and proper law making? In: Mader L., Karpen U. (eds.) The participation of Civil Society in the Legislative Process. Nomos, Baden-Baden, pp. 101–118.
- Popelier P. (2007) De visie van het Grondwettelijk Hof op de verhouding tussen de Grondwet en het internationale recht (The Constitutional Court's view on the relation between the Constitution and international law). Chroniques de droit public 14:228–238.
- Popelier P. (2008) Procederen voor het Grondwettelijk Hof (Litigating before the constitutional court). Intersentia, Antwerp.
- Popelier P. (2011) The supremacy dilemma: the Belgian Constitutional Court caught between the European Court of Human Rights and the European Court of Justice. In: Popelier P., Van de Heyning C., Van Nuffel P. (eds.) Human Rights Protection in the European Legal Order: the interaction between European and the national courts. Intersentia, Cambridge, pp. 149–172.
- Popelier P. (2012) Judicial conversations in multilevel constitutionalism. The Belgian case. In: Claes M., Popelier P., De Visser M., Van de Heyning C. (eds.) Constitutional Conversations in Europe. Intersentia, Antwerp, pp. 73–100.
- Popelier P. (2014a) Europe clauses and constitutional strategies in the face of multilevel governance. MJ 21:300–319.
- Popelier P. (2014b) Subnational multilevel constitutionalism. Perspectives on Federalism 6:1–23.
- Popelier P., Lemmens K. (2015) The constitutional system of Belgium. Hart, Oxford.
- Popelier P., Van de Heyning C. (2011) Droits constitutionnels et droits conventionnels: concurrence ou complémentarité. In: Verdussen M. (ed.) Les droits constitutionnels en Belgique. Bruylant, Brussels, pp. 495–536.
- Popelier P., Vandenbruwaene W. (2011) The subsidiary mechanism as a tool for inter-level dialogue in Belgium: on 'regional blindness' and cooperative flaws. EuConst 7:204–228.
- Popelier P., Voermans W. (2015) Europeanization, constitutional review and consensus politics. In: Vollaard H., Beyers J., Dumont P. (eds.) European integration and consensus politics in the Low Countries. Routledge, Abingdon, pp. 92–113.
- Raunio T. (2005) Holding governments accountable in European affairs: Explaining cross-national variation. The Journal of Legislative Studies 11:319–342.
- Rimanque K. (2002) Samenstelling en bevoegdheden van een opnieuw hervormde Senaat (Composition and competences of the newly reformed Senate). In: Centre d'études constitutionnelles et administratives (ed.) Quelles réformes pour le Sénat? Bruylant, Brussels, pp. 73–77.
- Rimanque K., Wouters J. (1998) De betekenis van de Grondwet voor de Europese rechtsorde (The importance of the Constitution for the European legal order). Tjeenk Willink, Zwolle.
- Valticos N. (1984) Expansion du droit international et constitutions nationales, un cas significatif: le transfert de pouvoirs à des organisations internationales et la constitution Belge. In: Evolution constitutionnelle en Belgique et relations internationales. Hommage à P. De Visscher. Pédone, Paris, pp. 9–22.
- Van Assche C. (2012) Het Grondwettelijk Hof en het internationale recht: je t'aime, moi non plus? (The constitutional court and international law: je t'aime, moi non plus?). Revue belge de droit international 48:438–451.
- Van de Heyning C. (2012) The European Perspective: from lingua franca to a common language. In: Claes M., Popelier P., De Visser M., Van de Heyning C. (eds.) Constitutional Conversations. Intersentia, Antwerp, pp. 181–204.
- Van Meerbeeck J., Mahieu M. (2007) Traité international et constitution nationale. Rev. Crit. De Jurisprudence Belge 61:79–88.
- Van Nuffel P. (2005) Het Europees recht in de rechtspraak van het Arbitragehof: prejudiciële vragen, te veel gevraagd? (European law in the case law of the Court of arbitration: preliminary references, asking too much?) In: Alen A. (ed.) 20 jaar Arbitragehof. (20 years of the Court of Arbitration). Kluwer, Mechelen, pp. 38–47.
- Van Nuffel P. (2010) Prejudiciële vragen aan het Hof van Justitie na het Verdrag van Lissabon (Preliminary references to the Court of Justice after the Lisbon treaty). Rechtskundig Weekblad 74:1154–1177.

- Vandamme T. (2008) Prochain Arrêt: La Belgique! Explaining recent preliminary references of the Belgian Constitutional Court. EuConst 4:127–148.
- Vande Lanotte J., Goedertier G. (2010) Belgisch Publiekrecht (Belgian public law). Die Keure, Bruges.
- Velaers J. (1999) De Grondwet en de Raad van State, afdeling wetgeving (The Constitution and the Council of State, Legal Branch). Maklu, Antwerp.
- Velaers J. (2003) Artikel 190 van de Grondwet (Article 190 of the Constitution). In: Wintgens L. (ed.) De verplichting tot bekendmaking van de norm (The duty to publish legal norms). Die Keure, Bruges, pp. 31–70.
- Velaers J. (2008) De samenloop van grondrechten in het Belgische rechtsbestel (Concurrence of fundamental rights in the Belgian legal order). In: Vereniging voor de vergelijkende studie van het recht van België en Nederland: Preadviezen 2008 (Association for the comparative legal study of Belgian and Dutch law: Preliminary reports 2008). Boom Juridische Uitgevers, The Hague.
- Velaers J. (2012) The protection of fundamental rights by the Belgian Constitutional Court and the Melki-Abdeli judgment of the European Court of Justice. In: Claes M., Popelier P., De Visser M., Van de Heyning C. (eds.) Constitutional Conversations. Intersentia, Antwerp, pp. 323–342.
- Velu J. (1992) Contrôle de constitutionnalité et contrôle de compatibilité avec les traités. Bruylant, Brussels.
- Verrijdt W. (2012) Het Grondwettelijk Hof en het Unierecht: over constitutioneel pluralisme en rechterlijke dialoog (The Constitutional Court and Union law: on constitutional pluralism and judicial dialogue). In: Samoy I., Sagaert V., Terryn E. (eds.) Invloed van het Europese recht op het Belgische privaatrecht (Influence of European law on Belgian private law). Intersentia, Antwerp, pp. 41–100.
- Verschueren H. (2011) Social federalism and EU law on the free movement of persons. In: Cantillon B., Popelier P., Mussche N. (eds.) Social Federalism: The Creation of a Layered Welfare State. Intersentia, Antwerp, pp. 211–223.
- Weiler J.H.H. (1998) The European Court and National Courts, Doctrine and Jurisprudence. Hart Publishing, Oxford.
- Wigny P. (1952) Droit constitutionnel. Principes et droit positif. Bruylant, Brussels.
- Wouters J. (1998) De betekenis van de grondwet voor de Europese rechtsorde (The meaning of the constitution for the European legal order). W.E.J. Tjeenk Willink, Deventer.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Austria in International Constitutional Networks: Pluralism, Dialogues and Diversity

Konrad Lachmayer

Abstract The report shows that the Austrian constitutional framework is composed of a range of domestic and international instruments. The core constitutional act from 1920 is detailed, as are amendments regarding EU and international law. However, the 1867 State Basic Law provides only a generic bill of rights, and therefore the ECHR is the main, constitutionalised source of fundamental rights protection. The Constitutional Court reads the relevant provisions from the different instruments together, to provide a comprehensive protection. Earlier, the constitutional culture had been characterised as formalistic; this changed in the 1980s under the influence of the German Constitutional Court and the ECtHR towards a strict approach to the rule of law and rights. Constitutional review is marked by the principles of legality and reasonability. It is notable that several cases at the heart of the present research project have originated from Austrian courts, such as Data Retention (Seitlinger), Heinrich, Schmidberger and Weidacher. Regarding the European Arrest Warrant, the Austrian courts stand out with a rights-protective approach. The challenge to the ESM Treaty led to constitutional amendments that ensure parliamentary authorisation for increased expenditure. The report outlines areas where EU law has improved fundamental rights protection as well as those where it has been weakened. The report makes a case for retaining the pluralism and diversity of constitutional cultures, finding that it is necessary to see the incommensurability of the various legal traditions and the impracticability of attempting to unify all traditions in one common constitutional tradition.

K. Lachmayer is Professor for Public Law, European Law and Foundations of Law at the Sigmund Freud University Vienna. e-mail: konrad.lachmayer@jus.sfu.ac.at.

All translations are from the official translation of the Austrian Constitution https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/Dokumente/Erv/ERV_1930_1/ERV_1930_1.pdf and of other legal acts in English at the governmental website: <https://www.ris.bka.gv.at/defaultEn.aspx>.

All websites accessed 8 November 2018. Text submitted 7 October 2015.

K. Lachmayer (✉)
Sigmund Freud University Vienna, Vienna, Austria
e-mail: konrad.lachmayer@jus.sfu.ac.at

Keywords The Constitution of Austria · Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation · Constitutionalisation of the ECHR
 EU Charter of Fundamental Rights · The Austrian Constitutional Court
 Constitutional review statistics · Fundamental rights and the rule of law
 Seitlinger · Data Retention Directive, the right to privacy and secrecy of communications · European Arrest Warrant · Heinrich and publication of laws
 Judicial dialogues · ESM Treaty · The principles of legal certainty and legitimate expectations · Pluralism and diversity

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1–1.1.2 The Austrian Constitution, enacted in 1920, is based on monarchic dynamics of constitutionalism from the second half of the 19th century but was also drafted by Hans Kelsen.¹ The Kelsenian influence on the Constitution is still visible today, although Austrian constitutional law has changed significantly and dynamically in the last 30 years.²

The Kelsenian concept of constitution focuses on the constitution as law and not on the constitution as a state-based approach.³ Consequently, the Constitution neglects concepts like sovereignty and nation-building. The Constitution is understood as a set of procedural rules to enable the state to function. The Constitution is viewed far more as a legal tool of Parliament than as the foundation of the state. Yet the Constitution still contains various provisions with regard to the organisation of the state, e.g. with regard to the federal structure of the country.⁴

A major political divide between the conservatives and socialists in the 1920s meant that it was not possible to create a new set of fundamental rights in the Constitution.⁵ Instead, the old State Basic Law from 1867 was adopted, which granted civil liberties to the citizens.⁶ The development of human rights in Austria is more closely linked to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). The ECHR was adopted into Austrian law in 1958, and Parliament declared in 1964

¹ See Stelzer 2011, pp. 2–10; Wiederin 2007a, pp. 389–449.

² See Lachmayer 2017a, pp. 436–454.

³ Jakab 2009, pp. 933–955; Wiederin 2007b, pp. 293–317.

⁴ Stelzer 2011, pp. 107–174.

⁵ The Treaty of St. Germain in 1919 includes certain rights, e.g. minority rights, but not a full fundamental rights catalogue.

⁶ See the Basic Law on the General Rights of Nationals (Imperial Law Gazette 1867/142); see also Stelzer 2011, p. 209.

that the ECHR is part of Austrian constitutional law.⁷ Since the 1960s, the ECHR has been a source of constitutional rights in Austria.

The Constitution can be amended by a two-thirds majority in Parliament. Only the abolition of the basic principles of the Constitution requires a popular referendum. For partly structural but mainly political reasons, constitutional law has been easily amendable over approximately the last 60 years.⁸ The grand coalition government after WWII and the social partnership between worker and employer representatives⁹ has guaranteed a constitution-amending majority in Parliament. This means that constitutional law is regularly amended and contains various details which are not usually part of constitutional law.¹⁰ Another important characteristic of the Constitution is its fragmentation.¹¹ Austrian constitutional law consists not only of its core document, the Federal-Constitutional Act of 1920 (Constitution), but also of various other acts, including ‘ordinary’ constitutional acts, international treaties (that have constitutional rank) and so called ‘constitutional provisions’, which are provisions in ordinary statutes (which have constitutional rank). It is an Austrian particularity that certain sections within an act may have constitutional character. This fragmentation of constitutional law creates the impression among politicians that there is nothing special or unusual about making changes to constitutional law in Austria.

Austrian constitutional law has its historic core, but is highly dynamic, not only because of the regular formal amendments but also because of the interpretation on the part of the Austrian Constitutional Court, which has taken a considerably active role since the 1970s.¹² Influenced by the German Constitutional Court and the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), the Austrian Constitutional Court has developed a broad approach to human rights and, since the 1980s, has moved towards a more principle-based constitutional reasoning (e.g. principle of equality, principle of reasonability, rule of law principle, democratic principle, etc.).¹³

Austria acceded to the EU in 1995 (by a popular referendum) and has developed a Euro-friendly approach in its constitutional thinking over the last 20 years. The Constitutional Court has contributed significantly to this approach, and has also overseen other important legal developments. While the Constitutional Court established certain limits to privatisation in the 1990s, the Court has confirmed (e.g. in the European Stability Mechanism (ESM) case in 2013) that Austrian constitutional law is very open to the internationalisation of law.¹⁴

⁷ Federal Law Gazette 1964/59; see also Öhlänger and Eberhard 2016, para. 681.

⁸ See below in Sect. 1.2.

⁹ See Stelzer 2011, pp. 55–58.

¹⁰ This especially refers to the detailed governance structure of the administration.

¹¹ Eberhard and Lachmayer 2008, pp. 113–116.

¹² See the website of the Austrian Constitutional Court available at www.vfgh.gv.at.

¹³ Lachmayer 2014b, pp. 78–80.

¹⁴ See most importantly regarding privatisation the Austro Control Judgment (VfSlg. 14.473/1996), and regarding internationalisation the ESM Judgment (VfSlg. 19.750/2013) and the Judgment with regard to the Fiscal Compact (VfSlg. 19809/2013).

To summarise, the Constitution has to be understood in its historical and evolutionary context, with its strong legal character. The core constitutional document is extremely detailed, with 150 articles that each have extensive and detailed sub-provisions. Besides this core document, the Constitution also includes various other constitutional acts and more than 300 constitutional provisions in various ordinary statutes. From a formal perspective the Constitution is highly dynamic: it is regularly amended and greatly influenced by the Constitutional Court. From a substantive perspective, the Constitution deals with questions of state organisation and is equally concerned with limiting state powers by the rule of law, separation of powers and human rights.

In terms of the broader type of constitutionalism, on the one hand the Austrian Constitution is a post-WWI constitution and thus not a classical post-authoritarian type of constitution. It may be said that in its early years it was characterised by the influence of Kelsen and by quite formalistic and not substantive constitutionalism. On the other hand, since the 1980s the influence of the German Constitutional Court and the case law of the ECtHR have changed the approach of the Austrian Constitutional Court significantly towards a strict approach to the rule of law and rights.¹⁵ Thus, I would argue that nowadays the Austrian Constitutional system is a strong one, which significantly protects constitutional values, but still – to a minor extent – relates to its old, formalistic patterns.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1–1.2.4 The Austrian Constitutional Court and its doctrine distinguish two levels of constitutional law: ordinary constitutional law and the basic principles of the Constitution, which form the basis for higher constitutional law. The starting point of this distinction is Art. 44 para. 3 of the Constitution, which requires a popular referendum for a ‘total revision of the Federal Constitution’ in addition to a constitution-amending majority in Parliament. The ‘total revision’ of the Constitution is interpreted as a significant change in the basic principles of the Constitution (including democracy, federal state, republic, the rule of law, separation of powers and human rights). The two-level structure of the Constitution also has the effect that the Constitutional Court is able to review ‘ordinary’ constitutional law for compliance with the basic principles.¹⁶

An obligatory popular referendum to change the basic principles of the Constitution has only been used once in Austrian constitutional history: the ¹⁵ Lachmayer 2017b, pp. 75–114.

¹⁶ It is possible for constitutional law to be considered unconstitutional. Only once (in 2001), the Constitutional Court considered a constitutional provision as a breach of the basic principles and, thus, as unconstitutional. See Eberhard and Lachmayer 2008, p. 117.

Austrian EU accession in 1995 was preceded by a popular referendum in 1994, with 66% of those who participated voting in favour of the accession. The technical procedure of accession was as follows: a new Constitutional Act was drafted, which simply contained the statement that, with this referendum, the constitutionally competent institutions were authorised to accede to the Union.¹⁷ The bill was accepted by a two-thirds majority in Parliament and a successful referendum held subsequently. As part of the procedure, the Constitution underwent a ‘total revision’, especially with regard to its acceptance of the EU system of democracy and ‘federalism’ or the EU rule of law. The scholarly debate was and still is influential regarding the Austrian approach towards the implementation of EU law in Austria. However, the ‘total revision’ of the Constitution makes it very easy to argue in favour of EU law in the Austrian context, as the ‘total revision’ changed the legally correct procedure of the whole constitutional and legal system.

Until 2008, it was possible to implement international treaties (including new EU treaties) as constitutional law in the Austrian legal system, which happened in the case of all the new European treaties in the same manner as the accession treaty (only without a popular referendum). Thus, in the case of the Amsterdam Treaty and the Nice Treaty, a separate constitutional act was enacted, which authorised the competent institutions to conclude these treaties. Since 2008, the Constitution has contained an explicit procedure stipulating how new EU treaties can be integrated in the Austrian legal system: Art. 50 of the Constitution clarifies that for all further changes to the EU treaties, Parliament has to authorise such changes with a two-thirds majority. A popular referendum is only necessary if the Union changes in a way that requires a ‘total revision’ of the Constitution and which was not already covered by the referendum in 1994.

Each new EU treaty has thus been adopted on the basis of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court has regularly had to decide whether a new treaty has gone beyond the ‘total revision’ of the Constitution in 1995; the Court has ruled that this has not been the case. In comparison to the German situation where the German Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe regularly creates hurdles for any new transfer of domestic powers,¹⁸ the Austrian situation is completely different: first, the Constitution is not based on a strong concept of sovereignty and is thus open towards the transfer of powers on an international (European) level; secondly, the Austrian Constitution (in contrast to the German Constitution) was ‘totally revised’ by accession to the EU. Thus, the EU concepts of democracy, ‘federalism’ and the rule of law are already part of Austrian constitutional law.

As the Constitution is amended several times a year, it is not possible to analyse all of the constitutional amendments that have explicitly or implicitly related to EU law.¹⁹

¹⁷ Federal Constitutional Act on the Accession of Austria to the European Union, Federal Law Gazette 1994/744.

¹⁸ See e.g. the Maastricht or the Lisbon judgment; Thym 2009, pp. 1795–1822.

¹⁹ An example would be the amendment in 2008 (Federal Law Gazette I 2008/2), when the possibilities for establishing independent authorities were extended significantly. The new Art. 20 para. 2 of the Constitution contains an explicit provision that the establishment of independent

By way of a brief summary of EU-related amendments, the central provisions are contained in chapter B of the Constitution, entitled ‘European Union’, where Arts. 23 (a)–(k) contain extensive and detailed provisions regarding various EU-related matters. For example, Art. 23 (a) and (b) regulate the elections of the European Parliament, Art. 23c regulates Austrian appointments to high-level posts in the EU, e.g. the appointment of the members of the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU); Art. 23(d) regulates the right of information of the provinces in EU matters affecting their competence; Arts. 23 (e)–(i) regulate the involvement of Parliament (see Sect. 1.4.1); and Art. 23(j) regulates participation in the EU Common Foreign and Security Policy. Generally, numerous aspects of EU law are interwoven throughout the whole text of the Constitution, e.g. as regards elections of the European Parliament (Art. 6(4)); division of competences between the federal level and the provinces (Art. 10), independent administrative authorities (Art. 20(2)), ratification of changes to EU treaties (Art. 50), parliamentary participation in the ESM (Art. 50a–d), etc. Additionally, EU amendments are also frequently inserted into the constitutional provisions of statutes, as, for example, in the case of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) amendment, which will be discussed in Sect. 2.3.

One notable amendment was the establishment of the administrative courts of first instance in 2014. This political project that was undertaken over 20 years was initiated by the ECtHR case law regarding Arts. 5 and 6 of the ECHR and was mainly influenced by the need under EU law to establish independent tribunals.²⁰ From a structural perspective it was the largest constitutional reform since accession to the EU. It is definitely possible to conclude that European influence on amendments to the Constitution is increasing.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The Constitution was never built upon a strict concept of sovereignty, but on a constitutional concept that is based on law and its constitutional framework. It is remarkable that in the 1990s the Constitutional Court developed constitutional limits to privatisation, which are based on sovereignty and state-based thinking. The Court argued in favour of certain core functions (core areas) of the state, which cannot be transferred to private persons or companies (e.g. military services, the police and justice systems, foreign policy). The Court has never developed a similar concept regarding the transfer of power to an international level. Article 9 para. 2 of administrative authorities is in conformity with constitutional law ‘to the extent necessary according to the law of the European Union’.

²⁰ See Öhliger and Eberhard 2016, paras. 645–49; see also Sect. 2.9.

the Constitution provides a general provision on the transfer of powers on an international level, which was recently extended.²¹

The transfer of power to the EU follows its own constitutional concept. The first step refers to the amendment of the EU treaties. As mentioned above, Art. 50 of the Constitution requires a constitution-amending majority (two-thirds majority) in both chambers of the Austrian Parliament for the ratification of new EU treaties.²² The transfer of power within the EU Treaties is no longer identified as a specific constitutional question and only depends on the regular participation of the Government and/or Parliament in European legislative procedures. There are no ‘constitutional reservations’ or further limits. The only limit refers to the ‘total revision’ of the Constitution. Only if the Union were to abolish or significantly reconceptualise democracy, the rule of law, Austrian federalism, the separation of powers or human rights would another popular referendum be required.

1.3.2–1.3.4 Although the direct effect and supremacy of EU law are not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution, these concepts were well established by the CJEU at the time of Austrian accession in 1995. The ‘total revision’ of the Constitution unquestionably also included these concepts in the Austrian legal system at the highest possible constitutional level. In academic literature, there were debates with regard to a constitutional core²³ which would resist any form of EU integration with regard to the basic principles of Austrian constitutional law. This, however, could not refer to EU law concepts, as they had been established before the accession in 1995, but only to fundamental violations of democracy, the rule of law or human rights in general, e.g. a European dissolution of the Austrian Parliament or the abolition of federalism in Austria as a whole. Any other kind of impact of EU law on the Austrian legal system seems to be possible within the Austrian constitutional framework.

The Constitutional Court has accepted the supremacy of EU law from the very beginning. There is no explicit provision in the Constitution that EU law is supreme, however, the total revision of the Constitution included EU supremacy. The Court has approached EU law from a point of view that neither defends its own position nor claims the particular importance of Austrian constitutional law. On the contrary, the Court follows a legalistic, pragmatic and procedural approach and has developed its case law towards the interrelation between Austrian constitutional law and EU law. Four years after Austria’s accession to the EU, the Constitutional Court initiated its first preliminary reference proceeding.²⁴ In the same year, the Court used the supremacy of EU law to set aside a constitutional provision.²⁵ In the *Telekom-Control Case*²⁶ the Court refused to apply Art. 133(4) Constitution, which limited – in the understanding of the Court – the possibilities to establish ²¹ See Federal Law Gazette I 2008/2; see also Handl-Petz 2010, pp. 288–289.

²² See Handl-Petz 2010, pp. 296–300.

²³ See Öhlinger and Eberhard 2016, pp. 156–158.

²⁴ VfSlg 15.450/1999.

²⁵ VfSlg 15.427/1999; see also VfSlg 17.065/2003, 19.632/2012.

²⁶ See Sect. 2.6.

independent administrative courts. Although the Court had declared that EU law would not be the standard model for constitutional review by the Court, in 2012 the Court declared that it would use the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (Charter) as the standard model against which to review human rights violations in Austria on an equal basis with human rights provided by Austrian constitutional law.²⁷ The Court has developed an active and pro-European approach, which limits the application of Austrian constitutional law. The reasons for this approach can be found in the legalistic, Kelsenian culture of Austrian constitutional law, the total revision of the Constitution upon accession to the European Union and the overall Euro-friendly approach of the Court, which is also rooted in the fact that the ECHR is a formal part of constitutional law in Austria.²⁸

Thus it can be said that the Constitution follows a very flexible concept of sovereignty, which does not provide significant limits to the transfer of powers to a transnational level. Only if a transfer of new powers were to go far beyond the concept of the Maastricht Treaty, which was approved by a constitutional referendum in 1994, might it be necessary to hold another referendum, which could always provide legitimization for another dimension of the transfer of powers to the European level. The Constitutional Court, however, has not seemed to have had any constitutional problems with the new EU Treaties (including the Lisbon Treaty) so far. When the Constitutional Treaty was being discussed by the EU, the Austrian position was quite clear – that another referendum would not be necessary.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The Constitution involves the Austrian Parliament in the EU decision-making process. On the day of Austria's accession to the EU, a new chapter (Arts. 23a–f) was added to the Federal Constitutional Law.²⁹ Article 23e of the Constitution determines that the competent Federal Minister is obliged to inform Parliament of any EU legislative proposal. The first chamber of the Austrian Parliament (National Council) has the opportunity to provide an opinion, which binds the federal minister in his or her actions at the European level. The only possibility for a minister to deviate from the parliamentary opinion is on the grounds of 'mandatory reasons with regard to integration or foreign policy'. The same procedure applies for upcoming resolutions of the European Council or the Council concerning 'the change from unanimity to a qualified majority' or 'the change from a special legislation procedure to the regular legislation procedure'. Moreover, the second

²⁷ VfSlg 19.632/2012; see also Lachmayer 2013b, pp. 105–107.

²⁸ The Austrian Constitutional Court is used to applying international (human rights) treaties naturally, as Austrian constitutional law. This culture, developed over many decades (since the 1960s), has shaped Austrian constitutional thinking. From this perspective, it is easier to approach EU law and to implement it in the Austrian legal system.

²⁹ See Federal Law Gazette 1994/1013.

chamber of Parliament (Federal Council) has the same opportunities for involvement when the allocation of powers between the federation and the states is affected.³⁰

While the Austrian Parliament rarely submitted an opinion in the first fifteen years of EU membership (five times), it has since 2010 done so regularly. For example, in 2013 a parliamentary opinion was issued with regard to the ‘placing on the market of a genetically modified maize product’.³¹ Genetically modified products are a very sensitive topic in Austrian politics. Thus, the Austrian position on this topic does not seem to be an area of conflict between the Government and Parliament, rather Parliament’s opinion has to be understood more as an expression of Parliament that stresses the overall Austrian position.

As a consequence of the Lisbon Treaty, new provisions were added to the EU chapter of the Constitution regarding the involvement of national parliaments in 2010.³² Article 23f of the Constitution clarifies that the Austrian Parliament will exercise the competences regarding subsidiarity and proportionality control, and provides further general provisions for parliamentary involvement (e.g. the right of the National Council to communicate its positions on legislative proposals to the EU institutions). The Constitution contains more detailed provisions for parliamentary opinions regarding subsidiarity (Art. 23g) and the possibility to refer a matter to the CJEU (Art. 23h). Finally, the new provisions allow Parliament to reject resolutions of the European Council or the Council concerning ‘the change from unanimity to a qualified majority’ or ‘the change from a special legislation procedure to the regular legislation procedure’ (Art. 23i).

1.4.2 The direct democratic dimensions of the Constitution have only been used in the case of the referendum to accede to the EU. This, however, involved the strongest and most important way possible: through a total revision of the Constitution. The Constitution provides a number of direct democratic instruments that in general are rarely used by Parliament. Although different popular initiatives have been initiated over the last few decades, they have ultimately been ignored by Parliament, which shows the political culture concerning direct democracy.³³ In recent years, however, there has been a huge debate to foster direct democracy in Austria.³⁴

To summarise, the Constitution provides for different ways for the Austrian Parliament to participate in the EU legislative process. It is interesting to observe that Parliament has become more aware of its possibilities and is more engaged in the European dialogue. It has definitely helped that the necessary constitutional provisions were already in place and could easily be used.

³⁰ Öhlinger and Potacs 2017, pp. 30–36.

³¹ http://www.parlament.gv.at/PAKT/VHG/XXV/SEU/SEU_00001/imfname_333335.pdf.

³² See Federal Law Gazette I 2010/57.

³³ Eberhard and Lachmayer 2010, pp. 241–258.

³⁴ Öhlinger and Poier 2015.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 As already mentioned above, the Austrian constitutional culture leads to regular constitutional amendments. This culture has formed a stable part of the Austrian legislative culture as long as the Government has had a constitution-changing majority in Parliament. However, even when there has been no required majority, for a ‘reason of the state’ (Staatsräson), over last few decades, opposition parties have usually tended to provide the necessary majority.³⁵ This, however, has changed in the last seven years, since the majority in the grand coalition has started to shrink, and the opposition parties have become aware of their political possibilities. The coalition Government nowadays has to negotiate with at least one opposition party to obtain the required constitution-changing majority. In most cases, the Austrian Government has had no problem finding a party in Parliament with which to cooperate.³⁶

The constitutional amendments linked to the European Union are above all part of this culture. If it is necessary to change the Constitution because implementation is not possible without it, the Constitution is amended. This concept is rooted in the hierarchy of norms (Stufenbau der Rechtsordnung).³⁷ When it comes to constitutional amendments relating to the EU, the following examples show a more detailed picture of the concrete reasons for amending the Constitution. Five broader conceptual approaches can be distinguished:

- (1) Total revision as a starting point. The importance of total revision as a starting point to introduce EU law in the Austrian constitutional system should not be underestimated. Many constitutional amendments have not been necessary thanks to this total revision, and many constitutional concerns cannot arise. The Constitution fully integrates the EU legal system, including direct effect and supremacy, at least in the state of integration since the Maastricht Treaty.
- (2) Constitutional law implementing procedure of new EU Treaties. Besides the EU accession treaty in 1995, the subsequent EU Treaties, including Amsterdam³⁸ and Nice,³⁹ were implemented in the Austrian legal system by constitutional law that authorised these treaties domestically. A separate constitutional Act, which required a two-thirds majority in Parliament, was enacted. As mentioned above, this option was finally introduced in Art. 50 of the Constitution in 2008 and thus, today, the Constitution provides this option as the standard procedure for new EU Treaties.

³⁵ See also regarding the role of the social partnership Stelzer 2011, pp. 55–58.

³⁶ The opposition parties have, however, been successful in negotiating further control competences in the context of parliamentary committees of inquiry. See Art. 53 Austrian Constitution (Federal Law Gazette I 2014/101).

³⁷ Stelzer 2011, pp. 23–27.

³⁸ Federal Law Gazette III 1999/83.

³⁹ Federal Law Gazette III 2003/4.

- (3) Treaty supplementing constitutional amendments. Besides constitutional revision and the constitutional procedure for implementing new EU Treaties (by a two-thirds majority), there are further constitutional amendments that enable the implementation of a Treaty. Such constitutional amendments provide for the necessary adaptation of existing provisions or the introduction of new provisions in Austrian constitutional law to make a new Treaty more efficient and effective. For example, the accompanying law regarding the Lisbon Treaty introduced new provisions (Art. 23g–i Constitution) to enable Parliament to use the subsidiarity procedure.
- (4) Structural constitutional reforms. Besides the constitutional amendments related to new EU Treaties, the Constitution has been reformed structurally – at least with regard to certain areas – to enhance the compatibility of the Austrian legal system with EU law. The most significant reform was the introduction of administrative courts of first instance, which completely changed the system of legal protection in administrative law.⁴⁰ Other examples relate to the amendment of Art. 20 para. 2 Constitution with regard to independent administrative authorities⁴¹ and a new approach to allocation of powers with regard to public procurement⁴².
- (5) Specific constitutional amendments. Finally, Parliament does not avoid specific constitutional amendments to comply with EU law. The possibility of creating constitutional provisions in ordinary statutes is thus used to facilitate the implementation of EU law. For example, an independent EU style Energy (Control) Agency was established to comply with the third EU internal market package regarding electricity and gas.⁴³ Parliament established specific constitutional provisions referring to this Energy Control Agency in particular, which guaranteed the necessary independence from the state.

Thus, the constitutional amendments illustrate not only the unpretentious nature of the Austrian constitutional culture, but also the pro-European attitude of Austrian legislation. The flexibility of the Constitution leads to regular adjustments of constitutional law when there is a European necessity; in other words in order to make EU law effective in Austria, the Constitution is amended. However, not all constitutional questions lead to amendment, e.g. questions of state liability are not solved by introducing new procedures in the Constitution, but rather by interpretation on the part of the courts using existing mechanisms for these procedures. Although the text of the Constitution does not provide a legal basis, these procedures have been established by the dynamic interpretation of the courts (based on EU law principles like the principles of equivalence and effectiveness). Thus, the implementation of EU law in Austrian constitutional law is shared between ⁴⁰ See Öhlänger and Eberhard 2016, paras. 650–670; see also Sect. 2.9.

⁴¹ See Eberhard and Lachmayer 2008, pp. 119–120.

⁴² Article 14b Austrian Constitution.

⁴³ See Lachmayer 2014b, pp. 297–300.

constitutional acts of Parliament and constitutional reasoning by the Constitutional Court.

1.5.2 Not applicable.

1.5.3 The exercise of power on an international and European level is changing the role of domestic constitutions. The constitutionalisation of international law⁴⁴ and the internationalisation of constitutional law are not only corresponding dimensions of legal globalisation but also create an increasing interrelation between the national and international constitutions. The author has described this phenomenon as International Constitutional Networks.⁴⁵ These networks cannot be described as a homogeneous legal system. On the contrary, the different constitutional systems follow different approaches, defend divergent values and are based on their very own particular constitutional cultures.

But is it necessary to amend national constitutions so that they are able to retain their importance? I do not think so.

First, formal constitutional amendments play different roles in different domestic constitutional cultures. Some constitutions are hard to amend and it is up to the (constitutional or supreme) courts to guarantee the functioning of the interaction between the national and the international levels. In other constitutional cultures it is much more the role of ordinary statutory legislation to build solid links with international or European law. Ultimately, the constitution might be the right domestic legal level to link international and national law, but it might not be. It depends on the particular constitutional culture.

Secondly, different domestic constitutional systems react differently to the transnational realm. Based on Vicki Jackson's distinction,⁴⁶ one might identify the following approaches: resistance, convergence and engagement. Although domestic constitutional systems are affected by legal globalisation, it is not guaranteed that they will develop a positive approach towards these developments. Constitutional amendments can also be used to strengthen anti-international concepts.⁴⁷ The example of Hungary illustrates that constitutional amendments, even more than constitutional revisions, do not necessarily lead to a more international approach.⁴⁸

Thirdly, constitutional amendments per se do not effectively guarantee stronger ties to international law. This approach would be too formalistic. Substantive cooperation depends on the overall knowledge of and attitude towards international or European law of the relevant politicians, lawyers and other decision-makers. Constitutional amendments might be the right tool to support these developments, but they might also be completely irrelevant.

⁴⁴ See Peters 2010, pp. 50–61

⁴⁵ Lachmayer 2013a, pp. 1490–1491.

⁴⁶ Jackson 2013.

⁴⁷ Schepple 2006, pp. 347–373.

⁴⁸ See Uitz 2015, pp. 279–300.

The author therefore follows a concept of constitutional pluralism,⁴⁹ in which the relevance and function of constitutions, as well as the amending procedures in the different domestic constitutions can differ significantly. The Austrian Constitution can serve as an example of a pro-European and internationally open constitutional culture, which fully uses the possibilities of constitutional amendments to strengthen European integration domestically. These constitutional developments, however, do not mean that the Austrian legal system (or even the Constitution) adopts European concepts perfectly. On the contrary, the permanent struggle to do so leads to further amendments. Finally, it is questionable whether these amendments maintain the relevancy of the Constitution. One could also argue that Austrian constitutional law is, step by step, losing its unique character and being harmonised towards a European model constitution.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 The Constitution does not provide a coherent catalogue of human rights, rather must be understood in its evolutionary context. The Austrian system of human rights consists of a variety of catalogues and constitutional provisions enacted nationally and internationally over the last 150 years. The main parts consist of the following. First, the State Basic Law on the protection of the rights of citizens from 1867 contains traditional civil liberties and builds the classic catalogue of fundamental rights in Austria, which was adopted into the democratic Constitution in 1920.⁵⁰ The State Basic Law is still an independent document separate from the core constitutional document of 1920, and continues to provide an important constitutional basis for the Constitutional Court's case law.

Secondly, the constitutionalisation of the ECHR in 1964 (supplemented by the rights in the additional protocols) created the second human rights catalogue in Austria.⁵¹ The rights of the ECHR are understood as constitutional rights, as they are formally part of Austrian constitutional law (rather than the ECHR being applied as an international treaty). In addition to these two major layers of constitutional rights, the Constitution provides few but important rights, especially the right to equality in Art. 7.⁵² Moreover, Austria has signed various peace treaties such as the Treaty of St. Germain 1919 and the Treaty of Vienna 1955, which contain constitutional rights (e.g. with regard to minorities). Austria has ratified other international treaties and ⁴⁹ See Walker 2002, pp. 317–359.

⁵⁰ See Stelzer 2011, pp. 209–210.

⁵¹ Stelzer 2011, pp. 211–215.

⁵² See Pöschl 2008.

adopted them on a constitutional level (e.g. the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination)⁵³ or implemented them through a special constitutional act (e.g. the Convention on the Rights of the Child)⁵⁴. Finally, the EU Charter is of rising importance in the Austrian human rights system.⁵⁵ To summarise, the Austrian human rights system is very complex and focuses on liberal equality and procedural rights. A social rights catalogue is missing in the Constitution.⁵⁶ Some particular rights, however, contain a social rights dimension.⁵⁷

The application of the different human rights catalogues and provisions by the Constitutional Court follows a very particular approach of ‘reading the relevant provisions together’. Thus, the Court regularly applies all the relevant provisions from the different documents to provide a comprehensive protection of these rights.

2.1.2 There is no general constitutional provision on the limitation of rights, but certain rights include a specific limitation clause (such as in the provisions of the ECHR).⁵⁸

2.1.3 The rule of law (Rechtsstaat) and (the existence of) human rights are two basic principles of the Constitution, which can only be abolished by a popular referendum.⁵⁹ This view regarding these basic principles, which is common to the Austrian courts and the doctrine, is not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution, but is the result of the constitutional reasoning of the Constitutional Court and the interpretation of the Constitution by academic scholarship in Austria.⁶⁰

Article 18 para. 1 of the Constitution refers to the principle of legality, providing as follows: ‘[t]he entire public administration shall be based on law’. For a number of decades, this provision was understood to be the core of the Austrian (formal) understanding of the rule of law.⁶¹ The substantive part of the rule of law is built on the legal protection of individuals through the existence of relevant institutions and procedures.

⁵³ Adopted and opened for signature and ratification by UN General Assembly resolution 2106 (XX) of 21 December 1965, which came into force 4 January 1969. Transformation to Austrian constitutional law by Federal Law Gazette 1973/390.

⁵⁴ Adopted and opened for signature, ratification and accession by General Assembly resolution 44/25 of 20 November 1989, which came into force 2 September 1990. Austrian Constitutional Act on the Rights of the Child, Federal Law Gazette I 2011/4.

⁵⁵ VfSlg 19.632/2012; see also Lachmayer 2013b, pp. 105–107.

⁵⁶ See further details in Sect. 3.5.

⁵⁷ E.g. the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Equality Principle (Art. 7 Austrian Constitution), or the Right to Education (Art. 2, Add. Protocol No. 1 ECHR).

⁵⁸ The State Basic Law on the Rights of Citizens from 1867 includes specific paragraphs on the limitation of rights in relation to certain provisions, e.g. Art. 13 State Basic Law on the Freedom of Expression demands a statutory basis for legislation and Art. 10 State Basic Law regarding privacy of correspondence requires a judicial order. The concept of limitations of rights in the State Basic Law is – in contrast to the ECHR – a formal one and does not include substantive criteria.

⁵⁹ See Art. 44 para. 3 Constitution.

⁶⁰ See Öhlänger 1990, pp. 2–9.

⁶¹ Mayer et al. 2015, paras. 165, 569.

The concept of legal protection against administrative action and law enforcement is (still) bound to certain forms of administrative action (Handlungsformen), which leads to an increasing lack of legal protection, because newer forms of administrative action do not necessarily fit into this relatively strict and old system of forms of administrative action (relative Geschlossenheit des Rechtsquellsystems). In particular, since the 1990s the Constitutional Court has started to actively develop its case law on the rule of law in new dimensions. The core of this new case law is linked to the principle of effective legal protection, which is directly derived from the rule of law principle. The rule of law principle includes many elements, including the rule that only published laws can be valid, and the requirement of legal certainty and of a certain level of clarity, which will be explored in Sect. 2.5. Other elements of the rule of law include non-retroactivity; the rule that the imposition of obligations, administrative charges or penalties and criminal punishments is only permissible on the basis of a parliamentary statute; and the prohibition on applying sanctions retroactively, by inferring from objectives through teleological reasoning or by analogy.

The rule of law does not constitute a constitutional right in itself; however, procedural rights and other constitutional rights can be brought forward with regard to violations of fundamental rights before the Constitutional Court.⁶² An applicant can then claim a violation of the rule of law. The rule of law is an independent and – especially since the 1990s – frequent ground for annulment. Thus, a protective mechanism exists which allows for claims against rule of law violations at the Constitutional Court.

The system of constitutional review and judicial review in Austria The Constitutional Court was one of the first specialised courts with centralised constitutional review.⁶³ However, the Court is one out of three highest courts in the Constitution.⁶⁴ The other two are the Supreme Administrative Court and the Supreme Court of Justice. Following a subject-oriented approach, the Constitutional Court mainly reviews statutes and ordinances with regard to their constitutionality and reviews administrative acts with regard to constitutional rights, whereas the Supreme Administrative Court reviews the legality of administrative acts with regard to statutes. The Supreme Court is the highest of the ordinary courts, which deal with civil rights and obligations⁶⁵ as well as criminal charges. The system of ordinary courts is mainly separate from the administrative authorities and administrative courts.⁶⁶ Higher courts of appeal and the Supreme Courts have the right to initiate preliminary proceedings at the Constitutional Court to review the constitutionality of a statute or an ordinance.

⁶² See Art. 144 Constitution.

⁶³ Gamper and Palermo 2008, pp. 64–79.

⁶⁴ Stelzer 2011, pp. 188–189.

⁶⁵ The distinction between civil and administrative law in the Austrian legal system does not comply with the understanding of civil rights and obligations in Art. 6 ECHR.

⁶⁶ See Art. 94 Austrian Constitution; however, a newly (in 2012) enacted Art. 94 para. 2 Constitution broadened the possibility to create cross-subject procedures.

In contrast to the German legal system, the Constitution does not provide for a constitutional complaint against a final decision of an ordinary court or the Supreme Court. Since 2015, it is possible to file a constitutional complaint at the Constitutional Court in relation to a judgment of an ordinary court of first instance.⁶⁷ The claim, however, can only refer to the unconstitutionality of the statute on which the judgment is based, but it cannot be argued that the ordinary court judgment is unconstitutional itself.⁶⁸ The important consequence of this court system is that it is mainly up to the ordinary courts and the Supreme Court to protect the Constitution and constitutional rights. Although this protection of constitutional rights has improved over the last 20 years, several famous judgments of the ECtHR (with regard to violation of the freedom of speech according to Art. 10 ECHR) illustrate the struggles of the ordinary courts to fully guarantee constitutional rights in Austria.⁶⁹

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 The fundamental rights in the Constitution also contain economic rights, especially the freedom to conduct a business (Erwerbsfreiheit) and the right to property (Eigentumsfreiheit). Both of these economic rights have played an important role in the case law of the Constitutional Court in the last few decades. The Court has also contributed to the liberalisation of protected professions (e.g. taxi drivers).⁷⁰ Moreover, the Court itself has had to balance these economic rights with other fundamental rights. One example was the Kleiderbauer case,⁷¹ in which animal rights activists protested in front of a clothing store which was selling fur coats. The Court argued that the gathering of the animal rights activists was unlawful because it took place at the entrance of the store and thus made it more difficult to enter the store. The outcome of the Court's ruling was that the freedom to conduct a business had priority in this case but that the activists were allowed to demonstrate five meters from the entrance. Thus, independently of the EU freedoms, the Constitutional Court has also considered economic freedom as significantly relevant in its case law.

The Austrian Schmidberger case at the CJEU⁷² never reached the Constitutional Court, because the transportation company 'Schmidberger' sued the Austrian state

⁶⁷ Federal Law Gazette I 2013/114.

⁶⁸ See Art. 140 Austrian Constitution.

⁶⁹ See already the ECHR case Lingens v. Austria, 8 July 1986, Series A no. 103; see the further case law in Öhlinger and Eberhard 2016, paras. 918–918a.

⁷⁰ VfSlg 10.932/1986.

⁷¹ VfSlg 18.601/2008.

⁷² Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659.

in the ordinary courts for allowing a demonstration that blocked a major motorway in Tyrol. There is currently no legal protection against judgments of the ordinary courts in the Constitutional Court.⁷³ The Schmidberger case also illustrates the relevance of classic fundamental rights in Austria. The CJEU's Data Retention case – although it is known as 'Digital Rights Ireland' – is also based on a preliminary reference from the Constitutional Court. Thus, the CJEU also showed that the Court is able to address fundamental rights concerns when it comes to the harmonisation of the internal market.⁷⁴

From the perspective of the Austrian constitutional culture, the integration of the four freedoms thus does not seem too difficult. On the one hand, Austria acceded to the European Union at a time when rights were already on the rise and, on the other hand, the Constitutional Court has also accepted that economic rights form an important part of fundamental rights. Moreover, Austrian constitutional culture is rooted in its legal (and thus technical) approach to the interrelation between the European and the domestic legal system. The Court was able to accept economic freedoms as an important part of the EU legal systems, which can also take precedence over Austrian constitutional law.⁷⁵

Another Austrian conflict that better shows the struggle between Austria and the EU⁷⁶ is the 'German students' case.⁷⁷ The CJEU decided that Austria had to open its free access to universities to all European Union citizens. The effect of that judgment was that German students who were not accepted to certain programmes of study in Germany, especially medical studies, because of their insufficient grades obtained at German high schools, applied for entrance to medical studies in Austria. The Austrian state universities were unable to offer enough places and had to restrict the number of students by introducing a preliminary exam. The result was – for many reasons⁷⁸ – that more German students passed the exam successfully, but after finishing their studies, they went back to Germany. The Austrian Government has drafted various bills to comply with EU standards, but has ultimately introduced an increasing number of exams before the beginning of the studies, thus changing the Austrian legal system. Although there were many complaints about the CJEU's judgment in Austria, the ⁷³ Since 2015, it is possible to file a constitutional complaint at the Constitutional Court regarding a judgment of an ordinary court of first instance. The claim, however, can only refer to the unconstitutionality of the statute on which the judgment was based, but not argue that the ordinary court judgment is unconstitutional itself (see Art. 140 Austrian Constitution); see Ziniel 2014, pp. 437–444.

⁷⁴ See sceptical Albi 2015, pp. 158–161.

⁷⁵ In the Telekom Control case, the Austrian Constitutional Court accepted the supremacy of European legislation over Austrian constitutional law. Although the case did not relate either to the four freedoms or to domestic constitutional rights (but to questions regarding the concept of administrative authorities), the case showed the willingness of the Court to give EU law supremacy over domestic constitutional law. See VfSlg 15.427/1999.

⁷⁶ See also the debate on genetically modified food as discussed in Sect. 1.4.

⁷⁷ Case C-147/03 Commission v. Austria [2005] ECR I-05969.

⁷⁸ The German students tended to be older, had more preparation time and were more focused on the test.

Austrian courts did not try to obstruct the EU decision. On the contrary, the Constitutional Court declared several other attempts to resolve the overall problems facing universities in Austria as unconstitutional.⁷⁹ This example shows that Austrian struggles with European Union law might not be the result of EU economic freedoms but rather the result of the rights of EU citizens. The case also illustrates the willingness to adapt domestic law to comply with EU law standards.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

Introductory note Defence rights are mainly based on the ECHR (e.g. on fair trial, right to judicial protection), and are considered constitutional rights.

The overall constitutional framework for judicial and constitutional review in Austria, described at the end of Sect 2.1, was crucial when it came to the introduction of the EAW in Austria. EAWs have to be applied by the ordinary courts and are reviewed by the Supreme Court.⁸⁰ As the Constitutional Court is not involved and the Supreme Court and the ordinary courts are not primarily concerned with human rights, constitutional concerns have not arisen in the same manner as they might have within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court.

The implementation The introduction of the EAW was accompanied by a scholarly debate on the constitutionality of the EAW, but the matter never reached the Constitutional Court nor was there an overall objection to the EAW in Austria. However, there has been an intensive academic debate among criminal lawyers during the last 10 years, which includes concerns regarding the presumption of innocence, nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, fair trial and in absentia judgments, practical challenges regarding a trial abroad and the right to effective judicial protection.⁸¹

For example, regarding Art. 6 ECHR, Hinterhofer and Schallmoser⁸² have criticised the Framework Decision⁸³ and stated that it requires improvement regarding in absentia cases, because the defendant should receive the decision before he is transferred to the Member State that issued the EAW and should have ⁷⁹ See Lachmayer 2014c, pp. 77–120.

⁸⁰ The ordinary courts, however, had and have the possibility to file a complaint at the Constitutional Court themselves if they have doubts about the constitutionality of the act implementing the EAW, but have never actually approached the Constitutional Court on this matter.

⁸¹ See e.g. Medigovic 2006, pp. 627–642; Murschetz 2007a, pp. 98–106; Murschetz 2007b, pp. 302–369; Zeder 2003, pp. 376–386; Sautner 2005, pp. 328–343; Hinterhofer and Schallmoser 2010, p. 365; Hinterhofer and Schallmoser 2011a, b, para. 7; Schallmoser 2012, pp. 134–235.

⁸² Hinterhofer and Schallmoser 2010, p. 365.

⁸³ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

the possibility to request a review of the judgment. Medigovic, for example, has exposed the problems of the partial relinquishment of the requirement of double criminality due to the broad and vague terminology of the list of offences.⁸⁴

The scholarly debate and scepticism towards certain topics relating to the EAW were considered in the Austrian implementation of the EAW from the very beginning. One main criticism concerned the lack of a human rights clause in the Framework Decision. A human rights clause was introduced upon implementation of the EAW in Art. 19 para. 4 of the Judicial Cooperation in Criminal Matters in the Member States of the European Union Act:⁸⁵

The execution of the arrest warrant can be refused on the following grounds: if the surrender would violate the principles of Art. 6 TEU or any objective indications exist that the warrant was issued for discriminatory purposes (e.g. regarding sex, race, religion, ethnicity, citizenship, language, political opinion or sexual orientation). The examination of these objections can remain undone when the person had the possibility to object before the competent judicial authorities in the issuing state, the ECtHR and the CJEU.

Thus, the Austrian legislator has created a real possibility to claim abuse of human rights in extradition proceedings. This legal practice not only accepts objections by the persons concerned (as indicated by the statute), but the courts also consider this clause ex officio. Moreover, the Austrian scholarship considers this clause to be in conformity with EU law.⁸⁶ This statutory starting point for the EAW gives Austrian legal practice the necessary flexibility in EAW cases. However, no specific Austrian EAW case has yet reached the CJEU, and thus the Luxembourg Court has not yet had to decide on the Austrian human rights clause.

The Constitution was involved in the introduction of a constitutional provision with regard to the extradition of Austrian citizens in the context of the execution of an EAW. The Austrian EAW implementation act includes Sect. 5, which is a constitutional provision,⁸⁷ to allow the extradition of Austrian citizens. The Austrian Parliament thus amended the Constitution to make the EAW possible. This provision, however, is mainly concerned with cases in which extradition is not possible (e.g. where the person concerned did not commit any act on the territory of the issuing state or where acts of the same type would not be subject to Austrian criminal law, thus issues regarding 'nulla poena sine lege'). These exemptions to prohibit extraditions of Austrian citizens are formulated extensively and protect Austrian citizens broadly. As a result, up until 2013, in legal practice only one Austrian citizen who did not agree to extradition was extradited on the basis of an EAW.⁸⁸

⁸⁴ Medigovic 2006, p. 642.

⁸⁵ Bundesgesetz über die justizielle Zusammenarbeit in Strafsachen mit den Mitgliedstaaten der Europäischen Union (EU-JZG), Federal Law Gazette I 2004/36.

⁸⁶ Hinterhofer and Schallmoser 2011b, paras. 18–28.

⁸⁷ See regarding constitutional provisions Sect. 1.1; see also Eberhard and Lachmayer 2008, pp. 113–116.

⁸⁸ Hochmayr 2013, pp. 182–187.

To summarise, the Austrian Parliament has not only used the flexibility of the EAW Framework Decision to introduce a form of the EAW that is compatible with the Constitution, but has also been willing to adopt constitutional provisions to enable the integration of the Framework Decision in Austria. The changes to the Constitution, however, still guarantee the Europe-friendly implementation of the Framework Decision in Austria.

The Austrian case law The case law of the Supreme Court on the EAW is very limited and mostly technical. It does not touch upon sensitive questions related to the EAW. As mentioned above, for procedural reasons, the Constitutional Court has no involvement with the Austrian statute that implements the EAW. Politicians have also not considered the EAW as a particular threat to human rights, and none of the political actors with the possibility to seek a review by the Constitutional Court have initiated a review procedure. Some individual cases that have been covered by the media are discussed in Sect. 2.12 regarding the public debate.

There has been, however, an interesting case between Italy and Austria before the Austrian Supreme Court, which was based on traditional extradition and not on the EAW, because the EAW had not been implemented at that time.⁸⁹ The judgment was decided in 2008 and concerned an in absentia judgment of an Italian Court. The Austrian appeal court stated that there was no violation of the principle of fair trial (Art. 6 ECHR), because the person concerned left Italy after his pre-trial detention ended and he never informed the Italian authorities of his usual residence in Austria. The Supreme Court, however, recognised a violation of Art. 6 ECHR, because he had never waived his right to present an oral argument and his return to his life in Austria could not be understood as an attempt to escape. Finally, his failure to inform the Italian authorities of his residence did not release the Italian courts from the obligation to provide effective legal protection. The Supreme Court considered the Italian in absentia judgment as a violation of Art. 6 ECHR and did not agree that the requirements for an extradition had been fulfilled.⁹⁰ The Supreme Court especially referred to the case law of the ECtHR.⁹¹ This leading case was the first (!) time that the Supreme Court had denied extradition on the basis of Art. 6 ECHR. The Austrian academic literature came to the conclusion that the same decision would have had to be made by the Supreme Court if the very same case would have been decided within the legal framework of the EAW. Section 11 of the Austrian implementation act provides similar human rights guarantees.⁹² Although ⁸⁹ OGH 21. 1. 2008, 15 Os 117/07f.

⁹⁰ Murschetz 2009, pp. 29–33.

⁹¹ See e.g. ECtHR F.C.B. v. Italy, 28 August 1991, Series A no. 208-B; T. v. Italy, 12 October 1992, Series A no. 245-C; Sejnovic v. Italy [GC], no. 56581/00, ECHR 2006-II.

⁹² Sect. 11 EU-JZG formulates the following criteria for the enforcement of an EAW on the basis of a custodial sentence imposed in absentia. The preconditions are that the Defendant: (1) was informed in due time by personal summons of the time and place of the trial and was also informed that a decision could be taken in absentia; (2) was aware of the time and place of the trial and was entrusted a lawyer and was in fact represented by this lawyer during the trial; (3) was served the decision taken in absentia and was instructed about the right to appeal against the decision and the EAW Framework Decision does not invoke Art. 6 ECHR in its Art. 5, the consideration of human rights is set out in recitals 12 and 13 of the Framework Decision. This case therefore shows that Austrian courts are willing to invoke human rights in extradition cases. The actual number of cases is, however, very small.

The Austrian debate on the EAW has not been a public one, but rather a scholarly one.⁹³ Moreover, it has primarily been a discussion within the community of criminal law scholars and has not significantly involved constitutional lawyers.⁹⁴ As already mentioned above, the Constitutional Court has not been involved because criminal charges cannot be reviewed by the Constitutional Court, only by the Supreme Court. The rising awareness of the Supreme Court of human rights has only led to consideration of Art. 6 ECHR on one occasion in the Italian extradition case, which did not refer to the EAW. The debate of Austrian criminal law scholars, however, can be observed in the context of the increasing case law of the CJEU.

The CJEU's case law The emergence of the CJEU case law on the EAW has had different effects on the Austrian approach towards the EAW. First of all, certain rights issues have been discussed within the Austrian community of criminal lawyers. Secondly, the Austrian legislator has amended the act implementing the Framework Decision.

A critique by Austrian scholars e.g. referring to the Melloni case⁹⁵ is that the interpretation of the CJEU overlooks that the Charter only determines a minimum standard, which is also evident from the vagueness of the provisions. The core idea of minimum standards is, however, that in the individual case the minimum standard may be transcended. With its interpretation of Art. 53 of the Charter, the CJEU prohibits this possibility.⁹⁶ In the Radu case the CJEU neglected to elaborate more on the rights' standards.⁹⁷ The Austrian act implementing the EAW was amended to integrate the CJEU's case law (Kozlowski, Wolzenburg, Lopes da Silva Jorge)⁹⁸ regarding the discrimination of EU citizens by including a new Sect. 5a in the Act.⁹⁹

The CJEU's role in EAW cases shows an ambivalent approach, which primarily strengthens the overall concept of mutual recognition and the EAW. The Lisbon explicitly declared that he or she would not appeal against the decision, or within the existing time limits did appeal against the decision; or (4) has personally been served the judgment immediately after his or her surrender and on this occasion has explicitly been instructed about his or her right to appeal against the decision and thus achieve a new evaluation and suspension of the decision, and about the time limits for this.

⁹³ See also Sect. 2.12.

⁹⁴ See, however, Merli 2007, pp. 125–140.

⁹⁵ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

⁹⁶ Wirth et al. 2014, p. 381.

⁹⁷ See with regard to the Austrian analysis of this judgment Zeder 2013b, p. 85.

⁹⁸ Case C-123/08 Wolzenburg [2009] ECR I-09621; Case C-66/08 Kozlowski [2008] ECR I-06041; Case C-42/11 Joao Pedro Lopes Da Silva Jorge [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:517.

⁹⁹ Federal Law Gazette I 2013/175.

Treaty gave the Court the full potential to embrace a rights-based approach. The future position of the Court will decide on further rights development in the context of the EAW. The end of the transition period for the Lisbon Treaty (2009–2014) will further impact the rising role of the CJEU as a human rights court in relation to judicial cooperation in criminal matters.¹⁰⁰

Enhancing the EU's judicial cooperation While the EU tends to intensify police and judicial cooperation relatively quickly, the enactment of the complementary rights of citizens in the same policy field takes significantly more time. The establishment of a framework decision on data protection in police and judicial cooperation is one such example, and the establishment of rights of defence demonstrates the same problem. Certain developments in recent years indicate the first steps in a rights-oriented direction. The rise of defence rights in European criminal procedural law is illustrated by Directive 2010/64/EU on the right to interpretation and translation in criminal proceedings, Directive 2012/13/EU on the right to information in criminal proceedings and the Proposal for a Directive on the right of access to a lawyer in criminal proceedings and on the right to communicate upon arrest.^{101,102} A fully-fledged system of rights in transnational criminal proceedings still seems far away. Many elements have still not been properly addressed, and it remains a challenge for the domestic courts (but also legislators) to guarantee constitutional rights properly in transnational prosecution and extradition. The problem of imbalances between European prosecutorial concepts and the lack of rights of defence could get even worse with the introduction of a European Prosecution Office.¹⁰³

As regards abolition of the exequatur in civil matters, whilst one of the most important cases where the first instance court refused to forcibly send a child to live with her father in Italy was an Austrian case (both before the CJEU and the ECtHR – Povse v. Austria),¹⁰⁴ this is not regarded as a matter of constitutional rights or the right to access to courts in the Austrian discourse, because the Constitutional Court was not involved in this case law (which is the result of the Austrian court system as explained in Sect. 2.1). The case did, however, attract media attention.¹⁰⁵

Conclusion Austria presents a very particular approach towards the EAW. It is not possible to find any significant case law on constitutional rights and the EAW. The reason for this can be traced to the limited possibility of the Constitutional Court to review criminal law statutes and the lack of a constitutional complaint against judgments of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court itself is relatively reluctant

¹⁰⁰ Zeder 2015, pp. 126–130.

¹⁰¹ COM (2011) 326 final.

¹⁰² Zeder 2012b, p. 155.

¹⁰³ Zeder 2013a, p. 179–200; Zeder 2012a, p. 105.

¹⁰⁴ Case C-211/10 Povse [2010] ECR I-06673; ECtHR Povse v. Austria, no. 3890/11, 18 June 2013.

¹⁰⁵ Aichinger, P. and Winroither, E. (2013, August 6) Gegen alle Instanzen: Kampf ums Kind. Die Presse. http://diepresse.com/home/panorama/oesterreich/1438411/Gegen-alle-Instanzen_Kampf-ums-Kind.

when it comes to constitutional rights and has only shown a changing approach in recent years. The main elements of the Austrian rights approach towards the EAW can be identified in the implementing legislation, which employs an extensive interpretation of the Framework Decision to broaden the human rights guarantees. In Austrian legal culture, the Constitution is also involved in the general enabling of the extradition of Austrian citizens. The particular provisions are very complex, but tend to protect Austrian citizens against extradition in most cases.

With regard to rights in a criminal law context and the EAW, Austria generally has chosen a non-constitutional approach, using the potential of the implementing legislation. Concerns, especially regarding certain case law of the CJEU, have been raised by criminal law scholars, but real conflicts regarding the possibly of different approaches by the CJEU and the Austrian implementing legislation have not yet occurred. In the meanwhile, the pro-rights approach in the context of the EAW prevails in Austria.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 Before the EU introduced its Data Retention Directive,¹⁰⁶ the Austrian legal system did not have the police powers provided by the Directive. The Government waited a long time before implementing the Data Retention Directive in 2011.¹⁰⁷ Austria had already been punished by the CJEU for missing the implementation deadline for the directive.¹⁰⁸ This situation reflected the political scepticism in Austria. Finally, the bill was drafted by the Ministry of Technology in cooperation with a human rights institute to strengthen the constitutional rights elements in the Austrian implementation.¹⁰⁹

The state of Carinthia, as well as human rights activists, immediately initiated proceedings at the Constitutional Court as soon as the implementing act entered into force. The Constitutional Court initiated preliminary proceedings in the CJEU,¹¹⁰ where the Irish case¹¹¹ was already pending. The Constitutional Court submitted a number of questions, in particular regarding the validity of the Directive in the light of Arts. 7, 8, 11 of the Charter and regarding interpretation of the Directive in the context of the Data Protection Directive and the Charter. The Constitutional Court

¹⁰⁶ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

¹⁰⁷ See details regarding the political debate in Sect. 2.12.

¹⁰⁸ See CJEU Case C-189/09 Commission and Council v. Austria [2010] ECR I-00099.

¹⁰⁹ See <http://bim.lbg.ac.at/de/informationsgesellschaft/bimentwurf-zur-vorratsdatenspeicherung-begutachtung>.

¹¹⁰ VfSlg. 19.702/2012.

¹¹¹ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

also referred to constitutional law (especially Art. 1 of the Data Protection Act) and extensively to Art. 8 ECHR, which is also understood to be Austrian constitutional law. The Court did not refer to its own case law on privacy; however, the Court referred to the German case law on data retention as well as to the German concept of informational self-determination and to Polish constitutional provisions. After the judgment of the CJEU in April 2014,¹¹² the Constitutional Court ruled in June 2014 on the (un)constitutionality of the Austrian statutory provisions implementing the EU Directive. The Court declared the relevant provisions in the Austrian Telecommunication Act, the Security Police Act and Criminal Procedural Act to be unconstitutional and thus null and void.¹¹³

The Court came to this decision by reviewing the Austrian implementing provision primarily under Sect. 1 of the Data Protection Act, which is a constitutional provision and contains constitutional rights on data protection.¹¹⁴ This particularity of Austrian constitutional law, that ordinary statutes can contain constitutional provisions and even constitutional rights, was presented in Sect. 1.1; Sect. 1 of the Data Protection Act is a significant example. The Court used the usual proportionality test to review the provisions. By also explicitly considering the reasoning of the CJEU, the Court came to the conclusion that the Austrian provisions were disproportionate. Similarly to the Data Retention Directive, the Austrian provisions did not distinguish enough with regard to the criminal offences ('... it is not guaranteed that retained data is only then provided if it serves the criminal prosecution and resolution of the investigation which in the individual case is a serious threat to the objectives stated in Art. 8 para. 2 ECHR and which justifies such interference').¹¹⁵ The Court further reasoned/stated that 'the "distribution range" of the unfounded storage exceeds those interferences in the legal sphere which it ever had to decide and which is protected by Sect. 1 DSG 2000. ... This applies to the affected category of individuals, the scope and nature of the data as well as the purposes for which it is required and also the modalities of the use of data.'¹¹⁶ The Court concluded that:

The limitations of the fundamental right of data protection according to the legal reservation in S 1 para. 2 DSG 2000 are only permissible based on laws which are necessary for the reasons mentioned in Art. 8 para. 2 ECHR and which regulate in a sufficiently precise manner that is clear to everyone, the conditions under which the investigation or use of personal data for the performance of specific administrative tasks is allowed.¹¹⁷

The existing provisions, however, did not fulfil these requirements.

The Austrian police used the retained data for several purposes but not for prosecuting terrorism suspects. However, the pressure from police authorities to reintroduce these powers in the Austrian legal system is currently very high. The ¹¹² Ibid.

¹¹³ VfSlg 19.892/2014; see Lehner 2014, pp. 445–457.

¹¹⁴ The Court also considered Art. 8 ECHR, and Arts. 7 and 8 of the Charter in its reasoning.

¹¹⁵ VfSlg 19.892/2014, para. 172.

¹¹⁶ VfGH 27.06.2014, G47/2012 et al., para. 181.

¹¹⁷ VfGH 27.06.2014, G47/2012 et al., para. 199.

powers gained under the Data Retention Directive seemed to be very advantageous. The Minister of the Interior and the Minister of Justice have publicly stated on several occasions that there is a need to reintroduce these powers for police and judicial authorities.¹¹⁸

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 The Heinrich case¹¹⁹ was an Austrian case which did not happen by chance. The Austrian understanding of the rule of law focuses particularly on the necessity of publication of legal acts. There is a specific line of case law based on Arts. 89, 139 and 140 of the Constitution, which determines the requirements for the proper publication of ordinances (by ministries or administrative authorities). A ‘proper public announcement’ has to fulfil the constitutional or statutory provisions for public announcements. If there are no particular legal rules, a typical customary announcement has to be made. If an ordinance is not published at all, the ordinance cannot be deemed valid.¹²⁰ If an ordinance is not properly published, the Constitutional Court still has the possibility to invalidate the ordinance, while other courts will not apply the ordinance (Fehlerkalkül).

The Constitutional Court has created a link between the question of public announcements and the rule of law in general in its case law.¹²¹ It is understood as an element of the rule of law that generally binding legal acts have to be published adequately, which above all means in accordance with statutory law. This understanding of the rule of law was already part of the traditional formal understanding of the rule of law in its elaboration as the principle of legality.¹²² The principle of legality serves the function of legal certainty, which was also recalled by the CJEU in the Heinrich case.¹²³ Thus, the initiation of a preliminary reference procedure in the Heinrich case and the formal questions regarding the principle of legality reflect a typical Austrian constitutional understanding of the rule of law. The European result, however, that the measure remained valid but not enforceable vis-à-vis individuals, is not quite the same as the Austrian constitutional approach, as the Austrian approach would have been to invalidate the act.

With regard to the Skoma-Lux case, the publication of legal acts in the right language is crucial.¹²⁴ Article 8 of the Constitution determines that German is the ¹¹⁸ See e.g. Wimmer, B. Polit-Zwist um Neuregelung für Vorratsdaten. Futurezone. <http://futurezone.at/netzpolitik/mikl-leitner-fordert-neuregelung-fuer-vorratsdaten/125.315.643>.

¹¹⁹ Case C-345/06 Heinrich [2009] ECR I-01659.

¹²⁰ Mayer et al 2015, paras. 602–603.

¹²¹ VfSlg 16.852/2003; see VfSlg 14.851/1997; 11.867/1988.

¹²² Mayer et al 2015, paras. 165, 569.

¹²³ Case C-345/06 Heinrich [2009] ECR I-01659, para. 68.

¹²⁴ Case C-161/06 Skoma-Lux [2007] ECR I-10841.

official language of the Austrian state. Further minority languages (e.g. Slovene and Croatian) are also accepted as official languages for these minorities. Moreover, the author has carried out scholarly research on questions of the official state language in the context of police cooperation in operative measures.¹²⁵ The TFEU provides the legal basis for operative cooperation between the police forces of different Member States. Thus, foreign police officers have police powers without even speaking any of the languages of these citizens and without knowing the legal provisions (at least not the legal details) which they have to apply. Thus, there is a general problem regarding language in the operative cooperation of police forces in the EU.

Another interesting element of the Austrian principle of legality refers to a certain level of clarity which a statute has to provide. The Constitutional Court has developed case law regarding too complicated or too complex forms of legislation. The Court has stated that it is not the task of the citizens to show a level of diligence normally demonstrated by keepers of archives ('archivarischer Fleiß') to understand the content of statutory legislation.¹²⁶ Moreover, the Court has emphasised that it is not necessary for statutory interpretation to incite the desire to solve brain teasers or word puzzles ('Lust zum Lösen von Denksportaufgaben').¹²⁷ Again, the Court has established limits to legislation, which – although published – is not comprehensible to individuals.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 After the accession to the EU, the Constitutional Court declared in its early case law that the Court would not review domestic statutes on the basis of European legislation.¹²⁸ It would be the responsibility of the Supreme Administrative Court to review administrative decisions with regard to European regulations and directives. The Constitutional Court accepted the direct effect and supremacy of EU law even in relation to constitutional law. In the Telekom Control case, the Court clearly accepted that EU law takes precedence over constitutional provisions (which were related to the concept of administration in Austria and thus contributed to the rule of law).¹²⁹ Other cases in the context of energy regulation, for example, were already constitutionally considered by Parliament through the enactment of new constitutional legislation in Austria.

¹²⁵ Lachmayer 2011, p. 419.

¹²⁶ VfSlg. 3130/1956.

¹²⁷ VfSlg. 12.420/1990.

¹²⁸ VfSlg 14.886/1997.

¹²⁹ VfSlg 15.427/1999.

The Court has not been confronted with any cases involving European market regulations limiting property rights, legal certainty, etc.¹³⁰ On the contrary, European market regulations have usually broadened the rights of individuals as well as business corporations against the state. Thus, while limiting the power of the state, the rights of individuals have been strengthened by European legislation.

In state aid cases, it might be possible to argue that the Constitutional Court, according to its own case law, would in certain cases have provided a higher standard of legitimate expectations.¹³¹ Due to the European concept of limitation of state aid, however, the European Commission is more restrictive in these cases.¹³²

It can therefore be said that the Constitutional Court is willing to adapt Austrian constitutional provisions to European legislation and the CJEU's case law, especially in the context of the rule of law. With regard to constitutional rights, the Court follows a hierarchical approach and uses the preliminary reference procedure to refer to the CJEU to declare European legislation void.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 The implementation of the ESM Treaty in the Austrian legal system consisted of two stages. The Parliament first authorised the international treaty¹³³ and subsequently included new provisions (Art. 50a-d) regarding the role of Parliament within the ESM in the Constitution.¹³⁴ Parliament has to authorise the voting of the Austrian Government with regard to any 'proposal for a resolution to grant stability aid to a member state in principle'; 'an alteration of the approved share capital and an adaptation of the maximum loan volume of the European Stability Mechanism as well as the calling of approved share capital not having been paid in' and 'amendments of the financial aid instruments'.¹³⁵ Moreover, the competent minister has to inform Parliament about recent developments. Parliament has – similarly as in the case of EU policy matters¹³⁶ – the power to bind the minister by a parliamentary opinion. Furthermore, the Constitution authorises Parliament to establish further competences of Parliament by an ordinary statute. Parliament was therefore included significantly in the decision-making of the Government upon implementation.

¹³⁰ However, regarding judicial review at EU level, legal certainty and non-retroactivity were unsuccessfully raised in a case regarding excess stocks (Case C-179/00 Weidacher [2002] ECR I-00501) after Austria's accession.

¹³¹ Öhlinger and Eberhard 2016, paras. 787–788.

¹³² See e.g. Case C-368/04 Transalpine Ölleitung in Österreich [2006] ECR I-09957.

¹³³ Federal Law Gazette III 2012/138.

¹³⁴ Federal Law Gazette I 2012/65.

¹³⁵ Article 50b Austrian Constitution.

¹³⁶ See above in Sect. 1.4.

Besides this constitutional integration and the democratic considerations, the Constitutional Court has had to decide on a constitutional complaint against the ESM Treaty.¹³⁷ The complaint was filed in an abstract review procedure by the Carinthian state government and addressed manifold concerns regarding the ESM Treaty, including the unconstitutional adoption of the interpretative declaration on the ESM, the undue transfer of various sovereign powers and the lack of reasonability of the ESM.¹³⁸ In an unusually long judgment, the Constitutional Court dismissed all arguments which were raised. According to Art. 9 para. 2 of the Constitution, the Republic of Austria is authorised to transfer individual governmental powers to international institutions. This provision had already traditionally been interpreted broadly. The Constitutional Court in its ESM judgment, however, broadened its already international-friendly approach even further. The Court based its decision on the CJEU's Pringle,¹³⁹ case and referred to the German Constitutional Court's judgment.¹⁴⁰ The Court declared that the ESM does not contradict the constitutional principle of an 'overall economic balance and sustainable balanced budget' nor the principle of reasonability nor the principles of economy, efficiency and expediency. The maximum amount allowed under the ESM for Austria would be about 27% of the Austrian annual state budget and 5% of the annual GDP. The Constitutional Court stated that these economic decisions still fall within the political leeway that must not be restricted by the Court.

2.7.2 With regard to further financial matters it is – by Austrian standards – remarkable that it was not possible to find a constitutional amending majority in Parliament for the constitutionalisation of the golden rule (debt brake, Schuldenbremse), which was then only implemented on a statutory level.¹⁴¹ Other political reasons (opposition parties tried to get further parliamentary minority rights) were behind this. However, the Austrian federation (Bund), the states (Länder) and the municipalities concluded an inter-state agreement with regard to financial stability within the Republic of Austria.¹⁴²

Moreover, the Constitutional Court has had to decide on the European fiscal compact.¹⁴³ The Constitutional Court defended – with a similar approach as in the ESM case – the fiscal compact. The Court (especially in relation to the complaints) justified the involvement of European institutions in general and the powers transferred to them from a domestic level on the basis of Art. 9 para. 2 of the Constitution. Moreover, the Court stated that the establishment of a balanced ¹³⁷ VfSlg. 19.750/2013; see also Mayer 2013, pp. 385–400.

¹³⁸ The irrevocable and unconditional clause was not addressed by the complainant. As the Constitutional Court was bound by the arguments put forward in this specific procedure of abstract review, the Court could not address any other topics.

¹³⁹ Case C-370/12 Thomas Pringle [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:756.

¹⁴⁰ Urteil des Bundesverfassungsgerichts vom 12.09.2012, 2 BvR 1390/12 ua.

¹⁴¹ See regarding a European comparison Adams et al. 2014.

¹⁴² See the Austrian Stability Pact, Federal Law Gazette I 2013/30.

¹⁴³ VfSlg. 19809/2013.

budget is the task of an ordinary majority of Parliament (and thus no constitution-amending majority is needed).

On the whole, Austrian legislation and the Constitutional Court seem to be open to European fiscal cooperation. However, it is important to mention the domestic challenges relating to bail-outs and hair-cuts. The Carinthian bank, Hypo Alpe Adria, which is completely bankrupt (heavily influenced by Jörg Haider's politics and systems of corruption), created a major threat to the economic situation in Austria and the state budget. Heavy financial losses have had a significant impact on the Austrian state budget, have increased national debt significantly and have demonstrated that in the Austrian Federal System economic challenges need further legal frameworks, stronger accountability and effective control. The Constitutional Court has declared certain forms of hair-cuts to be unconstitutional.¹⁴⁴ The Court argued that the Hypo Reorganization Act, in an unconstitutional manner, distinguishes between 'normal' creditors and 'junior creditors', whose position in the event of insolvency is junior, and 'further differentiates within the group of junior creditors merely on the basis of the cut-off date (set at 30 June 2019). Exposures of junior creditors falling due before this date are deemed to be expired; claims falling due after that date remain unaffected. Such procedure, i.e. the application of an unequal treatment regime within the group of junior creditors depending on the cut-off date, is unconstitutional. This constitutes a violation of the fundamental right to the protection of property.¹⁴⁵

2.7.3 Austria has not been subject to a bailout or austerity programme.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Since the accession of Austria to the EU in 1995, Austrian courts have referred to the CJEU in more than 200 cases overall. Since 2001, Austrian institutions have requested a preliminary ruling from the CJEU in seven cases with regard to the validity of EU legislation; thus, only a very small number have related to questions of validity. A closer look at these seven cases shows a highly diverse approach by the CJEU.

The most prominent preliminary reference is Seitlinger and others with regard to the Data Retention Directive, as discussed in Sect. 2.4. Another case regarding the Data Retention Directive submitted by the Austrian Data Protection Commission was not considered because the case submitted by the Constitutional Court was already pending.¹⁴⁶ As is widely known, the CJEU declared that the Data Retention Directive contradicts the Charter and is thus void.

¹⁴⁴ See VfGH 3 July 2015, G 239/2014, G 98/2015.

¹⁴⁵ Ibid.

¹⁴⁶ Case C-46/13 H [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:1998.

In case C-309/10, the referring Administrative Court challenged the temporary scheme for the restructuring of the sugar industry in the European Community, as well as with regard to the principle of conferral of powers. The CJEU did not only review the EU principle of conferral of powers but also many other principles, including the ‘obligation to state reasons’ and the principle of proportionality. The CJEU, however, concluded that its review had not ‘revealed anything which might affect the validity of Art. 11 of Regulation No 320/2006’.¹⁴⁷

Regarding some of the other cases, the CJEU stated in its judgment in case C-439/01 that the relevant provisions (Art. 8 of Regulation No 3820/85 on the harmonisation of certain social legislation relating to road transport)¹⁴⁸ do not contradict the principle of legal certainty.¹⁴⁹ In CJEU case C-216/03, the Court declared the preliminary reference to be inadmissible.¹⁵⁰

In CJEU case C-329/13 (Stefan), the Austrian State Independent Administrative Authority questioned the validity of a provision of Directive 2003/4/EC, which granted an exception to the obligation to disclose environmental information where the disclosure compromises the right of any person to receive a fair trial with regard to Art. 47 para. 2 of the Charter. The CJEU could not find any violation of the right to fair trial. Finally, another preliminary reference at the CJEU in the context of environmental law concerned Commission Decision 2013/448/EU and questioned whether this decision is invalid because of an infringement of Directive 2003/87/EC.¹⁵¹

From the very beginning, the Constitutional Court has been willing to initiate preliminary reference proceedings at the CJEU. The Constitutional Court has not used these proceedings very often (four times), but it seems that they have always been a viable possibility for the Court. With regard to constitutional rights, the Constitutional Court has changed its approach since the enactment of the Lisbon Treaty. The Constitutional Court has used the EU Charter as the standard of its review since 2012 with the following effect: if Austrian statutes contradict domestic or European fundamental rights, the Court will declare them void and unconstitutional. Moreover, if European legislation contradicts European fundamental rights, the Court will file a preliminary reference with the CJEU for the European Court to determine whether the European legislation is invalid. The Court applied this approach with regard to the Data Retention Directive.¹⁵² The Schmidberger case also exemplified that ordinary courts in Austria follow this approach.¹⁵³

In summary it can be said that the Austrian cases in the context of preliminary rulings regarding validity are very limited. Other than in the Data Retention case, ¹⁴⁷ Case C-309/10 Agrana Zucker [2011] ECR I-07333.

¹⁴⁸ [1985] OJ L 370/1.

¹⁴⁹ Case C-439/01 Cipra and Kvasnicka [2003] ECR I-00745.

¹⁵⁰ Case C-216/03 DLD Trading Company Import-Export.

¹⁵¹ Case C-191/14 Borealis Polyofine [2016] ECLI:EU:C:2016:311 and Case C-192/14 OMV Refining & Marketing.

¹⁵² VfSlg. 19.702/2012.

¹⁵³ Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659.

the CJEU has not found any problems with validity. If one excludes the cases which are still pending and those which have been rejected, only four cases remain. In one of the four cases the CJEU accepted the concerns (25%). The overall number is, however, too small to base any specific argument on the outcomes.

2.8.2–2.8.3 The system of constitutional review in Austria is outlined in Sect. 2.1. According to the 2014 annual report of the Constitutional Court, in 41 cases of statutory review (out of 198) the Court declared a provision to be at least partly unconstitutional and void. In 102 cases the court declared the review to be inadmissible.¹⁵⁴ Thus, in 20% of all cases and 50% of admissible cases the Court declared a statutory provision to be void. Clearly the greatest challenge for a complainant is the acceptance of the case by the Court.

The Constitutional Court traditionally does not review EU legislation. It is up to the Supreme Administrative Court and the Supreme Court of Justice to review the implementation of EU legislation in the final instance. In 2012, however, the Constitutional Court introduced an exemption that concerns the Charter.¹⁵⁵ The Constitutional Court also uses the Charter to review administrative decisions within the scope of EU law.

If one compares the general standard of review between the Constitutional Court and the CJEU it is possible to argue that the domestic constitutional court has developed higher standards in different areas: the Constitutional Court has, based on the Constitution, a very distinctive and restrictive concept of the principle of legality.¹⁵⁶ The Constitutional Court has developed a principle of reasonability, which enables the Court to control every act of legislation regarding its reasonability.¹⁵⁷ Finally, the influence of the ECtHR has led to a detailed review of the principle of proportionality.¹⁵⁸

The comparison of these two courts, however, has to be put into perspective, as the CJEU and the Constitutional Court fulfil different functions and both courts work together in the European network of (constitutional/supreme) courts. First, the CJEU has to guarantee general principles in 28 different jurisdictions, which makes it necessary not to exercise review in an overly detailed manner, since this would make it difficult for jurisdictions to consider these principles properly. Secondly, the CJEU is not the only court to review EU principles and human rights, but rather builds on the cooperation of courts in Europe. Thus, it makes sense that the CJEU does not have the same intensity of review of general principles or human rights as domestic constitutional courts.

¹⁵⁴ See the annual report of the Court for 2014: https://www.vfgh.gv.at/downloads/taetigkeitsberichte/VfGH_Taetigkeitsbericht_2014.pdf. The statistic, however, does not consider the many cases in which an individual proposed a statutory review procedure that the Court did not consider.

¹⁵⁵ VfSlg 19.632/2012; see also Lachmayer 2013, pp. 105–107.

¹⁵⁶ Mayer et al 2015, paras. 165, 569.

¹⁵⁷ Stelzer 2011, pp. 242–244.

¹⁵⁸ Lachmayer 2014a, pp. 85–86; Grabenwarter 2007, p. 125.

2.8.4 The Bosphorus case law¹⁵⁹ shifted the human rights responsibilities from the ECtHR to the CJEU, which has intensified its human rights approach accordingly in the last 10 years. The Data Retention judgment was the climax of these developments. The Lisbon Treaty even raised the protection of human rights within the Union to a new level; the accession of the EU to the ECHR should have been the next step in these developments. The opinion of the CJEU can be regarded as a backlash against these attempts to create a complex but coherent system of human rights protection.¹⁶⁰ This also means that it would be necessary to revisit the Bosphorus case law, should the CJEU fail to guarantee human rights protection. The CJEU's approach, however, can be understood in coherence with its claims of autonomy, which were already stated in the Kadi judgment.¹⁶¹ The CJEU's approach could lead to a new balance in the European network of human rights protection if the ECtHR were to again intensify its own review of EU legislation.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

The rule of law as a domestic concept European administrative law fundamentally challenges the Austrian system of legal protection in administrative law. The Austrian system is based on certain forms of administrative acts and action (e.g. ordinance, decision, law enforcement).¹⁶² Depending on the type of administrative act, different types of legal protection are available. The problem that arises in the Austrian system in relation to EU administrative law is that new forms of administrative acts have been introduced which do not fit in with the system of Austrian administrative law and thus lack the necessary legal protection. The result is that the Austrian Parliament and Government have sought to transform European concepts into Austrian administrative forms – attempts which have not always been entirely successful.

Two examples of this are air quality assessments and air quality management in environmental law.¹⁶³ Rights for individuals and legal protection against omissions by administrative authorities must be provided to enact these plans. Such plan would usually take the form of an ordinance in Austria, but the legal protection available against ordinances is quite limited in Austria and only directly possible at the Constitutional Court. Legal action against administrative authorities who fail to enact a plan is not directly possible. Moreover, the Austrian legal system provides a relatively narrow definition of ‘parties’ in administrative proceedings. In contrast to ¹⁵⁹ Bosphorus Hava Yollarr Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Sirketi v. Ireland [GC], no. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

¹⁶⁰ Opinion 2/13 Opinion pursuant to Article 218(11) TFEU [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2454.

¹⁶¹ See Halberstam 2015, pp. 105–146.

¹⁶² See Öhlinger and Eberhard 2016, para. 81.

¹⁶³ See Directive 2008/50/EC on ambient air quality and cleaner air for Europe, [2008] OJ L 152/1; see also Case C-237/07 Janecek [2008] ECR I-06221.

the French model, which inspired the EU legislation, the Austrian system cannot provide the right for everybody to participate in administrative proceedings. The necessary changes to Austrian administrative law are not that easy to bring about because all of these questions are deeply rooted in constitutional law and it would be necessary to develop a completely different concept of the rule of law. The result is that currently the Austrian constitutional system cannot provide effective legal protection in all cases.¹⁶⁴

The introduction of administrative courts of first instance in 2014, however, shows that the Constitution and the rule of law have been changed significantly to create a constitutional framework that better fits EU administrative law.

The rule of law as a European value The European Union has developed its own concept of the rule of law over the last 60 years. The Maastricht Treaty identified the rule of law and human rights as two of the core values of European constitutionalism, which have to be fulfilled by countries applying to join the EU, as well as by the existing Member States of the Union. The case of the ‘EU 14 sanctions against Austria’ in the year 2000 and the Hungarian case showed the increasing aspiration of the Union to strengthen the rule of law in the Member States’ constitutions.¹⁶⁵ Although the Union’s approach struggles between strong legal powers (Art. 7 TEU) and too weak political debates as well as too detailed infringement proceedings, the EU institutions are intensifying their efforts to protect the rule of law and human rights as part of European constitutionalism.¹⁶⁶

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 The search for common constitutional traditions seems to follow a harmonising and universalising approach. From the author’s perspective, two levels of common constitutional traditions can be distinguished: first, a general level of basic principles and rights, and secondly, a deeper understanding of the very same principles and rights, which focuses on the particular constitutional cultures.

The first and general level of a basic collection of principles and rights seem to be found easily. The core constitutional values of democracy, the rule of law and human rights are common to the EU Member States. It is even possible to elaborate these three values in more detail and to find certain principles and rights which can be understood as common constitutional traditions. With regard to democracy, the parliamentary concept of representation shares certain elements of democratic accountability or public debate, as well as the party system in general. With regard to the rule of law, the independence of the judiciary, the principle of legality and access to justice are relevant. Finally, the ECHR creates a common foundation of European human rights. Common constitutional traditions can thus be identified and built upon, which leads to a harmonising and universalising approach.

¹⁶⁴ Giera 2015, pp. 218–245; Potacs 2009, pp. 874–879.

¹⁶⁵ Lachmayer 2017a, pp. 436–454.

¹⁶⁶ See European Commission Communication: A new EU Framework to strengthen the Rule of Law, COM(2014) 158 final/2.

On a second, deeper level of constitutional principles and rights, nothing seems to be the same. Each country has shaped its own constitutional approach by historical experiences, political decision-making or constitutional culture. The countries can be distinguished as federalised or centralised systems, presidential or parliamentary democracies, by the role of direct democracy, social rights or by civil or common law traditions. Particular rights are interpreted completely differently in the case law of the courts. Finally, the details of constitutional culture are shaped by history, language, politics and legal culture in general. While on a general level a common constitutional tradition seems obvious, it is more than doubtful that on a deeper level common constitutional traditions exist at all.

2.10.2 If one tries to address the question of common constitutional traditions, it is the author's view that it is necessary to see the incommensurability of attempting to unify all traditions in one common constitutional tradition. Thus, it cannot be the task of the CJEU to create a proper unification of all traditions, but it was and is necessary that the European courts develop their own approach to addressing constitutional principles.¹⁶⁷ Beyond the surface of common constitutional traditions it is necessary to see the plurality of constitutional cultures. The solution that seems preferable to the author is to engage more intensely in a dialogue from a pluralistic perspective with these different constitutional traditions. It is not possible to unify them, but it is possible to actively approach and confront them with the European approach, which has to be different (at least from some constitutional cultures).

The author stresses the still unexploited potential of comparative research in practice and in academia to strengthen the dialogue on constitutional traditions in Europe. The potential for comparative research in e.g. the courts' practice does not, however, only refer to the European Courts, which could informally as well as formally engage more in the comparative project. This comparative approach is primarily addressed to the domestic courts, to raise awareness of the different constitutional cultures in the other Member States. It is not only a 'hierarchical' dialogue between the European and the domestic levels, but a cooperative dialogue between the domestic courts on a transnational level. The transnational dialogue can also currently be 'hierarchical', as certain courts, like the German Constitutional Court, (pro)claim a certain order of priority in constitutional reasoning when it comes to the EU/Member State interrelation of constitutional principles. This practical comparison, however, would need strong academic support to provide the relevant constitutional knowledge for the courts.¹⁶⁸ Finally it seems necessary that the courts not only engage in this dialogue but also reveal their approach towards legal comparison, their comparative methodology and the practical outcome of the comparison.¹⁶⁹

¹⁶⁷ Tridimas 2007.

¹⁶⁸ See different projects like this one on the role of national constitutions by Anneli Albi (<http://www.kent.ac.uk/roleofconstitutions/>), András Jakab's CONREASON project on constitutional reasoning (<http://www.conreasonproject.com/>) and Robert Schütze's project on neo-federalism (www.federalism.eu).

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 Article 53 of the Charter has to be understood in its broader context as part of a very complex legal coordination of different human rights standards in Europe. The Charter, the ECHR and domestic constitutional rights systems compete legally to provide effective human rights protection. This legal complexity is created by the mutual interdependence of the different legal orders: the ECHR binds the domestic legal systems internationally and the EU is also bound by the Convention by its own reference in Art. 52 of the Charter. EU law in general binds the legal systems of the Member States by direct effect and supremacy supranationally. The human rights dilemma arises because the systems (EU, ECHR, domestic constitutions) do not provide the exact same constitutional rights, but vary significantly. On the one hand, the Solange approach – developed by the German Constitutional Court – gives EU law supremacy in human rights protection and was strengthened by the Bosphorus decision of the ECtHR. On the other hand, Art. 53 of the Charter and Art. 53 ECHR return the competence to advance human rights protection to the Member States. Within the scope of EU law, however, higher domestic constitutional protection might be in contradiction with the supremacy of EU law and the CJEU's function to 'ensure that in the interpretation and application of the Treaties the law is observed' (Art 19 TEU). The possibility to apply stricter human rights standards would create a different kind of EU law.¹⁷⁰ The increasing judicial conflicts between the European courts (CJEU, ECtHR)¹⁷¹ and domestic constitutional/supreme courts¹⁷² will increase the complexity and plurality of the whole human rights network.

An interesting element of this interrelation might be provided by the Constitutional Court's approach towards human rights. Austria is an interesting test case because it has worked with different national and international human rights catalogues for the last 50 years. The fragmented structure of Austrian constitutional rights¹⁷³ made it necessary for the Constitutional Court to create its own concept of constitutional reasoning regarding fundamental rights. The Constitutional Court

¹⁶⁹ Lachmayer 2013a, pp. 1490–1491.

¹⁷⁰ See also Sect. 2.3.

¹⁷¹ See Opinion 2/13, supra n. 160.

¹⁷² In Austria, a new rivalry between the domestic supreme courts can be observed.

¹⁷³ See above Sects. 1.1 and 2.1.

'reads the different texts together'¹⁷⁴ and creates a mixture of all the textual layers of fundamental and human rights. In particular, the Constitutional Court has had to apply the ECHR as Austrian constitutional law. Certain judicial divergences exist (e.g. with regard to the scope of Art. 6 ECHR) between the Constitutional Court and the ECtHR, but nowadays the Constitutional Court mainly follows the case law of the ECtHR.¹⁷⁵ Finally, the Constitutional Court – as mentioned above – has applied the EU Charter as the standard of its review since 2012. The Constitutional Court thus involves domestic and European (ECHR as well as Charter) human rights catalogues in its case law. The strategy of the Court does not follow a formal application of Art. 53 Charter or Art. 53 ECHR, but a more sophisticated interpretation of all different human rights catalogues, which takes each particular case into account. In its prominent judgment relating to the Charter, the Constitutional Court tried to combine Art. 6 ECHR case law and Art. 47 of the Charter.¹⁷⁶ Although the author is sceptical whether the interpretation in this concrete case is convincing, the inter-textual approach seems promising.

Thus, while Art. 53 of the Charter does not provide the solution to the complex interdependence of the different human rights catalogues, it might be useful in sensitive cases to consider the possibility of integrating Art. 53 of the Charter in the constitutional reasoning of domestic supreme and constitutional courts.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1–2.12.3 In Austria no democratic debate on the EAW Framework Decision or on the EU Data Retention Directive took place at the time of adoption of these European acts. In the case of the Data Retention Directive, public information was released by the media,¹⁷⁷ and the EAW was even introduced on a European level without any significant public knowledge at the Austrian level. The implementation of the EAW and the following discussion in Austria show that the Austrian media did not perceive the EAW as a particular threat to the Austrian legal system or to the people living in Austria.¹⁷⁸

¹⁷⁴ See VfSlg. 19349/2011.

¹⁷⁵ See Mayer and Wutscher 2014, pp. 201–211; see also regarding the dialogue on the ne bis in idem principle Fuchs 2010, pp. 181–197.

¹⁷⁶ VfSlg 19.632/2012.

¹⁷⁷ Editorial (2006, May 12) Umstrittene EU-Richtlinie zur Datenspeicherung in Kraft getreten. Der Standard. <http://derstandard.at/2435410/Umstritten-EU-Richtlinie-zur-Datenspeicherung-in-Kraft-getreten>.

¹⁷⁸ Editorial (2006, May 2) Europäischer Haftbefehl: 'Österreich kann eine Auslieferung verhindern'. Der Standard. <http://derstandard.at/2426050/Europaeischer-Haftbefehl-Oesterreich-kann-eine-Auslieferung-verhindern>.

Two cases shall be mentioned to illustrate the Austrian approach. The first is the Elsner case. Mr. Elsner is an Austrian banker who was sentenced for embezzlement and fraud in a huge bank scandal (BAWAG affair).¹⁷⁹ In the context of his prosecution, Austria issued an EAW against Mr. Elsner, who resided in France, because of an increased risk of escape.¹⁸⁰ The EAW was received as a positive opportunity for Austria to prosecute potentially corrupt Austrian bankers abroad. It showed the effectiveness of European judicial cooperation in criminal matters. The second is the Haderer case. Mr. Haderer is an Austrian cartoonist, who created a Jesus comic in which Jesus was basically portrayed as a junkie who smoked marijuana all the time. Mr. Haderer was sentenced by a Greek Court in absentia for the violation of religious feelings. Although the EAW was not relevant in the Haderer case because the violation of religious feelings does not fall within the scope of the EAW and the judgment was revised by the court of appeal, the case showed the tensions between human rights (freedom of speech) and transnational extradition in a European context, which was critically reported by the Austrian media.¹⁸¹

While the EAW was neither really discussed in Austria nor led to any negative reaction on the part of the Austrian media or public, there was a huge debate surrounding the implementation of the EU Data Retention Directive.¹⁸² The media and civil society were critical of the implementation of the Data Retention Directive in Austria. Constitutional lawyers openly expressed their concerns.¹⁸³ Moreover, Austrian politicians were reluctant to implement the directive. Only when Austria was threatened with a penalty for non-implementation of the directive¹⁸⁴ did Austria finally implement the directive. Austrian civil society groups immediately filed an action against the implementation, and the Constitutional Court initiated preliminary proceedings. Thus, Austrian society and the state did everything possible to escape this unconstitutional situation and finally succeeded. The damage, however, was already done. The taboo was broken and since then, Austrian police authorities have increased political pressure for re-implementation.¹⁸⁵

¹⁷⁹ Chronologie: Der Bawag-Skandal. Die Presse. http://diepresse.com/home/wirtschaft/economist/bawag/316119/Chronologie_Der-BawagSkandal.

¹⁸⁰ Editorial (2006, September 15) Für Elsner klickten die Handschellen. Wiener Zeitung. http://www.wienerzeitung.at/nachrichten/oesterreich/politik/282080_Fuer-Elsner-klickten-die-Handschellen.html.

¹⁸¹ Editorial (2005, January 25) Gerhard Haderer in Griechenland wegen Jesus-Buch verurteilt. Der Standard. <http://derstandard.at/1923749/Gerhard-Haderer-in-Griechenland-wegen-Jesus-Buch-verurteilt>; Rohrhofer, M. (2005, April 21) Freispruch für Gerhard Haderer am Olymp. Der Standard. <http://derstandard.at/2013477/Freispruch-fuer-Gerhard-Haderer-am-Olymp>.

¹⁸² Editorial (2007, June 8) Vorratsdatenspeicherung: Neue Allianz sieht Bedenken Faymanns. Der Standard. <http://derstandard.at/2907222/Vorratsdatenspeicherung-Neue-Allianz-sieht-Bedenken-Faymanns>.

¹⁸³ See e.g. Editorial (2008, January 9) Karl Korinek: 'Da passt alles hinten und vorne nicht'. Der Standard. <http://derstandard.at/3098462/Karl-Korinek-Da-passt-alles-hinten-und-vorne-nicht>.

¹⁸⁴ Case C-189/09 Commission and Council v. Austria, supra n. 108.

¹⁸⁵ Wimmer, B. (2015, April 16) Polit-Zwist um Neuregelung für Vorratsdaten. Futurezone. <http://futurezone.at/netzpolitik/mikl-leitner-fordert-neuregelung-fuer-vorratsdaten/125.315.643>.

The Austrian example shows that the domestic debates started very late: at the time of implementation or even later when the effects of the implementation became obvious. The EU Data Retention Directive, however, also illustrates that the implementation of an apparently unconstitutional EU legislative act will cause damage when it is implemented and effective (even if it is in force only for some years). Sufficient consideration of these concerns in the European legislative processes might provide an interesting step forward towards a truly European constitutional network.

First and foremost, there is a lack of domestic public debate taking place before new EU legislation is adopted on a European level. The integration of the national parliaments in the EU legislative process with regard to the subsidiarity principle is already an interesting step in the right direction. The European Parliament seems to be the place where these concerns should be relevant. I think that nowadays it would be possible for the concerns of domestic constitutional courts with regard to domestic constitutional issues to be raised in advance of the debates in the European Parliament. I do not think that further formal procedures are necessary at this stage. On the contrary, an over-formalised political process would create too many obstacles to enacting legislation on a European level at all.

When it comes to the implementation of EU legislation in the Member States, it seems an interesting idea to give constitutional or supreme courts (at least a certain number of courts) the possibility to raise their concerns in an infringement procedure with regard to the validity (constitutionality) of an EU act of legislation. Such a procedure, however, could not refer to the domestic constitution, but would have to be based on concerns regarding the EU Treaties, especially the Charter.

2.13 Conclusion: Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 The interrelation between the protection of constitutional rights and EU law can be characterised as complex and ambiguous. At least three different effects of EU law on domestic constitutional rights can be distinguished: first, the strengthening of constitutional rights through EU law, secondly the changing (and maybe challenging) of constitutional rights and thirdly, the weakening of constitutional rights. These three developments shall be exemplified from an Austrian perspective.

Strengthening human rights through EU law The strengthening of human rights through EU law in Austria can be related to many different legal sources, including EU secondary law, CJEU case law (especially regarding the general principles of the Union) and, finally, the Charter. After 20 years of EU membership, it is definitely possible to conclude that the EU has contributed significantly to the extension and increase of human rights in Austria.

EU secondary law was mentioned first for a reason. Although it is ordinary legislation of the Union, equipped with direct effect and supremacy, it has at least the same legal force as domestic constitutional rights. EU regulations and directives contain significant rights and thus change the rights of individuals significantly. There are many examples, but the most significant ones might be the anti-discrimination directives¹⁸⁶ and the General Data Protection Regulation.¹⁸⁷

As for CJEU case law, the general principles of the Union have also shaped the Austrian possibilities with regard to constitutional rights.¹⁸⁸ The right to effective judicial protection is the most prominent example, which changed the Constitutional Court's approach to grant (significantly more) judicial protection than was offered under the Constitution.¹⁸⁹ The EU concept of state liability, as another example, has also broadened the opportunities for legal protection in Austria.

Finally, the EU Charter will significantly widen the scope of rights which are protected by the Constitutional Court. With its important decision on the EU Charter in 2012, the Constitutional Court declared that the Charter will be the standard of review by the Constitutional Court in the scope of application of EU law. The consequence will be that completely new rights (like human dignity and the right to good administration) will be introduced in the Austrian constitutional system.

In conclusion, EU law has had many positive effects on domestic constitutional rights in Austria.

Changing human rights through EU Law The Austrian system of legal protection is primarily based on certain forms of administrative procedures and actions. The EU has introduced many new concepts in Austrian administrative law (e.g. in the context of emissions certificates and environmental protection), which do not fit in with the Austrian system.¹⁹⁰ The consequences, at least in certain fields, are structural constitutional problems which lead to a lack of judicial protection and, thus, challenge human rights protection in Austria. It will be up to further constitutional changes in Austria to adapt to these challenges.

Weakening human rights through EU Law The examples of the EAW and data retention illustrate that the transnational dimension of EU law creates deeper challenges to domestic constitutional systems and their protection of constitutional

¹⁸⁶ See e.g. Council Directive 2000/78/EC establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation, [2000] OJ L 303/16; Council Directive 2000/43/EC implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin, [2000] OJ L 180/22.

¹⁸⁷ Regulation (EU) 2016/679 of the European Parliament and of the Council of 27 April 2016 on the protection of natural persons with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data, and repealing Directive 95/46/EC (General Data Protection Regulation), [2016] OJ L 119/1.

¹⁸⁸ See Tridimas 2007.

¹⁸⁹ See Hiesel 2009, pp. 113–114.

¹⁹⁰ See VfSlg 17.967/2006, 19.020/2010, 19.157/2010, 19.305/2011, 19.415/2011; see also Oberndorfer and Mayrhofer 2006, pp. 529–554.

rights. Certain well-established constitutional concepts like the non-extradition of a Member-State's own citizens have to be changed to be in line with the European concept of judicial cooperation in criminal matters. Moreover, the Union seems to be developing cooperation that impacts on constitutional rights faster than the necessary complementary rights protection regimes, especially with regard to transnational procedural rights. These effects can only be addressed by a robust rights regime, which has to be enacted on a European level. The proposed directive on data protection regarding police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters¹⁹¹ serves as an example of adopting rights standards at the same time; however, the substantive value of the rights guarantees involved seems questionable.

From an overall perspective, it is possible to conclude that with regard to the Austrian legal system, EU law has had and continues to have positive and challenging effects on constitutional rights. The Austrian approach towards European human rights illustrates an active participation in the European constitutional network and the adaptation to European standards in constitutional law, including a broadening of Austria's own constitutional rights approach. Even such a domestic approach towards EU law, however, cannot absolve the Union of its responsibility to foster its own human rights regime, especially when it comes to challenges which clearly arise from the particular transnational nature of EU law.

The European approach towards human rights might be characterised as integration dynamics between rights' activism and rights' restraints. The constitution-alisation of the Union was significantly increased by the enactment of the EU's own Charter of Fundamental Rights, which subsequently became legally binding under the Lisbon Treaty. The integration of human rights by the CJEU is a process that has evolved over decades, which was given a further impetus by the Lisbon Treaty.¹⁹² However, the EU also has to ensure that it develops its own human rights approach, as this approach affects the remaining competences of the Member States.¹⁹³ Thus, the strengthening of human rights has to be understood as a step in the right direction and the next dimension of European integration. This development of European integration will create even stronger ties between the EU and the Member States within a European constitutional network.

¹⁹¹ COM/2012/010 Proposal for a Directive on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data by competent authorities for the purposes of prevention, investigation, detection or prosecution of criminal offences or the execution of criminal penalties, and the free movement of such data.

¹⁹² See e.g. Douglas-Scott, 2011, pp. 645–682.

¹⁹³ See e.g. Barnard 2008, pp. 257–283.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1–3.1.3 Article 9 of the Constitution provides the major provisions for opening the Constitution to international law. While para. 1 states that ‘[t]he generally recognised rules of international law are regarded as integral parts of federal law’, para. 2 authorises Parliament to transfer state powers (including parliamentary, governmental and judicial powers) to international organisations or other (foreign) states.¹⁹⁴ Parliament has to enact a statute to authorise an international organisation and can only transfer specific powers.¹⁹⁵ The Constitutional Court recently confirmed its wide interpretation of Art. 9 para. 2 Constitution in the context of the ESM Treaty and the European fiscal compact. The Court argued in favour of broad competences to transfer powers to international organisations.¹⁹⁶

Further constitutional provisions refer to the parliamentary authorisation process (Art. 50), the role of the President of the Republic in the ratification process (Art. 65), the possibilities of the states (Länder) to conclude international treaties (Art. 16) and the review competences of the Constitutional Court (Art. 145).

Austria has adopted certain international treaties on a constitutional level (e.g. the ECHR and its additional protocols).¹⁹⁷ The WTO Agreement, the Rome Statute and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights were adopted on a statutory level; however, certain provisions of the first two treaties were adopted as constitution-amending provisions. It is significant that amendments of the Constitution have been reduced since 2008 through the abolishment of the possibility to transform international treaties directly into Austrian constitutional law. At the same time, certain constitutional provisions in international treaties (like the WTO Treaty) have been de-constitutionalised and are now ‘only’ statutory law.¹⁹⁸ If international treaties are to be ranked as constitutional law, a particular constitutional act is now necessary. In 2008, the possibilities to transfer powers to international organisations and foreign states were broadened. The following sentence was added to Art. 9(2) of the Constitution: ‘Within this framework it may be provided for that Austrian agents shall be subject to the authority of institutions of other states or intergovernmental organizations or such be subject to the authority of Austrian institutions.’

¹⁹⁴ Art. 9 para. 2 Constitution starts with the following sentence: ‘By Law or state treaty having been approved according to Art. 50 para. 1 may be transferred specific federal competences to other states or intergovernmental organizations’.

¹⁹⁵ The limitation to transfer only ‘specific’ powers is traditionally interpreted widely.

¹⁹⁶ See above in Sect. 2.7.

¹⁹⁷ See already Federal Law Gazette 1964/59, but e.g. also International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, Federal Law Gazette 1972/377.

¹⁹⁸ Federal Law Gazette I 2008/2.

3.1.4 Does it make sense to amend constitutions to integrate international developments in the constitutional text? As mentioned in Sect. 1.5, the author argues that this depends on the constitutional culture of the particular country. Regarding Austria, it is interesting to observe that Parliament has actively amended constitutional law to adapt it to developments in EU law. It is, however, not possible to argue the same when international law is at stake. The Constitution is, as mentioned above, very open to international legal developments, but does not adapt to international law in the way it is used to adapting to EU law.¹⁹⁹ On the whole, I would not generally argue in favour of the internationalisation of domestic constitutional documents, but I would think that – when it comes to Austrian constitutional culture – it would make more sense to adapt international law more vigorously on a constitutional level and amend the Constitution regularly on the basis of international legal developments, than to de-constitutionalise international law, which does not correspond to Austrian constitutional culture. This development would weaken the Austrian approach towards constitutional law.²⁰⁰

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 The Austrian discussion on the position of international law in domestic law is divided into three different parts: customary international law, international treaties and decisions of international organisations.

First, as regards customary international law, Art. 9 para. 1 of the Constitution declares that it is part of the domestic legal system. There is controversial debate on the level of customary international law in the Austrian hierarchy of norms.²⁰¹ The first and most important theory states that customary international law has the status of domestic statutory law. Other theories assume that it depends on the content of the customary international law. If the content would affect a certain level of domestic law (e.g. an Act of Parliament), the customary international law would require the same level.²⁰² Finally, a third theory positions customary international law between constitutional law and domestic statutory law (mezzanine theory).²⁰³

Secondly, with regard to international treaties, the situation is clear: Art. 50 Constitution provides the relevant procedures. If an international treaty affects statutory law, Parliament has to authorise the ratification. As a consequence, a ¹⁹⁹ See regarding the comparative approach in Austria Gamper 2013, pp. 213–228.

²⁰⁰ The abolition of the possibility to implement international treaties directly as constitutional law is an interesting development. The adaptation of constitutional law no longer means a simple integration of international law on a constitutional level, rather has become much more a conceptual consideration of international law in constitutional amendments.

²⁰¹ Handl-Petz 2010, pp. 330–335.

²⁰² Mayer et al 2015, paras. 219–220.

²⁰³ Öhlinger and Eberhard 2016, para. 113.

particular international treaty has the same level as statutory law.²⁰⁴ If no authorisation by Parliament is needed, the international treaty has the same level as an administrative ordinance. Since 2008, it has no longer been possible for Parliament to authorise an international treaty on a constitutional level (not even with a constitution-amending majority). It is, however, possible for Parliament to enact a specific constitutional act, which transforms the content of the international treaty into Austrian constitutional law.²⁰⁵

Thirdly, as regards decisions of international organisations, it seems to be a general scholarly opinion that their position is not clear.²⁰⁶ The implementation of decisions of international organisations depends again on the content and the way the particular international organisation is integrated by international treaty in the Austrian legal system. For example, in the 1990s, the Supreme Court considered UN Security Council Resolutions as higher international law, and that jus cogens prevails in the context of UN Security Council Resolutions.²⁰⁷ The lack of further debate shows a significant deficit in the Austrian approach towards international law.

3.2.2 Although there has been debate on monism and dualism in Austrian scholarship for almost 100 years,²⁰⁸ when it comes to the adoption of international law in domestic law, the relevance of the debate is relatively minor. The moderate monism and the moderate dualism are similar in their effect. The explanatory value of the theories seems to be increasingly diminishing. The theories are based on a traditional understanding of international law as law between nation states. International law is, however, confronted with manifold developments, like the rise of the individual in international law, the role of transnational corporations, the fragmentation of international law, the increase of transnational and supranational law and the privatisation of public international law. Both approaches (monism and dualism) thus seem to be suffering the same fate. These theories are not complex enough to address the complex legal interrelation between different legal systems sufficiently: international legal pluralism or governance theories approach the legal complexities more convincingly.²⁰⁹

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 Article 65 of the Constitution states that it is the role of the Austrian President to conclude state treaties. Although the President is a representative of the administrative branch, the President is elected directly in Austria (and not by ²⁰⁴ Handl-Petz 2010, pp. 296–300.

²⁰⁵ Mayer et al 2015, paras. 239–242.

²⁰⁶ Öhlinger and Eberhard 2016, para. 127.

²⁰⁷ Handl-Petz 2010, pp. 333–334.

²⁰⁸ Öhlinger and Eberhard 2016, paras. 109–111.

²⁰⁹ Berman 2014; Zumbansen 2013, pp. 506–522.

Parliament). The President's direct democratic legitimacy is, thus, also part of the democratic control of the ratification of international treaties in Austria.

Article 50 of the Constitution determines the involvement of Parliament in the ratification process. Parliament has to authorise political treaties as well as international treaties that modify or complement statutory law in Austria. These treaties have the level of statutory law in the Austrian legal system. All other international treaties can be ratified by the President and have the status of administrative ordinances. If a treaty which has been authorised by Parliament provides a simplified modification procedure, Parliament does not have to be involved in that procedure as long as Parliament itself does not make a reservation in the primary authorisation.²¹⁰ In the context of competences of the states (Länder), the federal council (2nd chamber of the Parliament) has to authorise an international treaty. Finally, Parliament has the power to authorise an international treaty on the condition that the treaty itself will not become part of the Austrian legal system, but Parliament has to implement the treaty by a separate Act of Parliament.

Besides these 'traditional' competences of Parliament, it is quite unusual that the Austrian Parliament is subsequently involved in the activities of international organisations that do not result in another Act of Parliament. As mentioned above, the decisions of international organisations have not even been properly addressed by legal scholars. An example of the lack of involvement and awareness of Parliament are bilateral investment treaties.²¹¹ Democratic concerns were only raised with regard to the free trade agreements with Canada (CETA) and the US (TTIP).²¹² This democratic ignorance towards international legal development is complemented by a very open-minded Constitutional Court, which interprets the possibilities to transfer powers to international organisations very broadly.

The ESM Treaty, however, illustrates a new approach. The involvement of Parliament in the ESM activities was introduced in the Constitution as mentioned in Sect 2.7. The concept of this parliamentary involvement is similar to the possibilities that Parliament has to influence the Government in EU legislative matters. Because of its close proximity to the Union, it would seem obvious that parliamentary involvement in the ESM would be introduced by a constitutional amendment in the Constitution. The ESM Treaty, however, is an international treaty and the parliamentary involvement serves as an example of how democratic control could be improved in the Austrian constitutional order with regard to the increasing power of international organisations.

²¹⁰ Mayer et al. 2015, paras. 239–242.

²¹¹ See the list of Austria's bilateral investment treaties on the website of the Austrian Ministry of Economics: <https://www.bmdw.gv.at/Aussenwirtschaft/investitionspolitik/Seiten/BilateraleInvestitionsschutzabkommen-Laender.aspx>.

²¹² See e.g. the parliamentary opinion on the TTIP (see in general Sect. 1.4), which was only published internally; there was also a parliamentary discussion on the TTIP in June 2015 (see http://www.parlament.gv.at/PAKT/PR/JAHR_2015/PK0725/).

3.3.2 Direct democracy is not the usual approach to international law in Austria. This, however, reflects the overall constitutional culture regarding direct democracy and domestic issues.²¹³ In Austria, a referendum is only obligatory when the Constitution is ‘totally revised’. As seen in Part 1, this rule has only been applied once, for the referendum on EU accession. Other, optional referendums are possible for all other constitutional amendments and statutory acts. The optional referendum has only been used once, in the 1970s, with regard to the operation of a nuclear power plant in Austria. Thus, it is highly unusual for Parliament to ask the Austrian population for a referendum on domestic issues. This applies all the more in the case of international law.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 Article 140a of the Constitution empowers the Constitutional Court to review international treaties regarding their conformity with domestic constitutional and statutory law (depending on the legal level of the particular treaty).²¹⁴ The Constitutional Court’s competence only refers to the domestic dimension of its validity. If the Constitutional Court declares an international treaty unconstitutional, it obviously does not affect the international treaty on an international level, but only its application in Austria. By the ruling of the Constitutional Court, the international treaty is no longer applicable and cannot legally affect any institution or authority domestically.²¹⁵ A domestic declaration of unconstitutionality might, however, violate Austria’s obligations in international law.

The last prominent cases concerned – as mentioned in Sect. 2.7 – the ESM Treaty and the European fiscal compact. The Constitutional Court stated in both cases that these international treaties were in conformity with the Constitution and confirmed its open approach towards the transfer of state powers to international and supranational organisations. Since 1980, there have been 18 proceedings in which provisions of international treaties have been – at least to a certain extent – reviewed by the Constitutional Court. In all of the cases the Constitutional Court rejected the complaints, for various (formal and substantive) reasons. The right of individuals to file a complaint with regard to an international treaty is very limited. The practical relevance of the review mechanism to limit the transfer of powers or to raise constitutional rights concerns is therefore quite limited. However, the Constitutional Court performs quite a thorough review and will declare a provision unconstitutional if necessary. Thus, the potential that the Court will use its competence to effectively use its power to limit the transfer of state powers to the international level still exists.

²¹³ Eberhard and Lachmayer 2010, pp. 241–258.

²¹⁴ The provision was introduced in 1964 (Federal Law Gazette 1964/59). With the very same constitutional amendments, certain provisions from 13 international treaties were declared to be constitutional provisions. Most prominently, the ECHR was declared to be constitutional law.

²¹⁵ Handl-Petz 2010, pp. 304–306.

According to Art. 145 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court could gain the power to review domestic law on the basis of international law. The Constitution requires a specific statute as a precondition for this power, which Parliament can enact. Such specific statute has never yet been enacted and thus, the Constitutional Court cannot review domestic law from an international law perspective. It would be up to Parliament to empower the Court to do so. Due to the increasing importance of international law, this constitutional potential might be an interesting perspective for the changing role of the Constitutional Court in the future.

In conclusion it can be said that the Constitution provides significant possibilities for judicial review of international law and the involvement of international law in constitutional review. The case law of the Constitutional Court illustrates its open approach towards international law. The potential of judicial review, however, has not been fully developed as of yet.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 As mentioned in Sect. 2.1, the Constitution does not specifically provide a social rights catalogue. This was due to tensions between the conservatives and the social democrats in the 1920s, which made it impossible to agree on a human rights catalogue at all.²¹⁶ The reason for the impossibility to agree on a human rights catalogue lay explicitly in the social rights, which the social democrats insisted on integrating and the conservative refused to integrate. The subsequent developments in human rights in Austria have only been possible because of the influence of international law in Austria. The last serious attempt to enact an Austrian human rights catalogue was in 2003–2005 at the so-called ‘Austrian Convention’, which tried to significantly reform the Constitution.²¹⁷ The Convention, however, failed, and again, one reason was a failure to agree on social rights. International influence did not lead to the constitutionalisation of social rights in Austria.

Certain elements of social rights can be identified in the Constitution: the right to equality has certain social dimensions,²¹⁸ the right to education as guaranteed in the ECHR is part of Austrian constitutional law as well as the (limited) constitutional implementation of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child in 2011.²¹⁹ As mentioned above, the most important impact on social rights has been the European Union, first with regard to EU legislation and secondly with regard to the EU

²¹⁶ Stelzer 2011, p. 210.

²¹⁷ www.konvent.gv.at.

²¹⁸ Pöschl 2008, pp. 659–737.

²¹⁹ See the Federal Constitutional Law on the Rights of the Child, Federal Law Gazette I 2011/4; see also Fuchs 2011, pp. 91–110.

Charter. The decision of the Constitutional Court to apply the Charter similarly to Austrian constitutional rights will significantly affect the development of social rights case law in Austria.²²⁰ No social welfare clause like in Germany can be found in the Constitution.

This constitutional situation regarding social welfare does not, however, change the overall legal situation in Austria as a social welfare state. The Austrian legal system provides manifold self-governing institutions, especially in the context of social security, which provide a broad and effective system of health insurance, casualty insurance, unemployment insurance, etc. The social security system is currently struggling with new forms of employment, the costs of the public health system and the increasing number of unemployed people due to the economic crisis. Other social benefits include a tuition-free university system provided by the states and, for example in Vienna, free kindergarten. Thus, the social welfare system is still very solid and provides various rights to individuals on a statutory but not constitutional level. The economic crisis is, however, affecting the social rights system in Austria.

To summarise, due to Austrian constitutional history and politics, social welfare is not addressed constitutionally, rather mainly by administrative law. Social rights are not constitutionalised, but are institutionalised. The Austrian social welfare system is still an effective model for providing social rights, but not on a constitutional level.

3.6 Conclusion: Constitutional Rights and Values in Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 While Austrian constitutional law is ready to adapt its standards to European law very flexibly and quickly, constitutional developments regarding international law are less dynamic. However, some adjustments, like the re-conceptualisation of Art. 50 of the Constitution in 2008 required that international law, which affects constitutional law, has to be implemented by a specific Act of Parliament and cannot merely be authorised by Parliament.

The general constitutional approach in Austria towards international law is open in many cases. The Constitutional Court has the power to review international law domestically and uses its powers to defend an open and flexible transfer of powers to the international level. The constitutional possibilities to transfer powers were recently even broadened by Parliament.²²¹ It still seems that the Austrian constitutional scholarly debate and legal practice underestimate the impact of the transfer of powers to international organisations and other forms of international institutions. Within the Austrian constitutional culture there is still plenty of leeway to develop further constitutional concepts regarding international law. A plausible path to pursue is shown by the Austrian approach towards the ESM Treaty: amending the Constitution and involving the Austrian Parliament. Further international treaties would have the potential to be integrated in the same constitutional manner. Moreover, the legal integration of decisions of international organisations would be another important element for constitutional reform.

²²⁰ VfSlg 19.632/2012.

²²¹ Art. 9 para. 2 Austrian Constitution, Federal Law Gazette I 2008/2.

International counter-terrorism measures, including police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters, UN terrorist lists, asset freezing and secret prisons, have not played a significant role in the Austrian debate. The obligations of banks to freeze accounts have never been debated substantially either in public or academically.

However, one topic has triggered extensive public debate and scepticism in Austria: the introduction of an international conflict resolution mechanism in investment disputes with regard to the free trade agreement.²²² The TTIP debate is changing the public perspective and widespread public scepticism in Austria still remains; the parliamentary opinion on the matter was noted in Sect. 3.3.1. Although Austria has already concluded more than 60 bilateral investment treaties, there has been no debate on the constitutionality of the international conflict resolution mechanism, mainly because Austrian companies already use these opportunities and Austria itself has not been affected by any claims. However, a first investment treaty claim has been filed against Austria by an Austrian bank from its Malta branch.²²³ Based on a bilateral investment treaty between Austria and Malta, the owners of Meinl bank, which was involved in corruption scandals and had been prosecuted, claimed it had suffered 200 million EUR in damage caused by unjust public prosecution over seven years.

With regard to constitutional issues arising in the context of constitutional rights and values in global governance, it is first and foremost important to stress that the most important improvements in rights have been incorporated in Austrian constitutional law from the international level. Austrian constitutional rights are mainly shaped by international law; thus, Austrian constitutional law is internationalised when it comes to rights.

A final remark on global governance and Austrian constitutional law relates to the structure of global governance itself. When discussing global governance, two important developments also have to be taken into account: the fragmentation of international law and the role of private actors. The fragmentation of international law²²⁴ makes it necessary for domestic constitutional law to not only address one coherent and unified international law, but the various forms and concepts of international law separately. Global governance also includes private actors, e.g. powerful

²²² (2015, March 4) Mehrheit der Österreicher gegen TTIP. Der Standard. <http://derstandard.at/2000012479763/Freihandel-Mehrheit-der-Oesterreicher-gegen-TTIP>.

²²³ (2014, December 18) Causa Meinl bringt Vorgeschmack auf TTIP. Der Standard. <http://derstandard.at/2000009536985/Meinl-Bank-Aktionär-klagt-Republik-Oesterreich>.

²²⁴ See Martti Koskenniemi's Report on the Fragmentation of International Law: http://legal.un.org/flic/documentation/english/a_cn4_l682.pdf.

NGOs like the International Standardization Organisation and transnational corporations like Google and Facebook.²²⁵ In Austrian constitutional law, the legal power of these private actors is not constitutionally recognised. The consequence is that this dimension of global governance is neglected significantly. Only if both developments are addressed constitutionally in Austria will it be possible to uphold the role of the Constitution as guardian of the rule of law and constitutional rights.

References

- Adams M., Fabbrini F., Larouche P. (eds.) (2014), The Constitutionalization of European Budgetary Constraints. Modern Studies in European Law. Hart Publishing Pty Ltd., Oxford.
- Albi A. (2015) Erosion of Constitutional Rights in EU Law. A Call for ‘Substantive Co-operative Constitutionalism’ Part 1. Vienna Journal on International Constitutional Law 9:151–185.
- Barnard C. (2008) The ‘Opt-Out’ for the UK and Poland from the Charter of Fundamental Rights: Triumph of Rhetoric over Reality? In: Griller S., Ziller J. (eds.) The Lisbon Treaty: EU Constitutionalism without a Constitutional Treaty. Springer, Vienna, pp. 257–283.
- Berka W. (2018) Verfassungsrecht. Grundzüge des österreichischen Verfassungsrechts für das juristische Studium, 7th edn. Verlag Österreich, Vienna.
- Berman P.S. (2014) Global Legal Pluralism. A Jurisprudence of Law beyond Borders. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Douglas-Scott S. (2011) The European Union and Human Rights after the Treaty of Lisbon. Human Rights Law Review 11:645–682.
- Eberhard H., Lachmayer K. (2008) Constitutional Reform 2008 in Austria. Analysis and Perspectives. Vienna Journal on International Constitutional Law 2:112–123.
- Eberhard H., Lachmayer K. (2010) Ignoranz oder Irrelevanz? – Direkte Demokratie auf österreichisch. In: Feld L., Huber P., Jung O., Welzel C., Wittreck F. (eds.) Jahrbuch für direkte Demokratie 2009. Nomos Verlag, Baden-Baden, pp. 241–258.
- Fuchs C. (2010) Ne bis in idem: Korrespondenzen zwischen Straßburg und Wien. In: Lienbacher G., Wielinger G. (eds.) Jahrbuch Öffentliches Recht 2010. NWV Verlag, Vienna, pp. 181–197.
- Fuchs C. (2011) Kinderrechte in der Verfassung: Das BVG über die Rechte von Kindern. In: Lienbacher G., Wielinger G. (eds.) Jahrbuch Öffentliches Recht 2011. NWV Verlag, Vienna, pp. 91–110.
- Gamper A. (2013) Austria: Non-cosmopolitan, but Europe-friendly – The Constitutional Court’s Comparative Approach. In Groppi T., Ponthoreau M.C. (eds.) The Use of Foreign Precedents by Constitutional Judges. Hart Publishing, Oxford/Portland, pp. 213–228.
- Gamper A., Palermo F. (2008) The Constitutional Court of Austria: Modern Profiles of an Archetype of Constitutional Review. Journal of Comparative Law 2:64–79.
- Giera U. (2015) Individualrechte im europäischen Umweltrecht und ihre Durchsetzung im nationalen Recht. Facultas-Nomos, Vienna & Baden-Baden.
- Grabenwarter C. (2007) Zur Bedeutung der Entscheidungen des EGMR in der Praxis des VfGH. Österreichische Richterzeitung 85:154–160.
- Halberstam D. (2015) ‘It’s the Autonomy, Stupid!’ A Modest Defense of Opinion 2/13 on EU Accession to the ECHR, and a Way Forward. German Law Journal 16:105–146.
- Handl-Petz E. (2010) International Law in the Austrian Legal System. In Verschraegen B. (ed.) Austrian Law – An International Perspective, Jan Sramek Verlag, Vienna, pp. 287–344.

²²⁵ See e.g. the Austrian Initiative Europe versus Facebook: <http://www.europe-v-facebook.org/>.

- Hiesel M. (2009) Die Entfaltung der Rechtsstaatsjudikatur des Verfassungsgerichtshofs. Österreichisch Juristen-Zeitung 63:111–119.
- Hinterhofer H., Schallmoser N. (2010) Europäisches Strafrecht. In: Eilmansberger T., Herzig G. (eds.) Jahrbuch Europarecht 2010. NWV Verlag, pp. 353–374.
- Hinterhofer H., Schallmoser N. (2011a) § 3 EU-JZG In: Höpfel F., Ratz E. (eds.) Wiener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, 2nd edn. Manz Verlag, Vienna.
- Hinterhofer H., Schallmoser N. (2011b) § 19 EU-JZG. In: Höpfel F., Ratz E. (eds.) Wiener Kommentar zum Strafgesetzbuch, 2nd edn. Manz Verlag, Vienna.
- Hochmayr G. (2013) Schutz eigener Staatsbürger vor Auslieferung. Österreichische Richterzeitung 91:182–187.
- Jackson V. (2013) Constitutional Engagement in a Transnational Era. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Jakab A. (2009) Two Opposing Paradigms of Continental European Constitutional Thinking: Austria and Germany. International and Comparative Law Quarterly 58:933–955.
- Lachmayer K. (2011) Transnationales Polizeihandeln – Demokratische und rechtsstaatliche Herausforderungen der europäischen Polizeikooperation. Juristische Blätter 133:409–427.
- Lachmayer K. (2013a) Constitutional Reasoning as Legitimacy of Constitutional Comparison. German Law Journal 14:1463–1491.
- Lachmayer K. (2013b) The Austrian approach towards European human rights, VfGH 14 March 2012, U 466/11 et al. Vienna Journal on International Constitutional Law 7:105–107.
- Lachmayer K. (2014a) Eine Sprache, zwei Rechtskulturen: deutsches und österreichisches Verfassungsrechtsdenken. In Kischel U. (ed.) Der Einfluss des deutschen Verfassungsrechtsdenkens in der Welt: Bedeutung, Grenzen, Zukunftsperspektiven. Mohr Siebeck Verlag, Tübingen, pp. 65–91.
- Lachmayer K. (2014b) Regulatory Constitutional Law. ENLR 2:297–300.
- Lachmayer K. (2014c) Rechtliche Regelwerke der Universitätsfinanzierung. In: Funk B.-C. (ed.) Rechtliche und ökonomische Fragen der Finanzierung öffentlicher Universitäten, Schriften zum österreichischen und internationalen Universitäts- und Hochschulrecht Band 7. ÖGB Verlag, Vienna, pp. 77–120.
- Lachmayer K. (2015) Rethinking Privacy Beyond Borders. Developing Transnational Rights on Data Privacy. Tilburg Law Review 20:78–102.
- Lachmayer K. (2017a) Questioning the Basic Values I – Austria and Jörg Haider. In Jakab A., Kochenov D. (eds.) The Enforcement of EU Law and Values: Ensuring Member States' Compliance. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 436–454.
- Lachmayer K. (2017b) Constitutional Reasoning in the Austrian Constitutional Court. In Jakab A., Dyevre A., Itzcovich G. (eds.), Comparative Constitutional Reasoning. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, pp. 75–114.
- Lehner A. (2014) Data Retention: A Violation of the Right to Data Protection, Strengthening the Judicial Review System in Austria. Vienna Journal on International Constitutional Law 8:445–457.
- Mayer C. (2013) VfGH 16.03.2013, SV 2/12-18, ESM Treaty in accordance with the Austrian constitution. Vienna Journal on International Constitutional Law 7:385–400.
- Mayer C., Wutscher H. (2014) Are Austrian Courts Obligated to Consider the Jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights when Interpreting the ECHR? Vienna Journal on International Constitutional Law 8:201–211.
- Mayer H., Kucsko-Stadlmayer G., Stöger K. (2015) Bundesverfassungsrecht, 11th edn. Manz Verlag, Vienna.
- Medigovic U. (2006) Der Europäische Haftbefehl in Österreich. Juristische Blätter 128:627–641.
- Merli F. (2007) Europäischer Haftbefehl und nationales Verfassungsrecht. In: Lagodny O., Wiederin E., Winkler R. (eds.) Probleme des Rahmenbeschlusses am Beispiel des Europäischen Haftbefehls. NWV Verlag, Vienna, pp. 125–140.
- Murschetz V. (2007a) Der Rahmenbeschluss über den Europäischen Haftbefehl und seine Umsetzung im EU-JZG. Österreichische Juristen-Zeitung 61:98–106.

- Murschetz V. (2007b) Auslieferung und Europäischer Haftbefehl. Kontinentaleuropäische und anglo-amerikanische materielle Prinzipien des Auslieferungsrechts im Vergleich zum Europäischen Haftbefehl und dessen Umsetzung in Österreich. Springer Verlag, Vienna.
- Murschetz V. (2009) Aktuelles zur Auslieferung nach einem Abwesenheitsurteil. Juristische Blätter 131:29–33.
- Oberndorfer P., Mayrhofer M. (2006) Der nationale Zuteilungsplan für Emissionszertifikate – eine neue Rechtsquelle? In: Akyürek M., Baumgartner G., Jahnel D., Lienbacher G., Stolzlechner H. (eds.) Staat und Recht in europäischer Perspektive. Festschrift Heinz Schäffer. Manz Verlag, Vienna, pp. 529–554.
- Öhlinger T. (1990) Verfassungsgesetzgebung und Verfassungsgerichtsbarkeit. Österreichische Juristen-Zeitung 45:2–9.
- Öhlinger T., Eberhard H. (2016) Verfassungsrecht, 11th edn. Facultas, Vienna.
- Öhlinger T., Poier K. (eds.) (2015) Direkte Demokratie und Parlamentarismus: Wie kommen wir zu den besten Entscheidungen? Studien zu Politik und Verwaltung Band 84. Böhlau, Vienna.
- Öhlinger T., Potacs M. (2017) EU-Recht und staatliches Recht. Die Anwendung des Europarechts im innerstaatlichen Bereich, 6th edn. LexisNexis, Vienna.
- Peters A. (2010) Rechtsordnungen und Konstitutionalisierung: zur Neubestimmung der Verhältnisse. Zeitschrift für Öffentliches Recht 65:3–63.
- Potacs M. (2009) Subjektives Recht gegen Feinstaubbelastung? Zeitschrift für Verwaltungsrecht, pp. 874–879.
- Pöschl M. (2008) Gleichheit vor dem Gesetz. Springer, Vienna.
- Sautner L. (2005) Die Vollstreckung eines Europäischen Haftbefehls nach dem EU-JZG. Österreichische Juristen-Zeitung 59:328–343.
- Schallmoser N. (2012) Europäischer Haftbefehl und Grundrechte. Risiken der Verletzung von Grundrechten durch den Rahmenbeschluss über den Europäischen Haftbefehl im Lichte der EMRK. Manz Verlag, Wien.
- Schepple K. (2006) The migration of anti-constitutional ideas: the post-9/11 globalization of public law and the international state of emergency. In: Choudhry S. (ed.) Migration of Constitutional Ideas. Cambridge University Press, New York, pp. 347–373.
- Stelzer M. (2011) The Constitution of the Republic of Austria. A Contextual Analysis. Hart Publishing, Oxford.
- Thym D. (2009) In the Name of Sovereign Statehood: A Critical Introduction to the Lisbon Judgment of the German Constitutional Court. CML Rev. 46:1795–1822.
- Tridimas T. (2007) The General Principles of EU Law, 2nd edn. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Uitz R. (2015) Can you tell when an illiberal democracy is in the making? An appeal to comparative constitutional scholarship from Hungary. ICON 13: 279–300.
- Walker N. (2002) The Idea of Constitutional Pluralism. MLR 65:317–359.
- Wiederin E. (2007a) Grundlagen und Grundzüge staatlichen Verfassungsrechts: Österreich. In: von Bogdandy A., Cruz Villalon P.C., Huber P.M. (eds.) Handbuch ius Publicum Europaeum. Vol. I: Grundlagen und Grundzüge staatlichen Verfassungsrecht. C.F. Müller, Heidelberg, pp. 389–449.
- Wiederin E. (2007b) Denken vom Recht her. Über den modus austriacus in der Staatsrechtslehre. In: Schulze-Fielitz H. (ed.) Staatsrechtslehre als Wissenschaft: Die Verwaltung Beiheft 7. Duncker & Humblot, Berlin, pp. 293–317.
- Wirth B., Schallmoser N., Hinterhofer H. (2014) Europäisches Strafrecht. In: Herzig G. (ed.) Europarecht. Jahrbuch 2014. NWV Verlag, Vienna, pp. 363–390.
- Zeder F. (2003) Der Europäische Haftbefehl: das Ende der Auslieferung in der EU? Österreichisches Anwaltsblatt 65:376–86.
- Zeder F. (2012a) Europäische Staatsanwaltschaft: Die Nebel lichten sich. Journal für Strafrecht 9:105–109.
- Zeder F. (2012b) Der Europäische Haftbefehl im Fall Assange: Dichtung und Wahrheit. Journal für Strafrecht 9:151–157.
- Zeder F. (2013a) Der Vorschlag zur Errichtung einer Europäischen Staatsanwaltschaft: Große – kleine – keine Lösung? Journal für Strafrecht 10:173–180.

- Zeder F. (2013b) Neue Entwicklungen im Europäischen Straf- und Strafprozessrecht. Österreichisches Anwaltsblatt 75:192–203.
- Zeder F. (2015) Normalität und ein Sonderfall: Nach dem Ende der Übergangsperiode. Journal für Strafrecht 12:126–130.
- Ziniel T. (2014) Strengthening the Judicial Review System in Austria. Vienna Journal on International Constitutional Law 8:437–444.
- Zumbansen P. (2013) Administrative Law's Global Dream: Navigating Regulatory Spaces Between 'National' and 'International'. ICON 11:506–522.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Ireland: The Constitution of Ireland and EU Law: The Complex Constitutional Debates of a Small Country

Gerard Hogan

Abstract The 1937 Constitution of Ireland draws on the following three main influences: (1) the US Constitution as regards judicial review of legislation; (2) UK common law heritage regarding the fused Westminster style legislative/executive model; and (3) a variety of continental constitutions regarding some fundamental rights. The report observes that apart from constitutional guarantees on fair trial and habeas corpus, most fundamental rights provisions are expressed at a high level of generality. A distinctive feature is that the Constitution can only be amended by a referendum, and this is indeed frequently done, including with regard to EU law. The central EU amendment is the so-called ‘necessitated obligations’ clause (Art. 29.4.(6)), which has the effect of overriding all other constitutional provisions. The Constitution is a key part of the political debate, and extensive constitutional issues have also arisen in relation to EU law. Three of the most important data retention cases that have come before the ECJ have all originated from Ireland. Another notable case is Pringle, where an MP raised concerns about the large size of the financial liabilities undertaken by the ESM Treaty. With regard to the European Arrest Warrant, whilst the Irish courts carry out more extensive judicial review, the automaticity involved in mutual recognition has nevertheless been a constant source of concern for judges. The rule of parliamentary reservation of law has led to extensive adjudication, e.g. in relation to the introduction of indictable offences by governmental regulations under EU measures, and in relation to the ratification of an IMF loan agreement and an extradition treaty.

Keywords The Constitution of Ireland · The Supreme Court of Ireland
Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation
The ‘necessitated obligations’ clause/Article 29(6) · Fundamental rights

Gerard Hogan is Advocate General at the Court of Justice of the European Union; at the time of writing, Judge at the Court of Appeal of Ireland. e-mail: gerard.hogan@curia.europa.eu.

All websites accessed 16 October 2015. Text submitted 24 July 2015.

G. Hogan (✉)
European Court of Justice, Luxembourg, Luxembourg
e-mail: gerard.hogan@curia.europa.eu

Digital Rights Ireland and the Data Retention Directive • Schrems European Arrest Warrant, mutual recognition, automaticity of extraditions, defence rights and judicial review • Pringle and the ESM Treaty • Meagher, Maher, indictable offences and parliamentary reservation of law • Property rights Crotty and referendums • Ratification of an IMF loan agreement and an extradition treaty by governmental regulations

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The Constitution of Ireland entered into force on 29 December 1937 following its approval at a referendum which was held on 1 July 1937.¹ Since June 1941 the Constitution can only be amended by means of a referendum. It replaced the Constitution of the Irish Free State 1922, although key elements of that Constitution were preserved. That Constitution itself was the product of the Anglo-Irish War of 1919–1921 and the subsequent Treaty of December 1921.

Despite the (relative) frequency with which the Constitution has been amended, its basic structure has remained unchanged. In general, it may be said that the majority of the amendments have been designed either to delete the more nationalistic² or specifically Roman Catholic inspired provisions³ or to deal with the various amendments to EU Treaties. Several amendments deal with the vexed question of abortion. Perhaps the single biggest institutional change has been the creation of a new Court of Appeal in October 2014 and the (de facto) re-constitution of the Supreme Court along US lines.⁴

1.1.2 The Constitution mandates a (relatively) strict separation of powers, save that it follows the fused legislative/executive model in the Westminster style. It is also quite prescriptive in terms of matters such as parliamentary privilege, elections,

¹ See generally, Hogan 2012.

² Thus, for example, the territorial claim to Northern Ireland contained in the original Art. 2 and Art. 3 of the Constitution was deleted by the 19th Amendment of the Constitution Act 1998, which also gives effect to aspects of the Belfast Agreement between the UK and Ireland. See generally Hogan 2000.

³ Thus, for example, the 5th Amendment of the Constitution Act 1972 deleted the reference to the ‘special position’ of the Roman Catholic Church ‘as guardian of the faith professed by the great majority of the citizens’, along with the named recognition of other religious denominations and ‘the Jewish Congregations’.

⁴ By the 33rd Amendment of the Constitution (Court of Appeal) Act 2013 which came into effect on 28 October 2014. The practical effect of this was that all appeals now go from the High Court to the Court of Appeal. The decision of that Court is final save for those cases where the case either raises a point of law of exceptional importance or the interests of justice so require. There is also provision for ‘leapfrog’ appeals directly from the High Court to the Supreme Court, also confined to exceptional cases.

legislative procedure, executive powers and the powers of the (largely ceremonial) President. It gives strikingly impressive powers of judicial review of legislation to the High Court, Courts of Appeal and the Supreme Court. The Constitution also contains elaborate protections for a range of civil and political rights, including trial in due course of law, equality before the law, the protection of life, person, good name and property rights, liberty and habeas corpus, the home, free speech and assembly. The right to family life, the protection of children and the right to education are contained in Art. 41, Art. 42 and Art. 42A. Freedom of religion is also protected.⁵

While the Constitution is often unfavourably – and, in many respects, quite unfairly – compared with the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) by political activists and non-governmental organisations, it has nonetheless succeeded in becoming a key part of the political debate and is increasingly seen as a badge of national identity. In many respects its longevity and the vast corpus of important case law thereby generated, along with the fact that it can only be amended by referendum, have all contributed to this development.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1–1.2.4 As is by now (relatively) well known, the Irish rules governing the transfer or delegation of powers to the European Union are complicated and, in many respects, quite singular. While the recent decision in *Pringle v. Government of Ireland*⁶ has in some respects presaged a significant change in direction, in practice every significant treaty change over the last forty years or so has had to be enacted by referendum. Why is this so?

The Constitution of Ireland of 1937 is relatively ‘rigid’ in that since June 1941 it can only be amended by means of a referendum. If, therefore, it is considered that the ratification of an EU Treaty requires a constitutional amendment, then this can be achieved only by means of a referendum. Articles 46 and 47 of the Constitution require that a special Bill must be passed in both Houses of the Oireachtas (Parliament). The Bill must then be submitted to referendum and the amendment is carried if a simple majority vote in its favour. The Constitution has been amended in this manner on 29 occasions, but there have also been 11 occasions where such a proposal has been defeated. The referendum procedure is regarded as the ⁵ See generally Kelly 2003; and Casey 2000.

⁶ [2012] IESC 47, [2013] 3 IR 1.

quintessence of the overriding principle contained in the Constitution itself, namely that of popular sovereignty.⁷ The Supreme Court has twice rejected the notion that there are implied limits to the capacity of the People to amend the Constitution.⁸

There have been nine referendums in respect of European treaties:

1.	1972	Entry into the EEC
2.	1987	Single European Act
3.	1992	Maastricht
4.	1998	Amsterdam
5.	2001	Nice I (defeated)
6.	2002	Nice II (successful)
7.	2008	Lisbon I (defeated)
8.	2009	Lisbon II (successful)
9.	2012	Fiscal Treaty

These referendums have led to the inclusion of several constitutional amendments that authorise the ratification of the relevant EU treaties, including the following clauses in Art. 29.4:

- 4° Ireland affirms its commitment to the European Union within which the member states of that Union work together to promote peace, shared values and the well-being of their peoples.
- 5° The State may ratify the Treaty of Lisbon ..., and may be a member of the European Union established by virtue of that Treaty. ...
- 7° The State may exercise the options or dispositions –
 - i to which Article 20 of the Treaty on European Union relating to enhanced cooperation applies,
 - ii under Protocol No. 19 on the Schengen acquis ..., and
 - iii under Protocol No. 21 on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland in respect of the area of freedom, security and justice ..., but any such exercise shall be subject to the prior approval of both Houses of the Oireachtas.
- 8° The State may agree to the decisions, regulations or other acts –
 - i under the Treaty on European Union and the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union authorising the Council of the European Union to act other than by unanimity,
 - ii under those treaties authorising the adoption of the ordinary legislative procedure, and
 - iii under subparagraph (d) of Article 82.2, the third subparagraph of Article 83.1 and paragraphs 1 and 4 of Article 86 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, relating to the area of freedom, security and justice, but the agreement to any such decision, regulation or act shall be subject to the prior approval of both Houses of the Oireachtas.

⁷ See Pringle v. Government of Ireland [2012] IESC 47, [2013] 3 IR 1, 101–103 per O'Donnell J.

⁸ Re Art. 26 and the Regulation of Information Bill 1995 [1995] 1 IR 1, Riordan v. An Taoiseach.

- 9° The State shall not adopt a decision taken by the European Council to establish a common defence pursuant to Article 42 of the Treaty on European Union where that common defence would include the State.
- 10° The State may ratify the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union ...⁹

The Constitution is, of course, the quintessential product of orthodox nationalist thinking about the nation state. It proceeds on the assumption that state sovereignty resides in one of the three organs of state, namely, the executive, legislative and judiciary. Thus, even to this day, Art. 15.2.1 of the Constitution makes the following claim that:

The sole and exclusive power of making laws for the State is hereby vested in the Oireachtas [Parliament]: no other legislative authority has power to make laws for the State.

This latter claim is, of course, quite unrealistic in the context of EU membership, but broadly similar claims are also made in the context of both the executive and judicial powers. How, then, can these constitutional provisions be reconciled with EU membership? The short answer is that they cannot in themselves be so reconciled.

Faced with this problem on entry to the (then) EEC in 1972, the device was adopted by the Third Amendment of the Constitution Act 1972, whereby Art. 29 of the Constitution, which deals with international relations, was amended to permit entry. The effect of this general amendment,¹⁰ which was expressed to override all other constitutional provisions, was that (a) Ireland was empowered to join the European Economic Community, and (b) no law or administrative act which was ‘necessitated’ by Ireland’s Community law obligations could be found unconstitutional (‘the necessitated obligations’ clause). The ‘necessitated obligations’ clause, now contained in Art. 29.4.6, provides as follows:

- 6° No provision of this Constitution invalidates laws enacted, acts done or measures adopted by the State, before, on or after the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon, that are necessitated by the obligations of membership of the European Union ..., or prevents laws enacted, acts done or measures adopted by –

⁹ For the text of the Constitution, see <http://www.irishstatutebook.ie/eli/cons/en>.

¹⁰ Originally numbered as Art. 29.4.3. It has subsequently been renumbered on several occasions to accommodate a variety of constitutional amendments. Following on the 28th Amendment of the Constitution Act 2009 (which permitted the ratification of the Lisbon Treaty), it is now numbered as Art. 29.4.6. A version of the ‘necessitated obligations’ clause in relation to legislation enacted pursuant to obligations imposed by the Fiscal Treaty is contained in Art. 29.4.10 following the enactment of the 30th Amendment of the Constitution Act 2012 (which permitted the ratification of the Fiscal Treaty).

- i the said European Union ... institutions thereof,
- ii the European Communities or European Union existing immediately before the entry into force of the Treaty of Lisbon, or institutions thereof, or
- iii bodies competent under the treaties referred to in this section, from having the force of law in the State.

The formula contained in what was then Art. 29.4.3 of the Constitution worked relatively well until its limitations were highlighted by the Supreme Court's decision in April 1987 in Crotty v. An Taoiseach.¹¹ The plaintiff in this case had challenged the decision of the Government to ratify the Single European Act (SEA) by means of parliamentary legislation only, without a referendum. The Supreme Court ultimately held that ratification of Title II of the SEA (dealing with the creation of the single market) was within the scope of the 1972 constitutional amendment, since it did no more than attempted to give effect to market integration policies which had been contained in the original 1957 EC Treaty. The Court took a different view of Title III (which provided for formalised common foreign policies rules), holding that a constitutional amendment was necessary to ratify this aspect of the Treaty.

The Supreme Court's reasoning may be summarised thus:

- (a) There was no Community legal – as distinct from political – obligation to ratify the SEA. Ratification by parliamentary legislation was therefore not protected from constitutional attack by the 'necessitated obligations' clause in the 1972 amendment.
- (b) Without the protection of the 'necessitated obligations' clause, ratification was unconstitutional, since Title III of the SEA curbed an essential feature of state sovereignty. In the Court's view the power to conduct the foreign affairs of the state was an essential part of sovereignty, and the Government could not by a binding Treaty commitment agree to transfer that power to other states or to the Community.

While the reasoning and ultimate decision in Crotty remain controversial, it has been nonetheless accepted by successive Governments of the day. A special referendum was then passed in May 1987¹² allowing ratification of the Single European Act. But the long-term implications have also been significant. In practice, this means that the ratification of every Treaty change involving any further appreciable transfer of sovereignty or the creation of new competences for the Union has required – or at least has been thought to require – a referendum.¹³

¹¹ [1987] IR 713. ('An Taoiseach' are the Irish words for 'the Prime Minister'). For the background to this important decision and its implications, see generally, Hogan 1987; Bradley 1987; and Temple Lang 1987.

¹² 10th Amendment of the Constitution Act 1987.

¹³ Of course, there have been several instances where Ireland has ratified Treaty changes without the necessity for a constitutional amendment, not least in the case of Treaty changes required to permit accession by new Member States.

One of the difficulties with Crotty is that it is a single, isolated judgment from the Supreme Court which is by now over twenty-five years old. Not surprisingly, the composition of that Court has changed completely in the intervening years. Moreover, both Irish constitutional law and European Union law have developed significantly in the last thirty years.

A more nuanced view emerged from the Supreme Court's decision in Pringle v. Government of Ireland.¹⁴ In Pringle, the plaintiff's case was that the ratification of the European Stability Mechanism Treaty was such a momentous decision on the part of the Government that, following Crotty, it required approval by a referendum. The plaintiff pointed to the fact that it involved a potential liability of up to 11.1454 billion EUR by way of contribution to a fund totalling some 700 billion EUR for the express purpose of securing the stability of the eurozone in circumstances where the allocations from the fund could, at least in certain circumstances, be made by a qualified majority of the contracting states, which might not include Ireland, either because Ireland disagreed with the allocation or was excluded from voting.

O'Donnell J. put the matter well when he stated:

There can be little doubt that if the essence of sovereignty, at least as contemplated by the Irish Constitution, is to be understood as meaning that Ireland fetters its sovereign right to decide by joining any organisation which acts collectively, or at least one in which Ireland does not retain a veto (and therefore the right to say no), then the ESM Treaty would be of dubious constitutional validity, along with, it must be said, many other important international agreements.¹⁵

Following a very close analysis of the relevant provisions of Art. 28 and Art. 29 of the Constitution dealing with executive responsibility to Dáil Éireann (the lower House of Parliament) and the executive's powers in the field of foreign affairs, respectively, O'Donnell J. went on to point out that [f]rom these provisions may be drawn the unremarkable conclusion that the Constitution contemplates that the conduct of the State's foreign relations will necessarily involve the making of binding agreements with other states, which agreements could have financial consequences for the State, and on occasions require an alteration of its domestic law. ... It can be deduced from these constitutional provisions, at a minimum, that the Constitution clearly anticipated the Executive power could and would involve the making of binding agreements with other nations, and that Ireland might become involved in disputes which themselves might be resolved by a process involving a binding determination by which Ireland would be obliged to abide. ... This again contemplates that the business of the conduct of foreign affairs might necessarily involve the making of agreements with foreign States, cooperation with, and membership of, international bodies, and occasionally, and regrettably, the possible occurrence of disputes including the commitment of the State to a war.

O'Donnell J. then stressed the extent to which judicial review of the executive function in the sphere of foreign affairs remained limited:

¹⁴ [2012] IESC 47, [2013] 3 IR 1.

¹⁵ [2013] 3 IR 1, 104.

The courts' function in this regard is to enforce those boundaries of, and limitations to, the exercise of the Executive power in foreign relations which are either express in, or to be implied from, the constitutional text, and at the same time to reject any attempt to impose limitations on Governmental conduct of foreign relations not justified by the Constitution.

... Since it is to the Government alone that the conduct of foreign affairs is consigned by the Constitution, it follows that such international relations must be conducted by the Government, which cannot abdicate, alienate, transfer or subordinate its functions to any other State or body.

O'Donnell J. stressed the extent to which membership of international organisations – such as, for example, the United Nations or the International Monetary Fund – was regarded as the very exercise of sovereignty and not a restriction upon its exercise. What was critical, therefore, was whether the power to conduct foreign affairs had been transferred or alienated to another body. Short of that, the fact that the Government had made a momentous decision with potentially profound consequences was in itself irrelevant.

It is hard to disagree with the conclusion of many observers that the effect of Pringle has been to neutralise at least part of the earlier decision in Crotty, which dealt with restrictions on the executive power of the state.¹⁶ One should not, however, deduce from this that the Government now has a free hand, because the other aspect of Crotty – namely, that a proposal to amend an EU treaty does not enjoy constitutional immunity for the purposes of Art. 29.4.6 of the Constitution because it is not (yet) an obligation of EU law – continues to hold sway. There will thus continue to be constitutional objections where an EU Treaty imposes specific obligations on Member States over and above any perceived restrictions on the right to conduct foreign policy. Accordingly, even if the decision in Pringle had been delivered before the dates of both the Lisbon Treaty and the Fiscal and Stability Treaty, it is hard to see how a referendum would still not have been required in both instances. In the case of the Lisbon Treaty, the decision to accord Treaty status to the Charter of Fundamental Rights would probably have required a constitutional amendment, given the uncertain reach and scope of the Charter and the manner in which it might potentially overreach some of the corresponding fundamental rights provisions of the Irish Constitution. The same is true in respect of the Fiscal Treaty: the specific obligations in relation to fiscal discipline and budget deficits would cut across the autonomy of Dáil Éireann in relation to such matters granted by the Constitution.

The provisions of Art. 29.4.7 and Art. 29.4.8 have their origins in the variable geometry provided for in the aftermath of the Amsterdam Treaty. Given that the United Kingdom had secured opt-outs from the Schengen agreement and in the entire area of justice and home affairs, it was for practical purposes necessary for Ireland to do likewise, as otherwise the entire common travel arrangements with the United Kingdom (and specifically free access over the land border with Northern Ireland) would have been placed in jeopardy. From a constitutional perspective it was considered that the ‘necessitated obligations’ clause would break down in the face of the adoption of measures in respect of which Ireland later elected to opt in and which were thus plainly optional in the sense just described. Article 29.4.7 and Art. 29.4.8 are accordingly designed to give democratic legitimacy to such decisions by securing the prior assent of both Houses of the Oireachtas. In practice, however, this generally amounts to giving parliamentary assent to matters which have already been diplomatically agreed in principle at EU level, and there is no real sense in which the negotiating hand of the executive has been constrained by the need to secure subsequent parliamentary approval.

¹⁶ See in particular the important articles written by two former members of the Supreme Court: Keane 2014, pp. 195–213; and Geoghegan 2014, pp. 213–219.

1.3 The Supremacy of EU Law

1.3.1–1.3.4 The constitutional provisions and court judgments regarding sovereignty are outlined in the preceding section.

Regarding supremacy, Ireland may be regarded as a classic example of a dualist state on the basis of Art. 29.6 of the Constitution (see Sect. 3.2). However, the situation is very clearly otherwise in the case of European Union law, since the effect of Art. 29.4.6 of the Constitution, the wording of which was provided in the preceding section, is to confer supremacy on EU law over the domestic law and Constitution to the extent that this is necessitated by the obligations of EU membership. To date, application of the supremacy clause has been largely unproblematic. It is nonetheless clear that from the standpoint of Irish law, EU law is supreme within its proper sphere of application because Art. 29.4.6 of the Constitution says it is, and not because of some autonomous, freestanding notion of European Union law which the Irish courts feel obliged to apply independently of this constitutional provision.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 While Art. 15.2.1 of the Constitution provides that the exclusive lawmaking power resides in the Oireachtas,¹⁷ it has on the whole performed poorly as a law making institution. In practice, legislation is drafted by specialist teams within the Attorney General’s Office, who in turn take their instructions from the civil service departments that sponsor the measure. Very few measures which have been drafted or prepared otherwise than with the approval of the Government become law. To that extent, therefore, the Oireachtas might better be regarded as ‘a law-declaring rather than a law-making body’.¹⁸

¹⁷ I.e., the Parliament which consists of Dáil Éireann (the lower House), Seanad Éireann (the upper House) and the President.

Added to this is the fact that, at least in the past, legislation was often drafted in wide and loose terms, such that in many instances the underlying policy was really to be found in the statutory instrument giving effect to the legislation. Admittedly, Art. 15.2.1 of the Constitution has been deployed on a number of occasions to invalidate legislation which has been held to confer open-ended powers on members of the Government (and, in some cases, other bodies) to make ministerial orders on the basis that the powers so delegated were essentially legislative in nature.¹⁹ This important development notwithstanding, the basic problem remains that of weak parliamentary oversight of the legislative drafting process.

This problem was especially acute in the context of the transposition of European Union directives, as the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1973 permitted the relevant minister to give effect to a directive by means of a statutory instrument. In essence, the weak parliamentary oversight at Union level²⁰ was magnified by even weaker legislative scrutiny at national level, so that important legislative measures are transposed into national law without really any effective parliamentary scrutiny at all. The constitutionality of this system was upheld by the Supreme Court in *Meagher v. Minister for Agriculture*²¹ and *Maher v. Minister for Agriculture*²² with few, if any, reservations in respect of its implications for a democratic system of government.

The present system can, however, be defended on the very practical ground that it ensures that directives are transposed into national law in a timely fashion:

The ever-increasing number of directives requiring implementation within strict deadlines inevitably puts pressure on members of the Irish executive to implement directives by statutory instruments even in circumstances where enactment by statute might otherwise have been more appropriate.²³

A key limitation on the power to implement Union law by regulation was contained in Sect. 3(3) of the European Communities Act 1972: an indictable offence may not be created by regulation. However, apparently sensible – and eminently justifiable – judicial intervention here, aimed at upholding the rule of law, has had unforeseen consequences. The issue arose in Browne v. Attorney General,²⁴ where the applicant had been charged with violating a ministerial order

¹⁸ Chubb 1974, p. 65.

¹⁹ See, e.g., McGowan v. Labour Court [2013] IESC 21, [2013] 2 ILRM 376, Bederev v. Ireland [2015] IECA 38, [2015] 1 ILRM 301.

²⁰ Even if post-Lisbon the power of co-decision at European Parliament level has been strengthened and enhanced.

²¹ [1994] 1 IR 329. See generally Fahey 2010, pp. 51–69 for a very helpful overview of the case law.

²² [2001] 2 IR 139.

²³ Tomkin 2004, p. 150.

²⁴ [2003] 3 IR 205.

which restricted drift-net fishing. The restriction was required by a Council regulation. Indeed, the ministerial order had expressly recited that it was being promulgated in order to permit the enforcement of a Council regulation. In order to circumvent the prohibition in the 1972 Act, the respondent claimed that he possessed the authority to create an indictable offence under Sect. 223A of the Fisheries (Consolidation) Act 1959 (as amended), under which he could ‘prescribe and adopt either or both of the following measures, namely, measures of conservation of fish stocks and measures of rational exploitation of fisheries’. The Supreme Court held that the power to make regulations could not be used to circumvent this statutory prohibition:

There is no indication whatever in the language of section 223A that it was envisaged by the Oireachtas that the second respondent could give effect to principles and policies which had never been considered or adopted by the Oireachtas by means of a statutory instrument under that section which effectively circumvented the prohibition on the creation of indictable offences in section 3(3) of the Act of 1972.²⁵

The effect of Browne was reversed by the European Communities Act 2007, in which the Oireachtas permitted the creation of indictable offences by secondary legislation implementing Community law.²⁶ Section 4 of the 2007 Act also allows the minister to exercise the power to make a statutory instrument for the purposes of implementing an EU act, if the ‘obligations imposed on the State under the European act concerned relate, in whole, to matters to which that [power] relates’. Other legislative innovations increasing the armoury of the executive in Community law matters have followed. For example, Sect. 4 of the Communication Regulations (Amendment) Act 2007 inserted a new Sect. 46A into the Communication Regulations Act 2002, which now allows the minister to create indictable offences by regulation in order to give effect to various provisions of Community law. Thus, worries about the democratic deficit aside, an unfortunate – and entirely unforeseen – consequence of the Supreme Court decision in Browne has been that instead of compelling the Oireachtas to introduce new criminal offences by primary legislation with the full panoply of political safeguards, there has been an increase in the number of areas in which a minister can introduce new indictable offences by regulation. The requirement of the rule of law that statutory requirements be public and precise has been undermined somewhat by these developments.²⁷

In addition, the principle of legal certainty, central to the rule of law, has been undermined by the sheer volume of Community law that is put on the statute books:

²⁵ Ibid., p. 220, per Keane C.J.

²⁶ European Communities Act 1972, s. 3(3), as substituted by European Communities Act 2007, Sect. 2.

²⁷ Cf. Quinn v. Ireland [2007] IESC 16, [2007] 3 IR 395, where Denham J. held that regulations having statutory effect (Sect. 4 of the European Communities Act 1972 having given birth to such strange creatures) cannot themselves be amended by subsequent regulations.

There is no official publication that gives up to date information as to whether or not a particular statutory instrument has been amended or revoked. In fact, the only certain way of establishing as to whether or not a particular statutory instrument is in force, is by going through every subsequent statutory instrument manually, and checking to see if another statutory instrument under a different name, amends the earlier statutory instrument.²⁸

1.4.2 On EU referendums in Ireland, see Sect. 1.2.

1.5 Waning Constitutional Influence?

1.5.1–1.5.3 While concerns have been frequently expressed that the on-going expansion of the scope and reach of European Union law might ultimately lead to a waning of the influence of the Constitution of Ireland, this has not (as yet, at least) happened. These concerns were particularly voiced during the two Lisbon referendums, as it was suggested that by ‘constitutionalising’ the Charter of Fundamental Rights and by the ever expanding potential reach of EU law, key decision-making on aspects of fundamental rights by the Irish judiciary (and especially by the Irish Supreme Court) might be supplanted in practice by the Court of Justice.

It has to be said that there is no immediate sign of this, partly because of the absolute centrality of the Constitution to Irish political, social and legal discourse. In addition, the fact that the People have an important role in key decision-making via the referendum process reinforces this legal and cultural tendency. This was immediately visible in the recent same-sex marriage referendum on 22 May 2015. The striking scenes of popular joy and celebration in Dublin as the referendum results were announced were remarkable, even astonishing.²⁹ While some disagree as to the wisdom of the referendum process in relation to matters of this kind,³⁰ what is undeniable is that a decision of this sensitivity brought about in this fashion is likely to have greater long-term democratic acceptability even by comparison with a purely legislative change or a change imposed by either the Irish Supreme Court, the Court of Justice or the European Court of Human Rights.

²⁸ Tomkin 2004, p. 152.

²⁹ See e.g. O’Hanlon, G (2015, June 1) Scenes of joy in Dublin Castle on May 23rd felt like a kind of secular Pentecost. The Irish Times.

³⁰ See e.g. Weeks, L. (2015, June 2). Rule by way of referendum is not the best way to make decisions. The Irish Times.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Articles 40 to 44 of the Constitution of Ireland are headed ‘Fundamental Rights’ and deal with what might be regarded as standard civil and political rights: thus the principle of equality, life, person, good name, property rights, personal liberty, habeas corpus, inviolability of the dwelling, free speech and assembly, family and children, education and freedom of religion are all protected. In addition, Art. 38.1 of the Constitution guarantees that ‘[n]o person shall be tried on any criminal charge save in due course of law’, and Art. 38.5 guarantees the right to jury trial. In some cases the guarantees are detailed and specific: this is true, for example, of the procedure to be followed in habeas corpus applications.³¹ In most other cases, however, the guarantees are expressed at a high level of generality.³²

Two specific features of these fundamental rights provisions should, however, be noted. First, the courts have developed a doctrine of unenumerated or implied rights designed to capture standard fundamental rights which are not otherwise expressly provided for in Arts. 40 to 44: rights protected under this heading include free movement and travel, the right to fair procedures, the right to marry and the right to privacy. Secondly, Art. 45 contains a list of what would nowadays be described as socio-economic rights which are not ‘cognisable by any Court under any provision of this Constitution’.³³

Over and above the specific constitutional provisions lie the general principles of law – such as proportionality, non-retroactivity and legal certainty – some of which have a specific constitutional grounding. Thus, for example, Art. 5 of the Constitution describes the State as a democracy, and this provision is increasingly cited by the courts to justify decisions supporting the rule of law.³⁴ Article 15.5.1

³¹ Article 40.4.1 provides that ‘[n]o citizen shall be deprived of his personal liberty save in accordance with law’. Para. 2 continues as follows: ‘Upon complaint being made by or on behalf of any person to the High Court or any judge thereof alleging that such person is being unlawfully detained, the High Court and any and every judge thereof to whom such complaint is made shall forthwith enquire into the said complaint ... and the High Court shall ... after giving the person in whose custody he is detained an opportunity of justifying the detention, order the release of such person from such detention unless satisfied that he is being detained in accordance with the law.’

³² Thus, for example, Art. 40.5 provides: ‘The dwelling of every citizen is inviolable and shall not be entered save in accordance with law.’

³³ Thus, for example, Art. 45.4.2 provides: ‘The State shall endeavour to ensure that the strength and health of workers, men and women, and the tender age of children shall not be abused and the citizens shall not be forced by economic necessity to enter avocations unsuited to their sex, age or strength.’

³⁴ See e.g. Mallak v. Minister for Justice [2012] IESC 59 (The Minister does not enjoy an absolute discretion with regard to a naturalisation application if by this is meant that he or she is free to act in an autocratic or arbitrary fashion, since this would be the antithesis of the guarantee contained in Art. 5); Waterville Fisheries Development Ltd v. Acquaculture Licensing Appeals Board (No.2) expressly forbids the enactment of legislation ‘which declare[s] acts to be infringements of the law which were not so at the date of their commission’.

2.1.2 The Constitution itself uses different language to describe the rights it protects and sometimes employs different language to set out the circumstances in which the right can be curtailed or restricted. Although some rights are described as ‘inviolable’ or ‘inalienable’, this is not universally the case. Similarly, while the power of the State ‘to delimit the exercise of constitutionally protected rights’ is expressly given in some cases and not referred to at all in others, this does not mean ‘that, where absent, the power does not exist’. ³⁵

For the best part of twenty years, however, the Irish courts have employed a standard proportionality doctrine in assessing the validity of legislative restrictions on the exercise of constitutional rights. The classic test remains that articulated by Costello J. in Heaney v. Ireland.³⁶

The objective of the impugned provision must be of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right. It must relate to concerns pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society. The means chosen must pass a proportionality test. They must:

- (a) be rationally connected to the objective and not be arbitrary, unfair or based on irrational considerations,
- (b) impair the right as little as possible, and
- (c) be such that their effects on rights are proportional to the objective.

This test has been consistently applied and it has helped to provide an objective template whereby the legitimacy of such restrictions on the exercise of constitutional rights can be assessed.³⁷

2.1.3 Irish courts frequently employ the concept of the rule of law, although this is sometimes no more than a rhetorical makeweight. Nevertheless, the rule of law principles reflect the idea that the State is described as a democracy in Art. 5 of the Constitution and that Art. 34 of the Constitution commits the administration of justice to the judiciary. Among the key ideas contained in the rule of law decision making found in the Irish jurisprudence are the following:

- The principle of legality: every decision affecting legal rights must have an appropriate legal basis.

[2014] IEHC 381 (‘absolute discretion’ given by statute does not mean that the Board was not obliged to give reasons for its decisions).

³⁵ Murray v. Ireland [1985] IR 532, 538, per Costello J.

³⁶ [1994] 3 IR 593, 607, per Costello J. The test was expressly borrowed from a then contemporary decision of the Supreme Court of Canada: Chaulk v. R. (1990) 3 SCR 1335–1336.

³⁷ See, e.g., Daly v. Revenue Commissioners [1996] 3 IR 1 Re Art. 26 and the Health (Amendment) Bill (No.2) [2005] IESC 7, [2005] 1 IR 105, King v. Minister for Environment (No.2) [2006] IESC 61, [2007] 2 IR 296. See generally: Hogan 1997, Foley 2010 and Kenny 2014.

- The executive cannot constitutionally be given the power by statute to act in an arbitrary or autocratic fashion.³⁸
- The right of access to the courts: legislation which restricts the right of access to the courts will be construed narrowly.³⁹ Legislation which unfairly restricts access to the courts will be found to be unconstitutional.⁴⁰
- The law must be certain and accessible.⁴¹
- Legislation cannot retroactively create new criminal offences or other legal wrongs.⁴²
- Fundamental rights should not be affected adversely by legislation save through the use of clear language.⁴³
- Legal penalties cannot be created by the use of oblique language in a statute. It is, for example, a ‘cardinal principle in the judicial interpretation of statutes that the range of criminal liability should not be held to have been statutorily extended except by clear, direct and unambiguous words’.⁴⁴

³⁸ Mallak v. Minister for Justice [2012] IESC 59; Waterville Fisheries Development Ltd. v. Acquaculture Licensing Appeals Board (No.2) [2014] IEHC 381.

³⁹ Murphy v. Greene [1990] 2 IR 560, Re MJBCH [2013] IEHC 256, [2013] 1 IR 407.

⁴⁰ Macauley v. Minister for Posts and Telegraphs [1966] IR 345, Blehein v. Minister for Health and Children [2008] IESC 40, [2009] 1 IR 275.

⁴¹ But note the decision of the Supreme Court in Minister for Justice and Equality v. Adach [2010] IESC 33, [2010] 3 IR 402. The background to that case was that the European Arrest Warrant Act 2003 had been amended by legislation enacted by the Oireachtas (Parliament) and duly signed by the President on 21 July 2009. Notice of this had been published in the official gazette in the manner required by Art. 25 of the Constitution. The amending legislation required that no appeal would be taken in European Arrest Warrant cases save with leave of the High Court. In October 2009 the requested person, Mr. Adach, purported to appeal without leave of the High Court, contending that the new legislation had not been officially published until November 2009. This was admitted – a translation into Irish had been awaited – but the Supreme Court noted that the appellant and his advisers were fully aware of the effect of the new provision and they had been advised of its terms by the trial judge. The Court rejected arguments that case law such as Case C-345/06 Heinrich [2009] ECR I-01659 had any relevance to this question, since the matter was governed entirely by the publication requirements of Art. 25 of the Constitution. While Hardiman J. acknowledged the importance ‘of accessibility, clarity and foreseeability when considering laws mandating the deprivation of a person’s liberty’, this was not such a case, as the legislation in question was essentially a law prescribing new procedural rules.

⁴² Doyle v. An Taoiseach [1986] ILRM 693. See also The People v. Geraghty [2014] IECA 2.

⁴³ See e.g. Albatross Feeds Ltd v. Minister for Agriculture and Food [2006] IESC 52, [2007] 1 IR 271.

⁴⁴ Director of Public Prosecutions v. Flanagan [1979] IR 265, 280 per Henchy J. Additionally, laws which create unclear or arbitrary offences have been held to be unconstitutional: see, e.g., King v. Director of Public Prosecutions [1981] IR 233, Douglas v. Director of Public Prosecutions [2013] IEHC 343, [2014] 1 IR 510.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 During the referendums on the Lisbon Treaty, certain decisions of the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU), such as Laval and Viking,⁴⁵ prompted concerns about the EU prioritising economic liberties over traditional human rights, and that the CJEU imposed significant limitations on the right of workers to take collective action where the exercise of that right interfered with the freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.⁴⁶ This issue has, however, simply not arisen in practice, and it remains to be seen how the Irish courts would endeavour to reconcile traditional liberties with the free movement objectives which were prioritised in Laval and Viking.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

Introduction: Implementation of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) in Ireland and the main principles in its judicial application The European Arrest Warrant Act 2003 (as amended) (the 2003 Act) has given effect to the EAW Framework Decision.^{47,48} The system mandated by the 2003 Act requires that all applications be made to the High Court, generally under the supervision of a specially assigned judge. Since 2009, leave is required before an appeal can be taken from the High Court to the Supreme Court.⁴⁹ Following the establishment of the new Court of Appeal in October 2014, appeals now lie (with leave) to the Court of Appeal. In exceptional cases the Supreme Court can grant leave to hear an appeal from the Court of Appeal.

A further consideration is that prior to 1 December 2014, no Irish court had jurisdiction to make a reference to the CJEU in respect of the interpretation of a framework decision. Article 10(3) of Protocol No. 36 to the Treaty of Lisbon provided for jurisdiction to make a reference after a five-year transitional period. The Lisbon Treaty entered into force on 1 December 2009, and the transitional period expired on 1 December 2014. Given the sheer volume of case law which the ⁴⁵ Case C-341/05 Laval [2007] ECR I-11767 and Case C-438/05 Viking Line [2007] ECR I-10779.

⁴⁶ Kiernan et al. 2012, p. 539.

⁴⁷ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁴⁸ See generally, Fahey 2010, pp. 107–128 and more generally, Farrell and Hanrahan 2011.

⁴⁹ Section 16(11) of the 2003 Act (as substituted by Sect. 10 of the EAW (Application to Third Countries and Amendment) and Extradition (Amendment) Act 2012).

2003 Act has generated to date,⁵⁰ one may expect – should this trend continue – that a steady stream of references will be made by the Irish courts over the next number of years.

Indeed, this case law has been such that it could not be said that the Irish courts have largely acted as ‘rubber stamps’, since the Irish courts have paid particular attention to the procedural safeguards prescribed by the 2003 Act. Accordingly, applications for surrender which have not specified with ‘unambiguous clarity ... the number and nature of the offences for which the person sought is so sought’⁵¹ or have not clearly indicated whether the warrant sought is in respect of a conviction *in absentia*⁵² will be rejected. There is likewise no prospect of surrender if the foreign offence does not ‘correspond’ to an offence known to Irish law.⁵³ The High Court has nonetheless provided a very complete explanation of the difference between the EAW system and the former system of extradition in O’Sullivan v. Irish Prison Service,⁵⁴ which admirably sums up the prevailing judicial attitude to the EAW regime:

Despite superficial similarities between extradition and surrender, namely that both can result in the forcible departure, by compulsion of law, of a person from this State, the EAW regime must be considered as a regime different, separate and distinct from extradition. The principles upon which each rests are materially different: one driven by executive motivation, the other by mutual judicial trust and respect. The EAW regime was developed to solve many notable and renowned problems, which developed with the extradition system which existed previously. The former regime, and indeed the one which still regulates our relationship with the vast majority of States worldwide, was technical, slow, and lacked reciprocal judicial trust and respect. Without the latter it is incumbent on both the State and its Courts to apply a heightened level of scrutiny in relation to those being extradited; many of the world’s legal systems do not uphold the same principles or rule of law or democracy which we enjoy here, the risk of wrongful conviction or mala fides prosecution are therefore much greater outside of the EU. Even with our more developed neighbours, procedural safeguards and concepts of justice and punishment may be at significant variance with our own. A more thorough investigative procedure is therefore both justified and required, so as to safeguard the rights of those whose extradition is sought

The EAW regime and the Framework Decision upon which it is based are the result of ever-increasing cooperation in criminal and judicial matters, particularly with regards to extradition ... within the Union, which was necessitated by the opening up of the free market. ... This has meant the removal of a number of traditional exceptions for extradition, for example with regards to the political offence exception and the non-extradition of nationals.

⁵⁰ The Supreme Court appears to have given some 40 written judgments on diverse aspects of the EAW.

⁵¹ Minister for Justice and Equality v. Connolly [2014] IESC 34, [2014] 2 ILRM 241, 253, per Hardiman J.

⁵² Minister for Justice and Equality v. Palonka [2015] IECA 69.

⁵³ 2003, Sect. 38(1)(b) and see generally Minister for Justice and Equality v. Marjasz [2012] IEHC 233. Differences in terminology between domestic and foreign offences do not, however, generally lead to a lack of correspondence: see Minister for Justice v. Szall [2013] IESC 7, [2013] 1 IR 470.

⁵⁴ [2010] 4 IR 562.

Therefore it cannot be accurate to assimilate, ideologically or practically, the case law or mind-set of extradition into those of intra-Union surrender. ... I am satisfied that this represents an entirely new system. Surrender is not extradition. There is no hearing into the merits of the prosecution, pending or anticipated in the requesting jurisdiction; nor should there be; and the Executive no longer has a role. There is a special relationship between the Member States of the Union. By virtue of this unity there is increased judicial co-operation between Members. However there is necessarily a great level of trust that the other Member State will act in accordance with the highest and fundamental principles of the Union; namely rule of law, peace, freedom and democracy. Nonetheless, there may be circumstances where certain Member States may be lacking in this regard. It is for this reason that procedural safeguards are placed within the Framework Decision.⁵⁵

In addition, as will be seen, some hugely complicated EAW cases have come before the Irish courts. Two in particular – Minister for Justice v. Tobin and Minister for Justice v. Bailey – require elaborate consideration. But before examining this case law, a number of special features and safeguards of the 2003 Act should be noted.

First, Sect. 38 of the 2003 Act contains important safeguards in terms of the correspondence of the offence and the seriousness of the offence. Section 38(1)(b) of the 2003 Act provides:

Subject to subsection (2), a person shall not be surrendered to an issuing state under this Act in respect of an offence unless (a) the offence corresponds to an offence under the law of the State, and

- (i) under the law of the issuing state the offence is punishable by imprisonment or detention for a maximum period of not less than 12 months, or
- (ii) a term of imprisonment or detention of not less than 4 months has been imposed on the person in respect of the offence in the issuing state, and the person is required under the law of the issuing state to serve all or part of that term of imprisonment or
- (a) the offence is an offence to which paragraph 2 of Article 2 of the Framework Decision applies or is an offence that consists of conduct specified in that paragraph, and under the law of the issuing state the offence is punishable by imprisonment for a maximum period of not less than 3 years.

Secondly, the provisions of Sect. 37 include the following safeguards that will be of importance to the cases that follow:

(1) A person shall not be surrendered under this Act if:

(i) ...

(a) his or her surrender would constitute a contravention of any provision of the Constitution (other than for the reason that the offence specified in the European arrest warrant is an offence to which section 38(1)(b) applies⁵⁶), ⁵⁵ [2010] 2 IR 562 at 597–598, per McKechnie J.

⁵⁶ This is a technical provision to ensure that applicants cannot resist extradition on the ground that they would be deprived of their right to jury trial for serious offences punishable for more than one year in the requesting state.

- (b) there are reasonable grounds for believing that:
 - (i) ...
 - (ii) in the prosecution or punishment of the person in the issuing state, he or she will be treated less favourably than a person who:
 - (I) is not his or her sex, race, religion, nationality or ethnic origin,
 - (II) does not hold the same political opinions as him or her,
 - (III) speaks a different language than he or she does, or
 - (IV) does not have the same sexual orientation as he or she does,
- or
- (ii) were the person to be surrendered to the issuing state:
 - (I) he or she would be sentenced to death, or a death sentence imposed on him or her would be carried out, or
 - (II) he or she would be tortured or subjected to other inhuman or degrading treatment.

Section 37 of the 2003 Act may be thus be said to give effect to Recital 12 of the Framework Decision, which provides that the EAW procedure does not:

[p]revent a Member State from applying its own constitutional rules relating to due process, freedom of association, freedom of the press and freedom of expression in other media.

In fact, Sect. 37 of the 2003 Act probably goes a good deal further than this by protecting the full panoply of constitutional rights and not just those reflecting due process and freedom of speech.⁵⁷ In the course of the parliamentary debates on the 2003 Bill, the sponsoring minister justified Sect. 37 of the 2003 Act on the ground that it would ensure that ‘no state in the European Union [would] have a higher degree of real and substantial protection for those who seek the protection of the [Irish] courts’.⁵⁸

It is perhaps not altogether surprising that these provisions have generated a good deal of case law. While it might seem that the Irish courts are under a particular duty to treat surrender applications under the EAW procedure in ‘a most serious fashion’, the ‘practical operation of the Act of 2003 has not matched the ⁵⁷ The Commission Staff Report Document, Annex to the Report from the Commission on the implementation since 2005 of the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2007), at pp. 5–6 commented adversely on this development:

‘... EL, IE, IT and CY have transposed the text into their legislation in such a way that it goes beyond the Framework Decision and therefore creates the risk that a EAW will be refused on the basis of grounds not envisaged in the Framework Decision. In addition to referring to the European Convention on Human Rights, IE and IT require refusal where surrender would breach their national constitutions. Although this may cover situations arising under both Art. 6 TEU and Recital 12 (such as rules on due process), it nevertheless goes beyond the Framework Decision, in particular as Art. 6 TEU refers only to those constitutional principles common to Member States.’

⁵⁸ 577 Dáil Debates Col. 10 (17 December 2003).

ideal and the role of Sect. 37 has been “read down” dramatically through judicial interpretation’.⁵⁹

In *Minister for Justice v. Altaravicius*⁶⁰ the Supreme Court stressed that the 2003 Act must be interpreted in the light of the objectives of the Framework Decision, which include ‘to remove the complexity and potential for delay inherent’ in the pre-existing extradition arrangements between the Member States (Preamble) and to ground the EAW procedure on the principle of mutual recognition of judicial decisions (Recital 6 and Art. 1(2)) and ‘on a high level of confidence between Member States’ (Recital 10). It was against that background that the Supreme Court stressed that the residual power to refuse surrender contained in Sect. 37(1)(b) of the 2003 Act must be understood: this provision was a residual power which was to be confined to exceptional cases. As Murray C.J. stated, it could not constitute a breach of the Constitution to effect a surrender ‘simply because [the foreign] legal system of trial differed from ours as envisaged by the Constitution’.⁶¹

⁵⁹ Fahey 2010, p. 110. For a similar view, see Walsh 2009.

⁶⁰ [2006] IESC 23, [2006] 3 IR 148.

⁶¹ [2007] 3 IR 732, 743. The Chief Justice had earlier stated ([2007] 3 IR 732, 741):

‘The effect of such an argument is that an order for surrender under the Act of 2003, and indeed any order for extradition, ought to be refused if the manner in which a trial in the requesting State including the manner in which a penal sanction is imposed, does not conform to the exigencies of our Constitution as if such a trial or sentence were to take place in this country. That can hardly have been the intention of the Oireachtas when it adopted s. 37(1) of the Act of 1973 since it would inevitably have the effect of ensuring that most requests for surrender or extradition would have to be refused. And indeed if that were the intent of the Framework Decision ... and other countries applied such a test from their own perspective, few, if any, would extradite to this country

The manner, procedure and mechanisms according to which fundamental rights are protected in different countries will vary according to national laws and constitutional traditions. The checks and balances in national systems may vary even though they may have the same objective such as ensuring a fair trial. There may be few, if any, legal systems which wholly comply with the precise exigencies of our Constitution with regard to these matters. Not all for example will provide a right to trial by jury in exactly the same circumstances as our Constitution does in respect of a trial for a non-minor offence. Rules of evidence may differ. The fact that a person would be tried before a judge and jury in this country for a particular offence could not in my view, be a basis for refusing to make an order for surrender solely on the grounds that in the requesting State he or she would not be tried before a jury. . . .

That is not by any means to say that a Court, in considering an application for surrender, has no jurisdiction to consider the circumstances where it is established that surrender would lead to a denial of fundamental or human rights. There may well be egregious circumstances such as a clearly established and fundamental defect in the system of justice of a requesting State where a refusal of an application for surrender may be necessary to protect such rights. It would not be appropriate in this case to examine further possible or hypothetical situations where this might arise. The sole matter which I wish to make clear here is that the mere fact that a trial or sentence may take place in a requesting State according to procedures or principles which differ from those which apply, even if constitutionally guaranteed, in relation to a criminal trial in this country does not of itself mean that an application for surrender should be refused pursuant to s. 37(2) of the Act.’

This trend was continued in the subsequent decision of the Supreme Court in Minister for Justice v. Stapleton.⁶² Here the question was whether the respondent could invoke undue delay as a ground to resist surrender to the UK under Sect. 37 of the 2003 Act. In effect, the argument was that if he were to face trial in Ireland at that time, he could invoke the jurisprudence arising from the due process provisions of Art. 38.1 in order to demonstrate that such trial would infringe his constitutional rights due to undue delay. Proceeding from that premise, the applicant then argued that his surrender to the UK would amount to an infringement of his constitutional rights.

In his judgment for the Supreme Court, Fennelly J. observed that the principle of ‘mutual confidence’ in the respective legal systems was broader and went further than the systems of mutual political and judicial trust which were contained in the European Convention on Extradition 1957 and, in our own legal system, the Extradition Act 1965, as it ‘encompasses the system of trial in the issuing member state’.

Fennelly J. further noted that the question of whether there had been any undue delay could be best resolved within the context of the legal system of the requesting state. The mere fact that there was a difference in criminal procedure between the two jurisdictions was not in itself enough. Fennelly J. then stated:

I cannot see that any of the differences discerned by the trial judge between the right to seek prohibition of trial in the English courts and our own could amount to the establishment of an infringement of the right to fair trial, or fair procedures, whether by reference to the [European] Convention [on Human Rights] or to the Constitution. They certainly do not amount, to repeat the words of Murray C.J. [in Brennan], to ‘a clearly established and fundamental defect in the system of justice of [the] requesting State’.

On the facts of this case, there is available to the respondent a procedure which will enable him, on surrender to the issuing Member State to seek a remedy based on the very long period of time which has elapsed since the alleged commission of the offences. Moreover, on the facts of the case, it is demonstrably more efficient and more convenient that those matters be debated before the courts of the country where the respondent is to be tried. The prosecuting and police authorities as well as other witnesses are available to and amenable to the jurisdiction of the courts of that country. Documentary evidence, of the type demanded by the respondent, will be more readily available there. If not, its absence may be more readily explained. There may, in addition, be arguments or points of domestic law, whether based on precedents or otherwise, which the respondent can advantageously argue or rely upon which may not be available to him in this jurisdiction and of which an Irish court might not necessarily be aware.⁶³

It is accordingly clear from this case law that Sect. 37(1)(b) of the 2003 Act can only be successfully invoked by a respondent if it can be demonstrated that the very act of surrender would either itself ex facie amount to an unconstitutionality in the circumstances or where the Court, acting on the clearest of evidence, has significant grounds for apprehending that the requested person would, if surrendered, face a manifestly unfair trial which does not meet contemporary minimum standards presupposed by the Framework Decision itself.

⁶² [2007] IESC 30, [2007] 1 IR 669.

⁶³ [2007] 1 IR 669, 691–692.

There appears to be only two cases where the Court has refused to sanction surrender in the light of the provisions of Sect. 37. In Minister for Justice and Equality v. Nolan,⁶⁴ the requested person was facing surrender to the UK to serve out the balance of a sentence which had been imposed by a British court. Aspects of that particular sentencing regime had already been held by the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) to be contrary to Art. 5.1 of the ECHR insofar as it provided for detention beyond the tariff stipulated by the trial judge.⁶⁵ The Supreme Court held that to surrender the applicant in these circumstances would amount to a breach of Sect. 37(1)(a)(i) of the 2003 Act, since it would be contrary to the state's obligations under the ECHR. In effect, therefore, the Court refused the surrender of the respondent where he would be delivered up to complete the balance of a sentence which had been held to be non-ECHR compliant. In the other case, Minister for Justice and Equality v. Rostas,⁶⁶ the High Court refused to sanction the surrender of a Romanian of Roma ethnicity in respect of a conviction for robbery in 1995, where there were clear and detailed reasons to suggest that the conviction represented a miscarriage of justice.⁶⁷

The decision in Tobin and abuse of process The Irish courts have also been obliged to deal with some particularly difficult EAW cases, of which the Tobin litigation is perhaps the paradigm example. In Minister for Justice v. Tobin (No. 1),⁶⁸ an Irish national⁶⁹ had been arrested in Hungary following the death of two young children in a road traffic accident. He was then permitted by the authorities to leave Hungary, but was subsequently convicted in his absence by the Hungarian courts. The Supreme Court ultimately refused to sanction his surrender from Ireland under the EAW procedure on the basis that it had not been shown that he had 'fled' Hungary in the manner then required by Sect. 10 of the 2003 Act.

⁶⁴ [2013] IESC 54.

⁶⁵ See James, Wells and Lee v. the United Kingdom, nos. 25119/09, 57715/09 and 57877/09, 18 September 2012.

⁶⁶ [2014] IEHC 391, [2015] 1 ILRM 1.

⁶⁷ Edwards J. noted ([2015] 1 ILRM 1, 58–59) while the trial took place 'in a very different Romania to today's Romania', nevertheless:

‘while it is impossible to determine definitively whether the respondent in fact received a fair trial, there is sufficient supporting evidence demonstrating the consistency of her narrative with what is known to have been commonplace in Romania and its criminal justice system at the material time, and concerning the manner in which persons of Roma ethnicity were frequently ill-treated and discriminated against by police and officials within that system, to give the court substantial grounds for believing that there is a real risk that the respondent has suffered a flagrant denial of justice in the requesting country.’

⁶⁸ [2008] IESC 3, [2008] 4 IR 42.

⁶⁹ Later described by Hardiman J. as a person of ‘unblemished character’ who ‘has had a distinguished career in an Irish public company’: Minister for Justice v. Tobin (No. 2) [2012] 4 IR 147, 266.

While Fennelly J. accepted that the ‘fleeing’ requirement was not compatible with the requirements of the Framework Decision, he concluded that in view of the express language of the 2003 Act, it could not be construed in a manner compatible with the Framework Decision without giving the Act an interpretation which would be contra legem.

The Oireachtas subsequently enacted the European Arrest Warrant (Amendment) Act 2009, Sect. 6 of which deleted the ‘fled’ requirement. At that point, the State sought a fresh surrender of Mr. Tobin. A majority of the Supreme Court ultimately refused the request. The two judges of the minority, Denham C. J. and Murray J., took the view that the State was obliged to alter the law in order to ensure that it conformed with the requirements of the Framework Decision, and that obligation effectively superseded any issue concerning the rights of the accused. The majority could not accept this approach and, in lengthy and passionate judgments, they concluded that the surrender would amount to an abuse of process by re-opening a final decision and interfering with vested rights.⁷⁰

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1–2.3.1.2 The automaticity underlying the EAW system has been a constant source of judicial concern for the Irish courts. This can be seen in two important

⁷⁰ Note, for example, that some members of the majority went to pains to stress that they were entitled to rely on a fundamental legal principle of domestic law – namely abuse of process – in the context of the interpretation of the Framework Decision, provided that the application of these rules did not infringe the principle of non-discrimination or effectiveness. As Fennelly J. observed ([2012] 4 IR 147, 212):

‘The legislation was then amended by this State. Indeed this had to be done in order to bring Irish law into conformity with the Framework Decision. That is cold comfort for the appellant. He is the only person whose surrender had been refused by reason of the ‘fled’ provision. The amendment … exposed him to the possibility that a second European Arrest Warrant would be issued, which is indeed what has occurred. If the legislation had been enacted originally in conformity with the Framework Decision, he would at least have had his case decided on appropriate grounds. He would either have been surrendered to Hungary or he would have succeeded on appeal on one of the other grounds advanced in Tobin (No. 1). He would not have been subjected to the same judicial process twice.’

The consequence of the amending legislation was that the appellant has faced a second process of arrest, objection, High Court hearing and appeal. All this is the result of what appears to have been a legislative error followed by its correction. None of this was the responsibility of the appellant. … [T]his is quite different from cases where an earlier proceeding has failed by reason of defects in a warrant. In those cases it will be apparent that the surrender … is the result of a particular defect in the warrant and that … the error can be remedied and a new warrant can be issued without the defects.

These are in essence the reasons why I agree … that the appeal should succeed on the ground of abuse of process. The principle of national procedural autonomy permits the courts of the Member States to apply national procedural rules so long as they do not infringe either the principle of non-discrimination or of effectiveness.’

recent Supreme Court decisions in *Minister for Justice and Equality v. Bailey*⁷¹ and Minister for Justice and Equality v. Ostrowski.⁷²

In Bailey the applicant, a British national, had been a suspect in the murder of a noted French actress, Sophie Toscan du Plantier, in rural west Cork in December 1996. This murder was one of the most controversial murder cases in Irish criminal justice history. The Director of Public Prosecutions decided not to prosecute Mr. Bailey who had been identified as a suspect in the crime.⁷³ Section 42(c) of the 2003 Act as originally enacted had provided that no surrender could take place where the Director of Public Prosecutions had already decided not to prosecute the suspect for the crime in question, but this prohibition was later deleted in 2005.⁷⁴

At that point the French authorities issued an EAW request for Mr. Bailey, but this was ultimately refused by the Supreme Court for two fundamental reasons. First, the Court concluded that it was implicit in Art. 4(7)(b) of the Framework Decision that it imported a requirement of reciprocity. A murder committed outside of Ireland is a crime in Irish law only if committed by an Irish citizen, so that, for example, a court in Ireland could not seek the surrender of a British national in respect of a murder committed in France. It followed that Ireland could not surrender a British national to France in respect of a murder committed in Ireland. Secondly, it was also clear that Mr. Bailey was being sought for the purposes of a preliminary investigation and that no decision had yet been taken to charge the person whose surrender had been sought.⁷⁵

In Ostrowski the surrender of a Polish national was sought on the ground that he was found in possession of 0.72 g of marijuana. In the High Court, Edwards J. refused to order surrender on the ground that this was wholly disproportionate, not least as the accused was most unlikely to receive a prison sentence in respect of this offence. This decision was, however, reversed on appeal by the Supreme Court. Denham C.J. stressed that once the offence met the minimum gravity test⁷⁶ specified by the 2003 Act, the High Court had no further role in the matter in assessing any question of proportionality. She also took the view that the Irish courts had no role in assessing what type of sentence the offender was likely to

⁷¹ [2012] IESC 16, [2012] 4 IR 1.

⁷² [2013] IESC 24.

⁷³ This has always been a matter of considerable controversy. It is sufficient perhaps to state that in the course of the EAW proceedings evidence emerged to show that the Director of Public Prosecutions considered that the police inquiry ‘into the case was “prejudiced” against [Mr. Bailey] and flawed’: Minister for Justice v. Bailey [2012] 4 IR 1, 65, per Hardiman J.

⁷⁴ Criminal Justice (Terrorist Offences) Act 2005, Sect. 83.

⁷⁵ Article 1(1) of the Framework Decision requires that the warrant must be ‘for the purpose of conducting a criminal prosecution or executing a custodial sentence or detention order.’ Section 21A of the 2003 Act requires the High Court to refuse to order the surrender where the Court is satisfied ‘that a decision has not been made to charge the person with and try him or her for the offence specified in the warrant’. See also to same effect, Minister for Justice v. McArdle [2005] IESC 76, [2005] 4 IR 260 and Minister for Justice v. Olsson [2011] IESC 1, [2011] 1 IR 384.

⁷⁶ In this case the offence carried a maximum penalty of three years imprisonment.

receive in the requesting state. It is interesting, however, that two other members of the Court, McKechnie J. and MacMenamin J., while concurring in the result, expressed deep unease at this result. Both intimated that the EAW system required revision to ensure that the proportionality of any request was assessed both by the requesting and, indeed, the surrendering state.

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 It may seem surprising, given the extensive litigation regarding the EAW, that the issue of nullum crimen sine lege has not featured prominently in Ireland. This is probably because of the protections contained in Sect. 38 of the 2003 Act, the wording of which was provided in the introduction to Sect. 2.3. In the vast majority of cases the requesting state will be required to show that the offence in question has a corresponding Irish offence.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 The issue of in absentia judgments has also proved troubling. Section 45 of the 2003 Act contained a general prohibition on surrender for such purposes, but this prohibition has itself been re-cast on two separate occasions.⁷⁷ In the present form, Sect. 45 provides that '[a] person shall not be surrendered under this Act if he or she did not appear in person at the proceedings resulting in the sentence or detention order in respect of which the European arrest warrant was issued, unless the European arrest warrant indicates the matters required by points 2, 3 and 4 of point (d) of the form of warrant in the Annex to the Framework Decision as amended by Council Framework Decision 2009/299/JHA ... '.

It should be noted, however, that the Sect. 45 prohibition is not absolute, reflecting the exceptions expressly provided in Art. 5 of the Framework Decision.⁷⁸ It does not apply to persons who have had adequate notice of the trial but who elect not to participate.⁷⁹ To that extent it may be that Sect. 45 of the 2003 Act is not inconsistent with the decision of the Court of Justice in Melloni.⁸⁰ At the same time, these safeguards are real. Thus, for example, it is inappropriate to order surrender

⁷⁷ Section 45 of the 2003 Act was first replaced by Sect. 20 of the Criminal Justice (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 2009. That substitution was itself replaced by Sect. 23 of the European Arrest Warrant (Application to Third Countries) and Extradition (Amendment) Act 2012.

⁷⁸ Minister for Justice and Equality v. McCague [2008] IEHC 154, [2010] 1 IR 154, per Peart J.

⁷⁹ Minister for Justice and Equality v. McCague [2008] IEHC 154, [2010] 1 IR 154 (the accused who discharged his legal team in advance of a scheduled trial date cannot contend that he was sentenced in absentia, even where the accused contended that he was ill and feared for his life if he attended the trial).

⁸⁰ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

where the accused did not appear at the trial, unless the requesting authority has actually completed and filled in the table contained in Sect. 45 of the 2003 Act.⁸¹

2.3.4–2.3.5 The Right to a Fair Trial/The Right to Effective Judicial Protection

See matters covered in previous sections.

2.3.6 Proportionality and EU Criminal Law

As can be seen from this brief discussion, the Irish courts have expressed unease with aspects of the operation of the EAW system, particularly its automaticity and lack of proportionality. While there is no doubt that the Oireachtas sought to provide the greatest level of protection possible when enacting the 2003 Act, the courts have struggled to fully live up to these expectations,⁸² as they have felt obliged to give effect to the language and objects of the Framework Decision,⁸³ save where to do so would be plainly contra legem.⁸⁴ It should also be noted that the courts have at times expressed unease regarding aspects of the lack of proportionality inherent in the EAW system⁸⁵ and the automaticity involved in giving effect to foreign prosecutorial and judicial decisions.⁸⁶

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 As it happens, three of the most important data protection cases which have either recently come before the CJEU or are pending before that Court have come ⁸¹ Minister for Justice and Equality v. Palonka [2015] IECA 69.

⁸² See e.g. the very narrow reading given to the ‘protecting constitutional rights’ provisions of Sect. 37 of the 2003 Act as demonstrated in cases such as Stapleton and Brennan.

⁸³ The principle of interprétation conforme as expressed in cases such as Case C-105/03 Pupino [2005] ECR I-05285 features prominently in the Irish EAW jurisprudence. As one might expect, the effect has been in nearly every case to dilute the specific national safeguards contained in the 2003 Act in favour of a more standardised interpretation which conforms with the requirements of the Framework Decision: see generally the comments of Murray J. in Minister for Justice and Equality v. Tokarski [2012] IESC 61.

⁸⁴ As happened with respect to the ‘fleeing’ provisions discussed in Minister for Justice v. Tobin (No.1) [2008] IESC 3, [2008] 4 IR 42. See generally, Minister for Justice v. Palonka [2015] IECA 69, per Finlay Geoghegan and Peart JJ.

⁸⁵ See, e.g., the comments of Denham C.J., McKechnie and MacMenamin J.J. in Minister for Justice v. Ostrowski [2013] IESC 24.

⁸⁶ See, e.g., the disagreement even among the majority in Minister for Justice v. Tobin (No. 2) [2012] 4 IR 147 as to whether the Irish courts could look behind the merits of the Hungarian conviction.

from Ireland: Ireland v. Parliament and Council (2009),⁸⁷ *Digital Rights Ireland*⁸⁸ and, most recently, Schrems.⁸⁹ These will now be explored in greater detail.

Ireland v. Parliament and Council The first of these cases, Ireland v. Parliament and Council, was a challenge to the legal basis on which the Data Retention Directive⁹⁰ was adopted, with the CJEU rejecting the argument that the Union legislator was not entitled to adopt this provision as an internal market measure. While the case is doubtless an important one in terms of the jurisprudence on internal market measures, it would be hard to say that it had implications for data protection rights as a topic in itself. At the same time, the fact that the action was dismissed may have given the wrong impression that the Directive itself was impregnable to future legal challenge. Many commentators may thus have overlooked the Court's express saver at the commencement of its discussion of the merits of the action:

It must also be stated that the action brought by Ireland relates solely to the choice of legal basis and not to any possible infringement of fundamental rights arising from interference with the exercise of the right to privacy contained in Directive 2006/24.⁹¹

While the Court acknowledged that data retention is directly concerned with criminal justice and the prevention of terrorism,⁹² it also stressed that this topic has significant implications for the internal market:

It is also clear from the file that the obligations relating to data retention have significant economic implications for service providers in so far as they may involve substantial investment and operating costs.

The evidence submitted to the Court shows, moreover, that the national measures adopted up to 2005 pursuant to Article 15(1) of Directive 2002/58 differed substantially, particularly in respect of the nature of the data retained and the periods of data retention. ...

In the light of that evidence, it is apparent that the differences between the various national rules adopted on the retention of data relating to electronic communications were liable to have a direct impact on the functioning of the internal market and that it was foreseeable that that impact would become more serious with the passage of time.

⁸⁷ Case C-301/06 Ireland v. Parliament and Council [2009] ECR I-00593.

⁸⁸ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

⁸⁹ Case C-362/14 Schrems [2015] ECLI:EU:C:2015:650.

⁹⁰ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁹¹ Case C-301/06 Ireland v. Parliament and Council, n. ⁸⁷, at para. 57.

⁹² Ireland had argued that the 'centre of gravity' of the measure related to the prevention of crime and the protection of national security. Cf. the later comments of the Court in Digital Rights Ireland (at para. 41): '...[t]he material objective of that directive is, therefore, to contribute to the fight against serious crime and thus, ultimately, to public security.'

Such a situation justified the Community legislature in pursuing the objective of safeguarding the proper functioning of the internal market through the adoption of harmonised rules.⁹³

While there was disappointment in official Irish circles that the objections to the legal basis of the Directive were rejected – it was, after all, the first time in which Ireland had challenged EU legislation on this basis – the Directive was duly transposed into domestic law. Certainly, few were prepared for what happened next.

Case C-293/12 Digital Rights Ireland Digital Rights Ireland Ltd. (DRI) is a company limited by guarantee, which focuses on data protection and data privacy. It sought to challenge in the Irish High Court a direction issued by the Garda (Police) Commissioner instructing telecommunications providers to retain telecommunications data. DRI further challenged the constitutionality of legislation which sought to authorise retention of such data.

Much of the judgment of the High Court is devoted to the question of whether a limited company had locus standi to challenge the validity of this legislation.⁹⁴ Following a review of the Irish constitutional case law on this topic, McKechnie J. granted DRI the right to pursue an actio popularis in relation to interference with constitutional rights to privacy and communications, but not in respect of grounds alleging an interference with marital privacy and the right to travel. Since, however, the state sought to justify the legislation by reference to the Data Retention Directive, McKechnie J. felt that he had no alternative but to make a reference on the validity of the Directive to the CJEU.

The decision of the CJEU in respect of the Art. 267 TFEU reference was that the Directive was invalid having regard to Arts. 7 and 8 of the Charter.⁹⁵ The Court stressed the fact that the Directive permitted the storage of data on an open-ended and undifferentiated basis, and that such interference was significant:

It must be stated that the interference caused by Directive 2006/24 with the fundamental rights laid down in Articles 7 and 8 of the Charter is ... wide-ranging, and it must be considered to be particularly serious. Furthermore ... the fact that data are retained and subsequently used without the subscriber or registered user being informed is likely to generate in the minds of the persons concerned the feeling that their private lives are the subject of constant surveillance.

At the same time the Court observed that the essence of the rights was not affected, as under Art. 1(2) of the Directive, ‘the acquisition of knowledge of the content of the electronic communications as such’ is not permitted by the Directive. Nevertheless, given that the interference was significant, any interference had to be limited to that which was strictly necessary:

⁹³ Case C-301/06 Ireland v. Parliament and Council, n. 87, paras. 68–72.

⁹⁴ Digital Rights Ireland v. Minister for Communications [2010] IEHC 221, [2010] 3 IR 251.

⁹⁵ Although the plaintiff was also challenging the constitutionality of the legislation in the Irish courts, there appears to have been no reference to the Irish constitutional provisions in the Art. 267 reference itself.

Consequently, the EU legislation in question must lay down clear and precise rules governing the scope and application of the measure in question and imposing minimum safeguards so that the persons whose data have been retained have sufficient guarantees to effectively protect their personal data against the risk of abuse and against any unlawful access and use of that data

The need for such safeguards is all the greater where, as laid down in Directive 2006/24, personal data are subjected to automatic processing and where there is a significant risk of unlawful access to those data

So far as the proportionality of the measure was concerned, the Court noted that it applied to virtually all electronic communications, so that the measure applied to virtually the entirety of the European population. The Court also appears to have been struck by the fact that the Directive did not provide any measured exceptions:

Directive 2006/24 affects, in a comprehensive manner, all persons using electronic communications services, but without the persons whose data are retained being, even indirectly, in a situation which is liable to give rise to criminal prosecutions. It therefore applies even to persons for whom there is no evidence capable of suggesting that their conduct might have a link, even an indirect or remote one, with serious crime. Furthermore, it does not provide for any exception, with the result that it applies even to persons whose communications are subject, according to rules of national law, to the obligation of professional secrecy.

The CJEU further found that the Directive does not require any relationship between the data of which retention is provided for and a threat to public security, e.g. by reference to a particular time period or a particular geographical zone, or a circle of particular persons likely to be involved in a serious crime. Additionally the Directive ‘also fails to lay down any objective criterion by which to determine the limits of the access of the competent national authorities to the data and their subsequent use for the purposes of prevention, detection or criminal prosecutions concerning serious offences. Furthermore, Directive 2006/24 ‘does not contain substantive and procedural conditions relating to the access of the competent national authorities to the data and to their subsequent use’. ‘Above all, the access by the competent national authorities to the data retained is not made dependent on a prior review carried out by a court or by an independent administrative body whose decision seeks to limit access to the data and their use to what is strictly necessary for the purpose of attaining the objective pursued ...’. Nor did the measure lay down clear and precise rules regarding the time period during which the data is to be retained. It likewise was found not to have adequate safeguards against potential abuse. The Court further added that:

The directive does not require the data in question to be retained within the European Union, with the result that it cannot be held that the control, explicitly required by Article 8 (3) of the Charter, by an independent authority of compliance with the requirements of protection and security, as referred to in the two previous paragraphs, is fully ensured. Such a control, carried out on the basis of EU law, is an essential component of the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data

Given that the measure failed the proportionality test, it followed that the Directive had to be annulled. It may be significant that the Court did not address questions of retroactivity in its decision.

Schrems v. Data Protection Commissioner The third case, *Schrems v. Data Protection Commissioner*⁹⁶ arose in judicial review proceedings before the High Court in which the above-named applicant, an Austrian national, challenged a decision of the respondent Data Protection Commissioner (hereinafter Commissioner) not to investigate a particular complaint of his any further pursuant to Sect. 10(1)(b) of the Data Protection Act 1988 (hereinafter 1988 Act). All users in Europe of the major social network, Facebook, are required to sign a contract with Facebook Ireland Ltd. (Facebook Ireland). To that extent, therefore, Facebook Ireland is regulated by the Commissioner under the Irish Data Protection Acts. Facebook Ireland is a subsidiary of its US parent, Facebook Inc. (Facebook). Some or all data relating to Facebook subscribers residing within the EU/EEA is in fact transferred to and held on servers which are physically located within the United States.

The essence of Mr. Schrems' complaint of 25 June, 2013 to the Commissioner was that in the light of the revelations made from May 2013 onwards by Edward Snowden concerning the activities of the US National Security Agency (NSA), there was no meaningful protection in US law and practice in respect of data so transferred to the US so far as State surveillance was concerned.

The Commissioner rejected this complaint on two grounds. First, he considered that there was no evidence that Mr. Schrems' personal data had been accessed by the NSA (or other US security agencies) ('the locus standi objection'), so that the complaint was purely hypothetical and speculative. Secondly, the European Commission had determined in its decision of 26 July, 2000 (2000/520/EC) ('the Safe Harbour Decision') that the United States 'ensures an adequate level of [data] protection' in accordance with Art. 25(6) of Directive 95/46/EC (the 1995 Directive). The Commissioner noted that the Safe Harbour decision was a 'Community finding' for the purposes of Sect. 11(2)(a) of the 1988 Act, so that any question of the adequacy of data protection in that third country (in the present case, the United States) where the data is to be transferred was required by Irish law 'to be determined in accordance with that finding'. As this was the gist of the applicant's complaint – namely, that personal data was being transferred to a third country which did not in practice observe these standards – the Commissioner took the view that this question was foreclosed by the nature of the Safe Harbour Decision.

⁹⁶ [2014] IEHC 310, [2014] 2 ILRM 441 (Irish High Court), Case C-326/14 Verein für Konsumenteninformation [2015] ECLI:EU:C:2015:462 (pending before the CJEU). I should disclose that the author was the referring judge. Nothing in this commentary should be taken as reflecting one way or another on the merits of litigation which is currently pending before the Court of Justice.

The evidence and the findings of fact The High Court of Ireland found the following facts regarding the interception of personal data:

- (a) Electronic surveillance and interception of communications in the manner provided by law serves necessary and indispensable objectives which are in the public interest, namely, the preservation of national security and the prevention of serious crime. The surveillance and interception of personal data transferred from the EU to the US by the US National Security Authority (and other similar agencies, both in the US and elsewhere) serves legitimate and necessary counter-terrorism objectives and goals.
- (b) Nevertheless, the revelations made by Edward Snowden demonstrated a significant over-reach on the part of those authorities. While there is oversight on the part of the Foreign Intelligence Services Court in the US, this is done on an ex parte and secret basis. EU citizens have no effective right to be heard on the question of the interception and surveillance of their data and, furthermore, decisions taken to access such data are not conducted on the basis of EU law.
- (c) While there may be some dispute regarding the scope and extent of some of these programmes, it was clear from the extensive exhibits contained in the affidavits filed in these proceedings that the accuracy of much of the Snowden revelations did not appear to be in dispute. The Court accordingly found that personal data transferred by companies such as Facebook Ireland to its parent company in the United States can thereafter be accessed by the National Security Authority (and other federal agencies such as the Federal Bureau of Investigation) in the course of a mass and indiscriminate surveillance and interception of such data. Indeed, in the wake of the Snowden revelations, the available evidence presently admitted of no other realistic conclusion.⁹⁷
- (d) Both Facebook and Facebook Ireland had self-certified pursuant to the Safe Harbour Decision.

National law So far as Irish national law is concerned, Sect. 11(1) of the 1988 Act precludes the transfer of personal data outside of the State, save where that foreign State ‘ensures an adequate level of protection for the privacy and the fundamental rights and freedoms of data subjects in relation to the processing of personal data having regard to all the circumstances surrounding that transfer’. The Court then held that the accessing of private communications by the State authorities through interception or surveillance engages the constitutional right to privacy. Further, accessing by State authorities of private communications generated within the home – whether this involves the accessing of telephone calls, internet use or private mail – is also a clear interference with the inviolability of the dwelling as guaranteed by Art. 40.5 of the Constitution.⁹⁸

The Court next held that the mere fact that these rights are thus engaged does not mean that the interception of communications by State authorities is necessarily or ⁹⁷ At paras. 10–13 of the judgment of the Irish High Court, [2014] 2 ILRM 441, 447–448.

⁹⁸ Paragraphs 47 and 48 of the judgment, [2014] 2 ILRM 441, 457–458.

always unlawful. The Preamble to the Constitution of Ireland envisages a ‘true social order’ where the ‘dignity and freedom of the individual may be assured’, so that both liberty and security are valued. Provided appropriate safeguards are in place, the Court ruled that in a modern society electronic surveillance and interception of communications is indispensable to the preservation of State security. It was accordingly plain that legislation of this general kind serves important – indeed, vital and indispensable – State goals and interests, drawing by analogy on the decision of the German Constitutional Court in the Anti-Terrorism Database case⁹⁹ and the comments of the Court of Justice in Case C-293/12 Digital Rights Ireland.

It further held that the importance of these constitutional rights is nonetheless such that the interference with these privacy interests must be in a manner provided for by law, and any such interference must also be proportionate. This is especially the case in respect of the interception and surveillance of communications within the home. While the term ‘inviolable’ in respect of the dwelling in Art. 40.5 of the Constitution does not literally mean what it says (i.e. the right is not absolute or incapable of being interfered with), the reference to inviolability in this context nonetheless conveys that the home enjoys the highest level of protection which might reasonably be afforded in a democratic society.¹⁰⁰

The High Court then held that the mass and undifferentiated accessing of personal data generated perhaps especially within the home – such as e-mails, text messages, internet usage and telephone calls – would not pass any proportionality test or could not survive constitutional scrutiny on this ground alone. The potential for abuse in such cases would be enormous and might even give rise to the possibility that no facet of private or domestic life within the home would be immune from potential State scrutiny and observation. Such a state of affairs would be totally at odds with the basic premises and fundamental values of the Constitution: respect for human dignity and freedom of the individual (as per the Preamble to the Constitution); personal autonomy (Art. 40.3.1 and Art. 40.3.2); the inviolability of the dwelling (Art. 40.5) and protection of family life (Art. 41). Drawing on earlier Irish case law,¹⁰¹ the Court noted that Art. 40.5 of the Constitution presupposes that ‘in a free society the dwelling is set apart as a place of repose from the cares of the world’ and assures ‘the citizen that his or her privacy, person and security will be protected against all comers’, save in a manner provided for by a law which respects the essence of that constitutional guarantee.

The Court then held that a dwelling could not in truth be a ‘place of repose from the cares of the world’ if, for example, the occupants of the dwelling could not send an e-mail or write a letter or even conduct a telephone conversation if they were not protected from ‘the prospect of general or casual State surveillance of such communications on a mass and undifferentiated basis’. The Court observed:

⁹⁹ 24 April 2003 at paras. 106, 131 and 133, passim.

¹⁰⁰ At paras. 49–50 of the judgment, [2014] 2 ILRM 441, 457, 458.

¹⁰¹ Such as The People v. O'Brien [2012] IEHC 68.

That general protection for privacy, person and security in Article 40.5 [of the Constitution of Ireland] would thus be entirely compromised by the mass and undifferentiated surveillance by State authorities of conversations and communications which take place within the home. For such interception of communications of this nature to be constitutionally valid, it would, accordingly, be necessary to demonstrate that this interception of communications and the surveillance of individuals or groups of individuals was objectively justified in the interests of the suppression of crime and national security and, further, that any such interception was attended by appropriate and verifiable safeguards.¹⁰²

The Court further held that if this matter were entirely governed by Irish law, then measured by these particular constitutional standards, at the very least a significant issue would arise as to whether the United States ‘ensures an adequate level of protection for the privacy and the fundamental rights and freedoms’ within the meaning of Sect. 11(1)(a) of the 1988 Act, such as would permit data transfers to that country. Moreover, given the (apparently) limited protection given to data subjects by contemporary US law and practice so far as State surveillance is concerned, this would indeed have been a matter which the Commissioner would have been obliged to investigate.

Accordingly, the Court found that if the matter were to be judged solely by reference to Irish constitutional law standards, the Commissioner could not properly have exercised his Sect. 10(1)(a) powers to conclude in a summary fashion that there was nothing further to investigate.

National law pre-empted by European Union law? The Safe Harbour Decision
The parties agreed, however, that the matter was only partially governed by Irish law and that, in reality, on this key issue of the adequacy of data protection law and practice in third countries, Irish law has been pre-empted by general EU law in this area.¹⁰³ On this point the Court stated:

This brings us to the nub of the issue for the Commissioner. He is naturally bound by the terms of the 1995 Directive and by the 2000 Commission Decision. Furthermore, as the 2000 Decision amounts to a ‘Community finding’ regarding the adequacy of data protection in the country to which the data is to be transferred, s. 11(2)(a) of the 1988 Act (as amended) requires that the question of the adequacy of data protection in the country where the data is to be so transferred ‘shall be determined in accordance with that finding’. In this respect, s. 11(2)(a) of the 1988 Act faithfully follows the provisions of Article 25(6) of the 1995 Directive.

All of this means that the Commissioner cannot arrive at a finding inconsistent with that Community finding, so that if, for example, the Community finding is to the effect that a particular third party state has adequate and effective data protection laws, the Commissioner cannot conclude to the contrary. The Community finding in question was, as we have already seen, to the effect that the US does provide adequate data protection for data subjects in respect of data handled or processed by firms (such as Facebook Ireland and Facebook) which operate the Safe Harbour regime.

¹⁰² Paragraph 55, [2014] 2 ILRM 441, 459.

¹⁰³ This is because Sect. 11(2)(a) of the 1988 Act (as substituted by Sect. 12 of the Data Protection (Amendment) Act 2003) effects a renvoi of this wider question in favour of EU law. Specifically, Sect. 11(2)(b) of the 1988 Act provides that the Commissioner must determine the question of the adequacy of protection in the third state ‘in accordance’ with a Community finding made by the European Commission pursuant to Art. 25(6) of the 1995 Directive.

It follows, therefore, that if the Commissioner cannot look beyond the European Commission's Safe Harbour Decision of July 2000, then it is clear that the present application for judicial review must fail. This is because, at the risk of repetition, the Commission has decided that the US provides an adequate level of data protection and, as we have just seen, s. 11(2)(a) of the 1998 Act (which in turn follows the provisions of Article 25(6) of the 1995 Directive) ties the Commissioner to the Commission's finding. In those circumstances, any complaint to the Commissioner concerning the transfer of personal data by Facebook Ireland (or, indeed, Facebook) to the US on the ground that US data protection was inadequate would be doomed to fail.

This finding of the Commission is doubtless still true at the level of consumer protection, but, as we have just seen, much has happened in the interval since July 2000. The developments include the enhanced threat to national and international security posed by rogue States, terrorist groupings and organised crime, disclosures regarding mass and undifferentiated surveillance of personal data by the US security authorities, the advent of social media and, not least from a legal perspective, the enhanced protection for personal data now contained in Article 8 of the Charter.

While the applicant maintains that the Commissioner has not adhered to the requirements of EU law in holding that the complaint was unsustainable in law, the opposite is in truth the case. The Commissioner has rather demonstrated scrupulous steadfastness to the letter of the 1995 Directive and the 2000 Decision.

The applicant's objection is, in reality, to the terms of the Safe Harbour Regime itself rather than to the manner in which the Commissioner has actually applied the Safe Harbour Regime. There is, perhaps, much to be said for the argument that the Safe Harbour Regime has been overtaken by events. The Snowden revelations may be thought to have exposed gaping holes in contemporary US data protection practice and the subsequent entry into force of Article 8 of the Charter suggests that a re-evaluation of how the 1995 Directive and 2000 Decision should be interpreted in practice may be necessary. It must be again stressed, however, that neither the validity of the 1995 Directive nor the validity of the Commission's Safe Harbour decision have, as such, been challenged in these proceedings.

Although the validity of the 2000 Decision has not been directly challenged, the essential question which arises for consideration is whether, as a matter of European Union law, the Commissioner is nonetheless absolutely bound by that finding of the European Commission as manifested in the 2000 Decision in relation to the adequacy of data protection in the law and practice of the United States having regard in particular to the subsequent entry into force of Article 8 of the Charter, the provisions of Article 25(6) of the 1995 Directive notwithstanding. For the reasons which I have already stated, it seems to me that unless this question is answered in a manner which enables the Commissioner either to look behind that Community finding or otherwise disregard it, the applicant's complaint both before the Commissioner and in these judicial review proceedings must accordingly fail.¹⁰⁴

¹⁰⁴ At paras. 64–70 of the judgment, [2014] 2 ILRM 441, 462–463.

Given that the critical issue in the present case was whether US law and practice afforded sufficient data protection and that no issue was ever raised in these proceedings concerning the actions of Facebook Ireland or Facebook¹⁰⁵ as such, the Court took the view that the real question was whether the Commissioner was bound by the earlier findings to this effect by the European Commission in the Safe Harbour Decision. In other words, the Court considered that this was really a complaint concerning the terms of that decision, rather than the manner in which the Commissioner had applied it.¹⁰⁶ While Art. 3(b) of the Safe Harbour Decision allows the national authorities to direct an entity to suspend data flows to that third country, this is in circumstances where the complaint is directed to the conduct of that entity. Here the real objection was not to the conduct of Facebook as such, but rather to the fact that the Commission has already determined that the US law and practice provides adequate data protection in circumstances where it is clear from the Snowden disclosures that personal data of EU citizens so transferred to the US can be accessed by the US authorities on a mass and undifferentiated basis.

In these circumstances the High Court found that it would be appropriate to refer to the Court of Justice the question whether, having regard in particular to the earlier findings of fact regarding the Snowden disclosures and the subsequent entry into force of Art. 7 and Art. 8 of the Charter and the recent judgment of this Court in Digital Rights Ireland, the Commissioner was bound by the earlier determination of the European Commission in the Safe Harbour Decision as to the adequacy of the data protection offered by US law and practice. The outcome of this reference is currently pending.¹⁰⁷

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 The rules regarding the promulgation of legislation are contained in Art. 25 of the Constitution, which provides that Bills must be presented to the President for signature.¹⁰⁸ The critical provisions are Art. 25.4 paras. 1 and 2:

¹⁰⁵ Mr. Schrems has made other separate complaints to the Commissioner concerning Facebook, but none of these complaints arose for consideration in these judicial review proceedings.

¹⁰⁶ Paragraph 69 of the judgment, [2014] 2 ILRM 441, 463.

¹⁰⁷ In its judgment in C-362/14 Schrems, n. 89, delivered on 6 October 2015, the Court of Justice held (i) that the Data Protection Commissioner was not so bound and (ii) the Safe Harbour Decision was itself invalid.

¹⁰⁸ This is not a pure formality, as the President could elect to refer the Bill to the Supreme Court to test its constitutionality, having first consulted with the Council of State. The Council of State has met on 27 occasions for this purpose, and the relevant Bills have been referred on 15 occasions.

1. Every Bill shall become and be law as and from the day on which it is signed by the President under this Constitution, and shall, unless the contrary intention appears, come into operation on that day.
2. Every Bill signed by the President under this Constitution shall be promulgated by him as a law by the publication by his direction of a notice in the Iris Oifigiúil¹⁰⁹ stating that the Bill has become law.

These provisions do raise the possibility that a measure may become law before the public can access the text of the new legislation, although the difficulties thereby presented appear to be more theoretical than real. To date the Irish Supreme Court has been largely unsympathetic to arguments of this kind, citing the express language of Art. 25.4.¹¹⁰ A curious variation of this problem emerged in Cussens v. Brosnan,¹¹¹ a VAT case where it emerged in the course of an appeal to the Supreme Court that the Irish Revenue Commissioners had withheld the text of a derogation by Ireland from the application of the VAT rules on the disposal of property and, just as remarkably, that the EU Commission had agreed to this. In the light of this admission, the Court gave the appellant leave to amend its pleading based on the emergence of this new fact.¹¹²

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 The question of the protection of property rights and legitimate expectations in the context of EU legislation has rarely arisen in the Irish courts. This is principally because insofar as such a measure interferes with property rights or other procedural entitlements, it will nonetheless be held to be ‘necessitated’ by the obligations of EU law for the purposes of Art. 29.4.6 of the Constitution and, hence, immune from constitutional review.

¹⁰⁹ I.e., the Official Gazette.

¹¹⁰ Minister for Justice and Equality v. Adach [2010] IESC 33, [2010] 3 IR 402, Minister for Justice v. Bailey [2012] IESC16, [2012] 4 IR 1.

¹¹¹ [2015] IESC 45.

¹¹² As Laffoy J. commented in her judgment:

‘Further, it is difficult to understand how a State body could consider that it had the entitlement to withhold the derogation, which, in reality, is a legal instrument which regulates the charging of VAT and … can be regarded as part of the law of the land, from a taxpayer’s adviser, for example, from Mr. Brennan and other partners of Deloitte. It should have been furnished when it was sought in the context of this appeal in March 2012. While the Court was told, in the course of the submissions, that its withholding was not wilful, in that neither the respondent nor the European Commission was able to find it, there was no evidence to support that. Further, as counsel for the appellants emphasised, by letter dated 12th August, 2002 from the European Commission, Mr. Brennan was informed that the “Irish authorities have informed my services that they do not agree to the release of these documents.”’

This was made clear by the Supreme Court's decision in Maher v. Minister for Agriculture and Food.¹¹³ In that case the plaintiff farmers, who were not at that time milk producers themselves, had leased their milk quotas to other producers from which they derived an income. They challenged the constitutionality of a ministerial order which directed them to either sell back their quotas at par value¹¹⁴ or else to resume milk production and cease the leasing of the quota. The Supreme Court held that the order was 'necessitated' by the obligations of the EU milk quota system and was, accordingly, immune from constitutional review. The Court added for good measure that milk quotas were creatures of EU law and as the Court of Justice had ruled that such quotas were not in themselves a species of property rights,¹¹⁵ such quotas could not be regarded as a form of property rights for the purposes of Irish constitutional law.

The courts will not, however, interpret national legislation affecting fundamental rights in a manner which is contra legem, even if the ultimate consequence is that the national legislation is interpreted in a manner which is contrary to the intentions of the relevant EU directive.¹¹⁶

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 Under the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty), Member States may be required to contribute funds to the ESM that in several countries amount potentially to a large proportion of the annual state budget. In Ireland, the liability of the Irish State under the ESM Treaty is 11.1454 billion EUR; the projected Irish Government expenditure for 2015 is 50 billion EUR, and thus the exposure represents some 22% of the Irish annual budget. The use of such funds is not subject to democratic control or judicial review, and the 85% majority rule means that smaller states have no say over the use of the funds. The constitutionality of the ratification of the ESM Treaty was, however, directly challenged in Pringle v. Government of Ireland.¹¹⁷ Part of the challenge was to the validity of the ESM Treaty itself as a matter of EU law. This aspect of the proceedings ultimately resulted in a reference by the Supreme Court to the Court of Justice which, as is well known, sustained the validity of the treaty.¹¹⁸ Independently of ¹¹³ [2001] IESC 32, [2001] 2 IR 139.

¹¹⁴ I.e. at a price lower than the prevailing market price.

¹¹⁵ See e.g. Case 2/94 Bostock [1994] ECR I-00995.

¹¹⁶ See e.g. Albatross Feeds Ltd. v. Minister for Agriculture and Food [2006] IESC 52, [2007] 1 IR 271.

¹¹⁷ [2012] IESC 47, [2013] 3 IR 1.

¹¹⁸ Case C-370/12 Pringle [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2012:756.

that decision, however, a majority of the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the ratification of the ESM Treaty without a referendum.

The judgments of the Court are lengthy and complex and do not lend themselves to an easy summary. Both the majority judgments and the minority judgment spend much time on the implications of the earlier Crotty decision.¹¹⁹ While the majority judges acknowledged the serious implications of the ESM Treaty, they considered that unlike Title III of the Single European Act which was at issue in Crotty, the ESM Treaty did not involve an abdication of or the fettering of the executive power of the State. They stressed that, on the contrary, ratification of the Treaty involved the exercise of the executive power of the State in the manner contemplated by Art. 29 of the Constitution. The dissenting judge, Hardiman J., dissented principally on the basis that the ESM Treaty involves a transfer of sovereignty to a degree that makes it incompatible with the Constitution when one applies the principles set out by this Court in Crotty, such that a referendum amending the Constitution is necessary to permit the State to ratify the ESM Treaty on behalf of Ireland.¹²⁰

2.7.2 No significant constitutional issues have been raised with regard to the Banking Union.

2.7.3 Ireland was in an EU sponsored bailout from 2010 to 2013. This bailout proved necessary after Ireland had to spend enormous sums rescuing its banks at taxpayers' expense during 2008–2010, the costs of which threatened to overwhelm the financial stability of the state. Even prior to that period, there had been a series of fiscal retrenchments from the onset of the financial crisis in the mid-summer of 2008. During this period, from 2009 onwards, there were a series of emergency measures reducing public sector pay and other disbursements from public moneys through the Financial Emergency Measures in the Public Interest Acts. The courts have, moreover, almost always consistently rejected all challenges to executive or other decisions designed to give effect to the austerity and deficit reduction programme. Thus, the constitutionality of legislation affecting the pension payments of public servants with privately funded pensions¹²¹ or effecting significant reductions in payments to pharmacists¹²² or payments to police officers¹²³ has been upheld, even though by definition the legislative measures in question adversely affected

¹¹⁹ Crotty v. An Taoiseach [1987] IR 713.

¹²⁰ In his dissent, Hardiman J. also drew attention to other potential implications of the Treaty for the budgetary process prescribed by the Constitution. For example, although Art. 17.2 provides that no money shall be appropriated save on a recommendation to the lower House, Dáil Éireann, by the Taoiseach, ‘[w]hat would be the position, having regard to Art. 17.2, of a future Government, Taoiseach, who did not wish to approve, or to recommend, an appropriation for payments to the ESM to Dáil Eireann?’

¹²¹ Unite the Union v. Minister for Finance [2010] IEHC 354.

¹²² JJ Haire Ltd. v. Minister for Health and Children [2009] IEHC 562, [2010] 2 IR 615.

¹²³ Garda Representative Association v. Minister for Finance [2010] IEHC 78.

contractual and other entitlements protected by the property provisions contained in Art. 40.3.2 and Art. 43 of the Constitution. The courts have likewise rejected all claims based on legitimate expectations in relation to changes to a teachers' early retirement scheme¹²⁴ or in sick pay benefits for public servants,¹²⁵ with the courts expressly citing the financial crisis as a justification.

There is, perhaps, only one case of this kind where a claimant has succeeded: Dellway Investments Ltd. v. National Asset Management Agency.¹²⁶ In that case the Supreme Court held that the principles of fair procedures were violated when the performing loans of the plaintiff company were transferred to the National Asset Management Agency (NAMA) without giving that company an opportunity to be heard on the matter. NAMA was the 'bad bank' established by the Oireachtas in the wake of the property and banking collapse designed to take major debtors off the books of the Irish banks, so that they could resume lending again in the ordinary way. The Court held that the transfer of these loans to NAMA in practice unambiguously signalled to the markets that there were serious solvency issues arising in respect of the company in question. It followed that the applicant company was entitled to be heard on this question prior to such transfer.

While the decision in Dellway was regarded as a major defeat for the Government, it is nonetheless significant that it was the first and only such reverse so far as the austerity programme was concerned. It is ever more significant perhaps that the decision was based on procedural grounds only, since there was no equivalent at all of the decision of the Portuguese Constitutional Court invalidating a budgetary measure adopted as part an austerity measure on proportionality or similar substantive grounds.

The High Court has also upheld the constitutionality of the legislation (Credit Institutions (Financial Support) Act 2008) giving effect to the banking sector guarantee in September 2008 which was at the heart of the financial crisis: see Collins v. Minister for Finance.¹²⁷ The Court held that the legislation contained sufficient principles and policies which enabled the courts to review decisions taken under the legislation and to ensure democratic accountability. The Court further rejected the argument that the appropriations clause in Art. 11 of the Constitution was violated by the 2008 Act because of the open-ended nature of the guarantee.¹²⁸

¹²⁴ Curran v. Minister for Education [2009] IEHC 378, [2009] 4 IR 300.

¹²⁵ Garda Representative Association v. Minister for Public Expenditure and Reform [2014] IEHC 457.

¹²⁶ [2011] IESC 14, [2011] 4 IR 1.

¹²⁷ [2013] IEHC 530.

¹²⁸ The Court said that it was sufficient for this purpose that:

'the appropriation must be for "an object, to an extent, and out of a fund, which the laws have prescribed." Applying that test to the present case, it can be said that the objects of the appropriation under the 2008 Act are clear and satisfy the requirements of Art. 17.2 [of the Constitution] Section 6(12) of the 2008 Act further provides that the payment comes from the Central Fund in the manner envisaged by Article 11. The extent of the payments are also clear. While, of course, the Oireachtas did not know precisely the sums which were at stake when enacting the 2008 Act, it

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 The number of Irish cases which have been the subject of Art. 267 TFEU references is not high, although the number has begun to rise steadily from a low base in recent years.¹²⁹ Since 2006, there has been only one instance where a reference has expressly sought the annulment of an EU measure, namely, Digital Rights Ireland (see Sect. 2.4).

2.8.2–2.8.3 So far as the domestic judicial review is concerned, the standard of review is mixed. There is vigorous judicial review of administrative decisions on grounds of fair procedures, adherence to procedural rules and vires. In this area the record of the Irish courts is very good indeed: one might almost regard it as exemplary. So far as substantive review is concerned, the record is more mixed; there is, to some extent, a culture of deference and unwillingness to intervene. This is especially true of specialist agencies such as planning bodies.¹³⁰ There is, however, some sign that this standard of review is regarded as too restrictive, so that a more elaborate review takes place in cases where the protection of fundamental rights is at stake.¹³¹

So far as domestic constitutional review is concerned, there have been some 94 declarations of unconstitutionality since 1937. While this is in some respects impressive, it might also be said that given the breadth and extent of the fundamental rights guarantees contained in the Constitution, the courts have too often looked away and not engaged sufficiently with major constitutional claims. Against that background, one cannot say from an Irish perspective that the standard of review performed by the Court of Justice in respect of proceedings against EU institutions in matters of economic regulation is lower than that which in practice prevails in ordinary constitutional and judicial review cases in Ireland.¹³²

2.8.4 The Irish courts have not yet given any indication of a Solange style rebellion. This is perhaps because the question is to some degree pre-determined by the language of Art. 29.4.6 of the Constitution: if the matter is ‘necessitated’ by the obligations of EU law, then it is beyond the purview of constitutional review. The laid down principles and policies in s. 2 and s. 6 of the 2008 Act which circumscribe the extent of the Minister’s discretion to provide financial support.’

Article 17.2 of the Constitution provides that the Dáil may not vote for the appropriation of public money without a message signed by the Taoiseach for this purpose.

¹²⁹ The Court of Justice of the European Union, Annual report 2013, Luxembourg 2014, p. 107, puts the figure at 72.

¹³⁰ See most notably the leading decision in O’Keeffe v. An Bord Pleanála [1993] 1 IR 39.

¹³¹ See e.g. Holland v. Governor of Portlaoise Prison [2004] IEHC 208, [2004] 2 IR 573; Clinton v. An Bord Pleanála [2007] IESC 19, [2007] 4 IR 701; Meadows v. Minister for Justice and Equality [2010] IESC 3, [2010] 2 IR 701 and Efe v. Minister for Justice and Equality [2011] IEHC 414, [2011] 2 IR 798.

¹³² For relevant case law, see Chalmers et al. 2006, pp. 436–437.

Irish courts have, by and large, taken an accommodating view of what is ‘necessitated’¹³³ by the obligations of Union law. While there remains uncertainty as to the extent to which discretionary decisions taken within the purview of EU law can be described as ‘necessitated’ for this purpose, Treaty obligations, decisions of the Court of Justice and the method of implementation of EU legislative measures can all be regarded as ‘necessitated’ obligations required by EU law.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 The other major constitutional issue which has arisen is the method of implementation of EU directives. The Irish courts have, by and large, facilitated the implementation of EU legislative measures by means of ministerial orders made under the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1973, with the Supreme Court reasoning that the practical necessity of transposing such statutory instruments in this fashion means that this method of implementation is itself ‘necessitated’ and, hence, immune from constitutional review by reason of Art. 29.4.6 of the Constitution.¹³⁴ Following two further decisions which invalidated statutory instruments that were found to have by-passed the prohibition on the creation of indictable offences by means of statutory instruments,¹³⁵ the European Communities Act 2007 now expressly permits a statutory instrument to give effect to EU legislative requirements and to create an indictable offence for this purpose.¹³⁶ This is further discussed in Sect. 1.4.1 above.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 Much of the contemporary Irish historical constitutional scholarship has stressed the extent to which many of the substantive provisions have drawn not only on the US Constitution and the UK common law constitutional historical heritage,¹³⁷ but also on a variety of continental constitutions, most notably the Weimar Constitution of 1919.¹³⁸ A good example is provided by Art. 40.5 of the ¹³³ Most notably in cases such as Meagher v. Minister for Agriculture and Food [1994] 1 IR 329. See generally Barrett (2013), pp. 154–155.

¹³⁴ Meagher v. Minister for Agriculture and Food [1994] 1 IR 329.

¹³⁵ Kennedy v. Ireland [2005] IESC 36, [2007] 2 IR 45, Quinn v. Ireland [2007] IESC 16, [2007] 3 IR 395.

¹³⁶ Provided that the maximum penalty is now greater than five years imprisonment.

¹³⁷ See generally, Keane 1992, p. 25; Jaconelli 1992; O'Donnell 2014, p. 139.

¹³⁸ See generally, Kelly 1983; Hogan 2014, p. 155.

Constitution which provides: ‘The dwelling of every citizen is inviolable and shall not be forcibly entered save in accordance with law.’

This has a direct counterpart in Art. 13 of the German Basic Law, which in turn had a corresponding provision in Art. 115 of the (1919) Weimar Constitution. The latter, however, also drew on earlier sources, such as Art. 3 of the French Constitution of 1848, which provided that the ‘residence of every person dwelling in French territory’ was ‘inviolable’.

It is indeed striking that there has been little comparative analysis of similar constitutional provisions of this kind, of which many unexplored examples abound. As Besselink and others have noted, the references in the case law of the Court of Justice and, for that matter, of the European Court of Human Rights to national constitutions is often perfunctory.¹³⁹ Two reasons may be advanced for this. The first is quasi-legal in nature, since it suits the two European Courts to fashion a new homogenised European jurisprudence in matters of human rights which, while acknowledging the original national sources, seeks to carve out a new jurisprudence which is divorced from and independent of national case law and traditions. The second reason is that it is now almost forgotten that the European standards were (originally) designed to set minimum benchmarks. Thus, for example, the drafters of the ECHR deliberately rejected arguments which had been advanced by, inter alia, the French delegation that Art. 8(1) should protect the ‘inviolability’ of the dwelling and the ‘natural rights deriving from marriage and paternity and those pertaining to the family’. The compromise which was arrived at was that Art. 8(1) should simply ‘respect’ those rights, leaving each state free to have higher domestic constitutional standards.¹⁴⁰

2.10.2 There are in this context practical mechanisms for rendering the ‘common constitutional traditions’ a more direct and relevant source in EU law. In the Schrems data protection reference, the Irish High Court drew attention to the manner in which the Irish courts had protected the inviolability of the dwelling and suggested that, drafting differences notwithstanding, Art. 7(1) of the Charter might well be interpreted in a similar fashion.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 It is, perhaps, not altogether surprising that Art. 53 of the Charter was interpreted in a restrictive fashion by the Court of Justice in Melloni. In effect, Member States are not permitted to have higher constitutional standards where this would jeopardise the uniform application of EU law. Not, perhaps, for the first time, the wording of the Charter is apt to mislead. As thus interpreted, Art. 53 of the Charter permits Member States to have their own national constitutional standards and to apply them to those cases where either the Charter or, for that matter, EU law is not engaged. It would nonetheless have to be admitted that any other interpretation of Art. 53 would potentially jeopardise the uniform application of EU law.

¹³⁹ Besselink 2012, pp. 137–138.

¹⁴⁰ Hogan 2014, pp. 167.

There has, however, been little discussion in Ireland on whether the Court of Justice should properly set the level of Charter rights at the level of the ECHR, or whether there are areas where there may be a case for increasing the standard to match that provided under the Constitution. This is mainly because it is recognised that the ECHR is the only common template among the Member States which would justify this approach.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 Fair Trials International has noted that the adoption of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision was marked by ‘the lack of public engagement in the area of defence rights and the almost total absence of political debate on the subject’ (cf. the Questionnaire). This was certainly true in Ireland as much as elsewhere in the EU. The elaborate nature of the safeguards and protections contained in the 2003 Act is largely due to the fact that the Minister for Justice at the time¹⁴¹ was a very prominent lawyer who was greatly interested in the entire EAW process and its implications for the administration of criminal justice. There has been even less debate on the question of the EU Data Retention Directive. Unlike in other jurisdictions – such as e.g. Germany – data protection is regarded as an exotic topic which excites few outside of a cadre of specialists.

There is little doubt but that, as the Irish Meagher and Maher case law shows, the need for the speedy and effective transposition of EU directives and the supremacy of EU law dilutes the opportunity for democratic deliberation, constitutional review and accommodation of important constitutional issues. In Meagher the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a procedure whereby a fixed time limit contained in earlier legislation was amended by ministerial order. The Court reasoned that in the circumstances of the substantive prosecution at issue in that case,¹⁴² it was necessary for the time limit¹⁴³ to be extended to ensure an effective ¹⁴¹ Michael McDowell S.C. Mr. McDowell was a former Attorney General who later held the office of Tánaiste (Deputy Prime Minister).

¹⁴² The applicant had been prosecuted for the possession of illegal animal growth promoting substances which Member States were required by a series of directives to make illegal.

¹⁴³ The time limit was extended from six months (in legislation) by two months (by ministerial order).

prosecution system for these offences.¹⁴⁴ This system of amending legislation by ministerial order was accordingly deemed to be ‘necessitated’ to give effect to European Union obligations and was accordingly immune from constitutional challenge by reason of Art. 29.4.6 of the Constitution.¹⁴⁵

Other examples can be given where the decisions of the Court of Justice or the European Court of Human Rights have also effectively lessened or weakened the protection of domestic fundamental rights provided for in Irish constitutional law. One example from the sphere of immigration law and family life is the ‘insurmountable obstacles’ line of case law from the ECtHR where that Court has held that there is, generally speaking, no objection on Art. 8 grounds to the deportation of a spouse to that spouse’s country of origin where it is reasonable to expect the other spouse to join him or her.¹⁴⁶ This test has proved very influential with the Irish courts, even though the practical effect of this decision may be that non-national parents are in effect obliged to take their Irish citizen children back with them to their country of origin.¹⁴⁷ This test has been applied even though Art. 8 ECHR refers merely to ‘respect’ for family life, whereas Art. 41.1.1 of the Constitution guarantees the ‘inalienable and imprescriptible rights’ of the family. Some later judgments have dissented from the proposition that the ‘insurmountable obstacles’ test is the appropriate test to apply in view of the higher standard of protection contained in Irish constitutional law, ‘as some weight must be given to the even more emphatic description of family rights contained in Article 41’ as compared with Art. 8 ECHR.¹⁴⁸

In other cases, however, the Court of Justice has shown the way. Thus, for example, the Court’s own decisions in *Chen*¹⁴⁹ and *Ruiz-Zambrano*¹⁵⁰ have illustrated how the right of European citizenship contained in Art. 20 TFEU will serve to protect the (third country) parents of minor children who are citizens of the

¹⁴⁴ As Blayney J. put it ([1994] 1 IR 329, 360):

‘The relevant directives here were binding on the State from the moment they were adopted, “as to the result to be achieved.” One result to be achieved clearly was the creation of effective sanctions for the enforcement of the measures contained in the directives. So the State was bound to introduce effective measures, and if this necessitated adopting a measure which impliedly amended an existing statute, that measure would prevail over the statute because it was in substance a measure of Community law. It is really only in form that it is part of the domestic statute.’

¹⁴⁵ The reasoning of the Irish Supreme Court in Meagher has met with almost universal criticism in the academic literature. See e.g. the comments of Fahey 2010 at 50 describing the decision as ‘an unfortunate case of the Irish judiciary demonstrating yet again that they are excessively pragmatic in this area of the law’.

¹⁴⁶ See, e.g., Boultif v. Switzerland, no. 54273/00, ECHR 2001-IX; Uner v. the Netherlands [GC], no. 46410/99, ECHR 2006-XII.

¹⁴⁷ See, e.g., Alli v. Minister for Justice, Equality and Law Reform [2009] IEHC 595, [2010] 4 IR 45.

¹⁴⁸ See, e.g., AO v. Minister for Justice [2012] IESC 79, EA v. Minister for Justice [2012] IEHC 371.

¹⁴⁹ Case C-200/02 Chen [2004] ECR I-09925.

¹⁵⁰ Case C-34/09 Ruiz-Zambrano [2011] ECR I-01177.

Member State in question from deportation where this would have the ‘effect of depriving citizens of the Union of the genuine enjoyment of the substance of the rights conferred by virtue of their status as citizens of the Union’. A majority of the Irish Supreme Court had previously reached exactly the opposite conclusion in the context of the operation of the rights of citizenship conferred by Art. 2 and Art. 9 of the Constitution.¹⁵¹ That Court has now – tacitly at least – acknowledged that its earlier decision was wrong and that it must be re-considered in the light of Chen and Zambrano.¹⁵²

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1–3.1.4 International relations are regulated in Art. 29 of the Constitution, where the relevant sections provide as follows:

- 1 Ireland affirms its devotion to the ideal of peace and friendly co-operation amongst nations founded on international justice and morality. ...
- 3 Ireland accepts the generally recognised principles of international law as its rule of conduct in its relations with other States. ...
- 5 1° Every international agreement to which the State becomes a party shall be laid before Dáil Éireann.
- 2° The State shall not be bound by any international agreement involving a charge upon public funds unless the terms of the agreement shall have been approved by Dáil Éireann.
- 3° This section shall not apply to agreements or conventions of a technical and administrative character.

As we have already noted, where an international treaty involves a significant derogation from national sovereignty or materially affects the international operation of executive, legislative or judicial powers, a referendum will generally be required to effect constitutional change. This has been the basis of the various constitutional amendments dealing with EU Treaty change, but it also explains the basis for the constitutional amendment dealing with the Belfast Agreement in respect of Northern Ireland and the ratification of membership of the International Criminal Court. The relevant provisions include the following:

- 7 1° The State may consent to be bound by the British-Irish Agreement done at Belfast on the 10th day of April, 1998, hereinafter called the Agreement. ...
- 9 The State may ratify the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court done at Rome on the 17th day of July, 1998.

¹⁵¹ AO and DL v. Minister for Justice [2003] 1 IR 1.

¹⁵² Okunade v. Minister for Justice [2012] IESC 49, [2012] 3 IR 152.

Where an international treaty involves a charge on public funds, it must be laid before Dáil Éireann (cf. Art. 29.5.2 above) and the courts will not give effect to any international treaty where this constitutional requirement has not been complied with. For example, a ministerial order giving effect to an Irish-US extradition treaty was found unconstitutional, as the treaty provided for a charge on public funds and it had not received the prior approval of Dáil Éireann.¹⁵³

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 Article 29 of the Constitution commits Ireland to the classic position of the dualist state, since Art. 29.6 provides that an international agreement has force in domestic law only to the extent that such is provided by the Oireachtas itself:

No international agreement shall be part of the domestic law of the State save as may be determined by the Oireachtas.

In recent times both the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal have stressed that the effect of this provision is that international agreements do not have, as it were, direct effect in Irish law unless the Oireachtas has clearly indicated to the contrary.¹⁵⁴

Beyond the rules outlined above and in the preceding section, the Irish courts have nonetheless faithfully given priority to international treaty obligations which have been incorporated into EU legislative instruments. If, as nowadays is often the case, these treaty obligations have been subsumed into an EU legislative instrument, then this will have the effect that, by virtue of Art. 29.4.6 of the Constitution, the treaty (as thus subsumed into EU law) is beyond challenge on domestic law grounds. This can be seen in cases involving the European Arrest Warrant,¹⁵⁵ but perhaps a better example can be found in one aspect of the Bosphorus Airways litigation.

At the height of the Yugoslav wars, economic sanctions were imposed by means of Council Regulation 990/93/EEC. These sanctions in turn reflected the terms of a UN Security Council resolution to the same effect. Acting pursuant to the sanctions Regulation, the Irish authorities had impounded an airplane owned by Yugoslav Airways but which had been the subject of a dry lease to Bosphorus. The airplane in question had never returned to Yugoslavia, but had been principally utilised for the purpose of charter flights between Turkey and the rest of Europe. In the High Court Murphy J. stressed that the lease in question was bona fide and did not represent an attempt to circumvent the sanctions in these regulations. Accordingly, he declined to hold that the 1993 Regulation should apply to the situation presented by this case:

¹⁵³ The State (Gilliland) v. Governor of Mountjoy Prison [1987] IR 201.

¹⁵⁴ See, e.g., McD. v. L. [2009] IESC 81, [2010] 2 IR 199 (European Convention on Human Rights), Sweeney v. Governor of Loughan House Open Prison [2014] IESC 42, [2014] 2 ILRM 401 (European Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons); McCoy v. Shillelagh Quarries Ltd. [2015] IECA 28 (Aarhus Convention outside the scope of EU law).

¹⁵⁵ This unhappiness is most notably visible in the judgments of McKechnie J. and MacMenamin J. in Minister for Justice and Equality v. Ostrowski [2013] IESC 24.

As long as the position is that no citizen of Serbia or Montenegro has any use or control over the aircraft in question or the opportunity to receive any income derived from it, then it would seem to me that the regulations have achieved their purpose fully and the impounding of the aircraft would constituted a wholly unwarranted interference in the business of Bosphorus.¹⁵⁶

The state appealed to the Supreme Court, which in turn made a reference under Art. 267 TFEU (then Art. 177) to the Court of Justice. That Court, however, saw no real difficulty in the manner by which the sanctions operated. It stated that all sanctions regimes might impact on innocent third parties. It continued:

Moreover, the importance of the aims pursued by the regulation at issue is such as to justify negative consequences, even of a substantial nature, for some operators..... the aim pursued by the sanctions assumes especial importance, which is, in particular, in terms of Regulation No 990/93 and more especially the eighth recital in the preamble thereto, to dissuade the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia from ‘further violating the integrity and security of the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina and to induce the Bosnian Serb party to cooperate in the restoration of peace in this Republic.

As compared with an objective of general interest so fundamental for the international community, which consists in putting an end to the state of war in the region and to the massive violations of human rights and humanitarian international law in the Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina, the impounding of the aircraft in question, which is owned by an undertaking based in or operating from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, cannot be regarded as inappropriate or disproportionate.¹⁵⁷

While Bosphorus Airways may properly be regarded as a special – almost unique – case so far as Ireland is concerned, it may nonetheless be thought to illustrate how the decisions of global institutions such as the UN see justice through the prism of a global governance and are, perhaps, less sensitive to the appeals of individuals affected by such measures. No one doubted the grave and terrible humanitarian consequences of the Bosnian War, but it might be thought that the Court of Justice made undeservedly little of the argument that the operation of the sanctions regime had a disproportionate effect on what the Irish court regarded as a bona fide leasing arrangement.

¹⁵⁶ Bosphorus Airways v. Minister for Transport [1994] 2 ILRM 550, 560, per Murphy J.

¹⁵⁷ Case C-84/95 Bosphorus [1996] ECR I-03953.

3.3–3.4 Democratic Control and Judicial Review

See Sects. 3.1 and 3.2.

3.5 IMF Bailout Programme

3.5.1–3.5.2 When the bail-out package was announced in December 2010, the issue arose as to whether the agreement with the IMF was an international agreement which involved a charge on public funds for the purposes of Art. 29.5.2 of the Constitution. If it was, Art. 29.5.2 would require that the agreement receive the prior approval of Dáil Éireann (the lower House of Parliament). Although the IMF denied that the agreement was an international agreement for this purpose on the basis that it was a simply a ‘letter of intent’ to enter into a conditional assistance programme, it awaited the formal approval of the Dáil¹⁵⁸ before the bail-out package was agreed with the Irish Government.

References

- Bessink L. (2012) General Report. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 63–139.
- Bradley S.T. (1987) The Referendum on the Single European Act. E.L. Rev. 12:301 et seq.
- Casey J.P. (2000) Constitutional Law in Ireland. Sweet & Maxwell, Dublin.
- Chalmers D., Hadjiemmanuil C., Monti G., Tomkins A. (2006) European Union law: text and materials. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Chubb B. (1974) Cabinet Government in Ireland. Institute of Public Administration, Dublin.
- Fahey E. (2010) EU Law in Ireland. Clarus Press, Dublin.
- Farrell R., Hanrahan A. (2011) The European Arrest Warrant in Ireland. Clarus Press, Dublin.
- Foley B. (2010) The BUPA Ireland Case and Constitutional Litigation. Irish Jurist 45:230 et seq.
- Geoghegan H. (2014) Crotty put to sleep by Pringle. In: Bradley K., Travers N., Whelan A. (eds.) Of Courts and Constitutions: Liber Amicorum in Honour of Nial Fennelly. Hart, Oxford, pp. 233 et seq.
- Hogan G. (1987) The Supreme Court and the Single European Act. Irish Jurist 22:55 et seq.
- Hogan G. (1997) The Constitution, Property Rights and Proportionality. Irish Jurist 32:373 et seq.
- Hogan G. (2000) The British-Irish Agreement and the Irish Constitution. E.L. Rev. 6:1 et seq.
- Hogan G. (2012) The Origins of the Irish Constitution 1928–1941. Royal Irish Academy, Dublin.
- Hogan G. (2014) The Influence of the Continental Constitutional Tradition on the Drafting of the Constitution. In: Ruane B., Barniville D., O’Callaghan J. (eds.) Law and Government: A Tribute to Rory Brady. Round Hall, Dublin.
- Jaconelli J. (1992) Human Rights and Irish Home Rule. Irish Jurist 25–27:181 et seq.
- Keane R. (1992) Fundamental Rights In Irish Law: A Note on the Historical Background. In: O'Reilly J. (ed.) Human Rights and Constitutional Law: Essays in Honour of Brian Walsh. Round Hall, Dublin, pp. 25 et seq.

¹⁵⁸ 725 Dáil Debates, Col. 337 (15 December 2010).

- Keane R. (2014) Reconciling Ireland's Sovereignty with Membership of the European Union – the Lessons of Crotty and Pringle. In: Ruane B., Barniville D., O'Callaghan J. (eds.) Law and Government: A Tribute to Rory Brady, Round Hall, Dublin.
- Kelly J.M. (1983) Equality before the Law in Three European Jurisdictions. Irish Jurist 18:259 et seq.
- Kelly J.M. (2003) The Irish Constitution, Fourth edn., Tottel, Dublin.
- Kenny D. (2014) Proportionality, Burden of Proof and Some Signs of Reconsideration. Irish Jurist 49:141 et seq.
- Kiernan F., Brittain S., Donnelly C. (2012) Ireland. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 561–580.
- O'Donnell D. (2014) The Most Curious Forerunner. In: Ruane B., Barniville D., O'Callaghan J. (eds.) Law and Government: A Tribute to Rory Brady. Round Hall, Dublin.
- Temple Lang J. (1987) The Irish Court Case which delayed the Single European Act. CML Rev. 24:709 et seq.
- Tomkin A. (2004) Implementing Community Legislation in to National Law: the Demands of a New Legal Order. Judicial Studies Institute Journal (2):130 et seq.
- Walsh D.P.J. (2009) The European Arrest Warrant in Ireland: Surrendering Our Standards to a European Criminal Law Area. In Bacik I.C., Heffernan L. (eds.) Criminal Law and Procedure: Current Issues and Emerging Trends. First Law, Dublin, pp. 5–34.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Cypriot Constitution Under the Impact of EU Law: An Asymmetrical Formation

Constantinos Kombos and Stéphanie Laulhé Shaelou

Abstract The Constitution of Cyprus (1960) is described in the report as unique and as a hybrid model. On the one hand, it has been seen as one of the world's most rigid and detailed constitutions; on the other hand, some parts are governed by the doctrine of necessity, given the division of the country. Special features include a strong protection of social rights and of the right to property; the protection granted to these and some other rights goes beyond the protection afforded by the ECHR. Cyprus has a mixed model of constitutional review. Fundamental rights based review is strong, with provisions interpreted in favour of the individual in cases of doubt. Resorting to constitutional amendments has become a tool for addressing issues related with the idiosyncrasies of the Cypriot Constitution. The use of this approach has become more frequent in the last two decades, whereas there had been a persistent refusal to amend the Constitution in the previous years. With regard to EU law, the Constitution has been amended to remove conflicts, including by virtue of Art. 1A, modelled loosely on the blanket EU clause of the Irish Constitution. At times, the amendments have even proved to be excessive, e.g. as regards an amendment pertaining to the EU Data Retention Directive that was subsequently annulled. The Constitution has also been amended to remove barriers to the European Arrest Warrant, alas in an incomplete way, at least initially; in parallel, Constantinos Kombos is Associate Professor of Public Law, Law Department, University of Cyprus. e-mail: c.c.kombos@ucy.ac.cy.

Stéphanie Laulhé Shaelou is Professor of European Law and Reform and Head, School of Law, University of Central Lancashire, Cyprus. e-mail: SLaulhe-Shaelou@uclan.ac.uk.

Constantinos Kombos wrote Part 1 and Sects. 2.1, 2.4, 2.7, 2.9–2.13. Stéphanie Laulhé Shaelou wrote Sects. 2.2, 2.3, 2.5, 2.6, 2.8 and Part 3.

All websites accessed 15 July 2015. Text submitted 16 September 2015.

C. Kombos (✉)

Law Department, University of Cyprus, Nicosia, Cyprus
e-mail: c.c.kombos@ucy.ac.cy

S. Laulhé Shaelou

School of Law, University of Central Lancashire, Pyla, Cyprus
e-mail: SLaulhe-Shaelou@uclan.ac.uk the initially rights-protective approach of Cypriot courts has gradually been watered down. The cases regarding EU sugar stocks measures raised issues regarding the principles of legitimate expectations and non-retroactivity of charges. The report raises the issue of a lack of debate about constitutional limits to EU law. It highlights the merits of a dissenting judicial opinion in the so-called ‘bail-in’ case that cautioned against elimination of the rule of law and judicial protection.

Keywords The Constitution of Cyprus · Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation · The Supreme Court of Cyprus · The ‘necessity’ doctrine · Judicial review · Fundamental rights and the rule of law

Data Retention Directive and excessive constitutional amendment

European Arrest Warrant · Defence rights · Judicial review and the statute of limitations · Property rights · Judicial dialogues and absence of constitutional limits Supremacy · ‘Bail-in’ case · Sugar stocks cases and the principles of legitimate expectations and non-retroactivity of charges · International extradition treaties

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The Cypriot constitutional paradigm is unique in content and atypical in character, and it can be argued that as such it has no comparative parallel at the international level. That is manifested in two main ways.

First, there is the peculiarity of the constitutional setting whereby there is a stark and material difference between the provisions of the Constitution of 1960 and their actual application since 1964, when the doctrine of necessity was introduced by the Supreme Court in the landmark judgment Ibrahim.¹ The doctrine of necessity has redefined constitutional law and created two parallel constitutional worlds. On the one hand, there are the constitutional provisions that remain in full formal force; they provide for a bi-communal structure that assumes the presence and participation of both Turkish and Greek Cypriots and for a constitutional system with organs of the state that are reflective of bi-communalism and with a plethora of strict checks and balances on the same basis. This can be called ‘the silent Constitution’. On the other hand, there is the ad hoc suspension of the invalidity rule that attributes hierarchical supremacy to the Constitution of 1960 in those instances that can be justified under the doctrine of necessity. This can be called ‘the pragmatic Constitution’.

Therefore, the primary peculiarity of the Cypriot constitutional system is that both ‘Constitutions’ coexist to the point where a constitutional provision and constitutional reality are two completely different things. For example, Art. 1 provides for a Turkish-Cypriot Vice-President, but no such official has assumed duties since 1963. Moreover, the Constitution in Art. 133(1) provides for a Supreme Constitutional Court composed of three members (a Turkish-Cypriot, a Greek-Cypriot and a presiding non-Cypriot). Since 1964, there is instead a Supreme Court that was founded on the basis of Law 33/64, which included provisions that were in direct contradiction with Art. 133. Nonetheless, the Supreme Court continues to function regardless of the rule in Art. 179 of the Constitution that attributes hierarchical supremacy to the constitutional provisions.

¹ The Attorney General of the Republic v. Mustafa Ibrahim [1964] CLR 195. For analysis see Kombos 2015a, b; Polyviou 2013, pp. 26–64; Polyviou 2015a, pp. 32–124; 2015b.

At this point, it is useful to elaborate on the doctrine of necessity, which was introduced on the basis of the founding premise that the Constitution exists for the state and when the state is in grave danger of collapse, constitutional provisions have to give way. In response to this dilemma, the Supreme Court enabled the suspension of the application of certain fundamental constitutional provisions yet without in any way altering any of those provisions in the formal sense. The doctrine of necessity is an atypical response to an atypical constitutional situation and is now in its fifth decade in Cyprus.² Therefore, the constitutional provisions remain fully effective in theory but where the doctrine of necessity is applied, their content and effectiveness is numbed, neutralised and non-applicable. The preceding approach can be explained by reference to the German theoretical perception that distinguishes between the concept of hierarchical supremacy leading to invalidity (Geltungsvorrang) and the concept of priority in application (Anwendungsvorrang). Where the doctrine of necessity applies, the constitutional norm is rendered non-applicable in an exceptional and extraordinary manner, thus removing the invalidity (Geltungsvorrang) function and, as a corollary, the contested legal norm acquires a de facto priority in application (Anwendungsvorrang).³

Therefore, the classic perception that emphasises the distinction between ‘Constitution’ and ‘constitutional law’ is especially relevant to the Cypriot context, given the fact that the Constitution of 1960 must be read in the light of the doctrine of necessity that, since 1964, offers the pillar on which the Constitution relies for its preservation. In this vein, ‘Constitution’ refers to the constitutional provisions of the Constitution of 1960, while ‘constitutional law’ refers to the application of those provisions through the filter of the doctrine of necessity. Through the Ibrahim judgment, the doctrine of necessity in effect redefined the scope, content, structure and philosophy of the Constitution, yet without formally amending any of its provisions.⁴

The second distinctive character of the Cypriot constitutional context relates to the judicial approach that is characterised by cosmopolitanism and by a traditional reliance on the comparative methodology.⁵ It can be argued that the national system

² Loizou 2001, pp. 12–31; Nicolaou 2000, pp. 105–34; Evriviades 1975; Tornaritis 1980, pp. 54–77.

³ Kombos 2015a, Chap. 2.

⁴ Kombos 2015a.

⁵ Kombos 2015b, Chap. 3; Hatzimihail 2013.

was developed with direct references to foreign jurisdictions. The nexus with comparative law as a special feature of the Cypriot legal order has been explained with reference to historical factors.⁶ These relate to the organic evolution of the legal system, thus classifying Cyprus as part of ‘the mixed-jurisdictions sub-genre’.⁷ This argument is supported with reference to the areas of family law and contract law⁸ where there is a considerable body of evidence pointing to a strong presence of common law principles. For example, Hatzimihail argues that the three main Codes of the Cypriot legal system are directly derived from common law and especially from the Nigerian Criminal Code, the Indian Contract Code and also the Indian Civil Wrongs Code.

In the field of public law, the creation and evolution of administrative law has been marked by the strong influence of the Greek droit administratif.⁹ This is evident in the form of frequent reliance on Greek academic works and on the case law of the Greek Conseil d'Etat, to the point where it is reasonable to argue that it is rare to find a decision in the area of administrative law where reference is not made either directly or indirectly to Greek academic works and/or Greek jurisprudence. It must be noted that the codification of administrative law took place in 1999, and thus until that point the evolution of administrative law by the Supreme Court took place on a case-by-case basis.

The Cypriot legal system has also more generally used the comparative method either as an independent source of law or as an auxiliary tool for supplementing existing constitutional provisions. Reference to foreign jurisdictions extends beyond the Greek context.¹⁰

The use of the comparative method – strong in intensity and dense in frequency – is indicative of a willingness of the Supreme Court to be open to external sources of influence. This characteristic of the judicial approach represents a benchmark for analysing the degree and form of receptiveness that the Supreme Court has illustrated in relation to EU law. The peculiarity relates to the scale and intensity of the use of the comparative method on the one hand, and to the unjustified entrenchment of EU law concepts and principles on the other.

As a corollary, the rather bold opening statement about the uniqueness of the Cypriot constitutional system is not an exaggerated claim influenced by an inherent ‘need’ to give priority and importance to the national constitutional idiosyncrasies and peculiarities. Moreover, the preceding statement is not an expression of constitutional patriotism dictated by an anachronistic inward approach to public law

⁶ Hatzimihail 2013.

⁷ Ibid., p. 39.

⁸ Ibid.

⁹ Hatzimihail 2013, p. 79.

¹⁰ Kombos 2015b, Chap. 3; Hatzimihail 2013.

that is dictated by a pre-existing familiarity with national legal doctrines and thought.¹¹

Overall, the Cypriot constitutional culture reflects the normative and conceptual modifications that have affected the system after the application of the above-mentioned doctrine of necessity that has redefined constitutional law in pragmatic terms.¹² Accordingly, the Cypriot example can be classified in a hybrid category that falls between classical and evolutionary constitutions.¹³ The former tend to have a strict and pure legal character that is founded on rigidity, normative hierarchy and effective judicial protection, while the latter tend to be more evolutionary, historic and political in nature.¹⁴ In the case of Cyprus, the Constitution of 1960 is founded on strict adherence to the hierarchical supremacy of the constitutional provisions (Art. 179), combined with a permanency of the system that is reflected in the long list of unamendable provisions (Art. 182 and Annex III) whereby 48 out of the 199 constitutional provisions have perpetual status. It must be noted that in that list, only one article relates to fundamental human rights (Art. 23 on the right to property). To that effect, De Smith has argued that the Constitution of 1960 is ‘the most rigid, detailed and complicated constitution in the world’,¹⁵ and has also stated that

[t]he Constitution of Cyprus is ... weighted down by checks and balances, procedural and substantive safeguards, guarantees and prohibitions. Constitutionalism has run riot in harness with Communalism. The Government of the Republic must be carried on, but never have the chosen representatives of a political majority been set so daunting an obstacle course by the constitution makers.¹⁶

Therefore, the Cypriot constitutional system is inherently a classical Constitution yet with certain important and influential special features. First, the Constitution is the outcome of international law applied in an unusual form. Specifically, the nature of the process of decolonisation and the actual method for the transfer of power to a newly formed independent state in 1960 were decided in principle and also in detail in Zurich, by Greece and Turkey, in the physical absence of the legally responsible entity that was the colonial power (Great Britain). That paradox is significant, as Great Britain within days of the conclusion of the international agreement between Greece and Turkey stated its acceptance of all the terms with just one single addition in relation to the status of the military bases that it was to retain on the island. The Zurich agreement had 17 points that would form the organisational core of the new state, and those were to create the framework and the content of the new Constitution. Thus, the right of self-determination and, more importantly, the right to exercise primary constitutive power found no expression in the case of Cyprus.

¹¹ Legrand 2002, pp. 246 and 255.

¹² Soulioti 2006.

¹³ Birkinshaw and Kombos 2009; Kombos 2010a.

¹⁴ Besselink 2006, p. 113 et seq.; Albi 2005, p. 22 et seq.

¹⁵ De Smith 1964, p. 285.

¹⁶ Ibid.

No referendum was called and no constituent assembly was formed. Secondly, the Cypriot example is also characterised by the attribution of the role of guardian to Great Britain, Greece and Turkey through the Treaty of Guarantee. Their role included the safeguard of the constitutional status quo, thus creating an impasse in the event of the need to modify the Constitution and its philosophy because of functionality problems. Thus the Cypriot Constitution is simultaneously a classical constitution and also deviates from that blueprint due to the restriction of the exercise of constitutive power at the moment of inception and at any later stage.

At the same time, the Cypriot constitutional system is undoubtedly also an evolutionary constitution because the application of the doctrine of necessity after Ibrahim has created a parallel constitutional world, as explained above. Nonetheless, the maintenance at a formal and normative level of the original Constitution, even after the application of the doctrine of necessity, has the effect of excluding the characterisation of the system as purely evolutionary.

By way of summary, the Cypriot paradigm thus represents a hybrid model that does not fall in either of the two categories in a mutually exclusive manner, but rather belongs to both categories.

1.1.2 The position of the Constitution in such an open and evolving constitutional system that has been redefined in a fundamental way by the doctrine of necessity remains central with regard to the rationale of the judiciary. The rationale and the role of the Constitution remain paramount in the sense of ensuring full effective judicial protection, the rule of law, separation of powers and the principle of legality. The concept of sovereignty and the organisation of the state take a subsidiary role in the approach of the Court for different reasons. As regards the organisation of the state, the doctrine of necessity has an important impact, since it enables the restructuring of state organs in order to ensure functionality. In terms of the concept of sovereignty, the Supreme Court has in the past placed emphasis on the need to preserve the formal status of constitutional provisions by restricting the possibility of amendments as a way to ensure the preservation of the Republic at the level of public international law (see Sect. 1.2). Overall, the emphasis is on the rule of law and effective judicial protection, and these can be considered to be the foundations for the judicial approach towards the Constitution.

The Courts have to strike a delicate balance between the actual constitutional provisions and the application of the doctrine of necessity; in general, two categories of cases can be identified. First, there are the cases where the full application of a constitutional provision is not possible due to the withdrawal of the Turkish-Cypriot Community, thus triggering the application of the doctrine of necessity. Secondly, there are the cases where a constitutional provision has remained unaffected by the withdrawal of the Turkish-Cypriots and, in those instances, the Constitution remains the paramount guiding source. One such area is the protection of fundamental rights that the Constitution fully provides for in Part II.¹⁷ In such cases the doctrine of necessity has remained non-applicable almost entirely¹⁸ because the Court places the centre of gravity on the protection of fundamental rights (see Sect. 2.2).

¹⁷ Kombos and Pantazi 2012; Kombos et al. 2015.

One special feature of the Cypriot Constitution in relation to fundamental rights that can be seen as part of the national constitutional identity is the protection of social rights. The Constitution by a series of articles guarantees the individual certain social and economic rights, which are to be exercised within the framework of the public interest and common good (see Sects. 2.1–2.2).

1.2 The Amendment of Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1–1.2.4 Prior to EU accession, the Constitution was amended in relation to the EU only as regards the independence of the Central Bank. The Fourth Constitutional Amendment, introduced by Law 104 (I)/2002, amended Arts. 147, 118 and 119 of the Constitution to ensure the independence of the Central Bank in terms of restricting the dismissal of the Governor and also to exclude any political supervision of the Bank.

After EU accession, the Constitution was amended in 2006 by the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution Law¹⁹ in order to accommodate the introduction and application of the basic principles of EU law.

By way of the history of its introduction, during the lengthy process of implementation of the acquis communautaire, the need to amend the Constitution was considered, and a formal recommendation was made to extensively amend the Constitution in order to facilitate accession to the European Union.²⁰ However, at first the decision was taken that such a course of action was not necessary for three main reasons that are related to the external recognition of the Republic, to the limits of the doctrine of necessity and to the complexity of the provision governing constitutional amendments. In particular, the Supreme Court initially,²¹ in the 1980s, rejected attempts to amend the Constitution on the basis that the votes of the Turkish-Cypriot Members of Parliament were required under Art. 182(3) of the Constitution. This could have been remedied through the doctrine of necessity. Nonetheless, the approach of the Supreme Court was to reject the use of the doctrine, which is deemed an exceptional measure to be used in the most extreme situations where the existence of the state is endangered. As such, its application

¹⁸ For the rare examples where the opposite applied see Kombos 2015a, Chap. 6.

¹⁹ Law No. 127(I)/2006, Official Gazette No. 4090, 28.7.2006, Annex I(I), p. 1372, available in English at http://www.olc.gov.cy/olc/olc.nsf/all/EC240D2A9413ABB4225793A00403484/\$file/The%20Fifth%20Amendment%20of%20the%20Constitution%20Law%20of%202006.pdf?openelement.

²⁰ Lycourgos 2010, pp. 102–03.

²¹ President of the Republic v. House of Representatives [1985] 3 CLR 2224; President of the Republic v. House of Representatives [1986] 3 CLR 1439.

must have a temporary effect. A constitutional amendment would have a permanent effect, and hence the doctrine of necessity cannot be used to enable the enactment of a constitutional amendment.²² Although that approach was subsequently reversed, the crucial point is that the rationale against constitutional amendments remained relatively strong and influential.

In relation to EU accession, it was thought that a solution would be found through a judicial method whereby the provisions of the Constitution would be interpreted in the light of Art. 169 of the Constitution that refers to the status of international treaties and also in the light of the doctrine of necessity. As a result, it was hoped that the courts would enable the effective and efficient participation of the Republic in the EU by harmoniously construing the obligations arising from EU membership with national constitutional law.

The key in the preferred approach was Art. 169(3) of the Constitution that grants superior force against any conflicting municipal law to ratified Treaties (see Sects. 3.1–3.2). This basic rule was supplemented by the adoption of Law No. 35(III)/2003, with which the House of Representatives approved the ratification of the Accession Treaty. The Law contained the important Art. 4, which stated in clear terms that '[t]he rights and obligations deriving from the Treaty [of Accession] are directly applicable in the Republic and take precedence over any contrary legal or regulatory provision'. The formula used secured the primacy of EU law against all conflicting acts originating from national law, yet it fell short from regulating the relationship between national constitutional law and EU law.

This obvious shortcoming emerged in Attorney General of the Republic v. Costas Constantinou.²³ The case concerned the implementation of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) Framework Decision (FD)²⁴ by Law 133(1)/2004, and the issuing of an order to surrender Mr. Constantinou to the United Kingdom, which will be discussed in greater detail in Sect. 2.3. The Supreme Court held that the Framework Decision could not prevail over Art. 11 of the Constitution that expressly prohibits the extradition of Cypriot nationals,²⁵ despite the fact that the Supreme Court acknowledged the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) on the principle of primacy of EU law. Accordingly, the Supreme Court declared the incompatibility of the national implementing law with the Constitution, which according to Art. 179 of the Constitution renders the law invalid. Moreover, the Supreme Court in effect indirectly dictated the need for a constitutional amendment without stating so, thus giving the impression that the solution remains within the exclusive powers of the other branches of the state. This approach is in line with the principle of separation of powers, but it also creates an understanding that the subsequent normative accommodation of the primacy of EU

²² Kombos 2015a, Chap. 6.

²³ [2005] 1 CLR 1356.

²⁴ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

²⁵ Attorney General v. Afamis 1 R.S.C.C 121.

law with regard to the Constitution must be full in order to ensure future compliance with the yardstick that the Court applied in Constantinou. It is in this light that one must read the subsequent Fifth Constitutional Amendment that, as will be explained below, had an unnecessarily extensive scope.

The Court on first sight safeguarded the hierarchy of the Constitution, but at the same time it opened the door for the redefinition of that hierarchical position. This was perhaps a clear outcome dictated by express constitutional provisions that limited the room for harmonious interpretation, but at the same time the open-ended invitation to amend the Constitution without defining the limits of what could be acceptable represents a serious shortcoming. Such an approach contradicts the traditional vigilance that the Supreme Court has shown with regard to constitutional amendments. In addition, the decision could be contrasted with that of the German Bundesverfassungsgericht in the Lisbon Judgment,²⁶ which provides an interesting example of the ‘proactive approach’, representing a judicial pronouncement – at the earliest possible opportunity – on what would interfere with the Constitution and the separation of powers.

In terms of the content and character of the Fifth Constitutional Amendment, which, as noted earlier, was introduced (two years) after EU accession in 2006, the original idea was to ensure the primacy of EU law in one single article of the Constitution that would then function as the point of reference for any incompatibility arising between EU law and national constitutional law. This is now Art. 1A of the Constitution. Nonetheless, it must be noted that despite the fact that introduction of an umbrella provision was the selected model, the provisions of the Fifth Constitutional Amendment took a completely different form in terms of methodology and approach. There were instead a nexus of constitutional provisions that were amended in addition to the introduction of the single umbrella provision: in addition to Art. 1A, a paragraph was added to Arts. 140 and 169, and alterations were made to Arts. 11(2) and 179 of the Constitution.

Specifically, Art. 1A states:

No provision of this Constitution shall be considered as invalidating laws enacted, acts done or measures adopted by the Republic necessitated by its obligations as a Member State of the European Union or shall prevent Regulations, Directives or other acts or binding measures of a legislative character adopted by the European Union or by the European Communities or by their institutions or by their competent bodies under the provisions of the treaties founding the European Communities or the European Union, from having legal effect in the Republic.

It is submitted that there is a crucial problem with Art. 1A, and that problem has both formal and substantial aspects. Formally, as explained above, Art. 182(1) of the Constitution, read in combination with Annex III of the Constitution, creates a long list of non-amendable articles of the Constitution, which includes Art. 1. The addition of para. A to Art. 1 is only indirectly justified in the Preamble of the Fifth Constitutional Amendment Law as not amounting to a constitutional amendment of a basic constitutional provision. It is submitted that this approach is not correct and is at best playing with formalism, because an addition to any article of the Constitution cannot be construed as anything other than a constitutional amendment. At the same time, the insertion in Art. 1 was deliberate in order to pre-empt any future constitutional amendment. Moreover, it is submitted that the issue is made clear by Art. 182 of the Constitution:

²⁶ BVerfG, Judgment of 30 June 2009 - 2 BvE 2/08 - Rn. (1-421).

1. The Articles or parts of Articles of this Constitution set out in Annex III hereto which have been incorporated from the Zurich Agreement dated 11th February, 1959, are the basic Articles of this Constitution and cannot, in any way, be amended, whether by way of variation, addition or repeal.
2. Subject to para. 1 of this Article any provision of this Constitution may be amended, whether by way of variation, addition or repeal, as provided in para. 3 of this Article.
3. Such amendment shall be made by a law passed by a majority vote comprising at least two-thirds of the total number of the Representatives belonging to the Greek Community and at least two-thirds of the total number of the Representatives belonging to the Turkish Community.

Accordingly, there is a clear question about the constitutionality of the Law introducing the Fifth Constitutional Amendment. There has never before or since been any amendment of a basic constitutional provision.

Moreover, besides Art. 1A, further amendments were introduced to other parts of the Constitution – Arts. 11(2), 140, 169 and 179.

Lastly, it would have been expected that the Supreme Court would have at least examined even as obiter the nature and even validity of the introduction of Art. 1A; this has never happened so far. Yet, it is imperative that the Supreme Court take a position on the matter, as the issue exceeds by far the matter of primacy of EU law.

Furthermore, it would have been preferable to implement the choice of introducing an umbrella clause by amending Art. 179, which guarantees the supremacy of the Constitution and, in terms of structural coherency, it would have represented the obvious place for such a clause. As to the possible argument that Art. 179 could be further amended in the future and thus it would not present a permanent solution, the answer has three parts. First, it is not axiomatic that the Republic should make the acceptance of the principle of primacy of EU law perpetually permanent, as it can theoretically decide to exit the Union. Secondly, the introduction of the principle of primacy of EU law in Art. 179 would have the same permanency as that of Art. 1A, since nothing would restrict the House of Representatives from repealing that paragraph. Thirdly, one must balance the importance of accommodating the principle of primacy of EU law in a permanent way with the need to safeguard the non-amendable nature of the fundamental constitutional provisions, which is by far and without question the most important consideration.

The next step in the normative solution was to complement Art. 1A with the amendment of the non-basic provisions to be found in Arts. 169, 179, 140 and 11 of the Constitution. Article 179, in its amended form, reads as follows:

1. Without prejudice to the provisions of Art. 1A, the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the Republic.
2. No law or decision of the House of Representatives or of any of the Communal Chambers and no act or decision of any organ, authority or person in the Republic exercising executive power or any administrative function shall in any way be repugnant to, or inconsistent with, any of the provisions of this Constitution or any obligation imposed on the Republic as a result of its participation as a Member State in the European Union.

In terms of the effect of the preceding provision, Lycourgos correctly observes that:

[t]he combined effect of the new Art. 1A and of Art. 179 as amended, is that not only Community law but also EU law has been recognized as taking precedence over the Constitution. In that respect, the principle enshrined in the Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus preceded even the case law of the ECJ, which never expressly held that the acts adopted under the Union's third pillar – as it was at the time the fifth constitutional amendment – had precedence over national constitutional provisions.²⁷

However, from the preceding approach arises a serious substantive problem: it had, at the time, the effect that the Republic of Cyprus gave a more extensive scope and effect to the principle of primacy of EU law than what the jurisprudence of the ECJ required. Although the issue has lost its relevance since the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty, before that, the EU and the EC dimension had clearly been distinguished under Union law, with the ECJ jurisdiction having been limited in relation to the Second and Third Pillars. This in a comparative perspective is perhaps unprecedented. The Supreme Court remained silent on the issue.

The remaining amendments concerned Art. 11(2) in relation to extradition under the European Arrest Warrant, which will be explored in Sect. 2.3, and Arts. 140 and 169, which will subsequently be explored here.

Under Art. 140, as applied after 1964, the President of the Republic may, prior to the promulgation of any law or decision of the House of Representatives, refer to the Supreme Court for its opinion as to whether such act is inconsistent with the Constitution. With the Fifth Constitutional Amendment, this power was extended to the compatibility of a law or decision of the House of Representatives with the ‘law of the European Communities or of the European Union’.

The difficulty arises from the way in which the power of the President is exercised in practice. Traditionally, the Art. 140 power was exercised in instances of a clear difference of opinion between the President and the Parliament and on matters having a non-negligible political dimension and/or affecting the balance of powers and/or impacting on the proper interpretation of the Constitution. In addition, the Attorney General advises the President on the propriety of making use of Art. 140 and in practice, the view of the Attorney General is crucial. Compliance with the often technical requirements of the obligations arising from EU law creates a different setting, where the advisory role of the Attorney General is expected to be broadened; it marks a considerable shift towards a stronger advisory role of the Attorney General.

²⁷ Lycourgos 2010, p. 105.

As regards the extension of this jurisdiction to compatibility with EU obligations, it must be stressed that the point of reference for the exercise of the jurisdiction by the Supreme Court changes. The issue could very likely become one of interpretation of what the EU obligations entail, thus opening the way for a preliminary reference to the CJEU. In the event of a preliminary reference, the status of the law will remain pending until the CJEU responds, thus creating, as Lycourgos correctly argues, an issue of propriety and compliance with the principle of separation of powers.²⁸ The alternative for the Supreme Court would be to deliberately avoid making a preliminary reference, thus distancing the Court from the correct application of Art. 267 TFEU. Therefore, the amendment of Art. 140 of the Constitution seems to be creating more problems than it solves.

One such notable example was evident in President of the Republic v. House of Representatives,²⁹ which concerned non-compliance with Directive 2000/13/EC on the approximation relating to the labelling, presentation and advertising of food-stuffs,³⁰ which required that all national implementing measures relating to the sale of genetically modified foodstuffs in supermarkets had to be notified to the European Commission and the other Member States. Moreover, only after three months following that notification and only if the Commission did not issue a negative opinion could the national measures be introduced. An amendment to the Foodstuffs (Control and Sale) Law came within the scope of the Directive, but the notification procedure had not been followed. As a result and on the advice of the Attorney General, the President proceeded to refer the Law via the amended Art. 140 of the Constitution. The Supreme Court found that there was an apparent procedural error that resulted in non-compliance with the EU obligations. The finding in this case was relatively straightforward, as the issue was one of apparent procedural infringement; however the same cannot be said in relation to more complex situations.

One such complex situation arose in Reference 2/2013, President of the Republic v. House of Representatives.³¹ The case concerned a conflict between a Law adopted in 2012 on the protection of the seaside and the Services Directive.³² The national Law, in which priority was given to the owner or operator of a seaside hotel or recreational business in relation to the tender procedure for leasing the relevant part of the beach, went against the Directive's requirement that the licensing system should not be discriminatory and disproportionate. In this case, which will be explored in greater detail in Sect. 2.2, the President referred the

²⁸ Ibid., p. 107–08.

²⁹ [2008] 3 CLR 118.

³⁰ [2000] OJ L 109/29.

³¹ 9 May 2014.

³² Directive 2006/123/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December 2006 on services in the internal market, [2006] OJ L 376/36.

incompatibility to the Supreme Court under Art. 140 of the Constitution. The decision of the Supreme Court made note of the CJEU case law that the Attorney General cited in his argumentation, but at the same time the Court did not make any specific reference to those cases. Moreover, the issue concerned the application of the principle of proportionality, which by nature has an element of subjectivity and creates room for different approaches. However, the Supreme Court was unanimous in deciding that there was an apparent incompatibility between the Law and the Directive. The matter in this case was one of substance rather than procedure, and the Court made the correct assessment. Nevertheless, the assessment was much more complex than that necessitated in the earlier case, which gives rise to concerns relating to the selection of instances where Art. 140 is used and the manner of deciding such cases in the context of a preliminary reference.

Finally, there is also a technical issue regarding a gap that has emerged in relation to secondary legislation (i.e. regulations, etc., introduced by the executive but the approval of which is to be decided by the legislature) that is often the means used for completing the implementation of directives. Such measures cannot be the subject of a reference under Art. 140, since under Arts. 51 and 140 of the Constitution, the President is not required to sign them. The issue came to the surface in the aftermath of the Supreme Court decision in the same case, Reference 2/2013. The House of Representatives had modified regulations submitted by the executive that were intended to comply with the provisions of the Services Directive in the context of the licensing system that would apply for seaside establishments wishing to take commercial advantage of the seaside (sunbeds, water sports, etc.). The relevant regulations that the House of Representatives had adopted introduced a discriminatory scheme whereby it was considered an advantage if an applicant for a license had experience (5 years) in providing services in the specific area. Therefore, despite the earlier ruling of the Supreme Court and the clear provision of the Directive, the adopted regulations reintroduced a discriminatory system. According to Cypriot constitutional law, secondary legislation cannot be the subject of a reference under Art. 140. Consequently, the problem of incompatibility arose and resulted in the Ministry of Interior asking the local authorities to not comply with the regulations on the basis of the ECJ decision in Fratelli Costanzo.³³ There the ECJ held that ‘administrative authorities, including municipal authorities, are under the same obligation as a national court to apply the provisions of... [a] Directive and to refrain from applying provisions of national law which conflict with them’,³⁴ provided that the relevant provision has direct effect.³⁵ According to related case law of the ECJ, the scope of application must be construed in the light of the principles of national procedural autonomy and national institutional autonomy. Therefore, an interesting gap in relation to Art. 140 of the Constitution exists that creates further doubts as to its effectiveness, given its non-applicability to secondary legislation. Moreover, attempts are made to fill the gap in by relying on the Fratelli Costanzo rule which has, as its basic precondition, the direct effect of the EU law provision. But the issue then arises as to who has the authority to make such a complicated determination, since the obligation to apply such secondary legislation often rests on administrative authorities. This creates issues of legal certainty, expertise and separation of powers. All of these matters surfaced in the example in question and, at the time of writing, the outcome is uncertain.

³³ Case C-103/88 Fratelli Costanzo v. Commune di Milano [1989] ECR 01839.

³⁴ Ibid., para. 33.

³⁵ Ibid., paras. 29–32.

To summarise, it must be questioned whether the constitutional amendment of Art. 140 of the Constitution was necessary given the problems arising from its application and the rarity of its use.

The Fifth Constitutional Amendment additionally added a new para. 4 to Art. 169 to the Constitution, which reads as follows:

4. The Republic may exercise every choice and discretion provided for in the Treaties establishing the European Communities and the Treaty on European Union and in any Treaties which amend or replace the above and which are concluded by the Republic.

This provision and its rationale are once again forward-thinking. The provision shields the national act related with the exercise of the option from scrutiny as to its constitutionality. The question is whether it should, given that there is a clear distinction between obligation and option. The ECJ founded the creation of primacy of EU law on the basis of a paramount need for the effectiveness, uniformity and structural coherence of the legal system of the Union. The justifying rationale for the principle of primacy of EU law, however, does not apply to the exercise of options by Member States before they decide to make use of their discretion. Therefore, the amendment of Art. 169 cannot be justified with reference to the need to comply with the principle of primacy of EU law.

The Constitution was subsequently further amended in 2010 (Sixth Amendment, of Art. 17 of the Constitution) with regard to the Data Retention Directive³⁶ in the aftermath of the Supreme Court judgment in Alexandrou; the details will be provided in Sect. 2.4.

Finally, Art. 11 of the Constitution was amended on a further occasion in 2013 by introducing the Seventh Amendment of the Constitution via Law 68(I)/2003, in order to allow the extradition of Cypriot citizens in connection to events that took place at any time even before accession to the EU; the details will be provided in Sect. 2.3.

In general, the opinions of legal scholars were not requested during the process of introducing the above amendments, with the exception of the Fifth Constitutional amendment for which consultation took place, at an earlier stage of the discussion, about the need for a full revision of the Constitution. At the time of writing, no other constitutional amendments relating to EU law are being discussed; however there are areas where such discussion could be useful. For instance, the whole logic of the Fifth Constitutional Amendment, as explained previously, needs to be re-examined since it is problematic and overly expansive. In addition, the Sixth Constitutional Amendment is now equally problematic given that the Data Retention Directive has been annulled by the CJEU.

³⁶ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The provisions on supremacy of EU law were provided in Sect. 1.2.

1.3.2 The issue of the transfer or delegation of powers to the EU has not been at the epicentre of the debate in Cyprus because the prevailing view sees participation in the EU as a matter of political determination that was expressed through accession to the Union. Therefore, any delegation or transfer of competences is understood as an expression of the will of the sovereign state and as a matter of choice that attracts the full accommodation of the international obligations of the Republic. If such membership requires the effective transfer or delegation of powers and if that in practice commands the amendment of the Constitution, then any such adjustment is perceived as being nothing more than the expression of the Republic's will. On this basis, the Fifth Constitutional Amendment and the previous decision of the Supreme Court in Constantinou can both be explained as an expression of the intention to participate in the EU system and as a voluntary limitation of powers.

1.3.3 Nonetheless, the extensive scope of the Fifth Constitutional Amendment, as explained in detail above, is so open-ended that it significantly constrains any room for disagreement. This is problematic because the Supreme Court has so far failed to develop a reservation formula that would set limits as to what is constitutionally acceptable. Moreover, this approach places Cyprus in the minority of Member States that have accepted the principle of primacy of EU law without serious reservations. Put differently, the Cypriot approach is purely national in nature and founded on what the Constitution provides in the aftermath of the amendment. There is no judicial elaboration as to the limitations that apply to the scope of the relevant constitutional amendment.

There has only been one notable attempt to discuss the limits of the principle of primacy of EU law and of the transfer of powers to the EU, the dissenting opinion of Judge Eerotokritou in the 'bail in' case. The case concerned the imposition of a levy amounting to partial confiscation of all unsecured deposits, i.e. below 100,000 EUR, in the two systemic Cypriot banks. The dissenting judge underlined the significance of ensuring, through judicial review, that any European and national mechanism forming the foundation for the imposition of a bail-in, respects fundamental rights and the rule of law. The case and the dissenting opinion will be explored in greater detail in Sect. 2.7.3, drawing parallels with the German Constitutional Court's Honeywell judgment.

1.3.4 As seen in Sect. 1.2, the amended Art. 179(1) provides that '[w]ithout prejudice to the provisions of Art. 1A, the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the Republic'. The Constitution has to give way in case of a conflict with EU law, and that would logically trigger a constitutional amendment. As seen with the EAW saga, the rectification of the incompatibility took years.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1–1.4.2 In relation to applicable rules that govern the participation of the national parliament in the EU decision-making processes, in the case of Cyprus, no such rules exist. Moreover, no referendum has ever taken place in relation to the EU nor has there been any discussion about one.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 As explained in greater detail in Sect. 1.2, on the one hand, the guiding background premise has been the traditional reluctance of the judiciary to approve constitutional amendments; on the other hand, the Supreme Court through its ruling in Constantinou in effect required the introduction of a constitutional amendment that would govern the relationship between EU law and the national constitutional order. The outcome was the introduction of the Fifth Constitutional Amendment that has an overly expansive scope and leaves little, if any, room for the subsequent establishment of specific boundaries for the relationship between EU law and Cypriot constitutional law. By way of an additional point of background information, the approach behind the amendment was modelled on the method of Art. 29(4)(3) of the Irish Constitution (now Art. 29(3)(10)).³⁷ The original idea was to ensure the primacy of EU law in one single article of the Constitution that would then function as the point of reference for any incompatibility of EU law with national constitutional law. That is now Art. 1A. Nonetheless, it must be noted that despite the fact that the introduction of an umbrella provision was based on the Irish model, the provisions of the Fifth Constitutional Amendment eventually took a completely different form in terms of methodology and approach. There is instead a nexus of constitutional provisions that were amended in addition to the introduction of the single umbrella provision inserted in the Constitution (Arts. 11, 140, 169, 179).

³⁷ Lycourgos 2010, pp. 104–106.

1.5.2 The Cypriot example has two distinct phases in relation to EU-related constitutional amendments. The first phase, which lasted until 2006, was characterised by the conscious decision not to introduce a constitutional amendment in relation to EU law. The rationale related to the pre-existing caution towards constitutional amendments for reasons having to do with the doctrine of necessity, the protection of the international status of the Republic, political reasons and the complexity of the procedure for constitutional amendments. The second phase is characterised by the introduction of the Fifth Constitutional Amendment that has been extremely open and accommodating for EU law.

In relation to the issue of ‘waning constitutionalism’ raised in the Questionnaire, such argumentation has not appeared in the Cypriot context as a factor that could influence the decisions during either the first or the second phase. The rationale for both periods has been pragmatic and has reflected the approach that the Supreme Court had adopted at different stages. The shift in the judicial approach in the second phase was influenced by the clear clash between competing supremacies, namely the primacy of EU law and the supremacy of the Constitution. As a result, the judicial reasoning was founded on formal and substantive hierarchy and mirrored considerations relating to functionality and pragmatism.

1.5.3 The symbiosis of the national constitutional order with supranational legal orders that have dense constitutional characteristics is becoming more difficult as the areas of coexistence start to include fields traditionally associated with the state. The need to define and regulate the boundaries between the legal orders is becoming pressing, and the introduction of constitutional amendments represents the most preferable option for two reasons. First, the regulation of the relationship thus stems from the expression of the will of the state that is reflected in the Constitution. This is significant for symbolic and substantive reasons, as it justifies the transfer of powers from the national level to the supranational level by direct reference to the national Constitution. In addition, any amendment would be introduced on the basis of the usually enhanced procedures that require a higher threshold of democratic approval, thus attributing a much-needed element of legitimacy to the relationship between the national and the supranational legal orders. Secondly, the solution of introducing a constitutional amendment is the most functional way to delimit the boundaries, reinforce legal certainty and provide the opportunity to express any reservations that the state decides to apply as to those limits. Such considerations are specifically relevant in relation to the primacy of EU law, fundamental rights and the allocation of competences.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 The position of fundamental rights in the Cypriot constitutional system is central both in terms of their provision and effective protection. The 1960 Constitution contains an extensive bill of rights in Part II ('Fundamental Rights and Liberties'), which in terms of content is similar³⁸ to that of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and, as Kyriacou³⁹ and Pikis⁴⁰ rightly observe, the provisions of which in 'certain instances are wider in scope and substance compared to their counterparts found in the [Convention]'.⁴¹ Moreover, the Constitution by a series of articles guarantees certain social and economic rights⁴² to the individual which are to be exercised within the framework of the public interest and common good.⁴³ The relevant provisions are detailed and comprehensive, and the judiciary has been extremely active in ensuring the full protection of these rights.

It can be argued that the level and content of the judicial protection of fundamental rights has been developed in direct connection with the ECHR system, in which Cyprus participated as part of the colony regime even before independence in 1960. The ECHR has been used as a guiding factor for establishing the level of protection and it has become particularly relevant where there has been ambiguity either in the constitutional text⁴⁴ or in the facts of a specific case. Moreover, the Cypriot system has exceeded the standard that the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) requires in numerous cases, with the Supreme Court making direct reference to the need to adopt a higher standard of protection.⁴⁵

In relation to general principles of law, this concept is present and active in the Cypriot system of public law, either as an independent source of law or as an auxiliary tool used for supplementing existing constitutional provisions. Such general principles can be directly derived from the common law that provides the early foundation for the Cypriot legal system (due process, audi alteram partem);

³⁸ Kombos and Pantazi 2012.

³⁹ Kyriacou 2010, p. 2.

⁴⁰ Pikis 2006, p. 43.

⁴¹ Kyriacou 2010, p. 2.

⁴² Tornaritis 1968, clarifies that Professor Bridel, who assisted in the drafting of the Constitution, recommended the incorporation of the liberty to work, trade and industry, liberty of contract and the right to strike.

⁴³ Tornaritis 1968, p. 2.

⁴⁴ For example, Attorney General v. Afamis, n. 25.

⁴⁵ Charalambous and others v. Republic, Joined cases 1480/2011, 11 June 2014; Police v. Ekdotiki Eteria [1982] 2 CLR 63; David Scattergood v. Attorney General [2005] 1 CLR 142 (see Sect. 2.3 below).

they are primarily procedural in nature yet with a substantive effect on the essence of the basic right to fair trial. Nonetheless, the influence of such principles has remained limited due to the fact that the Constitution exhaustively covers the rights to fair trial and personal liberty in a combined manner through Arts. 11, 12 and 30.

In terms of general principles not resulting directly from the Constitution, the most notable example is the principle of proportionality. Proportionality has been given an elevated status through the codification of the general principles of administrative law in Art. 52 of Law 158(I)/99. Nonetheless, proportionality already had a constitutional position as an unwritten principle of law and has been referred to by the Supreme Court in the landmark judgment Ibrahim (see Sect. 1.1) as an essential criterion to be met in order for the constitutionally crucial doctrine of necessity to be applicable. The overall effect is that the principle of proportionality is not just a general principle of law with constitutional status, but it also constitutes an integral criterion for the assessment of the foundation of the Constitution post 1964, that is, the doctrine of necessity.

2.1.2 The Constitution in Art. 33 provides for the conditions under which restrictions can be imposed on rights:

1. Subject to the provisions of this Constitution relating to a state of emergency, the fundamental rights and liberties guaranteed by this Part shall not be subjected to any other limitations or restrictions than those in this Part provided.
2. The provisions of this Part relating to such limitations or restrictions shall be interpreted strictly and shall not be applied for any purpose other than those for which they have been prescribed.

Further considerations pertaining to Art. 33 will be explored in Sect. 2.2.

2.1.3 The Cypriot Constitution makes no express reference to the concept of the rule of law, but this has not stopped the judiciary from positioning the concept at the epicentre of our constitutional law.

The clearest example of the general approach towards the rule of law can be found in the above-mentioned landmark judgment Ibrahim where the Supreme Court introduced the doctrine of necessity. The foundation for the decision was that after the withdrawal of the Turkish-Cypriots and the resignation of the two foreign judges, the administration of justice could not function, which thus directly affected the rights of the individual in a negative way. The consequence of this was to nullify the meaning of the rule of law that was defined as being inherently inter-linked with judicial supervision and effective judicial protection, fundamental rights and the principle of legality. This approach, which led to the introduction of the doctrine of necessity, has since permeated the Cypriot legal system.

In terms of justiciability, both parties to legal proceedings and the national courts frequently use the principle of the rule of law, but the principle is not independently justiciable. Rather, the invocation of the rule of law is combined with other legal principles that are content-specific in a manner that is constitutionally precise. The general perception as to the rule of law is that it represents the fundamental principle for the legal system and it forms part of all other constitutional principles that are to be construed with the principle of the rule of law in mind.

One such manifestation of the rule of law is access to courts, especially in relation to judicial review proceedings. Article 146 of the Constitution guarantees access to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as an administrative court in a liberal and generous way.⁴⁶ Specifically, Art. 146(2) states that '[s]uch a recourse may be made by a person whose any existing legitimate interest, which he has either as a person or by virtue of being a member of a Community, is adversely and directly affected by such decision or act or omission'.

Furthermore, the principle of the rule of law is present in the constitutional provisions that prohibit retroactivity (Art. 24(3) in relation to tax law and Art. 12(1) in relation to criminal law, see Sect. 2.3.2) and that guarantee legal certainty. Articles 3 and 104 require the publication of all laws as an essential requirement for their validity.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 In Cyprus, the balancing exercise pertaining to the protection of classic constitutional and/or fundamental rights must initially be considered with respect to the application of the doctrine of necessity (as developed in more detail in Sect. 1.1). In Alloupas v. National bank of Greece,⁴⁷ it was held by the majority of the Supreme Court of Cyprus that constitutional rights may only be restricted on the express basis of the Constitution and by applying the ‘strictest possible’ criteria of necessity (does a state of necessity exist) and of proportionality (are such restrictions proportionate to the necessity).⁴⁸ As seen in Sect. 2.1.1, the principle of proportionality has been granted constitutional status as an ‘unwritten principle of law’, and it was referred to by the Supreme Court as an ‘essential criterion’ in the application of the doctrine of necessity. If the Supreme Court initially gave a rather wide interpretation to the principle of proportionality, starting with the Ibrahim case, it did so when the application of the doctrine of necessity ‘did not concern the exercise of legislative powers by the executive, or the restriction of fundamental individual rights’.⁴⁹ The Court also gave a narrow interpretation to the principle of proportionality and refused to consider administrative acts of a final nature, decided by an administrative organ out of its own discretion (not deriving from a law) as ⁴⁶ See Kombos 2010b.

⁴⁷ [1983] 1 CLR 55.

⁴⁸ Emilianides 2013, p. 47.

⁴⁹ Ibid., pp. 42–4.

justified on the basis of the doctrine of necessity,⁵⁰ for the reason that administrative acts are not general in nature and are therefore more likely to be arbitrary. As a result, '[a]dministrative acts of a final nature could not themselves be justified on the grounds of the doctrine of necessity; however, administrative acts of a final nature which were based on a law, which was justified on the grounds of the doctrine of necessity, would also be justified'.⁵¹ Thus, it appears that the protection of constitutionally safeguarded fundamental rights in Cyprus has remained largely outside of the scope of the doctrine of necessity, as also noted in Sect. 1.1.2 of the Report.

It was seen in Sect. 2.1 that the Constitution contains a detailed and extensive list of rights, which at times are more extensive than comparable rights under the ECHR, and that in the case of doubt, the interpretation favours the individual over the state. According to Emilianides, the protection of the rule of law is a 'cardinal principle' of the Constitution.⁵² This, combined with the supremacy of the Constitution, means that 'the courts have the power to examine the constitutionality of both laws and action of the administration and that no law, regulation or administrative act may be inconsistent with the Constitution'.⁵³ This means that a trial court (i.e. any court other than the Supreme Court) has the power to declare unconstitutional any law which is contrary to the provisions safeguarding individual human rights as set out in the Constitution. This is the result of the mixed character that applies to the system of review of constitutionality in Cyprus after 1964 whereby the examination of claims of unconstitutionality is diffused and decentralised. This also entails that constitutionally safeguarded fundamental rights must be interpreted in favour of the individual protected rather than the state in case of doubt.⁵⁴

As far as restrictions or limitations to constitutionally safeguarded fundamental rights are concerned, it is stated in Art. 33(1) of the Constitution that these can only be contained in express provisions of the Constitution (see Sect. 2.1.2). A careful review of Part II of the Constitution reveals that such restrictions or limitations can also be contained in legislation within the limits of the Constitution itself,⁵⁵ as introduced by the House of Representatives or 'deemed to be part of Cypriot law under Art. 188 of the Constitution'⁵⁶ or deriving from EU law,⁵⁷ subject to the ⁵⁰ See Mesaritou v. The Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation [1972] 3 CLR 100; Theodorides v. Plousiou [1976] 3 CLR 319.

⁵¹ Emilianides 2013, p. 44.

⁵² Ibid., p. 53. See Sect. 1.1.2 of this Report. See also Loizou (2001) (in Greek).

⁵³ Emilianides 2013, p. 53.

⁵⁴ Fina (Cyprus) Ltd v. The Republic [1962] 3 RSCC 26; see Emilianides 2013, p. 146.

⁵⁵ E.g. more recently President of the Republic v. House of Representatives [2000] 3 CLR 238 (in Greek).

⁵⁶ Police v. Hondrou and Another [1962] 3 RSCC 82.

⁵⁷ See Emilianides 2013, p. 146.

general principles inter alia of reasonableness and proportionality. Article 33(2) of the Constitution expressly provides that such restrictions or limitations must be interpreted strictly and cannot be applied ‘for any purpose other than those for which they have been prescribed’, thereby providing a general framework of necessity and/or proportionality to the restriction/limitation to constitutionally safeguarded fundamental rights. This provision of the Constitution must be read in conjunction with Art. 35 of the Constitution, which casts a vertical duty on the state and its various branches of government (within the limits of their respective competence) to ensure the efficient application of Part II of the Constitution vis-à-vis the beneficiaries of these fundamental rights.

Additionally, it should be noted that the fundamental rights safeguarded under the Constitution are minimum rights. Rights may be further protected or new rights may be established through legislation, in which case these are not protected as constitutional rights but as ordinary rights.⁵⁸ This last point may have direct implications for the protection afforded to rights deriving from EU law and their implementation in the national legal order.

While EU law (all provisions) should take precedence over conflicting constitutional provisions as a result of Art. 1A of the Constitution, the use of the EU Charter by the Supreme Court in its case law is far less developed than the (much older) use of the ECHR. This could perhaps also be explained by looking at the overall practice of the supremacy of EU law by the courts in Cyprus, especially by the Supreme Court. It could be said that despite the reference to Art. 1A in Art. 179 of the Constitution and because the Constitution in Cyprus still provides expressly for its own supremacy, considerations of EU law and the exercise of judicial review arising as a result of the application of EU law in Cyprus appear prima facie to be encompassed within the fabric of the Constitution. This may be the subject of some academic debate in Cyprus,⁵⁹ but in judicial and/or practical terms, the overall approach of the Supreme Court can be described as inconsistent and as sometimes ignoring EU law (or even the ECHR) to concentrate merely on the protection of fundamental rights in accordance with express constitutional provisions.⁶⁰

⁵⁸ Emilianides 2013, p. 146.

⁵⁹ Emilianides argues that EU and EC law are considered an integral part of the Constitution, Emilianides 2013, p. 54; contra Kombos & Pantazi 2012, p. 309: ‘the hierarchical rule resulting from Art. 179 does not apply to EU law’; see also Lycourgos 2010, p. 101. For a detailed analysis, see also Laulhé Shaelou 2010a, pp. 133–40 who concludes: ‘The legislative objective of removing the potential conflict between EC/EU law and the Constitution appears a priori achieved; it will however no doubt face the judicial scrutiny of the Cypriot courts through cases on the enforcement of Community law rights in Cyprus’, p. 139.

⁶⁰ Interview with Dr. Demetrios Hadjihambis, former President of the Supreme Court of Cyprus (June 2013–July 2014) and judge at the Supreme Court (1999–2013), 9 January 2015.

Some of the wide-ranging areas where the Ombudsman of Cyprus and equality bodies in Cyprus have pointed out that national law needs to better ensure fundamental freedoms and the principle of non-discrimination arising from EU law include e.g. the right of entry and residence for same-sex partners and/or the third country national spouse of an EU citizen, the free movement of workers, social assistance, and detention or expulsion orders of EU nationals.⁶¹ The courts in particular would need to revise their role and adopt a more teleological or holistic approach, as legal actions brought before them normally fall within the (narrow) ambit of the judicial control of administrative acts under Art. 146 of the Constitution and do not entail any balancing exercise established within the fabric of the Constitution for the protection of constitutionally safeguarded fundamental rights.⁶²

In general, the protection of constitutionally safeguarded fundamental rights in the Cypriot legal order, whether ‘classic’ fundamental rights, economic or social rights, has always been at the core of the case law of the Cypriot courts, independently of the supremacy of EU law. As such, the balancing of fundamental rights with economic rights can be said to amount to a ‘routine’ exercise for the Cypriot courts within the fabric of the Constitution, to which EU law ‘merely’ added one more – albeit fundamental in nature – dimension, thereby increasing the likelihood of constitutional issues arising. Whereas a full and comprehensive review of the balancing exercise between these rights within the fabric of the Constitution would be beyond the scope of this Report and has been explored elsewhere,⁶³ drawing general trends could prove useful. The balancing exercise usually involves a strict (but careful and delicate) construction of the restrictions/limitations to such rights on the basis of Arts. 33 and 35 of the Constitution and/or in accordance with the case law of the ECHR (in the case of a collision of classic rights).⁶⁴ It is also useful to mention that the collision between social rights ‘per se’, especially within the framework of the freedom of movement that is so central to the case law of the CJEU, and the right to strike, have not arisen as such in the Cypriot legal order.⁶⁵ This could however be an area of potential conflict between the Cypriot and the EU legal orders given the attachment to social rights of the ⁶¹ See in particular Trimikliniotis 2013 for a review of recent domestic case law related to these issues, pp. 121–140.

⁶² Administrative recourses under Art. 146 fall under the exclusive revisional jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, both first instance and appellate, are strictly limited to the review of the legality of an administrative act, decision or omission, and exclude any review of the case on the merits. See Emilianides 2013, p. 197.

⁶³ For a detailed review of the collision between classic rights and/or socio-economic and cultural rights, including within these sub-categories of rights, see Kombos and Pantazi 2012, pp. 338–46. For a thorough consideration of the balancing exercise between economic freedoms and fundamental rights in the European public order with an emphasis on Cyprus, see Laulhé Shaelou 2011.

⁶⁴ Kombos and Pantazi 2012, p. 344.

⁶⁵ Kombos and Pantazi 2012, p. 343.

former⁶⁶ and to free movement of the latter.⁶⁷ It has been suggested that the overall balancing exercise currently taking place in the Cypriot legal order, whereby the Supreme Court ‘advances its own perception’ in the event that the standard of protection granted under the ECHR is lower, usually in the absence of any meaningful consideration of the case law of the CJEU, may have to change in the future, especially with respect to potential clashes between social rights and free movement. This could result in the ‘lowering’ or at least ‘alteration’ of the standard of protection offered to social rights in the Cypriot Constitution, with a special reference to the right to strike.⁶⁸ In the meantime and until such a conflict arises, what could be said is that the test to be satisfied for the protection of social rights ‘within the framework of the public interest and common good’ could end up in effect being higher than for other constitutionally protected fundamental rights. This would seem to be confirmed by the recent case law of the Supreme Court of Cyprus related to austerity measures put in place in response to the sovereign debt crisis.

For example, the case of *Georgos Charalambos and others v. Republic of Cyprus*⁶⁹ concerned a number of recourses brought before the Supreme Court by a number of civil servants against the Republic, the Ministry of Finance and the General Auditor, with respect to the law for the special levy on the pensions and gross salaries of officers and employees in the public sector as well as the pensions of retired persons (Law 112(I)/2011 as amended). The case was brought on the basis of Arts. 23, 24, 26, 28 and 146, but not Art. 9 of the Constitution (right to a decent existence and social security) which can be considered as requiring on a case-by-case basis a higher burden of proof to rebut the presumption of constitutionality afforded to legislation (on the basis of proportionality), including apparently in times of economic crisis. With respect to the combined principles of equal treatment and equality in taxation (Arts. 28 and 24 respectively), the Supreme Court confirmed its previous case law by stating that the principle of equality must be balanced with the economic situation and fiscal policy in place at the time, and that the state has the discretion in ‘times of extreme economic crisis’ to take measures targeting specific groups of the population ‘without necessarily violating the principle of equal treatment’.⁷⁰ Adopting a comparative approach and after examining the legal framework put in place in Cyprus with respect to the special levy (including for the private sector), the Supreme Court subsequently ruled that there had been no breach ⁶⁶ In Apostolides Georgios & Others v. the Republic of Cyprus through the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance & Others [1982] 3 CLR 928, the Supreme Court ruled that social rights are on an equal footing with political rights but that the economic situation and capacity of the country must be taken into account when assessing compliance of a measure with Art. 9 of the Constitution (right to a decent existence and social security); see Kombos and Pantazi 2012, pp. 314–315.

⁶⁷ Ibid. See also the analysis of the dissenting opinion of Judge Erotokritou in the case of Myrto Christodoulou in Sect. 2.7.3 of this Report.

⁶⁸ Kombos and Pantazi 2012, p. 345.

⁶⁹ Cases No. 1480-4/2011, 1591/2011 and 1625/2011, 11 June 2014 (majority decision) (in Greek).

⁷⁰ Translation by the author.

of the principle of equal treatment and that the measures put in place ('in coordination with the competent organs of the EU') could not be deemed 'extreme' and thus disproportionate (proportionality was raised with respect to the right to property), given the economic situation in which Cyprus found itself.

This judgment should be contrasted with the case of Maria Koutselini-Ioannidou and others v. The Republic,⁷¹ with respect to the reduction of pensions of retired civil servants and public officers who have been re-employed in the public sector based on Law 88(I)/2011, which was deemed unconstitutional on the basis of Art. 23 of the Constitution, independently of the current economic climate and/or any obligations as may arise under EU membership and/or the ECHR. In this majority decision, the Supreme Court distinguished this case from the previous one on the basis that pensions are a property right which cannot be limited in the name of the public interest on the basis of Art. 23. In the second judgment in the case, however, Judge Michaelidou referred to the expression of the general concept of public interest, included in Art. 23 under the form of public benefit, and to the need to justify it.⁷²

In a wider framework, it should be briefly noted that the right to free movement and residence on the territory of the Republic of Cyprus⁷³ arguably holds a strategic place in the Constitution, between the right of the accused and the 'no-exile' rule. It should therefore be regarded as a basic fundamental right in the Cypriot legal order and any restriction/limitation to this right should be interpreted strictly (the grounds are contained in the provision itself). To this consideration could be added the case law on shopping hours within the framework of Art. 25 of the Constitution (the right to work) where there has been an uneasy relationship between working conditions and open and fair competition in the name of the general public interest,⁷⁴ including post-EU accession.⁷⁵ It is undeniable, however, that there have been overall some gradual adjustments in the balancing of fundamental rights with economic free movement rights or associated/flanking policies, in the name of EU law and/or in favour of economic freedoms falling within the scope of EU law.⁷⁶ An example of this would be the (unanimous) decision in a reference to the Supreme Court⁷⁷ in relation to the law amending the law on the protection of beaches and transposing the Services Directive, analysed earlier in Sect. 2.1. As

⁷¹ Joined Cases No. 740/2011-587/2012, 7 October 2014 (majority decision) (in Greek).

⁷² In this respect, see speech by Judge Myron M. Nicolatos.

⁷³ Article 13 of the Constitution.

⁷⁴ See Georgoulla Georgiou et al v. the Police [1999] 2 CLR 616 (in Greek) and Andronikos Vasiliadis Ltd et al v. the Police (2001) 2 CLR 715 (in Greek).

⁷⁵ A power struggle involving the various branches of government of the Republic of Cyprus has been ongoing for the past few years, with no ultimate outcome yet, as to who has the power to regulate shopping days/hours and related working conditions, and on what constitutional basis/principle. Overall it would appear that the economic situation of the island prevails over any consideration of EU law.

⁷⁶ Dr. Hadjihambis, interview 9 January 2015.

⁷⁷ President of the Republic v. House of Representatives, Reference 2/2013, 9 May 2014 (in Greek).

seen, the national Law gave priority to the owners or operators of a seaside hotel or recreational business in relation to the tender procedure for leasing the relevant part of the beach. The lawyers of the House of Representatives justified this policy by the general public interest as an exception to the selection process, including under Art. 12(3) of the Directive (applicable ‘where the number of authorisations available for an activity is limited because of scarcity of natural resources or technical capacity’) and on the basis of Art. 25 of the Constitution. These arguments were rejected by the Supreme Court not only on the basis of the Directive’s requirement that the licensing system should not be discriminatory and disproportionate, but also on the basis that the principles of free competition, as set out in EU law and in the Directive, should prevail.⁷⁸

On a further point, the Court noted that there was no breach of the principle of legitimate expectations since the House of Representatives, in addition to not meeting the deadline for transposition of the Directive at the end of 2012, had through the amending law extended the existing situation until the end of October 2014, thereby giving ample time to all concerned to comply.⁷⁹

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

Introduction and constitutional amendments The European Arrest Warrant (EAW) Framework Decision (FD) was implemented in Cyprus by Law No. 133(I)/2004 on the European Arrest Warrant and the Surrender Procedures of Requested Persons, which has since been amended three times.⁸⁰ There were initial difficulties in some Member States with the very idea of surrendering their own nationals based on the principle of mutual recognition, including in Cyprus where ‘expelling or extraditing’ procedures were interpreted as being expressly limited to aliens under Art. 11(2)(f) of the Constitution.⁸¹ This difficulty persisted following EU accession and the matter was brought before the full bench of the Supreme Court of Cyprus in November 2005.⁸² The Court had to consider the ⁷⁸ Ibid., p. 12.

⁷⁹ Ibid., p. 14.

⁸⁰ Consolidated version available at http://www.cylaw.org/nomoi/enop/non-ind/2004_1_133/full.html (in Greek).

⁸¹ See Attorney General v. Afamis, n. 25. An unofficial translation of Art. 11(2)(f) in force until the 2006 amendment is available in English at http://www.law.uj.edu.pl/~kpk/eaw/other/220_EAW.pdf, p. 170. See also case note by Tsadiras 2007, p. 1516.

⁸² Attorney General v. Constantinou [2005] 1 CLR 1356, [2007] 3 CMLR 42; see Tsadiras 2007 and Laulhé Shaelou 2010a, pp. 134–137. See also <http://www.supremecourt.gov.cy/Judicial/SC.nsf/All/1F76458C67091E86C2257348004BC6B6?OpenDocument> and http://www.law.uj.edu.pl/~kpk/eaw/judicial_decisions/Cyprus_Constitutional_Court.pdf.

implementation of the FD in the national legal order and the compatibility of the implementing law with the Constitution.⁸³ The Court took the view that Art. 11 of the Constitution provided an exhaustive list of the reasons why a person could be arrested and it did not provide for the execution of an EAW.⁸⁴ It then reiterated its jurisprudence on the prohibition of the extradition of Cypriot nationals,⁸⁵ referred to the Pupino case⁸⁶ and to the lack of direct effect of the FD, and ruled as a result that it was left to its own discretion to interpret national law in this field in accordance with the FD. On this point, it decided that the implementing law was contrary to Art. 11 of the Constitution, as no provision in the implementing law could be interpreted ‘in such a way so as to prevail and to be applied as regards the nationals of the Republic’.⁸⁷ This judicial decision triggered (indirectly) a legislative reaction and provided the necessary impetus to proceed with long-awaited amendments to the Constitution to reflect EU membership obligations, including with respect to Art. 11.⁸⁸ Following the 2006 amendment to the Constitution (the Fifth Amendment, see Sect. 1.2), the arrest and detention of a Cypriot national for the purpose of extradition to another EU Member State was made possible, provided that it related to offences committed after Cyprus became an EU Member State on 1 May 2004 (Art. 11(2)(f), sub-para. 1) and that such request was not motivated by grounds such as race, religion, ethnic origin or political opinion (sub-para. 3).⁸⁹

⁸³ For the constitutional implications of this case in the Cypriot legal order, see Sect. 1.2.

⁸⁴ Laulhé Shaelou 2010a, p. 136.

⁸⁵ Georgiou v. Director of Central Prisons [1991] 1 CLR 814.

⁸⁶ Case C-105/03 Pupino [2005] ECR I-05285.

⁸⁷ Constantinou, para. 24. Translation by the author.

⁸⁸ See Sect. 1.2. See also Laulhé Shaelou 2010a, pp. 137–138, and Gorski & Hofmanski 2008.

⁸⁹ Sub-paragraph (f) of Art. 11(2) was substituted with the following:

‘(f) the arrest or detention of a person ... or of an alien against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition or of a national of the Republic with a view to extraditing or surrendering him, subject to the following provisions:

(i) the arrest or detention of a national of the Republic for the purpose of surrendering him under a European arrest warrant is possible solely in relation to events that occurred or acts done subsequent to the date of accession of the Republic to the European Union.

(ii) the arrest or detention of a national of the Republic for the purpose of extraditing or surrendering him pursuant to an international agreement binding the Republic is possible solely in relation to events that occurred or acts done subsequent to the publication of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution Law of 2006.

(iii) the arrest or detention of any person for the purpose of extraditing or surrendering him pursuant to an international agreement is not possible if the competent body or authority under the law, has substantial grounds for believing that a request for extradition or surrender has been made for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing a person on grounds of his race, religion, ethnic or ethnotic origin, political opinion, or of any legal claims of collective or individual rights in accordance with international law.’

At the same time, Art. 7 of Law 133(I)/2004 was also amended to provide that a request for the issuing of an EAW for the purpose of criminal prosecution must be accompanied by the written approval of the Attorney General of the Republic of Cyprus (who is responsible for criminal proceedings in the territory of the Republic in accordance with Art. 113(2) of the Constitution).⁹⁰ Following these amendments, the legal framework of the EAW in Cyprus remained prime facie incompatible with the FD, to the extent that it set out additional requirements/limitations to the issuing and execution of an EAW, provided for additional protection of fundamental human rights not expressly provided in the FD and, as such, potentially affected the principle of mutual recognition and/or the rights of suspects and defendants.⁹¹

In 2013 Cyprus proceeded with a further amendment to its Constitution, allegedly to ‘fully comply’ with its obligations arising from the EAW FD.⁹² The amendment was related to the pending extradition proceedings that were examined by the Supreme Court in Dinos Michailides v. Attorney General.⁹³ This case was an appeal and concerned a Cypriot citizen against whom a first EAW had been issued in 2013 by the Greek authorities who requested the surrender for purposes of criminal prosecution for money laundering. It should be noted that the prosecution related to events that took place between 1997 and 2001, and that Art. 11 of the Constitution as amended by the Fifth Constitutional Amendment allowed the extradition of Cypriot citizens only for events that took place after accession to the EU in 2004. Article 11(2) (f) was thus further amended in order to allow the extradition of Cypriot citizens in connection to events that took place at any time, even before accession to the EU.⁹⁴ All ⁹⁰ Amending law 112(I) of 2006, available at http://www.cylaw.org/nomoi/arith/2006_1_112.pdf (in Greek).

⁹¹ See DG Internal Policies of the Union, Citizens’ Rights and Constitutional Affairs (2009) ‘Implementation of the European Arrest Warrant and joint investigation teams at EU and national level’ available at <http://www.eipa.eu/files/EUROPEANARRESTWARRANT.pdf> 3, pp. 11–12, p. 14 and pp. 18–19; see also Kapardis 2008, pp. 12–23 and <http://www.law.uj.edu.pl/~kpk/eaw/data/cyprus.html>.

⁹² Seventh Amendment to the Constitution Law 68(I)/2013, available in English at: http://www.olc.gov.cy/olc/olc.nsf/all/DA5878C1FB78D167C2257C16002284F7/\$file/The%20Seventh%20Amendment%20of%20the%20Constitution%20Law%20of%202013.pdf?openElement.pdf.

⁹³ Dinos Michailides v. Attorney General, Case 221/13, 2 September 2013.

⁹⁴ The sub-paragraph (f) in Art. 11 was replaced as follows:

‘(f) ... the arrest or detention of an alien against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition or the detention of a national of the Republic with a view to extraditing or surrendering him pursuant to a European arrest warrant or pursuant to an international treaty binding on the Republic, on condition that such treaty is applied by the other party thereto. However, the arrest or detention of any person for the purpose of extraditing or surrendering him is not possible if the competent body or authority under the law has substantial grounds for believing that a request for extradition or surrender has been made for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing a person on the grounds of his race, religion, nationality, ethnic origin, political opinion, or of any legal claims of collective or individual rights in accordance with international law.’

sub-paragraphs were deleted and time limitations were removed.⁹⁵ The guarantee of non-discrimination on grounds of race, religion and other grounds was clearly reiterated and now applies to all persons subject to extradition or surrender procedures, whether nationals of the Republic or not, and whether the subjects of a European or an international arrest warrant. This Seventh Amendment to the Constitution with respect to the surrender of Cypriot nationals was welcomed by the Supreme Court of Cyprus in its recent case law as necessary for the Republic to fully abide by its obligations under the FD.⁹⁶

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 The legal maxim of nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege is a fundamental principle of Cypriot criminal law embodied in Art. 12(1) of the Constitution, which provides that

[n]o person shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence under the law at the time when it was committed; and no person shall have a heavier punishment imposed on him for an offence other than that expressly provided for it by law at the time when it was committed.

It was on the basis of the principle of the non-retroactivity of criminal law deriving from this provision that the Republic had sought inter alia to limit the scope of application of the EAW in Cyprus to suspected offences committed post EU accession (in the Fifth Amendment). This concern, however, appeared unfounded for procedural law and was accordingly removed with the Seventh Amendment to the Constitution. Article 12(2) of the Constitution also sets out the rule against double penalty (ne bis in idem): ‘a person who has been acquitted or convicted of an offence shall not be tried again for the same offence. No person shall be punished twice for the same act or omission except where death ensues from such act or omission’. This is a constitutional right that even precedes the birth of the Republic, without deviations, even in the name of public security.⁹⁷ There is also a guarantee in the Constitution against arbitrary punishment (Art. 12(3)) as well as against general confiscation of property (Art. 12(6)).⁹⁸

The presumption of innocence also features in Art. 12(4) of the Constitution. It provides that ‘every person charged with an offence shall be presumed innocent

⁹⁵ Cyprus had been criticised for having introduced such time restraints. See Christou 2012, p. 63 and fn. 31 in particular.

⁹⁶ See Dinos Michailides v. Attorney General of the Republic, Civil Appeal 221/13, 2/9/2013.

⁹⁷ Paraskeva 2015, p. 185. In the context of the EAW, see District Court of Larnaka, Case No. 2/06, based on Law 133(I)/2004 and concerning the execution of an EAW against Vakhtang Obolashvili, 4 May 2005, where the District Judge refused to execute the EAW against the requested person based on the principle of double jeopardy (developed below).

⁹⁸ For a general consideration of the rights of the accused, with respect in particular to Arts. 11 and 12 of the Constitution, see Emilianides 2013, pp. 157–159; see also Paraskeva 2015, pp. 176–220. On the rights of suspects of criminal offences, see also Stefanou 2011.

until proved guilty according to law'. This is a constitutional right without qualification, constitutes a human right and, in the context of procedural law, applies all throughout the process – before, during and until the final conviction of the accused. It is important to note that this right is afforded to all, whether nationals or aliens. It lies entirely in the hands of the judiciary to determine whether a criminal offence has been committed by a person, provided the prosecution can prove so beyond all reasonable doubt.⁹⁹ This means in particular that no public authority can speculate on the guilt of a person before he/she has been convicted by a competent court. Thus, it was held that administrative decisions attributing criminal acts to a person were in violation of the constitutional presumption of innocence and, as such, unconstitutional.¹⁰⁰ It should also be noted that the presumption of innocence in Cypriot constitutional law also implies that the accused has a right to silence and against self-incrimination.¹⁰¹ Exercising these rights, which are ancillary to the presumption of innocence, does not mean admitting guilt.¹⁰²

The absolute protection afforded to the presumption of innocence by the Constitution raises interesting questions in the context of the EAW and mutual recognition, with respect in particular to the authorities involved, the procedure and the nature of the arrest warrant. Following the Seventh Amendment to the Constitution, Art. 11(3) now provides that 'save when and as provided by law in case of a flagrant offence punishable with death or imprisonment', a person can only be arrested under the authority of a reasoned judicial warrant issued according to the formalities prescribed by the law or pursuant to an EAW (the latter reference to the EAW having been added by the Seventh Amendment). The police cannot therefore proceed with the arrest of a person without the issue of a judicial warrant/ EAW and its communication to the relevant authorities of the Republic. The central authority for the issue and execution of EAWs in Cyprus is the Ministry of Justice and Public Order, i.e. an executive organ of the state, although other key actors such as the police force, the Law Office of the Republic and District Judges are also involved in the process.¹⁰³ The competence of the central authorities in other Member States was challenged before the courts in Cyprus in relation to the execution of EAWs, but in vain. The case of Igor Ovakimyan v. Attorney General of the Republic concerned the execution in Cyprus of an EAW issued by the Dutch Central Authority. The Supreme Court upheld the decision of the Limassol District Court to execute the EAW against the appellant and ruled that the Central Authority

⁹⁹ Rex v. Mentesh 14 CLR 233; Police v. Chrysanthou 15 CLR 50 and Costis Panayi Kefalos v. The Queen 19 CLR 121. For the reversal of the burden of proof in Cyprus law in specific instances, see Paraskeva 2015, pp. 197–198 and in particular fn. 790 and 792.

¹⁰⁰ Kyriakides v. The Republic [1997] 3 CLR 485 (in Greek). See Emilianides 2013, pp. 158–159.

¹⁰¹ President of the Republic v. House of Representatives [1994] 3 CLR 1 (in Greek). See Emilianides 2013, p. 158; see also Paraskeva 2015, pp. 201–202.

¹⁰² Charalambous v. The Republic [1985] 2 CLR 40; Emilianides 2013, p. 158.

¹⁰³ See <http://www.police.gov.cy/police/police.nsf/All/367B2EB11E7D96B9C2257A1E002E2E17?OpenDocument>.

can also be a public prosecutor or other judicial body as determined by the legal system of each state. In the Netherlands, as the Cypriot Supreme Court noted, despite being assigned to the Ministry of Justice, the public prosecution service belonged to the judiciary branch of government.¹⁰⁴ This was repeated in Eva Karina Andersson v. Attorney General of the Republic in the context of the execution of an EAW from Sweden.¹⁰⁵ It appears to be in line with the jurisprudence of the ECtHR on the nature of the ‘court’ as an independent organ from the executive power.¹⁰⁶ Thus, the essence of the matter seems to be that the EAW must remain in effect a ‘judicial decision’,¹⁰⁷ independent from the executive. This does not seem to be exactly the case in Cyprus¹⁰⁸ or at least was arguably not the case until 2014.

In Cyprus, once a request is transmitted to the Central Authority, it is communicated to the Attorney General who is also not a judicial authority, but an independent officer of the Republic (Arts. 112–114 of the Constitution). The latter is said to perform a ‘double-check’ to the extent that the police first ‘presents the case’ and subsequently a draft of the EAW for approval by the Attorney General. This administrative/technical process, prior to the judicial decision being taken, has been criticised in evaluation reports as being at the very least unnecessary and perhaps more seriously in violation of the principle of mutual recognition and/or the spirit of the FD, to the extent in particular that it could constitute an obstacle to a request reaching the District Court in Cyprus.¹⁰⁹ Furthermore, it should be noted that while the Attorney General performed its double check, the Central Authority would until 2014 scrutinise the EAW in terms of formalities but also substance, with the possibility to request further information or a re-issue of the EAW by the issuing state. It was only following this screening procedure that the Central Authority would proceed with issuing a certificate under Sect. 16(1) of the implementing law and transmit it to the judge who would decide under Sect. 16(2) on the issue of an arrest warrant under the implementing law. As ably noted by Christou, this certificate constituted no guarantee that the EAW would not be ‘challenged before the courts’, since the Central Authority is not a judicial authority either, thereby begging the question of the real judicial nature of the EAW and of the scope of the principle of mutual recognition in Cyprus.

The role of the Ministry and the Attorney General in the issue/execution of EAWs recently led for the first time to legal issues raised in the case of Mr. Louka in the context of an international arrest warrant from South Africa; the details will be provided in Sect. 3.6. This case entitles one to wonder whether considerations regarding extradition decisions based on political discretion could arise in the ¹⁰⁴ [2005] 1 CLR 1119.

¹⁰⁵ [2008] 1 CLR 1092. See Christou 2012, p. 64 and fn. 50.

¹⁰⁶ Hutchison Reid v. the United Kingdom, no. 50272/99, § 64, ECHR 2003-IV.

¹⁰⁷ See Art. 7(2) of the FD.

¹⁰⁸ See <http://www.eipa.eu/files/EUROPEANARRESTWARRANT.pdf>, p. 11.

¹⁰⁹ Christou 2012, pp. 64–65.

European context and what safeguards are available in the law to avoid potentially arbitrary results.¹¹⁰

It should be said from the outset that the legal framework surrounding international arrest warrants and EAWs certainly differs with respect to their spirit, scope, powers and processes.¹¹¹ With respect to the legal basis of an arrest warrant, the Supreme Court in Scattergood had clarified the judicial character of an arrest warrant issued under the law implementing the EAW FD (as opposed to an arrest warrant issued in other extradition procedures) and that the basis for such arrest warrant was the law implementing the FD (Sects. 3 and 18) and not domestic law.¹¹² The Court subsequently stated that a warrant issued on the basis of Art. 16 of the implementing law was a ‘preliminary measure’ which aimed at ensuring the arrest of the suspected offender, in order to then decide during the course of the procedure ‘whether the execution of the EAW should be allowed’.¹¹³ This was quite an ambiguous statement which appears to reveal that the execution of an EAW did not occur ‘as if it were issued by the issuing state’s own authorities’,¹¹⁴ as requested by the principle of mutual recognition. More recently, however, and within the context of the amendments to the law implementing the EAW FD in Cyprus,¹¹⁵ the Supreme Court, referring to the case law of the ECJ,¹¹⁶ clearly stated that there is an ‘express obligation’ to execute ‘every’ EAW in accordance with Art. 1(2) of the FD and this obligation is without exception outside of the framework provided in the FD (Arts. 3 and 4) and in the implementing law (Sects. 13 and 14) (see below).¹¹⁷

It therefore appeared that, at least until 2014, there were some weaknesses (i.e. extra scrutiny even where it may have favoured the defendant’s rights) in the law implementing the EAW FD in Cyprus, with some of them also identified with respect to international arrest warrants. The House of Representatives passed two amending laws to the implementing law in 2014, one in early 2014 where

¹¹⁰ For equivalent considerations arising (indirectly) from unsuccessful pleas by the lawyers of Dinos Michailides subject to an EAW issued by the Greek authorities, see Dinos Michailides v. Attorney General of the Republic, Civil Appeal 221/13, 2/9/2013.

¹¹¹ As noted by the Supreme Court itself in Scattergood v. Attorney General [2005] 1 CLR 142 (in Greek), the EAW procedure is a ‘relative’ of the extradition procedure under the relevant domestic law but as such, ‘does not stop being different, based on another law enacted within the framework of the EU accession’ (translation by the author).

¹¹² Ibid.

¹¹³ Ibid.

¹¹⁴ Christou 2012, p. 65.

¹¹⁵ Amending Law 30(I)/2014 was published in the Official Gazette of the Republic on 7 March 2014 and Amending Law 183(I)/2014 on 12 December 2014.

¹¹⁶ Case C-388/08 PPU Laymann and Pustovarov [2008] ECR I-08993, para. 51; Case C-261/09 Mantello [2010] ECR I-11477, para. 36.

¹¹⁷ Civil Appeal No 184/2014, Hadwen James v. Attorney General, 17 July 2014; for a more flexible approach, see Civil Appeal No. 41/14, Attorney General v. Mrukwa, 5 March 2014; see also n. 127 below.

significant amendments were made to a number of provisions of the law,¹¹⁸ and again in late 2014 where one additional amendment was made to the rights of the person subject to the EAW.¹¹⁹ Through the first amending law, the power given to the Central Authority (CA) to scrutinise the EAW and issue a certificate of compliance under Art. 16 para. 1 was revoked, and the CA was merely left with the obligation to ensure the arrest of the person subject to the EAW; there is only mention of the power of the judge to proceed with the issue of a temporary arrest warrant in the case of an emergency and on the basis of an EAW or before the issue or the transmission of an EAW, following receipt of such a request through EUROPOL or otherwise (new para. 2). The detention time under the temporary arrest warrant was also extended from three to eight days (Art. 16(3)). Amending Law 30(I)/2014 also removed the reference to ‘criminal proceedings’ in Sect. 3 of the implementing law, thereby arguably enhancing judicial pre-trial and procedural powers.

The above changes appear to reconcile the implementing law with the spirit and provisions of the FD as well as the principle of mutual recognition. It remains, however, to be seen what the impact of the amendments to Sect. 16 of the implementing law will mean in terms of safeguards, including for the respect of the rights of suspects, the protection of the presumption of innocence and of other fundamental human rights/principles embodied in procedural guarantees. In addition to constitutional safeguards in each country, the protection of fundamental rights is also part of the principle of mutual recognition itself,¹²⁰ thereby arguably implying the exercise of a certain level of control by the competent authorities.¹²¹ It should not mean, however, that the protection of fundamental rights can constitute an autonomous ground of refusal to execute an EAW. This was confirmed recently by the Supreme Court of Cyprus with respect to the EU Charter, in the case of James Hadwen,¹²² with the Court noting that such arguments do not ‘fit’ within the ‘specific procedure’ of the execution of EAWs by District Courts (which the Court classified as sui generis).¹²³

2.3.1.2 Until at least 2014, however, the authorities in Cyprus, and in particular the District Judges, would not ‘automatically authorise extradition with minimum formality and no consideration of evidence’ (cf. the Questionnaire). The courts

¹¹⁸ Law 30(I)/2014, 7.3.2014.

¹¹⁹ Law 183(I)/2014, 12.12.2014.

¹²⁰ For Cyprus, see Sect. 2(2) of the implementing law: ‘The application of the provisions of the present Law cannot result in the violation of the obligation of respect of the fundamental rights and principles, in accordance with Art. 6 TEU. In any case, the requested person shall not be transferred to a country where he/she would be at serious risk of being subjected to the death penalty or subjected to torture or other inhuman or humiliating or treatment’ (translation by the author).

¹²¹ Christou et al. 2009, p. 113.

¹²² See n. 117 above.

¹²³ Ibid.; see also Dinos. Michailides v. Attorney General, Civil Appeal No. 221/13, 2 September 2013.

proceeded with the review of pre-trial evidence to determine in particular the seriousness of the offence,¹²⁴ the time frame and the situation of the person, inter alia whether the person subject to the EAW was more ‘at risk’ if extradited to the issuing country rather than remaining under arrest and/or in detention in Cyprus. Overall, the courts proceeded on the assumption that there was ‘reasonable suspicion’ against the suspected person as evidenced by the EAW, which, however, had to be investigated and determined by the District Judge, with a view to arresting and/or detaining the person subject to the EAW. This is quite clearly expressed in the implementing law where it transpires that even after a suspected person is brought before the District Judge, extradition is still only a ‘possibility’ (Sect. 17 (1)) whereas his/her detention needs to be decided by the judge (Sect. 18(1)). Most of the time, however, an EAW is issued and/or executed,¹²⁵ with one commentator noting with respect to the role of the judge that judges need to ‘be moved’ by the parties, which is a characteristic of the common law tradition, as opposed to the civil law system where the role of the judge is more inquisitorial.¹²⁶ The Supreme Court of Cyprus has, however, recently expressed in rather strict terms the obligation on the District Courts to proceed with the execution of EAWs and appears to have framed the protection of fundamental rights (exclusively) within procedural guarantees as provided in the FD and the implementing law subject to a proportionality test, thereby potentially adopting a stricter reading than some District Judges on a case-by-case basis.¹²⁷

¹²⁴ See e.g. Civil Appeal, Panayiotis Philippou (no. 2) [2009] 1 CLR 693.

¹²⁵ The latest public statistics available date back from 2010 when 34 EAWs were issued to Cyprus. The statistics of the Ministry of Justice do not specify how many EAWs were actually executed. The annual report only mentions that these EAWs were transmitted to the judicial authorities of the Republic for execution. It then states under the title ‘transfer of sentenced persons’ that 13 requests were received by the Ministry, out of which 11 culminated in extradition from or to Cyprus; see http://www.mjpo.gov.cy/mjpo/MJPO.nsf>All/88FC4FA80EAFB52AC22579BC003005DE/\$file/etisia%202010%20-%20final.pdf, p. 37.

¹²⁶ Christou 2012, p. 66.

¹²⁷ This does or does not benefit the person subject to the EAW. In James Hadwen (see n. 117 above), the Supreme Court acting as an appeal court, upheld the findings of the trial court to the extent that it had allowed a request for adjournment in order to call an expert witness from Malta to testify that the offence for which he was arrested was time-barred but refused to grant a second adjournment, noting that the execution of an EAW must occur within a strict time frame. The fact that in the application of Sect. 15(2) of the implementing law, the trial court omitted to hear the appellant was not sufficient to render the decision of the District Court to execute the EAW invalid. In Mrukwa (see n. 117 above), the District Judge had refused to execute an EAW issued by the Polish authorities on the basis of delays in justice both in Poland and in Cyprus, and lack of justification, and referred to Sects. 2(2) and 4(1)(f) and/or (g) of the implementing law. In the appeal case, the Supreme Court upheld the decision of the trial court and confirmed that even though the implementing law does not provide for the refusal to execute an EAW on the basis of the timely administration of justice, account should be taken of Sect. 2(2) of the implementing law (and not of the Constitution, as stated by the District Court) which, in conjunction with Art. 6 TEU and the principle of mutual recognition, should ensure the protection of fundamental rights by the authorities of the issuing Member State.

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 The legal maxim of nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege was already discussed in Sect. 2.3.1.1 above in the context of constitutional rights.¹²⁸ It was also said that there is an express human right ground to reject requests for surrender of suspects in the implementing law, the scope of which, however, remains unclear. In line with the FD, the implementing law also includes a list of 32 offences in Sect. 12 (2) which do not require the double criminality principle to be satisfied, provided that the offences are punishable by a custodial sentence or detention order of a maximum period of at least three years in the law of the issuing state (verbatim transposition of Art. 2(2) of the FD). This list remains unamended to date and the section has been described as helping to serve ‘substantial justice’ by preventing suspects from escaping from justice on procedural grounds.¹²⁹ Despite controversies deriving from the abolition of double criminality, it has been seen as creating a ‘better balance between private individuals and national interest in enforcing the law’.¹³⁰

The above provision must be read in conjunction with Sect. 13 of the implementing law where the grounds for mandatory non-execution of an EAW are set out, including some not expressly provided in Art. 3 of the FD (amnesty, ne bis in idem, and lack of criminal responsibility due to age).¹³¹ It is worth noting that Sect.13 of the implementing law was amended in 2014, but only with respect to the phrasing of sub-para. (d) which reflects Art. 11(2)(f) of the Constitution sub-para. 3, as amended. The two other grounds remain unaffected, namely that the Republic will refuse to execute the EAW in two situations. First, if a person subject to an EAW for the execution of a custodial sentence or detention order is a Cypriot citizen, the Republic will execute the sentence or detention order according to its own criminal laws. Secondly, if a person subject to an EAW for his/her prosecution is a Cypriot citizen, the Republic will not execute the request unless it is assured that after being heard, the person will be transferred to the Republic to serve his/her custodial sentence or execution order passed against him/her in the issuing Member State. These two additional grounds for the mandatory non-execution of an EAW appear to defeat the very purpose of the FD and of mutual recognition and sit rather uneasily with the amended version of Art. 11(2)(f) of the Constitution.

Mention should also be made of the optional grounds for non-execution of an EAW as set out in Art. 4 of the Framework Decision. The implementing law in Cyprus does not reproduce Art. 4(1) of the FD, which provides for the possibility to lift the requirement of double criminality for acts falling outside the list set in Art. 2(2) and within the ambit of Art. 2(4) of the FD. All other optional grounds have been implemented in the Cypriot law (Sect. 14). Given the human rights guarantees present in the implementing law, the perhaps intentional omission of Art. 4(1) FD may appear ¹²⁸ See also Christou et al. 2009, p. 114.

¹²⁹ Dr. Demetrios Hadjihambis, 9 January 2015.

¹³⁰ Ibid.

¹³¹ Stefanou and Kapardis 2006, p. 264.

regrettable in terms of substantive justice and mutual recognition. It actually appears that even if an act falls within the ambit of Sect. 12(2) of the implementing law, for which the requirement of double criminality is lifted, the execution of the EAW can still fail on the basis of mandatory (or not) grounds for non-execution,¹³² which provide specific procedural guarantees and/or, as a last resort, on the basis of the general clause for the protection of fundamental human rights in Sect. 2(2) of the implementing law.¹³³ In this respect, it should also be noted that in 2014, Sect. 14 of the implementing law was amended by Law 30(I)/2014 to the effect that sub-sections 2, 3 and 4 were added, thereby reinforcing the discretion of the judicial authorities to refuse the execution of an EAW in several additional instances involving the protection of human rights embodied in procedural guarantees.¹³⁴

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 Article 30(1) of the Constitution provides that '[n]o person shall be denied access to the court assigned to him by or under this Constitution'. The right of access to the courts is however not an absolute right and is subject to reasonable restrictions, such as time limitations.¹³⁵ Article 30(2) then provides that '[i]n the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, every person is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent, impartial and competent court established by law'. Again, this can be subject to restrictions.¹³⁶ Finally, Art. 30(3) combined with Art. 12(5) of the Constitution set out the minimum rights of litigants, including in criminal proceedings and in line with Art. 6(3) ECHR. Thus, every person has the right to (i) be informed of the reasons why he/she is required to appear before the court; (ii) to present his/her case before the court and to have sufficient time necessary for its preparation; (iii) to adduce or cause to be adduced his/her evidence and to examine witnesses according to law; (iv) to have a lawyer of his/her own choice and to have free legal assistance where the interests of justice so require and as provided by law; and (v) to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he/she cannot understand or ¹³² Such grounds seem to be used within reason; see e.g. Civil Appeal, Panayiotis Philippou (no. 2) [2009] 1 CLR 693.

¹³³ In Obolashvili, the District Judge, after refusing to execute an EAW on the grounds of the principle of double jeopardy (Sect. 13(b) of the implementing law), also clearly stated that in any case, a person would not be surrendered if his/her human rights were violated as protected under Sect. 2(2) of the same law. In this case, the length of time since the alleged offence was found by the District Judge to be unacceptable and sufficient in itself to refuse the execution of the EAW. See also Christou 2012, p. 68. Trial court decisions should however be contrasted with judgments delivered by the Supreme Court in its appeal capacity (see Sect. 2.3.1 and n. 97 above).

¹³⁴ For a pre-2014 review of procedural guarantees, see Christou 2012, pp. 71–77.

¹³⁵ See Emilianides 2013, p. 171.

¹³⁶ Ibid., p. 172.

speak the language used in court. These minimum requirements are deemed to constitute ‘fundamental elements of a fair trial’ and any deviation therefrom would be in violation of the latter principle and invalidate the proceedings.¹³⁷

Article 12(5)(c) of the Constitution provides in particular that every person charged with an offence has the right to ‘to defend himself in person or through a lawyer ...’. If it is possible in civil proceedings to have a judgment in absentia provided all minimum rights to a fair trial have been allegedly duly respected,¹³⁸ this does not appear to be the case in criminal proceedings.¹³⁹ For serious offences in particular, the presence of the accused at the trial is required, given the nature of the burden of proof in criminal proceedings and the right to self-representation and participation in the proceedings guaranteed in the Constitution.¹⁴⁰ As a matter of public order, the presence of the lawyer of the person charged does not discharge the authorities from their obligation to ensure that the accused is present at the trial, at least at first instance, unless that person has fled the country or has waived the relevant rights.¹⁴¹

Despite the exceptional nature of judgments in absentia in the Cypriot legal order, legislation was enacted in 2014 in Cyprus to implement the relevant provisions of the EAW FD, as amended by the FD 2009/299/JHA of 26 February 2009, reproducing verbatim the amendments, thereby enhancing the procedural rights of ¹³⁷ Ibid., pp. 173–174.

¹³⁸ See Apostolides v. Orams, Case No. 9968/04, 9 November 2004, where Mr. Apostolides obtained a judgment by default of appearance in the Nicosia District Court against Mr. and Mrs. Orams, British citizens who had purchased his property in the area not under the effective control of the Republic of Cyprus. On 19 April 2005, a second judgment was delivered by the District Court refusing to set aside the earlier judgment on the ground that there was no valid defence to the claim (the court set aside appearance) – a judgment later upheld by the Supreme Court (Apostolides v. Orams [2006] 1 CLR 1402). Those judgments were then registered in, and declared enforceable by, the Queen’s Bench Division of the High Court of England pursuant to the Brussels Regulation (Orders made by Master Eyre, 21 October 2005) and successfully challenged by the Orams before the High Court Judge pursuant to Art. 43 of the Brussels Regulation (Orams v. Apostolides (QB) [2007] 1 WLR 241). Mr. Apostolides appealed under Art. 44 of the Brussels Regulation before the Court of Appeal of England and Wales, which decided to stay the proceedings and refer five questions pertaining also to the right of the defence, service of documents and public order as grounds for refusal of enforcement of judgments to the ECJ (Case C-420/07 Apostolides [2009] ECR I-03571). For a detailed analysis of the judgment of the ECJ in this case, see S. Laulhé Shaelou 2011, pp. 342–356.

¹³⁹ See Report by the European Committee on Crime Problems (CDPC), Council of Europe, writing about judgments in absentia in Cyprus that ‘it is not possible except in the case of specified very minor offences for which the accused requests to be permitted to be represented only by his counsel (section 45 of the Criminal Procedure Code) or if summons is proved to have been served on him and he fails to appear in which case the Court may hear the case in his absence (section 89 of the Criminal Procedure Code)’, available at http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/pc-oc/PCOC_documents/Documents%202013/PC-OC%20\(2013\)%201%20Summary%20and%20Com%20ilation%20of%20Replies%20Quest%20judgements%20in%20absentia%20and%20the%20possibility%20of%20retryal.pdf%201%20Summary%20and%20Com%20ilation%20of%20Replies%20Quest%20judgements%20in%20absentia%20and%20the%20possibility%20of%20retryal.pdf).

¹⁴⁰ See also Sect. 63 of the Criminal Procedure Code, Chapter 155 of the laws of Cyprus.

¹⁴¹ Paraskeva 2015, p. 212.

persons and fostering the application of the principle of mutual recognition to decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned at the trial. The courts are now under an obligation (as opposed to this being within their discretion before) to fill in Annex A reproduced from the amending FD. The new legal framework has been perceived positively by the Cypriot courts as giving them additional discretionary grounds to refuse the execution of an EAW (even if no judgments seem to have been issued in absentia so far).¹⁴²

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1–2.3.4.2 As previously noted, judges in Cyprus try to ensure that EAWs are executed.¹⁴³ Beyond the legal framework as developed above, no further information is available on the assistance which Cyprus extends to its own nationals in extradition procedures. Generally and in terms of issuing EAWs, there have been cases where persons requested under an EAW issued by the Cypriot authorities and executed in another Member State have been subsequently cleared of charges by the courts in Cyprus.¹⁴⁴ There have also been cases where EU nationals extradited to Cyprus under an EAW have been found guilty by the Cypriot courts and transferred back to their country to serve their sentence.¹⁴⁵ Cyprus, however, remains a place for fugitives to hide in the areas not under the effective control of its government, where the application of EU law is suspended, thereby avoiding EAWs issued by Cypriot or other Member States' authorities.¹⁴⁶ There are, however, some (rare) examples of surrender of a requested persons under an EAW in connection with the illegal purchase of property in the occupied areas of the Republic of Cyprus, which falls under the category of 'fraud',¹⁴⁷ forming part of the 32 offences for which the requirement of double criminality has been lifted. On this basis, the UK surrendered a requested person under an EAW to the Cypriot authorities in accordance with the principle of mutual recognition and despite not having an equivalent offence under UK law.¹⁴⁸

¹⁴² See e.g. John Constantinides v. Attorney General, Civil Appeal No. 347/2014, 5 March 2015 (in Greek).

¹⁴³ See Christou et al. 2009, p. 113.

¹⁴⁴ See also <http://gmadvocates.com/cases/cypriot-businessman-brought-cyprus-under-european-arrest-warrant-found-be-innocent-charges>.

¹⁴⁵ <http://www.fairtrials.org/cases/michael-binnington-and-luke-atkinson/>.

¹⁴⁶ <http://www.bbc.com/news/uk-19485421>. For a detailed legal analysis of the application of EU law in Cyprus, including in relation to the areas not under the effective control of the government, see Laulhé Shaelou 2010a.

¹⁴⁷ See http://www.mfa.gov.cy/mfa/embassies/embassy_stockholm.nsf/ecsw19_en/ecsw19_en?OpenDocument.

¹⁴⁸ See <http://www.chroniclelive.co.uk/news/local-news/former-north-east-nightclub-owner-1363996>; see also Christou 2012, pp. 61–62.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection

2.3.5.1–2.3.5.4 There are mechanisms available in the Cypriot legal order that guarantee access to justice for individuals, such as the principle that time does not start running until full knowledge of the facts has been obtained. In administrative cases, if the Supreme Court has to decide on a matter of facts, it hears evidence first, including from other jurisdictions if necessary. The principle of mutual recognition is based on the mutual recognition of foreign law/judgments; this principle existed in Cyprus before it was applied in an EU context to civil and criminal matters, as Cyprus is a mixed legal system.¹⁴⁹ As such, the conception of the role of the courts in Cyprus has not really changed and remains, in the context of mutual recognition, mainly concerned with a review of coercive actions by the executive and the justification by the state for its actions.¹⁵⁰ In a wider framework, the courts in Cyprus may be criticised for privileging formalities over substance. The Apostolides v. Orams case is probably an example of extreme formalism through a literal interpretation of the meaning of losing a case ‘by default’ (lack of appearance) rather than on the merits, thereby taking the right to appear to the extreme.¹⁵¹

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The implementation of the Data Retention Directive raised serious constitutional problems in Cyprus and resulted in the Sixth Constitutional Amendment (Law 51 (I)/2010 of 4 June 2010) after a decision of the Supreme Court in Alexandrou (see below). The effect was the amendment of Art. 17(2) of the Constitution that provided for the limitations available for Art. 17(1). Article 17(1) states that ‘[e]very person has the right to respect for, and to the secrecy of, his correspondence and other communication if such other communication is made through means not prohibited by law’. The new provision of Art. 17(2) allows interference with the aforementioned right through data retention on the basis of a judicial order that relates to the investigation of serious crimes carrying a prison sentence of five years or more. That amendment remains in full force today despite the decision of the CJEU in Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others.¹⁵²

Originally, the Republic implemented the Directive with the Law 183(I)/2007 (as amended) that introduced a system for data retention along the lines the Directive requires. However, in terms of scope, the Law applied for any crime that is defined in Sect. 2(1) as ‘a felony’ either by the Criminal Code or any other ¹⁴⁹ See Hatzimihail 2013.

¹⁵⁰ Interview with Dr. Demetrios Hadjihambis, 9 January 2015.

¹⁵¹ Ibid.

¹⁵² Joined cases C-293/12 and 594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

legislation and/or which carries a maximum prison sentence of five years. Therefore, the Cypriot approach opted for the widest possible definition of serious crime, in order to resolve long-lasting problems relating to the law of evidence and to the empowerment of the police to effectively combat crime in general.

The constitutionality of Law 183(I)/2007 was examined by the Supreme Court in the case of *Alexandrou*¹⁵³ that concerned the criminal investigation and prosecution of an individual. The Supreme Court assessed whether to grant leave for certiorari in relation to an ex parte order of a first instance court that permitted the use of the data retention system. The reasoning of the Supreme Court needs to be examined carefully because the decision in Alexandrou is often wrongly cited as an example of national reaction to the Directive's approach.

In reality, the Court disassociated the implementation of the Directive from Law 183(I)/2007 despite the fact that the preamble of the legislation expressly stated implementation of the Directive as its intention. The consequence of that disassociation was that the relevant Law was a national measure that had no connection with EU law, and thus could not benefit from the protective scope of Art. 1A of the Constitution. This reasoning of the Supreme Court was formed by relying on the ECJ ruling in Ireland v. Parliament and Council,¹⁵⁴ from which it deduced that since the Directive was adopted on the correct legal basis (Art. 95 EC that provides for harmonising measures for the common market), then as a corollary the Directive has as its only purpose exactly that. Therefore, the Supreme Court construed the ECJ ruling as limiting the scope of application of the Directive only to matters relating to the legal basis upon which the adoption of the Directive was based. Criminal law and the effective combating of crime were outside the scope of the Directive and therefore the relevant national legislation was disconnected from the Directive. Moreover, it must be noted that the Supreme Court did not examine the provisions of the Directive per se, as that was held to be unnecessary since the ECJ had already examined the purpose of the Directive. In addition, the Supreme Court did not consider whether it was necessary to submit a preliminary reference. The outcome of the preceding reasoning was to approach the relevant law as purely domestic in content and, as such, as unconstitutional and in conflict with Art. 17 (1) of the Constitution.

The judgment paved the way for the Sixth Constitutional Amendment. It must be noted that the constitutional amendment cannot on its own regulate the area in full and hence a legislative act was required in order to specify the scope and manner of application of what the amendment permitted. The only legislation in force that practically enables access to electronic data remains Law 183(I)/2007 that has as its stated aim the implementation of the Directive. Therefore, the retention of data became a domestic issue and policy engraved in the Constitution, but its application is governed by legislation intended to implement the Directive. Moreover, that legislation was held by the Supreme Court to be going beyond the proper scope of the Directive that was identified as relating only to market harmonisation. This creates a constitutional paradox since the matter of data retention in its criminal law context seems to have been regulated in Cyprus as a matter of national law and not EU law. This poses the question whether in the absence of the Directive such a course of action would have been followed, and the answer can only be negative.

¹⁵³ Alexandrou [2010] 1 CLR 17.

¹⁵⁴ Case C-301/06 Ireland v. Parliament and Council [2009] ECR I-00593.

Before the entry into force of the Constitutional Amendment, a case came before the Supreme Court that touched upon similar matters. In Demetris Siamishis,¹⁵⁵ the Supreme Court had to examine the constitutionality of the execution of a data retention order that chronologically took place prior the introduction of the Sixth Amendment. The case concerned an appeal from a criminal conviction, and since the appeal could only take into account the law as it stood at the time of the conviction, that conviction was held by the Supreme Court to be unstable as it had taken into account evidence obtained via infringement of the right to privacy. The Court emphasised the connection between the Directive and Law 183(I)/2007, which was considered to be an act implementing the Directive and as such enjoyed the protective status under Art. 1A of the Constitution. It therefore becomes puzzling to compare the preceding statement with the rationale of the decision in Alexandrou, and there is clearly inconsistency as to whether Art. 1A could apply to Law 183(I)/2007. If Demetris Siamishis is good law, then there was no need for amending the Constitution. If Alexandrou is good law, then there should not be any substantially different approach in Demetris Siamishis.

The next important decision that followed the Constitutional Amendment was that in Christos Matsia.¹⁵⁶ The details of the case are crucial since the case was decided after the aforementioned amendment, but the relevant orders instructing the telecommunications company to make the data retained available to the police were issued prior to the amendment. The Supreme Court in a much lengthier judgment approached the issue of the relation of Law 183(I)/2007 and the proper implementation of the Directive, and reached the same conclusion as in Alexandrou. It was held that the Law exceeded what was required for the implementation of the Directive and was therefore beyond the scope of Art. 1A of the Constitution and, by implication, beyond the relevant supremacy clause that would have shielded Law 183(I)/2007 from a finding of unconstitutionality. The new element in the reasoning of the Supreme Court was that the Court expressly stated that '[t]he Law in question exceeds the necessary and proportionate of what the obligations of the Republic entail under EU law'.¹⁵⁷ That conclusion was solely justified by full citation of paras. 80–85 of the CJEU's decision in Ireland v. Parliament and Council.

The new element in Christos Matsia was the analysis of the importance of the right to privacy and the detailed citation of its development through the case law, with specific reference to the jurisprudence of the ECtHR. However, at no point was there a comparison of the standards applied under pre-existing national jurisprudence and under the ECHR with the EU standard, hence no criticism of the Directive was in any way attempted. The key point is that the right to privacy provided the benchmark, and that right did not form part of the argumentation that the ECJ had adopted in Ireland v. Parliament and Council. This was a clear example of a situation in which a preliminary reference should have been submitted to the CJEU with the same content as the subsequent references in Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others.

¹⁵⁵ [2011] 2 CLR 308.

¹⁵⁶ [2011] 1 CLR 152.

¹⁵⁷ Paragraph 170 of the Judgment (translation by the author).

After the entry into force of the Sixth Constitutional Amendment, the Supreme Court consistently held that the data retention system was constitutionally permissible as a matter of national law. From that case law, reference can be made to two judgments that were chronologically subsequent to the ECJ judgment in Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others. In the case of *Attorney General v. Isaia*¹⁵⁸ and in the case of Sikifantou,¹⁵⁹ the important issue was the impact of the ECJ decision in Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others on the system of data retention that Law 183(I)/2007 introduced. Surprisingly, the Supreme Court in both cases stated that ‘the impact of the CJEU’s ruling is apparent’ since ‘Law 183 (I)/2007, according to its preamble, was adopted for the purpose of implementing the Directive on Data Retention’. Nonetheless, the ‘apparent’ is problematic given the earlier finding in Alexandrou; however, in the case of Attorney General v. Isaia, the Court, by a majority, relied on exactly that statement.

In that case the majority of the Supreme Court held that the annulment of the Directive does not impact on the case before it because Law 183(I)/2007 remains in force as a national measure. The majority decision was extremely brief on the matter and made no mention of the Directive or the ECJ judgment that annulled it. The Court insisted on the existence of a clear distinction between the Directive and Law 183(I)/2007, thus following the rationale and approach of the earlier case law on the matter. It is submitted that such a distinction is formalistic and distorts the legislative intent that was clearly stated in the preamble of Law 183(I)/2007.

The minority judgment (Nathanael and Nicolatos JJ) adopted a rather different approach on the matter. The emphasis was placed on the ECJ decision in Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others and on the argumentation that the ECJ applied especially in relation to the principle of proportionality. The conclusion reached stated that Law 183(I)/2007 was founded on the Directive, and that becomes evident from the preamble of the Law. As a result of the annulment of the Directive, the ‘legitimising foundation’ of the Law disappears and takes with it the totality of the system that enables the police to have access to the retained data. Therefore, the issue arises whether the minority considers Law 183(I)/2007 as being invalid and, if yes, on what basis, given the existence of the Sixth Constitutional Amendment.

To summarise, the approach of the Supreme Court in the area of data retention, either as a matter of EU law or as a matter of national constitutional law, is inconsistent and inherently problematic. The Supreme Court has in effect necessitated a Constitutional Amendment that altered the balance of the content of the right to privacy. The consequence is that the implementation of the Directive has become a matter of national law, irrespective of the stated intention in the preamble of the relevant Law. Therefore, the subsequent annulment of the Directive by the CJEU becomes irrelevant, whereas the whole issue arose out of the need to implement the Directive. This is clearly conceptually cyclical, structurally unsound and constitutionally heretical.

¹⁵⁸ Case 402/2012, 07 July 2014.

¹⁵⁹ Case 213/2014, 18 December 2014.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 Articles 3 and 104 of the Constitution require the publication of all laws as an essential requirement for their validity. There is no case law nor academic comment on this point. The principle of due publication is implicitly also embodied in the principle of good administration.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 As a background to this important part of the Report for Cyprus, the reader should be reminded of the fact that Art. 41 of the 2003 Act of Accession provided that the European Commission had the power to ‘adopt measures to facilitate the transition’ of the new Member States to the regime of the Common Agricultural Policy.¹⁶⁰ The European Commission therefore adopted Regulation (EC) No 1972/2003¹⁶¹ (for agricultural products) and Regulation (EC) 60/2004¹⁶² (for the sugar market) on this basis, mainly in order to avoid the risk of speculation. Both Regulations required the new Member States to levy charges on holders of surplus stocks on 1 May 2004 for products in free circulation. With respect to the sugar market more specifically,¹⁶³ Art. 6(1) of Regulation No 60/2004 required the European Commission to determine by 31 October 2004 at the latest, for each ¹⁶⁰ See Laulhé Shaelou 2010b, pp. 496–497.

¹⁶¹ Commission Regulation (EC) No 1972/2003 of 10 November 2003 on transitional measures to be adopted in respect of trade in agricultural products on account of the accession of the Czech Republic, Estonia, Cyprus, Latvia, Lithuania, Hungary, Malta, Poland, Slovenia and Slovakia, [2004] OJ 2003 L 293/3.

¹⁶² Commission Regulation (EC) No 60/2004 of 14 January 2004 laying down transitional measures in the sugar sector by reason of the accession of the Czech Republic, Estonia, Cyprus, Latvia, Lithuania, Hungary, Malta, Poland, Slovenia and Slovakia, [2004] OJ L 9/8.

¹⁶³ For litigation regarding other agricultural products, see Laulhé Shaelou 2010b pp. 498–500.

Member State, the quantity of sugar as such or in processed products exceeding ‘the quantity considered as being normal carry-over stock at 1 May 2004’, which needed to be eliminated from the market ‘at the expense of the new Member States’. Article 6(2) also provided that Member States had to eliminate such quantities in excess by 30 April 2005, as determined by the Commission. For this purpose, Art. 6(3) of the Regulation required the new Member States to dispose on 1 May 2004 of a system for the identification of traded or produced surplus quantities and to use the system to compel the operators concerned to eliminate quantities at their own expense. The burden of proof was on the operators and, if not satisfied by 30 April 2005, the new Member States were entitled to charge an amount to the operators concerned. With Commission Regulation (EC) No 832/2005,¹⁶⁴ the European Commission fixed the surplus quantities to be eliminated for each new Member State, taking into consideration activities in the sugar sector of each new Member State before accession (period 1 May 2003–30 April 2004 compared to the average of quantities in the same period for the three previous years). The figure for Cyprus was 40,213 tonnes. The Commission subsequently extended the deadlines with Commission Regulation (EC) No 651/2005.¹⁶⁵

At the national level, Law 40(1)/2005 was passed to implement the Commission Regulations on the transitional measures in the sector of agricultural goods. The Ministry of Commerce, Industry and Tourism, appointed as the competent authority, had informed the operators of Regulation 60/2004 prior to accession and, upon accession, had requested the relevant information from the operators. In 2005, it set out the surplus quantity for each operator and, in 2006, it proceeded with issuing penalties against the operators concerned on the basis of Art. 5(1) of Law 40(1)/2005.¹⁶⁶ Two administrative actions were therefore taken by the Ministry of Commerce on the basis of Law 40(1)/2005: (i) a decision dated 2 August 2005, requesting the addressees to eliminate the surplus quantities allocated to them by 30 November 2005; and (ii) a decision dated 21 August 2006, imposing a penalty on the operators who did not comply (or only partly complied) with the first decision. As a result, 33 recourses were introduced before the Supreme Court of Cyprus against the 2005 decision, as well as 18 recourses against the 2006 decision, totalling 51 actions which were joined and brought before the Full Chamber of the Supreme Court. In fact, there were actually 52 actions in total, but one of them was judged on the merits on 16 July 2007 by a single judge chamber.¹⁶⁷ Judge Hadjihambis ruled in this case

¹⁶⁴ Commission Regulation (EC) No 832/2005 of 31 May 2005 on the determination of surplus quantities of sugar, isoglucose and fructose for the Czech Republic, Estonia, Cyprus, Latvia, Lithuania, Hungary, Malta, Poland, Slovenia and Slovakia, [2005] OJ L 138/3.

¹⁶⁵ Commission Regulation (EC) No 651/2005 of 28 April 2005 amending Regulation (EC) No 60/2004 laying down transitional measures in the sugar sector by reason of the accession of the Czech Republic, Estonia, Cyprus, Latvia, Lithuania, Hungary, Malta, Poland, Slovenia and Slovakia, [2005] OJ L 108/3.

¹⁶⁶ Laulhé Shaelou 2010b, pp. 496–497.

¹⁶⁷ Morphis Morphy & Associates Ltd v. RoC through Ministry of Commerce, Case No. 121/2007, 16 July 2007.

that the system put in place for calculating the surplus quantities fell within the scope of Commission Regulation No 60/2004, due to the margin of discretion left to the new Member States to determine the method for such calculation.¹⁶⁸ The case was appealed¹⁶⁹ but the Supreme Court decided that this appeal would not be heard until a decision had been issued in the 51 other actions.

During the process of judicial review of administrative actions under Art.146 of the Constitution, an act must be deemed both administrative and executory in order to be reviewed. An act is deemed executory if it is ‘determinative in itself of the rights and obligations of a person under the authority of the administration’, and the Supreme Court examines whether an act is executory ex proprio motu.¹⁷⁰ On 13 July 2011, the Supreme Court (Full Chamber) considered the 33 joined actions challenging the 2005 decision¹⁷¹ and ruled that the 2005 decision was not executory in view of the 2006 decision which imposed the penalties. It therefore rejected the 33 actions based on preliminary objections. On 21 March 2013, the Supreme Court (Full Chamber) reconvened to consider the 18 recourses for judicial review of the 2006 decision. The Court found (preliminary objections) that the 2005 and 2006 decisions constituted a series of two administrative actions and could be reviewed by the Court in accordance with the Chrikar jurisprudence. It then considered the following grounds for review: (i) retroactivity of taxation prohibited by Art. 24 of the Constitution; (ii) lack of reasonable and due inquiry; (iii) lack of due reasoning; and (iv) lack of competence. The Court ruled that the consideration of the retroactivity of the charge, at the constitutional level, was not ‘necessary’ in order to establish the ratio of the case and gave no further explanation as to why this was so. The Court then found several reasons why there was a lack of due inquiry on the part of the Republic of Cyprus. For instance, it noted that there was no system specified by law as of 1 May 2004, but on 15 April 2005 (Art. 6 Law 40(I)/105 provided for the retroactive ratification of acts taken during this period). It noted the absence of a legal system duly notifying natural and legal persons of their rights and obligations. Since the surplus quantities had not been established with certainty, the Court found that there was no need to refer to the ECJ and distinguished the facts of the present case from the ones arising in the Balbiino case referred to the ECJ by the Tallinn Administrative Court (Estonia) in the ‘sugar saga’.¹⁷² The Court further ruled that there was a lack of justification in the methods of assessment and identification of surpluses and, finally, that there was lack of competence, since the Minister himself had not authorised the actions.

¹⁶⁸ Laulhé Shaelou 2010b, p. 499.

¹⁶⁹ The Appeal, scheduled for 12 September 2014 for procedural considerations, was withdrawn. The action was initially based on its compatibility with EU law, the violation of constitutional rights – no retroactivity of taxation, right to trade and non-discrimination, and finally on a review of administrative actions.

¹⁷⁰ Emilianides 2013, p. 197.

¹⁷¹ Chrikar Trading and others [2011] 3 CLR 541.

¹⁷² Case C-560/07 Balbiino [2009] ECR I-04447. For a review of the relevant litigation in the new Member States, see Albi 2009 and Lazowski 2010.

The Court's decision in the above case was based on the principles of sound administration as established in Law 158(I)/1999 on the General Principles of Administrative Law. As seen in Sect. 2.1, this law is a source of constitutional law as it refers to matters of public law. Some principles like retroactivity and non-discrimination are protected both under the Constitution and this law. But since an Art. 146 recourse is limited by nature to considerations of administrative law and does not extend to a review of constitutionality, it would appear that only the constitutional principles expressly mentioned among the general principles of administrative law are implicit in a review of administrative actions under Art. 146 (namely the protection of legitimate expectations and the principle of proportionality). Even so, it would appear that they will only be considered by the Court when necessary for the establishment of the ratio of the case. This is also true of rights protected expressly under the Constitution, but the Court will not raise constitutional issues out of its own motion.¹⁷³

Thus, contrary to constitutional courts in other new Member States such as Hungary, Estonia and the Czech Republic,¹⁷⁴ the Supreme Court in Cyprus did not consider any constitutional issues raised in the sugar cases. It restrained itself to a mere control of administrative actions. There is no reference to the EU legal framework either, even if the supremacy of EU law appears to be implicit. To the extent that this decision of the Supreme Court relieves operators from penalties, it could be said to participate in the protection of individual (economic) rights. It is also a clear signal to the public administration in Cyprus that despite EU accession, legal certainty in administrative procedures must prevail and no lowering of national standards is permitted by the Court.¹⁷⁵ It is argued that this finding could be of utmost significance, especially in the context of the financial crisis (on concerns about the protection of property rights in a dissenting opinion in the ‘bail-in’ case, see Sect. 2.7.3).

In the meantime, Cyprus requested the annulment of Regulation 651/2005 before the General Court of the EU because it argued that it changed its legal situation under Regulation 60/2004.¹⁷⁶ The General Court found on the contrary that the amendments with respect to Cyprus were purely procedural and that the act (as amended) had become final vis-à-vis Cyprus since it had not been challenged within the deadline.¹⁷⁷ The action was therefore found inadmissible. However, this was based on the findings of the General Court that there was no need to be a Member State to challenge generally applicable acts under (then) Art. 230 EC, and that it was sufficient to be a legal person.¹⁷⁸ The General Court had concluded that there was no violation of the principle of effective judicial protection towards ¹⁷³ Interview with Dr. Demetrios Hadjihambis, 20 August 2014.

¹⁷⁴ See Albi 2009, Lazowski 2010 and Laulhé Shaelou 2010b.

¹⁷⁵ Interview with Dr. Demetrios Hadjihambis, 20 August 2014.

¹⁷⁶ Joined Cases T-300/05 and T-316/05 Republic of Cyprus v. Commission [2009] ECR II-00192.

¹⁷⁷ Ibid., paras. 258–260.

¹⁷⁸ Ibid., paras. 241, 245.

Cyprus in this case.¹⁷⁹ The ECJ however overruled the specific finding of the General Court on the locus standi of new Member States in the Polish case seeking the annulment of Regulation 1972/2003, finding that the General Court had erred in law.¹⁸⁰ Cyprus did not appeal the decision of the General Court although its arguments with respect to Regulation 651/2005 had not been heard, contrary to Poland for whom Regulation 735/2004 was found to make substantial changes to Regulation 1972/2003 and whose action was deemed admissible, thereby raising the question of effective judicial protection vis-à-vis Cyprus.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1–2.7.2 The constitutionality of the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) has not been directly raised in Cyprus despite the fact that the Supreme Court had to examine the legality of the ‘bail-in’ that was imposed on Cyprus. Specifically, issues relating to the structure of the financial stability mechanism and its actual funding were not discussed in connection with budget autonomy and responsibility. Moreover, no constitutional amendment was introduced in relation to those matters or Eurobonds and the Banking Union.

2.7.3 Some of the case law regarding the impact of austerity measures on constitutional rights was provided in Sect. 2.2.

A further central case regarding the judicial protection of property rights and judicial review concerned the ‘bail-in’ measures in 2013. As is explained in Sect. 3.5, the bail-in decision resulted from a political agreement at the Eurogroup level and had the effect of imposing a levy amounting to partial confiscation of all unsecured deposits, that is below 100,000 EUR, in the two systemic Cypriot banks.

The legality of the measures adopted to impose the ‘bail-in’ were contested in Myrto Christodoulou,¹⁸¹ or what is referred to in the rest of the Report as the ‘bail in’ case. The majority decision, taking an unsatisfactory position, classified the matter as one belonging to the sphere of private law, and therefore the proper course of action was to initiate actions for damage for breach of contract and tort law. Therefore, the issue was not one of administrative law, as it concerned the relationship between depositors and the banks, and the recourse filed under Art. 146 of the Constitution was dismissed. In terms of the civil actions, the criterion to be applied was whether the loss suffered would have been greater if the ‘bail-in’ had not taken place. This criterion was mentioned eight times in the judgment of the majority. The majority judgment did not examine the EU aspect of the matter nor consider the possibility of sending a preliminary reference.

¹⁷⁹ Ibid., paras. 242–247.

¹⁸⁰ Case C-335/09 P Poland v. Commission [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:385.

¹⁸¹ Myrto Christodoulou [2013] 3 CLR 427.

In contrast to that formalistic approach, the dissenting judgment by Judge Eerotokritou takes a different and much more preferable approach that is perhaps the most complete attempt in Cyprus to discuss the nature of the principle of primacy of EU law and its relationship with national constitutional law. Judge Eerotokritou stated that the matter is one that relates to human rights, as it affects the right to property as protected under Art. 17 of the EU Charter and under Protocol 1 ECHR, as well as under Art. 23 of the Constitution. The adopted approach is so important that it necessitates fuller citations:

Recent events in Europe due to the financial crisis and the measures taken, give the impression that not only international law, but also the European and national law seems to be rewritten. It is therefore imperative in order to safeguard the rights of the parties arising from the TEU, to give the chance to national administrative courts to control not only the legality of the contested acts, but also the compatibility of the various national laws which led to the contested measures with EU law.

In this part, the dissenting judgment raises the point that the situation that is emerging is one that deviates from pre-existing EU law and creates a new set of factors that are different from those upon which the relationship between national law and EU law has been based so far. Therefore, the ‘bail-in issue’ is rightly approached as an issue exceeding the consensus that pre-existed, thus necessitating the scrutiny of the compatibility of the new EU/international law measures with the rights arising from EU law. Judge Eerotokritou continued:

Where conflict is found and there is no ambiguity, Union law is to be applied, as it takes precedence and is directly applicable. Where conflict is found, but the requisite clarity as to the content and validity of the provisions of Union law is not present, then the national court has the power under Art. 267 TFEU to apply with a preliminary question to the CJEU calling either for the interpretation of certain provisions of EU law, e.g. free movement of capital (Art. 63 TEU), or for a ruling on the validity of specific legal instruments of the EU institutions. With this assistance, the national court may now proceed to examine the compatibility of national law with EU law.

In this part of the approach, Judge Eerotokritou focused on the use of the preliminary reference procedure as a useful tool for exercising the national judicial power of scrutiny. In addition, Judge Eerotokritou stated:

National sovereignty undoubtedly gives way to the supremacy of European law and rightly so I would say. But it seems that the further erosion of that national sovereignty and the parallel erosion of fundamental rights, often through informal procedures should at some stage be scrutinised by the CJEU, albeit indirectly through Article 267, as to whether it is compatible with the primary law of the European Union.

This is perhaps the centre of gravity of the approach of Judge Eerotokritou. The judge adopts a pragmatic approach that accepts the limitation of national sovereignty as a logical consequence of the need to apply the principle of primacy of EU law. This indirectly refers to the nature of the EU system as being founded on the principle of conferred powers that the Member States have voluntarily transferred to the Union. It is respectfully submitted that if this point would have been specifically included in the dissenting opinion, then it would have acquired a more holistic theoretical and substantial character in relation to the way that the national constitutional system sees the Union. This would therefore have formed an opportunity for starting to express the inherent reservations as regards the principle of primacy of EU law and for starting to set the limits to the acceptance of the principle.

The next argument is also very interesting, as it identifies the problem that is created by any further unilateral alteration of the equilibrium that relates to the transfer of sovereignty to the EU and to the corresponding application of the principle of primacy of EU law. This becomes especially relevant if the impact of the alteration is directed towards the protection of fundamental rights and has as a result a unilateral and substantial shift in competences. However, this point could have been further explained as having the meaning that any expansion of EU competences at the expense of national sovereignty in a way that structurally affects the constitutional identity cannot be accepted by the national legal order and even by the ECJ.

One cannot avoid making the comparison of the dissenting decision with the decision and the reasoning of the Bundesverfassungsgericht in the Honeywell case.¹⁸² There it was held that the ultra vires review by the Federal Constitutional Court, namely the striking down of an EU act, can only be considered by the national court if a breach of competences on the part of the European bodies is manifestly in breach of competences and the impugned act led to a structurally significant shift in the structure of competences that is to the detriment of the Member States. A reference to this judgment would have given an essential element of justification to the argument that Judge Ertokritou was making. This would have been useful also because the Judge impliedly followed the reasoning of the German Court by requiring the CJEU to scrutinise the potential erosion of competences, thus placing the responsibility on the CJEU and not solely on the national court. This reflects exactly the inherent idea that the relationship between national constitutional law and EU law is one that both parties have an obligation to safeguard in order for the relationship to remain one of partnership. Judge Ertokritou continued to reinforce exactly the preceding point by stating that:

In the EU legal system, the supremacy of the rule of law and of legal protection, which form a fundamental principle of the European Union and which are inextricably intertwined with the Republic, can not be eliminated through the creation of exemptions from judicial administrative control, each time for various reasons national governments are in trouble and take decisions which violate basic human rights that are derived from the legal order of the European Union and generally from the European acquis communautaire. The legal restrictions imposed by the Constitution on the exercise of state power must be maintained even in critical and difficult conditions such as those that exist today, in order to ensure the supremacy of the rule of law and of the principle of legality.

To summarise, the approach is the best and only example of real discussion about the nature of the relationship between national constitutional law and the principle of primacy of EU law in Cyprus. The approach by Judge Ertokritou contains many important structural and substantive points that reflect the theoretical perspective about the principle of primacy of EU law and which has two dimensions: that of the CJEU and that of the national Constitution. Moreover, Judge Eerotokritou places both parties under an obligation to safeguard the delicate equilibrium in order to prevent any unilateral alterations that could create a clash. In doing so, Judge Eerotokritou removes the possibility of tensions arising by requiring the national court to first submit a preliminary reference. This is the same approach inherent in Honeywell. The identification of the delicate issue of fundamental rights and the indirect reference to competences through the connection with the erosion of national sovereignty is also in line with the rich jurisprudence of other national constitutional courts.

¹⁸² BVerfG, Order of 06 July 2010 - 2 BvR 2661/06 - Rn. (1-116).

Nonetheless, the approach of Judge Eerotokritou also does not go far enough and does not fully elaborate on all the crucial points that it raised. The lack of any reference to the jurisprudence of other national constitutional courts, including Honeywell, is one such step short of full elaboration.

The last point to be made is that the dissenting opinion was unfortunately not endorsed by the majority. Nonetheless, it is submitted that the fact that views expressed were not endorsed by the majority does not pre-empt the subsequent adoption of the reasoning of Judge Eerotokritou as the formula that the Supreme Court can apply to the primacy of EU law. The dissenting judgment exists and can always be used to supplement the already incomplete approach of the Supreme Court on this issue, regardless of the different views of the majority on one specific matter, i.e. bail-in.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1–2.8.6 The characteristics of judicial review in the Cypriot legal order have already been addressed elsewhere in this Report.¹⁸³ Overall, standing requirements have been said to be construed broadly by the Supreme Court, thereby ‘guaranteeing the procedural access to effective judicial protection’.¹⁸⁴ As a manifestation of the doctrine of separation of powers, the Supreme Court in Cyprus seems to be responsible for keeping the balance between access to judicial review and the good administration of justice.¹⁸⁵ This duty appears to extend also to indirect judicial review in the context of preliminary references to the CJEU.

¹⁸³ See e.g. Sects. 2.1.3, 2.2 and 2.6 above. No statistical data regarding annulment and relevant grounds is available.

¹⁸⁴ Kombos 2010b, pp. 329 and 350.

¹⁸⁵ Ibid., p. 338.

It should be noted in this respect that the Courts Law of 1960, as amended,¹⁸⁶ used to provide for a right of appeal against decisions of lower courts to refer or not to refer a matter to the CJEU, limited initially (in 2007) to instances where the court ruled on the basis of an application made by one of the parties to the case, and subsequently extended (in 2008) to cases where the courts would decide to refer on their own motion. The authors of the present Report respectively provided at the time an extensive critical analysis of the right to refer or not to refer a matter to the CJEU.¹⁸⁷ Suffice to note here that following the Cartesio case,¹⁸⁸ the Law since 2009 provides that no such appeal is possible.

Following the removal of the right to appeal decisions of lower courts to refer or not to refer to the CJEU, it can be said that lower courts are quite free to use the preliminary reference mechanism, including in matters of interpretation and validity of EU legal acts. However, the first preliminary reference to the CJEU from a court other than the Supreme Court only came in 2013 and did not concern matters of validity of EU legal acts.¹⁸⁹ In the meantime, the lower courts have gradually developed their legal reasoning in terms of dealing with requests from applicants to refer questions of interpretation of EU law to the CJEU, but still too often reject such requests with little justification, resulting in a very low number of preliminary references to the CJEU from such courts (three in total).¹⁹⁰ As far as the Supreme Court is concerned, only four preliminary references have been made to date.¹⁹¹ These four references appear to indicate a steady trend towards the progressive awareness and ‘mastering’ of the preliminary reference mechanism by the Court.¹⁹² Suffice to note here that none of these references appears to raise issues of validity of EU legal acts.

Regarding concerns about a gap in judicial review, in the context of the financial crisis measures, it might be worth briefly recalling the concern in the dissenting opinion of Judge Eerotokritou (Sect. 2.7.3) that in the intertwined EU legal order ‘the rule of law and legal protection can not be eliminated through the creation of exemptions from judicial administrative control, each time for various reasons national governments are in trouble and take decisions which violate basic human rights’.

¹⁸⁶ Law 14 of 1960, Sect. 25, new sub-sect. 2A, as amended in 2007, 2008 and 2009.

¹⁸⁷ Laulhé Shaelou 2010b; Kombos 2010b. For a comprehensive, unpublished study see Lycourgos 2014.

¹⁸⁸ Case C-210/06 Cartesio [2008] ECR I-09641.

¹⁸⁹ Sotiris (Akis) Papasavvas v. O Philelftheros Dimosia Eteria ltd and others, Nicosia District Court, Case No. 9493/10, 27 March 2013 (in Greek).

¹⁹⁰ Court of Justice of the European Union, Annual report 2013, Luxembourg 2014, pp. 118.

¹⁹¹ Ibid.

¹⁹² Especially Cypra Ltd v. the Republic, Administrative Appeal 78/2009, 5 June 2013 and Alpha Bank Cyprus Ltd v. Si Senh Dau and others, Joined Civil Appeals E23/2013-E29/2013, 13 September 2013 (in Greek). See Laulhé Shaelou 2010b.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 There have been no further notable developments in Cyprus.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1–2.10.2 The influence and impact of the common constitutional traditions on the definition and interpretation of concepts of EU law has been minimal. From the Cypriot perspective, the matter has not been examined by the Supreme Court, but it can be argued that the opportunity to do so was missed in the ‘bail-in’ case and in relation to social rights that form a distinct and important part of the national Constitution. Reference can be made to the rather unique passage in Art. 9 of the Constitution that states ‘[e]very person has the right to a decent existence and to social security. A law shall provide for the protection of the workers, assistance to the poor and for a system of social insurance.’

Nonetheless, the content and scope of the preceding provision is rather idiosyncratic and specifically relevant to the Cypriot context, even if a parallel can perhaps be found in the German Basic Law and the fundamental principle of the ‘social state’. It would however be difficult to establish the universality of the principle to the required extent that would qualify it as forming part of the common constitutional traditions. The same could apply in relation to various other national constitutional principles to be found in other jurisdictions. The issue can also be assessed through the perspective and the experience of the ECHR on margin of appreciation and European common ground. The key factor is the progression of time and the maturing of a legal principle that is reflected in the growing acceptance and adoption by the majority of the participating legal orders. In practical terms, the highlighting of the centrality of a legal system in the national constitutional order can be useful especially in the context of the preliminary reference procedure.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 The Cypriot constitutional system places considerable emphasis on the protection of fundamental rights and on the continuation of a fruitful relationship between the national Constitution and the ECHR. This relationship has been very close and can be characterised as an example of harmonious coexistence. The EU dimension of the matter creates de facto and de jure a legal triangle that governs the applicable standard of protection, but in the Cypriot context the issue has never been discussed fully. The prevailing approach, as can be seen in relation to the Data Retention Directive in Sect. 2.4, tends to isolate the EU aspect at least to the point where it resolves any clash with the national standards of protection in favour of the EU standard. Methodologically this is achieved by ‘nationalising’ the issue and by subsequently modifying the national standard; this is an unfortunate and problematic approach and outcome. Some cases where the Cypriot Constitution and the Supreme Court provide a higher standard of protection than the ECHR were noted in Sects. 1.1.2 and 2.1. Additionally, it will be recalled from Sect. 2.7.3 that Judge Erotokritou in a dissenting opinion has expressed concern about the ‘erosion of fundamental rights’ ‘often through informal procedures’.

At the general level, the constitutional triangle of protection must be ‘isosceles’. That would reflect the equality of the legal orders, which is a fundamental prerequisite for the symbiosis of legal orders. This argument is reinforced by two considerations. First, the respect for the constitutional identity of each system and secondly, because of the forthcoming accession of the EU to the ECHR system. As a result, the upwards modification of the EU standard that would favour the protection afforded to a fundamental right must be encouraged, as it will be constructive for both the right in question and for the relationship with national courts. The concept of deference is therefore to be reinforced, and the CJEU has shown such willingness in the Omega case.¹⁹³

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1–2.12.3 In relation to the democratic element as expressed through the participation in open discussions about EU measures bound to have a substantial impact on national constitutional values, it can be safely argued that in Cyprus no such deliberations took place at any stage in relation to the EAW or the Data Retention Directive. Moreover, when problems arose in those areas, the Supreme Court indirectly facilitated the opening of a democratic dialogue by requiring the introduction of constitutional amendments. This had the effect of creating a new opportunity for the legislature to discuss in full such matters before proceeding with the constitutional amendments, but the character of that discussion has remained the responsibility of the legislature and the executive. Normally in such situations the legislature invites professional bodies and experts to express their opinions, but such discussion is not conducted at the national level and the public remains largely disassociated. The matter is indeed important given the standing restrictions in relation to an action for annulment of an EU act and it also touches upon the legitimacy of the EU system. However, the fact that Member States through their elective representatives participate in the adoption and implementation of such EU acts cannot be ignored. The responsibility remains at the national level, and the creation of a specific procedure could be beneficial in terms of legitimacy, but it is questionable whether it could be effective and efficient. One such procedural route could be the assessment of legality prior to the entry into force of the EU act, at both the national and EU level. This, however, has to be assessed in relation to the privileged standing status of Member States and to the efficiency of the EU system. Moreover, issues of national procedural autonomy also arise and there is the potential of national constitutional courts engaging in the review of validity of EU acts in the making that would trigger the preliminary reference obligation for national courts of last resort. The other suggested option, recognising the fact that unconstitutionality has been identified in accordance with the domestic system of control of constitutionality as a defence for the Member State in an infringement proceeding, is problematic. This would occur at a later stage of the entry into force of the EU measure and would create differing levels of compliance for Member States, thus affecting the effectiveness of EU law.

¹⁹³ Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609. For analysis, see Kombos 2006.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.2 The symbiosis of the different standards of protection is proving problematic, but it is submitted that this has been the situation for decades, as the experience with the Solange jurisprudence¹⁹⁴ clearly indicates. The matter is nonetheless bound to come to the forefront of the discussion with the accession of the EU to the ECHR system, and it is perhaps crucial to assess the method and rules of accession especially after the recent approach of the CJEU in Opinion 2/2013.¹⁹⁵ This author acted as co-agent for Cyprus in those proceedings, and it can be argued that the concerns of the CJEU about the relationship between the two systems and the two Courts were evident in both the questionnaire sent to the intervening parties and in the questions that the CJEU raised during the oral stage of the proceedings.

To summarise, the concerns about the different standards of protection are legitimate but are not new; they form part of the history of the constitutional coexistence.

2.13.3 As regards the quality of the reasoning of the CJEU in cases concerning constitutional sensitivities, it is submitted that unfortunately the Cypriot Supreme Court has so far not raised such concerns or issues for that matter. The limited number of preliminary references submitted by Cypriot courts have concerned specific issues that did not relate to deep constitutional concerns.

In terms of the broader issue, it can be argued that the key is in the formulation of the preliminary reference by the national courts. The detailed statement of the national perception and of the relevant applicable jurisprudence can hopefully steer the approach of the CJEU towards a more detailed reasoning. Such examples, albeit ¹⁹⁴ Internationale Handelsgesellschaft mbH v Einfurh- und Vorratstelle für Getreide und Futtermittel [1974] 2 CMLR 540; Wünsche Handelsgesellschaft (Solange II) [1987] 3 CMLR 225.

¹⁹⁵ Opinion 2/13 Opinion pursuant to Art. 218(1) TFEU [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2454.

with varying success, can be found in the preliminary references in Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others and in Outright Monetary Transactions (OMT).¹⁹⁶ Moreover, the introduction of dissenting judgments would be beneficial for the clarity and completeness of the stated judicial reasoning, but there are strong informal signs that the CJEU is firmly against any such reform.

2.13.4 In the Cypriot context there is an urgent need to re-establish the boundaries between national constitutional law and EU law because the Fifth Constitutional Amendment and the approach of the Supreme Court have created a tight and restricted topos for airing national concerns about the shaping and upholding of constitutional rights and principles.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1–3.2 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification and Application of Treaties

The ratification of treaties in Cyprus¹⁹⁷ and the transfer of powers to international organisations need to be considered within the framework of the status of the Republic of Cyprus in public international law and the rigid nature of its Constitution, as already analysed in detail in Sect. 1.1. One of the peculiar implications for the Republic of Cyprus deriving from its unique constitutional setting relates to its membership in international organisations. It should be noted that almost from the date of its creation up to its accession to the EU (1961–2004), the Republic of Cyprus was a member of the non-aligned movement. Cyprus is also the only EU Member State that is not a member of NATO or of the Partnership for Peace Programme.¹⁹⁸ The relationship the Republic maintains with international organisations must of course be examined in the light of the de facto division of its territory and in view of the several attempts (including currently ongoing) to find a solution to the Cyprus problem.

The Council of Ministers has the power to conclude any international agreement by virtue of Arts. 50 and 54 of the Constitution. There is a difference between international agreements concluded with a foreign state or an international organisation falling under the scope of Art. 169(1) of the Constitution and relating to ‘commercial matters, economic co-operation and motus vivendi’, which are concluded under a decision of the Council of Ministers, and any other treaty, ¹⁹⁶ See respectively Joined cases C-293/12 and 594/12, n. 152; Case C-62/14 Gauweiler and Others [2015] ECLI:EU:C:2015:400.

¹⁹⁷ For a legal analysis of the reception of international legal agreements in the Cypriot national legal order, see Laulhé Shaelou 2010b, pp. 471–484; see also Laulhé Shaelou 2010a, pp. 130–140.

¹⁹⁸ Emilianides reports that ‘a decision of the House of Representatives that the Republic should apply for membership in the Partnership for Peace programme was vetoed by the President of the Republic Demetris Christofias on 2 March 2011’, Emilianides 2013, p. 20.

convention or international agreement falling under Art. 169(2) of the Constitution which requires such international agreements to be ‘negotiated and signed under a decision of the Council of Ministers’ but will ‘only be operative and binding on the Republic when approved by a law made by the House of Representatives whereupon it shall be concluded’. In accordance with Art. 169(3) of the Constitution, all such treaties, conventions and agreements have, ‘as from their publication in the official Gazette of the Republic, superior force to any municipal law on condition that such treaties, conventions and agreements are applied by the other party thereto’.¹⁹⁹ Article 170(1) of the Constitution further provides that the Republic of Cyprus ‘shall, by agreement on appropriate terms, accord most-favoured-nation treatment to the Kingdom of Greece, the Republic of Turkey and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland for all agreements whatever their nature might be’. The Treaty of Guarantee also provides in its Art. I that the Republic of Cyprus undertakes to ensure the maintenance of its independence, territorial integrity and security, as well as respect for its Constitution and undertakes not to participate, in whole or in part, in any political or economic union with any State whatsoever. It accordingly declares prohibited any activity likely to promote, directly or indirectly, either union with any other State or partition of the Island.

These provisions of the constitutional framework of the Republic of Cyprus were at the centre of legal debates prior to Cyprus joining the EU. A group of international legal experts concluded that none of these provisions were an obstacle to Cyprus’ EU membership.²⁰⁰

3.3–3.5 Democratic Control, Judicial Review and the Social Welfare Dimension

As for democratic control by the House of Representatives, it was already noted that most of the time democratic deliberations are non-existent or limited. The Constitution of Cyprus is, however, based on the principle of representative democracy.²⁰¹ Democratic debates within the House of Representatives take place on a regular basis but not systematically (referendums can take place upon a decision of the House of Representatives following a proposal from the Council of Ministers as per the Referendum Law No 286/1989, but are kept for issues of special importance and of public interest).²⁰² It was noted for example in the context of the run-up towards Cyprus’ EU accession that there was very little or no

¹⁹⁹ The role of the Supreme Court with respect in particular to the ECHR has already been developed in this Report.

²⁰⁰ Emilianides 2013, p. 212. For a pre-accession consideration of other debates surrounding the impact of Cyprus’ EU membership on the Constitution, including with respect to conflict of powers and transfer of powers, see Laulhé Shaelou 2010a, pp. 133–134.

²⁰¹ For a detailed description and analysis of the system of government in Cyprus including political parties and their role in the House of Representatives as interpreted recently by the Supreme Court, see Emilianides 2013, pp. 65–75.

²⁰² For a review of the Referendum Law, see Emilianides 2013, pp. 75–76.

democratic debate taking place in the Parliament, as Cyprus's strategy was mainly based on external considerations and concerns.²⁰³

More recently, however, mention should be made of the more active role currently played by the House of Representatives in the context of the EU/IMF macro-economic adjustment programme for Cyprus²⁰⁴ and of its pivotal role during the negotiations leading to the programme.²⁰⁵

The lack of judicial activism in respect of the same matter has been noted elsewhere in this Report.²⁰⁶

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 The constitutional amendment regarding extradition under international/European arrangements was discussed in the introduction to Sect. 2.3.

The question of what safeguards are available to avoid potentially arbitrary results in the context of an international arrest warrant arose in the case against Mr. Louka, requested by South Africa, signatory to the European Convention on Extradition since 2003, in George Louka v. Minister of Justice and Public Order.²⁰⁷ In the first decision, the Supreme Court had to review the (alleged) administrative decision of the Minister to sign the international arrest warrant issued against Mr. Louka. The lower court had considered the discretionary powers of the Minister to sign the said warrant as an 'acte de gouvernement', which meant that it fell beyond the scope of the Court's powers of review of administrative acts under Art. 146 of the Constitution. The recourse before the Supreme Court was therefore rejected. In the second decision, the Supreme Court ruled in final instance on the request for the issue of an order in the form of habeas corpus, as part of the prerogative orders under Art. 155(4) of the Constitution whereby the Court has the exclusive jurisdiction to review the action of a lower court, in order to determine the lawfulness of ²⁰³ Laulhé Shaelou 2010a, p. 42.

²⁰⁴ With respect for example to the legal framework regarding non-performing loans and the protection of the dwelling house.

²⁰⁵ See Sect. 2.7.3 and Laulhé Shaelou 2013.

²⁰⁶ See Sect. 2.7.3 for case law related to the bail-in and Sect. 2.2 for the austerity measures put in place in Cyprus as a result of the financial crisis. On 16 March 2013, a first political agreement was reached between the Eurogroup, IMF and the Cypriot authorities which included a one-off stability levy for all resident and non-resident depositors, both insured and uninsured. This political agreement was rejected by the House of Representatives on 19 March 2013. On 25 March 2013, a second political agreement was reached between the Eurogroup and the Cypriot authorities, supported by all euro area Member States and the international lenders on the policy Programme and the loan package associated with it (10bn EUR in total). The political agreement included inter alia bail-in measures for unsecured deposits in the two main Cypriot commercial banks and a resolution programme. The Memorandum of Understanding was signed between the Cypriot authorities, IMF and the European Commission on 26 April 2013. On 30 April 2013, the Programme was endorsed by the House of Representatives.

²⁰⁷ Case 5965/2013, 16 October 2013 and Case 124/2013, 8 January 2014.

the authority to detain a person—in this case Mr. Louka.²⁰⁸ Not surprisingly, the Court decided that in the case of international arrest warrants to be executed under the relevant law in Cyprus,²⁰⁹ the ultimate decision remains with the Minister who can exercise his discretion to sign the warrant. The Court characterised this discretionary power as ‘political’ and ‘executive’ in nature, intimately linked to the country’s international obligations, thereby falling beyond the scope of judicial control which it found had been effectively exhausted in this case, including with respect to the protection of fundamental human rights and in terms of access to justice. Finally, the Court noted that both the courts and the Minister examine the same criteria and therefore the scope of the examination ought to be different, taking a ‘political dimension’ in the case of the examination by the latter. It is hardly of any comfort to know that the judicial decision on the extradition of a person may ultimately be subject to political considerations independently of the judicial process accompanying the execution of the warrant. Given the role of the Ministry and the Attorney General in the issue/execution of arrest warrants, one is entitled to wonder what safeguards are available in the law to avoid potentially arbitrary results.

In general, in view of the characteristics of the Constitution as developed in this Report, many of them unique, and the lack of prospects for constitutional improvements pending a solution to the Cyprus problem,²¹⁰ it is debatable to what extent Cyprus is equipped to face a process of globalised constitutional governance.

References

- Albi A. (2005) EU Enlargement and the Constitutions of Central and Eastern Europe. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Albi A. (2009) Ironies in human rights protection in the EU: pre-accession conditionality and post-accession conundrums. ELJ 15:46–69.
- Besselink L. (2006) The Dutch Constitution, the European Constitution and the Referendum in the Netherlands. In: Albi A., Ziller J. (eds.) The European Constitution and National Constitutions: Ratification and Beyond. Kluwer, The Hague, pp. 149–156.

²⁰⁸ For prerogative orders, see Emilianides 2013, p. 124.

²⁰⁹ For the applicable legal framework, see http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/standardsetting/pc-oc/Country_information1_en_files/CYPRUS%20%20national%20procedures%20for%20extradition.pdf.

²¹⁰ For an attempt to submit a group of international agreements to a referendum in Cyprus (under the auspices of the UN and not within the framework of the Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus), mention should be made of the so-called Annan Plan put to a referendum in 2004 on both sides of the divide, allegedly promoting a comprehensive settlement to the Cyprus problem and creating a new constitutional framework for the country. See <http://www.hri.org/docs/annan/>. This Plan was rejected by the Greek Cypriot community and endorsed by the Turkish Cypriot community. For a legal analysis of the Plan from the point of view of EU law, see Laulhé Shaëlou 2010a, Chap. 6.

- Birkinshaw P., Kombos C. (2009) The UK Approach to the Emergence of European Constitutionalism – Repositioning the Debate: Departure from Constitutional Ontology and the Introduction of the Typological Discussion. In: Arnold R. (ed.) The Emergence of European Constitutional Law. Bruylant, Brussels, pp. 35–75.
- Christou T., Kousoupi E., Xanthaki H. (2009) Mutual recognition in criminal matters in Cyprus. European Journal of Law Reform 11(1):111 et seq.
- Christou T. (2012) The European Arrest Warrant and human rights in the context of the Republic of Cyprus. Cyprus Human Rights Law Review 1(1):57 et seq.
- De Smith S.A. (1964) The Commonwealth and its Constitutions. Penguin Books, London.
- Emilianides A. (2006) Beyond the Constitution of Cyprus. Sakkoulas, Thessaloniki.
- Emilianides A. (2013) Cyprus Constitutional Law. Wolters Kluwer, The Hague.
- Evriviades M. (1975) The Legal Dimension of the Cyprus Conflict. Texas International Law Journal 10:227 et seq.
- Gorski A., Hofmanski P. (eds.) (2008) The European Arrest Warrant and its implementation in the Member States of the EU. Wydawnictwo C.H. Beck, Warsaw.
- Hatzimihail N. (2013) Cyprus as a Mixed Legal System. Journal of Civil Law Studies 6 (1):37–96.
- Kapardis A. (2008) The European Arrest Warrant in Cyprus and constitutional concerns. In Gorski A., Hofmanski P. (eds.) (2008) The European Arrest Warrant and its implementation in the Member States of the EU. Wydawnictwo C.H. Beck, Warsaw.
- Kombos C. (2006) Fundamental Rights and Fundamental Freedoms: A Symbiosis on the basis of Subsidiarity. EPL 12 (3):433 et seq.
- Kombos C. (2010a) The Esoteric Dimension of Constitutional Pluralism. In: Birkinshaw P., Varney M. (eds.) The End of the 1992 Legal Order. Kluwer, Alphen Aan Den Rijn, pp. 291–323.
- Kombos C. (2010b) The Supreme Court's of Cyprus and the CJEU's Approach to Standing for Judicial Review and to the Preliminary Reference Procedure. EPL 16(3):327–355.
- Kombos C. (2015a) The Doctrine of Necessity in Constitutional Law. Sakkoulas, Athens.
- Kombos C. (2015b) The Impact of EU Law on Cypriot Public Law. Sakkoulas, Athens.
- Kombos C., Arrestis G., Kyriakou N. (2015) Human Rights in Cyprus. In: Merten D., Papier H. J. (eds.) Handbook of fundamental rights in Germany and Europe. C.F. Müller Verlag, Heidelberg.
- Kombos C., Pantazi Lambrou A. (2012) Cyprus. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1, Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 303–354.
- Kyriakou N. (2010) National Judges and Supranational Laws on the Effective Application of the EC Law and the ECHR: The Case of Cyprus. Available at SSRN: <http://ssrn.com/abstract=1623560>.
- Laulhé Shaelou S. (2010a) The EU and Cyprus: principles and strategies of full integration. SEUR vol. 3. Martinus Nijhoff, Leiden.
- Laulhé Shaelou S. (2010b) ‘Back to reality’: the implications of EU membership in the constitutional legal order of Cyprus. In: Lazowski A. (ed.) Brave new world: application of EU law in the new member states. T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague.
- Laulhé Shaelou S. (2011) Market freedoms, fundamental rights and the European public order. YEL 30(1):298–357.
- Laulhé Shaelou S. (2013) The EU in crisis. Myths and Realities. Paper presented at the seminar ‘Cyprus in the eyes of the storm: legal implications of the economic and financial crisis’. UCLan Cyprus, 27 June 2013.
- Lazowski A. (ed.) (2010) Brave new world: application of EU law in the new member states. T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague.
- Legrand P. (2002) Public law, Europeanisation, and convergence: can comparatists contribute? In Beaumont P., Lyons C., Walker N. (eds.) Convergence and Divergence in European Public Law. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 225 et seq.
- Loizou A. (2001) The Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus. Nicosia.

- Lycourgos C. (2010) Cyprus Public Law as Affected by Accession to the EU. In: Kombos C. (ed.) Studies in European Public Law. Sakkoulas, Athens, pp. 101–115.
- Lycourgos C. (2014). Preliminary reference to the Court of Justice of the European Union – Law and practice in Cyprus ten years after accession to the EU (March 2014, unpublished study) (on file with the author).
- Nicolaou I. (2000) The Control of the Constitutionality of the Laws and the Separation of Powers of the State Institutions of Cyprus. Sakkoulas, Athens.
- Paraskeva C. (2015) Cypriot Constitutional Law: Fundamental Rights and Freedoms. Nomiki Bibliothiki, Athens.
- Pikis G. (2006) Constitutionalism – Human Rights – Separation of Powers. Martinus Nijhoff, Leiden.
- Polyviou P. (2013) Cyprus on the Edge: a Study in Constitutional Survival. Nicosia.
- Polyviou P. (2015a) Cyprus: A Study in the Theory, Structure and Method of the Legal System of the Republic of Cyprus. Nicosia.
- Polyviou P. (2015b) Ibrahim: The Doctrine of Necessity and the Republic of Cyprus. Nicosia.
- Stefanou E. (2011) Rights of suspects in Cyprus. Speech delivered at the meeting of the European Criminal Bar Association, 24 September 2011. http://www.kscp.com.cy/documents/SUSPECTS_RIGHTS_24092011.pdf.
- Stefanou E., Kapardis A. (2006) The first two years of fiddling around with the implementation of the EAW in Cyprus. Cyprus and European Law Review 2:258 et seq.
- Soulioti S. (2006) Fettered Independence: Cyprus 1878–1964 vol.1: The Narrative. Minnesota Mediterranean and East European Monographs, Minneapolis.
- Tornaritis C. (1968) The Social and Economic Rights Under the Law of the Republic of Cyprus. In: Mélanges Marcel Bridel: recueil de travaux. Imprimeries Réunies, Lausanne, pp. 533–556.
- Tornaritis C. (1980) Cyprus and its Constitutional and Other Problems. Nicosia.
- Tsadiras A. (2007) Case note. CML Rev. 44:1515 et seq.
- Trimikliniotis N. (2013) Cyprus National Report 2012–2013. Network on free movement of workers. http://works.bepress.com/nicos_trimikliniotis/41/.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Part VI
Specific Constitutional Developments

Introductory Editorial Note to the Hungarian Report: The Pre-2010 Rule of Law Achievements and the Post-2010 Illiberal Turn

Anneli Albi

In the case of Hungary, from the perspective of constitutional law it is important to draw the attention of the reader to two distinct periods in the development of Hungarian constitutionalism: the period from the beginning of the post-communist constitutional reforms up to 2010, and the subsequent change of direction that was marked by the preparation and adoption of the new Fundamental Law in 2011. The post-2010 period has been described as one of ‘illiberal constitutionalism’,¹ and has caused widespread concern amongst EU and Council of Europe institutions as well as other Member States. The Hungarian report to this volume focuses on the post-2010 period.

From the point of view of constitutional history, comparative European constitutional heritage and the questions explored in the project, it may be of interest for the readers to bear in mind that in the aftermath of the post-communist constitutional reforms, the Hungarian constitutional system was widely acclaimed in Europe for the particularly extensive safeguards for the rule of law and human dignity established by the Constitutional Court, as part of the concept of the ‘invisible constitution’. As the former Chief Justice of the Hungarian Constitutional Court put it, constitutional review became ‘a kind of symbol of the rule of law’.² For example, in its early years, the Hungarian Constitutional Court struck down as unconstitutional roughly one out of three challenged laws, although a quieter tone was taken after 1998.³ In particular, the Constitutional Court championed a robust and rigid approach to the principle of legal certainty and non-retroactivity as part of the doctrine of the rule of law and democracy.⁴ By way of what came to be widely

¹ Uitz 2014.

² Sólyom 2002, p. 25, as cited in Prochazka 2002, p. 25.

³ Scheppelle 1999.

⁴ Sadurski 2006, p. 14; Dupré 2003, p. 31.

A. Albi (✉)

University of Kent, Canterbury, UK

e-mail: A.Albi@kent.ac.uk

regarded as a classic example, the so-called ‘Bokros package’ of statutes, which modified the benefits system as part of a vigorous economic rationalisation plan, was declared unconstitutional on the ground of breach of the principle of legal certainty: the very short time (two weeks) between the adoption of the statutes and their implementation did not leave individuals sufficient time to adjust to the new situation.⁵ In another landmark decision, a law aimed at lifting the statutes of limitations for politically motivated crimes committed under Communism was invalidated on the ground of non-retroactivity: it was found that such an ex post facto restoration of criminal liability would have amounted to an improper retroactivity of the law.⁶ Regarding judgments on human dignity, an extensive study of the relevant Hungarian judgments by Catherine Dupré revealed that whilst there was a general tendency for the judges to closely follow the German constitutional case law and reasoning, the Hungarian Constitutional Court selected those elements from the German doctrine that emphasised the individuality and autonomy of individuals, without importing the corresponding restrictions.⁷

This earlier case law was also at the origins of some of the questions in the Questionnaire of the present research project, and is taken into account in the identification of comparative European constitutional achievements in the protection of fundamental rights and rule of law safeguards in the Comparative Study that accompanies the national reports (as explained in the Introduction to this book). Thus this pre-2010 case law is worth bearing in mind, in addition to the material in the report that focuses on the post-2010 climate.

References

- Dupré C. (2003) Importing the Law in Post-Communist Transitions. The Hungarian Constitutional Court and the Right to Human Dignity. Hart Publishing, Oxford.
- Prochazka R. (2002) Mission Accomplished: On Founding Constitutional Adjudication in Central Europe. CEU Press, Budapest.
- Sadurski W. (2006) Solange, Chapter 3: Constitutional Courts in Central Europe. EUI Law Working Paper 2006/40.
- Scheppele K.L. (1999) The New Hungarian Constitutional Court. East European Constitutional Review 8:81–88.
- Sólyom L. (2002) On the Co-operation of Constitutional Courts: Introduction to the 10th Conference of European Constitutional Courts. <http://www.mkab.hu>.
- Uitz R (2014) Hungary. Paper presented at the ECSA-Austria workshop ‘Member States’ Constitutions and EU Integration’, University of Maastricht, 5–6 June 2014, forthcoming in 2019 in Griller S., Claes M., Papadopoulou L., Puff R. (eds.) Member States’ Constitutions and EU Integration. Hart, Oxford.

⁵ Dupré 2003, p. 31.

⁶ Sadurski 2006, p. 14.

⁷ Dupré 2003, pp. 120 et seq., 122, 125–126.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Hungary: Constitutional (R)evolution or Regression?

Nóra Chronowski, Márton Varju, Petra Bárd and Gábor Sulyok

Abstract Since 2010, Hungarian constitutionalism has turned in a direction that has widely been regarded as illiberal and has attracted criticism from European and international organisations and other Member States. Central to the change was the adoption of the new Fundamental Law in 2011. The Hungarian report explores the post-2010 period in the context of EU and international law. Whilst the Hungarian Nóra Chronowski is Associate Professor of Constitutional Law, National University of Public Service, and Visiting Researcher, Hungarian Academy of Sciences. email: chronowski.nora@tk.mta.hu.

Márton Varju is Senior Research Fellow at the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, Centre for Social Sciences, Head of the Lendület-HPOPs Research Group, and Senior Legal Advisor at the Curia, Hungary. email: varju.marton@tk.mta.hu.

Petra Bárd is Assistant Professor of Criminology, Eötvös Loránd University Faculty of Law, and Visiting Professor, Central European University, Budapest. email: bardp@ceu.edu.

Gábor Sulyok is Senior Research Fellow, Hungarian Academy of Sciences, and Professor of International Law, Széchenyi István University Györ, Hungary. email: sulyok.gabor@tk.mta.hu.

Nóra Chronowski wrote Sects. 1, 2.1, 2.4 and 2.12; Márton Varju wrote Sects. 2.2, 2.3.5.2–2.3.5.4, 2.5–2.11, 2.13 and 3.5; Petra Bárd wrote Sects. 2.3.1–2.3.5.1; and Gábor Sulyok wrote Sects. 3.1–3.4.

All websites accessed 20 May 2015. Text submitted 15 June 2015 with an updated constitutional amendment in Sect. 1.3.1.

N. Chronowski (✉) · M. Varju · G. Sulyok
Hungarian Academy of Sciences, Budapest, Hungary
e-mail: chronowski.nora@tk.mta.hu

M. Varju
e-mail: varju.marton@tk.mta.hu

G. Sulyok
e-mail: sulyok.gabor@tk.mta.hu

N. Chronowski
National University of Public Service, Budapest, Hungary

Constitutional Court in 2012 affirmed the ‘constitutional continuity’, in that the interpretations that had been used prior to the new Fundamental Law would be applied, this was overruled by a subsequent constitutional amendment, which has reinforced concern that the governing majority is ignoring the constitutional traditions of the last two decades. Since this amendment, the Constitutional Court adds reasoning if it refers to the former case law. In the rulings related to international law and EU law, the constitutional practice did not change significantly, although it became somewhat ambiguous until 2015. An Editorial Note has been added to the country chapter to explain that before the illiberal turn in 2010 and in the aftermath of the post-communist constitutional reforms, the Hungarian constitutional system had in fact been widely acclaimed in Europe for the particularly extensive safeguards for the rule of law and human dignity established by the Constitutional Court. For instance, the Hungarian Constitutional Court during that period represented a robust approach to the principles of legal certainty and non-retroactivity as part of the doctrine of the rule of law, which was invoked frequently as the basis for annulment of legislation.

Keywords The Hungarian Fundamental Law 2012 · The Hungarian Constitutional Court · Illiberal constitutionalism · Decline in the rule of law · Venice Commission Constitutional amendments regarding EU and international co-operation European Arrest Warrant · Data Retention Directive · Privatisation of public services

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1–1.1.2 In Hungary, no new constitution was formally approved during the change of regime (1989–1990). The Constitution of the Republic of Hungary was a derivative of Act XX of 1949, which was comprehensively revised by Act No. XXXI of 1989 (in force until 31 December 2011; hereinafter 1989

P. Bárd
Eötvös Loránd University Faculty of Law, Budapest, Hungary
e-mail: bardp@ceu.edu

P. Bárd
Central European University, Budapest, Hungary

G. Sulyok
Széchenyi István University, Győr, Hungary

Constitution).¹ With regard to content, new acts emerged not through revolution, but via a parliamentary process of constitution-making that accompanied the regime change in 1989–1990. These proposed and approved amendments were fully compatible with the requirements of democracy and the rule of law. From then until 2011, the Constitution was under continuous revision, with several acts amending it. The most comprehensive amendment was carried out in December 2002 in connection with the anticipated accession of the country to the EU. In 2010, the parliamentary elections resulted in a two-thirds majority, which enabled the right-wing governing party alliance to write a new constitution (however, this ambition was not articulated during the campaign). The new constitution – the Fundamental Law of Hungary (FL) – was adopted in April 2011 and came into force on 1 January, 2012.²

In 2010, in parallel with the constant – altogether more than 10 – amendments of the 1989 Constitution reflecting ad hoc political interests, the governing parties announced the creation of a new constitution. The constitution-making procedure was criticised by the European Parliament and Venice Commission for the absence of pluralistic social debate.³ While the FL contains the basic principles and institutional system that had become crystallised through democratic constitution-making (like the principles of rule of law, democracy, division of powers, protection of human rights), they do not fully prevail, primarily because of the rules of interpretation referring to the ‘historic constitution’ of the ancient Hungarian kingdom and the restriction of constitutional jurisdiction. This is particularly true in cases where the FL itself grants exemptions from the implementation of fundamental principles. Although the catalogue of fundamental rights in the FL is more modern in some parts than that of the 1989 Constitution, the system of fundamental rights protection as a whole represents a step backward compared to the 1989 Constitution. It is undoubtedly the greatest weakness of the FL that it does not ensure the possibility of a comprehensive review of and remedy for violation of the constitution by the legislature. This is because the FL reduces the scope of action of the Constitutional Court and maintains the procedural and material restrictions introduced in 2010 for an uncertain period. More specifically, the FL lays down that with regard to ex post norm control and constitutional complaint procedures, the Constitutional Court is prohibited from reviewing the content of or annulling acts on public finances, with the exception of four ‘protected fields of fundamental rights', as long as the state debt exceeds half of the gross domestic product. A regulation adopted on 16 November 2010 that essentially corresponds to the content of Art. 37(4) of the FL which restricts the Constitutional Court's right of review and annulment, also fails to accord with the principles of European constitutional development, the traditions of Hungarian constitutionalism developed since 1989–1990 and democratic political culture. It violates the constitutional principles of the rule of law, legal security and separation of powers. As a result of the restriction of the procedure of the Constitutional Court, numerous fundamental rights (especially, for example, the right to property, social rights, the freedom of enterprise and the right to a profession) became 'defenceless'.

¹ Available at (with the amendments of 2010/11) http://www-archiv.parlament.hu/angol/act_xx_of_1949.pdf.

² All translations are from the official English translation of the Fundamental Law (consolidated version after the Fourth Amendment) available at <http://www.mfa.gov.hu/NR/rdonlyres/8204FB28-BF22-481A-9426-D2761D10EC7C/0/FUNDAMENTALLAWOFHUNGARY\mostrecentversion01102013.pdf>.

³ See Venice Commission Opinion No. 614/2011, Strasbourg 28 March 2011, and Opinion No. 621/2011 on the new constitution of Hungary adopted by the Venice Commission at its 87th Plenary Session (Venice, 17–18 June 2011) points 29, 34. Many Hungarian scholars also criticised the tight time limits for the drafting, and the restricted possibilities for open political and social debate. See Arato et al. 2011, pp. 3–7.

Parliament has modified the FL five times since 2011,⁴ and has, inter alia, cemented the model of limited constitutional judicial review, attempted to break constitutional continuity, to restrict the exercise of the right to vote and freedom of expression and perpetuated the practice of overruling the Constitutional Court's decisions. The Constitutional Court has tried, sometimes with greater, sometimes with less determination, to protect the FL, with a varying degree of success. European bodies have followed this process with great interest: the Venice Commission of the Council of Europe continues to provide opinions on the significant amendments to the FL and on the cardinal laws,⁵ and the European Parliament has adopted several resolutions as well. The sharpest criticism has been raised with regard to the fourth amendment to the FL, with which

- lex specialis rules were introduced in contrast to the fundamental principles of the rule of law, democracy and the protection of fundamental rights;
- regulations (e.g. relating to student contracts, the acknowledgement of churches, the concept of family) evading or bypassing Constitutional Court rulings were enacted, substantially reducing the space for constitutional protection;
- a specific procedural review and a new limit on interpretation were imposed with regard to constitutional judicial review (excluding substantial review of amendments to the FL, repealing Constitutional Court decisions adopted before the FL); and
- open infringement of EU law (limitation of election campaigns, possibility of special taxation as an indirect result of court rulings)⁶ was also risked.

The European Commission has initiated several infringement proceedings as well, on the basis of which the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) has issued important judgments with direct constitutional implications: one on the subject of a radical lowering of the retirement age of judges and another on the subject of bringing to an end the term served by the Data Protection Supervisor. Hungary was held to have infringed EU law in both cases.⁷

⁴ See the amendments in Sonnevend et al. 2015, pp. 45–70.

⁵ Cardinal laws are Acts of Parliament that can be adopted or amended with a two-thirds majority of votes of the MPs present.

⁶ As the European Commission expressed its serious concerns about the conformity with EU law of the new article on CJEU judgments entailing payment obligations, the fifth amendment repealed this rule.

The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) has also heard Hungarian cases which have arisen due to the elimination of the previous constitutionalism and from the arrangements based on the new FL – such as the recognition of churches, dismissal from employment without reason, lifetime imprisonment without compulsory review, premature termination of the mandate of the President of the Supreme Court and a ban on the parliamentary right of expression.⁸ The ECtHR has found that the State of Hungary infringed the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) in every case.

There is no room here to provide a comprehensive analysis of all of the issues which have arisen and been debated at European forums;⁹ however, expeditiously we can diagnose that the developments of the last 3–5 years question the commitment to liberal constitutional values such as the rule of law, democracy and individual freedom. The Constitutional Court still has some margin of appreciation on the basis of the constitutional text to safeguard the achievements of liberal constitutionalism and disregard political expectations, but the quality of reasoning and the decisive arguments of the Court have given rise to a very specific ideational framework that cannot be interpreted under liberal values of rule of law.¹⁰

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 The amendment of the Hungarian Constitution related to EU accession was passed by Parliament in December 2002 (Act LXI of 2002), and introduced a new Art. 2/A into the text of the Constitution:

By virtue of treaty, the Republic of Hungary, in its capacity as a Member State of the European Union, may exercise certain constitutional powers jointly with other Member States to the extent necessary in connection with the rights and obligations conferred by the treaties on the foundation of the European Union and the European Communities (hereinafter referred to as ‘European Union’); these powers may be exercised independently and by way of the institutions of the European Union. The ratification and promulgation of the treaty referred to in subsection (1) shall be subject to a two-thirds majority vote of the Parliament.¹¹

⁷ Case C-286/12 Commission v. Hungary [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:687; Case C-288/12 Commission v. Hungary [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:237.

⁸ Magyar Keresztény Mennonita Egyház and Others v. Hungary, nos. 70945/11, 23611/12, 26998/12, 41150/12, 41155/12, 41463/12, 41553/12, 54977/12 and 56581/12, ECHR 2014 (extracts); K.M.C. v. Hungary, no. 19554/11, 10 July 2012; László Magyar v. Hungary, no. 73593/10, 20 May 2014; Baka v. Hungary, no. 20261/12, 27 May 2014; Karácsony and Others v. Hungary, no. 42461/13, 16 September 2014.

⁹ See e.g. Vörös 2014, pp. 1–20; Zeller 2013, pp. 307–325; Vincze 2013, pp. 86–97.

¹⁰ Szente 2015, p. 185.

¹¹ The English translation of the former Hungarian Constitution is available at http://www-archiv.parlament.hu/angol/act_xx_of_1949.pdf.

Thus, in 2002, an authorisation was added permitting the signing of the Treaty of Accession, and a commitment to European unity was declared. Additionally, the rules on cooperation between the National Assembly and the Government in matters of EU integration were determined (for the wording see Sect. 1.4), and the constitutional definition of the National Bank of Hungary was modified. In addition, the rules on voting rights were changed in anticipation of European parliamentary and European local elections.¹² The relevant provisions provide as follows:

Art. 32/D(1)

The National Bank of Hungary shall define the country's monetary policy in accordance with the provisions of specific other legislation.

Art. 70(2)

All adult Hungarian citizens residing in the territory of the Republic of Hungary and all adult citizens of other Member States of the European Union who reside in the territory of the Republic of Hungary shall have the right to be elected in local ballots for the election of the representatives and mayors; they shall have the right to vote, provided that they are in the territory of the Republic of Hungary on the day of the election or referendum, and furthermore to participate in local referendums or popular initiatives.

Art. 70(4)

All adult Hungarian citizens residing in the territory of the Republic of Hungary and all adult citizens of other Member States of the European Union who reside in the territory of the Republic of Hungary shall have the right to be elected and the right to vote in elections for the European Parliament.

The second amendment to the 1989 Constitution in relation to EU membership took place in December 2007 before the ratification of the Lisbon Treaty (Act CLXVII of 2007). It was an embarrassing amendment and a surprise for experts, as it was not communicated by the Government and the amending process was very rapid. The aim of the amendment was to create constitutional authorisation for criminal law cooperation under the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice (AFSJ) provisions of the EU Treaty. The following text was inserted into Art. 57(4) – the nullum crimen rule – of the 1989 Constitution:

No one shall be declared guilty and subjected to punishment for an offense that was not considered – at the time it was committed – a criminal offense under Hungarian law, or the laws of any country participating in the progressive establishment of an area of freedom, security and justice, and to the extent prescribed in the relevant EU legislation with a view to the mutual recognition of decisions, without any restrictions in terms of major fundamental rights.

The EU provisions in the FL broadly follow the above amendments, and are cited in Sect. 1.3.1.

1.2.2 The constitutional amendment procedure is provided in Art. S) of the FL. An amendment may be initiated by the President of the Republic, the Government, any parliamentary committee or any Member of the National Assembly. The adoption of a new FL or the amendment of the FL requires the votes of two-thirds of all the Members of the National Assembly. The amendment has to be signed by the President, who may refer the matter to the Constitutional Court if the President finds that any procedural requirement laid down in the FL with respect to adoption of the FL or amendment of the FL has not been met.

¹² Chronowski 2005, pp. 190–199.

In the 1989 Constitution the rules were the same except for the possibility of ex ante constitutional review.

1.2.3 The Constitutional Court played a significant role in the wording of the 2002 amendments. The Constitutional Court proclaimed its jurisdiction for posterior review of the constitutionality of statutes (and other legal instruments implementing international treaties) in a decision in 1997.¹³ In that decision the Court declared that a statute implementing an international treaty – and the international treaty – may be subjected to subsequent constitutional review. The reasoning of the Court is noteworthy:

The Constitutional Court emphasizes that the constitutional review of international treaties forms part of the practice of the constitutional courts of countries applying the dualistic-transformational system as a general rule, also in respect of international treaties becoming part of the domestic law by this technique. For instance, Article 59 of the German Basic Law prescribes the dualistic-transformational system. The German Federal Constitutional Court, despite its lack of jurisdiction for preventive norm control, has extended its practice to the control of international treaties prior to their ratification. ... It becomes clear from these decisions that in addition to ‘naturally’ exercising the competence concerning posterior norm control, the German Constitutional Court cannot fail in performing all parts of its duty to safeguard the constitution – especially in respect of the European Union treaties. ... On this ground, the [Hungarian] Constitutional Court keeps the subordination to Community law under its continuous supervision – besides examining the implementing acts.¹⁴

Thus, in 1997, the Court was ready to examine the constitutionality of Community law. In this respect, Decision 30/1998 (VI. 25.),¹⁵ assessing the constitutionality of a provision of Act I of 1994 on the Implementation of the Europe Agreement, is equally notable. Here, the Court treated the agreement as a traditional international treaty. In theory, it was correct in doing so, as Hungary was not then an EU Member State, although the agreement also had some supranational features. The decision declared that the Hungarian Parliament – in the absence of constitutional authorisation – is not entitled to act beyond the principle of territoriality in fields of law within the scope of the exclusive jurisdiction of state authority, nor may it amend the Constitution in a disguised manner by adopting and promulgating an international treaty. Thus, Decision 30/1998 had a significant impact on the drafting of the 2002 authorising provision (Art. 2/A, the so-called ‘Europe Clause’) of the Hungarian Constitution.

¹³ Constitutional Court Decision (hereinafter CC Decision) 4/1997 (I. 22.) AB.

¹⁴ Ibid.

¹⁵ CC Decision 30/1998 (VI. 25.) AB.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 Article E(1) as the basis of European and Union cooperation essentially follows word by word the Art. 6(4) of the 1989 Constitution. Thus, the frame of interpretation remains unchanged;¹⁶ this objective expresses the commitment to European (international or supranational) cooperation. FL Art. E) provides as follows:

- (1) In order to enhance the liberty, well-being and security of the people of Europe, Hungary shall contribute to the creation of European unity.
- (2) With a view to participating in the European Union as a Member State and on the basis of an international treaty, Hungary may, to the extent necessary to exercise the rights and fulfil the obligations deriving from the Founding Treaties, exercise some of its competences set out in the Fundamental Law jointly with other Member States, through the institutions of the European Union.
- (3) The law of the European Union may, within the framework set out in Paragraph (2), lay down generally binding rules of conduct.
- (4) For the authorisation to recognise the binding force of an international treaty referred to in Paragraph (2), the votes of two-thirds of the Members of the National Assembly shall be required.

Article E) paras. (2) and (4), with some simplification, adopts the rules of Art. 2/A of the 1989 Constitution; however, the formulation differs in one aspect. The difference is that the two distinct clauses of Art. 2/A(1) ['exercise certain constitutional powers jointly with other member states ...; these powers may be exercised independently and by way of the institutions of the European Union'] have been merged in Art. E(2) ['jointly with other Member States, through the institutions of the European Union']. However, according to the legal understanding, the Member States do not exercise their competences 'jointly' in the Union legislative processes, rather these are exercised by the institutions. Art. 2/A defined the 'way of institutions' as one form of joint exercise of powers in the EU. Yet in Art. E) of the FL, the exercise of powers 'through the institutions' is referred to as a joint exercise. While the Lisbon Treaty abolished the so-called pillar system and created a single institutional system, the supranational (i.e. Community) method has not become automatically dominant. The Lisbon Treaty intended to integrate the perspectives of supranational and intergovernmental methods, e.g. by respecting the constitutional identity of the Member States, the effective involvement of national parliaments and the consolidation of Member States' initiative in respect of some competences. Strictly speaking, the joint exercise of powers is not the same as exercise through the institutions.¹⁷

¹⁶ See also Bragyova 2012, pp. 335–338; Blutman and Chronowski 2011, p. 329; Bárd 2013, p. 457.

¹⁷ The Constitutional Court has also respected the relevance of the difference of exercising powers jointly and by the way of institutions. See CC Decision 143/2010. (VII. 14.) AB on the Act promulgating the Lisbon Treaty; press release is available at http://www.mkab.hu/letoltesek/en_0143_2010.pdf.

Article E) contained originally only one new rule compared to Art. 2/A of the 1989 Constitution. In its para. (3) it states that '[t]he law of the European Union may ... lay down generally binding rules of conduct'. From the domestic legal viewpoint, the ground for the constitutional validity of Union law becomes clearer than it used to be; however, this paragraph still does not solve the problem of primacy, i.e. that a domestic legal act conflicting with an EU legal act is not applicable. The duty of the courts of law to ensure the consistency of domestic and Union law still stems from the EU Treaties (i.e. by way of requesting preliminary rulings) and not from the Constitution itself.¹⁸

The National Assembly inserted a new sentence into Article E) para. (2) in 2018, by the seventh amendment to the Constitution, creating a solid basis for the Constitutional Court to protect the so-called national constitutional identity:

The exercise of powers under this Paragraph must be consistent with the fundamental rights and freedoms set out in the Fundamental Law, and it must not be allowed to restrict Hungary's inalienable right of disposition relating to its territorial integrity, population, political system and form of governance.

There are further provisions with regard to fair trial in the context of the EU's Area of Freedom, Security and Justice, which are cited in Sects. 2.3.1–2.3.2.

1.3.2–1.3.3 Contrary to expectations and the activism of the Constitutional Court in 1998, the Constitutional Court succinctly explained the meaning of Art. 2/A after EU accession. Article 2/A 'defines the conditions and the framework of the membership of the Republic of Hungary in the European Union, and the status of Community law in the system of the sources of Hungarian law'.¹⁹ Only in 2008 was the authentic interpretation of the authorising provision further enriched. The Constitutional Court highlighted the function of Art. 2/A in Decision 61/B/2005 AB:

The purpose of including this provision in the Constitution was to establish the conditions and the framework of the participation of the Republic of Hungary in the European Union. The cited provision of the Constitution authorises the Republic of Hungary to conclude an international treaty under which certain of its competences deriving from the Constitution may be exercised jointly with the other Member States of the European Union and the joint exercise of competences may be implemented through the institutions of the European Union.

The Court clarified the limitations on the exercise of competences within the Union as follows:

Competences may be exercised jointly to the extent required for the exercise of rights and fulfilment of obligations stemming from the founding treaties of the European Union; only the joint exercise of certain concrete competences deriving from the Constitution is authorised, in other words, the scope of competences exercised jointly is limited.

In respect of the exercise of jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, this decision for the first time expressly rejected the examination of a collision with EU law: 'The ¹⁸ Chronowski 2012, p. 111.

¹⁹ CC Decision 1053/E/2005 AB, judgment of 16 June 2006.

[Act on the Constitutional Court] contains no competence authorising the Constitutional Court to examine a collision with community law. Pursuant to the rules of community law, this question falls within the competence of the organs of the European Community, ultimately the European Court of Justice.' It also follows that a collision with EU law does not in itself serve as a ground for alleging unconstitutionality. As regards the position of EU law within the Hungarian system of sources of law, the Constitutional Court widened the meaning of the authorising provision by identifying it as the ground for the constitutional validity of EU (Community) law: 'Under Article 2/A of the Constitution, community law applicable in Hungarian law is just as valid as is law adopted by Hungarian legislation.' This interpretation opens the way for the possible examination by the Court of collisions between EU law and Art. 2/A.²⁰

In its decision of 143/2010. (VII. 14), the Constitutional Court ruled that the Act of Promulgation of the Lisbon Treaty is constitutional. According to the Court, Art. 2/A of the Constitution cannot be interpreted in a way that would deprive the constitutional provisions on sovereignty and the rule of law of their substance. It referred to its former decisions on the limitation of the exercise of sovereignty and came to the conclusion that although the reforms introduced by the Lisbon Treaty were of foremost importance, Hungary remained a sovereign and independent state with a prevailing rule of law.²¹

In Decision 22/2012 (V. 11.) AB on the interpretation of paras. (2) and (4) of Art. E) of the FL, the Court stated that Art. E(2) contains a provision identical to that of Art. 2/A. The Constitutional Court held that the interpretation of Art. 2/A of the previous Constitution, which was provided in the Decision 143/2010 (VII. 14.) AB, is also valid for the interpretation of Art. E) of the FL. In that decision of 2010, the Constitutional Court clarified the question whether the requirement of qualified majority was only applicable to the Accession Treaty or to other treaties as well. The Court found that the qualified majority 'is necessary for every treaty that leads to transferring further competences of Hungary, specified in the FL, through the joint exercise of competences by way of the institutions of the European Union'. The Court continued:

Provided that it is based on an international treaty, the requirement of qualified majority is also applicable to the implementation of the founding treaties and their supervision: it means that the implementing measures based on the founding treaties (adoption of secondary legal acts) are not sufficient any more, and therefore the implementation tools need to be amended, or new tools are needed. It is not a condition, however, that the treaty specify itself as the European Union's law, and neither is it a requirement that it should belong to the founding treaties of the EU.

1.3.4 EU law has been regarded as a separate legal system by the Constitutional Court and the courts of law since accession. As such, the supremacy and direct applicability of EU legal acts are recognised; in most cases the courts ensure the effectiveness of Community/Union law.²² References to the principles of direct effect and supremacy are rather automatic;²³ See also Supreme Court Decision Kfv. I.35.052/2007/7, which referred to Costa v. ENEL and Van Gend en Loos. the courts follow the well-known textbooks on EU law or utilise the ministerial explanations attached to the bill of the applicable Hungarian law. The Curia (former Supreme Court) seems to be willing to establish the triangular relationship of EU law, the ECHR and domestic law, and interpret harmonised Hungarian legal acts in the light of the ECHR, if the implemented EC directive provides a minimum standard.²⁴

²⁰ CC Decision 61/B/2005. AB, judgment of 29 September 2008.

²¹ See the press release on CC Decision 143/2010 (VII. 14.) AB, supra n. 17.

So far, the Constitutional Court has established two principles marking the boundaries of future constitutional practice. First, it will not treat the founding and amending treaties of the European Union as international law for the purposes of constitutional review,²⁵ thereby setting up a three-tier system of legal rules applicable within Hungarian legal practice that distinguishes between national, international and EU law. Secondly, in the absence of jurisdiction to review substantive (un)constitutionality (as opposed to procedural constitutionality), the Constitutional Court does not regard a conflict between domestic law and EU law as a constitutionality issue,²⁶ and this mandates the ordinary courts to resolve such conflict of a sub-constitutional nature.²⁷

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 Article 19 of the FL provides:

The National Assembly may request information from the Government on the government position to be represented in the decision-making procedures of the intergovernmental institutions of the European Union, and may take a position on the draft placed on the agenda in the procedure. In the course of the decision-making of the European Union, the Government shall act on the basis of the position taken by the National Assembly.

Through a scrutiny procedure regulated in Act XXXVI of 2012 on the National Assembly, the National Assembly takes part in the decision-making process

²² See Dezső and Vincze 2012, pp. 208–209.

²³ See e.g. the Decision of Szabolcs-Szatmár-Bereg County Court 5.K.20. 631/2010/4.: ‘... the Community Treaty has the highest rank in the hierarchy of legal norms. ... [T]he relationship of EU law and national law is determined by the principle of primacy, as the Supreme Court stated in principle: national law shall be interpreted in a way that is appropriate to fulfil (i.e. implement) Community law (EBH 2006/1568).’

²⁴ The Supreme Court established that only refugees are covered by the scope of Council Directive 2003/86/EC of 22 September 2003 on the right to family reunification [2003] OJ 251/12; however, in the light of Art. 8 of the ECHR, domestic law may recognise this right of other protected persons as well. The Supreme Court emphasised that Member States may maintain or introduce more favourable provisions than those laid down by the Directive. Supreme Court Kfv.III.37.925/2009/7.

²⁵ CC Decision 1053/E/2005. AB

²⁶ CC Decision 72/2006. (XII. 15.) AB.

²⁷ Blutman and Chronowski 2011, pp. 329–348.

indirectly, as the Government and the National Assembly cooperate according to special rules in formulating the national position regarding EU draft legislation. The National Assembly also monitors the activities of the Government in EU affairs. The instruments that already existed before accession have remained intact (such as interpellation, questions, committee hearings, parliamentary debates and committees of inquiry), and these instruments can also be used with regard to EU affairs. In addition, Art. 69 of the Act on the National Assembly defines further obligations for the Government in informing the Assembly.

Tasks stemming from subsidiarity checks are carried out by the Committee on European Affairs by virtue of Act XXXVI of 2012 on the National Assembly and Parliamentary Resolution 10/2014 (24 February 2014) on Certain Provisions of the Rules of Procedure. With regard to the ex-ante control of subsidiarity, if the Committee considers that a draft Union legislative act fails to comply with the principle of subsidiarity, it submits a report to the plenary on the adoption of a reasoned opinion. The adopted reasoned opinion is sent by the Speaker to the Presidents of the European Commission, the European Parliament and the European Council as well as to the Government of Hungary. With regard to the ex-post application of the subsidiarity principle, the Committee is entitled to propose to the Government that it bring an action before the CJEU on the grounds of infringement of the principle of subsidiarity in accordance with Art. 263 TFEU.

1.4.2 The referendum on accession to the EU was held on 12 April 2003, and 83.76% of the citizens who participated voted yes. This was 38% of all the electors. Of the 8 million citizens entitled to vote only 3.66 million voted, which means a participation rate of 45.6 %.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.3 As mentioned earlier, a Constitutional Court finding was of considerable significance in respect of the 2002 amendment of the 1989 Constitution. This amendment was based on a wide consent of the parliamentary parties of that time, and a special parliamentary committee discussed the questions of constitutional authorisation and the accession referendum. The prime minister established a so-called ‘council of wise men’ composed of former ministers of justice and constitutional court judges. The bill on the amendment was also sent to universities and other academic institutions, which provided expert opinions upon the request of the Government.

However, before the 2007 amendment no such public debate took place.

In the course of the constitution-making in 2010/11, no specific attention was devoted to the Europe Clause or the experiences of the application of EU-related rules in the 1989 Constitution. The entire drafting of the constitution was a closed and almost secret process, and thus public debate or expert advice did not influence the content of the FL.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Under the title ‘Freedom and Responsibility’ the FL lists the catalogue of fundamental rights (Articles II–XXIX) in 28 articles. These articles include constitutional rights (including new rights such as the right to good administration, some social rights of employees and the right to self-defence), prohibitions (including the new prohibitions ne bis in idem, non-refoulement and biomedical prohibitions) and principles (including the new principles of equality before the law and social responsibility for property). In the field of social solidarity, however, the FL is restricted to constitutional objectives instead of rights (protection of the elderly and persons with disabilities, striving to provide decent housing).

It is worthwhile to add that during the drafting of the Hungarian constitution in 2011 the question arose – and the Hungarian Government inquired from the Venice Commission – whether and to what extent it was necessary to incorporate the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (Charter) into the national constitution. The adopted FL originally contained more or less the same rights as the Charter in its relevant Chapter ('Freedom and Responsibility'), and some sentences of the Charter were ultimately incorporated; however, compared to the Charter, the content of the rights enumerated in the FL is less detailed and the text leaves the possibility for a wider limitation of rights. It is also worth referring to the preamble of the FL, according to which ‘individual freedom can only be complete in cooperation with others’. The Charter applies a completely different approach, with emphasises in its preamble that the Union ‘places the individual at the heart of its activities’. The Charter addresses individual responsibility only in connection with the enjoyment of rights.²⁸ Whereas the approach of the FL – considering also the numerous basic obligations – is communitarian and nationalist, the Charter focuses on the philosophy of individual freedom and supports pluralism.²⁹ The difference is not accidental. In the last decade, Hungarian society has become increasingly closed, exclusive and disunited, and discrimination, segregation, xenophobia and hate speech have become part of everyday life with the support of political populism. In the field of the most important human values, the FL has legalised and reaffirmed unprecedented solutions based on unacceptable societal practice.

²⁸ Charter Preamble: ‘Enjoyment of these rights entails responsibilities and duties with regard to other persons, to the human community and to future generations.’

²⁹ This difference is also pointed out in European Commission For Democracy Through Law (Venice Commission) Opinion No. 621/2011, Strasbourg 20 June 2011, Opinion on the New Constitution of Hungary, point 57.

2.1.2 Article I(3) provides as follows:

The rules for fundamental rights and obligations shall be laid down in an Act. A fundamental right may only be restricted to allow the effective use of another fundamental right or to protect a constitutional value, to the extent absolutely necessary, proportionate to the objective pursued and with full respect for the essential content of such fundamental right.

2.1.3 Article B) of the FL supports the most important principles of the 1989 Constitution – the rule of law and democracy. Art. C(1) of the FL explicitly provides the principle of division of powers. It is worth mentioning, however, that the division of powers should also be reflected in the rules on state organs in the FL and in constitutional practice.

An extremely alarming issue concerning the basic principles of the FL was that the Transitional Provisions supporting the entry into force of the FL (hereinafter TP-FL) undermined some rules of the FL itself.³⁰ The Constitutional Court declared that all provisions of the TP-FL that lack transitory character are invalid.³¹ As a response, in 2013 the governing majority adopted the fourth amendment of the FL, which incorporated into the Constitution most of the abolished articles, and overrode several earlier Constitutional Court decisions. The Venice Commission expressed its serious concerns about the systematic shielding of ordinary law from constitutional review. The reduction (budgetary matters) and in some cases complete removal (constitutionalised matters) of the competence of the Court to review ordinary legislation on the one hand undermined the rule of law – as the constitutional protection of the standards of the FL became limited; and, on the other hand, infringed the democratic system of checks and balances – as the Constitutional Court lost its influence and is no longer able to provide effective control.³²

Before the fourth amendment, some hope was given regarding ‘constitutional continuity’, in that the Constitutional Court seemed to be willing to refer to its jurisprudence and recall its previous argumentation where the formulation of text of the FL was the same as the wording of the Constitution. According to the Court’s judgment in 2012:

In the new cases the Constitutional Court may use the arguments included in its previous decision adopted before the Fundamental Law came into force in relation to the constitutional question ruled upon in the given decision, provided that this is possible on the basis of the concrete provisions and interpretation rules of the Fundamental Law, having the same or similar content as the provisions included in the previous Constitution. ... The ³⁰ On the TP-FL and other cardinal acts read more in Halmi and Scheppele 2012.

³¹ The Constitutional Court annulled approximately half of the articles of the TP-FL in its decision of 28 December 2012 (CC Decision 45/2012. (XII. 29.) AB).

³² Opinion No. 720/2013 of the Venice Commission, point 87.

conclusions of the Constitutional Court pertaining to those basic values, human rights and freedoms, and constitutional institutions, which have not been altered in the Fundamental Law, remain valid.³³

However, the fourth amendment of the FL repealed the decisions of the Constitutional Court delivered prior to the entry into force of the FL. This new regulation has reinforced the concern that the governing majority is ignoring the constitutional traditions of the last two decades.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 This issue has not been addressed in Hungarian judicial practice.³⁴ As indicated earlier, the Hungarian Constitutional Court has declined to recognise any formal competence to examine the compatibility of national legislation with EU law.³⁵ This excludes one of the main avenues in Hungarian law for contesting the order of priority of fundamental rights and fundamental economic freedoms.

The only, rather indirect indication of how Hungarian courts would approach the Court of Justice's balancing between fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms follows from an early judgment in the Dog Breeders Association case. In its ruling, the Budapest Metropolitan Court accepted that the fundamental rights jurisprudence of the Court of Justice is binding on Hungarian courts.³⁶ The judgment relied on Title I Article F(2) of the Maastricht Treaty and included citations from

³³ CC Decision 22/2012. (V. 11.) AB, paras. 40–41.

³⁴ There are examples of legislation establishing a balance favouring local, assumedly value-based considerations against fundamental freedoms, see the regulation of student contracts in Sect. 110 (1)23 of Act 2011: CCIV and Government Regulation 2/1012 requiring students in state higher education to enter into employment in Hungary. In the related judgment of the Constitutional Court in Decision 32/2012 of 4 July 2012, it was deemed necessary to take the rights provided by the free movement of persons in EU law into account in determining the appropriate level of legal protection available in Hungarian constitutional law. In contrast, the dissenting opinions, with a different degree of robustness, emphasised that the majority interpretation put the communitarian values of the new Fundamental Law in jeopardy and considered the individualistic fundamental economic rights in EU law to be in conflict with local social values.

³⁵ See, for instance, CC Decision 1053/E/2005 of 16 June 2006 where the claim that the 1997 Act on Gambling, which prohibited the sale and advertising of gambling activities organised abroad, breached Art. 56 TFEU, was refused, as the Constitutional Court had no jurisdiction to examine the compatibility of domestic legislation with the EU Treaties.

³⁶ Case No. 3.K-30698/2006/33. The issue was not addressed in the judgment of the Supreme Court, Case No. Kfv.IV.37.256/2008/14. In Case No. 5.K.20.155/2010/13, the reference to Case 44/79 Hauer [1979] ECR 03727, and its detailed discussion was obiter and, ultimately, EU law, despite the insistence of the first instance judge, was irrelevant in the case.

Internationale Handelsgesellschaft,³⁷ *Nold I*³⁸ and Rutili.³⁹ The impact of the judgment was considerably weakened by the fact that it failed to clarify whether EU jurisprudence was relevant in the case and whether the case fell within the scope of EU human rights law.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU criminal law

2.3.1–2.3.2 The presumption of innocence; nulla poena sine lege

As was seen in Sect. 1.2.1, the 1989 Constitution was amended with regard to the EU AFSJ. Further provisions on this were included in the FL, where Art. XXVIII (4)–(6) provides as follows:

- (4) No one shall be held guilty of or be punished for an act which at the time when it was committed did not constitute a criminal offence under Hungarian law or, within the scope specified in an international treaty or a legal act of the European Union, under the law of another State.
- (5) Paragraph (4) shall not prejudice the prosecution or conviction of any person for an act which, at the time when it was committed, was a criminal offence according to the generally recognised rules of international law.
- (6) With the exception of extraordinary cases of legal remedy laid down in an Act, no one shall be prosecuted or convicted for a criminal offence for which he or she has already been finally acquitted or convicted in Hungary or, within the scope specified in an international treaty or a legal act of the European Union, in another State, as provided for by an Act.

The principle of nullum crimen sine lege is and was the focal element of the constitutional legality of criminal law in Hungary. According to the Constitutional Court, it is not just a state obligation but the right of the individual that a person be found guilty and sentenced only according to law. Reference to EU law first appeared on the constitutional level at the time of the ratification of the Lisbon Treaty. The former Constitution had already been amended (see Sect. 1.2.1) to enable judicial cooperation in criminal affairs. A new element in the FL is that the text – as an exception to the rule – explicitly refers to an ‘act, which was, at the time when it was committed, an offence according to the generally recognised rules of international law’. However, this is not completely new, since the Constitutional Court in 1993 stated that war crimes and crimes against humanity are to be punished even in the absence of Hungarian criminalisation at the time of commitment.⁴⁰ The explicit formulation of the principle of ne bis in idem is also a new ³⁷ Case 11/70 Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 01125.

³⁸ Case 4/73 Nold [1974] ECR 00491.

³⁹ Case 36/75 Rutili [1975] ECR 01219.

⁴⁰ CC Decision 53/1993. (X. 13.) AB.

element in the FL compared with the 1989 Constitution; however, this was previously guaranteed by the Constitutional Court under the principle of the rule of law. A definite novelty is that foreign judgments can be recognised not only on the basis of EU law but also on the basis of international treaties.⁴¹

Under the 1989 Constitution neither the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant⁴² nor the implementing law were subjected to a constitutional challenge.

The Framework Decision was transposed into Hungarian law by Act CXXX of 2003, which was later replaced by Act CLXXX of 2012.

Unlike in other Member States, the prohibition of the extradition or surrender of own nationals is not constitutionally entrenched. Although the prohibition of extradition of Hungarian nationals as a general rule is laid down in Act XXXVIII of 1996 on international legal assistance in criminal matters, the law of CLXXX of 2012 prevails on the basis of the principle lex posterior derogat legi priori.

A more difficult question arises in the case of a potential constitutional challenge against the 2012 Act. First, the former Art. 69 of the 1989 Constitution and Art. XIV of the FL currently in force on the prohibition of expelling Hungarian citizens from the territory of Hungary, or the statement that Hungarians always have the right to return to Hungary, may be interpreted as encompassing the prohibition of extradition or surrender of Hungarian nationals.

Secondly, the other ground-breaking novelty of the European Arrest Warrant, the departure from the principle of double criminality, may also be challenged on the basis of the Constitution or may be disputed in light of the FL. Since there are potential clashes between EU law and the Constitution/FL of Hungary, the matter is more delicate. However, these issues have not yet been raised in front of the Constitutional Court.

In Decision 32/2008. (III.12.) AB, the first case in relation to the European Arrest Warrant (EAW), it was not the implementing domestic law but a related piece of legislation, the Hungarian law promulgating the Convention on the surrender procedure between the European Union on the one hand and the Republic of Iceland and the Kingdom of Norway on the other (hereinafter EUIN), which became the subject of constitutional scrutiny in March 2008. Using his constitutional right of veto, the President of the Republic initiated the constitutional review of the law promulgating the EUIN, which had been approved by the Hungarian legislature on 11 June 2007. The EUIN Convention extended the jurisdiction of the Framework Decision to the above-mentioned two non-EU members, Iceland and Norway. Therefore, the Convention forms neither part of the primary nor of the secondary legal sources of the EU.

⁴¹ Jakab 2011, p. 229.

⁴² Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

In Decision 32/2008. (III.12.), the Constitutional Court ruled that certain passages of the challenged law were unconstitutional. The Constitutional Court examined the correspondence of both Art. 2 of the Constitution, whereby ‘Hungary is a sovereign, democratic state’, and Art. 57(4), which enshrined the legal principles of nulla poena sine lege and nullum crimen sine lege in the 1989 Constitution. The Court was of the opinion that the turn of phrase ‘according to Hungarian law’ in Art. 57(4) was primarily meant to refer to the Criminal Code, but it also covers obligations that become part of the Hungarian sources of law through the ratification of an international convention, thus making allowance for possible exceptions to the principle of nullum crimen sine lege, and therefore also including the possibility of retrospective legislation.⁴³ Therefore, Art. 7 of the 1989 Constitution on international law complements Art. 57(4), and the two should be applied in parallel. According to the Constitutional Court’s decision, however, the EU acquis does not qualify as international law. The Union can promulgate an article of international law only within the framework of the third pillar, but according to the Constitution these conventions do not become ‘part of Hungarian law’. In light of the above, the Constitutional Court reviewed the various articles of the EUN Convention and came to the conclusion that several sections of the Act ratifying the Convention were in fact in contradiction with the Constitution.

In Decision 3144/2013. (VII. 16) AB, the applicant challenged Act CXXX of 2003 (replaced by Act CLXXX of 2012 by the time the decision was delivered) implementing the EAW Framework Decision in the form of a constitutional complaint. According to the Act, execution of an EAW has to be refused if the criminal prosecution or punishment of the requested person is barred by statute under Hungarian law, provided that the act in question falls within the jurisdiction of Hungary.⁴⁴ Justice Miklós Lévay wrote the decision rejecting the complaint for the court unanimously. He emphasised that mutual trust and cooperation were the basis of surrender according to the EAW. This, however, does not mean an unconditional or unverified acceptance of the issuing authority’s evaluation of the case. According to Art. 11(1) of the implementing Act, the Budapest-Capital Regional Court shall hold a hearing where the requested person has the opportunity to challenge the existence of circumstances which might affect the conditions of his or her surrender. Should the Budapest-Capital Regional Court not be able to decide on surrender based on the available data and facts provided by the issuing authority, it may request, by way of the responsible minister, that the issuing authority in an urgent procedure provide it with additional information, with special regard to data that might lead to a possible refusal to execute the EAW, including data on the statute of limitations. Should the Hungarian judicial authority ultimately come to the conclusion that the statute of limitations has expired, it will deny the execution of the EAW.

⁴³ CC Decision 2/1994. (I. 14.) AB.

⁴⁴ Article 4 of Act CXXX of 2003 and Art. 5 point c) of Act CLXXX of 2012.

In Constitutional Court Decision 3025/2014 (II. 17.), the judge of an ordinary court referred a constitutional issue in an on-going case to the Constitutional Court. The judge challenged Art. 15(3) of Act CXXX of 2003 implementing the EAW according to which, once located, the person requested has to be automatically arrested, i.e. the competent authority is not granted judicial discretion to opt for less rights-intrusive measures in lieu of arrest. The Constitutional Court's majority – in an opinion authored by Justice Mária Szívós – rejected the complaint.

The majority held that the regulation under review corresponds to the constitutional and international requirements on the limitation of fundamental rights. The limitation is prescribed by law. The limitation serves the aim of exercising state powers of criminal prosecution. In order to make the exercise of these powers efficient, the state organs need to have effective tools which by necessity severely limit certain rights. The necessity of employing these tools can be justified by the nature of criminal acts, which endanger or violate other persons' fundamental constitutional rights. The efficient enforcement of EAWs ensures the successful exercise of the state powers of punishment and necessarily involves rights infringing measures, such as arrest and detention.

Justice Miklós Lévay authored a dissenting opinion, joined by Justices Elemér Balogh, András Bragyova and László Kiss. In their view the Constitutional Court should have conducted a complex constitutional scrutiny (as opposed to examining surrender for the sake of execution of a sentence only) and it should have determined a violation of the FL. The dissenting opinion clarified that a Constitutional Court review conducted upon the initiative of a judge is an abstract review of the challenged provision. Often the Constitutional Court does not limit the scope of constitutional scrutiny to the subject or object of the case at hand, but reviews all elements of the attacked provision.⁴⁵ In the view of the dissenting judges, the only limitation is that the Constitutional Court must stick to the constitutional review of the provision to be invoked in the actual case at issue. Therefore, the majority Justices – in the opinion of the dissenting Justices – engaged in 'negative judicial activism' with regard to the scope of the constitutional scrutiny. In their view, a full constitutional analysis of the whole challenged provision should have been conducted. Neither the EAW Framework Decision nor the implementing domestic law differentiates between procedures conducted for the sake of a criminal proceeding and for the enforcement of a custodial sentence or detention order, which is a further reason to not limit the scope of constitutional review. In the view of the dissenting Justices, had the majority reviewed the whole provision, it would have come to the conclusion that the implementing legislation was, while necessary, disproportionate to the aim to be pursued and therefore unconstitutional.

In order to underpin his point, Justice Lévay also invoked EU law. He noted that the Constitutional Court must interpret domestic law – as far as possible – in line with the Framework Decision.⁴⁶ Although Art. 12 of the EAW Framework Decision leaves it primarily up to the Member States to decide whether a requested person should remain in detention after arrest, the main aim of this rights-infringing measure is the prevention of absconding. This provision thus does not oblige Member States to detain all requested persons. Quite to the contrary, in his view, severe doubts are raised regarding the compatibility of the Hungarian measures with EU law, with due regard to Art. 6 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights on the right to liberty and security of person.

⁴⁵ See e.g. CC Decision 37/2013. (XII. 5.) AB.

2.3.2.1 Decision 32/2008. (III.12.) evoked harsh criticism among legal scholars who immediately reacted to the Constitutional Court's ruling.⁴⁷ It is quite telling that a Constitutional Court judge, Péter Kovács, authored one of the scholarly articles,⁴⁸ thereby departing from the well-established practice that constitutional court justices do not explain their decisions, and judgments shall speak for themselves. The majority of the experts in the field seem to agree with Justice Bragyova and have criticised the application of the nullum crimen principle to the law under scrutiny. As Krisztina Karsai and Katalin Ligeti have proved, whether and to what extent constitutional and other guarantees apply to procedures conducted in the framework of legal assistance depends on the branch of law. As the professors have rightly pointed out, the Constitutional Court entirely omitted such analysis and took it for granted that legal assistance in criminal matters belongs to the branch of criminal law,⁴⁹ although the various parts of an extradition procedure are characterised by their patchwork nature: on the one hand a certain duality between international and domestic law can be traced, and on the other the procedure has both criminal and administrative law elements. Compliance with a request for extradition or surrender is an administrative law decision, and cannot be regarded as an act where the criminal power of the requested state is being manifested, even if – like in the case of surrender – the principle of direct request applies, since the objective of the procedure is neither the establishment of criminal liability nor the imposition of sanctions.⁵⁰

Although the rulings declaring the unconstitutionality of the domestic law giving effect to the international treaty which extended the ambit of the EAW to Iceland and Norway have created some difficulties, the overall situation is not as bad as it seems: in the day-to-day practice, this legal instrument more or less does the job. The overall experience indicates that in the face of all the constitutional worries, one-fifth of all arrest warrants end in effective surrender in the EU.⁵¹

⁴⁶ Cases C-105/03 Pupino [2005] ECR I-05285; C-397/01 Pfeiffer and Others [2004] ECR I-08835; C-282/10 Dominguez [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:33.

⁴⁷ Karsai and Ligeti 2008, pp. 399–408.

⁴⁸ Kovács 2008, pp. 409–413, commenting on the article by Karsai and Ligeti.

⁴⁹ Karsai and Ligeti 2008, pp. 399–408, 400.

⁵⁰ Ibid., pp. 401–402.

⁵¹ See the aggregate number of EAWs issued and resulting in effective surrender between 2005–2013, <http://www.europarl.europa.eu/EPRA/140803REV1-European-Arrest-Warrant-FINAL.pdf>.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 The expert has come across and is aware of a number of cases that raise doubts with regard to in absentia judgments rendered in other Member States decades ago, but these cases have not yet been heard by the courts.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1–2.3.4.2 Although constitutional issues did not directly arise in the following complex set of decisions, let us mention the perhaps best known EAW surrender case which has been extensively covered by the Hungarian and Irish media. The Tobin case illustrates the difficulties of the implementation of the EAW by the Member States.⁵²

The case confirms that the European criminal justice that used to operate along the lines of intergovernmentalism was inefficient. A field of law that develops slowly on a case-by-case basis is not suitable for remedying the negative side-effects of an expanded freedom of movement.

Out of fear for loss of national sovereignty over criminal law, the Member States opted for mutual recognition-based instruments rather than harmonisation. However, mutual confidence has still not been fully achieved among the Member States. As long as certain states are worried about their citizens' basic rights and respect for their procedural guarantees due to different fundamental rights standards, they will leave shortcuts in their legislation to avoid the enforcement of EU law; they will interpret EU law in a restrictive way or even contra legem. Irish Justice Hardiman's opinion speaks volumes in this regard; he straightforwardly rejected the idea of mutual trust.⁵³ Had he adhered to the basics of EU criminal law, neither his devastating opinion about Hungarian criminal procedure nor his ignorance about the Hungarian legal system should have mattered. The fact that Hungary would not have extradited its own citizen but rather would have offered to execute the punishment itself should also have been irrelevant, since the EAW does not operate on the basis of reciprocity, but rather on the basis of confidence among the Member States.

Had the Member States not guarded their national sovereignty over criminal so jealously, a Luxembourg decision in the framework of a preliminary ruling procedure would have clarified how to interpret Irish law in conformation with EU law so as to correspond to the Framework Decision. Had the third pillar operated along the lines of supranationalism, the Commission or another Member State, including Hungary, could have initiated an infringement procedure for the wrongful implementation of the Framework Decision. Had the Court of Justice had more powers, it could have condemned Ireland for disrespecting the maximum 90-day deadline applicable for the determination of a request for surrender, and the length of proceeding argument would not have arisen.

⁵² Buda Surroundings District Court, case number: 2.B.1308/2000/20, 7 May 2002., Pest County Court as court of second instance, case number: 2. Bf. 740/2002/6, 10 October 2002, High Court, Minister for Justice Equality & Law Reform v. Tobin, [2007] IEHC 15, 12 January 2007, Supreme Court of Ireland, Minister for Justice, Equality & Law Reform v. Tobin, [2008] IESC 3, 3 July 2007., High Court, MJELR v. Tobin, [2011] IEHC 72, 11 February 2011, Supreme Court of Ireland, Minister for Justice Equality and Law Reform v. Tobin, [2012] IESC 37, 19 June 2012.

⁵³ Supreme Court of Ireland, Minister for Justice Equality and Law Reform v. Tobin, [2012] IESC 37, 19 June 2012.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 The dissenting opinion of Justice Lévay to the EUIN decision, which clarified what procedural and substantive safeguards need to be available for the constitutional operation of the EUIN, seems to have embraced the necessity of mutual recognition and trust under the European framework for criminal cooperation. The separate opinion of Justice Bragyova, however, suggested that even though the nullum crimen sine lege principle may not constitute a constitutional limit to the EUIN, other constitutional principles, such as the right to asylum, the prohibition on the extradition of own nationals, the equal treatment principle, the right to a fair trial or the prohibition of the death penalty may offer sufficient constitutional grounds for the potential refusal of EU criminal cooperation measures.

The EAW Transfer Detention decision of the Constitutional Court⁵⁴ – reported above at Sects. 2.3.1–2.3.2 – was also not particularly critical of the mutual recognition principle. It merely took notice that criminal cooperation under the EU framework represented a closer system of cooperation among the Member States, and that the obligations of national criminal justice systems under the mutual recognition principle can be scrutinised domestically when the grounds for the execution of an EAW are examined by national courts. A more critical position was formulated in the dissenting opinion of Justice Lévay and others, arguing that the domestic implementation of the Framework Decision, which prescribed the mandatory detention of the person being transferred under an EAW and which did not regulate the possibility of using other alternative instruments, represented a disproportionate interference with the right to personal freedom. The EAW Framework Decision interpreted together with Art. 6 EU Charter contributed to the conclusion by the dissenting judges that the domestic regulation of mandatory detention following a mandatory arrest under an EAW was unconstitutional, as it represented a violation of the right to personal freedom by making the decision automatic and not subjecting it to a test of justification in the light of the circumstances of the individual case.

2.3.5.2 The Expert is not aware of any debates regarding the transplantation of mutual recognition from internal market to criminal law in Hungary.

Technically, the mutual recognition principle is an effective principle for the governance of large and diverse areas. It ensures that without engaging in politically treacherous and legally risky harmonisation, private and public activity across borders between the participating states can be secured, and conflicts between the different participating regulatory systems are settled. It places emphasis on horizontal cooperation and communication, and conflicts are settled in a bilateral framework. It creates an essentially decentralised framework for governance which, in harmony with the principle of subsidiarity, favours local discretion. Its safe operation, however, requires that exemptions from the obligation of mutual recognition be available. Mutual recognition, because of increased horizontal cooperation and communication between the participating states, may lead to voluntary harmonisation through the conduct of the individual participants.

⁵⁴ CC Decision 3025/2014 (II. 11.) AB.

2.3.5.3 The Expert is not aware of any such concerns raised with regard to the role of courts.

In the Expert's view, the mutual recognition principle assumes the approaches of both trust and cooperation and of protection. While there is pressure to cooperate horizontally and to safeguard the effectiveness of the overall governance framework, it is possible to protect locally formulated considerations in what is an essentially decentralised system. The sensitive issue is how these functions may be reconciled, and to what extent the protection function is allowed to be exercised in light of the inherent pressure to secure the effective operation of the governance framework. Again, this is a question of gradation.

In the Expert's view, a conflict between the different functions exercised by national courts is likely to arise in the area of cooperation in family matters. National courts are likely to be conflicted by their obligations to protect the rights of the child and to secure the effective execution of court orders issued in a foreign jurisdiction, in particular when the parents have initiated parallel proceedings concerning child custody in different jurisdictions.

2.3.5.4 In the Expert's view, it first needs to be considered whether the current safeguards available in the EU measures concerned enable effective protection in all circumstances and whether through the extension of the relevant safeguards at the EU level any hiatuses can be remedied. When the introduction of further nationally driven safeguards beyond these possibilities is considered, how they would affect the regulatory objectives of the relevant EU measures and whether they are liable to reproduce the procedural and other problems the relevant EU measures were intended to resolve in the first place needs to be taken into account. The Expert considers that while a reintroduction of judicial review could increase the level of protection of individuals, it is difficult to foresee the cross-border implications of such a solution. It must not be ignored that the effective resolution of cross-border matters is also in the interest of the individuals concerned.

Locally engineered responses could also raise the issue of different standards of protection being available to individuals in different Member States. It is not only questionable that the same institutions of judicial protection could be introduced in the different Member States in the different areas where the mutual recognition principle applies, but it is also unclear whether the relevant judicial remedies would have the same scope and intensity. These differences could reflect deeper divergences between the different legal systems and therefore, introducing a uniformly applicable solution at the national level may be problematic not only as a matter of competences, but also substantively. Revisiting the rules of the existing EU measures in light of the experiences of the past year may offer a more easily achieved solution.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The implementation of the Data Retention Directive⁵⁵ did not raise constitutional issues in Hungary. The Hungarian Civil Liberties Union filed a petition with the Constitutional Court in 2008 against several articles of Act C of 2003 on electronic communications,⁵⁶ alleging that beyond the violation of several fundamental rights (e.g. right to privacy, right to protection of personal data, right to property) the domestic legislation also infringed Art. 2/A of the 1989 Constitution by implementing an ultra vires EU act. However, the Constitutional Court did not address the petition, and when the 1989 Constitution was repealed by the FL, the petitioner was unable to re-initiate the procedure as a constitutional complaint under the new legal conditions.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 The principle of loyalty does not require the Member States to overlook the principles governing the legality of domestic administrative action completely, and it does not prevent the Member States from observing domestic legal requirements in the execution of EU measures, provided that the effectiveness of EU law is not placed in jeopardy. The Hungarian approach was placed under the scrutiny of the Court of Justice in its 22 May 2014 judgment in the Érsekcsanádi Mezőgazdasági Zrt. case.⁵⁷ The Court of Justice, as a matter of the formal requirements of EU law, confirmed the Hungarian practice by accepting that the adoption of national administrative decisions and administrative opinions for the execution of Commission Decisions are not excluded by those decisions.⁵⁸ This, however, does ⁵⁵ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁵⁶ Petition of the Hungarian Civil Liberties Union: http://tasz.hu/files/tasz/imce/Eht_AB_vegleges.pdf.

⁵⁷ Case C-56/13 Érsekcsanádi Mezőgazdasági Zrt [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:352.

⁵⁸ The Court of Justice paid no attention to matters arising in domestic law relating to the adoption of national measures for the execution of Commission Decisions – specifically, the use of an administrative opinion as opposed to an administrative decision to decide on the rights and not mean that as a matter of national law, and provided that EU law requirements are not violated, national courts cannot demand that the domestic requirements of administrative law be met.⁵⁹ This is particularly important in circumstances where the legality of administrative action, for example the choice of administrative instrument (here administrative decisions and a formally non-binding administrative opinion) restricting the rights of and imposing obligations on individuals, is questionable under domestic law. Arguably, the Court of Justice implied, whilst denying that it had competence to rule on the issue, that the lawfulness of the executing national measures may also depend on their meeting domestic legal requirements.⁶⁰ This follows from the fact that the questions referred to the Court of Justice were aimed at clarifying whether not providing compensation for damage caused by national executing measures is an acceptable practice in general considering, especially, the requirements following from EU law.

See also the György Balázs case in Sect. 2.8.1.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 It has been suggested that the declaration by the Constitutional Court that a domestic executing/implementing measure is unconstitutional could be considered as an indirect constitutional criticism towards EU market regulation, although formally it would have no effect on the legality of any EU instruments, and the Constitutional Court has always been cautious to indicate that its decisions do not involve an assessment of EU legislation.⁶¹

The Agricultural Surplus Stock decision⁶² offers a clear image of the hesitant approach of the Constitutional Court, which placed more emphasis on domestic conundrums of constitutional adjudication than on investigating the potential for obligations of individuals, and it was only interested in the effective execution of the Commission decisions, which did not specify the rules of their domestic implementation (paras. 40–43).

⁵⁹ This question was not put to the Court of Justice, and it is likely that the Court may not have jurisdiction to answer the question in its entirety.

⁶⁰ See paras. 47–49, 51–56, and 62–65 of the judgment. The Court of Justice held that in the absence of explicit requirements in EU law, it is exclusively for the national legislature to decide whether a system of compensation for any damage caused by the executing national protection measures should be established. In the relevant questions referred to the Court of Justice, the referring court wanted to clarify whether the principles of EU law would require the Hungarian state to set up a system of compensation, or liberate it from any such (European and domestic) obligation.

⁶¹ Fazekas 2014, p. 53.

⁶² CC Decision 17/2004 (V. 24.) AB. Annotated in Albi 2009, pp. 46–69; Sajó 2004, pp. 351–371 and Uitz 2006, pp. 41–63.

diverging constitutional standards of economic regulation at the European and the national level. The main limitation of the decision is that, unlike the Estonian Supreme Court and the Czech Constitutional Court,⁶³ the Constitutional Court refused to acknowledge that it is necessary to examine matters under EU law. Therefore, only the domestic implications of the relevant EU regimes were examined on the basis of domestic constitutional law. This enabled the Hungarian court to avoid the constitutional controversies of addressing the constitutional deficits of EU regulation and of giving precedence to EU law over the Hungarian Constitution.

The Court claimed that that ‘the question about the provisions challenged in the petition concerns the constitutionality of the Hungarian legislation applied for the implementation of the EU regulations, rather than the validity or the interpretation of the EU regulations themselves. This meant that the act was reviewed on the basis of the standing jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on the principle of legal certainty, which resulted in a declaration that several provisions of the act were unconstitutional. The Constitutional Court confirmed, in particular, that the payment obligations were introduced retroactively, and that the temporal complications of implementing the EU regulations in the first half of 2004 compromised the constitutional principle of legal certainty. The Commission regulations were subjected – albeit indirectly – to the control offered by Hungarian constitutional requirements.⁶⁴ Although the intention to uphold core domestic constitutional requirements, such as the rule of law, was evident,⁶⁵ it is far from certain that this was inspired by the suspected more relaxed demand for legal certainty in EU law. Similarly, the Constitutional Court did not specify whether the decision might be regarded as a challenge to the supremacy of EU law (of the Commission regulations) over the Hungarian Constitution.⁶⁶

There is perhaps a clearer indication of what the Constitutional Court thinks of the standard of fundamental rights protection at the EU level in the jurisprudence in which the protection of rights as offered by EU legislation is contrasted indirectly with national requirements.⁶⁷ As noted in the Hungarian commentary, these cases reveal a more receptive attitude towards the EU dimensions of constitutional

⁶³ EU legislation on transitional agricultural measures also caused constitutional problems immediately after EU accession in Estonia and the Czech Republic. See Albi 2009.

⁶⁴ Fazekas 2014, p. 53.

⁶⁵ As Fazekas noted, it is unclear ‘whether legal certainty was given precedence because it was one of the most significant constitutional principles of the democratic Hungarian state based on the rule of law, or other provisions of the constitution would also be treated in this way’. Ibid., p. 53.

⁶⁶ Fazekas argued that the Constitutional Court, first among the constitutional courts of the new Member States, was under considerable pressure to avoid a solution which would have represented a limitation of state sovereignty and independence, and of the constitutional values of Hungarian democracy. Fazekas 2014, p. 55.

⁶⁷ The Lisbon Decision made it clear that the Charter of Fundamental Rights binds the Member States and they are subjected to the jurisdiction of the Court of Justice under the Charter. It also accepted that the Lisbon Treaty reinforced fundamental rights protection in the EU.

disputes than the cases – discussed above – that deal with more visible conflicts between national and EU constitutional law.⁶⁸

There are several cases where EU law has enhanced the protection of employees and equal treatment on the grounds of gender.

Finally, it needs to be considered that recent jurisprudence from the Constitutional Court concerning the constitutional benchmarks of economic regulation by the Hungarian state under the FL seems to be pursuing a rather reduced constitutional agenda. The rulings, which aimed to lay down the foundations of economic constitutionalism under the FL, recognise a particularly broad discretion for the legislature to interfere with the economy, and they, therefore, seem to contradict any expectation that EU economic regulation may fall below Hungarian constitutional benchmarks, as now regulated under the FL. Nevertheless, the relevant decisions may serve as a source of conflict between EU economic regulation and Hungarian constitutionalism. While they do not represent an outright denial that the economic constitution under the FL follows the idea of a market economy,⁶⁹ their conclusions are based on explicit – if rather misunderstood – criticisms of global and regional market integration, and on concerns for the devastating consequences of unregulated markets. They also recognise the global fiscal and economic crisis as a ground for curbing back the market and expanding the influence of the state. This, in the interpretation of the recent jurisprudence, entails that normal rule of law requirements may be accorded lesser relevance and that the right to property and the freedom of enterprise may need to tolerate more robust interventions by the state. At this point, it must be noted that there is no evidence that the examination of the individual grounds by the Constitutional Court has actually been affected by these considerations. Beyond general declarations, the decisions in question have all failed to establish a link between the crisis/regulatory failure/globalisation and the legal provisions in question.

The June 2014 decision in the Cooperative Banking Restructuring case⁷⁰ indicated that in matters of economic policy and regulation, the Constitutional Court is prepared to trust the judgement of the Government. It also made it clear that the right to property and the freedom to pursue an economic activity represent a rather undemanding constitutional limitation on government discretion, and it seems to have set the benchmarks for justifiability, rationality and necessity applicable to economic regulation comparably lower than in the jurisprudence under the 1989

⁶⁸ Fazekas 2014, pp. 65–68.

⁶⁹ In Art. M), the Fundamental Law holds that the Hungarian economy is based on value-producing work and on the freedom of enterprise, and that Hungary ensures the conditions of fair and undistorted competition in the market. Contrast this with Art. 9(1) and (2) of the 1989 Constitution, which holds that the Hungarian economy is a market economy in which the equality of private and public ownership are guaranteed, and that Hungary recognises and supports the freedom of enterprise and the freedom of competition in the market.

⁷⁰ CC Decision 20/2014 (VI. 30.) AB.

Constitution.⁷¹ The decision was allegedly influenced by the exigencies of post-crisis economic and fiscal recovery. The Court was anxious to make the general point that global and regional market integration and the governance of global and regional markets have proved to constitute a risk for the Hungarian social and economic order, but without any elaboration on how this might actually affect constitutional standards.

The socially and politically highly controversial November 2014 Foreign Currency Consumer Loan decision⁷² ruled that Act XXXVIII of 2014 implementing the ‘uniformity decision’ by the Curia (uniformity decision in civil law 2/2014) concerning the fairness of foreign currency consumer loan contracts delivered on the basis of the Kásler judgment of the EU Court of Justice,⁷³ did not constitute a violation of legal certainty, the prohibition of retrospective legislation or the right to a fair trial. The Act had sought to alleviate the exposure to currency fluctuations of individuals affected by foreign currency mortgages. In setting the premises, the Constitutional Court claimed that the contested legislation needed to be interpreted in the light of the commitment of the FL to protect vulnerable individuals, in particular poor and vulnerable consumers. While this in principle is unproblematic, there is no evidence that the assessment of the Constitutional Court of the individual grounds was influenced by such commitment.

Concerning the requirement of legal certainty, the Constitutional Court held that the extremely limited amount of time available between the adoption and the entry into force of the act in question – although it was recognised as unusually short – cannot be regarded as unconstitutional, as in the circumstances of the case the financial institutions affected by the legislation were in fact able to make the necessary preparations. Fundamentally, it argued that the Act contained nothing new which the financial institutions affected would not have known from judicial practice or from other pieces of legislation, and that the Act, although it introduced considerable negative consequences for the financial institutions affected, did not contain provisions which would have required lengthy preparations.

Regarding the claim relating to retrospective legislation (and in this connection to legal certainty), the Constitutional Court stated that the conditions of contractual fairness as regulated by the Act – although not as explicitly as made out in the Act – had in fact been part of the Hungarian legal system before the introduction of foreign currency consumer loans in the Hungarian market. It argued that the fairness of consumer contracts have always been regulated clearly and unambiguously in Hungarian law and that the explicit conditions of the Act on contractual fairness, ⁷¹ See, also CC Decision 3194/2014 (VII. 7.) AB on the regulation of the sale of tobacco products, which by examining only the manifest unreasonableness of the regulatory instrument in light of its general objectives has created an extremely low constitutional benchmark for economic regulation, aiming to re-regulate and re-partition entire sectors of the economy. The generally applicable benchmarks, such as transparent and non-discriminatory regulation, and the adequate regulation of the discretion made available to the public body concerned, were ignored.

⁷² CC Decision 34/2014 (XI. 14.) AB.

⁷³ Case C-26/13 Kásler and Káslemné Rábai [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:282.

which followed directly from the judgment of the EU Court of Justice in Kásler interpreting Directive 93/13/EC, have been part of Hungarian law since the implementation of the directive into Hungarian law. In reaching this conclusion, the Constitutional Court was not disturbed by the fact that until the judgment in Kásler, the uniformity decision 2/2014 and the adoption of the Act, the particular meaning of contractual fairness as specified in length by the Act had not been defined at all in Hungarian law or in Hungarian judicial or other practice. It seemed satisfied that the vulnerable position of consumers and the information deficit favouring financial institutions should have been sufficient to allow for an interpretation of fairness in consumer contracts as determined in legislation in 2014.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 There is no evidence that any constitutional discussions on the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) have taken place in Hungary, which is not a eurozone country and has not ratified the ESM Treaty.

The Constitutional Court decision dealing with the constitutionality of the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance (TSCG) dealt with the interpretation of the ‘Europe clause’ (Art. E(2) and (4) of the FL).⁷⁴ It focused, in particular, on the issue of whether the binding nature of the TSCG, which regulates policy and institutional matters relating to the EU framework, should be considered under Article E of the FL, which requires a two-thirds majority in the Hungarian Parliament in the ratification process. The technical reasoning of the decision, which did not address the substantive legal and policy consequences of the TSCG, examined under these premises whether the TSCG should be classified as a treaty constituting the European Union, or as a treaty modifying or supplementing the rights and obligations laid down in the treaties constituting the European Union. Ultimately, it found that if the TSCG does not affect the transfer of constitutional competences under the EU framework, the provisions of Art. E(2) and (4) need not be applied. The reasoning is far from clear, and the use of the conditional in the conclusion ('if')⁷⁵ was not particularly helpful for the legislator in determining whether the TSCG in fact required a two-thirds majority for ratification by Parliament. The refusal of the Constitutional Court to look into the substance of the TSCG was based on the fact that its review powers were limited by the application

⁷⁴ CC Decision 22/2012 (V. 11.) AB.

⁷⁵ On the basis of EU constitutional law and as indicated in Art. 3(1) of the TSCG, the TSCG cannot be regarded as constituting a transfer of competences for their exercise under the EU framework, and the TSCG (therefore) was not adopted as a modification of the Founding Treaties. There are, nevertheless, TSCG provisions which affect – beyond explicit EU legal obligations – the fiscal sovereignty of its signatories (Arts. 3(1)a, 3(1)e, 3(2), and 11), which should justify its recognition as a treaty falling under Art. E of the FL.

in the given case, which did not touch upon substantive issues. The Court nevertheless indicated that it was prepared to examine the substance of the Hungarian legislation incorporating the TSCG in light of the FL, provided that it receives an admissible application in that matter.

2.7.2 There have been no constitutional discussions regarding Eurobonds in Hungary.

2.7.3 As seen earlier, the constitutional order established after 2010 in Hungary went particularly far in guaranteeing unrestrained discretion for the Government to tackle the economic and social impact of the financial and economic crisis. The partial suspension of the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court in reviewing economic regulation enabled the Government to make the necessary reforms through legislation. This is reflected in the constitutional case law dealing with the admissibility of petitions against fiscal and economic legislation aimed – supposedly – at managing the crisis, which despite inventing the potentially useful instrument of interpreting the right to human dignity together with the non-discrimination principle have left Governmental discretion untamed. However, the fact that these constitutional provisions were left in force in 2015 and that they are potentially of unlimited temporal applicability begs the question of whether their aim was ever to guarantee effective crisis management by the Government, and it is extremely controversial that these immunities apply to the non-crisis related re-regulation and re-partitioning of different markets in Hungary. More importantly, the essence of these constitutional changes has never been the reinforcement of democratic controls, rule of law requirements, transparency or the adequate balancing of rights with regard to Government austerity/bail out/ emergency and other nationalisation measures. Conversely, their intention was to exclude any form of potential control over Government policy-making.

This, necessarily, can be explained by some form of new government philosophy regarding the post-crisis role of the state in the market and by a newly found emphasis on solidarity and social rights in fiscal and economic regulation, as attempted in the previously commented recent case law of the Constitutional Court. The FL is also available to provide a potential communitarian interpretation of these changes, with the argument that the interest of the community of Hungarian people should enjoy priority over the rights and interests of individuals, economic operators or particular social groups. Nevertheless, there is no convincing evidence available that these interpretations of the Hungarian social order comprehensively influence government policy-making and regulation, and that austerity and other crisis management measures have been introduced to satisfy citizens' demand for control, transparency and accountability. It is a more likely interpretation that liberal constitutionalism has been suspended while the Government is 'at work'.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 The Expert is aware only of one instance in which the invalidity of the relevant EU measure was raised and the respondent petitioned for a reference for a preliminary ruling to this end.⁷⁶ It was claimed that Art. 5(3)j of Directive 2001/29/EC⁷⁷ – governing one of the exceptions and limitations to EU copyright law – violated Arts. 50 and 95 EC, without clarifying the grounds of that claim. The regional appeal court refused to refer the case to the CJEU. It indicated that the directive was irrelevant for the facts of the case and that the Treaty provisions cited were wrongly raised in the case.

There were two other cases in which this matter was addressed, although very indirectly. The question in GSV was whether the Common Customs Tariff was enforceable against individuals when its Hungarian version, containing an obvious mistake, supported the legal position of the individual in question.⁷⁸ In a preliminary ruling, the Court of Justice held that the linguistic discrepancy ‘is not liable to entail the annulment (of the tariff classification under EU law) made by the customs authorities on the basis of all the other language versions (of the Common Customs Tariff and the related regulations).’⁷⁹ In György Balázs, a question was put to the CJEU in a preliminary reference on whether the unavailability of legal measures in the national language had an impact on the lawfulness of their application under the relevant EU legislation (Directive 98/34/EC⁸⁰) by domestic public authorities.⁸¹

2.8.2 The Expert has found no evidence of discussion on the standard of review by the EU courts in Hungary. The focus of all actors – the ordinary courts, the Constitutional Court and the administration – has been on ensuring that EU law is given effect in a manner required by the relevant principles of EU law and as it follows from the FL and the accession documents. The main indication that the scope and effectiveness of judicial review may actually matter for the political and constitutional order under the FL is the notorious delimitation in the constitutional text of the competences of the Constitutional Court in questions of fiscal policy and of the related economic policies. In the instances where in the Expert’s view the effective application of EU law has not been adequately ensured, the cause of non-enforcement must be sought in individual professional incompetence rather ⁷⁶ Budapest Regional Appeal Court 8. Pf. 21.417/2011/6.

⁷⁷ Directive 2001/29/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 May 2001 on the harmonisation of certain aspects of copyright and related rights in the information society, [2001] OJ L 167/10.

⁷⁸ Case C-74/13 GSV [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:243.

⁷⁹ Ibid., para. 53.

⁸⁰ Directive 98/34/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 June 1998 laying down a procedure for the provision of information in the field of technical standards and regulations, [1998] OJ L 204/37.

⁸¹ Case C-251/14 György Balázs [2015] ECLI:EU:C:2015:687.

than in conscious resistance against expanding, strictly enforced but judicially inadequately controlled EU law. Nonetheless, considering the increasingly critical approach of the Constitutional Court to global and regional economic integration, it is not excluded that it will strike a more critical tone with regards to the legality and the impact of EU economic regulation. Although it is bound to obey EU law under domestic constitutional law and it would be extremely reluctant to contradict a formal obligation laid down in law, it is not completely excluded that the Constitutional Court – in circumstances where Hungarian interests are gravely affected, relying on the social and communitarian values of the FL as a rather thin veil hiding its true intentions – would question the applicability of EU law based on this or other gaps in EU constitutional law.

Considering that with the introduction of the FL and the recent jurisprudence on the economic constitution in Hungary the availability of judicial review against domestic economic and social legislation has been considerably reduced, arguments comparing the standard of judicial review before EU Courts and before the Constitutional Court do not appear particularly convincing. Both avenues of judicial review seem to acknowledge and defer to the discretion of the legislator, and both are prepared to annul legislative provisions in the case of a manifest breach of the requirements of legality. Since the examination by the EU Courts – in terms of the justification, regulatory design, balancing of competing objectives and the availability of sufficient regulatory and other safeguards – seems better executed than that of the Constitutional Court, compared to the current state of Hungarian jurisprudence, the judicial review carried out by the EU Courts appears to have a more solid legal footing.

2.8.3 As a necessary disclaimer to the assessment of Hungarian jurisprudence, a clear dividing line must be drawn between the approach of the ‘old’ and the ‘new’ Constitutional Court. Because of the new approach taken in recent years – predominantly following considerations of political nature – towards the constitutional limits and controls of legislative action, the jurisprudence cannot be conceived as having developed in a linear fashion under more or less constant institutional supervision.⁸²

2.8.4 See also the answer in Sect. 1.3.4.

In Decision 61/2011 (VII. 13.) AB, as a direct continuation of the thoughts first quoted, the Court adjusted the domestic level of constitutional protection of fundamental rights to the international level, not on a hierarchical basis, but as a consequence of the pacta sunt servanda principle:

In case of certain fundamental rights, the Constitution defines the substance of the fundamental right in the same way as it is in some international treaty (for example the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the European Convention on Human Rights). In these cases, the level of protection of fundamental rights provided by the Constitutional Court may in no instance be lower than the level of international protection of rights

⁸² Szente 2015, p. 186.

(typically elaborated by the Strasbourg Court of Human Rights). As a result of the pacta sunt servanda principle [Section 7(1) of the Constitution, Article Q(2)-(3) of the FL], the Constitutional Court is required to follow the Strasbourg jurisprudence and the level of protection of fundamental rights defined therein, even if they did not necessarily arise from its own previous case law.⁸³

Later, the Court broadened the international determination of the level of protection of fundamental rights to include the stipulations of EU law; moreover, it considered the above quoted conclusion to be ‘even more true’ for the law of the European Union, having regard to Art. E(2)–(3) of the FL (compared to the rules of the Constitution, however, it did not elaborate in detail the meaning of the new Article E(3)).⁸⁴

2.8.5 The Expert is not aware of concerns about the standard of review by the CJEU having been raised in Hungary. As indicated earlier, the discussions have focused on the adequate and effective implementation and application of EU law as it follows from the formal legal provisions which bind the relevant national actors in EU matters.

In the Hungarian context, there is a more directly damaging gap in judicial protection under EU law, which follows from the above-mentioned refusal of the Constitutional Court to assume jurisdiction to examine the compatibility of national legislation with EU law, which forces individuals to seek redress in litigation before ordinary courts.

The Expert understands the practical rationale for presuming equivalent standards of review in an environment characterised by the overlap of multiple constitutional jurisdictions. The Expert also understands that the threshold for the rebuttal of the presumption of equivalent standards was determined at such a high level in order to avoid disagreement between the affected courts on minor issues concerning the balance established between the policy aims pursued and the fundamental rights protected, or concerning the right combination of safeguards available for the protection of rights, and to confine inter-systemic constitutional conflicts to matters where there is a manifest breach of requirements or a fundamental backsliding in the standard of protection offered.

Considering that the presumption of equivalence is rebuttable as established in Bosphorus (and in the jurisprudence of national courts), the resulting gap in judicial protection does not seem as threatening and damaging as perhaps suggested by the question. Although the different assessment of EU legislation on fundamental rights grounds by different courts is not excluded, it does not seem likely that genuine fundamental rights concerns would be overlooked by one court and declared as vital by another. The state of the Strasbourg jurisprudence itself indicates that the protection of human rights by courts is not a task that could not be fulfilled by other courts within their jurisdiction, and that adequately prepared legislative measures, which duly incorporate the legal signposts indicated by human rights law, would not have much to fear in Strasbourg or Luxembourg. With intensive cross-fertilisation between the Strasbourg and the Luxembourg jurisprudence, the potential for divergent judicial treatment of EU legislation and a gap in judicial protection does not seem particularly high. It is also unclear whether the Strasbourg court because of its institutional position as a transnational court would not guarantee the same, or even greater, deference to the intention of the EU legislator in matters of policy as expressed in an otherwise adequately drafted and designed piece of EU legislation. It must not be overlooked that the Strasbourg jurisprudence regards international cooperation and effective transnational governance as a significant common objective of European states which, as expressed in Bosphorus, must be given some form of recognition in the judicial control of EU or other transnational legislation.

⁸³ CC Decision 61/2011. (VII. 13.) AB.

⁸⁴ CC Decision 32/2012. (VII. 4.) AB.

2.8.6 The Expert is not aware of concerns regarding the equal treatment of citizens falling under the scope of EU law and falling under the scope of domestic law having been raised in Hungary. The Expert notes that similar concerns have been raised in the academic literature regarding the legal treatment of individuals in the Member States that qualify and do not qualify as EU citizens. In the Expert's view, this has less to do with the constitutional credentials of EU legislation and more with the political willingness and unwillingness of the Member States to address the situation at the European and at the national level.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 The Hungarian case regarding surplus sugar stocks noted in the Questionnaire has partly been explored above in Sect. 2.6.1.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 In the Expert's view, the common constitutional traditions of the Member States as sources of EU constitutional law have indeed failed to fulfil the role(s) assumedly intended for them in previous jurisprudence. The concept – with a few exceptions – has proved to be unworkable and impractical in judicial practice, and a substitute was found in the more practical and workable law of the ECHR. In other instances (e.g. the fundamental rights guarantees in EU competition enforcement procedures), a genuinely European solution needed to be found, as the common constitutional traditions of the Member States appeared to be unable to provide workable legal principles, and they would not have been able to offer legal solutions suiting the particular context. The doctrinal, conceptual and other differences in that particular area in the then developing national legal orders were irreducible, and there was no common approach which would have satisfied both the constitutional demands and the interests of the effective administration of EU policies. Furthermore, judicial practice showed that principles of EU law could be developed and then applied on a whim, without taking into account their origins and workability as common constitutional traditions. Nevertheless, this does not mean that they have not influenced EU legislation and EU Treaty reform. The Treaties do in fact recognise – mainly, at the level of declarations – a number of shared constitutional norms and values, and the EU now seems unable to legislate without having regard to requirements recognised in national constitutions and also in European treaties governing the human rights dimension of human activity (e.g. the autonomy and informed consent of patients, the value of human life and human biological material).

In other words, the listing of common constitutional traditions depends on what normative content is expected to be expressed and how that normative content is expressed. In the case of nulla poena sine lege, finding common ground among the Member States as to its normative content – also considering that its guarantees have been subject to dilution – does not seem particularly problematic. However, establishing consensus regarding how that normative content may be regulated, especially in the European setting, may be more difficult, as the potential technical rules/arrangements and safeguards provided, as in the EAW, may not satisfy all expectations. Regarding the German expectation of citizens' private lives not being recorded, the fundamental question is how its assumed normative content can be expressed in EU legislation. If it can find expression in a limitation or exceptions clause agreed by the Member States, then within that framework it can be recognised as a common constitutional tradition of the Member States. In a similar manner, the requirement under legal certainty in Central and Eastern European Member States that adequate time must be afforded to enable preparations for the application of tax measures, as it emerged in the sugar quotas affairs, can be expressed in the shared, neutral requirement that the EU legislative process must have regard to the exigencies of the domestic implementation of EU instruments.

2.10.2 As noted earlier, the exploration of common constitutional traditions could be impractical and unworkable, it could lead to a downscaling of the protection offered or it could entail technical difficulties in expressing the qualifications, reservations, exceptions, etc., that could be attached to common requirements. These problems apply mainly with regard to the judicial recognition of common constitutional traditions. Their expression in EU legislative or other processes may be less problematic, although examples show that finding common constitutional ground can delay the adoption of EU legislation considerably (e.g. Directive 98/44/EC on biotechnological inventions). The democratic and other credentials of a judicial exploration of common constitutional traditions may also be problematic, as it may contradict the different conceptions in the different Member States of the extent and of the role of judicial power, and also because the method and the execution of a comparative exercise leading to the establishment of common constitutional traditions – as discussed in the academic literature on the difficulties and distortions of such comparative exercises – are not foolproof.

Furthermore, unless it is carried out with the purpose of highlighting that in a particular Member State a particularly high standard of protection is applicable, urging EU Courts to develop their judgment on the basis of a genuine exploration of common constitutional traditions may not be particularly relevant. Arguably, it may be more important to direct EU Courts towards the right assessment and the right balancing of considerations relevant in the legal appreciation of the case than to develop a legal test or legal formula genuinely shared among the Member States, which could be deduced from EU or ECHR law. For example, in the classic judgment in Hauer,⁸⁵ a thorough comparative analysis regarding the constitutional protection of property rights would not have added much to the legal formula that was available through less complicated sources or to the final assessment of the interference with focus on its justifiability and on the availability of safeguards/compensation.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 There is very little evidence that the issue of the ECHR setting a minimum floor influences deliberations and decisions in the Hungarian courts. Borrowing from foreign jurisdictions and from ECHR law has always been standard practice in Hungarian constitutional law; therefore, the ECHR predominantly represents a standard to adhere to, and not a standard adherence that should be criticised.

In the Expert's view, Art. 53 of the Charter needs to be interpreted together with the actual provisions of EU law in relation to which the application of a right or freedom included in the Charter is raised. As demonstrated by Omega and Schmidberger,⁸⁶ the structure made available for the application of the fundamental freedoms of the Single Market enables – as reinforced by judicial deference to the national level by the EU Court – the application of higher national standards in a scenario in which the Charter is clearly applicable. Also, EU legislative instruments, such as Directive 98/44/EC on biotechnological inventions, through their clauses that allow for derogations from the main obligations in the protection of national constitutional values (e.g. human dignity), can ensure the enforcement of higher national standards under the scope of the Charter. Finally, there are EU measures in the case of which the standard of rights protection will depend on the conduct of national authorities in the implementation and enforcement of the measure in question.⁸⁷ In such instances, it is the responsibility of the national public authorities to provide at least the minimum protection demanded by EU law.

⁸⁵ Case 44/79 Hauer [1979] ECR 03727.

⁸⁶ Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609 and Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659.

⁸⁷ See, for example, Joined cases C-411/10 and C-493/10 N.S. [2011] ECR I-00865.

Therefore, the scenario envisaged by the question could only arise in circumstances where the structure developed for the application of EU law does not allow for the vindication – in one way or another – of domestic constitutional concerns. Arguably, Melloni represented such an occasion, as the preliminary reference by the Spanish Constitutional Court was returned with the EU Court refusing to give effect to higher national standards. That judgment, however, must be interpreted in light of the fact, also indicated by the EU Court, that the regulation of the EAW reflects a ‘consensus reached by all the Member States regarding the scope to be given under EU law to the procedural rights enjoyed by persons’.⁸⁸ This implies that in the EU Court’s interpretation, the Member States, in the interest of the effective operation of a system for administering cross-border justice based on mutual trust and recognition, have waived their entitlement to enforce their higher national constitutional standards.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1–2.12.3 These points are not relevant in the context of Hungary’s recent constitutional developments.

In the Expert’s view, when important constitutional issues have arisen and have been referred to the Constitutional Court at the stage of implementing EU law, the present system and the preliminary ruling procedure allow sufficient space for democratic deliberation at the EU level. In the Hungarian context, the problem is that the Constitutional Court has not clarified its position on the relationship between EU law and the constitutional protection that had been controversially developed in the previous jurisprudence. It also does not seek formal contact, in the form of requests for a preliminary ruling, with the CJEU; this would have been possible not only in the case of the retirement of judges but also in the review of the Hungarian regulation on the implementation of the EAW. In the latter case, it could have inquired about the harmony of the rules with the Charter, thus contributing to development of the protection of fundamental rights at EU level. The Constitutional Court also did not invoke the procedural bond between the ordinary courts and the CJEU, i.e. the procedure of a preliminary ruling with constitutional emphasis on the interpretation of the right to a legitimate judge to establish if EU legal conditions have been met.⁸⁹ According to the permanent jurisprudence of the German Federal Constitutional Court, the CJEU may also be a ‘legitimate judge’ by virtue of Sentence 2 of Art. 101(1) of the German Basic Law. Namely, if a German judge fails to request a preliminary ruling even though the relevant EU conditions are met, then reference may be made to the infringement of the right to a legitimate judge within a constitutional appeal procedure.⁹⁰ According to the Hungarian Constitutional Court, this is not a constitutional issue but a technical legal issue falling within the scope of the judge of the proceedings. Although the Constitutional Court does not refuse or endeavour to actively participate in the network of cooperative constitutionalism, it might nevertheless emphasise the importance of a Europe-friendly interpretation of the Fundamental Law in a political environment in which rejection of an otherwise constructive European criticism, questioning of the decisions of Strasbourg and Luxembourg and a generally anti-EU rhetoric are typical. It appears that the political circumstances do not favour an extensive and activist constitutional judicature.

⁸⁸ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107, para. 62.

⁸⁹ CC Order 3110/2014. (VI. 17.) AB; reinforced by CC Order 3165/2014. (VI. 23.) AB. The petitioners argued in both cases that the court had not fulfilled the request to initiate a preliminary ruling in the base case and Art. XXVIII(1) of the FL had therefore been infringed.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 The Expert has not found evidence of EU law – unquestionably, systematically or fundamentally – having affected the protection of constitutional rights or the rule of law in a negative manner.

When addressing the standard of the EU's performance, it must not be ignored that EU constitutional requirements have been developed for a collective of different states in an environment characterised by a high degree of diversity. Finding common ground in such circumstances entails finding what could be expressed as optimum requirements which go beyond the minimum but which may not reach the maximum expectations. A certain degree of levelling out is necessary to be able to provide workable constitutional rules for a polity such as the EU. As a result, it is arguable that the development of common requirements cannot exclude the lowering of standards as recognised in individual Member States. This circumstance is particularly important when claims concerning the negative impact of EU law on the protection of constitutional rights and rule of law requirements are considered.

2.13.2 As stated earlier, the levelling out of standards could be necessary for the legal order of a collective polity such as the EU to develop common standards of protection of constitutional rights. The Expert also believes that while the protection offered in individual instances could be open to criticism, it would be controversial to formulate general conclusions concerning the performance of EU law in this domain on this basis. The Expert is willing to accept the argument that any levelling out of standards in EU law has been necessary to establish a collective polity and a collective system for the enforcement of common rights and obligations.

⁹⁰ BVerfGE 73, 339, 366 ff.; 75, 223, 233 ff.; 82, 159, 192 ff.; 126, 286, 315 ff., latest in 2010: I BvR 1631/08 http://www.bundesverfassungsgericht.de/entscheidungen/rk20100830_1bvr163108.html.

Nevertheless, in frameworks establishing essentially horizontal systems of governance among the Member States, which aim to negotiate between the benefits of mutual trust/recognition and the fundamental rights implications of the regulated activity, because of the weaknesses of these governance structures, the guarantees offered by EU law may not be satisfying in all circumstances.

2.13.3 In the Expert's view, the responsiveness of the EU Court and also of national courts to national constitutional concerns depends primarily on the ethos of the different institutions, and also on individual factors, such as the preparedness, sensitivity, etc., of individual judges. Courts of law – national and international – seem quite satisfied to present themselves as special adjudicatory agencies with the task of resolving legal disputes and matters of legal interpretation in a continuously growing number of cases. They are keen to explore avenues to increase administrative efficiencies, and are likely to have an interest in getting involved in the cases before them only to the extent necessary. The prevailing institutional culture – e.g. decision by consensus, lack of dissenting or other opinions, etc. – may also dictate a reserved approach to matters of broader relevance. In their everyday operation as agencies, the understanding of matters of context, of local priorities, of the anticipation of individuals of their decisions, or of the potential and often controversial domestic implementation of their rulings could be limited. Unless the national constitutional concerns are adequately presented – by the referring national court which is assumed to be aware of them, or by the intervening governments – their relevance can be lost in such an institutional environment.

A strict reading of the jurisdiction of the EU Court – certainly before the Treaty changes commencing in the 1990s – could exclude any responsiveness from the EU Court towards national constitutional concerns. Its mandate covers interpreting and upholding the law developed in the collective enterprise among European states that is the EU polity. On the other hand, its institutional position and legitimacy as a transnational court, and its role in governing the participation of national administrative and judicial systems in the enforcement of EU law make it absolutely necessary to pay attention to concerns raised at the domestic level on constitutional grounds. The overall image of its jurisprudence indicates that national constitutional concerns – directly or indirectly – have been taken on board. This, however, does not mean that in individual, often very significant cases, the EU Court does not follow a strict reading of its mandate under the Treaties and sidelines the constitutional dilemmas raised by particular Member States. The attitude of the EU Court might, however, be changed by Art. 4(2) TEU on the protection of national (constitutional) identities, which has made the commitment of the Member States to conserve their positions in EU integration explicit. Nevertheless, it is still unclear how Art. 4(2) might influence the adjudication of Member State compliance before the EU Court, and whether the principle might represent a categorical departure from the EU as a collective enterprise and legitimate Member State particularism beyond the traditional constitutional remits.

The references for a preliminary ruling from the Hungarian courts have not raised national constitutional concerns in a manner that would have affected the EU Court's judgments.⁹¹

2.13.4 In the Expert's view, the possible institutional, procedural and substantive instruments are already available at the national level. Constitutions are rather explicit about the mandate of national constitutional organs, and also about the constitutional values and principles which should be safeguarded by them. National courts, although they are bound to apply EU law on the terms of the EU Court as it follows from national law, are not prevented from raising constitutional concerns regarding the application and interpretation of EU law in a particular case. National parliaments have been granted the right under national law to control their government's action in EU decision-making, in the course of which they are not prevented from raising their own constitutional concerns. Provided that national actors approach these matters with appropriate individual and institutional attitudes, it seems rather difficult, and perhaps unnecessary, to develop further instruments for safeguarding national constitutionalism at the national level. This may even be true for Member States which have experienced a recent regression in constitutionalism and constitutional protection. The Expert holds the view that if adjustments are indeed necessary at the national level, they must focus on attitudes, knowledge and understanding instead of rules and institutions.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 The conduct of international co-operation is governed by Art. Q(1) of the FL: 'In order to establish and maintain peace and security and to achieve the sustainable development of mankind, Hungary shall endeavour to co-operate with all peoples and countries of the world.' The provision is modelled on the text of Art. 6(2) of the 1989 Constitution,⁹² but unlike its immediate predecessor, it explicitly mentions two objectives of international co-operation: the establishment and maintenance of peace and security, and the achievement of the sustainable development of humanity. These objectives were most likely incorporated into the text for exemplificative purposes. This constitutional clause is supplemented by a declaration in the National Avowal of the FL, which expresses the intention of members of the ⁹¹ The reference in Case C-328/04 Vajnai [2005] ECR I-08577 would have raised significant issues of national constitutional law; however, the EU Court ruled – correctly – to decline its jurisdiction since the case fell outside the scope of EU law.

⁹² 'The Republic of Hungary shall endeavour to co-operate with all peoples and countries of the world.'

Hungarian nation to strive to co-operate with every nation of the world. Although the wording of the provisions concerned is extremely broad, a comprehensive interpretation reveals all the essential details of international co-operation, including the potential partners, the scope of discretion, the primary objectives and the relevant limitations.⁹³

The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, although it was ratified as early as 30 November 2001, has yet to be promulgated in Hungary. There was an unsuccessful attempt to promulgate the Rome Statute at the time of ratification, but the relevant bills were subsequently withdrawn. It has been assumed by members of the scholarly community that the long-awaited promulgation of the instrument would probably necessitate the amendment of the FL. The previously planned promulgation of the Rome Statute would also have required the amendment of the Constitution to permit the criminal prosecution of the President of the Republic by an international judicial organ. A new bill on the promulgation of the Rome Statute was submitted to the National Assembly in 2016, but at the time of writing, it has yet to be adopted.

The expression of consent by Hungary to be bound by an international treaty is governed by the FL and Act L of 2005 on the Procedure Relating to International Treaties (hereinafter APRIT). The authorisation to express consent to be bound is granted either by the National Assembly for treaties falling within its functions and powers,⁹⁴ or by the Government for all other treaties (Art. 1(2)(d) FL; Art. 7(1) APRIT). The authorisation itself is contained in the law promulgating the treaty (Art. 7 (2) and Art. 10(1)(a) APRIT). Following the adoption of the promulgating law, the minister of foreign affairs must immediately initiate the expression of consent to be bound by the President of the Republic, if the authorisation has been granted by the National Assembly, or if the treaty provides that the consent to be bound must be expressed by the head of state. The consent to be bound by the treaty is then expressed by the President of the Republic, and the related instrument is exchanged or deposited, or the required notification to the other party or parties is provided by the minister of foreign affairs (Art. 9(4)(a) FL; Art. 8(1)–(2) APRIT). The consent to be bound by all other international treaties is expressed, as appropriate, by the minister of foreign affairs, or if the treaty provides that the consent to be bound must be expressed by the head of government, by the Prime Minister. The exchange or deposit of the related instrument is likewise performed by the minister of foreign affairs (Art. 8(4) APRIT).

3.1.2 The constitutional provisions on treaty ratification and international co-operation were, without exception, introduced by the adoption of the FL, and were designed to replace the corresponding provisions of the 1989 Constitution. Nevertheless, there is a close textual resemblance between the old and new provisions, and the former apparently served as a model in the formulation of the latter.

⁹³ Sulyok 2013a, pp. 464–489.

⁹⁴ Treaties in the field of EU cooperation (pursuant to Art. E(2) of the FL); the subject matter of the treaty is already regulated by an Act of Parliament or pursuant to the FL, it shall be regulated in a cardinal or other Act of Parliament; the treaty influences other matter belonging to the competence of the Parliament on the basis of Art. 1(2) (a)–(c) and (e)–(k) of the FL.

In the preliminary stages of the making of the FL, selected state organs, representative bodies, social organisations and the scholarly community were requested to submit proposals regarding the future constitution. The few submissions that touched upon the provisions concerned include the detailed proposals presented by the Institute for Legal Studies of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences.⁹⁵ The actual impact of these proposals is largely unknown: some were manifestly disregarded; others may have been accepted.

3.1.3 In spite of occasional criticism by members of the scholarly community, amendment of the provisions concerned, to our knowledge, has not been seriously raised since the adoption of the FL. Previously, in the period between the political transition and the entry into force of the FL, the 1989 Constitution was amended, inter alia, upon Hungary's accession to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization⁹⁶ and to the European Union.⁹⁷ The unsuccessful attempt to promulgate the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, as has been mentioned, would also have required the amendment of the Constitution.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 The application and position of international treaties in the domestic legal system are governed by the FL and APRIT. The second sentence of Art. Q(3) of the FL provides that '[o]ther sources of international law shall become part of the Hungarian legal system by promulgation by law'. This provision can only be interpreted in the light of the first sentence of the same paragraph, which concerns the generally recognised rules of international law, including customary international law, the general principles of law and the peremptory norms of international law.⁹⁸ Hence the scope of the second sentence covers the other sources of international law: international treaties, binding decisions of international organisations, judicial decisions and unilateral acts of states.

International treaties become part of domestic law by promulgation by law. The detailed reasoning of Bill T/2627 on the FL of Hungary placed special emphasis on the requirement of promulgation: 'Accordingly, the Bill expresses that other rules of international law binding on Hungary, including above all international treaties, only become part of the Hungarian legal system and applicable in the procedure of ⁹⁵ Magyar Tudományos Akadémia Jogtudományi Intézete (2010), Javaslatok a Magyar Köztársaság Alkotmányának szabályozási koncepciójához [Proposals for the Regulatory Concept of the Constitution of the Republic of Hungary], pp. 16–21.

⁹⁶ Act XCI of 2000 on the Amendment of Act XX of 1949 on the Constitution of the Republic of Hungary. See also CC Decision 5/2001. (II. 28.) AB.

⁹⁷ See supra n. 11. See also CC Decision 30/1998. (VI. 25.) AB.

⁹⁸ 'Hungary accepts the generally recognised rules of international law.'

Hungarian law enforcement agencies by promulgation by law'.⁹⁹ Earlier, the Constitutional Court had also pronounced that ensuring harmony between international law and domestic law demands the promulgation of international treaties, including self-executing treaties, and the inadequate or incomplete promulgation of treaties does not meet the constitutional requirements.¹⁰⁰

The detailed rules of promulgation are laid down by APRIT. The Act, as amended in 2011 in the wake of the adoption of the FL, provides that treaties falling within the functions and powers of the National Assembly must be promulgated by a Parliamentary Act; other treaties must be promulgated by Government decree.

Similarly to the 1989 Constitution,¹⁰¹ Art. Q(2)–(3) of the FL do not determine the position of promulgated international treaties in the domestic hierarchy of sources of law. Their position may nevertheless be explored by recourse to a range of related provisions. The provisions of the FL on the competences of the Constitutional Court and the provisions of Act CLI of 2011 on the Constitutional Court relating to procedures that may promote harmony between international law and domestic law, contain particularly useful guidelines.¹⁰² The same holds true for the case law of the Constitutional Court. These guidelines indicate that the position of international treaties in the domestic hierarchy formally corresponds to the level of the promulgating law. However, promulgated international treaties function differently than, and have precedence over, ordinary sources of domestic law. This precedence is largely based on procedural factors.

The requirement of faithful observance of international treaties, in addition to the relevant rules in international law, may be derived from several interrelated constitutional provisions. These provisions include Art. B(1) and Art. Q(2)–(3) of the FL on the constitutional principle of the rule of law,¹⁰³ on ensuring harmony between international law and domestic law,¹⁰⁴ and the domestic incorporation of norms of international law, respectively. The Constitutional Court has also pronounced that ⁹⁹ Bill T/2627 on the Fundamental Law of Hungary, Detailed reasoning to Art. P, 38.

¹⁰⁰ CC Decisions 30/1998. (VI. 25.) AB; 54/2004. (XII. 13.) AB; 7/2005. (III. 31.) AB; 30/2005. (VII. 14.) AB.

¹⁰¹ 'The legal system of the Republic of Hungary accepts the generally recognized rules of international law, and shall ensure harmony between obligations assumed under international law and domestic law.' 1989 Constitution, Art. 7(1).

¹⁰² FL Art. 24(2)–(3); Act CLI of 2011 on the Constitutional Court (hereinafter ACC), Art. 23–25, 32, 37–38, 40–42, and 46. The provisions of the FL prohibiting conflicts between various sources of law also offer guidance. FL Art. T(3), Art. 15(4), 18(3) 23(4) 32(3), 41(5).

¹⁰³ 'Hungary is an independent, democratic rule-of-law State.' FL Art. B(1).

¹⁰⁴ 'In order to fulfil its obligations under international law, Hungary shall ensure harmony between international law and Hungarian law.' FL Art. Q(2). The Venice Commission welcomed the incorporation of the provision into the Fundamental Law. European Commission for Democracy through Law, Opinion on the New Constitution of Hungary, CDL-AD(2011)016, 10, para. 42.

[t]he implementation of an international commitment ... is a duty originating from [the constitutional provision] containing the rule of law, including the fulfilment in good faith of obligations under international law, as well as from [the constitutional provision] demanding the harmony of international law and domestic law that exists from the moment from which the international treaty binds (in the sense of international law) Hungary. ... Those obliged by international treaties are, as a general rule, the states parties to the treaty.¹⁰⁵ It is the duty of these states to ensure the implementation of the treaty.¹⁰⁵

3.2.2 The relationship of international law and domestic law traditionally ranks among the most problematic issues of Hungarian constitutionalism. The first constitutional clause to explicitly regulate the matter, Art. 7(1) of the 1989 Constitution, received a tremendous amount of criticism for its infamously imprecise and vague wording which left room for conflicting interpretations. The Constitutional Court ultimately pronounced that the provision established a dualist system,¹⁰⁶ but even this authoritative interpretation could not put an end to the debate. Following several failed initiatives, the drafting of the FL offered an opportunity to remedy the theoretical and practical shortcomings by introducing a progressive new provision. However, Art. Q(2)-(3) of the FL were formulated on the model of their predecessor, the text of which seems to have been simply rearranged, partly rephrased and modestly supplemented. Due to the close resemblance of the two provisions, the early commentators of the new regulation mostly observed that essentially nothing had changed.¹⁰⁷ The FL is authoritatively interpreted so as to maintain the dualist tradition, wherein the generally recognised rules of international law and other sources of international law become part of domestic law by general transformation and by special transformation, respectively. The possibility of conflicting interpretations nevertheless remains.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 Parliamentary involvement in the initial negotiation of international treaties is rather limited in Hungary. The FL at present does not contain detailed provisions on the early phases of treaty-making, leaving the regulation of the process to Act L of 2005 on the Procedure Relating to International Treaties (APRIT). This Act assigns the relevant functions and powers to the Government in order to reduce the workload of the National Assembly.¹⁰⁸ Hence the conclusion of international treaties is initiated and arranged by the competent minister, with the consent of the minister of foreign affairs, and in observance of the foreign policy principles laid ¹⁰⁵ CC Decision 7/2005. (III. 31.) AB. (Inserts added).

¹⁰⁶ CC Decision 53/1993. (X. 13.) AB.

¹⁰⁷ E.g. Blutman 2014a, p. 30; Kovács 2011, pp. 75–76; Molnár 2013, p. 60; Sulyok 2013b, pp. 48–49.

¹⁰⁸ Molnár 2013, p. 117.

down by the National Assembly and by the Government (Art. 4(1) APRIT). The authorisation to adopt the text of the treaty and to designate the person representing the state in the process is granted by the Government, or in exceptional cases, between two sessions of the Government, by the Prime Minister. The granting of authorisation is initiated by the minister who has proposed the conclusion of the treaty, with the consent of the ministers of foreign affairs and justice (Art. 5(2) APRIT). If the treaty falls within the functions and powers of the National Assembly, the resolution authorising the adoption of the text of the treaty and the available text of the treaty must be forwarded to the competent parliamentary committee (Art. 5(3) and 7(1) APRIT). The National Assembly is certainly not precluded from expressing its political opinion on a treaty, and may even request or endorse the Government in a resolution to adopt the text of a treaty.¹⁰⁹ The National Assembly, therefore, may discuss various issues related to international treaties. Parliamentary discussion is most likely to take place upon the granting of authorisation to express consent to be bound by/promulgation of a treaty, or at any later stage following the promulgation.

3.3.2 Similarly to Art. 28C(5)(b) of the 1989 Constitution, Art. 8(3)d) of the FL explicitly prohibits the holding of a national referendum on ‘an obligation arising from an international treaty’.¹¹⁰ This provision only applies to existing international treaty obligations and does not prohibit the holding of referendums before the assumption of such obligations. These referendums may pursue several interrelated objectives, such as to consult the public in the preliminary stages of decision-making or to enhance the legitimacy of outstandingly important foreign-policy decisions. National referendums were indeed held prior to Hungary’s accession to NATO on 16 November 1997 and to the European Union on 12 April 2003. Both referendums were valid and conclusive. The Constitutional Court later pronounced that the holding of a referendum on the accession to NATO did not entail that a similar referendum could also be held on the question of withdrawal.¹¹¹ More recently, two politicians of the opposition initiated a national referendum on the planned expansion of the Paks Nuclear Power Plant, the only nuclear power station in Hungary, but the initiative was rejected by the National Election Commission on 17 February 2014.¹¹² The Commission pointed out that the initiative was incompatible with the constitutional prohibition concerned, as it would have affected existing international obligations arising from the Convention between the Government of Hungary and the Government of the Russian Federation on the Conduct of Co-operation in the Field of Peaceful Use of Nuclear Energy.

¹⁰⁹ Ibid., pp. 117–118.

¹¹⁰ See also Act CCXXXVIII of 2013 on the Initiation of a Referendum, the European Citizens’ Initiative, and the Referendum Procedure. For more details, see Csatlós 2014, pp. 337–346.

¹¹¹ CC Decision 35/2007. (VI. 6.) AB.

¹¹² National Election Commission Decision 91/2014. The decision was upheld by Curia Order Knk.IV.37.178/2014/3, and the subsequent constitutional complaint was rejected by Constitutional Court Order IV/938/2014.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 National courts are not in a position to perform a review of promulgated international treaties or binding decisions of international organisations; they are only expected to apply them appropriately.¹¹³ Recent investigations have nevertheless exposed considerable reluctance on the part of the judiciary to invoke international law, particularly when ordinary domestic provisions are equally sufficient to decide a given case.¹¹⁴ Domestic judges are further expected to turn to the Constitutional Court upon encountering conflicts between international law and domestic law. The Constitutional Court has several procedures in its inventory in which international treaties may be subjected to scrutiny. (The provisions of Act CLI of 2011 on the Constitutional Court do not explicitly mention the binding decisions of international organisations.) These procedures include the ex ante review of conformity with the FL (preliminary norm control),¹¹⁵ the ex post review of conformity with the FL (posterior norm control but of the domestic promulgating law rather than of the treaty),¹¹⁶ the judicial initiative for norm control in concrete cases¹¹⁷ and the examination of conflicts with international treaties.¹¹⁸

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 As noted earlier, over the summer of 2014 the Hungarian Constitutional Court made an attempt to develop the bases of a new economic constitution under the FL, which would reinstate the roles and the power of the Hungarian state as stabiliser, regulator and provider. The relevant decisions either build on a fervent criticism of economic regionalisation and globalisation, or they rely on the social provisions of the FL and the resulting social obligations of state actors.¹¹⁹ As criticised earlier, these observations are often rushed and wrong, and they never surpass the crude level of detail of simple declarations. More importantly, they do not seem to have affected the actual scrutiny of the Constitutional Court beyond accepting the discretion of the Government and rolling back the usual standards of constitutional ¹¹³ E.g. Blutman 2014b, pp. 167–179; Chronowski and Csatlós 2013, pp. 7–28.

¹¹⁴ E.g. Chronowski et al. 2011, p. 278.

¹¹⁵ ACC Art. 40(3).

¹¹⁶ FL Art. 24(2)e); ACC Art. 24(1).

¹¹⁷ FL Art. 24(2)b); ACC Art. 25(1).

¹¹⁸ FL Art. 24(2)f); ACC Art. 32.

¹¹⁹ See also CC Decision 3062/2012 (VII. 26.) AB on price regulation in the district heat market, where the Constitutional Court accepted that, inter alia, the impact of the global financial and economic crisis necessitated the local reregulation of the public and private law framework available for determining prices in the sector, despite legitimate expectations for the previous framework to remain in place.

control of Governmental economic governance. The Constitutional Court seems to be prepared to support the Government's efforts by failing to question the legitimacy and validity of the purpose of Government action, and by refusing to investigate the suitability and the necessity of the relevant measures. The Constitutional Court is satisfied with a rather relaxed circumregulation of the discretion made available to the responsible bodies under the measures in question, it raises no issue with the rather low standards of legal safeguards and remedies, and it is rather untroubled by the actual impact on individuals of the measures in question and by the potential for the application of the measures in question to lead to further violation of constitutional guarantees. Overall, the new economic constitutionalism in Hungary emerging in the wake of the crisis is less concerned with transparency, classical state roles in capitalist markets, and with issues of solidarity and social protection than with assisting the restructuring of the market in Hungary following undisclosed (or rather well-known but not openly advertised) economic policy priorities. Having regard to the apparent exclusionist, protectionist and possibly chauvinist economic policies of the Government, the anti-globalisation and anti-regionalisation agenda of the Constitutional Court seems to support a very particular transformation of the economy and society in the final years of the decade after the crisis.

Hungarian economic and social policies¹²⁰ and the erosion of the constitutional environment available to keep Government policies under control in light of social protection or other policies indicates that the states are equally responsible for the demise of the social dimension of constitutions. Following Bartolini, it may not seem controversial to suggest that the threat of globalisation and regionalisation on local social regulation and on local systems of social protection has resulted from conscious decisions by local political elites to transfer sensitive decisions of economic and social policy to the transnational level in order to avoid the confines of national constitutions and the control of national parliaments and courts.¹²¹ Furthermore, while pressures for deregulation, privatisation and liberalisation may come top-down from the global and/or regional level, states – the economies of which seem to benefit from these changes – are not prevented from compensating for any negative impacts of these transformations. Often, in structures of social governance favouring subsidiarity, they are even urged to make autonomous choices as to the compensatory measures or regarding the suitable extent and intensity of these changes in the particular domestic environment. The responsibility for failing to exploit these opportunities to level out the negative social effects of economic policies must be borne by states and their governments.

The Expert, therefore, would be very reluctant to argue that the social welfare dimension of constitutions is threatened only by global and regional governance, and that attempts by states to safeguard their social constitutions are thwarted by the binding rules of global and regional economic regulation. States can pursue economic, social, fiscal, etc., policies which are known to compromise social protection and social regulation.

¹²⁰ E.g. a flat income tax rate, tax benefits to high earners, the increase of VAT, the deregulation of employment law, the reduction of social benefits, an export driven exchange rate for the domestic currency, financing public debt through high premium sovereign bonds, etc.

¹²¹ Bartolini 2005, p. 405.

3.5.2 Hungary participated in a post-crisis bailout programme administered jointly by the World Bank, the IMF and the EU¹²² including an IMF Stand-by Arrangement,¹²³ but with the change of Government in 2010, this participation was reconsidered. It is suspected that the Government insisted on excluding these international partners because it aimed to regain control over matters of domestic economic policy in order to bring about the restructuring of markets and the rechannelling of market based income without being confined by demands of transparency, accountability, sustainability and balanced rationality. It is likely that the fairly obvious plans of the Government for the Hungarian public and private economy would have been thwarted if they had been carried out under the close supervision of an international agency.

References

- Albi A. (2009) Ironies in Human Rights Protection in the EU: Pre-Accession Conditionality and Post-Accession Conundrums. ELJ 15:46–69.
- Arato A., Halmai G., Kis J. (eds.) (2011) Opinion on the Fundamental Law of Hungary. <http://lapa.princeton.edu/hosteddocs/amicus-to-vc-english-final.pdf>.
- Bárd, P. (2013) The Hungarian Fundamental Law and Related Constitutional Changes 2010–2013. Revue des Affaires Européennes: Law and European Affairs 20:457–472.
- Bartolini S. (2005) Restructuring Europe. Centre Formation, System Building, and Political Structuring between the Nation State and the European Union. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Blutman L. (2014a) A nemzetközi jogi klauzula az Alaptörvényben (The clause on international law in the Fundamental Law). In: Blutman L., Csatlós E., Schiffner I. (eds.) A nemzetközi jog hatása a magyar joggyakorlatra (The effect of international law on Hungarian legal practice). HVG-ORAC, Budapest, pp. 29–36.
- Blutman L. (2014b) A nemzetközi jog érvényesülése a magyar belső jogban: joghatások (The enforcement of international law in Hungarian domestic law: legal effects). In: Blutman L., Csatlós E., Schiffner I. (eds.) A nemzetközi jog hatása a magyar joggyakorlatra (The effect of international law on Hungarian legal practice). HVG-ORAC, Budapest, pp. 119–180.
- Blutman L., Chronowski N. (2011) Hungarian Constitutional Court: Keeping Aloof from European Union Law. ICL Journal 5:329–348.
- Bragyova A. (2012) No New(s), Good News? The Fundamental Law and the European law. In: Tóth G.A. (ed.) Constitution for a disunited nation. CEU Press, Budapest-New York, pp. 335–358.

¹²² <http://www.imf.org/external/pubs/ft/survey/so/2008/car102808b.htm>.

¹²³ <http://www.imf.org/external/np/sec/pr/2008/pr08275.htm>.

- Chronowski N. (2005) Integrálódó alkotmányjog (Constitutional law under integration). Dialóg-Campus, Budapest-Pécs.
- Chronowski N. (2012) The New Hungarian Fundamental Law in the Light of the European Union's Normative Values. Revue Est Europa 2:111–142.
- Chronowski N., Csatlós E. (2013) Judicial Dialogue or National Monologue? The International Law and Hungarian Courts. ELTE Law Journal 1:7–28.
- Chronowski N., Drinóczi T., Ernszt I. (2011) Hungary. In: Shelton D. (ed.) International Law and Domestic Legal Systems: Incorporation, Transformation, and Persuasion. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 259–287.
- Csatlós E. (2014) Alkotmánybírósági határozatok: ahol a nemzetközi jog mérce vagy felülvizsgált norma (Constitutional court decisions: where international law is a standard or a reviewed norm). In: Blutman L., Csatlós E., Schiffner I. (eds.) A nemzetközi jog hatása a magyar joggyakorlatra (The effect of international law on Hungarian legal practice). HVG-ORAC, Budapest, pp. 337–386.
- Dezső M., Vincze A. (2012) Magyar alkotmányosság az európai integrációban (Hungarian constitutionality in the European integration), 2nd edn. HVG-ORAC, Budapest.
- Fazekas F. (2014) EU Law and the Hungarian Constitutional Court. In: Varju M., Várnay E. (eds.) The Law of the European Union in Hungary. HVG-ORAC, Budapest, pp. 32–76.
- Halmai G., Scheppelle K.L. (eds.) (2012) Amicus Brief for the Venice Commission on the Transitional Provisions of the Fundamental Law and the Key Cardinal Laws. http://halmaigabor.hu/dok/426_Amicus_Cardinal_Laws_final.pdf.
- Jakab A. (2011) Az új Alaptörvény keletkezése és gyakorlati következményei (Formation of the new basic law and its practical implications). HVG-ORAC, Budapest.
- Karsai K., Ligeti K. (2008) Magyar alkotmányosság a bűntúgyi jogsegélyjog útvesztőiben (Hungarian constitutionalism in the labyrinth of legal assistance in criminal matters). Magyar Jog 55:399–408.
- Kovács P. (2008) Az EUIN-megállapodás és az alkotmányosság (The EUIN convention and constitutionality). Magyar Jog 55:409–413.
- Kovács P. (2011) Nemzetközi közjog (Public international law), 2nd edn. Osiris, Budapest.
- Molnár T. (2013) A nemzetközi jogi eredetű normák beépülése a magyar jogrendszerbe (The incorporation of norms originating from international law into the Hungarian legal system). Dialóg Campus-Dóm, Budapest-Pécs.
- Sajó A. (2004) Learning Co-operative Constitutionalism the Hard Way: the Hungarian Constitutional Court Shying Away from EU Supremacy. Zeitschrift für Staats- und Europawissenschaften 3:351–371.
- Sonnevend P., Jakab A., Csink L. (2015) The Constitution as an Instrument of Everyday Party Politics: The Basic Law of Hungary. In: Bogdandy A. von, Sonnevend P. (eds.) Constitutional Crisis in the European Constitutional Area. C.H.BECK-Hart-Nomos, Oxford and Portland, pp. 33–109.
- Sulyok G. (2013a) A nemzetközi együttműködés alaptörvényi szabályozása (The regulation of international co-operation under the fundamental law). In: Szoboszlai-Kiss K., Deli G. (eds.) Tanulmányok a 70 éves Bihari Mihály tiszteletére (Studies in honour of Mihály Bihari at 70). Universitas-Győr, Győr, pp. 464–489.
- Sulyok G. (2013b) Incorporation of International Law into Domestic Law under the Fundamental Law of Hungary. In: Smuk P. (ed.) The Transformation of the Hungarian Legal System 2010–2013. CompLex Wolters Kluwer, Budapest, pp. 31–50.
- Szente Z. (2015) The Decline of Constitutional Review in Hungary – Towards a Partisan Constitutional Court? In: Szente Z., Mandák F., Fejes Z. (eds.) Challenges and Pitfalls in the Recent Hungarian Constitutional Development. L'Harmattan, Paris, pp. 185–210.
- Uitz R. (2006) EU Law and the Hungarian Constitutional Court: Lessons of the First Post-accession Encounter. In: Sadurski W. et al. (eds.) Après Enlargement. Legal and

- Political Responses in Central and Eastern Europe. European University Institute, Florence, pp. 41–63.
- Vincze A. (2013) Wrestling with Constitutionalism: the supermajority and the Hungarian Constitutional Court. ICL Journal 7:86–97.
- Vörös I. (2014) The constitutional landscape after the fourth and fifth amendments of Hungarian Fundamental Law. Acta Juridica Hungarica 55:1–20.
- Zeller J. (2013) Nichts ist so beständig... Die jüngsten Novellen des Grundgesetzes Ungarns im Kontext der Entscheidungen des Verfassungsgerichts. Osteuropa-Recht 59:307–325.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Part VII

Reforming the National Constitution in View of Global Governance

Constitutionalisation and Democratisation of Foreign Affairs: The Case of Switzerland

Raffaela Kunz and Anne Peters

Abstract The Swiss Constitution is unique in Europe in the way it organises international co-operation. Three features stand out: the very strong democratisation of foreign policy-making (through Parliament and through involvement of the people by virtue of referendums and popular initiatives), the relatively reluctant judicial review of measures based on international legal acts against the benchmark of fundamental rights, and, finally, the federal elements in conducting international relations. The Swiss case underscores both the desirability and the difficulties of compensatory constitutionalism as a normative programme. Switzerland, with its strong direct-democratic tradition, has started to react early to the impact of all types of global governance measures. However, major reforms, mainly with a view to strengthening the element of democratic control through domestic democratic institutions, have so far not succeeded in soothing popular aversion to 'foreign' and undemocratic international law and institutions. With regard to the second main element of contemporary constitutionalism, namely fundamental rights protection and judicial review, the reluctance of the Swiss Federal Tribunal to assume a role in Raffaela Kunz is Senior Research Fellow at the Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law, Heidelberg (Germany), and holds a Ph.D. from the University of Basel (Switzerland). e-mail: kunz@mpil.de.

Anne Peters is Director at the Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law, Heidelberg (Germany), and a professor at the universities of Heidelberg, Freie Universität Berlin and Basel (Switzerland), and William C. Cook Global Law professor at the University of Michigan. e-mail: apeters-office@mpil.de.

Text submitted 25 April 2015 and revised 30 March 2018. All websites accessed 27 March 2018.

R. Kunz (✉) · A. Peters

Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law, Heidelberg, Germany
e-mail: kunz@mpil.de

A. Peters
e-mail: apeters-office@mpil.de

R. Kunz · A. Peters
University of Basel, Basel, Switzerland

protecting constitutional (or European) fundamental rights when implementing international law has led to conflicts with the ECHR. It is likely that the ECtHR, in compelling Switzerland to exercise such review, might in the end work more in favour of compensatory constitutionalism through the pressure it creates.

Keywords The Constitution of Switzerland · The Swiss Federal Tribunal ECHR · Absence of constitutional review · Parliamentary participation in foreign policy · Direct democracy and international law · Democratic legitimacy Primacy of international law · Judicial review of targeted sanctions Compensatory constitutionalism · Conflict of law · Constitutional tolerance

1–2 An Overview of the Swiss Constitution

1.1 The Swiss Constitution and system of government are often portrayed as a ‘special case’. This has to do with several particular features. These include direct democratic rights of citizens’ participation, a strong federal element and a collective government composed of seven members vested with equal rights (directive system). Unlike in parliamentary or presidential systems, typical instruments of checks and balances between the Parliament and the Government, such as a motion of censure or the possibility to veto legislative acts, do not exist. Conversely, the people have a say on many important matters, through referendums and popular initiatives.

The Constitution of the Swiss Confederation¹ belongs to the category of ‘rigid’ constitutions, amendable only by a qualified procedure: any modification of the Constitution is mandatorily put to a vote by the people and the Cantons (i.e. the member states of the Swiss Confederation; Art. 140(1)(a) of the Constitution, as will be further explored in Sect. 3.1).² Nonetheless, in practice the Swiss Constitution has proven to be of a rather dynamic nature and has often been amended.

The constitutional cornerstones are democracy, the rule of law, solidarity and federalism.³ The overarching objectives of the Constitution are first, the organisation of the state, secondly the protection of individuals’ constitutional rights and liberties, the rule of law and the separation of powers with due checks and balances,

¹ Bundesverfassung der Schweizerischen Eidgenossenschaft of 18 April 1999 (SR 101). The official English translation is available at <https://www.admin.ch/opc/en/classified-compilation/19995395/index.html>.

² The Constitution may be totally (Art. 193) or partially (Art. 194) revised at any time (Art. 192 (1)). There is no specific procedure for revising the Constitution; it generally follows the legislative process (Art. 192(2)).

³ Botschaft des Bundesrates über eine neue Bundesverfassung of 20 November 1996, BBl 1997 1, pp. 14–17.

and thirdly the definition of the overall aims and directions of the state.⁴ The instrument of the popular initiative, which allows citizens to suggest new constitutional provisions that are not, however, limited to proposals of constitutional value, leads to the insertion of provisions that by their nature rather belong to the level of ordinary laws into the Constitution.⁵

There is no constitutional court designated as such in Switzerland, but the Federal Tribunal, which functionally is a supreme court with general jurisdiction, also exercises constitutional control. This control, however, has an important limit: the Federal Tribunal cannot review and quash federal acts (i.e. statutes). Art. 190 of the Constitution, which states that federal acts and international law are to be applied by the Federal Tribunal and the other judicial authorities, ‘immunises’ federal statutory law (but not cantonal law) from judicial review. Nonetheless, in practice, the Federal Tribunal at times scrutinises the constitutionality of federal acts, which is understood as an invitation to Parliament to take the necessary steps. The court interprets Art. 190 as a duty to apply federal acts, but not as a prohibition to examine their constitutionality. Because international law is mentioned together with federal acts in Art. 190, the Federal Tribunal, based on the principle of primacy of international law in the Swiss legal order, can refuse to apply federal acts that contradict international law. International law in practice thus compensates for the lack of a mechanism of constitutional review, which is in this sense introduced ‘through the backdoor’.

Overall, from a comparative perspective, the Swiss Constitution is not a particularly ‘sacred’ document. It contains more than just important and general provisions, and includes neither a separate constitutional court to uphold constitutionality nor specific principles for constitutional interpretation (as opposed to the interpretation of laws).⁶

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1–2.1.3 The first, relatively comprehensive, chapter of the second title of the Constitution (Arts. 7–36) is dedicated to fundamental rights and is clearly influenced by the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).⁷ The Constitution contains a general provision on the restriction of fundamental rights. Any restriction requires a legal basis, must be justified by the public interest or the protection of the fundamental rights of others, and must be proportionate. The essence of a fundamental right may never be impaired (Art. 36(1)–(4)).

⁴ Biagianni 2007, pp. 49–50.

⁵ Hangartner 2000, para. 816. Examples include Art. 73(3), prohibiting the construction of minarets, and Art. 75b on second domiciles.

⁶ BGE 116 Ia 359 (1990), E. 5.; more recently 131 II 13 (2004), E. 7.1.

⁷ European Convention on Human Rights of 4 November 1950 (213 UNTS 221); Keller 2011, para. 4.

Different aspects of the rule of law are enshrined in the Constitution in the form of constitutional principles which are generally only enforceable in courts in connection with a constitutional right (Art. 5).⁸ International law is explicitly mentioned as one element of the rule of law: Art. 5(4) provides that the Confederation and the Cantons ‘shall respect international law’.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 Ratification of treaties by Parliament and the Government The Swiss Constitution contains specific provisions on the ratification of treaties, but not on the transfer of powers to international organisations (IOs). The only provision dealing with IOs concerns the participation of citizens ('the people'): the accession to certain IOs is subject to a referendum, as will be discussed below.

Because Switzerland is a federal state, the ‘vertical’ separation of powers is important with regard to the conclusion of treaties. The overall responsibility in matters of foreign relations lies with the federal level (Art. 54(1) of the Constitution). However, the powers of the Cantons ‘shall be respected’ and their ‘interests protected’ (Art. 54(3)). The Cantons may, in matters lying within their powers, conclude treaties (Art. 56(1)); but due to the general federal powers, these cantonal powers are only subsidiary and may be superseded. By way of compensation, the Cantons participate in the conclusion of treaties (Art. 55).⁹

In terms of the ‘horizontal’ separation of powers, the Federal Council (hereinafter the Government) and the Federal Assembly (hereinafter Parliament) share the power to assume international legal obligations; they exercise their competences jointly.¹⁰ The Government holds the overall responsibility in foreign relations, subject to the participatory rights of Parliament (Art. 184(1)). Parliament ‘participates in shaping foreign policy and supervises the maintenance of foreign relations’ (Art. 166(1)). Accordingly, the Government is competent to sign and to express the will to be bound on the international plane in the sense of Art. 14 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties¹¹ (VCLT) (Art. 184(2)), but needs the approval

⁸ Botschaft BV, n. 3, p. 133; BGE 130 I 388 (2004), E. 4.

⁹ Peters 2016a, p. 198. Cantonal participation in foreign politics is further spelt out in a federal act; see Bundesgesetz über die Mitwirkung der Kantone an der Aussenpolitik des Bundes (BGMK) of 22 December 1999 (SR 138.1).

¹⁰ Botschaft BV, n. 3, pp. 392–393.

¹¹ VCLT of 23 May 1969 (1155 UNTS 331).

of Parliament (Art. 184(2) and Art. 166(2)). Additionally, the citizens and the Cantons are involved in the conclusion of certain treaties by way of referendum, as will be discussed below.

If a treaty is subject to a referendum, Parliament can include the domestic amendments necessary to implement the treaty already in its decision on approval of the treaty (Art. 141a of the Constitution, allowing for so-called ‘package votes’).

The Government may provisionally apply a treaty before approval by Parliament ‘in urgent circumstances or when it is necessary to safeguard important Swiss interests’ (Art. 7b(1) of the Government and Administration Organization Act).¹² In such case, it shall first consult the parliamentary committees for foreign affairs (Art. 152(3^{bis}) of the Parliament Act).¹³

The Constitution foresees exceptions to the requirement of parliamentary approval which permit the Government to conclude treaties independently from Parliament in certain cases (Art. 166(2)); this is known as the ‘simplified procedure’. These powers are substantiated in the Government Act: a delegation norm in a federal act or treaty approved by Parliament is required, and the treaties may only be of limited scope (Art. 7a(1)–(2)). Moreover, the Government has to provide Parliament with an annual report on treaties entered into under the simplified procedure (Art. 48a(2) of the Government Act). Based on this report, Parliament can request the ex post submission of a treaty for approval.¹⁴

Popular rights in connection with the conclusion of treaties Importantly in the case of Switzerland, certain treaties are subject to a referendum. This instrument allows for popular participation in the form of a veto right (control function), and thus ensures legitimacy through the mere possibility of popular involvement. Due to structural differences between law-making on the national and international planes, however, the referendum encounters particular challenges when applied to the international context. On the national level, the use of this instrument may lead to a dialogue between the different actors involved and contribute to a more acceptable and balanced solution. On the international level, however, when a treaty is rejected by one side, new negotiations might be precluded. The referendum thus bears the risk of impairing Switzerland as an actor on the international plane, and was disputed for that reason, as will be discussed below. At the same time, due to the special nature of law-making on the international level (negotiations, package deals, the important role of the executive branch), the main function of the referendum – the involvement of the people in decision-making – arguably cannot be fulfilled for questions related to foreign policy. For this reason, so the argument runs, popular rights are increasingly being ‘eroded’ in the course of the growing importance of international regulation.¹⁵ An example is the political decision of the Government and Parliament to continue the agreement between Switzerland and the EU on the free movement of persons and at the same time to extend it to Bulgaria and Romania. These two questions were jointly submitted to a referendum, so that the people could only accept or reject them together.¹⁶

¹² Regierungs- und Verwaltungsorganisationsgesetz (RVOG) of 21 March 1997 (SR 172.010); hereinafter ‘Government Act’.

¹³ Bundesgesetz über die Bundesversammlung (Parlamentsgesetz, ParlG) of 13 December 2002 (SR 171.10); hereinafter ‘Parliament Act’.

¹⁴ Bericht der Staatspolitischen Kommission des Nationalrates, ‘Parlamentarische Initiative Geschäftsverkehrsgesetz. Anpassungen an die neue BV’ of 7 May 1999, BBI 1999 4809, p. 4830; for the latest report, see Bericht über die im Jahr 2016 abgeschlossenen völkerrechtlichen Verträge of 24 May 2017, BBI 2017 4573.

There are three types of referendums:

- mandatory treaty referendums;
- optional treaty referendums; and
- unwritten, extraordinary treaty referendums.

It is mandatory to hold a referendum for Switzerland’s accession to ‘organizations for collective security or to supranational communities’ (Art. 140(1)(b) of the Constitution). Such decisions must be put to a vote of the people and the Cantons. A referendum vote is passed if a majority of the citizens and a majority of the Cantons approve the proposal (Art. 142(2)), with the position of each Canton determined by its internal majority. Mandatory referendums thus create a twofold legitimacy, consisting of a democratic and a federal element. Their rationale is the legitimisation of the areas of foreign relations that are considered to be the most important and far-reaching.¹⁷ So far, the only actual vote conducted has concerned the Swiss accession to the UN in 1986, which was rejected by a clear majority of 75.7% of the people and by all of the Cantons. UN accession took place only in 2002 following a popular initiative under Art. 140 of the Constitution.

The involvement of the people is optional for certain treaties, and this is regulated in Art. 141 of the Constitution. An optional referendum means that a vote only takes place if it is actively requested by at least 50,000 citizens within 100 days of the official publication of the underlying act. Then, only a majority of the people (and not the Cantons as well) have to accept the treaty in a vote.

Three types of treaties fall in the scope of an optional referendum: (a) treaties of ‘unlimited duration and that may not be terminated’ (which do not contain a withdrawal clause); and (b) treaties that foresee the ‘accession to an international organization’, the primary criterion thus being the duration of an international obligation; and since a reform in 2003 also (c) treaties which contain ‘important legislative provisions’ or whose ‘implementation requires the enactment of federal legislation’.

¹⁵ For a detailed overview, see Diggelmann 2005, pp. 35–61; see also Linder 2012, p. 324. On current challenges for direct democracy generally, see Auer 2013.

¹⁶ Accepted by popular vote on 8 February 2008.

¹⁷ Botschaft des Bundesrates über die Neuordnung des Staatsvertragsreferendums of 23 October 1974, BBI 1974 1133, p. 1156.

In practice, optional referendums have rarely been called for, and never has a treaty been rejected in a vote sought bottom-up by the citizens. This suggests that Switzerland is not overly handicapped by this instrument when acting on the international plane. Since its introduction in its current form in 1977,¹⁸ 28 treaties of unlimited duration, including e.g. the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) of 16 December 1966, have been in the scope of the first alternative of the optional referendum, but the necessary threshold of 50,000 signatures has never been reached so as to request that a vote actually take place.¹⁹ Thirty-eight treaties have fallen under the second alternative in Art. 141(1)(d) (accession to an IO) since 1977, including the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (2001) and the agreement establishing the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development (1990). A referendum vote has been held only once, in 1992, concerning accession to the institutions of Bretton Wood, which was approved.

Since the introduction of the option to hold a referendum on treaties containing important legislative provisions (141(1)(d)(3)) in 2003, 182 treaties have been declared by Parliament to fall under this form of referendum (as of July 2014), as compared to only 37 treaty-related referendums in all of the preceding years together. A referendum has, however, been requested by the citizens only eight times since 2003 and only once previously (in 2000 with regard to the bilateral treaties between Switzerland and the European Community); the necessary number of signatures was attained five times, including for the single referendum before the 2003 reform. All of the referendums have concerned bilateral treaties with the EU, and in all five cases, the citizens approved the treaties in the referendum vote.²⁰

The third type of referendum is possible under a somewhat disputed unwritten rule ('extraordinary referendum'): Parliament may submit further treaties to a popular vote. Such referendum would be 'mandatory' in the sense that no signatures would need to be collected by citizens to request it. It is thus ordered top down. This last happened in 1992 regarding the Swiss accession to the European Economic Area, which was rejected.

Values in, and limits to, international co-operation The provisions on the conclusion of treaties do not contain explicit references to objectives sought or values to be upheld in international co-operation. Neither are there provisions with regard to specific international organisations. Nevertheless, the state bodies entering into international obligations can only act within the limits of the law (the principle of legality, Art. 5(1)) and within the framework of the Constitution. They therefore ¹⁸ On the legal history of the treaty referendum, see Sect. 3.1.2.

¹⁹ For statistics on the use of popular rights in Switzerland, see c2d.ch. Data on the use of popular rights is available under <https://www.bk.admin.ch/bk/de/home/politische-rechte/gebrauch-der-volksrechte.html>. See further the study on the use of the referendum by Kübler et al. 2012, pp. 6–10.

²⁰ The votes were held in May 2009, February 2009, September 2005, June 2005 and May 2000.

have to respect the formal requirements (procedure, form, etc.) as well as substantive standards set out by the Constitution. The latter include respect of the general aims of the Swiss Confederation, as spelt out in Art. 2 of the Constitution,²¹ as well as fundamental rights. The state institutions also have to respect the objectives of foreign policy, which are as follows (Art. 54(2)):

The Confederation shall ensure that the independence of Switzerland and its welfare is safeguarded; it shall in particular assist in the alleviation of need and poverty in the world and promote respect for human rights and democracy, the peaceful coexistence of peoples as well as the conservation of natural resources.

For treaties concluded by the Cantons, explicit limitations exist: they ‘must not conflict with the law or the interests of the Confederation, or with the law of any other Cantons’ (Art. 56(2)).

A so-called ‘eternity clause’ does not exist, and in principle, any provision of the Constitution could be amended, although some authors have argued that certain constitutional core values like democracy and federalism should be resistant to amendments.²² Except with regard to these values, the Constitution could thus be modified in order to allow the conclusion of treaties that would otherwise contradict the Constitution (on the limits for the revision of the Constitution, see below Sect. 3.2.1).

3.1.2 In order to adapt to new realities and to the growing importance of international law, the Swiss Constitution has undergone major amendments concerning three areas since the 1990s. The first set of amendments concerned parliamentary participation in foreign policy. Reforms were undertaken first in 1992, and again with the complete revision of the Constitution in 1999. Smaller adjustments have also been undertaken later at the level of ordinary legislation. The second set of amendments aimed at extending the possibility of popular participation with regard to treaties in order to bring direct democratic rights in line with the growing number of concluded treaties. An even further extension, proposed through a popular initiative, was rejected in 2012.²³ Thirdly, with the complete revision of the Constitution in 1999, two new provisions were inserted in order to strengthen the position of the Cantons regarding foreign policy in response to losses of cantonal autonomy due to the growing internationalisation (Arts. 55 and 56).

Parliamentary participation in foreign policy With the complete revision of the Constitution in 1999, the relationship between Parliament and the Government in the area of foreign policy was fundamentally redefined. According to Art. 166(1) of the Constitution, Parliament ‘shall participate in shaping foreign policy and shall supervise the maintenance of foreign relations’. While the former Constitution had already allowed for participation in foreign policy, the role of Parliament in this regard had been rather passive, limited to approving treaties; the executive branch had almost ‘monopolised’ the conduct of foreign relations.²⁴ During the GATT negotiations of the Uruguay Round (1986–1994), the power shift from Parliament to the Government resulting from the growing importance of international law-making was for the first time clearly perceived.²⁵ Soon after, Parliament undertook steps to strengthen its role in foreign policy.²⁶ Express mention was made of the changed circumstances: ‘The legislative function of Parliament underwent some major changes, leading to a loss of influence.’²⁷ According to one of the initiators, the growing importance of foreign policy, engendering an incremental overlap of internal and external affairs, required the adaptation of Parliament to the new realities.²⁸ Further driving factors were the accessions of Switzerland to the European Economic Area and to the European Union, which were under discussion in the 1980s and early 1990s.

²¹ These include, inter alia, the liberty and rights of the people, the independence and security of the country, common welfare, equality of opportunity among citizens and the preservation of natural resources. Neutrality is not an aim, but a means to reach independence and security.

²² See for references Ziegler and Odendahl 2014, para. 36.

²³ Popular initiative ‘Für die Stärkung der Volksrechte in der Aussenpolitik (Staatsverträge vors Volk!)’, rejected by popular vote on 17 June 2012.

In 1992, a new provision was inserted into the former Parliament Act²⁹ (Art. 47^{bis}a), strengthening the role of Parliament in the stage of treaty negotiations.³⁰ The second step followed at the occasion of the complete revision of the Constitution in 1999. The aim was to codify the achievements of the 1992 reform also on the constitutional level. The definition of the relationship between the executive and legislative branches in this area, however, led to major debate.³¹ The most far-reaching proposal was made by two parliamentary committees, and would have given Parliament the powers to ‘determine the fundamental aims in the area of ²⁴ Bericht der Kommission des Nationalrates zur Parlamentsreform of 16 May 1991, BBl 1991 617, p. 649, citing Aubert J.-F. (1967) Traité de droit constitutionnel Suisse, vol I. Dalloz, Paris, para. 188.

²⁵ Diggelmann 2005, p. 9; the 1991 report concerning the reform of the Parliament mentioned in n. 24 expressly refers to those negotiations (p. 649). Already in a 1978 report on the ‘future of Parliament’, a parliamentary committee had noted the growing importance of treaty law and had demanded a stronger involvement of Parliament during treaty negotiations. See Schlussbericht der Studienkommission der Eidgenössischen Räte, ‘Zukunft des Parlaments’ of 29 June 1978, BBl 1978 996, pp. 1018, 1097.

²⁶ Parliamentary initiatives Rhinow, Amtliches Bulletin der Bundesversammlung IV 1990, p. 653, and Petitpierre, Amtliches Bulletin der Bundesversammlung IV 1990, p. 1624; motion Portmann, Amtliches Bulletin der Bundesversammlung IV 1991, p. 1508.

²⁷ Bericht NR Parlamentsreform, n. 24, p. 650.

²⁸ R. Rhinow, explanation in an e-mail of 25 September 2014, on file with the authors, available upon request.

²⁹ Bundesgesetz über den Geschäftsverkehr der Bundesversammlung sowie über die Form, die Bekanntmachung und das Inkrafttreten ihrer Erlasse (Geschäftsverkehrsgesetz) of 23 March 1962 (SR 171.11) (abolished on 1 December 2007).

³⁰ Bericht NR Parlamentsreform, n. 24, pp. 649–650.

³¹ Ehrenzeller 2014, para. 4.

foreign policy and to participate in their design'.³² The authors argued that in the light of progressing internationalisation, a modification of the existing balance of power between the branches with regard to foreign policy was necessary, and proposed giving Parliament the lead in determining the basic guidelines.³³ They expressly referred to the recommendation of a scholar asking for the extended participation of Parliament with binding effect in the area of foreign policy.³⁴

This parliamentary proposal was successfully opposed by the Government, arguing that it would imply a paradigm shift, leaving only marginal and executory powers to the Government, and render the conduct of foreign affairs too inflexible.³⁵ Both chambers of Parliament in the end voted for the 1996 draft of the Government. A remnant of the discussion is reflected in Art. 184(1) of the Constitution, which expressly subjects the responsibility of the Government for foreign relations to the participatory rights of Parliament.³⁶

The new provision did not lead to fundamental changes, but established more clearly that the democratically elected Parliament shall play an important and active role in the area of foreign relations.³⁷ The new Constitution thus does not merely allow parliamentary participation, it rather commands it.³⁸ Indeed, it has been noted that parliamentary participation is no longer a right, but a duty.³⁹

More recently (2015), two provisions concerning the powers of the Government vis-à-vis Parliament with regard to treaties were revised: the provisions on the conclusion of treaties without the approval of Parliament ('simplified procedure', Art. 7a of the Government Act) and on the consultation of Parliament in the course of the provisional application of yet to be approved treaties (Art. 7b of the Government Act and Art. 152(3)^{bis} of the Parliament Act).⁴⁰

Two incidents involving the problematic exercise of governmental powers gave rise to these adjustments. First, a politically controversial agreement of 2001 between Switzerland and Germany on airport noise was applied provisionally by the Government, but later Parliament refused to give its consent to the treaty. In consequence, Switzerland could not ratify the treaty and had to re-enter into difficult negotiations. The incident revealed the risk that the provisional application of ³² Zusatzbericht der Staatspolitischen Kommissionen der eidgenössischen Räte zur Verfassungsreform of 6 March 1997, BBl 1997 245, p. 313.

³³ Ibid., p. 281.

³⁴ Ibid., p. 282, referring to Ehrenzeller 1993, pp. 570–571. Ehrenzeller had argued for a stronger parliamentary involvement on the basis of the 'old' Constitution.

³⁵ Stellungnahme des Bundesrates zum Zusatzbericht der Staatspolitischen Kommissionen der eidgenössischen Räte zur Verfassungsreform of 9 June 1997, BBl 1997 1484, pp. 1496–1497.

³⁶ Zellweger 2001, p. 262, fn. 32.

³⁷ Ehrenzeller 2014, para. 19 speaks of a 'shift of emphasis' (our translation).

³⁸ Ibid., para. 16.

³⁹ Diggelmann 2005, p. 173, fn. 50.

⁴⁰ AS 2015 969 (in force as of 1 May 2015). The reform goes back to two parliamentary motions: Nr. 10.3354 der Aussenpolitischen Kommission des Ständerates (APK-S) of 27 May 2010 and Nr. 10.3366 der Kommission für Wirtschaft und Abgaben des Nationalrates (WAK-N) of 2 June 2010.

treaties by the Government could leave Parliament with a fait accompli, given that non-approval would lead to legal uncertainty and damage the credibility of Switzerland as a treaty partner.⁴¹ As a consequence, in 2004 the powers of the Government to provisionally apply treaties were codified and more clearly defined.⁴²

A further adjustment took place in the aftermath of a dispute between the United States and Switzerland regarding the handing over of client data of the Swiss bank UBS (the ‘UBS case’). In 2009, the Federal Council signed an agreement to resolve the issue. It did so under the simplified procedure, i.e. without the involvement of Parliament. However, the Federal Administrative Tribunal subsequently prohibited the handing over of data based on the 2009 agreement.⁴³ This led the Government to conclude an adaptation protocol to the agreement. Despite the negative statements of Parliament, which had been consulted under Art. 152(3^{bis}) of the Parliament Act, the Government provisionally applied the politically disputed instrument, arguing that important interests of Switzerland were at stake in an emergency situation.⁴⁴ Ultimately, in 2010, Parliament approved the 2009 agreement adapted by the protocol without submitting it to a referendum.⁴⁵

In reaction to this incident, the powers of the Government were limited by law. First, the list of treaties that can be concluded without parliamentary approval was narrowed down further, and secondly, the possibilities to prevent the provisional application of treaties were strengthened by granting Parliament an actual veto right.

Regarding the first point, certain treaties are now explicitly excluded from the simplified procedure. These include, inter alia, those fulfilling the conditions of the optional treaty referendum (Art. 141(1)(d)) and those with considerable financial implications.⁴⁶ The aim of the reform was to circumscribe the powers of the Government more clearly without overly narrowing them, in order not to overload Parliament with questions of minor importance. Furthermore, and in line with the idea of bringing democratic oversight at the national and international levels in line (‘principle of parallelism’), which will be further discussed below, the aim was to

⁴¹ Bericht der Staatspolitischen Kommission des Ständerates, ‘Parlamentarische Initiative Vorläufige Anwendung von völkerrechtlichen Verträgen’ of 18 November 2003, BBI 2003 761, p. 764 and 769.

⁴² Botschaft zum Bundesgesetz über die Kompetenz zum Abschluss völkerrechtlicher Verträge von beschränkter Tragweite und über die vorläufige Anwendung völkerrechtlicher Verträge (Änderung RVOG) of 4 July 2012, BBI 2012 7465, pp. 7477–7478.

⁴³ Federal Administrative Tribunal, A. gegen Eidgenössische Steuerverwaltung, A-7789/2009, Decision of 21 January 2010.

⁴⁴ Botschaft zur Genehmigung des Abkommens zwischen der Schweiz und den Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika über ein Amtshilfegesuch betreffend UBS AG sowie des Änderungsprotokolls of 14 April 2010, BBI 2010 2965, pp. 2988–2989.

⁴⁵ Bundesbeschluss über die Genehmigung des Abkommens zwischen der Schweiz und den Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika über ein Amtshilfegesuch betreffend UBS AG sowie des Änderungsprotokolls of 17 June 2010, AS 2010 2907.

⁴⁶ See Botschaft Änderung RVOG, n. 42, p. 7481.

exclude the conclusion of treaties containing significant provisions without parliamentary involvement.⁴⁷

In the second amendment concerning the provisional application of treaties, the tension between the demand for more parliamentary involvement on the one hand and for safeguarding the necessary flexibility of the executive branch on the other hand was mirrored in the parliamentary debate. In the end, both chambers of Parliament agreed on a form of veto right for the parliamentary committees in charge of these questions.⁴⁸

Popular participation in the ratification of treaties Attempts to strengthen the participation of citizens in the making of international law started as early as 1921.⁴⁹ The constitutional clause of 1921 subjected treaties of ‘unlimited duration’ (not containing a withdrawal clause) or concluded for ‘more than 15 years’ to an optional referendum. Moreover, the Government and Parliament submitted certain treaties to referendum without any explicit constitutional basis, e.g. the accession to the League of Nations in 1920 (accepted) and a free trade agreement with the European Community in 1972 (accepted).

Relying on the duration of a treaty as the decisive factor, however, was soon considered to be unsatisfactory because this excluded the people from having a say on the majority of treaties, no matter how far-reaching and important they were, if they contained a withdrawal option. Neither the accession to UNESCO in 1946, to the OECD in 1948, to EFTA in 1960, to the Council of Europe in 1963 nor to the ECHR in 1974 fell within the scope of the referendum.⁵⁰ Only approximately five percent of all treaties were subject to the possibility of a referendum, and only on three occasions was a referendum actually requested by citizens.⁵¹

As a consequence, a major reform was undertaken in 1977, extending the possibility for citizens to request a referendum. Those new rules on the referendum essentially remained the same during the complete revision of the Constitution in 1999. The aim was to achieve more popular participation, enhancing democratic legitimacy in the area of foreign policy without overly restricting the executive branch.⁵²

A further extension followed in 2003. The reason was that many treaties, especially bilateral treaties, still did not fall within the scope of the referendum, which led to a gap between the national and the international level. In light of the growing number of treaties, this was considered problematic.⁵³ As a consequence, ⁴⁷ Ibid., pp. 7480–7481.

⁴⁸ The modified provisions entered into force on 1 May 2015.

⁴⁹ See Botschaft Staatsvertragsreferendum, n. 17, pp. 1135–1136; see also NZZ of 9 April 2013, Ein Lösegeld für den Gotthard.

⁵⁰ Lombardi and Thürer 2002, para. 4.

⁵¹ Botschaft Staatsvertragsreferendum, n. 17, p. 1140.

⁵² Ibid., p. 1153.

⁵³ Bericht der Staatspolitischen Kommission des Ständerates zur parlamentarischen Initiative ‘Zur Beseitigung von Mängeln der Volksrechte’ of 2 April 2001, BBI 2001 4803, p. 4825.

Parliament proposed to strengthen the role of citizens in the approval of treaties and to align the possibility of a veto by the citizens on the national and the international plane.⁵⁴ On the national level, all ‘important’ provisions that establish binding legal rules must be enacted in the form of a federal legislative act by Parliament, subject to an optional referendum (as opposed to ordinances which can also be adopted by the Government and which are not subject to a referendum). It was proposed that the same criterion should also be decisive for popular involvement regarding treaties – all important treaties should become subject to a referendum. It was argued that this ‘parallelism’ would furthermore reduce the risk of a referendum against subsequent domestic legislation implementing a treaty. Hence, the idea was to guarantee both popular participation and Switzerland’s credibility as a partner on the international plane.⁵⁵

The Government objected to the proposal, arguing that it would lead to a myriad of possible referendums and endanger Switzerland’s credibility as a treaty partner.⁵⁶ The wording finally adopted in 2003 nonetheless corresponds to the more extensive parliamentary proposal. As has been shown above (Sect. 3.1.2), the number of treaties that have since been open to popular participation has significantly increased without at the same time leading to a similar increase in requests for a treaty referendum. The fears of the Government have therefore not materialised in practice, and the reform can – in quantitative terms – be qualified as a success.⁵⁷

At the same time, the provision on ‘package votes’ (Art. 141a of the Constitution) was adopted. It allows Parliament to write down the text of the domestic amendments necessary to implement a treaty already in its decision on approval of the treaty. The aim is to avoid contradictory popular votes, a risk that has increased after the extension of the referendum.⁵⁸ This time, the Government got its way, relying successfully on the importance of such a provision for the enhanced credibility of Switzerland as a treaty partner, against the resistance of Parliament.⁵⁹

3.1.3 A number of studies have been conducted on the impact of the internationalisation of the law on the fundamental principles of the Constitution, especially with regard to democratic legitimisation in the area of foreign policy, the separation of powers between Parliament and the Government, and on the federal structure.⁶⁰

⁵⁴ Ibid., pp. 4804 and 4826.

⁵⁵ Ibid., p. 4825.

⁵⁶ Ibid., p. 4826.

⁵⁷ A 2012 study finds that the current system is coherent and balanced. See Ehrenzeller 2012, p. 50.

⁵⁸ Botschaft BV, n. 3, p. 443.

⁵⁹ Stellungnahme des Bundesrates zur parlamentarischen Initiative ‘Beseitigung von Mängeln der Volksrechte’ of 15 June 2001, BBl 2001 6080, p 6093; for the position of Parliament, see Bericht SPK-S, n. 53, p. 4827.

⁶⁰ Diggelmann 2005; Ziegler 2004; Baumann 2002; Cottier et al. 2001; Sturny 1998; Saladin 1995; Ehrenzeller 1993.

The Government also, in detailed reports, has addressed issues that have arisen due to the changed circumstances in foreign policy. Mention is to be made of the reports on the continued relevance of Swiss neutrality,⁶¹ on the relationship between national and international law⁶² and on the Swiss-EU relationship.⁶³ No major reforms are currently under discussion.⁶⁴

3.1.4 See Sect. 3.7.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 Switzerland has traditionally been a (moderate) monist state. The Constitution is silent on this matter; however, the Federal Tribunal's case law follows the monist scheme.⁶⁵ Consequently, provisions of international law form part of the Swiss legal order without any act of transformation. In addition, a treaty norm is considered to be self-executing (directly applicable by domestic authorities and courts) if it contains rights or duties of individuals, is phrased in an unconditional and concrete way, and is therefore suited to form the legal basis of, and be applied in, an individual case, i.e. it is not addressed to the legislative branch.⁶⁶ Within the domestic hierarchy of norms, the Constitution is the highest-ranking source of law, followed by federal acts and finally federal ordinances. Cantonal law is subordinate to all federal law (Art. 49(1)). With regard to treaties, no clear hierarchy exists. Several constitutional provisions make reference to international law and are relevant for the determination of its position in the internal legal order. Viewed together, they display a considerable openness towards international law.

First, the Constitution explicitly states that 'the Confederation and the Cantons shall respect international law' and names international law as one aspect of the rule of law (Art. 5(4)). Furthermore, ius cogens forms a material limit to partial or complete revision of the Constitution (Arts. 139(2), 193(4) and 194(2)). Finally, the ⁶¹ Bericht des Bundesrates zur Neutralität, Anhang zum Bericht über die Aussenpolitik der Schweiz in den 90er Jahren of 29 November 1993, BBI 1994 153.

⁶² Bericht des Bundesrates 'Das Verhältnis von Völkerrecht und Landesrecht' of 5 March 2010, BBI 2009 2263, complemented by the additional report Zusatzbericht des Bundesrats zu seinem Bericht vom 5. März 2010 über das Verhältnis von Völkerrecht und Landesrecht of 30 March 2011, BBI 2011 3613.

⁶³ Europabericht 2006 of 28 June 2006, BBI 2006 6815 and Bericht des Bundesrates über die Evaluation der schweizerischen Europapolitik of 17 September 2010, BBI 2010 7239.

⁶⁴ For a parliamentary initiative regarding the extension of parliamentary participation with regard to the OECD, see below, Sect. 3.3.1; for the discussion on the position of international law within the Swiss legal order and a shift to a dualist system, see below, Sect. 3.2.2.

⁶⁵ Since BGE 7 782 (1881).

⁶⁶ BGE 120 Ia (1994), E. 5b; for a recent example, see BGE 138 II 42 (2012), E. 3.1. See further Bericht Völkerrecht und Landesrecht, n. 62, p. 2303.

Federal Tribunal and other judicial authorities are bound to apply federal acts and international law (Art. 190).

Due to the lack of an absolute rule, many questions regarding the position of international law remain disputed, especially with regard to its position vis-à-vis the Constitution.⁶⁷ It is uncontroversial that ius cogens takes precedence over any conflicting Swiss law. Furthermore, international law has primacy over all cantonal law and over federal ordinances.⁶⁸ Concerning conflicts between treaty law and federal acts, the Federal Tribunal has developed a differentiated approach. The more recent jurisprudence suggests that the Federal Tribunal in principle proceeds from the primacy of international law over all domestic law, including the Constitution.⁶⁹

Conflicts between international law and federal acts Article 190 of the Constitution does not give an answer to the question of what happens in the event of a conflict between international law and federal (parliamentary) acts. It names both international law and federal acts as ‘decisive’ and thereby leaves the choice to the organs applying the law.⁷⁰ The Federal Tribunal takes the idea of the primacy of international law as a starting point, invoking Arts. 26 and 27 VCLT as well as Art. 5(4) of the Constitution.⁷¹ The lex posterior rule does not apply to the relationship between international and national law.⁷² However, an exception applies: if the federal legislator deliberately contradicts a treaty and thus accepts a conflict with an existing international provision, the newer legislation prevails (the so-called Schubert rule).⁷³ Later, the Federal Tribunal created a counter-exception: Schubert does not rule when international norms for the protection of human rights are at stake (the so-called PKK rule).⁷⁴ In 2007, the Federal Tribunal gave precedence to an agreement on the free movement of persons (with the EU) over a provision of a federal act explicitly adopted to implement that agreement.⁷⁵

Conflicts between international law and the Constitution There is also no clear rule for conflicts between international law and the Constitution. This constellation has become practically relevant in the last years due to a proliferation of popular initiatives that contradict international law and especially the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).⁷⁶ The most frequently used variant of this direct ⁶⁷ See for references Ziegler and Odendahl 2014, para. 55.

⁶⁸ Bericht Völkerrecht und Landesrecht, n. 62, p. 2306.

⁶⁹ BGE 139 I 16 (2012), E. 5.1; BGE 142 II 35 (2015), E. 3. See already 125 II 417 (1999), E. 4d; 135 II 243 (2009), E. 3.1; 138 II 524 (2012), E. 5.1.

⁷⁰ Bericht Völkerrecht und Landesrecht, n. 62, p. 2310.

⁷¹ See BGE 139 I 16 (2012), E. 5.1 and 138 II 524 (2012), E. 5.1; BGE 142 II 35 (2015), E.3.1.

⁷² BGE 122 II 485 (1996), E. 3a; repeated in 138 II 524 (2012), E. 5.1.

⁷³ BGE 99 Ib 39 (1973) (Schubert) E. 3-4; repeated in 139 I 16 (2012), E. 5.1.

⁷⁴ BGE 125 II 417 (1999) (PKK), E. 4d.

⁷⁵ BGE 133 V 367 (2007), E. 11.6; see also BGE 142 II 35 (2015), E.3.1.

⁷⁶ E.g. popular initiative on preventive detention (‘Verwahrungsinitiative’), accepted on 8 February 2004; on the ban of minarets (‘Minarettverbotsinitiative’), accepted on 29 November 2009; deportation initiative (‘Ausschaffungsinitiative’), accepted on 28 November 2010; initiative democratic instrument allows 100,000 signatories to submit a concrete proposal for a constitutional provision that is, if valid under the conditions provided for in the Constitution, voted upon and adopted in its exact wording (Art. 139 of the Constitution). The Constitution contains only few limitations to this instrument. Peremptory norms (ius cogens) build the only substantial limitation. Initiatives violating ius cogens norms must be declared invalid by Parliament and are not brought to vote (Art. 139(3)). The constitutional term ‘peremptory norms of international law’ is interpreted broadly and includes norms at the margins of the international concept, such as the non-derogable rights under the ECHR. It follows that initiatives that are not in conformity with international law, outside the nationally determined circle of peremptory norms, can become constitutional norms.

The implementation and application of such provisions has led to considerable difficulties, leaving the organs concerned and especially Parliament with the situation that either the Constitution or conflicting international obligations have to be disregarded. This Catch-22 has led to an extensive debate on possible limitations of direct democratic rights in the name of the rule of law.⁷⁷ However, attempts to tackle the problem have hitherto failed.⁷⁸ In 2012, confronted with a constitutional provision introduced through a popular initiative on expulsions that foresaw far-reaching restrictions of the fundamental rights of foreigners, the Federal Tribunal, by way of obiter dictum, pronounced itself on the matter and stated that international law and in this case especially the ECHR would prevail over the conflicting constitutional provision.⁷⁹ It reached this conclusion by applying Art. 190, which mentions only federal acts and international law as being ‘decisive’ for the authorities applying the law. The Tribunal concluded e contrario that the Constitution (not explicitly mentioned) must cede to international law. Importantly, the Tribunal did not apply the Schubert exception to this constellation, which would have allowed a deliberate popular initiative to supersede pre-existing international law. The consequence of this far-reaching decision is that conflicts between constitutional norms and international law are now in principle to be resolved in favour of international law, granting it a quasi-supra-constitutional status. This leads to a restriction of the instrument of the popular initiative ‘through the backdoor’.

This triggered a heated political debate. The populist party, author of the successful popular initiatives of the last years, launched a new initiative, which aimed against mass immigration (‘Masseneinwanderungsinitiative’), accepted on 9 February 2014. For an academic assessment, see e.g. Auer 2013, pp. 158–160.

⁷⁷ For an overview of the reform proposals, see Zusatzbericht Verhältnis von Völkerrecht und Landesrecht, n. 62.

⁷⁸ See regarding the most recent attempts, Bericht des Bundesrates zur Abschreibung der Motionen 11.3468 und 11.3751 der beiden Staatspolitischen Kommissionen über Massnahmen zur besseren Vereinbarkeit von Volksinitiativen mit den Grundrechten of 19 February 2014, BBI 2014 2337.

⁷⁹ BGE 139 I 16 (2012), E. 5.3. See already (less clear) 133 II 450 (2007), E. 6; 133 V 233 (2007), E. 3.5.

to explicitly endorse the primacy of the Constitution over international law (with the exception of ius cogens). The proposal also foresaw that conflicting international obligations were to be re-negotiated or even terminated. The core argument brought forward was that international law and ‘foreign judges’, i.e. particularly the judges in Strasbourg, impinge too much on the ‘will of the people’ as expressed in direct democratic votes. In the end, the proposal was clearly rejected.⁸⁰ An approval would probably have had far-reaching consequences for Switzerland, one of them being a withdrawal from the ECHR. Most of all, the majority of the citizenry would then have been in the position to make laws with an almost unfettered discretion, to the detriment of minority rights.⁸¹

While it is certainly true that internationalisation and the greatly increased activity of international bodies in times of global governance constitute challenges to direct democracy, we think that the proposed solution missed the point. It first of all projects the debate on the proper balance between direct democracy and rule-of-law-induced limits of democracy, which is an inherently constitutional debate, onto international law and especially onto the ECHR. Furthermore, the supposedly simple solution proposed, granting the Constitution priority in any case, would have led to a myriad of new problems, while the rigid priority granted to the Constitution would not have provided the flexibility needed in the face of the pluralistic and complex legal reality.

3.2.2 A move to a dualist system has been repeatedly discussed in Parliament,⁸² with emphasis on state sovereignty and legitimacy concerns.⁸³ The Government has consistently refused to shift to dualism.⁸⁴ Its argument is that the leeway for legislative implementation of international law is not greater in dualist states, because Arts. 26 and 27 VCLT bind those states as well. Furthermore, the Government has pointed to the fact that direct democratic participation has been extended (see Sect. 3.1.2), and nearly parallel conditions for popular involvement in the adoption of national and international norms have been established.⁸⁵ A shift to dualism would not contribute to the resolution of pending problems, namely with regard to the position of international law in the Swiss legal order, the implementation of popular initiatives or the discontent in Switzerland about the role of ‘foreign’ judges.

⁸⁰ The initiative which was named ‘popular initiative on self-determination’ (‘Selbstbestimmungsinitiative’) was voted upon on 25 November 2018 and rejected by a majority of 66 percent of the voters and all the Cantons.

⁸¹ See for an overview Botschaft zur Volksinitiative ‘Schweizer Recht statt fremde Richter (Selbstbestimmungsinitiative)’ of 5 July 2017, BBI 2017 5355.

⁸² The most recent request, Motion 14.3221 (Reimann), ‘Dualismus statt Monismus’ of 21 March 2014 was rejected by the first chamber of Parliament in March 2016.

⁸³ As in the reasoning of the Motion Reimann, n. 82.

⁸⁴ Bericht Völkerrecht und Landesrecht, n. 62, pp. 2285–2286, 2302–2303, 2320–2321; statement of the Government of 28 May 2014 regarding Motion 14.3221 (‘Dualismus statt Monismus’). http://www.parlament.ch/d/suche/seiten/geschaefte.aspx?gesch_id=20143221.

⁸⁵ See statement of the Government regarding Motion 14.3221, n. 84.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 In Switzerland, as in most other states, Parliament is involved in the conclusion of treaties (see above Sect. 3.1) The Swiss Constitution, however, does not confine its participation to the ratification stage. It rather contains a provision that opens the door for parliamentary participation already prior to the approval of a treaty. Parliament partakes in the negotiation phase, but also beyond ratification, e.g. in subsequent negotiations within IOs. The intensity of parliamentarisation seems to be unique in a comparative perspective.⁸⁶

The starting point for parliamentary involvement in foreign policy is Art. 166(1) of the Constitution which states that the Federal Assembly ‘shall participate in shaping foreign policy and shall supervise the maintenance of foreign relations’. The Constitution itself does not define the term ‘participation’. The Parliament Act specifies that Parliament ‘shall follow international developments’ and ‘participate in the decision-making process on important foreign policy issues’ (Art. 24(1)). Additionally, Parliament shall ‘participate in international parliamentary conferences and cultivate relations with foreign parliaments’ (Art. 24(4)).

Parliament disposes of several instruments to this end: on the one hand, general parliamentary instruments and, on the other, instruments specifically designed for the area of foreign policy. The first group includes federal legislation concerning the area of foreign policy (marginal in practice), the parliamentary supervisory powers (Art. 169 of the Constitution) and finances (Art. 167), as well as the different types of procedural requests under the Parliament Act.⁸⁷ Several important legal developments, including the 1992 reform of parliamentary participation in foreign policy, go back to the use of these instruments. Of great practical importance for foreign policy are so-called motions, whereby Parliament can request that the Government submit a bill to the Federal Assembly or take certain action (Arts. 120 et seq. of the Parliament Act).

Examples of the use of the general parliamentary instruments include two parliamentary initiatives (Art. 160(1) of the Constitution and Art. 107 of the Parliament Act) regarding regulatory activities within the OECD. Both requested a stronger parliamentary involvement, arguing that OECD recommendations often lead to international standard-setting, ultimately resulting in international law with no democratic legitimization and control at all.⁸⁸ An example is the OECD approach to combatting tax avoidance by multinational enterprises as part of the organisation’s

⁸⁶ Ehrenzeller 2014, para. 14.

⁸⁷ Tripet 2012, pp. 23–25 offers some examples.

⁸⁸ Parlamentarische Initiative Nr. 14.424, ‘Parlamentarische Einflussnahme bei Regulierungsaktivitäten durch die OECD’ of 18 June 2014. Another initiative requests in the same vein consultation with Parliament in OECD matters. See Parlamentarische Initiative Nr. 14.433, ‘Empfehlungen und Beschlüsse der OECD und ihrer Sonderorganisationen. Pflicht zur Information und Konsultation der zuständigen Legislativkommissionen’ of 20 June 2014. Both initiatives were rejected by Parliament.

action plan on ‘base erosion and profit shifting’ (BEPS), which in Switzerland has contributed to the launch of a corporate tax reform.⁸⁹

Parliamentary ‘acts of general principle and planning’ are another general instrument. These are acts stating that ‘certain goals must be achieved, principles and criteria must be observed or measures must be planned’ (Art. 28(2) of the Parliament Act). This instrument is strong in legal terms – the Government may refuse to follow these decisions only if it provides justification (Art. 28(4)) – but of marginal practical relevance.⁹⁰

The specific instruments relating to foreign policy are mainly instruments of information and consultation. First, the Government shall regularly report to Parliament on Switzerland’s foreign policy (Art. 148(3) of the Parliament Act). Since 2011, the Government must submit an annual report providing a general overview of all activities in the area of foreign policy.⁹¹ Further reports may be explicitly required by law (Art. 148(1) of the Parliament Act). Examples include the ‘Foreign Economic Policy Reports’ based on Art. 10 of the Federal Act on Foreign Policy Measures.⁹² In these reports, the Government explains its main focus in the preceding year and the activities pursued to this end; furthermore, it provides information about foreign economic activities during this period, including the status of ongoing negotiations as well as the conclusion of negotiations.⁹³ Additionally, the Government may submit reports whenever it deems appropriate (Art. 148(1)).

Although reports are usually issued only for the information or attention of Parliament (Art. 148(1) of the Parliament Act), Parliament can, on its own or on the initiative of the Government, adopt an above-mentioned ‘act on principle and planning’ in reaction to important plans and reports (Art. 148(2) and (4)). So far, the Government has never submitted a report together with an invitation to take such a decision. Observers note that Parliament discusses the annual foreign policy reports less intensely than it did the more general pre-2009 reports. Furthermore, only few ⁸⁹ OECD press release of 16 September 2014, ‘OECD releases first BEPS recommendations to G20 for international approach to combat tax avoidance by multinationals’; Federal Department of Finance press release of 22 September 2014, ‘Federal Council launches consultation on third series of corporate tax reforms’.

⁹⁰ Tripet 2012, p. 18. The only instance (under the former law) so far is a draft federal decree with regard to a popular initiative proposing accession to the European Union. See Entwurf Bundesbeschluss über Beitragsverhandlungen der Schweiz mit der Europäischen Union, BBI 1999 3830, p. 3839 (rejected by the second chamber of Parliament).

⁹¹ Aussenpolitischer Bericht 2009 of 2 September 2009, BBI 2008 6291, p. 6293. Before 2009, the reports were issued on an irregular basis. The reports are available at <https://www.eda.admin.ch/de/de/home/dienstleistungen-publikationen/berichte/berichte-aussenpolitik.html>.

⁹² Bundesgesetz über aussenwirtschaftliche Massnahmen of 25 June 1982 (SR 946.201).

⁹³ In 2014, these included i.a. the entry into force of a bilateral free trade agreement with China, the conclusion of free trade agreements with Costa Rica and Panama, as well as the commencement of negotiations regarding a Swiss-EU institutional framework. See Bericht zur Aussenwirtschaftspolitik 2014 of 14 January 2015, p. 3.

requests (in the form of the general instruments) have been submitted by members of Parliament or the Government in reaction.⁹⁴

Further specific instruments are the information and consultation mechanisms in concrete situations which address not the parliamentary plenum but the Foreign Affairs Committees (FAC) of both chambers of Parliament (Art. 152 of the Parliament Act). The Government shall inform the presidents of the chambers and the FACs ‘regularly, comprehensively and in good time of important foreign policy developments’ (Art. 152(2)). If the information is classified, the recipients are bound by official secrecy (Art. 8). The FACs or other relevant committees can request to be informed or consulted (Art. 152(5)). The initiative to request information is, contrary to Art. 152(2) of the Parliament Act, mainly taken by the committees themselves.⁹⁵ An example is the request for information about the conclusion of negotiations concerning the multilateral Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement (ACTA).⁹⁶

The consultation mechanism is one of the most important instruments of participation in foreign policy, allowing Parliament to exercise influence prior to negotiations: the Government shall ‘consult the FACs on important plans as well as on the guidelines and directives regarding mandates for important international negotiations before it decides on or amends them’. In the same vein, the Government ‘shall inform these committees of the status of its plans and of the progress made in negotiations’ (Art. 152(3) of the Parliament Act).

The term ‘important international negotiations’ not only encompasses treaty negotiations but, more generally, all important foreign policy plans. It may also apply to soft law as far as it is important for the international standing of Switzerland.⁹⁷ Parliament can actively influence such negotiations by making statements during the consultation procedure.⁹⁸ The Government is not obliged to follow the statements, but must take them into account.⁹⁹

In the last four-year legislative period (2011–2015), 39 consultations took place, including on the aviation agreement between Germany and Switzerland and the UN Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20). Furthermore, the FACs were consulted on the mandate for negotiation concerning the WTO Ministerial Conferences in Bali and Nairobi. Another consultation concerned the mandate for ⁹⁴ Graf 2014, paras. 19–20.

⁹⁵ Tripet 2012, p. 46; Tripet Cordier 2014, para. 24.

⁹⁶ See Bericht der Aussenpolitischen Kommission des Nationalrates, ‘Rückblick 1. Hälfte der 49. Legislaturperiode 2011–2013’, p. 8, <http://www.parlament.ch/d/dokumentation/berichte/berichte-legislativkommissionen/aussenpolitische-kommission-apk/Documents/legislaturueckblick-apk-n-2011-2013-d.pdf>.

⁹⁷ See Notiz des Sekretariats der Aussenpolitischen Kommissionen, ‘Mitwirkungsrechte der eidgenössischen Räte im Bereich Aussenpolitik’, p. 3, <http://www.parlament.ch/d/organe-mitglieder/kommissionen/legislativkommissionen/kommissionen-apk/Documents/mitwirkung-aussenpolitik-apk-d.pdf>.

⁹⁸ See Bericht der Staatspolitischen Kommission des Nationalrates zur Parlamentarischen Initiative Parlamentsgesetz of 1 March 2001, BBl 2001 3467, p. 3604.

⁹⁹ Lanz 2014, p. 27.

negotiations with the EU to resolve institutional questions. Both committees approved the mandate, while adding a clarification.¹⁰⁰

The FACs usually approve proposed mandates; only in exceptional cases do they propose amendments or ask that negotiations be abandoned.¹⁰¹ A study finds a growing tendency to consult with Parliament.¹⁰² The Government seems to recognise the importance of the instrument of consultation, and Parliament actively exercises its powers.¹⁰³

It can thus be concluded that the reforms regarding the stronger involvement of Parliament in foreign policy have been successful – Parliament has assumed its role and proactively engages in foreign policy. This strong parliamentary involvement in Swiss foreign policy must be seen against the backdrop of some particular features of the Swiss system: the prevailing model of ‘consensus democracy’ as opposed to ‘majoritarian democracy’, and the far-reaching popular participation in treaty approval (‘threat’ of a referendum). While it is generally acknowledged that parliamentary involvement might negatively impact on flexibility during international negotiations, involving Parliament already in the stage of the framing of mandates for negotiations arguably has a positive impact on the acceptance of treaties, thus reducing the risk of a referendum. This might even strengthen the position of the Government during international negotiations.¹⁰⁴ Therefore, parliamentary involvement and especially consultation already during the shaping of mandates would be worth considering also in systems with no direct democratic participation, as this helps mitigate the power shift from the legislative to the executive branch and leads to a more legitimate and acceptable result.

3.3.2 See above, Sect. 3.1 on popular rights in connection with the conclusion of treaties, and Sect. 3.1.2 on the 2003 amendments on referendums.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 Rules on judicial review Treaties and acts of international organisations are not challengeable in Swiss courts. Several authors as well as a governmental report have claimed, however, that the essence of constitutional fundamental rights should form a limit to the application of international law.¹⁰⁵

¹⁰⁰ For an overview, see the report Die Aussenpolitische Kommission des Nationalrates in der 49. Legislaturperiode, 2011–2015, <https://www.parlament.ch/centers/documents/de/legislaturueckblick-apk-n-2011-2015-d.pdf>.

¹⁰¹ Tripet 2012, p. 62.

¹⁰² Ibid., p. 96: 12 consultations in the legislative period 2003–2007; 24 consultations in 2007–2011.

¹⁰³ Lanz 2014, p. 27.

¹⁰⁴ Ibid., pp. 27–28; Tripet Cordier 2014, para. 30.

¹⁰⁵ Bericht Völkerrecht und Landesrecht, n. 62, p. 2322; Schindler and Tschumi 2014, para. 87 for more references.

The object of judicial review is normally an individual act; federal legislative acts (statutes) are not challengeable.¹⁰⁶ As foreign relations lie in the responsibility of the Confederation (Art. 54(1) of the Constitution), most acts in the area of foreign relations emanate from the federal sphere. Federal administrative acts are usually first challengeable before a federal complaint authority, and then before the Federal Administrative Tribunal, with the Federal Tribunal as a last instance.

In the so-called administrative procedure, acts can, inter alia, be challenged for violation of federal law, which also includes the Constitution and international law (Art. 49(a) of the Federal Act on Administrative Procedure).¹⁰⁷ Before the Federal Tribunal, the benchmark will mainly be federal law as well as international law and the rights of persons derived from the cantonal Constitutions (Art. 95(a)–(c) Act on the Federal Tribunal).

The jurisdiction of both the Federal Administrative Tribunal and the Federal Tribunal is limited with regard to ‘acts of government’, i.e. acts considered to be mainly political and non-justiciable.¹⁰⁸ This means that appeal is precluded with regard to ‘rulings relating to the internal and external security of the country, neutrality, diplomatic protection and the other matters relating to external relations’ (Art. 32 (1)(a) Act on the Federal Administrative Tribunal¹⁰⁹ and Art. 83(a) Act on the Federal Tribunal¹¹⁰). Nevertheless, a counter-exception provides again for an appeal: if ‘international law confers the right to have the matter judged by a court’, judicial review is granted (last sentence of both provisions). This counter-exception was introduced in 2005 in order to comply with the obligations of Switzerland under Art. 6(1) of the ECHR.¹¹¹ In cases not falling under this counter-exception and thus not subject to judicial review, the Federal Council serves as a non-judicial appeal authority (Art. 72 of the Federal Act on Administrative Procedure).

An obstacle to setting aside international legal acts is contained in Art. 190 of the Constitution. This provision states that both federal acts and international law are ‘decisive’ for the Federal Tribunal and for other law-applying authorities (see above Sect. 3.2.1). The term ‘international law’ which is ‘decisive’ and therefore must be ¹⁰⁶ Article 44 in conjunction with Art. 5 of the Administrative Procedure Act (Bundesgesetz über das Verwaltungsverfahren [Verwaltungsverfahrensgesetz]) of 20 December 1968 (SR 172.021). Federal ordinances, however, can be subject to an ancillary control together with the challenged individual act. If a court finds that they are incompatible with a higher norm, it may refuse to apply them (but not invalidate them). Furthermore, acts of the Cantons may be challenged before the Federal Tribunal (Art. 82(b) Act on the Federal Tribunal).

¹⁰⁷ See e.g. BGE 130 I 312 (2004).

¹⁰⁸ Botschaft zur Totalrevision der Bundesrechtspflege of 28 February 2001, BBl 2001 4202, p. 4387; BGE 1A.157/2005 (2005), E.3.

¹⁰⁹ Bundesgesetz über das Bundesverwaltungsgericht (Verwaltungsgerichtsgesetz) of 17 June 2005 (SR 173.32).

¹¹⁰ Bundesgesetz über das Bundesgericht (Bundesgerichtsgesetz) of 17 June 2005 (SR 173.110).

¹¹¹ Botschaft zur Totalrevision der Bundesrechtspflege of 28 February 2001, BBl 2001 4202, p. 4388.

applied encompasses not only treaty law, but also customary international law, the general principles of law as well as the decisions of IOs binding on Switzerland.¹¹²

This provision does not prohibit the courts from reviewing and criticising the legal acts under scrutiny.¹¹³ However, even when an international legal act is incompatible with the Constitution and with constitutional fundamental rights, the judiciary is bound to apply the conflicting legal act, e.g. the domestic act on implementation of a UN Security Council (SC) resolution.¹¹⁴

Judicial review in practice The issue of (direct or indirect) judicial review of acts of international organisations has arisen in Switzerland several times regarding national measures implementing targeted sanctions against individuals. Such measures are generally based on the Federal Act on the Implementation of International Sanctions¹¹⁵ and issued by the Federal Council in the form of ordinances (Art. 2(3) of that Act).

In the leading case of 2007 (Nada), the Federal Tribunal decided that the appeal of a targeted individual against the authorities' refusal to remove him from a list annexed to the Swiss ordinance¹¹⁶ implementing UN SC Resolution 1267 on sanctions against the Taliban,¹¹⁷ resulting in a travel ban and the freezing of the applicant's assets, was admissible. Although formally, the issue was not the review of an individual act, but the modification of an ordinance,¹¹⁸ the Tribunal held that the inclusion in a list with the effect of restricting the exercise of individual rights had the same effect as an individual ruling affecting fundamental rights. Therefore judicial review should be allowed.¹¹⁹ As the rights of the applicant under Art. 6(1) ECHR were affected, the Tribunal applied the counter-exception to the act-of-government exception and found the complaint admissible.¹²⁰ On the merits, however, the Court held that scrutiny of such measures with regard to their conformity with constitutional rights and international human rights guarantees was not allowed. First, constitutional guarantees could not serve as benchmarks. While the Federal Tribunal expressly acknowledged that judicial review was lacking at the UN level,¹²¹ the Tribunal considered itself unable to remedy the situation. The reason was the Swiss authorities' constitutional obligation 'to apply' international

¹¹² Botschaft BV, n. 3, pp. 428–429; BGE 133 II 450 (2007), E. 6.1.

¹¹³ See BGE 129 II 249 (2003), E. 5.4.

¹¹⁴ BGE 133 II 450 (2007) (Nada), E. 6.1; 2A.783/2006 (2008) (Al-Dulimi), E. 7.1.

¹¹⁵ Bundesgesetz über die Durchsetzung von internationalen Sanktionen (Embargogesetz) of 22 March 2002 (SR 946.231).

¹¹⁶ Verordnung über Massnahmen gegenüber Personen und Organisationen mit Verbindungen zu Usama bin Laden, der Gruppierung 'Al-Qaïda' oder den Taliban of 2 October 2000 (SR 946.203).

¹¹⁷ SC Resolution 1267 (1999) of 15 October 1999.

¹¹⁸ See on the justiciability of ordinances n. 106.

¹¹⁹ BGE 133 II 450 (2007) (Nada), E. 2.1.

¹²⁰ Ibid., E. 2.2–2.3.

¹²¹ Ibid., E. 8.3.

law (Art. 190 of the Constitution).¹²² The Tribunal therefore felt bound by its obligation under Art. 25 of the UN Charter to implement the UN resolution which – according to the Federal Tribunal – left no leeway.¹²³ With regard to the international obligations to respect human rights under the ECHR and the ICCPR, the Tribunal applied Art. 103 of the UN Charter, according to which ‘in the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail’.¹²⁴ The Tribunal held that ius cogens would, however, constitute a limit to the duty to apply SC resolutions.¹²⁵

In 2012, the ECtHR decided that by prioritising the SC resolutions over respect for ECHR rights, Switzerland had violated Arts. 8 and 13 of the ECHR. It did not accept the defence that Switzerland had had no discretion when implementing the SC resolutions, but rather examined whether Switzerland had done everything in its power to minimise the conflict between the UN SC resolutions and the obligations arising from the ECHR, and concluded that this had not been the case.¹²⁶

In the Al-Dulimi case concerning the implementation of Iraqi sanctions resulting from UN SC Resolution 1483,¹²⁷ the ECtHR again found Switzerland to be in breach of the Convention.¹²⁸ The Federal Tribunal had, in three judgments rendered on the same date,¹²⁹ repeated its previous stance that it was not entitled to examine the merits of the complaints, because Switzerland was bound to apply international law due to Art. 190 of the Constitution,¹³⁰ and because Security Council resolutions enjoy priority over potentially conflicting treaty norms due to Art. 103 UN Charter (except for ius cogens).¹³¹ Given the fact that SC Resolution 1483 contained a strict obligation, and because the right of access to an independent and impartial court does not belong to the body of international peremptory norms, the Federal Tribunal refused to examine the applicants’ listing in substance, arguing that to do so would potentially deprive Art. 25 UN Charter of its effet utile.¹³² As Switzerland was not in a position to achieve the de-listing of the applicants, the Federal Tribunal

¹²² Ibid., E. 6.1.

¹²³ Ibid., E. 8.1.

¹²⁴ Ibid., E. 6.2.

¹²⁵ Ibid., E. 7.

¹²⁶ Nada v. Switzerland [GC], no. 10593/08, § 185–199, ECHR 2012.

¹²⁷ Resolution 1483 (2003), adopted by the SC at its 4761st meeting on 22 May 2003. The implementing legislation is the Verordnung über Wirtschaftsmassnahmen gegenüber der Republik Irak of 7 August 1990, amended on 20 May 2003 to adapt to UN SC resolution 1483 (BBI 2003 1887).

¹²⁸ Al-Dulimi and Montana Management Inc. v. Switzerland [GC], no. 5809/08, ECHR 2016.

¹²⁹ BGE 2A.783/2006; 2A.784/2006; 2A.785/2006 (Al-Dulimi); all of 23 January 2008. In these cases, the challenged act was an individual ruling (an administrative decision on confiscation of 16 November 2006).

¹³⁰ BGE 2A.783/2006 (2008) (Al-Dulimi), E. 7.1.

¹³¹ Ibid., E. 7.2.–7.3.

¹³² Ibid., E. 9.2; 10.1.

considered that Switzerland's behaviour neither violated the Swiss Constitution nor Arts. 6 and 13 of the ECHR.¹³³

The Grand Chamber did not accept this defence. It found that although the Swiss courts' refusal to review the complaint pursued the legitimate objective of maintaining international peace and security, the denial of any substantive review was disproportionate and therefore impaired 'the very essence of the applicant's right of access to a court'.¹³⁴ According to the ECtHR, SC resolutions must be interpreted as allowing for an appropriate review by domestic courts unless the resolution explicitly rules this out: '[w]here a Security Council resolution does not contain any clear or explicit wording excluding or limiting respect for human rights in the context of the implementation of sanctions against individuals or entities at national level, the Court must always presume that those measures are compatible with the Convention.'¹³⁵ The ECtHR then found that before freezing the assets 'the Swiss authorities had a duty to ensure that the listing was not arbitrary. ... The applicants should ... have been afforded at least a genuine opportunity to submit appropriate evidence to a court, for examination on the merits, to seek to show that their inclusion on the impugned lists had been arbitrary.'¹³⁶ Because the Swiss authorities, including the Swiss Federal Tribunal, completely refused to examine the complaint, they violated the Convention. Even though the ECtHR sought to strike a compromise and to avoid the hard consequences of Art. 103 UN Charter, it still leaves the ECHR member states that now have to apply an undefined arbitrariness test in a Catch-22 between the ECHR and the UN Security Council.¹³⁷

Experts' view The procedural elements of constitutionalism may be more important than the substantive ones; what counts are not only material guarantees but even more so the mechanisms to implement them, including judicial review. If such mechanisms exist only on the domestic plane, they need to be exploited. However, diverging interpretations and application of international primary and secondary law will persist in any case.

National courts play an important role at the intersection of legal orders: they are 'servants' to international law within the domestic realm and act as pivotal safeguards for the effectiveness of international law. At the same time, they remain answerable to the dictates of domestic law and act as gatekeepers for the protection of national values, as often enshrined in the constitution. In this dual function, national courts may be faced with the dilemma of obeying either national (constitutional) law or international law. As shown, the Swiss Federal Tribunal has so far proved reluctant to assume a role in protecting constitutional (or European) fundamental rights against encroachment by international legal acts, but rather has implemented measures prescribed by international law faithfully.

¹³³ Ibid., E. 11.2.

¹³⁴ Al-Dulimi [GC], n. 129, para. 151.

¹³⁵ Ibid., para. 140.

¹³⁶ Ibid., paras. 150–151.

¹³⁷ See for a critical appraisal of the case Peters 2016b.

In Switzerland as in other states, courts have so far been confronted with conflicts between international law and constitutional law mainly with regard to targeted sanctions, which arise less from a conflict of values and more relate to a lack of judicial review of the acts of the Security Council.

In other constellations, international and domestic (constitutional) standards diverge only in nuances rather than pointing in opposite directions. Here, harmonising approaches by national courts seem adequate. They should take international law into consideration in good faith and should interpret the domestic constitution in the light of international law.

If a normative conflict cannot be interpreted away, courts need to decide which norm should prevail. It is submitted here that priority should be given not by pointing to the formal sources, i.e. whether a norm is codified on the constitutional level or based in international law, but on the basis of their substance. Accordingly, less significant provisions in state constitutions would have to give way to important international norms. Inversely, fundamental rights guarantees should prevail over less important norms (independent of their locus and type of codification). Within such a flexible scheme, the practical outcome would greatly depend on who interprets and applies the law.

Arguably, if the application of international law risks violating the core principles of the domestic constitution, the ‘constitutional identity’, (some) domestic courts (maybe only courts of last instance) might exceptionally and temporarily be released from their duty to apply international law. However, they should exercise this emergency power in the spirit of pressing for international legal reform.¹³⁸ Also, such domestic judicial review seems to be warranted only ‘as long as’ adequate review of international acts is lacking on the international plane and must be abandoned once the international level has been sufficiently constitutionalised.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

No significant issues arise.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

On individuals affected by UN terrorist blacklists, see Sect. 3.4.1. Regarding other rights, in 2014, the ECtHR found that Switzerland, in applying the Dublin ¹³⁸ See Peters and Preuss 2013, pp. 41–42 for a more detailed reasoning.

Regulation,¹³⁹ had violated Art. 3 of the ECHR by sending an asylum seeking Afghan family with small children back to Italy.¹⁴⁰ Italy was the country of their registration in Europe, but had a problematic reception system.

The primary objective of the Dublin Regulation is to determine which state bears responsibility for examining an asylum application in order to avoid multiple applications and to ensure that only one state deals with any single case (Art. 3 and Chapter III of Regulation No. 604/2013). It therefore establishes a nearly automatic procedure. The Federal Administrative Tribunal had previously held that ‘while there [were] shortcomings in the reception and social welfare arrangements ...’, there was no evidence in the file capable of ‘rebutting the presumption that Italy comply[d] with its obligations under public international law’.¹⁴¹

The ECtHR, however, considered that Switzerland was obliged to undertake a further examination. It argued that the current situation in Italy was not comparable to the situation in Greece which the Court had examined in the case of M.S.S.¹⁴² However, in light of the current state of the reception system in Italy and the fact that children are a particularly vulnerable group, it was incumbent on Switzerland to obtain assurances from the Italian authorities that the family would be received in facilities and conditions adapted to the age of the children.¹⁴³

The decision to return the applicants to Italy did not strictly fall within Switzerland’s international legal obligations, because the Dublin II Regulation left some leeway and allowed a state to examine applications for asylum lodged with it, even if the particular state is not obliged to do so under the Dublin criteria.¹⁴⁴ Consequently, the Bosphorus presumption did not apply in the present case, and Switzerland remained fully responsible under the ECHR.

Taking into account the need to coordinate different legal regimes, this ECtHR judgment might be viewed critically. The Dublin system is based on the principle of mutual confidence and on the presumption that the participating states respect the ¹³⁹ Council Regulation (EC) No 343/2003 of 18 February 2003 establishing the criteria and mechanisms for determining the Member State responsible for examining an asylum application lodged in one of the Member States by a third-country national, [2003] OJ L 50/1. The Dublin Regulation is applicable to Switzerland under the terms of the association agreement of 26 October 2004 with the European Community regarding criteria and mechanisms for establishing the state responsible for examining a request for asylum lodged in a Member State or in Switzerland, [2008] OJ L 53/1.

¹⁴⁰ Tarakhel v. Switzerland [GC], no. 29217/12, ECHR 2014 (extracts).

¹⁴¹ Federal Administrative Tribunal, A. et al. contre Office fédéral des migrations (ODM), Judgment of 9 February 2012, D-637/2012, p. 7, in the translation of Tarakhel, n. ¹⁴⁰, para. 18. The judgment related to the previous Dublin II regulation (Regulation 343/2003)

¹⁴² M.S.S. v. Belgium and Greece [GC], no. 30696/09, ECHR 2011.

¹⁴³ Tarakhel, n. ¹⁴⁰, paras. 120–122.

¹⁴⁴ Under the ‘sovereignty clause’, Art. 3(2) of the Dublin II Regulation of 2003 and Art. 17 ‘discretionary clauses’ of the Dublin III Regulation of 2013.

fundamental rights laid down in the ECHR. According to the Court of Justice of the European Union, this presumption is only rebutted in the event of systemic flaws. The judgment of the ECtHR introduced a stricter standard of scrutiny, obliging Member States to deviate from the principle of mutual confidence and to examine individual cases beyond extreme cases of systemic deficits. This could undermine the balance and the effectiveness of the Dublin system. However, it leads neither to a Catch-22 for the Member States, nor does it preclude the application of the Dublin Regulation. It rather obliges Member States to use the exception clause foreseen in the Regulation and to ask for ‘detailed and reliable information’ concerning the reception conditions when particularly vulnerable categories, including children, are involved.¹⁴⁵ The Tarakhel judgment provides a more effective protection of human rights within the existing EU regime and thus allows harmonisation of the two different regimes (ECHR and EU law). Such an approach is in line with the idea of the maximum standard as expressed both in Art. 53 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights and in Art. 53 of the ECHR.

We submit that as long as there are no sufficient institutions and procedures on the international level to compensate for the ‘hollowing out’ of constitutional principles and processes ('compensatory constitutionalisation'), national actors (courts and parliaments) should continue to play an important role in upholding such principles. However, they need to practice constitutional tolerance. This means that they should not demand identical standards on every level of governance, should employ techniques of accommodation (conflict-avoiding clauses, harmonious interpretation, etc.), and not reify fixed normative hierarchies established between different legal orders.

The Swiss debate about the meaning of the constitutional reference to ‘international peremptory norms’ (see Sect. 3.2.1) illustrates the relevance of mutually adjusting domestic (constitutional) and international standards. This reference is unique in setting an international law-conscious limit to constitutional amendment. It is in principle legitimate to ‘domesticate’ the ius cogens standard, as long as domestication works immediately or indirectly in support of international coordination and co-operation. This is the case here, since the domestic interpretation has so far extended the range of international legal norms to be respected in amending the Constitution.

The institutional setting (procedures for constitutional amendment, jurisdiction of courts, etc.) needs to be designed so as to allow such accommodation and tolerance. For example, in Switzerland, the right to initiate a popular initiative could be further restricted, so as not only to stop short of international peremptory norms (in their ‘extended’ Swiss interpretation) but also to respect all or a core set of international (or European) human rights guarantees.

¹⁴⁵ Cf. Tarakhel, n. 140, para. 121.

3.7 Conclusions

Overall assessment The Swiss Constitution is unique in Europe in the way it organises international co-operation. Three features stand out: the very strong democratisation of foreign policy-making (through Parliament and through the involvement of the people), the relatively reluctant judicial review of international legal acts against the benchmark of fundamental rights and, finally (less importantly), the federal elements in conducting international relations. This constitutional design for accommodating international law and for acting on the international plane may have several reasons.

First, it appears to be an outgrowth of the internal constitutional design in which democracy (including the strong elements of direct popular participation) stands in the foreground and is only weakly checked by constitutional review. The relatively far-reaching cantonal competences in international relations mirror the strong Swiss federalism.

Importantly, the spectre of a popular referendum adds to the usual power struggle between the Government and Parliament in the conduct of international relations. As in probably all other democratic states, the Swiss Government time and again points to the need for reacting swiftly and flexibly, and to speak with one voice in order to justify its own competences in foreign affairs, unencumbered by too much parliamentary involvement. The current Swiss Constitution accommodates this concern but allows more room for Parliament than other European constitutions. The reason is that Parliament's involvement is apt to forestall the people from calling for a referendum which in turn would risk slowing down and confusing foreign affairs even more. Thus, overall, the purely 'internal' aspect of the Constitution and the outward-looking structures and mechanisms fit together.

Secondly, Switzerland as a small country surrounded by powerful neighbours has a long and strong tradition of investment in international law in order to pursue its national interests (host state of numerous IOs; depositary of the International Humanitarian Law Geneva Conventions; neutrality in war). Thirdly, the relevant constitutional provisions (and accompanying statutory law) date from the 1990s and the first decade of this millennium. This period was characterised by an increased awareness of globalisation and global interdependence, by a belief in the merits of international co-operation, and by the expectation that international governance would continuously become stronger and was in principle necessary and beneficial.

Overall, the Swiss constitutional reforms mirrored the zeitgeist and, at the same time, the result reflects four Swiss idiosyncrasies, namely the country's proactive use of international law for its own benefit, the extremely elaborate and far-reaching democratic procedures, strong federalism, and the country remaining outside the EU (in contrast to most other Western European states).

The importance of the tension between the rule of (undemocratic) international law and domestic democracy has been fully realised only in the past decade. The resulting scepticism towards the incorporation, accommodation, implementation and prioritisation of international law in the domestic legal order is an attitude which Switzerland shares with other states. This Europe-wide trend is not least a consequence of the increased practical relevance and reach of international legal acts which is felt within nation states. However, the backlash seems to be more intense in Switzerland than in other states because of the high value placed on the sovereignty of the (Swiss) people.

The seeming inconsistency between the current phenomenon of Swiss constitutional reforms triggered by popular initiatives in disregard of international standards on the one hand, and the faithful implementation of SC resolutions (in disregard of domestic constitutional fundamental rights and ECHR rights) on the other, is not a real contradiction. To the contrary, it precisely follows the internal order of constitutional values, namely the priority of democracy ('peoples' rights') over fundamental rights and judicial review. The Swiss courts' (relative) neglect of ECHR rights in this picture reflects Swiss ambivalence towards Strasbourg: although the constitutional catalogue of fundamental rights was copied from the text of the ECHR in 1999, the ECtHR's adjudicatory authority is viewed with scepticism, notably when it threatens to undo laws adopted not only by the democratic legislature but by the people itself.

Lessons for compensatory constitutionalism The Swiss case underscores both the desirability and the difficulties of compensatory constitutionalism as a normative programme.¹⁴⁶ On the triple premise that economic globalisation and global problems will persist, that these require a global or at least harmonised governance response (as opposed to isolated national responses), and that constitutional achievements reached within nation states should be preserved, the constitution-alisation of international (primary and secondary) law and its institutions indeed seems the only way forward.

The alternative strategy, namely to stop or cut back international law-making, is revealed as unfeasible, inter alia, by Swiss discussions such as on denouncing the ECHR. Also, the Swiss Parliament's demand to be involved not only in the elaboration of hard international law but also of soft law (OECD acts in the field of taxation) illustrates the impact felt by all types of international governance measures which in turn triggers the quest for creating a democratic basis for them.

As regards the difficulties of compensatory constitutionalism, it is worth noting that the important Swiss reforms, mainly with a view to strengthening the element of democratic control (Sect. 3.3) through domestic democratic institutions, have so far not succeeded in soothing popular aversion to 'foreign' and undemocratic international law and institutions. However, the way out, namely the democratisation of international law- and policy-making directly within the international institutions themselves, is fraught with normative and practical problems and will in the end only marginally be able to accommodate the (democratic) decision-making processes within very small sub-units (such as the Swiss people) feeding into the global law-making process.

¹⁴⁶ Peters 2006.

With regard to the second main element of contemporary constitutionalism, namely the rule of law (fundamental rights protection and judicial review (Sect. 3.4)), the Swiss case also provides lessons. At first sight, the Swiss readiness to implement SC resolutions, sacrificing fundamental rights (below ius cogens) and judicial review, might be praised for its acknowledgment that the constitutional standards need not be identical on the international and domestic levels of governance. However, this Swiss stance might be much less a manifestation of ‘constitutional tolerance’ towards international governance than it appears to be at first glance, but rather the result of a parochial scepticism towards judicial review. The ECtHR, in compelling Switzerland to exercise such review, might in the end work more in favour of compensatory constitutionalism through the pressure it creates (deployed through an ECHR member state) to reform the UN sanctions system.

References

- Auer A. (2013) Herausforderungen der direkten Demokratie in der Schweiz. In: Auer A., Holzinger K. (eds.) Gegenseitige Blicke über die Grenze. Schulthess, Zurich, Basel, Geneva, pp. 149–160.
- Baumann R. (2002) Der Einfluss des Völkerrechts auf die Gewaltenteilung am Beispiel Deutschlands, Frankreichs, der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika, Schwedens und der Schweiz. Schulthess, Zurich, Basel, Geneva.
- Biagianni G. (2007) Bundesverfassung der Schweizerischen Eidgenossenschaft und Auszüge aus der EMRK, den UNO-Pakten sowie dem BGG. Orell Füssli, Zurich.
- Cottier T., Achermann A., Wüger D., Zellweger V. (eds.) (2001) Der Staatsvertrag im schweizerischen Verfassungsrecht. Stämpfli, Bern.
- Diggelmann O. (2005) Der liberale Verfassungsstaat und die Internationalisierung der Politik. Stämpfli, Bern.
- Ehrenzeller B. (1993) Legislative Gewalt und Aussenpolitik. Helbing Lichtenhahn, Basel, Frankfurt am Main.
- Ehrenzeller B. (2014) Artikel 166. In: Ehrenzeller B., Schindler B., Schweizer R.J., Vallender K. A. (eds.) Die Schweizerische Bundesverfassung, St. Galler Kommentar, vol. II, 3rd edn. Dike and Schulthess, Zurich, Basel, Geneva, St. Gallen, pp. 2702–2724.
- Ehrenzeller B., Müller R.P. (2012) Gutachten zuhanden von economiesuisse betreffend die eidgenössische Volksinitiative ‘Für die Stärkung der Volksrechte in der Aussenpolitik (Staatsverträge vors Volk!)’. https://edoc.unibas.ch/49685/1/20131202123836_529c713ceaab.pdf.
- Graf M. (2014) Art. 148. In: Graf M., Theler C., von Wyss M. (eds.) Parlamentsrecht und Parlamentspraxis der Schweizerischen Bundesversammlung. Helbing Lichtenhahn, Basel, pp. 994–1004.
- Hangartner Y. (2000) Initiative auf Teilrevision der Bundesverfassung. In: Hangartner Y., Kley A. (eds.) Die demokratischen Rechte in Bund und Kantonen der Schweizerischen Eidgenossenschaft. Schulthess, Zurich, pp. 331–374.
- Keller H. (2011) Die Schweiz in der internationalen Gemeinschaft. In: Biagianni G., Gächter T., Kiener R. (eds.) Staatsrecht. Dike, Zurich, St. Gallen, pp. 48–58.
- Kübeler D., Surber M., Christmann A., Bernhard L. (2012) Mehr direkte Demokratie in der Aussenpolitik? Politikwissenschaftliches Gutachten zuhanden von economiesuisse anlässlich der Abstimmung über die eidgenössische Volksinitiative ‘Für die Stärkung der Volksrechte in der Aussenpolitik (Staatsverträge vors Volk!)’. <https://doi.org/10.5167/uzh-73669>.

- Lanz C. (2014) Die internationalen Beziehungen der Bundesversammlung. EUGRZ 41:26–29.
- Linder W. (2012) Schweizerische Demokratie, 3rd edn., Haupt Verlag, Bern, Stuttgart, Vienna.
- Lombardi A., Thürer D. (2002) Art. 141. In: Ehrenzeller B., Mastronardi P., Schweizer R.J., Vallender K.A. (eds.) Die schweizerische Bundesverfassung, Kommentar, 1st edn. Dike, Lachen and Schulthess, Zurich, Basel, Geneva, pp. 1491–1502.
- Peters A. (2006) Compensatory Constitutionalism: The Function and Potential of Fundamental International Norms and Structures. LJIL 19:579–610.
- Peters A. (2016a) Völkerrecht Allgemeiner Teil. 4th edn. Schulthess, Zurich, Basel, Geneva.
- Peters A. (2016b) The New Arbitrariness and Competing Constitutionalisms: Remarks on ECtHR Grand Chamber Al-Dulimi EJIL-Talk! of 30 June 2016. <https://www.ejiltalk.org/the-new-arbitrariness-and-competing-constitutionalisms-remarks-on-ecthr-grand-chamber-al-dulimi/>.
- Peters A., Preuss U.K. (2013) International relations and international law. In: Tushnet M., Fleiner T., Saunders C. (eds.) Routledge Handbook of Constitutional Law. Routledge, London, New York, pp. 33–44.
- Saladin P. (1995) Wozu noch Staaten? Stämpfli, Bern.
- Schindler B., Tschumi T. (2014) Art. 5. In: Ehrenzeller B., Schindler B., Schweizer R.J., Vallender K.A. (eds.) Die Schweizerische Bundesverfassung, St. Galler Kommentar, vol. I. 3rd edn. Dike, Zurich, St. Gallen and Schulthess, Zurich, Basel, Geneva, pp. 100–142.
- Sturny T. (1998) Mitwirkungsrechte der Kantone an der Aussenpolitik des Bundes. Universitäts-Verlag, Freiburg.
- Tripet F.M. (2012) Ein Instrument der parlamentarischen Mitwirkung im Bereich der schweizerischen Aussenpolitik. IDHEAP, Lausanne.
- Tripet Cordier F.M. (2014) Art. 152. In: Graf M., Theler C., von Wyss M. (eds.) Parlamentsrecht und Parlamentspraxis der Schweizerischen Bundesversammlung. Helbing Lichtenhahn, Basel, pp. 1029–1044.
- Zellweger V. (2001) Die demokratische Legitimation staatsvertraglichen Rechts. In: Cottier T., Achermann A., Wüger D., Zellweger V. (eds.) Der Staatsvertrag im schweizerischen Verfassungsrecht. Stämpfli, Bern, pp. 254–416.
- Ziegler A. (2004) Die schweizerische Bundesverfassung und das internationale Recht. Universität, St. Gallen.
- Ziegler A., Odendahl K. (2014) Bundesverfassung und Völkerrecht. In: Ehrenzeller B., Schindler B., Schweizer R.J., Vallender K.A. (eds.) Die Schweizerische Bundesverfassung, St. Galler Kommentar, vol. I. 3rd edn., Dike, Zurich, St. Gallen and Schulthess, Zurich, Basel, Geneva, pp. 23–48.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

