

ASSER PRESS

National Constitutions in European and Global Governance: Democracy, Rights, the Rule of Law

National Reports

Anneli Albi
Samo Bardutzky Editors

Springer Open

National Constitutions in European and Global Governance: Democracy, Rights, the Rule of Law

Anneli Albi · Samo Bardutzky
Editors

National Constitutions in European and Global Governance: Democracy, Rights, the Rule of Law

National Reports

ASSER PRESS

Springer Open

Editors

Anneli Albi
Law School
University of Kent
Canterbury, UK

Samo Bardutzky
Law School
University of Ljubljana
Ljubljana, Slovenia

European Research Council
Established by the European Commission

This project has received funding from the European Research Council (ERC) under the European Union's Seventh Framework Programme (Grant Agreement No. 284316).

ISBN 978-94-6265-272-9

ISBN 978-94-6265-273-6 (eBook)

<https://doi.org/10.1007/978-94-6265-273-6>

Library of Congress Control Number: 2018957065

Published by T.M.C. ASSER PRESS, The Hague, The Netherlands www.asserpress.nl
Produced and distributed for T.M.C. ASSER PRESS by Springer-Verlag Berlin Heidelberg

© The Editor(s) (if applicable) and The Author(s) 2019. This book is an open access publication.

Open Access This book is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this book are included in the book's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the book's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The use of general descriptive names, registered names, trademarks, service marks, etc. in this publication does not imply, even in the absence of a specific statement, that such names are exempt from the relevant protective laws and regulations and therefore free for general use.

The publisher, the authors and the editors are safe to assume that the advice and information in this book are believed to be true and accurate at the date of publication. Neither the publisher nor the authors or the editors give a warranty, express or implied, with respect to the material contained herein or for any errors or omissions that may have been made. The publisher remains neutral with regard to jurisdictional claims in published maps and institutional affiliations.

This T.M.C. ASSER PRESS imprint is published by the registered company Springer-Verlag GmbH, DE part of Springer Nature

The registered company address is: Heidelberger Platz 3, 14197 Berlin, Germany

Preface

We are delighted to bring to the readers what in our view is a truly fascinating book, National Constitutions in European and Global Governance: Democracy, Rights, the Rule of Law – National Reports. The book contains twenty-nine in-depth national reports, which are available online in two volumes via Open Access. The book will be accompanied by a comparative monograph – referred to in this book as the ‘Comparative Study’ – as is explained in greater detail in the introductory chapter; the Comparative Study will be published later this year.

The national reports were prepared in the framework of the five-year research project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’. The research project was funded through a 1.2 million EUR grant, awarded by the European Research Council (ERC) (Grant Agreement No. 284316; project acronym: ConstEurGlobGov), as part of the EU’s Seventh Framework Programme.

The reports are the result of extensive research by more than sixty contributors, whose posts and affiliations are listed at the beginning of each national report. The full, alphabetical list of all contributors is provided in the ‘Contributors’ section.

However, here we would like to make special mention of and gratefully acknowledge the central, pivotal contribution of the main constitutional law experts to the preparation and co-ordination of the twenty-nine national reports. The list of the main constitutional law experts for the countries covered in the research project is provided below.

We would also like to express particular gratitude to the considerable number of scholars specialising in the field of criminal law who kindly joined the project to share their expertise with regard to questions relating to the European Arrest Warrant. Equally, we would like to deeply thank all the other research collaborators for their extensive research and written contributions covering the range of themes addressed by the project.

The main constitutional law experts who were approached to carry out and co-ordinate the research for the project's national reports are as follows:

Austria:	Konrad Lachmayer
Belgium:	Patricia Popelier and Catherine Van De Heyning
Bulgaria:	Evgeni Tanchev and Martin Belov
Croatia:	Iris Goldner Lang
Cyprus:	Constantinos Kombos and Stéphanie Laulhé Shaelou
Czech Republic:	Zdeněk Kühn
Denmark:	Helle Kunke
Estonia:	Madis Ernits and Carri Ginter
Finland:	Tuomas Ojanen and Janne Salminen
France:	Laurence Burgorgue-Larsen
Germany:	Dieter Grimm and Matthias Wendel
Greece:	Xenophon Contiades
Hungary:	Márton Varju and Nóra Chronowski
Ireland:	Gerard Hogan
Italy:	Giuseppe Martinico, Oreste Pollicino and Barbara Guastaferro
Latvia:	Kristīne Krūma
Lithuania:	Irmantas Jarukaitis
Luxembourg:	Jörg Gerkrath
Malta:	Peter G. Xuereb
The Netherlands:	Leonard Besselink and Monica Claes
Poland:	Stanisław Biernat
Portugal:	Francisco Pereira Coutinho
Romania:	Bogdan Iancu
Slovakia:	Michal Bobek
Slovenia:	Samo Bardutzky
Spain:	Aida Torres Pérez
Sweden:	Joakim Nergelius
Switzerland:	Anne Peters
United Kingdom:	Alison L. Young and Patrick Birkinshaw

Once again, we are very grateful to the above constitutional law experts as well as to all the research collaborators for having generously given their time, expertise, attention and goodwill in carrying out extensive research for the project and for contributing constructively to the analysis of the new challenges posed to constitutional law by EU and transnational governance.

It must be noted that at the time of the book going to press, the overall constitutional and political climate has changed significantly since the start of the project in 2012, with widespread nationalist and illiberal developments in the interim in and beyond Europe. The timeline of the project is outlined in the introductory chapter, where it is explained that the present book does not address the more recent changes. Instead, the book explores the deeper comparative European constitutional culture and understanding of the rule of law, the common and diverse elements in the comparative European constitutional landscape, and how these have been affected or changed by EU and global governance.

We hope that the national reports will make a significant contribution towards thinking and discussion about the future direction of travel for national, comparative, EU and global constitutionalism.

Canterbury, UK
Ljubljana, Slovenia
February 2019

Anneli Albi
Samo Bardutzky

Acknowledgements

The editors would like to express their deepest gratitude to the following colleagues and institutions whose contributions have made this comprehensive, two-volume book possible.

First of all, we are profoundly grateful to the national constitutional law experts and their research collaborators for having generously given their time, expertise, attention and goodwill in carrying out extensive research for the project and for contributing constructively to the analysis of the new challenges posed to constitutional law by EU and transnational governance.

For linguistic editing, we would like to express our infinite appreciation to Siiri Aulik for having edited this large-scale book of 1,500 pages with consistently wonderful enthusiasm, diligence, patience and care. Many of the authors of the country reports have joined us in thanking Siiri for her magnificent work.

We would also like to express our special gratitude to Colin Moore for having carried out the extensive editing of referencing throughout the book.

Our warm thanks also go to Cathy Norman, Sian Robertson, Sarah Slowe, Sarah Gilkes, Ruth Woodger, Jane Benstead, Jody Turner, Zoe Wood, Ben Obembe, Jon King and Jenny Rafferty from the University of Kent for their very efficient assistance with administrative and financial matters. We also greatly appreciated the assistance of Cathy Norman and Serena Natile in the process of organising a work-in-progress seminar at Kent in 2014 to discuss the draft papers.

We would also like to extend our thanks more broadly to Kent Law School for having provided a supportive environment in which to carry out this research. Indeed, many of the research questions have their origin in the workshops held over the years—and in discussions with colleagues—at the Centre for Critical International Law (CECIL) and Kent Centre for European and Comparative Law (KCECL), especially with regard to some of the more debatable impacts of the policies of global financial institutions on social justice and development (we would particularly like to acknowledge the work of current and former colleagues Toni Williams, Iain Ramsay, Paddy Ireland, Kate Bedford and Donatella Alessandrini). The critical and interdisciplinary research environment also opened up broader, structural questions about the epistemology of research in EU and international law (with special thanks to current and former colleagues Harm Schepel, Simone Glanert, Bernard Ryan, Geoffrey Samuel and Wade Mansell). We would also like to thank Sally Sheldon, Dermot Walsh and Donal Casey for their contributions to the overall grant project.

Regarding the publishing process, we would like to express our immense appreciation to the staff at T.M.C. Asser Press and Springer Verlag. We would especially like to thank Philip Van Tongeren, Frank Bakker, Marjolijn Bastiaans, Antoinette Wessels, Kiki Van Gurp and Brigitte Reschke for their consistently enthusiastic, helpful and patient approach to bringing the book to fruition.

Last, but most importantly, we would like to acknowledge the very generous funding provided by the European Research Council as part of the EU's Seventh Framework Programme (Grant Agreement No. 284316). The grant made it possible to carry out this large-scale, extensive and systematic research on comparative constitutional law that otherwise quite possibly would never have been brought to life.

In Memoriam Kristīne Krūma

It is with deep sadness that I am writing to inform readers that Dr. Kristīne Krūma, the constitutional law expert for Latvia for the present ERC funded research project ‘The Role of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’, passed away on 4 July 2016 after a serious illness. Dr. Kristīne Krūma held the post of Associate Professor and Prorector of the Riga Graduate School of Law and was formerly a justice at the Constitutional Court of Latvia.

I have immensely appreciated Kristīne’s work both in her capacity as a constitutional court judge and as a scholar, and I remember her as a very kind and warm colleague. I have been particularly impressed by how Kristīne, on the one hand, was a strong champion of European and international law and cooperation and emphasised the need to redefine classic national concepts such as sovereignty. Yet on the other hand, especially in her role as the judge rapporteur in the IMF austerity cases at the Constitutional Court of Latvia, she also sought to ensure a fairer balance between the exigencies of tackling the economic crisis and the impact of drastic cuts on those affected, including pensioners, children, disabled persons and parents of newborn children.

Kristīne was an internationally esteemed scholar, frequent invited speaker at academic conferences and a valued member of numerous collaborative projects. The pre-eminent European constitutional law professor Leonard Besselink from the University of Amsterdam asked me to add the following note: ‘I will remember her gentle character, and acute sense and awareness of where rule of law, discrimination and fundamental rights could be involved where social or other policies seemed to ignore them’.

For the present book, Dr. Kristīne Krūma prepared a highly interesting national report ‘The Constitution of Latvia—A Bridge Between Traditions and Modernity’, in co-operation with Sandijs Statkus. In the Comparative Study that accompanies the book, it emerges that the Latvian Constitutional Court, along with its German and Portuguese counterparts, would appear to be the only courts in Europe to have taken a more proactive approach to finding a better balance and upholding fundamental rights and constitutional values in the context of the IMF and EU crisis measures and austerity programmes. In addition to its more well-known stance in protecting the legitimate expectations of individuals in the context of the austerity measures, the Latvian Constitutional Court notably underlined that taking international loans is an important matter of state and public life which must be decided by the legislator on the basis of the principle of separation of powers and that, furthermore, the government cannot restrict fundamental rights by assuming international obligations. In so doing, the Court protected an important continental European constitutional tradition that dates back to the nineteenth century but which has increasingly come under strain in EU and global governance.

In my view, Kristīne has left a highly valuable legacy to the legal thinking on constitutional values and the rule of law-based state in the context of transnational governance.

Everyone who knew Kristīne will be deeply saddened by her death. Our sincere condolences go to Kristīne's husband, Ivars, and daughter, Zane. According to Kristīne's last will, her ashes were scattered into the Baltic Sea.

Anneli Albi
Professor of European Law
University of Kent

Contents

Part I Introduction

Revisiting the Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance: Introduction to the Research Project	3
Anneli Albi and Samo Bardutzky

Questionnaire for the Constitutional Law Experts of the Research Project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’	39
Anneli Albi

Part II Political or Historical Constitutions: The Predominance of Parliament with the Absence of or a Weak Role for a Constitutional Court, and a Generic or ECHR-Based Bill of Rights

Europe’s Gift to the United Kingdom’s Unwritten Constitution – Juridification	83
Alison L. Young, Patrick Birkinshaw, Valsamis Mitsilegas and Theodora A. Christou

The Constitution of Malta: Reflections on New Mechanisms for Synchrony of Values in Different Levels of Governance	141
Peter G. Xuereb

The Netherlands: The Pragmatics of a Flexible, Europeanised Constitution	179
Leonard Besselink and Monica Claes

The Constitution of Luxembourg in the Context of EU and International Law as ‘Higher Law’	221
Jörg Gerkrath

The Role of the Danish Constitution in European and Transnational Governance	269
Helle Krunk and Trine Baumbach
The Constitution of Sweden and European Influences: The Changing Balance Between Democratic and Judicial Power	315
Joakim Nergelius
Finland: European Integration and International Human Rights Treaties as Sources of Domestic Constitutional Change and Dynamism	359
Tuomas Ojanen and Janne Salminen
Part III The Post-Totalitarian or Post-Authoritarian Constitutions of the ‘Old’ Member States: An Extensive Bill of Rights, Rule of Law Safeguards and Constitutional Review by a Constitutional Court
European Constitutionalism and the German Basic Law	407
Dieter Grimm, Mattias Wendel and Tobias Reinbacher
The Constitution of Italy: Axiological Continuity Between the Domestic and International Levels of Governance?	493
Giuseppe Martinico, Barbara Guastaferro and Oreste Pollicino
The Constitution of Spain: The Challenges for the Constitutional Order Under European and Global Governance	543
Joan Solanes Mullor and Aida Torres Pérez
Portugal: The Impact of European Integration and the Economic Crisis on the Identity of the Constitution	591
Francisco Pereira Coutinho and Nuno Piçarra
The Constitution of Greece: EU Membership Perspectives	641
Xenophon Contiades, Charalambos Papacharalambous and Christos Papastylianos
Part IV The Post-Totalitarian Constitutions of the ‘New’ Member States from the Post-Communist Area: A Detailed Bill of Rights, Rule of Law Safeguards and Constitutional Review Entrenched after the Recent Memory of Arbitrary Exercise of Power
The Future Mandate of the Constitution of Slovenia: A Potent Tradition Under Strain	687
Samo Bardutzky

The Role of the Polish Constitution (Pre-2016): Development of a Liberal Democracy in the European and International Context	745
Stanisław Biernat and Monika Kawczyńska
The Czech Republic: From a Euro-Friendly Approach of the Constitutional Court to Proclaiming a Court of Justice Judgment Ultra Vires	795
Zdeněk Kühn
Slovakia: Between Euro-Optimism and Euro-Concerns	835
Zuzana Vikarská and Michal Bobek
The Constitution of Estonia: The Unexpected Challenges of Unlimited Primacy of EU Law	887
Madis Ernits, Carri Ginter, Saale Laos, Marje Allikmets, Paloma Krõõt Tupay, René Väärk and Andra Laurand
The Constitution of Latvia – A Bridge Between Traditions and Modernity	951
Kristīne Krūma and Sandijs Statkus
The Constitutional Experience of Lithuania in the Context of European and Global Governance Challenges	997
Irmantas Jarukaitis and Gintaras Švedas
Romania – The Vagaries of International Grafts on Unsettled Constitutions	1047
Bogdan Iancu
The Bulgarian Constitutional Order, Supranational Constitutionalism and European Governance	1097
Evgeni Tanchev and Martin Belov
The Constitution of Croatia in the Perspective of European and Global Governance	1139
Iris Goldner Lang, Zlata Đurđević and Mislav Matajka
Part V Traditional or Hybrid Legal Constitutions: Combining Strict and Flexible Aspects, e.g. an Older or ECHR-Based Bill of Rights
The Constitution of France in the Context of EU and Transnational Law: An Ongoing Adjustment and Dialogue to Be Improved	1181
Laurence Burgorgue-Larsen, Pierre-Vincent Astresses and Véronique Bruck

The Belgian Constitution: The Efficacy Approach to European and Global Governance	1225
Patricia Popelier and Catherine Van de Heyning
The Constitution of Austria in International Constitutional Networks: Pluralism, Dialogues and Diversity	1271
Konrad Lachmayer
Ireland: The Constitution of Ireland and EU Law: The Complex Constitutional Debates of a Small Country	1323
Gerard Hogan
The Cypriot Constitution Under the Impact of EU Law: An Asymmetrical Formation	1373
Constantinos Kombos and Stéphanie Laulhé Shaelou
Part VI Specific Constitutional Developments
Introductory Editorial Note to the Hungarian Report: The Pre-2010 Rule of Law Achievements and the Post-2010 Illiberal Turn	1435
Anneli Albi
Hungary: Constitutional (R)evolution or Regression?	1439
Nóra Chronowski, Márton Varju, Petra Bárd and Gábor Sulyok
Part VII Reforming the National Constitution in View of Global Governance
Constitutionalisation and Democratisation of Foreign Affairs: The Case of Switzerland	1491
Raffaela Kunz and Anne Peters

Contributors

Anneli Albi Law School, University of Kent, Canterbury, UK

Marje Allikmets Supreme Court of Estonia, Tartu, Estonia

Pierre-Vincent Astresses Sorbonne Law School, University Paris 1 (Panthéon-Sorbonne), Paris, France

Petra Bárd Eötvös Loránd University, Faculty of Law, Budapest, Hungary; Central European University, Budapest, Hungary

Samo Bardutzky University of Ljubljana, Ljubljana, Slovenia

Trine Baumbach Faculty of Law, Centre for Public Regulation and Administration (CORA), University of Copenhagen, Copenhagen, Denmark

Martin Belov Faculty of Law, University of Sofia ‘St. Kliment Ohridski’, Sofia, Bulgaria

Leonard Besselink University of Amsterdam, Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Stanisław Biernat Jagiellonian University, Kraków, Poland

Patrick Birkinshaw University of Hull, Hull, UK

Michał Bobek College of Europe, Bruges, Belgium; Institute of European and Comparative Law, University of Oxford, Oxford, UK

Véronique Bruck Sorbonne Law School, University Paris 1 (Panthéon-Sorbonne), Paris, France

Laurence Burgorgue-Larsen Sorbonne Law School, University Paris 1 (Panthéon-Sorbonne), Paris, France

Theodora A. Christou Queen Mary University of London, London, UK

Nóra Chronowski National University of Public Service, Budapest, Hungary; Hungarian Academy of Sciences, Budapest, Hungary

Monica Claes Maastricht University, Maastricht, The Netherlands

Xenophon Contiades Panteion University, Athens, Greece

Francisco Pereira Coutinho Faculdade de Direito da Universidade Nova de Lisboa (NOVA School of Law), Lisbon, Portugal

Zlata Đurđević University of Zagreb, Zagreb, Croatia

Madis Ernits Faculty of Law, University of Tartu, Tartu, Estonia; Tartu Court of Appeal, Tartu, Estonia

Jörg Gerkrath University of Luxembourg, Luxembourg, Luxembourg

Carri Ginter Faculty of Law, University of Tartu, Tallinn, Estonia

Iris Goldner Lang University of Zagreb, Zagreb, Croatia

Dieter Grimm Humboldt University Berlin, Berlin, Germany; Wissenschaftskolleg zu Berlin (Institute for Advanced Study), Berlin, Germany

Barbara Guastaferro University of Naples ‘Federico II’, Naples, Italy; Durham Law School, Durham, England

Gerard Hogan European Court of Justice, Luxembourg, Luxembourg; formerly Court of Appeal of Ireland, Dublin, Ireland

Bogdan Iancu Faculty of Political Science, University of Bucharest, Bucharest, Romania

Irmantas Jarukaitis Court of Justice of the European Union, Luxembourg, Luxembourg; University of Vilnius, Vilnius, Lithuania

Monika Kawczyńska Jagiellonian University, Kraków, Poland

Constantinos Kombos Law Department, University of Cyprus, Nicosia, Cyprus

Kristīne Krūma Riga Graduate School of Law, Riga, Latvia

Helle Krunké Faculty of Law, Centre for European and Comparative Legal Studies (CECS), University of Copenhagen, Copenhagen, Denmark

Zdeněk Kühn Charles University Law School, Prague, Czech Republic; Supreme Administrative Court of the Czech Republic, Prague, Czech Republic

Raffaela Kunz Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law, Heidelberg, Germany; University of Basel, Basel, Switzerland

Konrad Lachmayer Sigmund Freud University Vienna, Vienna, Austria

Saale Laos Supreme Court of Estonia, Tartu, Estonia

Stéphanie Laulhé Shaelou School of Law, University of Central Lancashire, Pyla, Cyprus

- Andra Laurand Universität Hamburg, Hamburg, Germany
- Giuseppe Martinico Scuola Superiore Sant'Anna, Pisa, Italy
- Mislav Matajia University of Zagreb, Zagreb, Croatia
- Valsamis Mitsilegas Queen Mary University of London, London, UK
- Joakim Nergelius University of Örebro, Örebro, Sweden
- Tuomas Ojanen University of Helsinki, Helsinki, Finland
- Charalambos Papacharalambous Law Department, University of Cyprus, Nicosia, Cyprus
- Christos Papastilianos School of Law, University of Nicosia, Nicosia, Cyprus
- Anne Peters Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law, Heidelberg, Germany; University of Basel, Basel, Switzerland
- Nuno Piçarra Faculdade de Direito da Universidade Nova de Lisboa (NOVA School of Law), Lisbon, Portugal
- Oreste Pollicino Bocconi University, Milan, Italy
- Patricia Popelier University of Antwerp, Antwerp, Belgium
- Tobias Reinbacher Julius-Maximilians University of Würzburg, Würzburg, Germany
- Janne Salminen University of Turku, Turku, Finland
- Joan Solanes Mullor Pompeu Fabra University, Barcelona, Spain
- Sandijs Statkus Constitutional Court of Latvia, Riga, Latvia
- Gábor Sulyok Hungarian Academy of Sciences, Budapest, Hungary; Széchenyi István University, Győr, Hungary
- Gintaras Švedas University of Vilnius, Vilnius, Lithuania
- Evgeni Tanchev New Bulgarian University, Sofia, Bulgaria; Court of Justice of the European Union, Luxembourg, Luxembourg
- Aida Torres Pérez Pompeu Fabra University, Barcelona, Spain
- Paloma Krõõt Tupay Faculty of Law, University of Tartu, Tallinn, Estonia
- Catherine Van de Heyning University of Antwerp, Antwerp, Belgium
- Márton Varju Lendület-HPOPs Research Group, Centre for Social Sciences, Hungarian Academy of Sciences, Budapest, Hungary
- René Väärk Faculty of Law, University of Tartu, Tartu, Estonia

Zuzana Vikarská Masaryk University, Brno, Czech Republic; University of Oxford, Oxford, UK

Mattias Wendel Bielefeld University, Bielefeld, Germany

Peter G. Xuereb University of Malta, Msida, Malta; Court of Justice of the European Union, Luxembourg, Luxembourg

Alison L. Young Robinson College, University of Cambridge, Cambridge, UK

Abbreviations

ACTA	Anti-Counterfeiting Trade Agreement
AJIL	American Journal of International Law
Am. J. Comp. L.	American Journal of Comparative Law
AöR	Archiv des öffentlichen Rechts
CETA	Comprehensive Economic and Trade Agreement
Charter	Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union
CIA	Central Intelligence Agency
CJEU	Court of Justice of the European Union
CML Rev.	Common Market Law Review
Colum. J. Transnat'l L	Columbia Journal of Transnational Law
COSAC	Conference of Community and European Affairs
CPT	Committees of Parliaments of the EU
E.L.Rev.	European Committee for the Prevention of Torture
EAW	European Law Review
EBRD	European Arrest Warrant
EC	European Bank for Reconstruction and Development
ECB	European Community
ECHR	European Central Bank
ECJ	Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (European Convention on Human Rights)
ECLR	European Court of Justice
ECSC Treaty	European Competition Law Review
ECtHR	Treaty establishing the European Coal and Steel Community
	European Court of Human Rights

EDC Treaty	Treaty instituting the European Defence Community
EEA	European Economic Area
EEC Treaty	Treaty establishing the European Economic Community
EEC	European Economic Community
EFSF	European Financial Stability Facility
EFTA	European Free Trade Area
EIB	European Investment Bank
EJIL	European Journal of International Law
EJSL	European Journal of Social Law
ELJ	European Law Journal
ELTE Law Journal	Eötvös Loránd University Law Journal
EMU	European Monetary Union
EPL	European Public Law
ESM Treaty	Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism
ESM	European Stability Mechanism
EU	European Union
EuCLR	European Criminal Law Review
EuConst	European Constitutional Law Review
EuGRZ	Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitung
EUR	Euro
European Constitutional Treaty	Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe
Fiscal Compact	Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union
FRA	European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights
GATT	General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade
GDP	Gross Domestic Product
Harv. Law Rev.	Harvard Law Review
IASB	International Accounting Standards Board
ICANN	Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers
ICC	International Criminal Court
ICCPR	International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights
ICL Journal	The Vienna Journal of International Constitutional Law
ICLQ	International and Comparative Law Quarterly
ICON	International Journal of Constitutional Law
ILO	International Labour Organization
IMF	International Monetary Fund

IOSCO	International Organization of Securities Commissions
LJ	Lord Justice
LJIL	Leiden Journal of International Law
LQR	Law Quarterly Review
Maastricht Treaty	Treaty on European Union
MEP	Member of European Parliament
MJ	Maastricht Journal of European and Comparative Law
MLA	Mutual Legal Assistance
MLR	Modern Law Review
MoU	Memorandum of Understanding
MP	Member of Parliament
NATO	North Atlantic Treaty Organization
NGO	Non-governmental organisation
NJB	Nederlands Juristenblad
NSA	United States National Security Agency
NTBR	Nederlands Tijdschrift voor Burgerlijk Recht
NTER	Nederlands Tijdschrift voor Europees Recht
NTM	Nederlands Tijdschrift voor de Mensenrechten
OECD	Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development
OMT	Outright Monetary Transactions
PL	Public Law
RevIntlDroitComp	Revue internationale de droit comparé
SEA	Single European Act
SEK	Swedish krona
SIS	Schengen Information System
TEU	Treaty on European Union
TFEU	Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union
TSCG	Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union
TTIP	The Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership
UK	United Kingdom
UN	United Nations Organization
UNESCO	United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization
US	United States
USA	United States of America
USSR	Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
VAT	Value Added Tax
VCLT	Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties

WB	World Bank
WP IDEIR	Working Papers on European Law and Regional Integration
WTO	World Trade Organization
Yale L.J.	Yale Law Journal
YEL	Yearbook of European Law
ZSE	Zeitschrift für Staats- und Europawissenschaften

Part I

Introduction

Revisiting the Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance: Introduction to the Research Project

Anneli Albi and Samo Bardutzky

Abstract The Introduction provides an overview of the research project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’, which was funded by a five-year grant of 1.2 million EUR, awarded by the European Research Council (ERC). The research findings are published in the present two-volume book, containing national reports from twenty-eight EU Member States, and a twenty-ninth report – focusing on constitutional reforms related to global governance – from Switzerland. The reports are based on the project Questionnaire. The main themes are threefold: (a) constitutional amendments with a view to EU membership; (b) constitutional adjudication at the national level regarding EU measures such as the Data Retention Directive, European Arrest Warrant and ESM Treaty; and (c) novel challenges that are increasingly highlighted in the wider context of global governance (i.e. beyond the classic international treaties that advance human rights, peace and environmental protection) in relation to democratic participation, judicial review and the rule of law. Whilst in the mainstream discourse national constitutions have typically Anneli Albi is Professor of European Law, University of Kent, United Kingdom. e-mail: A.Albi@kent.ac.uk.

Samo Bardutzky is Assistant Professor of Constitutional Law at the University of Ljubljana, Slovenia; at the time of writing Research Associate, University of Kent, United Kingdom. e-mail: samo.bardutzky@pf.uni-lj.si.

The introductory chapter to the book was prepared as part of the research project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’, funded by European Research Council (ERC) grant No. 284316 (Project acronym: ConstEurGlobGov). The views are solely those of the authors, and cannot be attributed to the ERC or to the European Union. We would like to thank linguistic editor Siiri Aulik for her helpful assistance and comments. However, the views and any errors are solely those of the authors. Updates regarding the research project are available on the project website <https://research.kent.ac.uk/roc/>.

All websites noted in the Introduction were accessed on 21 March 2018.

A. Albi (✉)
Law School, University of Kent, Canterbury, UK
e-mail: A.Albi@kent.ac.uk

S. Bardutzky
University of Ljubljana, Ljubljana, Slovenia
e-mail: samo.bardutzky@pf.uni-lj.si

been approached from a top-down perspective and with a focus on sovereignty, the present bottom-up study allows for the perspective to be broadened by looking at how EU and transnational law have affected constitutional cultures in specific areas, such as fundamental rights protection, rule of law safeguards and constitutional review. The reports are accompanied by a linked book with a Comparative Study, which divides the constitutional systems of the EU Member States into three broader constitutional cultures and identifies overarching trends, changes and processes regarding constitutionalism. The comparative research findings are briefly outlined in the Introduction, inviting discussion on what ought to be the direction of travel for national, comparative European, EU and global constitutionalism. The project and the reports explore constitutional developments up until 2014–15 and do not address the more recent illiberal trends.

Keywords Comparative constitutional law and comparative European constitutional achievements • Political, post-totalitarian and traditional legal constitutions Constitutional amendments regarding EU integration • Fundamental/constitutional rights • The rule of law and the social democratic Rechtsstaat • European Arrest Warrant • Data Retention Directive • ESM Treaty, euro crisis, mutualisation of debt and democracy • Autonomous EU and global constitutionalism
The governance paradigm and neofunctionalism • Changing language of constitutionalism at the transnational level • Uniformity and diversity

1 The Reasons for Revisiting the Role of the National Constitutions

We are delighted to bring to the readers what in our view is a truly fascinating book, National Constitutions in European and Global Governance: Democracy, Rights, the Rule of Law – National Reports, with two combined volumes containing twenty-nine national reports, and which will shortly be accompanied by a linked comparative monograph that is hereinafter referred to as the 'Comparative Study'.¹ With the important transformations in the discourse on EU and global constitutionalism over the last few decades, we consider this to be an opportune moment to take a step back and revisit what is, or ought to be, the role of national constitutions in the new transnational legal environment. Indeed, the book comes at a time when both the European Union and the broader discourse on constitutionalism are at crossroads, with many important questions about their future directions at the centre of discussions.

Before the euro crisis, on the broader level of global constitutionalism, one leading scholarly article summarised the ongoing processes – primarily in relation to democratic legitimacy – as 'the end of constitutionalism as we know it'.² Another book brought together leading scholars of constitutional theory to examine issues relating to what in the title was rhetorically phrased as ‘The twilight of constitutionalism?’³ Some scholars have additionally noted the emergence of a thin, weak, procedural version of the rule of law, judicial review and democratic control in the context of European and global economic co-operation, with reduced opportunities for citizens to challenge public decisions.⁴ Furthermore, the extent to which the vocabulary of constitutionalism may have changed emerges from a recent influential monograph, Beyond Constitutionalism, by Nico Krisch, who calls for breaking away from and discarding the paradigm of constitutionalism in post-national law altogether, in favour of a paradigm of pluralism.⁵ Krisch has summarised what seems to be the prevailing view amongst EU and global governance lawyers: ‘the prospect of domestic constitutionalism shaping global governance or controlling its impact is very limited’, and the only hope would be ‘to turn the clock back and begin to withdraw from regional and international structures of cooperation’.⁶

¹ For the publication details of the Comparative Study, see below the text accompanying note 44.

² Kuo 2010.

An increasing number of scholars have begun to express heightened concerns about the decline of constitutionalism in the context of the euro crisis management. For example, Agustín Menéndez has documented the breadth of the European Union’s ‘constitutional mutation’,⁷ warning that ‘the breakdown of constitutional law will result in the mid- or long-run in the breakdown of the Social and Democratic Rechtsstaat'.⁸ Gunnar Beck cautions that the recent euro crisis adjudication in the European and national courts has allowed a bending of the rules to suit the executive to the extent that ‘the Rechtsstaat is effectively suspended’.⁹ The prevailing theories in Italy, as summarised by Andrea Simoncini, are that the euro crisis measures have accelerated a ‘decline of European constitutionalism’, with constitutions ‘destined to be obsolete’ in ‘the present age [that is] no longer the age of constitutions’.¹⁰ A small but growing number of scholars have even expressed concern about the EU having taken an authoritarian turn in the euro crisis governance. Christian Joerges and Maria Weimer have cautioned against the entrenchment of ‘authoritarian executive managerialism’¹¹ that ‘threatens to discredit the idea of the rule of law and its intrinsic linkages to democratic rule’.¹² Alexander Somek finds that in the EU’s euro crisis management, ‘formal legal constraints are bent in order to accommodate necessities’; he is concerned that this has led to

³ Dobner and Loughlin 2010, p. xi.

⁴ Harlow 2006, p. 195; Galera 2010, p. 302.

⁵ Krisch 2010, pp. 21, 26, 79, 303. On the changing vocabulary of constitutionalism, see Martinico 2015, pp. 5 et seq., and below notes 74 and 92, along with the accompanying text.

⁶ Krisch 2010, pp. 20–21.

⁷ Menéndez 2014.

⁸ Menéndez 2013, pp. 522–533, quote at p. 523.

⁹ Beck 2012, pp. 446–449, as cited in Bobek 2014, p. 423.

¹⁰ Simoncini 2013, pp. 158–159, 186.

¹¹ Joerges and Weimer 2012.

¹² Joerges 2014, p. 26.

‘authoritarian liberalism’ and ‘loss of political agency’, with the executive branch gaining power, as the constraints on governance are economic.¹³ Michael Wilkinson, also describing the EU crisis governance as ‘authoritarian liberalism’, has observed a process of ‘de-democratisation’, ‘de-legalisation’ and the overriding of Europe’s constitutional law with market teleology.¹⁴

However, what has hitherto received negligible attention is the way in which European constitutionalism and the European constitutional law discourse had already changed in the years preceding the financial crisis, during the ‘state of normalcy’. In particular, two key EU measures – the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision¹⁵ and the (eventually annulled) Data Retention Directive¹⁶ – are emblematic of broader changes in fundamental rights protection, constitutional review and judicial practice. In the following paragraphs, we will bring some examples of the issues explored in the national reports in the present two-volume book and in the accompanying Comparative Study. We consider the quotes cited to be both disconcerting – as they signal an uncertain fate for some of the historical achievements of European constitutionalism – as well as motivating for lawyers and scholars who may have had concerns about strain on well-established fundamental rights and values within individual national constitutional orders but without awareness that such concerns are often more widely shared.

By way of such examples, with regard to the European Arrest Warrant (EAW), the Italian report poignantly documents the way in which the national legislature was caught between criticism regarding infringements of fundamental rights in the context of the EAW and pressure from the European Commission, which was relentless in its calls for a faithful and complete implementation of the controversial Framework Decision. The report summarises concerns articulated by governmental committees and numerous legal scholars in Italy. Among the latter, the eminent constitutionalist Cesare Pinelli characterised the EAW as ‘the first serious threat of disablement of the constitutional guarantees to the right of liberty’.¹⁷ In Ireland, the automaticity involved in giving effect to foreign prosecutorial and judicial decisions has been a constant source of concern for the Irish courts, which the Irish report extensively documents with examples from case law.¹⁸ In Slovenia, scholarship has

¹³ Somek 2014, pp. 23–24.

¹⁴ Wilkinson 2016, pp. 29 et seq.

¹⁵ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

¹⁶ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

¹⁷ Pinelli 2012, p. 2399, as cited in the report on Italy by Martinico, Guastaferro and Pollicino in this book [The Constitution of Italy: Axiological Continuity Between the Domestic and International Levels of Governance?], Sect. 2.3.5.1.

¹⁸ The report on Ireland by Hogan in this book [Ireland: The Constitution of Ireland and EU Law: The Complex Constitutional Debates of a Small Country], Sects. 2.3.1.1 and 2.3.6.

warned that the ‘uncritical application of the principle of mutual recognition bears the danger of transforming the judge into a kind of a “ticking box” automaton checking only pre-established criteria and neglecting his/her duty of a critical assessment and safeguarding fundamental (constitutional) rights to the defendant’.¹⁹ From the Netherlands, concerns expressed by Judge Rob Blekxtoon from the District Court of Amsterdam are summarised in the accompanying Comparative Study. Judge Blekxtoon has written that his ‘quiet life was disturbed’ and he ‘began writing critical articles on the European Arrest Warrant in various journals and law reviews’, and that he even took the initiative in 2005 to publish the Handbook on the European Arrest Warrant in his effort to save ‘the well-established principles of extradition law which serve to safeguard the interests of the requested persons’.²⁰ Judge Blekxtoon additionally wrote that he was ‘very disappointed’, as he had been ‘told by people closely following the drafting of the EAW Framework Decision that the officials responsible for the outcome did not really want to listen to the experts present at the negotiations who knew what they were talking about’. It had been ‘more important to speed up matters for political reasons’.²¹

Turning to the Data Retention Directive, the Austrian report spells out a concern that also implicitly arises from several other reports – that a ‘taboo’ has been ‘broken’:

... Austrian society and the state did everything to escape this unconstitutional situation and finally succeeded. The damage, however, was already done. The taboo was broken and since [...] the annulment of the Directive], Austrian police authorities have increased political pressure for re-implementation.²²

The Slovenian report notes that if the Data Retention Directive had been a purely domestic legislative project, it would have probably met insurmountable constitutional and democratic obstacles. But as it originated in the EU, it became part of the law in a very different atmosphere.²³

Along with the above measures, the present edited volume predominantly focuses on the constitutional impact of the pre-financial crisis developments and the question of what is, or ought to be, the normal state of affairs in European constitutionalism.

It should be noted early on that the project and the reports explore constitutional developments up until 2014-15 and do not address Brexit or the more recent illiberal trends. The timeline of the project is explained below in Sect. 5.

¹⁹ Erbežnik 2014, p. 131, as cited in the report on Slovenia by Bardutzky in this book [The Future Mandate of the Constitution of Slovenia: A Potent Tradition Under Strain], Sect. 2.3.5.3.

²⁰ Blekxtoon 2009, p. V.

²¹ Ibid., p. V.

²² The report on Austria by Lachmayer in this book [The Constitution of Austria in International Constitutional Networks: Pluralism, Dialogues and Diversity], Sect. 2.12.

²³ The report on Slovenia by Bardutzky in this book [The Future Mandate of the Constitution of Slovenia: A Potent Tradition Under Strain], Sect. 2.13.

2 Overview of the ERC-Funded Research Project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’

The issues explored in the previous section are at the centre of the large-scale research project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’. The research project was funded by a five-year grant of 1.2 million EUR, awarded by the European Research Council (ERC) (Grant Agreement No. 284316; project acronym: ConstEurGlobGov), as part of the EU’s Seventh Framework Programme.

The present two-volume book contains the first main aspect of the research: the twenty-nine national reports prepared by leading constitutional law experts. The national reports were written on the basis of a Questionnaire, which was prepared by Professor Anneli Albi, the Principal Investigator of the research project, in consultation with Dr Samo Bardutzky, who worked for several years as the project’s Research Associate. The two volumes are accompanied by a linked, complementary book containing a Comparative Study. These aspects of the research project will be outlined in greater detail here and in the subsequent sections.

In designing the project’s Questionnaire and thereby also the general framework of the national reports, the idea was to bring together case law, doctrine and constitutional debates from the perspective of a multitude of national constitutional systems. We sought to provide viewpoints from national and comparative constitutional law in order to offer a fuller understanding of European constitutional law than what has prevailed in the mainstream English language European constitutional discourse, where the starting point has typically been the autonomous nature of EU constitutional law and its top-down reception in the Member States. Additionally, whilst existing comparative studies are typically based on a limited number of case studies, we committed to covering all of the twenty-eight Member States of the Union, and added a twenty-ninth report – focusing on constitutional reforms related to global governance – from Switzerland. The inclusion of smaller and what are often regarded as more peripheral countries has not only allowed the project to give a greater voice and visibility to the diverse constitutional systems, but has also unearthed numerous interesting and important broader trends, patterns and changes that warrant wider attention and discussion. Some of these will be summarised at the end of this introductory chapter.

The editors would like to express their greatest gratitude for the generous grant funding from the ERC, which has made it possible to carry out such comprehensive and systematic research on comparative constitutional law that otherwise quite possibly would never have been brought to life. The views and any errors are solely those of the editors and authors, and cannot be attributed to the European Research Council or to the European Union.

We are also pleased that this book has been published by T.M.C. Asser Press, which has a long-established tradition of publishing in the field of interaction between EU law and national legal systems. One key Asser Press book that has become part of a well-established canon in the field is the so-called ‘Red Book’, The Constitutional Impact of EU Enlargement at EU and National Level, which explores how national constitutions both in the older and new Member States have been adjusted to accommodate EU membership.²⁴ Another leading Asser Press publication that sparked interest in the research that follows is the above-mentioned Handbook on the European Arrest Warrant, edited by Judge Blekxtoon.²⁵

3 The Questionnaire

The national reports have been structured and written on the basis of the above-mentioned Questionnaire, which is reproduced in the next chapter. The Questionnaire invited constitutional law experts to consider national case law, doctrine and policy documents in three main areas, and was divided into three parts.

Part 1 explored how constitutions reflect the transfer of powers from domestic to European and global institutions, and thus to what extent they provide legitimacy to the shift in the exercise of power to the transnational level and retain their social relevance. Part 2 of the Questionnaire looked beyond the question of transfer of sovereignty, which has been the predominant focus of the discourse so far, and asked for reflection on constitutional values that have a continued importance in the contemporary globalising and pluralist legal setting, such as the protection of fundamental rights, the rule of law and constitutional review. The experts were tasked with outlining constitutional court judgments that tackle the protection of these rights and values in transnational judicial dialogues, e.g. regarding the Data Retention Directive, the European Arrest Warrant, the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) and European Commission and International Monetary Fund (IMF) economic crisis/austerity measures. The Questionnaire also invited assessment of the responsiveness of the European Court of Justice (CJEU) with regard to these rights and values, as well as assessment of the standard of protection at supranational level. Finally, Part 3 sought to explore the novel challenges that are increasingly highlighted in the wider context of global governance (i.e. beyond the classic international treaties that advance human rights, peace and environmental protection) in relation to legitimacy, democratic control, accountability and the rule of law.

It should be noted that the Questionnaire was prepared in 2013–2014 when critical scholarly and public discussion about EU and transnational governance was rare and very limited.

²⁴ Kellermann et al. 2001.

²⁵ Blekxtoon 2005; cf. also Blekxtoon 2009, p. V, supra n. 20 and the accompanying text.

4 The Constitutional Law Experts

The constitutional experts from whom the reports were commissioned are leading scholars in the field of constitutional law or European constitutional law, with an extensive record of publications in the field of interaction between national and EU constitutional law (in English, given the overall nature of the book, which inevitably had to take priority over our commitment to bring other voices and languages to the fore). In some countries, two experts were invited as joint experts, while in other cases, the main constitutional expert opted to invite one or more research collaborators, given the extensive scope of the Questionnaire. In particular, we are pleased that several scholars specialising in the field of criminal law kindly joined the project to cover the questions relating to the European Arrest Warrant. The main constitutional experts are listed in the Preface. We are honoured that a number of distinguished, current and former judges of constitutional courts and other highest courts have joined us here as scholarly colleagues. In the intervening years, we were honoured to observe that several colleagues were subsequently appointed as Judge or Advocate General to the European Court of Justice. The editors are delighted to be able to present the full, collected reports which, thanks to countless hours of thorough, patient and perceptive research by more than sixty colleagues, make for rich and thought-provoking reading.

In the framework of the project, the Network of Constitutional Experts was established in the hope that it would provide a more long-term structure and forum for deliberating perspectives from comparative constitutional law in the context of transnational governance.

The project questions and draft reports were discussed at a work-in-progress seminar ‘Assessing the Responsiveness of the EU to Constitutional Rights: Data Retention, Arrest Warrants and Beyond’, held at the University of Kent on 28–29 August 2014. In addition to contributions from project experts, we were honoured to have presentations from a number of guest speakers who are distinguished judges and/or scholars working in related areas. The themes covered included: cases regarding the EU Data Retention Directive (Brun-Otto Bryde, Jiří Zemanek and Gerard Hogan); case law on social rights affected by the IMF austerity measures (Kristīne Krūma); the EU’s democratic responsiveness (Damian Chalmers); the shift towards authoritarian executive managerialism in euro crisis governance (Christian Joerges); rights protection issues in the context of the European Arrest Warrant (Valsamis Mitsilegas, Esther Herlin-Karnell); and the constitutional issues surrounding the Trans-Atlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP) (Harm Schepel).

5 The National Reports and the Timeline of the Project

The structure of the national reports follows the three parts of the Questionnaire.²⁶ In principle, the authors were expected to follow the numbering of the questions from the Questionnaire, so that the reader would be able to compare the situation in a number of jurisdictions regarding a particular issue. To a great extent, this is indeed the case. Nevertheless, as the accounts of the individual constitutional systems differ, the editors did not insist on the numbering and, in many instances, the answers to questions have been merged. In the editorial process, we aimed to ensure that the reports would, as far as possible, be written in a way that would allow for them to be read independently without reference to the Questionnaire.

Whilst the reports are relatively lengthy – in the range of 19,000–23,000 words – they are also simultaneously not long enough, as they essentially provide but a glimpse of both the constitutional culture as well as of the constitutional doctrine and debates in the individual areas explored. Experts were not expected to answer all of the questions in an equal level of detail; they were invited to focus on issues of particular relevance for the Member State in question. Where the national discussions were considered particularly to be of broader, Europe-wide interest, an editorial decision was made to accommodate a longer report (e.g. Germany, Cyprus and Estonia).

In terms of the timeline, it should be noted that the majority of the reports were submitted during 2015, with some having been received in 2014 and some later in 2016. The Comparative Study was written in 2016–2019. The publication of the national reports was delayed, as the comparative analysis was initially meant to take the form of a shorter comparative report to be included in the present volumes. However, as the analysis grew in length, depth and breadth, it was eventually decided that it would be published as a separate but linked book.

It is important to note that the aim of the project was to take stock of and identify the challenges posed to the Member States' constitutional law up until 2014–2015; the reports and the Comparative Study do not include more recent developments. This book therefore does not cover the Brexit referendum (although a brief post scriptum note has been added to the British report), France's state of emergency regime after the November 2015 terrorist attacks in Paris or the developments in Poland from autumn 2015 that prompted the European Commission to act under the EU rule of law framework. The book also does not explore the recent, more wide-spread turn towards illiberal constitutional trends, at least beyond the national report on Hungary.

Instead, the project explores the deeper comparative European constitutional culture and the approach to the rule of law as it had been consolidated before the financial crisis and before the other more recent crises and illiberal developments. The project examines the common and diverse elements in the comparative European constitutional landscape, and how these have been affected or changed by the ongoing transition to autonomous EU constitutional law and global governance. In the accompanying Comparative Study, the comparative European constitutional achievements prior to the recent illiberal turn are collated and documented in greater detail, in the hope that these will serve as guidance for a quest to restore the values of European constitutionalism that have been eroded, and help shield the values that remain.

²⁶ With the exception of the report on Switzerland (see below).

6 The Structure of the Two-Volume Book: The Categorisation and Typology of Europe's National Constitutional Cultures

The national reports are structured in the present two-volume book on the basis of a somewhat revised typology of Europe's national constitutions, which is developed and explained in greater detail in the linked Comparative Study. As was once remarked by Dieter Grimm, former judge of the German Federal Constitutional Court and one of the national constitutional experts for Germany, '[t]ypologies are not ends in themselves. They help to answer questions' depending on the 'research interests that a scholar of constitutionalism pursues'.²⁷ The basis for the typology that underlies the structure of the present book is the dichotomy between historical constitutions on the one hand and revolutionary constitutions on the other, as developed by Leonard Besselink and outlined in the Questionnaire.²⁸ A similar division of Europe's national constitutions has also been suggested by other scholars, at times with somewhat different terminology. For example, Cesare Pinelli writes about 'evolutionary' or incrementally evolving constitutions, 'artificial' constitutionalism that prevailed on the European continent since the 1789 Revolution, and the more recent formation of a constitutional tradition in continental Europe that was based on the collapse of totalitarian regimes.²⁹ Within the present research project, the categorisation of the constitutional systems became somewhat more nuanced as the national reports were gradually received and as the broad and diverse landscape of national constitutions in Europe began to reveal itself to the editors of the book. As will be explained briefly in this introductory chapter, the categorisation of the constitutional systems is closely linked to the essence of the research question pursued by this project, which is how EU law and global governance have affected the different national constitutional cultures. Whilst in the mainstream EU discourse, national constitutions have typically been approached as a relatively monolith set of instruments that primarily protect sovereignty, the present bottom-up study allows for the perspective to be broadened by looking at the effects of EU law in specific areas of constitutional culture, such as fundamental rights protection, rule of law safeguards and constitutional review.

²⁷ Grimm 2012, pp. 98–99.

²⁸ See Besselink 2006, p. 113 et seq., and as summarised in the Questionnaire [Questionnaire for the Constitutional Law Experts of the Research Project 'The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance'], Sect. 1.1.1 in this book.

²⁹ Pinelli 2016, p. 258 and, on the same page, footnotes 4 and 5, with references.

Following the above revised typology, in the first category, as explained in greater detail in the accompanying Comparative Study, are the political or historical constitutions. These constitutional systems are characterised by the predominance of parliament and the absence of or a weak role for a constitutional court, and by a generic bill of rights that in some cases is historically older or based on the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). Additionally, the broader orientation of these constitutions is to incrementally incorporate changes ex post facto rather than to pre-determine the acceptable margins of behaviour for institutions in advance. In this category, we have placed the United Kingdom, Malta, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, and the Nordic countries Sweden, Denmark and Finland. Emblematically, the national report on the Netherlands is entitled ‘The Pragmatics of a Flexible, Europeanised Constitution’. It emerges from the report that the Constitution, which dates back to 1814–15, bans constitutional review of Acts of Parliament, and constitutional rights are not justiciable upon the judicial review of Acts, with the ECHR and the EU Charter being applied instead.³⁰ The national reports on these constitutional cultures are placed in the opening part of the book (Part II), after the introductory chapters (Part I). The Constitution of Switzerland, which is explored in a separate chapter, also belongs to this type of constitutional culture.

This category is followed by what in Besselink’s dichotomy are referred to as ‘revolutionary’ constitutions, which have a strongly legal character and are enforceable by courts (Parts III–V of the book). In general constitutional theory, this type are also referred to as ‘legal’ constitutions. The majority of the constitutions of the Member States of the European Union can be considered as ‘legal’ or ‘revolutionary’ in character. However, as explained in greater detail in the Comparative Study, in this project the category of ‘legal’ or ‘revolutionary’ constitutions is divided into two sub-categories, which would seem more expressive in terms of conveying the constitutional impact of the EU constitutional order on the different constitutional cultures. The new proposed sub-categories are:

- (1) post-totalitarian or post-authoritarian constitutions; and
- (2) traditional or hybrid legal constitutions, which have strict elements combined with historical or flexible, less prescriptive aspects.³¹

The central features of the constitutions in the first of these sub-categories – the post-totalitarian or post-authoritarian constitutions – stand in clearest contrast to the features that characterise the political or historical constitutions. In the post-totalitarian constitutional cultures, which embody the ‘Never again’ ethos, constitutional review

³⁰ The report on The Netherlands by Besselink and Claes in this book [The Netherlands: The Pragmatics of a Flexible, Europeanised Constitution].

³¹ For an explanation of this categorisation, see a brief explanation below in this section, and a fuller explanation with references to literature in the accompanying Comparative Study.

by constitutional courts plays a central role, the constitutions contain extensive and detailed bills of rights, and the constitutions and constitutional courts pre-determine the margins of constitutionally acceptable political behaviour. The post-totalitarian or post-authoritarian constitutions are presented in two groups, and are referred to hereinafter as the ‘post-totalitarian’ constitutions; the differences between totalitarian and authoritarian regimes will be explained in greater detail in the Comparative Study. The first group of post-totalitarian constitutions are those adopted after the atrocities of the Second World War in Germany and Italy, and those adopted after the end of the dictatorships of the 1970s in Spain, Portugal and Greece (Part III of the book). The second group are the post-communist constitutions of Central and Eastern Europe, adopted or brought back to life in the 1990s in the aftermath of the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989. Here we study the constitutions of the countries that became the ‘new’ Member States: Poland, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Slovenia, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Bulgaria and Croatia (Part IV of the book). These countries share a history of arbitrary exercise of power under socialist and communist regimes. Accordingly, their constitutions have entrenched strict constitutional safeguards as a reaction to the human rights violations and abuses of public power experienced by the people living under the pre-1990s regimes.³²

In fact, the eminent constitutionalist Cesare Pinelli regards the above constitutions as representing a broader continental European constitutional tradition, for the understanding of which the collapse of the totalitarian regimes in these countries is essential.³³ Prompted by a sense that the understanding of this tradition is fading in the mainstream English language EU constitutional discourse and that its classic elements are often brushed aside as representative of old-fashioned protection of sovereignty or of idiosyncratic national constitutional identity, the accompanying Comparative Study embarks on identifying a list of twelve distinctive features of the post-totalitarian type of constitution. These features include the following. Whereas in the political or historical type of constitutions parliament is supreme as an expression of the people’s will in line with the influences of the Enlightenment and the French Revolution, in the countries that experienced totalitarianism, the constitutional design had to go further. Here the constitutional design proceeds from the understanding that democracy is not always capable of ensuring rights and the rule of law, and thus they have been removed from the realm of politics and are ensured by constitutional courts.³⁴ Furthermore, some core provisions (typically regarding the democratic, social state governed by the rule of law; core fundamental rights) are unamendable or subject to a special, stringent amendment procedure, often involving a referendum. With the exception of Greece, the constitutional systems of all post-totalitarian countries feature a strong, centralised constitutional court,³⁵ and constitutional review is typically rigorous, with a statistically high rate of annulment of legislation, in particular in cases of so-called abstract review. These courts often follow the intellectual leadership of the German Constitutional Court, and have cemented the legal character of the constitutional safeguards provided in the bills of rights and the clauses protecting the Rechtsstaat or stato di diritto, i.e. ‘the state governed by the rule of law’. Crucially, these constitutions embody a value order centred on fundamental rights and based on human dignity; they typically start with extensive, detailed, directly applicable and justiciable chapters on fundamental rights and rule of law safeguards. Indeed, the editors were surprised to find that the respective constitutional provisions – especially as regards safeguards for deprivation of liberty, access to courts and the protection of the home, privacy and secrecy of communications – are often worded in a way that is notably more stringent and/or offers more extensive protection than the relatively generic provisions set out in the ECHR and the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights. The respective provisions are written out in the national reports for ease of reference. These constitutions typically also include extensive provisions on social rights and/or the social state, which form part of the concept of human dignity. This reflects the recognition that a life lived in dignity and with freedom of choice requires that a basic level of material needs is met; based on historical lessons, the social state dimension aims to avoid the root causes of the emergence of authoritarian regimes, which are economic insecurity and dependence.³⁶ The overall aim of the constitutional design was to avoid ‘a social situation that would [give] rise to mass support for another militant, anti-democratic, populist movement’.³⁷ The Comparative Study additionally documents the extensive and often constitutionally codified protection of the rule of law and its different sub-principles (e.g. parliamentary reservation of law; rules on publication of laws; the rules governing the limitation of rights; the principles of legal certainty; legitimate expectations and non-retroactivity) in this constitutional tradition.

³² The historical background and the central tenets of the post-communist constitutionalism are explained in particular in the report on the Czech Republic by Kühn with reference to the respective judgments of the Czech Constitutional Court [The Czech Republic: From a Euro-Friendly Approach of the Constitutional Court to Proclaiming a Court of Justice Judgment Ultra Vires], Sects. 1.1.1 and 2.1.3, and in the report on Poland (pre-2016) by Biernat and Kawczyńska [The Role of the Polish Constitution \(Pre-2016\): Development of a Liberal Democracy in the European and International Context], Sects. 1.1.1–1.1.2, in this book.

³³ Pinelli 2016, p. 258.

³⁴ See e.g. Pinelli 2016, pp. 264–266, and Somek 2014, pp. 15 et seq., 84–85 and 90–95.

The second sub-category of ‘legal’ or ‘revolutionary’ constitutions was – after considerable reflection – designated as ‘traditional or hybrid legal constitutions’, and these are placed in a separate part of the book (Part V). The reference to ‘legal’ constitutions aims to signify that these constitutions have a legal character, are binding in nature and enforceable in courts, and set the broad, constitutionally acceptable margins for the political institutions and civil servants in advance. However, they also contain more historical, political, or otherwise flexible or less prescriptive elements. The constitutional systems placed in this category are those of France, Belgium, Ireland, Austria and Cyprus. The constitutions of the first four of these countries have historical bills of rights with limited justiciability (e.g.

³⁵ In Estonia, this function is carried out by the Constitutional Review Chamber of the Supreme Court.

³⁶ For historical background, see e.g. Somek 2014, pp. 10–13, 85–86 and 155.

³⁷ Somek 2014, pp. 85–86.

France's 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, and Austria's 1867 Basic Law on the General Rights of Nationals), and the protection of fundamental rights is predominantly reliant on the ECHR. In France and Belgium, the mandate for constitutional review was initially confined to guaranteeing respect for the constitutional separation of powers scheme,³⁸ and thus full human rights based review is more recent.³⁹ In France and Ireland, the approach to judicial review is regarded as deferent to the governing institutions, as observed in the respective national reports. The constitutions date back to the pre-World War II period in Belgium (1831), Austria (1920) and Ireland (1937). The Cypriot Constitution is described in the Cyprus report as 'a hybrid model' due to special circumstances in the country.⁴⁰ The ways in which these constitutional systems are less strict and extensive in protection than the post-totalitarian constitutions are outlined in greater detail in the Comparative Study.

Hungary has been placed in a separate part of the book (Part VI), and an editorial note has been added to the report. In the recent past, Hungary's Constitution was in the category of post-totalitarian constitutions, and its Constitutional Court was widely acclaimed for its activist approach to constitutional review and the protection of fundamental rights and rule of law safeguards. The changes that have occurred since 2010 and which have been widely described as a turn to illiberal constitutionalism are explored in the national report, entitled 'Constitutional (R) evolution or Regression?'.⁴¹

The national report on Poland, a country which has recently followed the trend of illiberal constitutional reforms started by Hungary, was completed before these developments began to unfold. For the purposes of this study, therefore, the Polish Constitution is considered to be in the category of post-totalitarian constitutions in the 'new' Member States. It is notable that based on the case law of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal cited in the Polish report,⁴² it is evident that at least up until

³⁸ De Visser 2014, p. 7.

³⁹ In France, fundamental rights did not become justiciable for individuals until 2010, following a constitutional amendment of 2008 whereby ex post control of constitutionality was introduced into French constitutional law, allowing individuals to challenge the constitutionality of legislative provisions that violate their rights. The Belgian Constitutional Court was established relatively lately, in the 1980s – first as the 'Court of Arbitration' – with the task of adjudicating federal competences. Fundamental rights review of legislation was formally introduced in 2003. See, respectively, the report on France by Burgorgue-Larsen, Astresses and Bruck [The Constitution of France in the Context of EU and Transnational Law: An Ongoing Adjustment and Dialogue to Be Improved], and the report on Belgium by Popelier and Van de Heyning [The Belgian Constitution: The Efficacy Approach to European and Global Governance], in this book.

⁴⁰ See the report on Cyprus by Kombos and Laulhé Shaelou in this book [The Cypriot Constitution Under the Impact of EU Law: An Asymmetrical Formation].

⁴¹ The report on Hungary by Chronowski, Varju, Bárd and Sulyok in this book [Hungary: Constitutional \(R\)evolution or Regression?].

⁴² See the report on Poland by Biernat and Kawczyńska in this book [The Role of the Polish Constitution \(Pre-2016\): Development of a Liberal Democracy in the European and International Context].

that time (autumn 2015), the Polish Constitutional Tribunal had taken one of the most stringent approaches to the protection of the post-totalitarian understanding of constitutionalism and the rule of law, including in the context of EU law. This deserves wider awareness, as in the mainstream European constitutional discourse, many of the respective cases of the Polish Constitutional Tribunal (pre-2016) have in a somewhat reductionist and even unfair manner been portrayed as representative of a Eurosceptic and sovereignty-protective approach.

The final part of the book (Part VII) contains the report from Switzerland, which is the only country covered by this research project that is not a member of the EU. Experts from Switzerland were invited to participate because of the important constitutional reforms adopted in Switzerland to guarantee parliamentary participation in global governance issues as well as a role for direct democracy in these matters.⁴³ It emerges from the other reports that the Swiss reforms, by and large and comparably speaking, can be considered both pioneering as well as extensive. In other countries, international law has traditionally remained a matter of one-way reception. It is thus hoped that the Swiss experience will be of considerable wider interest, and will foster thinking and discussion elsewhere.

7 The Comparative Study: Outlining the Broader Trends and Processes Emerging from the National Reports

The wealth of material collated in the national reports is synthesised in a comparative monograph written by the Principal Investigator of the project, Anneli Albi. This will be published as an accompanying, linked book entitled National Constitutions in European and Global Governance: Democracy, Rights, the Rule of Law. A Comparative Study (T.M.C. Asser Press, 2019), and is referred to in the present book as the 'Comparative Study'.⁴⁴ The Comparative Study outlines a number of important issues and challenges that are shared by a significant (but not always overlapping) range of Member States. Furthermore, it identifies broader, overarching trends and processes that at times surprised the editors and in our view warrant wider attention.

By way of examples, these include the shift in a large number of Member States from the rule of parliamentary reservation of law to the use of governmental decrees when implementing EU law, including – somewhat strikingly – when limiting fundamental rights and imposing sanctions.

⁴³ See the report on Switzerland by Kunz and Peters in this book [Constitutionalisation and Democratisation of Foreign Affairs: The Case of Switzerland].

⁴⁴ Readers writing a book review are kindly asked to obtain a copy of both books – the two-volume book with the national reports as well as the Comparative Study – from the publisher, and to review these together.

The existence of a wider, endemic strain on constitutional values emerged most clearly in relation to the near-automatic process of extraditions under the European Arrest Warrant system. Numerous ombudspersons, NGOs and associations of defence lawyers, courts and especially lower instance courts, a considerable number of dissenting judges in the highest national courts, as well as other institutions and scholars – especially scholars in the field of criminal law – in a large number of Member States have expressed significant concerns about the presumption of innocence and other defence rights, and about the absence of judicial review in extradition cases. Judicial review is not allowed even in cases where serious fundamental rights concerns have been expressed in the context of deprivation of personal liberty. Strikingly, in several reports it was observed that the European Commission, in its critical evaluation reports, has required constitutional and legislative amendments to remove protective provisions in the Member States (see especially the accounts in the reports on Cyprus, Croatia, Ireland and Italy).

Regarding the EU Data Retention Directive, whilst in the mainstream European discourse the constitutional challenges have widely been portrayed as cases representing national constitutional identity, it emerged that privacy and protection of home and correspondence have ‘deep roots’ in the continental European constitutional tradition.⁴⁵ They have especially been subjected to heightened protection and safeguards in the post-totalitarian constitutions, given the historical experience of these countries with pervasive state surveillance. Although the Directive was eventually annulled by the CJEU on the second round, the far-reaching consequences have been difficult to undo. A ‘taboo’ was broken, as observed above in the Austrian report. As with the EAW, there has been a spillover from the originally intended use for serious crime into other areas. Additionally, in a development representative of a wider trend, a uniform, autonomous, self-referential standard was set by the CJEU in *Digital Rights Ireland*⁴⁶ on the basis of Arts. 7 (privacy) and 8 (data protection) of the EU Charter combined with the principle of proportionality. The more stringent approach and the diversity of the rights protected under many national constitutions and by many national constitutional courts were by and large displaced.

By way of examples from other areas, in the approach to the rules on publication of laws, for post-totalitarian constitutional systems there has been a shift through CJEU case law from the rule that an unpublished law is void and non-existent ab initio/ex tunc to the ‘valid but not enforceable against individuals’ approach that applies in France and Belgium. Similarly, with regard to the post-totalitarian constitutional systems, the Comparative Study documents significant changes in the approach to limitation of fundamental rights and in the interpretation of the principles of legitimate expectations and non-retroactivity as well as the principle of proportionality through CJEU case law. Additionally, several national reports mentioned strains on legal certainty and on the clarity and 'quality of law'.⁴⁷ A further host of profound changes emerged in a chapter exploring the 'relocation of judicial review from constitutional courts to the European Court of Justice' in increasingly wide areas of law. These changes are discussed in the Comparative Study in the light of emerging literature where concerns have been expressed about the displacement or exclusion of constitutional courts and national highest courts, along with their well-established case law.⁴⁸

⁴⁵ Hogan 2014, pp. 162–164. See also the report on Ireland by Hogan in this book [Ireland: The Constitution of Ireland and EU Law: The Complex Constitutional Debates of a Small Country], Sect. 2.10.1.

⁴⁶ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

Another area where widespread disquiet emerged concerns the severe and prolonged erosion of the social state dimension of Europe's post-totalitarian and some traditional legal constitutions through the EU and/or IMF euro crisis measures, e.g. by curtailing social rights (as well as funding for social benefits by redirecting state funds e.g. to the ESM) and reducing the protection of workers.⁴⁹ The strain on the social state is most clearly evident in the reports on Portugal, Greece, Latvia, Romania and Spain.⁵⁰ The euro crisis developments are further explored from the perspective of constitutionalisation as constitutional entrenchment – through the Treaties – of a certain economic order. As part of this broader theme, the Comparative Study explores constitutional issues relating to the ⁴⁷ This issue is explored report on Finland by Ojanen and Salminen [Finland: European Integration and International Human Rights Treaties as Sources of Domestic Constitutional Change and Dynamism], the report on Cyprus by Kombos and Laulhé Shaelou [The Cypriot Constitution Under the Impact of EU Law: An Asymmetrical Formation] and the report on Denmark by Krunk and Baumbach [The Role of the Danish Constitution in European and Transnational Governance] in this book. For specific guidance that implementation of EU law ought not to weaken the 'quality of law', see the work of the Finnish Parliament's Constitutional Law Committee, as outlined in the report on Finland by Ojanen and Salminen in this book [Finland: European Integration and International Human Rights Treaties as Sources of Domestic Constitutional Change and Dynamism], Sect. 2.3.6.

⁴⁸ See e.g. Komárek 2014, pp. 16 et seq.

⁴⁹ Whilst the observations regarding the social welfare dimension are also relevant e.g. with regard to the Nordic countries, in the political type of constitutions, social rights tend to be regulated at the legislative level rather than being entrenched through the text of the constitution. As it was seen above (see the text accompanying links to n. 36 and 37 respectively), historically, in the case of Germany and subsequently other post-totalitarian constitutions, protection of the social state was prompted by the lessons that the root causes of the rise of authoritarian and totalitarian governments are economic insecurity and dependence. This historical observation would seem to have significant contemporary relevance, but has perhaps been unduly neglected in the prevailing discourse where recent illiberal developments have predominantly been attributed somewhat generically to populism and nationalism.

⁵⁰ See the report on Portugal by Pereira Coutinho and Piçarra [Portugal: The Impact of European Integration and the Economic Crisis on the Identity of the Constitution], the report on Greece by Contiades, Papacharalambous and Papastylianou [The Constitution of Greece: EU Membership Perspectives], the report on Latvia by Krūma and Statkus [The Constitution of Latvia – A Bridge Between Traditions and Modernity], the report on Romania by Iancu [Romania – The Vagaries of International Grafts on Unsettled Constitutions], and the report on Spain by Solanes Mullor and Torres Pérez [The Constitution of Spain: The Challenges for the Constitutional Order Under European and Global Governance] in this book.

privatisation of public services and the entrenchment of independent regulatory agencies in the process of market liberalisation, which are mentioned in several national reports.⁵¹

The revised typology of constitutional systems that was briefly outlined in the preceding section is relevant for the understanding of the broader patterns that emerge in the Comparative Study in terms of whether EU law has given rise to constitutional conflicts in individual Member States. It should be noted that the study here does not concern areas where rights have been advanced – typically in an activist manner – in fields of EU law such as free movement, non-discrimination, gender equality and consumer protection, which have been extensively researched in the existing literature.⁵² In general terms – with of course exceptions – a pattern can be discerned whereby EU law has strengthened the protection of fundamental rights and the general principles of law and has expanded judicial review in countries with a political or historical constitutional system. However, this strengthening has often come at the cost of a reduction in the priority of parliamentary and democratic processes. These developments are perhaps most evocatively captured in the titles of the national reports from the UK ('Europe's Gift to the United Kingdom's Unwritten Constitution – Juridification'⁵³) and Sweden ('The Constitution of Sweden and European Influences: The Changing Balance between Democratic and Judicial Power'⁵⁴). At the same time, EU law has caused strain with regard to the standards previously established by the constitutional courts in the Member States with a post-totalitarian constitutional culture, both in ⁵¹ See the report on Spain by Solanes Mullor and Torres Pérez [The Constitution of Spain: The Challenges for the Constitutional Order Under European and Global Governance], the report on Portugal by Pereira Coutinho and Piçarra [Portugal: The Impact of European Integration and the Economic Crisis on the Identity of the Constitution], the report on Belgium by Popelier and Van de Heyning [The Belgian Constitution: The Efficacy Approach to European and Global Governance], the report on Slovenia by Bardutzky [The Future Mandate of the Constitution of Slovenia: A Potent Tradition Under Strain], the report on Austria by Lachmayer [The Constitution of Austria in International Constitutional Networks: Pluralism, Dialogues and Diversity], the report on Croatia by Goldner Lang, Đurđević and Matajka [The Constitution of Croatia in the Perspective of European and Global Governance], the report on Finland by Ojanen and Salminen [Finland: European Integration and International Human Rights Treaties as Sources of Domestic Constitutional Change and Dynamism], and the report on Hungary by Chronowski, Varju, Bárd and Sulyok [Hungary: Constitutional (R)evolution or Regression?] in this book.

⁵² This so-called 'double standards' issue is explained in greater detail in the Questionnaire in this book [Questionnaire for the Constitutional Law Experts of the Research Project 'The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance'] (Introduction to Sect. 2 and Sect. 2.6.1). See also Coppel and O'Neill 1992, pp. 670 et seq.

⁵³ See the report on the United Kingdom by Young, Birkinshaw, Mitsilegas and Christou in this book [Europe's Gift to the United Kingdom's Unwritten Constitution – Juridification].

⁵⁴ The report on Sweden by Nergelius in this book [The Constitution of Sweden and European Influences: The Changing Balance Between Democratic and Judicial Power].

Western Europe and in Central-Eastern Europe.⁵⁵ This is conveyed in the clearest terms in the title of the Slovenian report ('The Future Mandate of the Constitution of Slovenia: A Potent Tradition Under Strain'⁵⁶). This finding has a further important dimension in the light of other observations in the national reports – which we initially noted with interest and subsequently with an increasing sense of unease – concerning the numerous direct and indirect ways in which EU law and the CJEU case law have led to the uniformisation and homogenisation of the Member States' constitutional law. This includes the transition to a uniform ECHR/EU Charter standard in increasingly wider areas of law, including where this entails downgrading national standards of protection.

Another broader pattern in terms of correlation between the type of constitution and the effects of EU law emerged in relation to constitutional amendments regarding European integration. In broad lines, this could be based on a distinction between an 'efficacy approach' and a 'legitimacy approach', which is drawn in the Belgian report on the basis of Patricia Popelier's study of EU clauses in the national constitutions.⁵⁷ As summarised in the Belgian report:

Two main approaches can be discerned: an 'efficacy approach', which is predominantly occupied by the concern for efficient through-put of EU law, and a 'legitimacy approach', which is specifically concerned with providing legitimacy to inflowing EU law. If a legitimacy approach is adopted, ideally, (a) the transfer of powers is submitted to special procedural and/or substantive conditions, (b) the precedence of EU law over the constitution is contested and (c) constitutional or supreme courts play the role of watchdogs over the constitution, assuming the power to ultimately delineate competences. If an efficacy approach is adopted, (a) the transfer of powers to the EU is allowed without special formal conditions, (b) the precedence of EU law over national law, including the constitution, is uncontested and (c) the judicial review of EU laws and treaties is constrained.⁵⁸

Popelier's study observes that in Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg, an efficacy approach clearly dominates, with Germany being on the other side of the spectrum.⁵⁹ This research finding is confirmed in the Comparative Study.⁶⁰

⁵⁵ It is important to note that these conclusions specifically concern the rights explored in the project Questionnaire. In other areas, e.g. as regards prison conditions, media pluralism, the strength of civil society and the actual level of social welfare entitlements, the countries with a political or historical constitutional culture often have some of the highest standards in Europe.

⁵⁶ The report on Slovenia by Bardutzky in this book [The Future Mandate of the Constitution of Slovenia: A Potent Tradition Under Strain].

⁵⁷ Popelier 2014, as summarised in the report on Belgium by Popelier and Van de Heyning in this book [The Belgian Constitution: The Efficacy Approach to European and Global Governance], Sect. 1.5.3.

⁵⁸ The report on Belgium by Popelier and Van de Heyning in this book [The Belgian Constitution: The Efficacy Approach to European and Global Governance], Sect. 1.5.3.

⁵⁹ Popelier 2014, p. 316.

⁶⁰ See also, for example, the extensive constitutional conditions and adjudication outlined in the report on Germany by Grimm, Wendel and Reinbacher [European Constitutionalism and the German Basic Law], and the observations about the absence of constitutional conflicts in the report

Additionally, it emerges that a solution akin to the ‘efficacy’ approach has also been adopted in Ireland, Cyprus and Estonia, whereas the ‘legitimacy’ approach prevails in most of the post-totalitarian constitutional cultures. The tensions that an ‘efficacy’-based approach presents to a post-totalitarian constitution that has been influenced by the German Constitution are perhaps most evident in the Estonian report. What might appear to be the ideal solution from the perspective of the EU legal order – suspending conflicting constitutional provisions in order to ensure the full supremacy and effectiveness of EU law – has led to widespread concerns amongst Estonian lawyers about negating the hitherto binding, enforceable and rights-protective Constitution, as well as to practical difficulties in constitutional adjudication by the Supreme Court.⁶¹

Whilst the working title of the book was ‘The Role of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’, the above findings led us to expand the title and add ‘Democracy, Fundamental Rights, the Rule of Law’. With this subtitle, we sought to draw attention to the fact that these values have in fact been central to the national constitutions since the Enlightenment, and that these values have also provided the key, expressly worded conditions governing the transfer of powers to the supranational level, especially in the constitutions of Germany, Slovenia and Portugal, as well as in the case law of many constitutional courts. This is important to bear in mind, given that in the mainstream European constitutional discourse, the national constitutions have primarily come to be associated with a somewhat old-fashioned protection of sovereignty or, more recently, national constitutional identity. Sovereignty and the assessment of Euro-friendliness or Euroscepticism have also been the prevailing lens of assessment in the scholarly literature on constitutional courts, where unduly harsh and reductionist language has often been used with regard to those constitutional courts that have sought to retain some degree of constitutional review or uphold constitutional values in the context of EU law.⁶² In the Comparative Study, it is submitted that many of the constitutional rights and values that have come under strain in the context of EU law are in fact comparative European constitutional achievements,⁶³ which in several aspects quite possibly represent the most advanced constitutionally codified and judicially protected fundamental rights, social rights and rule of law safeguards in on Luxembourg by Gerkrath [The Constitution of Luxembourg in the Context of EU and International Law as ‘Higher Law’], both in this book.

⁶¹ For a summary of the discourse, see the report on Estonia by Ernits, Ginter, Laos et al. in this book [The Constitution of Estonia: The Unexpected Challenges of Unlimited Primacy of EU Law] in this book, Sects. 1.2.3, 1.2.4, 1.5.3, 1.3.4, 2.3, 2.7 and 2.8.

⁶² These trends in the scholarly literature have been documented with references in Albi 2015a, Sect. I and Albi 2015b, Sect. VIII.

⁶³ The expression ‘constitutional achievements’ is borrowed from Dieter Grimm, who uses it more generally in relation to the democracy and rule of law elements in modern constitutions (Grimm 2012, p. 104). See also Somek (2014, p. 10), who regards especially the constitutions based on the German model as representing the emancipation of constitutionalism – see below n. 99 and the accompanying text.

the world. However, the understanding of these has started to fade, as will be noted below.

At this juncture, it should be underlined that throughout the project, EU and international treaties and rules that protect human rights, ensure peace or enhance environmental protection are regarded as part of the constitutional achievements. Indeed, especially the ECHR has a constitutional or semi-constitutional status in the internal legal order of a large number of the countries studied. However, the material synthesised would seem to indicate a need for a more differentiated and nuanced approach in discussions on the domestic constitutional reception, on the one hand, of the above type of treaties and, on the other hand, of treaties and instruments that may have adverse effects on rights and constitutional values or that significantly curtail democracy beyond the constitutionally entrenched values. Some examples of such adverse effects from EU law were brought earlier in this section (e.g. the European Arrest Warrant and the Data Retention Directive). Regarding some constitutionally problematic examples from international and global law, the reader is invited to take a look at the following accounts in the national reports: the cases regarding IMF and/or European Commission instruments whereby already subsistence-level pensions and social benefits were drastically cut and social rights were curtailed along with the principle of legitimate expectations (reports on Latvia, Portugal, Greece and Romania; see also more generally the report on Spain); the adjudication of international extradition treaties (reports on Poland, the UK, Cyprus, Portugal, France); issues around access to judicial review regarding measures implementing targeted sanctions against individuals under the UN anti-terrorist resolutions and blacklists (reports on Belgium, Switzerland and the UK); the question whether parliamentary ratification and/or implementation by parliamentary law is needed for international instruments such as extradition treaties, UN sanctions targeting individuals, and IMF memorandums of understanding and loan agreements (reports on Latvia, Finland, Ireland and Belgium); the role of private actors in global governance, including their unpublished but binding technical standards (reports on the Netherlands, Estonia and Austria); transparency and access to documents in the context of international co-operation (the reports on Sweden and Finland); and constitutional issues regarding the effects of international investment arbitration treaties (reports on Romania and the UK).

Regarding the material in the national reports, in addition to outlining the domestic case law and legal discussion, we also invited the constitutional law experts to express their own views on how some of the older and more recent points of debate in the EU constitutional and judicial dialogues could be addressed. For example, we asked for the experts' assessments relating to the provision of higher standards of protection, if hitherto so provided under the national constitution, in the context of the ongoing debate regarding Art. 53 of the EU Charter. What role do the experts see for the common constitutional traditions? Would there be value in bringing national constitutional concerns to the CJEU and other European institutions and, if so, what avenues ought to be used? And, ultimately, how do the constitutional scholars see the role of national constitutions in European and global governance? The editors are immensely grateful to the project experts for joining us in constructively thinking about the new challenges to constitutional law posed by transnational governance. Their key observations are summarised in the Comparative Study, along with some specific policy recommendations.

The Comparative Study concludes with broader observations about an ongoing, gradual process of transition from the paradigm of (comparative) constitutional and public law to the paradigm of governance that prevails in EU law and large parts of transnational law.⁶⁴ The governance paradigm is predicated on a different underlying logic, which in the main seems to have emanated from the neofunctionalist thinking that underlies much of the European integration and transnationalisation processes and discourses. Other underlying theoretical constructs of the governance paradigm include e.g. the '[c]ontemporary delegation theory, with its emphasis on principal, agents, and dilemmas of agency control', which 'is an adaptation of concepts of contract law to the political world', including concepts from fiduciary constitutionalism, the law of trusts and other private law concepts.⁶⁵ It is not easy to reconcile these theories and classic constitutionalism. For example, the core tenets of neofunctionalism that drive supranational governance are integration-through-law, spillover, 'never let a good crisis go to waste', and the mobilisation of and instrumental use of law, of courts, institutions, political, bureaucratic and business elites, scholarship, as well as individuals and their rights towards a gradual shift of law, authority and loyalty from the national to the supranational level.⁶⁶ Whilst this has led to many progressive developments with lasting, beneficial changes, there is a structural flaw in neofunctionalist constitutionalism, in that it views national constitutional law as inherently inferior for the simple reason that it is national and based on a sovereign state. There has been a blind spot to and fading understanding of the comparative European constitutional achievements, which in many respects may quite possibly be the most advanced in the world, as noted above. A good example to illustrate the difference between the neofunctionalist and the comparative European constitutional thinking is the commentary on the Pupino case.⁶⁷ Lawyers specialising in EU law widely regard it as a milestone ‘constitutional’ case, as it extended indirect effect, effectiveness and loyal co-operation to the then third pillar. Lawyers specialising in the field of constitutional law and criminal law, however, point out that the case concerned application in the field of criminal trials of a framework decision that had not yet been implemented in national law and that had furthermore been adopted at the ministerial level by the EU Council. These aspects raise profound concerns from the point of view of the classic values protected in Europe’s national constitutions, such as the principles of the rule of law, including maximum certainty in criminal law, clearly determined provisions and democratic legitimisation by parliamentary law.⁶⁸

⁶⁴ Some aspects of such a paradigm change from constitutional and public law to governance have been identified by the following scholars: Joana Mendes (with regard to transnational technical regulatory regimes with norms that acquire the status of EU legal acts and also acquire supremacy through incorporation into EU law without traditional avenues for participation (Mendes 2014, p. 371)); Alexander Somek (in EU governance, constraints on public power have become economic (Somek 2014, pp. 23–24; see also above n. 13 and the accompanying text)) and Agustín Menéndez (conceptual innovation in legal research (Menéndez 2014, p. 140; see below n. 85 and the accompanying text)).

⁶⁵ Cf. e.g. Sweet and Brunell 2013, p. 67, with further references, including the influential writings of Giandomenico Majone.

⁶⁶ For an overview of the core tenets of neofunctionalism, see e.g. De Búrca 2005, pp. 316 et seq. and Sweet 2012. The Principal Investigator would like to acknowledge that the draft chapters of Maris Moks' Ph.D thesis 'Guardianship of the Constitution versus the Expectations of the European Integration: Judicial Review of the Euro-crisis Management' (Hertie School of Governance in Berlin), which contained an extensive literature review, greatly helped her to formulate the broader observation about a change from the constitutional law mindset to a neofunctionalist mindset, especially as regards the changing role of courts towards agents of integration in the neofunctionalist theory.

A tentative list of foundational changes in the transition from the classic constitutional law paradigm to the governance paradigm is compiled in the Comparative Study. Examples of such foundational changes include: a broader shift from constitutions to the Treaties as the normative point of reference and thereby to a market-oriented order or – in the euro crisis governance – to the exercise of public power simply on the basis of general economic exigencies; a shift from constitutional and rule of law requirements to the prioritisation of effectiveness, policy objectives and functionality; a changing understanding of the role of courts and constitutional courts in the neofunctionalist literature and in practice; a change away from the liberal separation of powers to a new autonomous system; an approach to fundamental rights whereby fundamental rights are treated as restrictions to economic freedoms and are ultimately subordinated to them as well as to the imperatives of uniformity and effectiveness; a changing understanding of the rule of law; the disappearance of constitutional law as higher law; and the manifold changes at the EU and national level towards executive governance, especially the gradual phasing out of national level democracy and the chain of legitimacy between public power and a territorial community of people. The severe curtailment of parliamentary democracy and control over the budget due to the very large financial liabilities undertaken by virtue of the ESM Treaty have been subject to particularly acute constitutional debates and challenges in Germany, Estonia, Ireland, Austria, Poland and to some extent in Lithuania, as documented in the respective national reports. In addition, the issue of parliamentary control over large-scale state guarantees was also at stake in the EFSF (European Financial Stability Facility) case before the Slovenian Constitutional Court.

⁶⁷ Case C-105/03 Pupino [2005] ECR I-05285.

⁶⁸ For a critical assessment of the constitutional significance of Pupino for EU law, see Herlin-Karnell 2007, pp. 1151 and 1154. More generally on the uneasy fit between EU criminal law and classic values in European criminal law and constitutional law, see the concerns of fourteen scholars in the ‘Manifesto on the European Criminal Policy’ (2009) Zeitschrift für Internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik, Issue 12, 70–716, at 715, available online at <http://www.crimpol.eu/>; Schünemann 2007, p. 227; Walsh 2009, pp. 5–34.

A more general foundational change may be, as a number of leading political scientists have observed, that the governance model is ‘post-political’ or ‘unpolitical’, and in fact oriented towards constraining dissent.⁶⁹ The picture that emerges from the national reports does little to alleviate this concern. For one, there is a near-absence of formal structures for invoking national constitutional grounds at the EU level, at least beyond the subsidiarity and proportionality arguments for national parliaments and for the national constitutional identity ground in judicial proceedings. Indeed, the Maltese expert makes the very commendable suggestion to extend the ex ante yellow card mechanism of national parliaments to a fuller monitoring procedure, which would include essential constitutional concerns beyond subsidiarity and proportionality.⁷⁰ The severely constrained scope for national level democratic protest or even for constitutional review by constitutional courts is perhaps most compellingly evident in the proceedings in which the European Commission threatened or imposed fines on Sweden and Germany for delays in implementing the Data Retention Directive, explored in the respective national reports. The scope for demonstrations and protest has been further reduced in different ways by CJEU rulings in cases such as Schmidberger, Viking Line and Laval,⁷¹ as well as by the European Commission and IMF economic conditionality measures that require the curtailing of trade union rights.⁷² In general, we observed a near-absence of debate in a considerable number of countries⁷³ regarding EU measures that in many other Member States had raised heightened concerns and extensive discussion about deficiencies in rights protection.

The Comparative Study further explores the corresponding changes in constitutional thinking and constitutional vocabulary, which have increasingly become the default, new baseline for constitutionalism, especially for the younger generations of scholars and lawyers. Indeed, one point of added value of the national reports is that many of them contain detailed documentation of the clashes between the classic constitutional thinking and the governance-oriented mindset.

⁶⁹ For references to literature, see Bouza Garcia 2017, pp. 348, 349, 340.

⁷⁰ The report on Malta by Xuereb in this book [The Constitution of Malta: Reflections on New Mechanisms for Synchrony of Values in Different Levels of Governance], Sects. 2.12.3 and 2.13.4.

⁷¹ Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659; Case C-438/05 The International Transport Workers' Federation and The Finnish Seamen's Union [2007] ECR I-10779; Case C-341/05 Laval un Partneri [2007] ECR I-11767.

⁷² On the latter, see especially report on Spain by Solanes Mullor and Torres Pérez [The Constitution of Spain: The Challenges for the Constitutional Order Under European and Global Governance], and the report on Greece by Contiades, Papacharalambous and Papastylianos [The Constitution of Greece: EU Membership Perspectives], in this book.

⁷³ The absence of debate is in particular mentioned in the report on Lithuania by Jarukaitis and Švedas [The Constitutional Experience of Lithuania in the Context of European and Global Governance Challenges], the report on Slovakia by Vikarská and Bobek [Slovakia: Between Euro-Optimism and Euro-Concerns], and the report on Bulgaria by Tanchev and Belov [The Bulgarian Constitutional Order, Supranational Constitutionalism and European Governance] in this book.

A careful reader may well observe that the former tends to remain on the dissenting or losing side (e.g. the grounds and arguments used by dissenting judges, traditional constitutional litigants such as ombudspersons, defence lawyers' associations and minority groups of MPs). Different aspects of the changes in the constitutional language in the transnational context are more specifically explored in the reports on Italy, Romania and Germany.⁷⁴ On a more general level, the fact that the language of constitutionalism in transnational law has little in common with the world of comparative constitutional law has perceptively been explained on the basis of an extensive literature review by Peer Zumbansen.⁷⁵ Transnational constitutionalisation depicts the dynamic forces of constantly newly emerging functional and specialised fora of law-making.⁷⁶ The risk, according to Zumbansen, is that the focus on limiting or placing constraints on governmental power, which is the central tenet of 'traditional constitutionalism', has been displaced.⁷⁷ The focus is on the autonomy of the emerging global legal order from claims from the nation state, and there has been 'erosion of institutionalized, accountable exercises' of political power.⁷⁸

Whilst scholarly research has hitherto predominantly focused on the benefits of EU and transnational constitutionalism, the present study looks at the risks arising from the way these ongoing processes have changed the application of the classic European understanding of constitutionalism and of the concept of the rule of law. It seeks to invite discussion on the shift to the governance paradigm, along with the merits and demerits of the gradual transition to autonomous EU constitutional law, and on the optimal balance between striving toward uniformisation and retaining the diversity of the national constitutional cultures. Discussion on the profound changes would also seem particularly timely, as the EU is moving towards the mutualisation of debt and ultimately to the EU raising its own revenue that would in the last resort be backed by the Member States,⁷⁹ and whereby individual Member ⁷⁴ See the report on Italy by Martinico, Guastaferro and Pollicino [The Constitution of Italy: Axiological Continuity Between the Domestic and International Levels of Governance?], the report on Romania by Iancu [Romania – The Vagaries of International Grafts on Unsettled Constitutions], and the report on Germany by Grimm, Wendel and Reinbacher [European Constitutionalism and the German Basic Law], in this book. See also notes 5 and 92 and the accompanying text. The report on Romania [Romania – The Vagaries of International Grafts on Unsettled Constitutions], additionally, makes perceptive observations about the change of the constitutional language in the quasi-constitutionalisation of the EU anti-corruption conditionality in Romania.

⁷⁵ Zumbansen 2012, p. 47, see also pp. 31 and 38.

⁷⁶ Ibid., p. 47, with further references.

⁷⁷ Zumbansen 2012, p. 38, with further references.

⁷⁸ Ibid., p. 47.

⁷⁹ The European Commission sees 'a step-by-step, policy-by-policy basis' advancement towards the latter as the ultimate goal according to its Communication 'A blueprint for a deep and genuine monetary union. Launching a European Debate' (COM 2012 777 final/2 30.11.2012, http://ec.europa.eu/archives/commission_2010-2014/president/news/archives/2012/11/pdf/blueprint_en.pdf). According to the Commission Blueprint, if the guarantee is claimed by creditors, accountability through national parliaments is no longer relevant and shifts to the European Parliament.

States and their parliaments would no longer be in control of their financial liabilities. This may well mark a significant transformative turning point – and one of no return – for classic European constitutionalism.

8 The Broader Importance of the Project for the Future Direction of Travel for National, Comparative European, EU and Global Constitutionalism

We hope that the readers will come to agree that such thinking and discussion about the future direction of travel for European constitutionalism is of real and pressing importance. In the past, EU law has been developed primarily in a top-down, autonomous, self-referential manner from the perspective of the needs and priorities of the EU legal order. On the one hand, European integration has brought important, lasting benefits, which include peace and stability, relative prosperity, freedom of movement and the broadening of important opportunities for individuals for greater self-realisation and enriched horizons. Indeed, all of the national reports in the present book strongly emphasise the beneficial changes and impacts resulting from EU law, as well as the importance of Euro-friendly interpretation of EU law by courts and of the (now predominantly extensive) national constitutional provisions that ensure openness to European and international law. European integration also entails valuable external mechanisms of control vis-à-vis national institutions, the need for which has been illustrated clearly e.g. by the developments towards an illiberal regime in Hungary and, since autumn 2015, in Poland. On the other hand, the increasing concerns with regard to governance at the EU level as well as the maturing of the EU legal order in general, make it the right time to consider a greater inclusion of perspectives that are more accommodating of national and comparative constitutional values and concerns, in a two-way⁸⁰ or multi-directional, pluralist process. The national reports in the present book are an essential precondition for such a multi-directional process, as they provide a wider audience with an overview of national case law and constitutional debates, of which there has typically been little awareness in the mainstream English language European constitutional discourse. Indeed, a recent BBC article raised the question ‘[a]re we “losing knowledge” because of the growing dominance of English as the language of higher education and research?’⁸¹

One could add that indirect mutualisation of debt liabilities through asset purchases by the European Central Bank programme and the need for a continued chain of democratic legitimacy between the people and the exercise of public power were also the underlying issues in the OMT case from the German Constitutional Court, BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2728/13 et al., OMT, order of 14 Jan. 2014, BVerfGE 134, 366.

⁸⁰ Mutanen 2015, pp. 387, 392–393.

⁸¹ Pickles, M. (20 January 2016) Could the dominance of English harm global scholarship? BBC News. <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/business-35282235>.

Upon reading the national reports, the editors developed a sense that this concern is of direct relevance to constitutional law in terms of losing constitutional knowledge more generally. We even had a sense that perhaps national constitutions and national constitutional law are being displaced and written out of mainstream English language European constitutional narratives. Historical accounts have documented the considerable investment by the European Commission in founding specialised EU law journals and university centres, with the aim of shifting EU studies away from a comparative analysis of national laws (which would aim to identify common principles) to the study of the ‘specificity’ of EU law, focusing on the relationships between EU law (and the CJEU) and national law (and courts).⁸² On a broader level, Anne Lise Kjaer has raised a concern about the far-reaching impact of the changes in the discourse:

[W]hat will happen to the mutually divergent national languages and cultures of law when independency and autonomy of a common European law are presumed by an increasing number of European lawyers; when they accept the European Courts as legitimate interpreters of a supranational and transnational European law and involve themselves in an increasingly self-referential European legal discourse with lawyers from other European countries; and when communicating about law and speaking the law are no longer conducted in divergent national legal languages, but in a Europeanized legal language with no reference to the domestic laws of the Member States [emphasis added].⁸³

Sharing the broader concern expressed by Kjaer with regard to the disappearance of comparative law, the editors more specifically have a sense that in the quest for new epistemic communities to build the autonomous, self-referential and new constitutional order of the European Union,⁸⁴ there is a substantial risk that some of the distinctively and uniquely valuable comparative European achievements in constitutionalism are being left behind and lost. Whilst this general impression had been based on reading mainstream English language European constitutional law literature, the Principal Investigator, since having started to write and present papers on the above topics, has been struck by the significant and growing number of researchers, doctoral students and even eminent, agenda-setting EU law scholars who have informally mentioned that they have never heard of what Pinelli above described as a continental European constitutional tradition that is predicated on post-totalitarian constitutional safeguards.

Thus, when taking a look at the national reports, the reader is invited to consider the broader question of what ought to be the direction of travel for national, comparative European, EU and global constitutionalism. Whilst ‘EU’, ‘global’ and ‘post-national’ constitutionalism may sound inherently more progressive, advanced and appealing, on a closer look they also entail an element of vagueness and even hollowness if compared e.g. to the post-totalitarian constitutional tradition in continental Europe noted above, at the essence of which are extensive, precise, constitutionally codified and judicially protected fundamental rights and rule of law safeguards. There is a danger of conflating European constitutional law with EU constitutional law, which is in fact very different. The distinction, however, has increasingly become muddled and blurred. Indeed, in the large volume of books and articles written in this field, one can discern that the expression ‘European Constitutional Law’ has already predominantly come to denote EU constitutional law, often with no mention of Europe’s national constitutions. Similarly, the term ‘Europeanisation’ has predominantly come to denote transition to autonomous EU law and to the EU governance model, rather than referring to the classic comparative European constitutional values.

⁸² Vauchez 2009, pp. 20–21.

⁸³ Kjaer 2015, p. 98.

⁸⁴ The shift from comparative European constitutional law to the autonomous EU constitutional law in the mainstream discourse has been explored and documented in greater detail in Albi 2015b, Sect. VIII.

The difference between EU constitutional law and continental European constitutional law has also been observed by a growing number of scholars. For example, Agustín Menéndez has pointed out that ‘European legal studies have been very keen ... on conceptual innovation’, which includes a switch to ‘governance’ amongst other concepts. He finds that it may be a suitable time to ‘reconstruct European constitutional law with the help of “classical” democratic constitutional theory, as developed for decades in national Social and Democratic Rechtsstaats’.⁸⁵ Menéndez regards ‘the collective of national democratic constitutions’ in Europe as ‘[t]he deep constitution of the European Union, the ultimate normative foundation of the whole edifice of the Union’, rather than the EU Treaties. He finds that ‘[w]hen integration starts going against the key normative content of the national constitutions, it is time to start using such constitutions ... as the ultimate source of the yardstick of European constitutionality’.⁸⁶ Nicola Lupo and Giovanni Piccirilli note the ‘progressive decline of the formal categories that dominated the public law literature in the past two centuries’ in the context of CJEU as well as ECHR case law. They highlight the risks to democracy, fundamental rights and to the legality principle, and express concern that there has been a shift towards the ‘lowest common denominator’ of the legality principle.⁸⁷ Lupo and Piccirilli have put forward a plea that the parliamentary process in the first instance, and the ordinary and constitutional courts as a second step in the process, ought to promote and protect fundamental rights ‘in order to restore the legality principle to its proper place’.⁸⁸ In a similar vein, the Principal Investigator has elsewhere outlined the procedural, formal, thin nature of EU constitutionalism where the keywords are supremacy, uniformity, direct effect, autonomy, effectiveness and trust. She has propounded the concept of ‘substantive co-operative constitutionalism’, in which the aim would be to uphold the established standard of protection of fundamental rights, the rule of law and other constitutional values, and also to retain the ⁸⁵ Menéndez 2014, p. 140.

⁸⁶ Menéndez 2013, pp. 525–526 (references omitted). Emphasis added.

⁸⁷ Lupo and Piccirilli 2015, pp. 55–56.

⁸⁸ Lupo and Piccirilli 2015, pp. 76–77.

diversity of national constitutional orders.⁸⁹ Jan Komárek has cautioned against transition to autonomous EU fundamental rights protection, especially in the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice, as EU constitutional law rests on the foundations of a market integration project and not on the post-war liberal constitutionalism that underlies Europe's national constitutions.⁹⁰ Susana Galera has written that 'Europeans share a well-defined doctrine about the European understanding of rule-of-law requirements, initiated in 1949 by the Council of Europe', whereas in the EU context, 'persistent gaps in the EU judicial review system and the different understanding of what judicial independence or division of powers means ... represent a serious divergence affecting values and principles that have been applied for a long time on the European institutional scene'.⁹¹ Amongst the national reports, the Italian report points out that the idea of constitutionalism propounded by leading international scholars 'does not readily correspond to what constitutional lawyers mean by the same word', and is 'conceived as an autonomous concept of international law rather than a concept derived by analogy from the domestic conception of constitutionalism'.⁹² The report underlines the importance of parallelism and axiological continuity between the values inspiring the domestic activity of the Italian Republic and those inspiring the external dimension (cf. the title 'The Constitution of Italy: Axiological Continuity between the Domestic and International Levels of Governance?').

It should be noted that another extensive part of the discourse associates European constitutionalism with the ECHR. Although the ECHR is beyond the scope of the present study, it is important to underline that the ECHR is regarded here, as explained above, as part of the well-established achievements of constitutionalism at the international level. Indeed, it emerges from the reports that the ECHR (and other international human rights treaties) has a constitutional status in the internal legal order in a large number of the countries studied, it is extensively and routinely referred to by the constitutional courts and other national courts, and the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg (ECtHR) have widely had extensive rights-advancing, transformative effects. However, what is often overlooked is that the ECHR sets the minimum floor of protection for forty-seven countries in the wider European area, and the ECtHR grants the states a considerable margin of appreciation. Whilst the ECHR is the main domestic instrument of fundamental rights protection especially in several political/historical and traditional legal constitutional systems, in many others – especially among the post-totalitarian constitutional systems – the text of the constitution and the constitutional court have provided a higher and more extensive level of protection, also simply to a much greater range of fundamental

⁸⁹ Albi 2015b, Sect. VIII ff.

⁹⁰ Komárek 2014, pp. 12–13, with references to further literature.

⁹¹ Galera 2010, p. 302.

⁹² The report on Italy by Martinico, Guastaferro and Pollicino in this book [The Constitution of Italy: Axiological Continuity Between the Domestic and International Levels of Governance?], Sect. 3.1.4, some references omitted. The changing vocabulary of constitutionalism is further explored in Martinico 2015. On this, see also references to national reports and literature supra in notes 5, 74 and 75, and the accompanying text.

rights than those listed in the ECHR. By way of some typical examples, unlike most continental European systems, the ECHR does not require the adoption of a parliamentary statute for the limitation of fundamental rights, and it does not contain a list of social rights. Through EU law, however, the ECHR standard has in many areas become the maximum standard rather than the minimum floor.

In this context, the Comparative Study also seeks to draw attention to the centre-periphery dimension in the mainstream English language EU and transnational constitutional discourse. That is, the leading, influential, agenda-setting scholars and experts often come from what in terms of the scholarly discourse could be regarded as the ‘centre’ countries, many of which – especially the Netherlands, Belgium, the UK and Ireland – have a political/historical or traditional legal type of constitutional system, where fundamental rights protection is mainly based on the ECHR and the constitutional system is regarded as more pragmatic or ‘efficacy’-oriented, as seen above. Additionally, considerable influence is held by US constitutional scholarship. Notably, in the euro crisis management, studies by economic actors have expressly called for political reform in ‘political systems around the periphery’ – especially Portugal, Spain, Italy and Greece – where the ‘shortcomings’ of the political and constitutional legacy include ‘weak executives’, ‘constitutional protection of labour rights’ and ‘the right to protest’.⁹³

Whilst one limitation of the present book is its Euro-centric approach, the above questions are also more broadly relevant to what might be described as ‘global constitutionalism’ and ‘global rule of law reform’. One of their elements is the above-mentioned shift to autonomous transnational and global standards and rules, with displacement of institutional accountability mechanisms as well as of standards of fundamental rights protection and constitutional review that have been established in traditional, state-based constitutionalism.

There is a further influence on the direction of travel that is relevant to global constitutionalism and global rule of law reform: the constitutional law of and constitutional thinking in the United States. The differences between the US and European (comparative) constitutionalism have been explored by leading comparative law scholars in a book edited by Georg Nolte under the auspices of the Venice Commission (the Council of Europe’s Commission for Democracy through Law).⁹⁴ Nolte observes that while focus during the Cold War era was on the similarities between US and European constitutional thought, in the present-day processes of globalisation and European constitutionalism – in the meaning of EU integration – attention on their differences has gained in importance. EU constitutionalism, as Nolte notes, ‘seems to embody something which is both more removed from the “people” and more vague than national constitutional law’, with clear-cut differences starting to disappear and ‘characteristic constitutionalisms’ being transformed.⁹⁵ Some concrete, profound differences between US and continental European constitutionalism include the following: the minimalistic approach to the role of the state and to fundamental and social rights in the US; the continuing debate in the US over the legitimacy of judicial review of legislation, which is known as the ‘counter-majoritarian difficulty’; and the different approach to separation of powers, e.g. as regards the extensive role of independent agencies.⁹⁶ Profound differences between the continental European tradition and US constitutionalism are found in the approach to courts and defence rights in criminal law and the understanding of human dignity, liberty, and the rule of law in this context. The continental European approach to constitutionalism and the rule of law places a strong emphasis on manifold safeguards for access to courts, and on the presumption of innocence and defence rights. By contrast, in the US, about 95% of criminal cases are resolved by the system of plea-bargaining, which entails out-of-court negotiations where there is no trial at all. This system has been explored in greater detail by Fair Trials International, which has expressed concern that the US has promoted the global spread of out-of-court plea-bargaining as part of the global rule of law reform.⁹⁷

⁹³ Mackie et al. 2013, pp. 12–13. Emphasis added.

⁹⁴ Nolte 2003a.

An understanding of the differences in the US constitutional system is crucial to the future direction of travel for European countries because the United States has become the main point of comparison for the EU constitutional order, and this has also impacted substantive European constitutional law. For example, in the Comparative Study, concern is expressed that through the EU mutual recognition system, the direction of travel has been towards removing judicial review in the country of residence in cross-border criminal as well as civil and administrative cases, and generally towards a more punitive and repressive criminal law. The Comparative Study also considers the influence of US thinking about state and social rights on the IMF and European Commission conditionality and austerity programmes. More broadly, we share the concern of Matej Avbelj that the dominant constitutional narrative, which equates the constitutionalisation of the EU with US-style federalism, has been transplanted in a misconceived way that is unsuited to the European constitutional landscape and may be a cause of the present malfunctioning of European integration. Hence, we support Avbelj’s call that ‘work must begin’ on the EU’s ‘own, genuine and authentic constitutional theory’ that would be oriented towards a pluralist legal entity with twenty-eight autonomous legal orders.⁹⁸ Some scholars have overtly noted that the point of reference in the quality of constitutionalism today ought to be the ⁹⁵ Nolte 2003b, p. 10. Emphasis added.

⁹⁶ Some of these are outlined in contributions by different scholars to Nolte 2003a (especially Bognetti 2003). On the ‘counter-majoritarian difficulty’, see Somek 2014, pp. 15 et seq.

⁹⁷ ‘Fair Trials to document the use and abuse of plea bargaining worldwide’, 8 February 2016, <https://www.fairtrials.org/fair-trials-to-document-the-use-and-abuse-of-plea-bargaining-worldwide/>; ‘What is plea bargaining? A simple guide’, 9 February 2016, <https://www.fairtrials.org/what-is-plea-bargaining-a-simple-guide/>.

⁹⁸ Avbelj 2008, pp. 4 et seq., 15 et seq., 23, 24.

German system rather than the American model, as is discussed more in the Comparative Study, with reference to literature collated by Alexander Somek, who sees constitutionalism as a project of emancipation.⁹⁹ Further, Giovanni Bognetti, exploring human dignity, has noted a certain ‘ruggedness’ of the American system in comparison with the European systems, although he has observed that this ought to be balanced against other values, such as the greater individual initiative and competitiveness enabled by the US system.¹⁰⁰

Against this background, for countries beyond the European area in search of good models for developing constitutionalism, awareness about some of the main differences between the EU, the ECHR, Europe’s political/historical, traditional legal and post-totalitarian constitutional cultures, and US constitutional law is of direct practical importance for shaping discussion about what models might be considered as optimal. The present book, along with the Comparative Study, documents these differences in greater detail.

As a concluding note, we hope that the readers will appreciate the little known yet fascinating material in the national reports, which we consider to be of real practical importance, and that the edited volumes will make a contribution towards developing European constitutionalism in a way that would be better informed by comparative European constitutional law perspectives. We believe that the wealth of material, concerns and suggestions stemming from the national constitutional discourses in the Member States will prove to be a useful resource for national judges – as well as members of parliament, ombudspersons and other custodians of constitutional values – who might, in the light of the changes in the discourse described, be in doubt as to whether they should uphold the national constitution. In particular, we believe that in the dialogue with the European Court of Justice, national judges should not shy away from expounding a higher level of protection of fundamental rights or other constitutional values where these exist in national law. We hope that the wealth of bottom-up constitutionalism on display in these two volumes will give them the confidence to do so. It is our aspiration that scholars in constitutional and public law – who have a long and proud tradition in Europe as custodes over the exercise of public authority – will perceive this book as confirmation that their vigilance can and ought to continue when public power is transferred to new sites of authority and veiled in new legal orders. Recognition that colleagues in other Member States have similar fears about strains on constitutional values, and the solutions adopted, may provide new vigour for constitutionalism in Europe.

Last but not least, we believe that the present volumes will also be of interest to the judges of the European Court of Justice and the lawyers of the institutions of the EU. In fulfilling their mission to create, interpret and advance European Union law, we hope that they will find inspiration in this comprehensive study that brings together the research of over sixty experts from throughout the Union, highlighting the constitutional traditions common to these European states as well as important elements of diversity that derive from the historical evolution and unique equilibrium of the individual constitutional systems in Europe.

⁹⁹ Somek 2014, p. 10 (emancipation of constitutionalism) and pp. 85–86 footnotes 38 and 42 (summary of writings of authors comparing German and US constitutionalism).

¹⁰⁰ Bognetti 2003, p. 78.

As the book is going to press, we have decided to add the following final observation. In the time after the material for the book was completed, there has been a widespread surge of illiberal and extremist, right-wing political forces across Europe and beyond, and thus the protection of the comparative European constitutional values and achievements has become more difficult. Regrettably, there is a risk that these values may be conflated with general protection of nationalism or populism and dismissed offhand. However, it is hoped that – when looking through the national reports – the reader will agree that there has been a structural oversight, in that advanced comparative European constitutional values and achievements have unduly been left out of the transnational discourse, and that it is important for this omission to be corrected by the mainstream scholarly, political and legal communities, in order to avoid it happening that the protection of these values will be misused by and/or associated with extremist movements.

References

- Albi A. (2015a) Erosion of Constitutional Rights in EU Law: A Call for ‘Substantive Co-Operative Constitutionalism’ Part 1. Vienna J of International Constitutional L 9: 151–185. Available Open Access at <http://ssrn.com/abstract=2746522>.
- Albi A. (2015b) Erosion of Constitutional Rights in EU Law: A Call for ‘Substantive Co-Operative Constitutionalism’ Part 2. Vienna J of International Constitutional L 9:291–343. Available Open Access at <http://ssrn.com/abstract=2741623>.
- Avbelj M. (2008) The Pitfalls of (Comparative) Constitutionalism for European Integration. Eric Stein Working Paper 1/2008. <http://www.ericsteinpapers.cz/>.
- Beck G. (2012) The Legal Reasoning of the Court of Justice of the EU. Hart, Oxford.
- Besselink L. (2006) The Dutch Constitution, the European Constitution and the Referendum in the Netherlands. In Albi A., Ziller J. (eds.) The European Constitution and National Constitutions: Ratification and Beyond. Kluwer, Alphen aan den Rijn, pp. 113–123.
- Blekxtoon R. (ed.) (2005) Handbook on the European Arrest Warrant. T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague.
- Blekxtoon, R. (2009) Foreword. In: Keijzer N., van Sliedregt E. (eds.) The European Arrest Warrant in Practice. T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague, pp. V–VI.
- Bobek M. (2014) The Legal Reasoning of the Court of Justice of the EU. ELR 39:418–428.
- Bognetti G. (2003) The Concept of Human Dignity in European and U.S. Constitutionalism. In: Nolte G. (ed.) European and U.S. Constitutionalism. European Commission for Democracy Through Law (Venice Commission) CDL-STD(2003)037, pp. 65–80. http://www.venice.coe.int/webforms/documents/default.aspx?pdffile=CDL-STD\(2003\)037-e037-e).
- Bouza Garcia L. (2017) The “New Narrative Project” and the politicisation of the EU. Journal of Contemporary European Studies 25(3):340–353.
- Coppel J., O’Neill A. (1992) The European Court of Justice: Taking Rights Seriously? CML Rev. 29(4):669–692.
- De Búrca G. (2005) Rethinking Law in Neofunctionalist Theory. Journal of European Public Policy 12(2):310–326.

- De Visser M. (2014) Constitutional Review in Europe. A Comparative Analysis. Hart Publishing, Oxford.
- Dobner P., Loughlin M. (2010) Introduction. In: Dobner P., Loughlin M. (eds.) The Twilight of Constitutionalism? Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. xi–xvi.
- Erbežnik A. (2014) Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Its Effects on the Role of a National Judge. In: Peršak N. (ed.) Legitimacy and Trust in Criminal Law, Policy and Justice Norms, Procedures, Outcomes. Ashgate Publishing Limited, Farnham, pp. 131–152.
- Galera S. (2010) The European Contribution to an emerging global law. In Galera S. (ed.) Judicial Review: A Comparative Analysis Inside the European Legal System. Council of Europe, Strasbourg, pp. 301–308.
- Grimm, D. (2012) Types of Constitutions. In: Rosenfeld M., Sajó A. (eds.) The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law. OUP, Oxford, pp. 98–132.
- Harlow C. (2006) Global Administrative Law: The Quest for Principles and Values. EJIL 17:187–214.
- Herlin-Karnell E. (2007) In the Wake of Pupino: Advocaten voor de Wereld and dell'Orto. German Law Journal 8(12):1147–1161.
- Hogan G. (2014) The Influence of the continental constitutional tradition on the drafting of the Constitution. In: Ruane B., Barniville D., O'Callaghan J. (eds.) Law and Government: A Tribute to Rory Brady. Round Hall, Dublin, pp. 162–164.
- Joerges C. (2014) Three Transformations of Europe and the Search for a Way Out of its Crisis. In: Joerges C., Glinski C. (eds.) The European Crisis and the Transformation of Transnational Governance. Authoritarian Managerialism versus Democratic Governance. Hart, Oxford and Portland, pp. 25–46.
- Joerges C., Weimer M. (2012) A Crisis of Executive Managerialism in the EU: No Alternative? Maastricht Working Paper 2012-7. http://www.maastrichtuniversity.nl/web/Faculties/FL/2012_maastricht_working_papers.htm.
- Kjaer A. (2015) Theoretical Aspects of Legal Translation in the EU: The Paradoxical Relationship between Language, Translation and the Autonomy of EU Law. In Šarčević S. (ed.) Language and Culture in EU Law. Multidisciplinary Perspectives. Ashgate, London and New York, pp. 91–108.
- Kellermann A., De Zwaan J.W., Czuczai J. (eds.) (2001) The Constitutional Impact of EU Enlargement at EU and National Level. T.M.C. Asser Press, The Hague.
- Komárek J. (2014) Why National Constitutional Courts Should Not Embrace EU Fundamental Rights, LSE Law, Society and Economy Working Papers 23/2014, http://eprints.lse.ac.uk/60568/1/WPS2014-10_Komarek.pdf.
- Krisch N. (2010) Beyond Constitutionalism: The Pluralist Structure of Postnational Law. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Kuo M.-S. (2010) The end of constitutionalism as we know it? Boundaries and the State of Global Constitutional (Dis)ordering. Transnational Legal Theory 1:329–369.
- Lupo N., Piccirilli G. (2015) The Relocation of the Legality Principle by the European Courts. Case Law: An Italian Perspective. EuConst 11(1):55–77.
- Mackie, D., Barr M. et al. (2013) Euro Area Adjustment: About Half-way There, by J.P. Morgan Bank, Europe Economic Research 28 May 2013, http://www.europe-solidarity.eu/documents/ES1_euro-area-adjustment.pdf.
- Martinico G. (2015) Constitutionalism, Resistance and Openness: Comparative Law Reflections on Constitutionalism in Global Governance. STALS (Sant'Anna Legal Studies, Pisa) Research Paper No 5/2015. <http://www.stals.sssup.it/files/martinicoSTALS.pdf>. A modified version published as Martinico G. (2016) Constitutionalism, Resistance, and Openness: Comparative Law Reflections on Constitutionalism in Postnational Governance. YEL 35:318–340.
- Mendes J. (2014) Rule of law and participation: A Normative analysis of internationalized rulemaking as composite procedures. ICON 12(2):370–401.
- Menéndez A.J. (2013) The Existential Crisis of the European Union. German Law Journal 14:453–526.
- Menéndez A.J. (2014) Editorial: A European Union in Constitutional Mutation? ELJ 20:127–141.

- Mutanen A. (2015) Towards A Pluralistic Constitutional Understanding of State Sovereignty in the European Union? The Concept, Regulation and Constitutional Practice of Sovereignty in Finland and Certain Other EU Member States. Ph.D. thesis, University of Helsinki.
- Nolte G. (ed.) (2003a) European and U.S. Constitutionalism. European Commission for Democracy Through Law (Venice Commission) CDL-STD(2003)037. http://www.venice.coe.int/webforms/documents/default.aspx?pdffile=CDL-STD\(2003\)037-e037-e); also published as Nolte G. (ed.) (2003) European and US Constitutionalism. CUP, Cambridge.
- Nolte G. (2003b), Introduction – European and U.S. Constitutionalism: Comparing Essential Elements. Nolte G. (ed.) (2003) European and U.S. Constitutionalism. European Commission for Democracy Through Law (Venice Commission) CDL-STD(2003)037, pp. 9–22. http://www.venice.coe.int/webforms/documents/default.aspx?pdffile=CDL-STD\(2003\)037-e037-e).
- Pinelli C. (2016) The Formation of a Constitutional Tradition in Continental Europe since World War II. EPL 22:257–268.
- Popelier P. (2014) Europe clauses and constitutional strategies in the face of multilevel governance. Maastricht Journal of European and Comparative Law 21:300–319.
- Schünemann B. (2007) Alternative-Project for a European criminal law and procedure. Criminal Law Forum 18(2):227–251.
- Simoncini A. (2013) Back to “Flexible” Constitutions? The Impact of Financial Crisis and the Decline of the European Constitutionalism. Italian Journal of Public Law 5(2):157–187.
- Somek A. (2014) The Cosmopolitan Constitution. OUP, Oxford.
- Sweet A.S. (2012) Neofunctionalism and Supranational Governance (unabridged version). Faculty Scholarship Series, Paper 4628, http://digitalcommons.law.yale.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=5636&context=fss_papers.
- Sweet A.S., Brunell T. (2013) Trustee Courts and the Judicialization of International Regimes: The Politics of Majoritarian Activism in the ECHR, the EU, and the WTO. Journal of Law and Courts 1(1):61–88. http://digitalcommons.law.yale.edu/fss_papers/4625/.
- Vauchez A. (2009) The transnational politics of judicialization. Van Gend en Loos and the making of the EU polity. ELJ 16:1–28.
- Walsh D.P.J. (2009) The European Arrest Warrant in Ireland: Surrendering Our Standards to a European Criminal Law Area. In: Bacik I.C., Heffernan L. (eds.) Criminal Law and Procedure: Current Issues and Emerging Trends. First Law, Dublin, pp. 5–34.
- Wilkinson M. (2016) The Reconstitution of Postwar Europe: Lineages of Authoritarian Liberalism. LSE working paper 5/2016. <http://www.lse.ac.uk/law/working-paper-series>.
- Zumbansen, P. (2012) Comparative, global and transnational constitutionalism: The emergence of a transnational legal-pluralist order. Global Constitutionalism 1(1):16–52.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Questionnaire for the Constitutional Law Experts of the Research Project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’

Anneli Albi

Abstract The Questionnaire forms the basis for the twenty-nine national reports which were prepared as part of the research project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’, funded by a five-year European Research Council grant. The Questionnaire contains three main parts, which address the following issues: (1) constitutional culture and constitutional amendments regarding EU membership; (2) constitutional/fundamental rights, the rule of law and constitutional adjudication regarding EU measures such as the Data Retention Directive, European Arrest Warrant and ESM Treaty; and (3) novel challenges that are increasingly highlighted in the wider context of global governance (i.e. beyond the classic international treaties that advance human rights, peace and environmental protection) in relation to democratic participation, judicial review and the rule of law. The different parts of the Questionnaire each start with a brief background outlining the specific constitutional issues or challenges encountered in some Member States, and subsequently invite the national constitutional law experts to explore these in relation to their respective countries. Whilst the mainstream English language European constitutional discourse has typically focused on autonomous EU constitutional law, the Questionnaire seeks to make

The Questionnaire was prepared as part of the research project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’, funded by European Research Council grant No. 284316 (Project acronym: ConstEurGlobGov). The views are solely those of the Principal Investigator and cannot be attributed to the ERC or to the European Union. The Principal Investigator would like to thank Samo Bardutzky and linguistic editor Siiri Aulik for their helpful comments on the Questionnaire; however, the views and any errors are solely those of the author. Updates regarding the research project are available on the project website <https://research.kent.ac.uk/roc/>.

All websites accessed 9 March 2016. The Questionnaire was prepared in January 2014, with some updates indicated in the text of the Questionnaire, along with some general editorial adjustments.

A. Albi (✉)
Law School, University of Kent, Canterbury, UK
e-mail: A.Albi@kent.ac.uk

available case law, doctrine and constitutional debates from the perspective of a multitude of national constitutional systems. It should be noted that the Questionnaire was prepared in 2013-14 when critical scholarly and public discussion about EU and transnational governance was generally rare; the Questionnaire does not address the recent illiberal trends.

Project Summary and Main Objectives

The European Research Council funded project ‘The Role and Future of National Constitutions in European and Global Governance’ revisits the role of national constitutions at a time when decision-making has increasingly shifted to the transnational level. The project has three objectives. First, it aims to carry out a comparative analysis on how constitutions reflect the transfer of powers from domestic to European and global institutions, and thus to what extent they provide legitimacy to the shift of the exercise of power to the transnational level and retain their social relevance. Secondly, while the discourse has come to associate national constitutions primarily with the protection of sovereignty, the project revisits constitutional values that have a continued importance in the contemporary globalising and pluralist legal setting, such as the protection of constitutional rights, the rule of law, legitimacy and democratic participation. The project explores constitutional court judgments from different Member States that tackle the protection of these rights and values in transnational judicial dialogues, e.g. in the field of data retention, arrest warrants and the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty). The project also assesses the responsiveness of the European Court of Justice (CJEU) with regard to the above rights and values, along with the standard of protection at supranational level. The third objective is to explore challenges that are increasingly highlighted in the context of global governance in relation to legitimacy, democratic control, accountability and the rule of law.

The Questionnaire that follows invited constitutional law experts¹ to reflect on what has increasingly been described as the ‘erosion’ of constitutionalism,² ‘twilight of constitutionalism’,³ ‘de-constitutionalisation’ at the domestic level⁴ or the ‘hollowing out’ of national constitutions⁵ and ‘waning constitutionalism’.⁶ Others have noted a trend towards a thin, weak, procedural version of the rule of law, democratic control and judicial review⁷ in the context of Europeanisation and globalisation processes. Are such developments inevitable? If not, are the solutions primarily to be found in the

¹ For the constitutional law experts as well as the countries covered in the project, see the Introduction and the Preface in this edited volume.

² Grimm 2010, p. 4.

³ Dobner and Loughlin 2010, p. xi.

⁴ Peters 2006, p. 580.

⁵ Peters 2005, p. 41; see further Introduction to Part 3 of the Questionnaire below.

⁶ Rasmussen 2006, pp. 149–156.

⁷ Harlow 2006, p. 195; Galera 2010b, p. 302.

gradual constitutionalisation processes at the European and global level, as is the prevailing expectation in the discourse on European constitutional law and global constitutionalism? Might there also be a case for a more proactive engagement in upholding and enhancing constitutionalism at the national level? While the ‘national’ dimension has come to be somewhat tainted and neglected given its connotations of sovereignty, it warrants closer scrutiny, as the national courts, parliaments and other institutions provide the closest and, in practice, the most accessible means for individuals to shape and contest legal measures and hold public power accountable.

Whilst the Questionnaire is of a considerable length, a significant part of it provides an introductory context for the questions that follow, with a summary of a selection of relevant cases and commentary in different Member States. Experts were not expected to answer all questions at equal level of detail; they were invited to focus on issues that have been of particular relevance for the Member State in question. The reports form the basis for the Comparative Study that accompanies the present book with an analysis and synthesis of the research findings, as explained in the introductory chapter of this book.

It should be noted that the Questionnaire was prepared in 2013–14 when critical scholarly and public discussion about EU and transnational governance was, in general, rare and limited. The Questionnaire does not address the recent illiberal trends in different parts of Europe and beyond.

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

Introduction The first objective is concerned with the role of constitutions internally within the state, and explores to what extent the content of the constitutions under examination remains credible and relevant given the realities of European governance. One key function of a constitution is to lay down the mechanisms governing the distribution and exercise of powers, and mutual checks and balances between the legislative, executive and judicial branches of power. In the context of European integration, the national mechanisms of decision-making have seen considerable alteration, given that more than half of the Member States’ legislation today has its origins in EU law. Against this background, the key objective of the project will be to provide a comprehensive, comparative overview and analysis of EU-related amendments to national constitutions.

Additionally, the project has sought to test some of the hypotheses explored in the literature surrounding the question of why constitutions are/are not amended. On the one hand, among the benefits of amending constitutions in view of European integration, Bruno De Witte has noted the need to address the ‘European deficit’ in the national constitutions, due to the fact that the constitutions might be gradually becoming somewhat obsolete with regard to the realities in the exercise of powers.⁸

⁸ De Witte 2001, p. 73.

Based on a similar line of thought, Monica Claes and Anneli Albi have in separate writings called on states to take their own constitutions seriously.⁹ In Hjalte Rasmussen's view, the absence of EU-amendments in the Danish Constitution has resulted in a process of 'waning constitutionalism'.¹⁰ András Sajó has noted that the silence of a constitution on important issues 'will lessen the constitution's functionality and undermine its social relevance'.¹¹ On the other hand, the choice not to amend may be due to reasons linked to constitutional culture, the degree of rigidity of the amendment procedures or other factors.

1.1 Constitutional Culture

Q 1.1.1 Constitutions have broadly been divided into two types. The first tend to have a legal character, with detailed rules and enforceability in courts; they have typically been adopted after the fall of an authoritarian regime or other cataclysmic event. The second type of constitutions tend to be more incrementally evolving, evolutionary, historical and political in nature.¹² Is such a categorisation relevant to the Member State in question? If so, in which category does the national constitution fall? Has the national constitutional culture been influenced to a notable extent by constitutional traditions in another country or region?

Q 1.1.2 What is regarded as the rationale and role of the Constitution in the relevant Member State? Do the key elements of the rationale of the Constitution include (a) sovereignty and the organisation of the state; (b) limits to power through the protection of constitutional rights and liberties, the rule of law and the separation of powers with due checks and balances? If the Constitution is concerned with both of these areas and/or further areas, does the centre of gravity fall more into one area in particular?

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

Q 1.2.1 How has the national constitution been adjusted in relation to EU membership? Please provide the timeline of the amendments (both in relation to initial membership as well as any subsequent amendments regarding the ratification of the Treaties or any other EU matters) along with the wording of the relevant provisions.

⁹ Claes 2005, p. 124; Albi 2005, pp. 206–210.

¹⁰ Rasmussen 2006, pp. 149–156.

¹¹ Sajó 2004, p. 427.

¹² For the two categories of constitutions, see e.g. Besselink 2006, pp. 113 et seq., and Albi 2005, pp. 22 et seq.

Please include amendments where the EU was not explicitly mentioned but which implicitly concerned EU law.

Q 1.2.2 Please outline the constitutional amendment procedure. If different procedural options were available, please indicate which option was used for each EU-related amendment.

Q 1.2.3 If an amendment has been more recent (e.g. from 1995 onwards), please provide some further background on the aims of the amendment, the amendment process and the conceptual background behind the choice of wording. What drove the reform, which obstacles were encountered in the process and which key factors influenced the decisions on the scope and content of the amendment? To what extent was the advice of legal scholars and experts followed by political decision-makers?

Q 1.2.4 Have there been EU-related amendment proposals or related constitutional reform packages which have not materialised in practice? If so, please outline the aims and rationale of the proposals and the reasons why the amendments did not succeed. Are there currently any provisions which have been highlighted as in need of amendment in view of EU membership, or which the Expert considers to be in need of amendment?

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

Q 1.3.1 Regardless of whether the Constitution contains specific amendments, please summarise the rules that govern:

- the transfer or delegation of powers to the European Union;
- the supremacy and direct effect of EU law.

Q 1.3.2 How are the clauses on the transfer or delegation of sovereignty conceptualised in the relevant judgments of the constitutional court and the legal commentary? Would it be fair to say that an older interpretation of absolute sovereignty has been replaced by a modern, revised approach? For example, the Estonian Supreme Court recently made an explicit statement to this effect in the ESM case, stating that ... the Constitution does not require, despite the strict wording of the sovereignty clause, observation of absolute sovereignty. ... [M]embership of the EU and in international organisations has become a natural part of sovereignty in this day and age.¹³

¹³ Supreme Court of Estonia, Case No. 3-4-1-6-12 on the ESM Treaty, English translation available at <http://www.riigikohus.ee/?id=1347>, para. 130.

Q 1.3.3 Are there nonetheless limits in the text of the Constitution, case law and/or constitutional commentary to the extent to which powers can be delegated to the EU? Have such limits changed over time? Can such limits be surpassed by recourse to a referendum?

Q 1.3.4 To what extent has the constitutional court or supreme court accepted the supremacy of EU law over the national constitution? Does the Constitution directly or indirectly proclaim the supremacy of the Constitution? If so, how have such provisions been interpreted in view of EU law? Would it be fair to say that the relevant court emphasises EU-friendly interpretation and generally seeks to avoid undermining EU law in practice?

1.4 Democratic Control – National Parliaments and Referendums

Q 1.4.1 Regardless of whether the Constitution contains specific amendments, please provide a summary of the rules that govern the participation of the national parliament in the EU decision-making processes. Are there any aspects in the parliamentary control in the relevant Member State that could be regarded as a best practice and which could be recommended more widely?

Q 1.4.2 Please provide a brief summary on referendums¹⁴ related to EU-amendments, ratification of EU treaties or other EU-related matters in the relevant Member State. Do the referendums on EU matters stand out, in any aspect, when one thinks of the role that direct democracy otherwise plays in the constitutional system of the Member State?

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

Q 1.5.1 If the Constitution has been amended to a considerable extent in relation to the EU, what was the rationale or the reasoning behind such amendment? Did any of the following considerations play a role: following best practices that have emerged in other countries; comparative influence of specific countries; constitutional culture; judicial decision(s), e.g. a finding by the constitutional court that the ratification of a Treaty was not possible without a constitutional amendment; following academic or expert advice; the quest to enhance the legitimacy of EU membership; the need to take the Constitution seriously and to reflect the shift of power to the supranational level; public support; relative ease of the amendment procedure; anything else?

¹⁴ A linguistic remark should be made here: we will use the plural ‘referendums’ instead of ‘referenda’ throughout the book, as recommended by a number of leading publications in the field. Although the word ‘referendum’ can be derived from the Latin word ‘referre’, the word ‘referendum’ itself does not appear in the Latin language as a noun, and thus there is no need to use the Latin plural ending ‘a’. See e.g. Suksi 1993, p. 10.

Q 1.5.2 If the Constitution has no EU-amendments or the EU-amendments are limited in their scope, please answer the following questions:

- (a) What are the reasons behind such a disposition? Have any of the following considerations played a role: the degree of difficulty of the amendment procedure, possibly involving a referendum; constitutional culture; level of public support for the EU; anything else?
- (b) As noted earlier, scholars have regarded constitutions that do not contain (significant) EU-amendments as being in the process of becoming somewhat obsolete with regard to the realities in the exercise of powers, and that such constitutions are experiencing reduced functionality and social relevance, or are not being taken seriously. The trend of ‘waning constitutionalism’ for example has been noted in Denmark. Have similar concerns been expressed in the relevant Member State? What is the Expert’s view on this matter?

Q 1.5.3 How does the Expert see the role of national constitutions in the context where power is increasingly exercised at supranational and global level? Would it be important to amend the constitutions with regard to the impact of EU and international organisations on the exercise of powers and/or constitutional values? Please provide reasons. Experts are welcome to identify areas where amendment may be beneficial and/or to formulate tentative suggestions for amending the constitution(s).

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

Introduction The second objective is to explore the role of constitutions externally vis-à-vis European governance, in particular as regards upholding constitutional rights and substantive constitutional values in the supranational context.

It is common ground that in a wide range of areas, the EU has made a pioneering and far-reaching contribution to the advancement of rights, especially as regards the CJEU’s case law on free movement rights, the rights of EU citizens and students, the right to non-discrimination, gender equality and the prohibition of age discrimination. Additionally, the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (Charter) plays an important role, e.g. by introducing a range of modern rights. Inspired by advances in these rights as well as the important contribution that the EU has made to peace, security and relative prosperity, the scholarly narrative has traditionally focused on assessing the national constitutional and supreme courts from the perspective of whether they are co-operative, Euro-friendly and accept the supremacy of EU law, or whether they remain Eurosceptic and reluctant to relinquish power. This appears to stem from an implicit assumption that national constitutions primarily symbolise nationally-oriented and somewhat old-fashioned values such as sovereignty.

However, in an increasing number of other areas, concerns have emerged about the standard of protection of constitutional rights, in particular in the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice. For example, a recent systematic analysis of the FIDE 2012 Congress Volume 3 reports on the national implementation of EU measures demonstrated that '[t]he uncritical focus on security has ... led ... to significant concerns regarding the impact of EU AFSJ law on the protection of fundamental rights'.¹⁵ Another author has noted that 'important values once recognised within the nation state are lost in the transition to the European level', and that especially pre-Lisbon, 'in the pursuit of substantive changes at the EU level even basic concepts such as fair trial and legality, which traditionally are recognised in national criminal law, seem to be forgotten'.¹⁶ In a recent paper, the Principal Investigator of the present project explored a range of cases where the Grand Chamber of the European Court of Justice has prioritised loyal co-operation and effectiveness of EU law over constitutional rights.¹⁷ The paper went on to argue that constitutional rights have seen a degree of erosion as a result of the supremacy of EU law, and called for a recalibration of the law and discourse towards 'substantive co-operative constitutionalism' in the EU.

The present project seeks to carry out a more systematic research on the substantive constitutional concerns identified by constitutional courts and in constitutional commentary. The European constitutional law discourse has predominantly come to focus on the constitutional law of the European Union, with research focusing on the autonomous, self-referential rules developed by the CJEU rather than comparative constitutional standards. This Questionnaire seeks to bring together constitutional concerns which seem to have arisen in several Member States, but which may be scattered in commentary in national languages and thus may not always receive sufficient attention in the mainstream European discourse. It ought to be recalled that by invoking constitutional values, constitutional courts have historically served as catalysts for improvements in the EU's constitutional order, in particular the German Constitutional Court by virtue of its Solange I decision¹⁸ that prompted the CJEU to introduce fundamental rights protection. It is hoped that by clearly articulating substantive concerns that have emerged in several Member States with regard to constitutional rights and values, the project will make a contribution towards enhancing substantive constitutionalism in the European Union, with greater responsiveness on the part of the European Court of Justice, European and national institutions involved in EU decision-making processes as well as the scholarly discourse.

It may be worthy to note that while the above research perspective may enter into territory that many may regard as controversial, it is of real importance, since in practice only the CJEU can act as the final arbiter and, by virtue of the supremacy of EU law, it sets the standard for twenty-eight Member States. As Stephen Weatherill has famously noted, 'even the most minor piece of technical Community legislation

¹⁵ Mitsilegas 2012, p. 141.

¹⁶ Herlin-Karnell 2010, pp. 238 and 240.

¹⁷ Albi 2015a, pp. 151–185, and Albi 2015b, pp. 291–343. The two-part article includes most of the material and case studies contained in Part 2 of this Questionnaire.

¹⁸ German Federal Constitutional Court, Internationale Handelsgesellschaft (Solange I) (1974) 2 CMLR, p. 549.

ranks above the most cherished constitutional norm'.¹⁹ This is of considerable significance, as EU law is no longer restricted to primarily governing the single market, but extends post-Lisbon to wide-ranging areas of law.

The sections that follow will in most cases start with a brief background outlining the concerns about specific (constitutional) rights that have arisen in one or more Member States, and will then invite the Experts to consider whether these are isolated occurrences or whether similar concerns have emerged in their respective countries.

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

Q 2.1.1 Please briefly outline to what extent (a) fundamental rights and (b) general principles of law (e.g. legal certainty and legitimate expectations, non-retroactivity, proportionality) are codified in the Constitution or have a constitutional rank. If there is a chapter on fundamental rights, is it comprehensive and detailed or relatively brief? To what extent are constitutional rights and general principles enforceable in courts?

Q 2.1.2 Is there a constitutional provision or a judicial ruling stipulating the conditions under which restrictions can be imposed on rights? For example, Art. 31(3) of the Polish Constitution provides as follows:

Any limitation upon the exercise of constitutional freedoms and rights may be imposed only by statute, and only when necessary in a democratic state for the protection of its security or public order, or to protect the natural environment, health or public morals, or the freedoms and rights of other persons. Such limitations shall not violate the essence of freedoms and rights.²⁰

Q 2.1.3 Is there a constitutional category equivalent or similar to the rule of law (or Rechtsstaat; État de droit) mentioned in the text of the Constitution of the relevant Member State? How is the concept of the rule of law conceptualised in the case law and legal commentary? What are the key elements of the concept? To what extent is the principle of the rule of law justiciable? Is the rule of law frequently used as an argument by applicants (in contesting legal acts) and courts (in exercising judicial review)?

It has been noted that access to courts, a right that has come to be explicitly recognised in the national constitutions, is of particular importance to the rule of law in the convergent principles of constitutional law in Europe.²¹ Please comment on the extent to which access to courts and the right to judicial review are constitutionally entrenched and/or regarded as a core element of the rule of law in the relevant Member State.

¹⁹ Weatherill 1995, p. 106.

²⁰ Translations from the unofficial translation of the Polish Constitution, <http://www.sejm.gov.pl/prawo/konst/angielski/kon1.htm>.

²¹ Galera 2010a, p. 277, referring to Storskubb and Ziller 2007, pp. 180 et seq.

To what extent are the following principles regarded as core elements of the rule of law in the relevant Member State:

- The rule that only published laws can be valid;
- Legal certainty and non-retroactivity;
- The rule that the imposition of obligations, administrative charges or penalties and criminal punishments is only permissible on the basis of a parliamentary statute, and that sanctions cannot be applied retroactively, through inference from objectives by virtue of teleological reasoning or by analogy.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

Prior to the *Omega*²² and *Schmidberger*²³ judgments in 2003–2004, the European Court of Justice by and large gave priority to the fundamental freedoms, i.e. economic free movement rights, in cases where these clashed with more classic constitutional and/or fundamental rights. Although in Omega and Schmidberger priority was given to the right to human dignity and the freedom of expression respectively, concerns continue to be expressed that classic fundamental rights have in the context of EU law become ‘restrictions’ to economic free movement rights, with the canon of interpretation being that exceptions to free movement rights must be interpreted strictly.

In the FIDE 2012 Congress Volume 1 reports on the protection of fundamental rights post-Lisbon, the national reports of Cyprus, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Ireland and Germany note that the national courts typically prioritise classic fundamental rights over economic freedoms, and that such an approach has changed, or is likely to change, in matters that fall within the scope of EU law, given the CJEU’s different approach to balancing.²⁴ The Irish Report in particular notes that during the referendums on the Lisbon Treaty, cases such as Laval and *Viking*²⁵ prompted concerns that the EU prioritised economic liberties over traditional human rights, and that the CJEU imposed significant limitations on the right of workers to take collective action where the exercise of that right interfered with the

²² Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609.

²³ Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659.

²⁴ See the relevant reports in Laffranque 2012a; see also ‘Questionnaire’ by Besselink 2012, pp. 8–9 in the same volume.

²⁵ Case C-341/05 Laval [2007] ECR I-11767 and Case C-438/05 The International Transport Workers’ Federation and The Finnish Seamen’s Union [2007] ECR I-10779.

freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.²⁶ The issues raised by this line of cases regarding collective action have also led to significant scholarly and political concern elsewhere.

Q 2.2.1 Does the balancing of fundamental rights and economic free movement rights raise constitutional issues in the relevant Member State and in the Expert's view? Have the national courts adjusted their balancing to match the CJEU's approach? If so, what has been seen as the objective of, or justification for, the relevant change?

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

Whereas in the past the balancing of rights primarily concerned the sphere of the single market, more recent developments in the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice mean that classic personal liberties have increasingly been affected by EU rules. The following sections will focus in particular on constitutional rights in the context of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW). Between 2005–2011, EU Member States issued a total of 78,785 EAW requests, with 19,841 requests resulting in the effective surrender of the person, according to data compiled by a report by the Centre for European Policy Studies (CEPS).²⁷

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

By virtue of the EAW Framework Decision,²⁸ extradition has been rendered speedy and near-automatic in the EU Member States. A court that receives an extradition request from another Member State must automatically authorise extradition, with minimum formality and no consideration of evidence.

The impact of the above rule on the presumption of innocence and on the principles of the rule of law and proportionality has been queried by Judge Broß in his dissenting opinion to the German Constitutional Court's European Arrest Warrant judgment.²⁹ He notes that the presumption of innocence protects the person charged from the disadvantages that are equivalent to a verdict of guilty, where such disadvantages have not been preceded by proceedings where evidence

²⁶ Kiernan et al. 2012, p. 539.

²⁷ Carrera et al. 2013, p. 16.

²⁸ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

²⁹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2236/04, European Arrest Warrant I, judgment of 18 July 2005, BVerfGE 113, 273, 304 et seq. http://www.bundesverfassungsgericht.de/SharedDocs/Entscheidungen/EN/2005/07/rs20050718_2bvr223604en.html, paras. 144–153.

of guilt has been provided in compliance with the code of procedure. He holds that in the EAW system, which does not allow for examination of the circumstances pertaining to the alleged offence or crime, prosecuted persons are treated as guilty in the context of the extradition proceedings, which is contrary to the rule of law.

Q 2.3.1.1 Have concerns with regard to the presumption of innocence arisen in the relevant Member State in this context? How have the courts and legal commentary approached the presumption of innocence in the context of the European Arrest Warrant? Please indicate the constitutional provisions which have been affected, as articulated by the courts, legal commentary and/or in the Expert's view. On the basis of national case law and in the Expert's view, can a conclusion be drawn that the principle of presumption of innocence can no longer fully be granted the same level of protection as prior to the entry into force of the EAW Framework Decision? If so, what is regarded as the objective of, or justification for, limiting this right?

Q 2.3.1.2 Is the prevailing practice for judges in the relevant Member State to rubber-stamp extradition requests, or to grant a hearing and/or carry out some form of preliminary judicial review? Do the courts review evidence prior to extradition where the person claims his or her innocence? If so, on how many occasions has extradition been refused on this ground?

2.3.2 Nullum Crimen, Nulla Poena Sine Lege

A central element of the EAW Framework Decision is that the rule of double criminality is abolished for 32 crimes, and thus a person must be extradited regardless of whether the act in question constitutes a crime in domestic law. Concerns have been expressed that each Member State is effectively accepting the criminal laws of all other Member States of the EU, without a clear picture of what those laws might be.³⁰ A further issue that has provided grounds for concern is the wide, open-ended wording in the list of '32 types of offences'; it has been commented that these are merely 'types' and not well-defined offences (e.g. 'racism and xenophobia'), and that some offences are susceptible to politicisation (e.g. 'terrorism', 'participation in a criminal organisation' and 'racism and xenophobia').³¹ There have also been concerns about different penalties for the same crime in different Member States.

The nulla poena sine lege rule led the Belgian Constitutional Court to request a preliminary ruling from the CJEU on the legality of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision.³² This was prompted by a concern from an association of defence lawyers that the abolition of double criminality was in breach of the principle of legality in criminal matters. Under national constitutions, criminal legislation must satisfy the conditions of precision, clarity and predictability, allowing each person to know whether an act constitutes an offence.

³⁰ Alegre and Leaf 2004, p. 208.

³¹ Sanger 2010, pp. 21–22.

³² Case C-303/05 Advocaten voor de Wereld [2007] ECR I-03633.

The concern about nulla poena sine lege was echoed in a more limited way by the German Constitutional Court,³³ which found that the issue of retroactive amendment of substantive criminal law would arise in cases where an individual is extradited to another Member State for an act that does not have a significant connecting factor to the requesting state and that was not punishable in Germany when the act was committed. The Court explained the threat to the rule of law as follows:

The principle according to which an offence may only be punished if punishability was legally determined before the offence was committed is a special guarantee under the rule of law of the confidence in the reliability of the legal system, which is to provide clear orientation on what is punishable and what is not. Without such reliable orientation, individual freedom cannot develop: Whoever must expect an unpredictable retroactive amendment of criminal-law provisions will no longer be able to exercise his or her freedom of action with the necessary security, and will lose his or her position as an autonomous individual in one of the areas that are most sensitive as concerns fundamental rights.

According to the FIDE 2012 Congress Volume 3 reports, the legality of the abolition of dual criminality has also been contested in Greece, Spain, Finland and Denmark, especially in relation to offences that have not been harmonised in the EU.³⁴ In the view of the Portuguese rapporteurs, abolition of dual criminality may foster a repressive ‘European criminal space’.³⁵ In the Czech Republic, the breach of the legality principle has also been contested with regard to other mutual recognition instruments, such as confiscation and freezing orders.

Q 2.3.2.1 How have the above constitutional issues been approached in the relevant Member State’s case law and legal commentary? Please outline the constitutional provisions affected, either as articulated by the courts, legal commentary and/or in the Expert’s view. On the basis of national case law and in the Expert’s view, can a conclusion be drawn that the principle of nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege can no longer fully be granted the same level of protection as prior to the entry into force of the EAW Framework Decision? If so, what is regarded as the objective of, or justification for, limiting this principle?

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

The EAW rules on in absentia judgments, as amended in 2009, prompted a preliminary ruling request by the Spanish Constitutional Court in Melloni.³⁶ In the past, the Spanish Constitutional Court had on numerous occasions prohibited

³³ Judgment of 18.7.2005, 2 BvR 2236/04, supra n. 29, para. 99.

³⁴ See Mitsilegas 2012 and country reports in the same volume (Laffranque 2012b).

³⁵ Vitorino and Leandro Vasconcelos 2012, p. 540.

³⁶ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

extradition to serve a severe sentence imposed in the absence of the requested person, where no possibility of a retrial was available. This included circumstances where the person had been represented in another Member State by a lawyer, without being present at the proceedings.

In the Spanish Constitutional Court's view, changing the above practice so as to allow extradition in such circumstances would breach the constitutional right to a fair trial and the rights of defence. The first paragraph of Art. 24 of the Spanish Constitution provides that '[e]veryone has the right to obtain effective protection from judges and the courts in the exercise of his rights and legitimate interests, and in no case may there be a denial of defence'. The Court noted that in its case law, the right to participate in the oral procedure and to mount one's own defence forms part of the nucleus of the rights of defence which must be regarded as essential under Article 24 of the Constitution. ... Only by means of physical presence at the trial can rejection of or acquiescence to the accusation be manifested, and the declaration by the accused can become part of his defence, witnesses can be questioned and examined, the defence conducted with specialised assistance from a lawyer can be coordinated and, finally, the right to the last word can be exercised...³⁷

According to the Spanish Constitutional Court, extradition without respect for the above 'undermines the essence of due process in a way which affects human dignity'. In the preliminary ruling question, the Constitutional Court asked the European Court of Justice whether it could no longer refuse the execution of an arrest warrant in the above circumstances. The Grand Chamber of the CJEU confirmed that the previous level of protection granted to Art. 24 of the Spanish Constitution was no longer available.

Q 2.3.3.1 Have in absentia judgments raised constitutional issues in the relevant Member State? Please outline the relevant constitutional provisions. Do in absentia judgments raise constitutional issues in the Expert's opinion? Have the national courts had to revisit the standard of protection in cases involving in absentia judgments in the context of the EAW Framework Decision? If so, what is regarded as the objective or justification?

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

The German Constitutional Court has explained the importance of the state's responsibility for its own citizens and why citizens ought not to be removed against their will from the legal system with which they are familiar. According to the Court, '[t]o the extent that they reside in the state territory, all citizens are supposed to be protected from the insecurities connected with being sentenced in a legal system that is unknown to them under circumstances that are inscrutable to them'.³⁸ The Court further noted that for the prosecuted person, transfer to another Member State's legal system, even though it has been brought closer by European integration, not only means discrimination under procedural law, which can consist in language obstacles, cultural differences and different procedural law and possibilities of defence. Such transfer ultimately ties the prosecuted person to a substantive criminal law in respect of which no democratic means had existed for him or her to participate in its creation, which he or she – unlike German criminal law – does not need to know and which in many cases due to a lack of familiarity with the respective national context, does not permit him or her as a layperson a sufficiently secure comparative evaluation.³⁹

³⁷ C-399/11-1, Order of 9 June 2011 of the Spanish Constitutional Tribunal (Plenary Formation), in the matter of Recurso de Amparo (petition for constitutional protection) lodged by Stefano Melloni, on file with the author.

Fair Trials International has noted the following: 'Too often we encounter people imprisoned for months or years before their trial even starts, who have no idea of their rights, no comprehension of the local legal system and no legal aid to help them pay for a lawyer or interpreter.'⁴⁰ In his dissenting opinion to a decision of the Czech Constitutional Court, Judge Balík has expressed concern about the feasibility of defending oneself in a language other than one's mother tongue, in addition to other difficulties which may arise, such as the high cost of flights for family members, which may be more than the average monthly salary in some countries.⁴¹

Q 2.3.4.1 Does the relevant Member State provide assistance to its extradited citizens or residents, e.g. by way of travel expenses, assistance with quality translation and legal aid? (Note that this question does not concern the recently adopted EU Directives regarding the respect of the relevant rights by the state to which the person has been extradited, but by the state of citizenship/main residence). In the United Kingdom, a parliamentary hearing was granted to individuals who had been extradited but were subsequently found innocent. Please outline any similar practices by public institutions in the relevant Member State.

Is there a public or non-governmental organisation that provides assistance to persons extradited from the relevant Member State? If so, what assistance do they provide? In the case of a non-governmental body, how are the activities of the NGO (predominantly) funded?

Would the Expert support a recommendation to introduce a publicly funded state or non-governmental body to provide assistance to residents who are involved in trials abroad?

Q 2.3.4.2 With reference to the statistical data on extraditions in 2005–2011, based on the CEPS report mentioned in Sect. 2.3 above, it would be helpful if the Experts could seek to determine how many of the extradited individuals were subsequently found innocent. How does the percentage compare to those found innocent in the course of domestic trials? If an individual was subsequently found innocent, what ³⁸ Judgment of 18.7.2005, 2 BvR 2236/04, supra n. 29, para. 66.

³⁹ Judgment of 18.7.2005, 2 BvR 2236/04, supra n. 29, para. 86.

⁴⁰ <http://www.fairtrials.net/get-involved/>.

⁴¹ Dissenting opinion by Judge Balík to Case No. Pl. ÚS 66/04, <http://www.concourt.cz>.

compensation was provided, especially given the cost of travel and the stay abroad for the suspect and his or her family?

If possible, please provide examples of individuals who have been extradited but have subsequently been found innocent, e.g. from media coverage.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

One of the Czech rapporteurs for the FIDE 2012 Congress has commented as follows:

The EU mutual recognition instruments, be it European arrest warrant, European evidence warrant, freezing order, confiscation order, mutual recognition of financial penalties or sentencing judgments or probations, present great challenges for the legal systems of Member States, including the Czech Republic. ... One of the most significant challenges is the shift of paradigm, whereby executing authorities are supposed to recognise and execute foreign judgments and other judicial decisions (in case of financial penalties, the respective decisions might also come from administrative authorities) almost automatically, while trusting that underlying foreign procedures and decisions observed fundamental rights and fulfilled particularly fair trial requirements. The mutual recognition instruments help to expand the operation of national law throughout the EU and might clash with domestic constitutional requirements as regards the substantive legality principle, principle of legal certainty or prerogatives of its own citizens or fundamental rights requirements generally.⁴²

In Estonia, an attorney has called for a parliamentary debate on constitutional rights with regard to the abolition of the exequatur in civil matters in the aftermath of the following case. Mr. Piirsoo, a truck driver, discovered in 2009 that his bank account was 430,000 EUR in debt, with a further 192,000 EUR added at a later stage by way of interest accrued. The Estonian customs authorities had automatically executed a customs tax demand notice issued by the German authorities.⁴³ Earning 700 EUR a month, the driver had little choice but to declare bankruptcy. He had been acquitted nine years earlier in Germany of cigarette smuggling charges, but Germany nonetheless demanded payment of customs tax. When his attorney sought to contest the demand notice in Germany, it emerged that the deadline for submitting the application had passed in 2000, when Mr. Piirsoo was detained in a German prison.

The attorney in the case, Mr. Siim Roode, called for a parliamentary debate to highlight the need for Estonian state authorities to provide assistance to citizens. He posed the question of whether it is compatible with the Constitution to enforce foreign administrative acts without the possibility of judicial review in a local court, a practice that is required by the relevant EU measures under the principle of mutual recognition.⁴⁴ The attorney recalled that the right to judicial protection is a fundamental right, which must be exercisable in a manner that is not overly onerous for the individual.⁴⁵ The right to judicial protection must be accessible within a reasonable time and at a reasonable cost. According to the attorney, the possibility to request judicial review of an act of a foreign authority in a foreign country does not meet these criteria, and is not within the reach of natural persons, i.e. individuals.⁴⁶

⁴² Švarc 2012, p. 269.

⁴³ Henno, E. (2009, November 4) Saksamaa nõuab eestlaselt miljoneid kroone (Germany demands millions of kroons from an Estonian). Postimees. <http://www.postimees.ee/183910/saksamaa-nouab-eestlaselt-miljoneid-kroone>.

Q 2.3.5.1 Have similar constitutional issues arisen with regard to mutual recognition in the relevant Member State? How has the move to mutual recognition been reconciled with the requirements of the rule of law and the right to effective judicial protection in the case law and legal commentary? On the basis of case law and in the Expert's view, can a conclusion be drawn that the principle of effective judicial protection and the rule of law can no longer fully be granted the same level of protection as prior to the introduction of the mutual recognition rule in criminal law and the abolition of the exequatur in civil and commercial matters? What is regarded as the objective of, or justification for, limiting the rights related to judicial protection?

Q 2.3.5.2 Has there been debate about the suitability of transposing mutual recognition from internal market matters, such as alcohol content in blackcurrant liqueurs as in Cassis de Dijon,⁴⁷ to criminal law and civil and commercial disputes? What is the Expert's view?

Q 2.3.5.3 Has any concern been expressed in the relevant Member State about a change in the role of courts, from providing judicial protection against unwarranted measures by the authorities, to becoming actors of loyal co-operation, efficiency and trust? What is the Expert's view on this matter? Is there reason to be concerned?

Q 2.3.5.4 In the United Kingdom, NGOs have called for the introduction of a proportionality test prior to extradition, due to extradition requests for a wide range of 'trivial' offences.⁴⁸ In the relevant Member State, have there been any calls for reintroducing some form of judicial review in the country of residence of the individual affected?

Would the Expert support a recommendation to reinstate some form of judicial review in the context of extradition, e.g. to ensure that there is sufficient evidence against the individual, that the offence is sufficiently serious, and that there is a sufficient link between the offence and the country to which the individual is ⁴⁵ Further comment by S. Roode on the case by e-mail, on file with the author.

⁴⁴ Ibid.

⁴⁶ Ibid.

⁴⁷ Case C-120/78 Rewe v. Bundesmonopolverwaltung für Branntwein [1979] ECR 00649.

⁴⁸ See (2008, October 20) Door Thief, Piglet Rustler, Pudding Snatcher: British Courts Despair at Extradition Requests. The Guardian; Wade, A. (2009, August 13) Extradited for 'stealing' a mobile phone. Times Online. <http://www.thetimes.co.uk/tto/law/article2214808.ece>.

extradited? Would the Expert support reinstatement of judicial review by a local court in civil and commercial matters?

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

Please use this section if any further constitutional issues have arisen in the case law and/or legal commentary, and/or in the Expert's view, in relation to European Union criminal law in the relevant Member State.

German Government's pleading in the EAW case to revise the concept of the rule of law (addition to the Questionnaire on 8 July 2014) Given the project's focus on the rule of law, the Experts may find it of interest to note the German Government's pleading in the EAW case to move from national requirements for the principles of the rule of law to a 'constitutional tradition that connects Europe and North America'. In para. 39 of the German Constitutional Court's EAW case, the Government's submission is summarised as follows:

The protection of German citizens from extradition can be restricted by a formal Act of Parliament. The European Arrest Warrant Act is such an Act. Pursuant to this Act, extradition can only be ordered if the 'principles of the rule of law' are adhered to. It results from the wording as well as from the objective of the relevant provision in the constitution that these principles cannot be equated with the nationally applicable requirements that result from the Basic Law's principle of the rule of law. On the other hand, the provision makes reference to more than a minimum standard under public international law. Instead, it establishes a reference to a 'constitutional tradition that connects Europe and North America' with the core standards of due process in criminal proceedings that results from this tradition. The legislature can assume that these standards are complied with in the European Union and its Member States because they are already a prerequisite for Union membership. In the individual case, a prosecuted person can invoke the ordre public in § 73 sentence 2 of the Law on International Judicial Assistance in Criminal Matters, which corresponds to the all-European ordre public under Article 6 of the Treaty on European Union.

In the sections regarding the rule of law, it might be of interest to report on whether there have been similar calls to change the concept of the rule of law in other Member States, and whether the Experts have views on the desirability of such a change.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

The EU Data Retention Directive 2006/24⁴⁹ has seen constitutional challenges in a number of Member States. While the Grand Chamber of the CJEU had previously confirmed the legality of the Directive,⁵⁰ two new cases, from Austria and Ireland, were pending at the CJEU at the time of preparing this Questionnaire and eventually led to the annulment of the Directive.⁵¹

⁴⁹ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available

In Germany, an action was brought before the Constitutional Court by more than 34,000 citizens. The German Constitutional Court found that the national implementing law contravened Germany's Constitution, and especially the right to privacy and proportionality.⁵² The Court noted that the storage of data envisioned constitutes a particularly serious encroachment with an effect broader than anything in the legal system to date. It allows third persons to obtain detailed information on a person's social or political affiliations and personal preferences, inclinations and weaknesses, making it possible to create personality profiles of virtually all citizens and to track their movements. According to the Court, it is part of Germany's constitutional identity that the citizens' enjoyment of freedom may not be totally recorded and registered.

The Romanian Constitutional Court has noted the national implementing act's 'large applicability – practically to all physical and legal persons'.⁵³ According to the Romanian Constitutional Court, this is likely to overturn the presumption of innocence, transforming a priori all users of electronic communication services into suspects, and to breach the right to private life, secrecy of correspondence and freedom of expression.

Q 2.4.1 In April 2014, the Court of Justice annulled the Data Retention Directive. The annulment was based on the disproportionality of the interference as regards the lack of safeguards on access and time limits; however, the Court found the underlying requirement of blanket data retention justified in view of the overriding objective of general interest (security). Advocate General Cruz Villalon had recommended suspension of the invalidity until the Directive was revised. We would welcome the Expert's reflection on the following matters:

- Did the implementation of the Data Retention Directive raise constitutional issues in the relevant Member State? Please outline the constitutional provisions affected. How did the courts or other bodies reconcile the Directive's requirements with constitutional rights during the period of 2006–2014 prior to annulment?

electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁵⁰ Case C-301/06 Ireland v. Parliament and Council [2009] ECR I-00593.

⁵¹ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

⁵² German Federal Constitutional Court, Judgment of 02.03.2010, 1 BvR 256/08, 1 BvR 263/08, 1 BvR 586/08. For an English summary, see www.bundesverfassungsgericht.de/en/press/bvg10-011en.html.

⁵³ Romanian Constitutional Court, Decision No. 12581 of 08.10.2009, English translation available at www.legi-internet.ro/fileadmin/editor_folder/pdf/decision-constitutional-court-romania-data-retention.pdf.

- If the national implementing act was adjudicated by the national constitutional or supreme court without a preliminary reference to the CJEU, was the CJEU's finding of the legality in the 2009 Ireland v. Council case regarded as having settled the matter of the legality of the Directive (and thus a reason why no further challenge to the validity was sent to the CJEU)?
- On the basis of previous case law and in the Expert's view, can a conclusion be drawn that in the domestic context, without the constraints of the EU legal order, there would have been a high degree of probability that a measure equivalent to the Data Retention Directive would not have been found compatible with the Constitution by the constitutional court? Would the national constitutional court or supreme court, in the context of national constitutional law without the constraints of the EU legal order, likely have found the underlying rule of blanket data retention compatible with the Constitution (rather than focusing on the proportionality of the rules on safeguards for access and time limits)?
- What was the consequence of the annulment by the CJEU for the relevant national implementing act? Has it been invalidated or will it continue to exist? Can it be said that the Directive may have established a new baseline for the national system in terms of the acceptability of blanket data retention?

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

In the Heinrich case,⁵⁴ an Austrian court queried the legality of the adoption of secret legislation by EU institutions. The Austrian court noted that keeping secret the rules of conduct with which individuals are required to comply constituted such a severe impairment of the most elementary principles of the rule of law that such regulations were legally non-existent and hence could not be binding. The Grand Chamber of the Court of Justice of the European Union decided that the secret EU regulation, while it could not impose obligations on individuals, remained valid law.

The CJEU's approach followed its earlier case law in relation to EU measures that had not been translated into and published in the languages of the new Member States in time for accession. In that context, the Polish, Czech and Estonian courts revisited their previous, more stringent approach whereby unpublished measures had been declared invalid, noting that the CJEU's approach in the Skoma-Lux case⁵⁵ had been more lenient.⁵⁶

Q 2.5.1 Has the question of the constitutionality of unpublished or secret measures arisen in the relevant Member State? How do the Heinrich and Skoma-Lux rulings compare to the national case law on the validity of such measures? If there has been no national case law dealing with similar issues, we would welcome the Expert's view on whether the existence of unpublished or secret measures would be deemed valid under the Constitution of the relevant Member State.

⁵⁴ Case C-345/06 Heinrich [2009] ECR I-01659.

⁵⁵ C-161/06 Skoma-Lux [2007] ECR I-10841, para. 37.

⁵⁶ See in more detail Bobek 2009, pp. 43 et seq., and Albi 2011, Sect. 3.1.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

In the context of the single market, German judges expressed concern during the so-called 'Banana Saga' in the 1990s that the CJEU was giving the EU institutions 'a carte blanche' and reducing judicial control to a minimum.⁵⁷ British scholars have noted the hands-off approach in matters of economic regulation, where the EU Courts allow the EU institutions to enjoy considerable discretion, resulting in 'the threshold of illegality being placed very high'.⁵⁸

This section seeks to explore the impact of EU law on the national standard of protection of property rights, legal certainty, non-retroactivity and proportionality in the adjudication of the validity of EU measures or measures implementing EU law in the field of market regulation.

This section has been prompted by a recent series of cases, described as the 'Sugar Saga' in several new Member States.⁵⁹ By way of a brief summary, courts in several new Member States reduced the level of protection of a range of constitutional rights in order to ensure the supremacy of EU law in the context of adjusting the quantities of agricultural products held by undertakings in view of the transition to the Common Agricultural Policy. These rights included the protection of private property and the rule that expropriation of property is only allowed in exceptional cases for public purposes, on the basis of a specific parliamentary statute and in return for compensation. The protection of property is accompanied by the constitutional rule that taxes, fines or pecuniary obligations can only be imposed under a parliamentary statute, with any grounds being interpreted narrowly and no retroactivity allowed. This is further protected by the principles of legal certainty and legitimate expectations. In the process, the Polish and Cypriot governments brought actions to the EU General Court, arguing that implementation of the EU requirement to impose fines on undertakings that had purchased sugar before EU accession was not possible without breaching the above rights in a disproportionate manner.

All of the challenges were rejected by the EU Courts as part of the practice of interpreting the general principles of EU law in a way that gives a wide margin of discretion to the EU institutions. As regards the right to property, the EU Courts had previously found no violations by EU measures until Kadi,⁶⁰ which pertained to UN measures.⁶¹ Indeed, a judge from the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) had expressed concern as to whether the protection granted by the EU Courts to property rights under Art. 1 of Protocol 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) corresponded to that granted by the ECtHR.⁶² As regards the principle of legitimate expectations, the overwhelming majority of claims have been rejected by the Court of Justice: one can rely on this principle only if specific assurances have been given by the EU institutions.⁶³ In the case of undertakings, the EU Courts expect a prudent and well-informed trader to foresee changes in the law. This interpretation is narrower than that used by Central and Eastern European constitutional courts before the ‘Sugar Saga’: in their previous case law, it was held that the imposition of obligations required a lead-in period, and laws that retroactively established obligations or pecuniary charges on individuals were prohibited and declared unconstitutional.

⁵⁷ Everling 1996, p. 419.

⁵⁸ For relevant case law, see Chalmers et al. 2006, pp. 436–437.

⁵⁹ See Albi 2010, pp. 791–829.

The ‘Sugar Saga’ additionally involved a case where both EU Courts upheld the legality of a 45 million EUR fine that had been imposed by the European Commission on Estonia for sugar that had been held by households, i.e. private individuals. The fine had been imposed on the basis of a requirement that was first written down in the same instrument that imposed the 45 million EUR fine, adopted one year after EU accession.⁶⁴ The fine was upheld despite the General Court’s acknowledgement that there had been no textual basis in EU law for the alleged requirement to eliminate private household sugar and, furthermore, despite the Court’s recognition that, in practice, it would have been impossible to require private households to dispose of their sugar. The fine was upheld on the basis of teleological interpretation and the principle of effectiveness of EU law.

The Czech Constitutional Court carried out a comparison of domestic and EU standards of protection of the principles of legitimate expectations, legal certainty, non-retroactivity and non-discrimination, the right to undisturbed engagement in economic activity and property rights, in a decision concerning sugar production quotas delivered on 8 March 2006.⁶⁵ It noted with regard to each right the high margin of discretion left by the CJEU to the Member States when implementing the Common Agricultural Policy. Indeed, as regards the principle of proportionality, it noted the ‘highly deferential standard’, and that fundamental rights ‘may be subject

⁶⁰ Joined cases C-402/05 P and C-415/05 P Kadi and Al Barakaat International Foundation v. Council and Commission [2008] ECR I-06351.

⁶¹ Tridimas 2006, p. 315.

⁶² Concurring Opinion of Judge Ress in Bosphorus Hava Yollari Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Sirketi v. Ireland [GC], no. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

⁶³ For a detailed analysis, see Tridimas 2006, Chap. 6 and Grousset 2006, pp. 202–212.

⁶⁴ Case T-324/05 Estonia v. Commission [2009] ECR II-03681; Case C-535/09 P Estonia v. Commission [2011] ECLI:EU:C:2011:171.

⁶⁵ Czech Constitutional Court, Pl. ÚS 50/04 (Sugar Quotas III), 08.03.2006, English translation available at <http://www.usoud.cz>.

even to significant limitation'. The Court concluded that its own previous judgments had been 'excessive' and emphasised the need for the Court itself to apply 'constitutional self-restraint'.

In the Netherlands, with regard to legitimate expectations in the field of state aid, it has been commented that the CJEU has adopted 'a much more restrictive approach than is considered reasonable and acceptable by Dutch lawyers and scholars'.⁶⁶ However, Dutch case law and practice have been adjusted to EU rules after the CJEU, in response to preliminary ruling questions, clarified that the Dutch version of legitimate expectations should not prevail.

Q 2.6.1 Have the above issues with regard to the standard of protection of property rights, legal certainty, legitimate expectations, non-retroactivity and proportionality arisen in the relevant Member State in relation to EU measures? (Note that this question does not concern areas where Member States' measures may have interfered with economic freedoms or other rights arising from EU law. In this area it is well established that the EU Courts apply a stricter test to proportionality as well as to the other general principles of law, and frequently find national measures to be disproportionately restrictive.)⁶⁷

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

Under the ESM Treaty, Member States may be required to contribute funds to the ESM that in several countries potentially amount to a third of the annual state budget (e.g. in Estonia and Ireland). The use of such funds is not subject to democratic control or judicial review, and the 85% majority rule means that smaller states have no say over the use of the funds. These issues have prompted constitutional challenges in several Member States, but have been found to be compatible with the Treaties by the CJEU.⁶⁸

Q 2.7.1 Has the issue of the constitutionality of the ESM Treaty been raised in the relevant Member State? In particular, the Experts are invited to comment on the following issues:

- (a) If the maximum capital calls allowed under the ESM Treaty were to be made, what would be the percentage of the annual state budget and the annual GDP that the calls would represent? In Estonia, in his legal challenge to the Estonian Supreme Court, the Chancellor of Justice pointed out that the unprecedented magnitude of the financial commitment has the potential to seriously limit the very ability of the state to ensure the functioning of state institutions, including the judicial system, and the protection of the rights and social welfare benefits envisaged under the Constitution.⁶⁹ Has the constitutionality of a budgetary commitment of such magnitude been raised as an issue in the relevant Member State?

⁶⁶ Claes and Gerards 2012, p. 643, with references to relevant legal commentary.

⁶⁷ Chalmers et al. 2006, pp. 450–451. See also Coppel and O'Neill 1992, p. 670 et seq.

⁶⁸ Case C-370/12 Pringle [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:756.

- (b) In Germany, the applicants to the Constitutional Court in the ESM case in that country were concerned about the state taking ‘incalculable risks’, with Parliament no longer being able to exercise overall budgetary responsibility.⁷⁰ The uncertainty about the existence of a maximum limit was also raised in the Estonian case. The German Constitutional Court noted the ambiguities in the Treaty’s wording regarding whether a maximum limit exists, and thus requested that the Bundestag address this issue in the ratification process. Has the issue of uncertainty about a maximum limit arisen in the relevant Member State? If so, have the courts or Parliament clarified this issue, e.g. in the process of ratification?
- (c) Under Arts. 8(4) and 9(3) of the ESM Treaty, the capital calls have to be met ‘irrevocably and unconditionally’ within seven days. How has this type of unconditional and irreversible commitment been interpreted from the point of view of the Constitution?

Q 2.7.2 Has there been discussion about the constitutionality of other proposed measures, such as Eurobonds and the Banking Union, from the point of view of the potential of exposing the country’s citizens and residents to unlimited liability for bank failures in other European countries?

Q 2.7.3 If the Member State has been subject to an EU bailout and a subsequent austerity programme, have constitutional issues arisen with regard to democratic control, the rule of law, transparency, the balancing of the rights of citizens/residents with those of the international creditor community or other aspects of the bailout programme?

For example, in Portugal, the state budget for the year 2012, which was prepared by the Government to reflect the requirements of the Financial Assistance Programme agreed between Portugal, the European Commission and the IMF, suspended certain benefits for employees of the public sector. The relevant provisions were contested by a group of parliamentarians before the Constitutional Court, invoking the protection of legitimate expectations, the principles of equality and proportionality and the constitutional right to social security. The Constitutional Court declared the relevant provisions unconstitutional,⁷¹ ruling that the need to tackle the extremely serious economic situation cannot serve as grounds for dispensing the legislator from being subject to the fundamental rights and key structural principles of a state based on the rule of law, including the principle of proportional equality. While the Constitution cannot distance itself from economic and financial reality, it does possess, according to the Court, a specific normative autonomy that prevents economic or financial objectives from prevailing in an unlimited way over constitutional rights such as equality.

⁶⁹ Supreme Court of Estonia, Case No. 3-4-1-6-12 on the ESM Treaty, Judgment of 12.07.2012, English translation available at <http://www.riigikohus.ee/?id=1347>.

⁷⁰ German Federal Constitutional Court, Judgment of 12.9.2012, 2 BvR 1390/12, http://www.bverfg.de/entscheidungen/rs20120912_2bvr139012en.html.

⁷¹ See the summary of the judgment in case No. 353/12 in English on the website of the Constitutional Tribunal (<http://www.tribunalconstitucional.pt/tc/en/acordaos/20120353s.html>).

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

It is widely acknowledged that direct access to the EU Courts to challenge the validity of EU measures is very limited, with the expectation of the CJEU being that private parties can make recourse to indirect judicial review via the national courts.

Q 2.8.1 In order to gauge the availability of indirect judicial review in practice, please provide statistical data on the following:

- (a) In how many cases in the relevant Member State have applicants requested a preliminary ruling with regard to the validity of an EU measure since 2001? Please provide a brief summary of the type of EU measure contested and the grounds for the alleged invalidity.
- (b) In how many of such cases since 2006 did the national court send a preliminary ruling request to the CJEU with regard to the validity of an EU measure? What type of measure was contested and on what grounds? Please note that while data from 2001–2005 on preliminary references regarding validity is available in a study by Takis Tridimas and Gabriel Gari.⁷² Experts are welcome to comment on the constitutional issues raised by the relevant cases.
- (c) How many preliminary ruling references since 2006 have led to a partial or full annulment of the relevant EU measure? Please specify whether the measure challenged was a decision, directive or regulation, and the grounds for annulment.

Q 2.8.2 Turning to the standard of review, British scholars have pointed to a ‘notable’ contrast between proceedings before the domestic courts against national authorities and in proceedings before the European Courts against EU institutions in matters of economic regulation.⁷³ One judge of the ECtHR has questioned the neutrality of the EU Courts, pointing out that the public interest of the European Union makes it ‘rather difficult for the ECJ to find violations’ of the general principles of law.⁷⁴ Six other ECtHR judges have cautioned against the emergence of ‘double standards’, noting that in the case law of the ECtHR, EU Member States

⁷² Tridimas and Gari 2010, p. 166 et seq.

⁷³ For relevant case law, see Chalmers et al. 2006, pp. 436–437.

⁷⁴ European Court of Human Rights, Concurring Opinion of Judge Ress in Bosphorus Hava Yollari Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Şirketi v. Ireland [GC], no. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

'live under a ... more lenient system' as regards the protection of ECHR rights in areas where they implement EU law.⁷⁵

A statistical study regarding annulments by EU courts in 2001–2005⁷⁶ shows that approximately 6.4% of challenges against measures of general application (directives and regulations) led to annulment in the General Court. It is likely that the success rate in the Court of Justice of challenges brought by the Member States and private parties is broadly at a similar level: the higher overall success rate of 16.1% in the Court of Justice includes the high rate of success (75%) of actions initiated by the EU institutions, compared to the 26.4% success rate of actions initiated by the Member States. The success rate was approximately 35% against decisions of the European Commission in both Courts. The annulment in most cases resulted from non-compliance with the parent EU legislation (review of administrative rule-making rather than review of constitutionality). In most cases the annulment occurred on procedural grounds (especially exceeding delegated powers), with some cases leading to success on the basis of general principles such as proportionality and legitimate expectations. The study notes that fundamental rights grounds did not feature prominently and did not bring success in cases against Union institutions. Note that *Kadi*⁷⁷ and *Schecke*⁷⁸ were decided after the time period studied.

Is the standard of judicial review by the EU Courts considered lower than that in the relevant Member State? What is the Expert's view on this matter? If the standard is deemed lower, is this regarded as justified in view of the objectives sought? Is the standard of review tenable in the long term, given the expansion of EU powers beyond the single market? Given that the CJEU is setting the standards for 28 Member States through the supremacy of EU law, might a case be made for a stricter standard of judicial review of EU measures?⁷⁹

Q 2.8.3 Do the constitutional court, the supreme court and/or other courts overall take a vigorous or a deferential approach to the review of constitutionality/legality of legislation, regulatory acts of the executive branch and administrative action? In systems where the national parliament or its bodies (e.g. the Constitutional Law Committee of the Finnish Parliament) play an important role in ensuring the conformity of legislation with the Constitution, please include them in the account accordingly. If possible, please corroborate the description with a brief summary of statistical data on the proportion of validity challenges concerning domestic (non-EU-related) acts leading to annulment and the main grounds for annulment.

⁷⁵ European Court of Human Rights, Concurring Opinion of Judge Ress, and Joint Concurring Opinion of Judges Rozakis, Tulkens, Traja, Botoucharova, Zagrebelsky and Garlicki in Bosphorus Hava Yolları Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Şirketi v. Ireland [GC], no. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

⁷⁶ Tridimas and Gari 2010, summary of conclusions at p. 170 et seq.

⁷⁷ Joined cases C-402/05 P and C-415/05 P Kadi and Al Barakaat International Foundation v. Council and Commission, supra n. 60.

⁷⁸ Joined cases C-92/09 and C-93/09 Volker und Markus Schecke and Eifert [2010] ECR I-11063.

⁷⁹ For this argument, see Albi 2015b, p. 334.

Q 2.8.4 To what extent does the national constitutional court or supreme court review measures that implement EU legislation (a) in terms of its doctrinal statement; (b) in practice in actual judgments? Has the constitutional court or supreme court adopted a position similar to the German Constitutional Court's Solange II judgment⁸⁰ or the ECtHR's Bosphorus judgment,⁸¹ which assumes that the EU standard of protection of rights is equivalent to the national or ECtHR standard, unless the applicant proves a manifest deficiency?

Q 2.8.5 If the standard of review by the CJEU is regarded as lower than in the relevant Member State and the national constitutional court or supreme court does not, in practice, review measures implementing EU law or assumes the equivalence of the standards of protection, has any concern been expressed about a resulting gap in judicial review? What is the Expert's view on this matter? In the context of EU accession to the ECHR, a concern about a potential gap has been noted in the General Report of the FIDE 2012 Congress Reports Volume 1, which points out that the Bosphorus doctrine effectively shields governments acting within the EU framework from scrutiny. This effect of shielding is even stronger, if it is not only the ECtHR that presumes EU compliance with the ECHR, but also national courts refrain from scrutinising acts under EU law from compatibility with the ECHR on such a presumption.⁸²

Q 2.8.6 In the Advocaten voor de Wereld case, the question of equal treatment of citizens falling under the scope of EU law and falling under the scope of domestic law as regards the interpretation of nulla poena sine lege was raised. Has the broader issue of equal treatment of individuals falling within the scope of EU law and individuals falling within the scope of domestic protection of constitutional rights arisen in the relevant Member State and in the Expert's view?

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

Q 2.9.1 Please comment on any other significant issues that have arisen with regard to constitutional rights or the rule of law in the relevant Member State in relation to EU law.

For example, in some countries, there has been pressure to implement EU requirements that affect individual rights or impose obligations on individuals by a governmental regulation, rather than by a parliamentary statute that requires democratic deliberation, as has traditionally been required by constitutional courts. Implementation by governmental regulation may be seen as a way to increase the speed of implementation, as well as the state's ranking on the European Commission's scoreboard. This issue also arose in the Hungarian Sugar case,⁸³ where the relevant national Act had delegated the adoption of the rules defining the subjects liable to pay a charge and the method of determining the charge to the executive. This was found to be in breach of the constitutional requirement that fundamental rights and duties be exclusively determined by a parliamentary statute.

⁸⁰ German Federal Constitutional Court, Wiünsche Handelsgesellschaft (Solange II), (1987) CMLR 225.

⁸¹ Bosphorus Hava Yollari Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Şirketi v. Ireland [GC], no. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

⁸² Besselink 2012, p. 120, references omitted.

In Ireland, the introduction of indictable offences by a governmental instrument was prohibited; however, this rule was abolished in order to facilitate implementation of obligations necessitated by EU membership.⁸⁴ Have the above issues arisen in the relevant Member State?

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

While 'common constitutional traditions' have formally provided a source of inspiration for the CJEU in identifying the rights protected by EU law, the General Report of the FIDE 2012 Congress Reports Volume 1 on fundamental rights notes that they have not functioned as an important direct source of protection in the case law of the CJEU.⁸⁵ The General Report goes on to remark:

The accent has not been on national traditions but on the European fundamental rights sources. National constitutional traditions are hardly ever referred to except in a most perfunctory manner. They do not play a role that is comparable to that of legal and social developments in the framework of the 'common ground' or 'consensual' approach of the ECtHR. ... In a sense, there has been a shift away from the national to the European context.⁸⁶

Q 2.10.1 The questionnaire for Volume 1 of the FIDE 2012 Congress Reports posed a question to the national rapporteurs on the role of the common and individual constitutional traditions at present and in future.⁸⁷ While this did not lead to significant reflection by the Volume's respondents, the present Questionnaire invites the Experts to further consider this area. What is the Expert's view on which rights and values might form part of the 'common constitutional traditions'?

Could any of the constitutional rights and principles addressed in this Questionnaire be regarded as part of the 'common constitutional traditions', e.g. the principle of nulla poena sine lege, the right to judicial protection, etc.? The German Constitutional Court has noted in the Data Retention case cited in Sect. 2.4 that it is part of Germany's constitutional identity that the citizens' enjoyment of freedom may not be totally recorded and registered. Is this something that could perhaps be

⁸³ Decision 17/2004 (V. 25) AB.

⁸⁴ See for relevant case law Barrett 2013, pp. 154–155.

⁸⁵ Besselink 2012, question 14 at p. 16.

⁸⁶ Besselink 2012, pp. 137–138.

⁸⁷ Besselink 2012, question 14 at p. 16.

regarded as a ‘common constitutional tradition’, rather than as an idiosyncratic element of German constitutional identity?

Q 2.10.2 The Experts are also invited to reflect on whether there might be practical mechanisms for rendering the ‘common constitutional traditions’ a more direct and relevant source in EU law. For example, at present, when national courts send preliminary ruling references to the European Court of Justice, the courts typically refer to the relevant EU and ECHR provisions. Might there be merit in also highlighting the long-standing constitutional rights or safeguards for the rule of law in the national constitution, along with comparative case law on the established standards in different Member States?⁸⁸

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

Article 53 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (Charter) provides: ‘Nothing in this Charter shall be interpreted as restricting or adversely affecting human rights and fundamental freedoms as recognised, in their respective fields of application, by ... the Member States’ constitutions.’

A question on the permissibility of using this provision to retain a higher level of protection under the national constitution was posed to the CJEU by the Spanish Constitutional Court in the above-mentioned Melloni case. The Spanish Constitutional Court noted in its preliminary ruling request that the protection of rights in EU law is autonomous, and that Arts. 47 and 48 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights protect a fair, public hearing and the right to be defended and represented. The Constitutional Court referred to the Explanations to the Charter,⁸⁹ according to which Arts. 47 and 48 are based upon Art. 6 ECHR on fair trial. To this end, the Spanish Constitutional Court noted that the ECHR only provides a minimum floor of protection, while states may grant more extensive protection (Art. 53 ECHR). It went on to note that the level of protection given by the Spanish Constitution, according to the Constitutional Court’s interpretation, is higher than the protection afforded by the ECHR and the EAW Framework Decision. Based on the above, the Spanish Constitutional Court asked whether it could invoke Art. 53 of the Charter to provide a higher level of protection under the national constitution, should the CJEU not find Art. 4a of EAW Framework Decision to be invalid. The CJEU upheld the legality of the measure, and rejected the possibility of granting a higher level of protection under the Constitution, on the grounds that casting doubt on the uniformity of the standard of protection of fundamental rights as defined in ... [the EAW] framework decision, would undermine the principles of mutual ⁸⁸ For a call to this end, see e.g. Torres Pérez 2009, p. 134 et seq., and Albi 2015b, pp. 330–331.

⁸⁹ Explanations Relating to the Charter of Fundamental Rights, [2007] OJ C 303/17.

trust and recognition which that decision purports to uphold and would, therefore, compromise the efficacy of that framework decision.⁹⁰

Prior to the Melloni judgment, the national rapporteurs of Germany, Austria, Hungary, Italy, Portugal, Spain and Bulgaria for the FIDE 2012 Congress Reports, Volume 1, assumed that under Art. 53 of the Charter, the national standard of protection would prevail if higher.⁹¹ Aida Torres Pérez has developed a compelling and comprehensively researched argument in support of allowing a stricter standard of protection under national constitutions based on Art. 53 of the EU Charter, along with a greater degree of deference to national constitutional courts.⁹²

Q 2.11.1 It is common ground that in a significant range of areas and cases, the ECHR has played an important role in increasing the standard of protection of rights in the Member States. However, at the same time, the ECHR sets the minimum floor of protection for 47 countries, and thus at times the national constitutional standard may be higher. Has there been a discussion in the relevant Member State on whether it is justified for the Court of Justice to set the standard of protection for Charter rights at the level of the ECHR, or whether there are areas where there may be a case for increasing the standard to match the level provided under the national constitutions by constitutional courts and/or supreme courts? Additionally, might there be a case for allowing higher standards at national level, along with greater deference to national constitutional courts/supreme courts? What is the Expert's view on this matter?

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

Q 2.12.1 Fair Trials International has noted that the adoption of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision was marked by 'the lack of public engagement in the area of defence rights and the almost total absence of political debate on the subject'.⁹³ In the Expert's observation, was there a public deliberation on constitutional rights in the relevant Member State, at the time of the adoption (or, if not, at the time of the national implementation) of (a) the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision; and (b) the EU Data Retention Directive?

Q 2.12.2 The European Court of Justice ordered Sweden to pay a fine of 3 million EUR for delays in the national implementation of the Data Retention Directive. The CJEU dismissed Sweden's argument that the delays were due to the need ⁹⁰ Case C-399/11 Melloni, supra n. 36, paras. 59 and 63.

⁹¹ Besselink 2012, p. 133 and footnote 177.

⁹² See Torres Pérez 2009, pp. 62 et seq., 92, 162.

⁹³ Fair Trials International submission to the EU Justice and Home Affairs Council Working Group, 9 July 2009, <http://www.fairtrials.net/campaigns>, p. 4.

to respond to an extensive political debate concerning the transposition of Directive 2006/24 into domestic law and that the implementation of the measures required to effect that transposition has led to problems at the legislative procedural level and to difficult choices involving weighing the protection of privacy against the need to combat crime effectively....⁹⁴

The European Commission brought a further enforcement action against Germany, with a fine of 300,000 EUR per day.⁹⁵ The Commission rejected the German Government's argument that the delay had resulted from the Constitutional Court's judgment declaring the transposition measures unconstitutional and void.

In the Expert's analysis, when important constitutional issues have arisen and have been referred to the constitutional court at the stage of implementing EU law, does the present system allow sufficient space for democratic deliberation, constitutional review and accommodation of important constitutional issues? Please also note the restricted standing of private parties to request judicial review of EU legislative measures and the low level of annulment of legislative measures by the CJEU (see Sect. 2.8).

Q 2.12.3 Would the Expert support a recommendation to suspend the application and carry out a review of EU measures, where important constitutional issues have been identified by a number of constitutional courts?

Would the Expert support a recommendation to recognise as a legitimate defence on the part of a Member State in an infringement proceeding that unconstitutionality has been identified in accordance with the domestic system of control of constitutionality?⁹⁶

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

Q 2.13.1 Does the Expert share the concerns about an overall reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights and the rule of law in the context of EU law (except in the areas where the rights arise from EU law, such as free movement, non-discrimination, gender equality and other areas noted in the Introduction to Part 2, or where the rights are enforced vis-à-vis the Member States rather than the EU institutions)?

Q 2.13.2 If the answer to the previous question is 'yes', please answer the following questions.

⁹⁴ Case C-270/11 Commission v. Sweden [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:339.

⁹⁵ Case C-329/12 Commission v. Germany [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2034; see European Commission Press Release, Data retention: Commission takes Germany to Court requesting that fines be imposed, IP/12/530 (31 May 2012), http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-12-530_en.htm.

⁹⁶ The Principal Investigator is grateful to Samo Bardutzky for this question regarding recognition of constitutional defences.

Has the reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights been significant or limited in extent in the Expert's view? Has the reduction been justified and proportionate in view of the overall objectives sought?

Is such reduction inevitable given the objectives of European integration, or has it rather resulted from a lack of wider awareness and debate given issues such as the complexity of multilevel governance? If the reduction of standards is deemed inevitable for the time being given the objectives sought, should the standard be restored in the future when such objectives are achieved, or should such standard remain in place on a continuous basis?

If the reduction is not considered inevitable, what does the Expert consider to be the main ways for upholding and enhancing the protection of constitutional rights? For example,

- EU accession to the ECHR (however, please comment how issues such as increased complexity and the ECHR providing a minimum floor of protection would be addressed);
- A revised approach and enhanced responsiveness by the EU Courts (see question 2.13.3);
- A more proactive role for national constitutional courts and/or supreme courts in highlighting the issues surrounding the standard of protection of constitutional rights in European judicial dialogues;⁹⁷
- A more proactive role for other national institutions, such as national parliaments and ombudsmen, in highlighting constitutional issues in European governance;
- Allowing a stricter standard of protection under national constitutions on the basis of Art. 53 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, and a greater degree of deference to national constitutional courts (see Sect. 2.11);
- Creation of a new independent judicial body, e.g. the European Constitutional Tribunal (with ex ante or ex post review);⁹⁸
- Comments and other solutions.

Q 2.13.3 With regard to the Advocaten voor de Wereld case regarding nulla poena sine lege, concern has been expressed that the European Court of Justice 'refused to make any comment on much-contested issues' and made 'little effort to engage with ...[its] national counterparts'.⁹⁹ Other authors have called upon the Court to 'abandon the cryptic, Cartesian style', which is 'not conducive to a good conversation with national courts',¹⁰⁰ and have noted that 'it is crucial that the Court display in its judgments that national sensibilities were fully considered and taken into account'.¹⁰¹

⁹⁷ For a call to this end, see e.g. Torres Pérez 2009, p. 134 et seq., and Albi 2015b, pp. 330–331.

⁹⁸ Calls to this effect have been put forward by J.H.H. Weiler, R. Herzog and others.

⁹⁹ Sarmiento 2008, pp. 177–178.

¹⁰⁰ Weiler 2001, p. 225.

¹⁰¹ Ibid.

What is the Expert's assessment on the responsiveness of the European Court of Justice with regard to national constitutional concerns? Have constitutional issues been raised by a national court in the relevant Member State in a preliminary ruling request to the CJEU? If so, has the CJEU's judgment been seen as adequately responding to the issue and/or taking the concern sufficiently into account?

If the Expert regards a revised approach by the CJEU as a key solution, please comment on specific potential changes. For example, scholars have recommended revising the autonomous, self-referential interpretation of rights on the part of the CJEU by making systematic use of comparative method in determining the protection of constitutional rights;¹⁰² making the arguments of the parties and of the intervening governments fully available on the Court's website;¹⁰³ a stricter standard of judicial review of EU measures (see Sect. 2.8); and allowing dissenting opinions.

Q 2.13.4 If the Expert sees solutions in a more proactive contribution at the national level, the Expert is welcome to formulate potential constitutional amendment proposals or other regulatory changes that would e.g. mandate a more proactive approach to upholding and shaping constitutional rights, the rule of law, democracy and other substantive constitutional values on the part of national parliaments, courts and other institutions in the context of European governance.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

Introduction The third section of the Questionnaire explores the more recent phenomenon of global governance, which, besides the extensive shift of powers to a multiplicity of international organisations and global institutions, involves a number of important structural changes. These include the rise of global regulatory networks,¹⁰⁴ the shift of global law-making outside the conventional formats of public international law to include a significant amount of rule-making by private and professional bodies,¹⁰⁵ and the wide-spread use of non-binding and non-justiciable yet highly effective soft law. Additionally, the distinction between domestic and international law has increasingly become blurred, as regulators come together in global institutions and set standards that they then implement in their domestic capacity. Indeed, a leading school of scholars regards global governance essentially as 'global administrative law', as regulatory functions are now performed in a global rather than national context.¹⁰⁶ The consequence of such ¹⁰² For a compelling and extensively researched argument to this end, see Torres Pérez, supra n. 88, pp. 144 et seq.

¹⁰³ The author is grateful to Giuseppe Martinico for this point.

¹⁰⁴ Slaughter 2004.

¹⁰⁵ Teubner 1996, p. 3 et seq.

¹⁰⁶ Krisch and Kingsbury 2006, pp. 1–3 and 11.

developments, as Nico Krisch notes, is that ‘the role of treaties as “transmission belts”, ensuring accountability to states and through the ratification process also to the public within states, has become weaker and weaker’.¹⁰⁷

While global governance institutions and networks play a vital role in advancing peaceful co-operation, human rights and democracy, the literature in the field increasingly also highlights important challenges to constitutionalism.¹⁰⁸ Central among them has been the erosion of democratic oversight. Foreign affairs have traditionally formed the prerogative of the executive, and hence countries are typically represented in transnational institutions and networks by their governments. There is also the broader problem of the legitimacy of the power exercised by global governance institutions. Among further challenges are a lack of accountability, deficiencies in legal protection, the capture of regulatory networks by narrow interest groups and a lack of transparency, as decision-makers are not clearly identifiable.¹⁰⁹ Regarding the rule of law as the primary constitutional principle, Anne Peters has shown how the downsides of globalisation affect all the key elements constituting the rule of law, including the requirement that government action must be bound by the law and has to be transparent, the separation of powers with checks and balances, fundamental rights protection, due process and judicial review of governmental action.¹¹⁰ Indeed, Peters concludes that in addition to positive effects, state constitutions have also been invisibly ‘globalised’ ‘in a rather negative way’,¹¹¹ and there has been a ‘hollowing out’ of national constitutions or ‘de-constitutionalisation’ at the domestic level.¹¹²

In order to respond to these problems, the global governance discourse is predominantly looking for solutions to enhance democracy and accountability at the transnational level. However, while global solutions are essential, this project invites the Experts to consider whether the above challenges could also be addressed at the national level, with corresponding adjustments in the national constitutional frameworks.

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

Q 3.1.1 Please briefly outline the constitutional or other provisions that regulate the transfer of powers to international organisations and the ratification of treaties. Do ¹⁰⁷ Krisch 2006, p. 277.

¹⁰⁸ Grimm 2005, p. 458; Peters 2007, p. 260 et seq.; Kiiver 2009.

¹⁰⁹ For different aspects see e.g. Alston 1997, p. 441; Krisch 2006, pp. 247–278; Slaughter 2004; Peters 2007, p. 260 et seq.

¹¹⁰ Peters 2007, p. 271.

¹¹¹ Peters 2007, pp. 254 and 273 et seq. See also Grimm 2005.

¹¹² See also Peters 2005 and 2006.

the relevant provisions contain references to the objectives sought by international co-operation, limits to the delegation of powers and/or values and principles that ought to be upheld by the state when participating in international co-operation? Are there constitutional provisions with regard to specific international organisations or institutions, such as NATO or the International Criminal Court?

Q 3.1.2 If any of the relevant provisions have been introduced since 1990, please outline the aims of the amendment, the amendment process and the conceptual background to the choice of wording. What drove the reform, which obstacles were encountered, which key factors influenced the decisions on the scope and content of the amendment? To what extent was the advice of scholars and experts followed by political decision-makers?

Q 3.1.3 Have any provisions been highlighted as being in need of amendment (e.g. in court decisions, by parliamentary or governmental bodies or in legal commentary), with regard to international law and global governance, especially as regards the question of how constitutional texts could better respond to the transfer of powers to transnational level and more effectively uphold constitutional values in international co-operation? Please also include any attempts at constitutional reform in this field that have not materialised in practice.

Q 3.1.4 Further to Question 1.5.3 in Part 1, please add any additional observations or recommendations regarding the role of the national constitution in the context of international law and global governance, and whether there is a need for amendments in this context. Please outline the potential areas and tentative content of the amendments.

If the Expert sees a solution in a more proactive contribution at the national level, the Expert is welcome to formulate potential amendment proposals or other regulatory changes, which would e.g. mandate a more proactive approach to upholding and shaping democracy, the rule of law, constitutional rights and substantive constitutional values, on the part of national parliaments, courts and other institutions in the context of global governance.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

Q 3.2.1 Please briefly outline the constitutional or other rules governing the application of treaties and their position in domestic law.

Q 3.2.2 It has been commented that neither dualism nor monism in their traditional form are able to capture the diversity of the processes of globalisation.¹¹³ Please outline the legal commentary on the applicability of monism and dualism in the relevant Member State. What is the Expert's view on the continued relevance of the above concepts?

¹¹³ Nollkaemper 2007, p. 11; Von Bogdandy 2008, pp. 399–400.

3.3 Democratic Control

Existing constitutional provisions typically concern the initial formal ratification by parliaments of international agreements or of accession to international organisations. Some scholars have noted the need for extended parliamentary participation in the international negotiation process and prior to the conclusion of a treaty.¹¹⁴ Others have called for continued involvement of national parliaments or their networks with regard to the international organisations beyond the initial conclusion of a treaty, especially in the case of the World Trade Organisation.¹¹⁵ Yet in Europe, the Swiss Parliament is the only legislature to systematically oversee WTO and transnational rules that affect national legislation. The Swiss Constitution was amended to this end in 1992 and further in 1999, to provide that the Federal Assembly shall participate in the shaping of foreign policy and supervise foreign relations (Art. 166).

More effective involvement of parliaments may also be necessary at the stage of implementing international commitments, as shown by a case in Latvia's Constitutional Court, where 9,000 pensioners challenged the constitutionality of a law that reduced their pensions by up to 70% in order to implement an IMF package. The Court noted that the measure had been adopted in a rush, without consultations, and that the IMF package had been very hard for the Court to access. To balance the social impact of the measures in a fairer way, the Latvian Constitutional Court ruled that the contested law was in breach of legitimate expectations, and that the Government must repay the pension reductions in later years when the economy improves.¹¹⁶

Q 3.3.1 Please briefly outline the constitutional and other rules on parliamentary involvement with regard to (a) the initial negotiation and ratification of an accession treaty; and (b) subsequent involvement in scrutinising an international organisation beyond initial ratification of the membership treaty. Are there any aspects in the parliamentary involvement in the relevant Member State that could be regarded as a best practice and could be recommended more widely? If relevant studies are available, please include a summary indicating to what extent the national parliament typically holds a debate on substantive matters arising from international obligations, beyond a formal reference to the requirement to transpose international commitments.

Q 3.3.2 Have any international organisations or treaties been subject to a referendum? If so, what has been the rationale for this procedure, e.g. to enhance legitimacy? Some constitutions contain a ban on referendums on treaties. Please indicate whether this rule applies in the relevant Member State.

¹¹⁴ Peters 2007, p. 283, citing Harrington 2006, pp. 121–160.

¹¹⁵ E.g. Maurer et al. 2005, p. 6 et seq. On the need to ensure parliamentary participation in supranational bargaining, see also Grimm 2005, p. 9.

¹¹⁶ Latvian Constitutional Court, Case No. 2009-43-01, English translation available at: <http://www.satv.tiesa.gov.lv/upload/Judgment%202009-43.htm>.

3.4 Judicial Review

Under the classic rule of pacta sunt servanda, it has come to be a standard expectation that national courts ought not to undermine the commitments of the state under international treaties. The acts of international organisations themselves are normally not challengeable in courts and tribunals. However, given the sheer scope of issues for which decision-making has shifted to the global level, views are increasingly expressed that under certain circumstances there should be a right of review of acts of global institutions, especially if they directly affect individuals.¹¹⁷ The need for such review was particularly propelled into the spotlight by the widely debated Kadi case.¹¹⁸ This concerned UN Security Council resolutions under which the assets of terrorist suspects were frozen without any reasons provided to them or any avenues available for judicial review. The severity of the breach of fundamental rights led to the annulment of the relevant EU measures by the European Court of Justice.

The experience with the Kadi case led Armin von Bogdandy to comment that '[t]here should always be the possibility ... to limit, legally, the effect of a norm or an act under international law within the domestic legal order if it severely conflicts with constitutional principles. This corresponds to the state of development of international law and the sometimes debatable legitimacy of international legal acts ...'.¹¹⁹

Q 3.4.1 What are the relevant rules in the Member State in question? To what extent do courts review, in doctrine and in practice, treaties and measures adopted under international law? Please include case law and constitutional issues arising from parliamentary debates or scholarly commentary. How has judicial review been reconciled with the classic rule of pacta sunt servanda? What is the Expert's view on this matter?

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

The global governance discourse contains a significant volume of literature that is critical of the erosion of the social state and the ever-increasing wealth gap. This is often attributed to the agenda of global economic institutions, which have pushed for liberalisation, deregulation, privatisation of public utilities and other policies representing a belief in the efficiency of unfettered markets.¹²⁰ Serious questions

¹¹⁷ Peters 2007, p. 273, referring to other publications including Cottier and Hertig 2003, pp. 326–327. See also Krisch and Kingsbury 2006, p. 11 and Kiiver 2009, p. 9.

¹¹⁸ Court of Justice, Joined cases C-402/05 P and C-415/05 P, Kadi and Al Barakaat International Foundation v. Council and Commission, supra n. 60.

¹¹⁹ Von Bogdandy 2008, p. 412.

¹²⁰ See e.g. Stiglitz 2002, pp. 442–443.

have also been asked about the mode of rule-making in these organisations. A former Chief Economist at the World Bank, Joseph Stiglitz, has described the IMF as ‘the least transparent’ institution that he has encountered in public life.¹²¹ In any event, the policies of international financial institutions, as Alston notes, have resulted in a dramatically reduced ability for a state to carry out the role of counter-balance, watchdog, regulator and the guarantor of the proverbial fair playing field.¹²² In the context of national constitutions, the erosion of the social element, which has been regarded as traditional to European constitutionalism, has been explored by Anne Peters.¹²³

Q 3.5.1 If the above issues have been of significance in the case law or the constitutional discourse in the relevant Member State, or raise issues in the Expert’s view, please include a summary in this section.

Q 3.5.2 If the country has been subject to a bailout and austerity programme (which has not already been covered in Sect. 2.7.3), please include in this section any issues that may have arisen with regard to IMF/World Bank conditionality in terms of democratic control, transparency, accountability and/or balancing the constitutional rights and social welfare of the citizens and residents against the interests of the international creditor community.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

Q 3.6.1 Please report in this section on any further cases, parliamentary debates and scholarly commentary in areas where constitutional rights, the rule of law, judicial review, democratic control or accountability may have been affected to a significant degree in the context of global governance in the relevant Member State. Some examples may include inclusion in terrorist blacklists, freezing of bank accounts, arrests under anti-terrorist legislation; cases regarding arrest warrants under international agreements and arrest warrants by Interpol; rendition flights and secret prisons. [Editor’s note: we did not initially include concerns about the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP), due the extensive scope of the Questionnaire. However, given that the TTIP subsequently received heightened public attention, which included a European Citizens’ Initiative with 3 million signatures, we informally asked the Experts to report national debates on the TTIP where relevant.] We would also welcome the Expert’s analysis of constitutional issues arising in the context of constitutional rights and values in global governance.

¹²¹ Stiglitz 2002, p. xii.

¹²² Alston 1997, pp. 442–443.

¹²³ Peters 2007, p. 285 et seq.

References

- Albi A. (2005) EU Enlargement and the Constitutions of Central and Eastern Europe. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Albi A. (2010) From the Banana Saga to a Sugar Saga and Beyond: Could the Post-Communist Constitutional Courts Teach the EU a Lesson in the Rule of Law? CML Rev. 47(3):791–829.
- Albi A. (2011) On secret legislation, blanket data recording, arrest warrants and property rights: Questions on the rule of law and judicial review in the EU in the light of post-communist constitutions. In: Popelier P., Van De Heyning C., Van Nuffel P. (eds.) Human Rights Protection in the European Legal Order: The Interaction between the European and the National Courts. Intersentia, Cambridge, pp. 173–210.
- Albi A. (2015a) Erosion of Constitutional Rights in EU Law: A Call for ‘Substantive Co-operative Constitutionalism’ (Part 1). Vienna Journal of International Constitutional Law 9(2):151–185. Available open access at: <http://ssrn.com/author=1246144>.
- Albi A. (2015b) Erosion of Constitutional Rights in EU Law: A Call for ‘Substantive Co-operative Constitutionalism’ (Part 2). Vienna Journal of International Constitutional Law 9(3):291–343. Available open access at: <http://ssrn.com/author=1246144>.
- Alegre S., Leaf M. (2004) Judicial Cooperation: A Step Too Far Too Soon? Case Study – The European Arrest Warrant. ELJ 10:200–217.
- Alston P. (1997) The Myopia of the Handmaidens: International Lawyers and Globalization. EJIL 8:435 et seq.
- Barrett G. (2013) The Evolving Door to Europe: Reflections on an Eventful Forty Years of Article 29.4 of the Irish Constitution. Irish Jurist 132:154 et seq.
- Besselink L. (2006) The Dutch Constitution, the European Constitution and the Referendum in the Netherlands. In Albi A., Ziller J. (eds.) The European Constitution and National Constitutions: Ratification and Beyond. Kluwer, Alphen aan den Rijn, pp. 113–123.
- Besselink L. (2012) Questionnaire. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 1–18.
- Bobek M. (2009) The Binding Force of Babel: The Enforcement of EC Law Unpublished in the Languages of the New Member States. Cambridge Yearbook of European Legal Studies 9:43–80.
- Carrera S., Guild E., Hernanz N. (2013) Europe’s most wanted? Recalibrating Trust in the European Arrest Warrant System. Centre for European Policy Studies Report No. 76, March 2013, p. 16. <http://www.ceps.be/ceps/dld/7957/pdf>.
- Chalmers D., Hadjiemmanuil C., Monti G., Tomkins A. (2006) European Union Law. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Claes M. (2005) Constitutionalizing Europe at its Source: The ‘European Clauses’ in the National Constitutions: Evolution and Typology. Yearbook of European Law 24(1):81–125.
- Claes M., Gerards J. (2012) The Netherlands. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 598–613.
- Coppel J., O’Neill A. (1992) The European Court of Justice: Taking Rights Seriously? CML Rev. 29(4):669–692.
- Cottier T., Hertig M. (2003) The Prospects of 21st Century Constitutionalism. Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law 7(1):261–322.
- De Witte B. (2001) Constitutional Aspects of European Union Membership in the Original Six Member States: Model Solutions for the Applicant Countries? In: Kellermann A., De Zwaan J., Czuczai J. (eds.) EU Enlargement: The Constitutional Impact at EU and National Level. Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 65–80.
- Dobner P., Loughlin M. (2010) Introduction. In: Dobner P., Loughlin M. (eds.) The Twilight of Constitutionalism? OUP, Oxford, pp. xi–xvi.

- Everling, U. (1996) Will Europe Slip on Bananas? The Bananas Judgment of the Court of Justice and National Courts. CML Rev. 33(3):401–437.
- Galera S. (2010a) European legal tradition and the EU legal system: understandings and premises about the rule of law's requirements. In: Galera S. (ed.) Judicial Review: A comparative analysis inside the European legal system. Council of Europe Publishing, Strasbourg, pp. 277–300.
- Galera, S. (2010b) The European contribution to an emerging global law. In: Galera S. (ed.) Judicial Review: A comparative analysis inside the European legal system. Council of Europe Publishing, Strasbourg, pp. 301–308.
- Grimm D. (2005) The Constitution in the Process of Denationalization. Constellations 12(4):447–463.
- Grimm D. (2010) The Achievement of Constitutionalism and its Prospects in a Changed World. In: Dobner P., Loughlin M. (eds.) The Twilight of Constitutionalism? OUP, Oxford, pp. 3–22.
- Groussot X. (2006) General Principles of Community law. Europa Law Publishing, Groningen.
- Harlow C. (2006) Global Administrative Law: The Quest for Principles and Values. EJIL 17 (1):187–214.
- Harrington, J. (2006) Scrutiny and Approval: The Role for Westminster-style Parliaments in Treaty-Making. International and Comparative Law Quarterly 55(1):121–160.
- Herlin-Karnell E. (2010) The integrity of European criminal law co-operation: The nation state, the individual, and the area of freedom, security and justice. In: Amtenbrink F., Van Den Berg P. (eds.) The Constitutional Integrity of the European Union. TMC Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 238 et seq.
- Kiernan F., Brittain S., Donnelly C. (2012) Ireland. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 561–580.
- Kiiver P. (2009) Constitutions in the Age of Internationalisation: Towards Transnational Constitutional Standards (revised version). Concept paper commissioned by the Hague Institute for Internationalisation of Law, <http://www.hiiil.org>.
- Krisch N. (2006) The Pluralism of Global Administrative Law. EJIL 17(1):247–278.
- Krisch N., Kingsbury R.B. (2006) Introduction: Global Governance and Global Administrative Law in the International Legal Order. EJIL 17(1):1–13.
- Laffranque J. (ed.) (2012a) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn.
- Laffranque J. (ed.) (2012b) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn.
- Maurer A., Kietz D., Bendiek A., Parkes R. (2005) Introduction: The Role of Parliaments within the WTO. In: Maurer A. The Role of Parliaments in Scrutinising and Influencing Trade Policy. A Comparative Analysis, Report for the European Parliament. European Parliament, pp. 6 et seq.
- Mitsilegas, V. (2012) General Report: The Area of Freedom, Security and Justice from Amsterdam to Lisbon. Challenges of Implementation, Constitutionality and Fundamental Rights. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 21–142.
- Nollkaemper A. (2007) Introduction. In: Nijman J.E., Nollkaemper A. (eds.) New Perspectives on the Divide Between National and International Law. OUP, Oxford, pp. 11 et seq.
- Peters A. (2005) Global Constitutionalism Revisited. International Legal Theory 11:39 et seq.
- Peters A. (2006) Compensatory Constitutionalism: The Function and Potential of Fundamental International Norms and Structures. LJIL 19(3):579–610.
- Peters A. (2007) The Globalization of State Constitutions. In: Nijman J.E., Nollkaemper A. (eds.) New Perspectives on the Divide Between National and International Law. OUP, Oxford, pp. 260 et seq.

- Rasmussen H. (2006) Denmark's Waning Constitutionalism and Article 20 of the Constitution on Transfer of Sovereignty. In: Albi, A., Ziller J. (eds.) The European Constitution and National Constitutions: Ratification and Beyond. Kluwer, Alphen aan den Rijn, pp. 149–156.
- Sajó A. (2004) Accession's Impact on Constitutionalism in the New Member States. In: Bermann G., Pistor K. (eds.) Law and Governance in an Enlarged European Union. Hart, Oxford, pp. 415–436.
- Sanger A. (2010) Force of Circumstance: The European Arrest Warrant and Human Rights. Democracy and Security 6:17–51.
- Sarmiento D. (2008) European Union: the European arrest warrant and the quest for constitutional coherence. ICON 6(1):171–183.
- Slaughter A.M. (2004) A New World Order. Princeton University Press, Princeton.
- Stiglitz J. (2002) Globalization and its Discontents. Penguin Books, London.
- Storskubb E., Ziller J. (2007) Access to justice in European comparative law. In: Francioni F. (ed.) Access to Justice as a Human Right. OUP, Oxford, pp. 177–204.
- Suksi M. (1993) Bringing in the People: A Comparison of Constitutional Forms and Practices of Referendum. Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Dordrecht.
- Švarc M. (2012) Czech Republic. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 261–288.
- Teubner G. (1996) Global Bukowina: Legal Pluralism in the World Society. In: Teubner G. (ed.) Global Law Without a State. Dartmouth Publishing, Dartmouth, pp. 3 et seq.
- Torres Perez A. (2009) Conflicts of rights in the European Union. A Theory of Supranational Adjudication. OUP, Oxford.
- Tridimas T. (2006) The General Principles of EU Law. OUP, Oxford.
- Tridimas T., Gari G. (2010) Winners and losers in Luxembourg: A statistical analysis of judicial review before the European Court of Justice and the Court of First Instance (2001–2005). E.L.Rev. 35(2):131–173.
- Vitorino A., Leandro Vasconcelos R. (2012) Portugal. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 531–554.
- Von Bogdandy A. (2008) Pluralism, direct effect, and the ultimate say: On the relationship between international and domestic constitutional law. ICON 6(3–4):397–413.
- Weatherill S. (1995) Law and Integration in the European Union. OUP, Oxford.
- Weiler J.H.H. (2001) Epilogue: The Judicial Après Nice. In: De Búrca G., Weiler J.H.H. (eds.) The European Court of Justice. OUP, Oxford, pp. 215–226.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Part II

Political or Historical Constitutions:
The Predominance of Parliament with the Absence of or a Weak Role for a Constitutional Court, and a Generic or ECHR-Based Bill of Rights

Europe's Gift to the United Kingdom's Unwritten Constitution – Juridification

Alison L. Young, Patrick Birkinshaw, Valsamis Mitsilegas
and Theodora A. Christou

Abstract The United Kingdom constitution is the only uncodified constitution in Europe, and is described in the report as evolutionary, historical and predominantly political, responding piecemeal to developments through pragmatic solutions. A central concept is parliamentary sovereignty. The Supreme Court, replacing the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords, started its work in 2009; it can make a declaration of incompatibility with the ECHR, but has no power to annul legislation (although prior to Brexit, the courts were willing to disapply legislation which contravened directly effective provisions of EU law). Fundamental rights are predominantly protected by the Human Rights Act 1998, which incorporates the Alison L. Young is the Sir David Williams Professor of Public Law at the University of Cambridge and a Fellow of Robinson College. e-mail: aly23@cam.ac.uk.

Patrick Birkinshaw is Emeritus Professor of Law, University of Hull. e-mail: P.Birkinshaw@emeritus.hull.ac.uk.

Valsamis Mitsilegas is Head of the Department of Law and Professor of European Criminal Law, Queen Mary University of London. e-mail: v.mitsilegas@qmul.ac.uk.

Theodora A. Christou is Convenor of Transnational Law and Governance and a Post-Doctoral Research Fellow, School of Law, Queen Mary University of London. e-mail: t.a.christou@qmul.ac.uk.

Alison Young wrote Part 1 and Sects. 2.1–2.2 and 2.8–2.13; Patrick Birkinshaw wrote Sects. 2.4–2.7 and Part 3; and Valsamis Mitsilegas and Theodora Christou wrote Sect. 2.3.

All websites accessed 1 August 2015.

A. L. Young (✉)

Robinson College, University of Cambridge, Cambridge, UK
e-mail: aly23@cam.ac.uk

P. Birkinshaw

University of Hull, Hull, UK
e-mail: P.Birkinshaw@emeritus.hull.ac.uk

V. Mitsilegas · T. A. Christou

Queen Mary University of London, London, UK
e-mail: v.mitsilegas@qmul.ac.uk

T. A. Christou

e-mail: t.a.christou@qmul.ac.uk

ECHR into UK law and the common law. A proactive role in raising fundamental rights issues, also in relation to EU law, is played by parliamentary scrutiny committees, NGOs and other institutions. These have contributed e.g. to the subsequent introduction of rights-based safeguards to European Arrest Warrant legislation and of a forum bar with regard to international extradition treaties. In terms of the main comparative influences, UK law is more likely to refer to the principles found in the common law of the US, Australia, Canada and New Zealand. Although European influences are present and have increased, it is unclear how far these influences will remain post Brexit. The report observes that membership of the EU and of the ECHR has helped to subject the UK constitution to juridification. In general, EU law has in many areas enhanced rights protection, e.g. as regards the right to privacy and the general principles of law; indeed, the latter were introduced into the UK through EU and ECHR law. The report does not address the Brexit process, although a brief post scriptum note has been added.

Keywords United Kingdom constitution • Parliamentary sovereignty
Political constitutionalism • European Communities Act • Human Rights Act 1998
Supreme Court • Judicial review • Declaration of incompatibility
European Arrest Warrant, extraditions and proportionality • Symeou case, the presumption of innocence and review of evidence • Data Retention Directive and the Data Retention and Investigatory Powers Act (DRIPA and the Investigatory Powers Act 2016) • Fundamental rights and the rule of law • General principles of law • Juridification of the constitution • Forum bar for international extradition treaties • TTIP • Brexit referendum • Miller

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The United Kingdom constitution is evolutionary, historical and predominantly political. Parliamentary sovereignty, as interpreted by Dicey, states that Parliament can legislate on any subject matter that it wishes; that the courts cannot question duly enacted legislation of the Westminster Parliament and that Parliament is unable to bind its successors as to the content or the manner and form of legislation. Understood in this manner, parliamentary sovereignty prevents the enactment of a legally entrenched Constitution.

However, recent developments question the accuracy of this account of UK constitutional culture. The UK's membership of the EU is one event influencing this change in attitude. First, the supremacy of directly effective EU law questions the accuracy of Dicey's conception of parliamentary sovereignty. Secondly, the way in which courts have modified English law to accommodate supremacy and direct effect may be evidence of a shift away from a political towards a legal constitution based on constitutional principles of the common law – referred to as ‘common law constitutionalism’. This is reinforced by the Human Rights Act 1998 which incorporated the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) into English law. Thirdly, there are legal dicta supporting the claim that courts could, in exceptional circumstances, refuse to enforce legislation.

The constitution remains evolutionary in nature, responding piecemeal to developments through a series of pragmatic solutions to specific problems. Concerns over the role of Europe in the UK constitution may have prompted the ‘in-out’ referendum on Brexit, but to see the result as being solely due to these concerns, and the need for more control, fails to give a full account of the motives of those who voted to leave and the motives of those campaigning on the side of leave. It is probably not too far-fetched to claim even a few days after the result of the Referendum held on 23rd June, that the decision to leave (17,410,742 votes, 51.9%) as opposed to remain (16,141,241 votes, 48.1%) will have huge constitutional implications for the UK and for the rest of the EU.¹

1.1.2 Given its evolutionary nature, it is hard to pinpoint the key rationale of the constitution. Although it is often argued that parliamentary sovereignty is its key principle, the UK constitution also recognises the rule of law, human rights and civil liberties. All of these have importance in the UK constitution and the balance between them constantly evolves.

The principle of the separation of powers has played a much smaller role as regards the organisation of the UK constitution. A further key feature of the UK constitution is the partial fusion, in terms of personnel, of the executive and the legislature. The executive is formed from the political party, or parties, with the majority of seats in the House of Commons and governmental ministers are simultaneously members of the executive and members of the legislature. However, this does not mean that there are no checks and balances. The executive is held to account by the legislature through parliamentary debates, parliamentary questions and departmental select committees. Moreover, there is a firm regard for the principle of the independence of the judiciary² and an ever-growing role of the courts in holding the executive to account for its actions through judicial review.

¹ Given the timing of the referendum and the writing of the report, the potential impact will be dealt with in a postscript, written by A.L. Young and P. Birkinshaw. The main text was submitted on 30 June 2016, with the postscript added on 10 July 2016 and further additions inserted on 17 March 2017 and on 10 February 2018.

² See, in particular, the Constitutional Reform Act 2005.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 The lack of a specific procedure for constitutional amendment makes it difficult to pinpoint a clear amendment of the UK constitution in relation to EU membership. Nevertheless, the UK has enacted legislation in relation to EU membership which has later been regarded by the UK courts as ‘constitutional’. See, for example, *Thoburn v. Sunderland City Council (Thoburn)*³ and R (HS2) v. Secretary of State for Transport (HS2).⁴ It is also now clearly recognised that leaving the European Union is a ‘fundamental change in the constitutional arrangements of the United Kingdom’, implying in turn that the UK’s membership of the European Union was also a fundamental constitutional change.⁵

The European Communities Act 1972 incorporates European Union law into UK law. Its key provisions are as follows:

Section 2

- (1) All such rights, powers, liabilities, obligations and restrictions from time to time created or arising by or under the Treaties, and all such remedies and procedures from time to time provided for by or under the Treaties, as in accordance with the Treaties are without further enactment to be given legal effect or used in the United Kingdom shall be recognised and available in law, and be enforced, allowed and followed accordingly; and the expression ‘enforceable EU right’ and similar expressions shall be read as referring to one to which this subsection applies.
- (2) Subject to Schedule 2 to this Act, at any time after its passing Her Majesty may by Order in Council, and any designated Minister or department may by order, rules, regulations or scheme, make provision
 - (a) for the purpose of implementing any EU obligation of the United Kingdom, or enabling any such obligation to be implemented, or of enabling any rights enjoyed or to be enjoyed by the United Kingdom under or by virtue of the Treaties to be exercised; or
 - (b) for the purpose of dealing with matters arising out of or related to any such obligation or rights or the coming into force, or the operation from time to time, of subsection (1) above;

And in the exercise of any statutory power or duty, including any power to give directions or to legislate by means of orders, rules, regulations or other subordinate instrument, the person entrusted with the power or duty may have regard to the objects of the EU and to any such obligation or rights as aforesaid.

In this subsection ‘designated Minister or department’ means such Ministers of the Crown or government department as may be specified by Order in Council.

- ...
- (4) The provision that may be made under subsection (2) above includes, subject to Schedule 2 to this Act, any such provision (of any such extent) as might be made by Act of Parliament, and any enactment passed or to be passed, other than one contained in this part of this Act, shall be construed and have effect subject to the foregoing provisions of this section; but, except as may be provided by any Act passed after this Act, Schedule 2 shall have effect in connection with the powers conferred by this and the following sections of this Act to make Orders in Council or orders, rules, regulations or schemes.

³ Thoburn v. Sunderland City Council [2002] EWHC 195 (Admin).

⁴ R (HS2) v. Secretary of State for Transport [2014] UKSC 3.

⁵ R (Miller) v. Secretary of State for Exiting the European Union [2017] UKSC 5, para. 78.

1.2.2 The UK has no specific constitutional amendment procedure. Constitutional amendment occurs through ordinary Acts of Parliament, the common law and constitutional conventions. In 2011, the Constitutional Committee of the House of Lords recommended that a different legislative procedure be used for constitutional legislation, including, by implication, legislation amending constitutional provisions.⁶ This was rejected by the Government.⁷ Miller recognised as a fundamental principle of the UK constitution that 'far-reaching change to the UK constitutional arrangements' cannot be 'brought about by ministerial decision or ministerial action alone'.⁸

1.2.3 The European Union Act 2011 could be considered as a recent reform of the UK constitution. This was not prompted by a change in EU law, but rather by a change in politics, recognising a shift towards greater Euro-scepticism. The Act, discussed in more detail below, governs future transfers of sovereignty from the UK to the EU.

1.2.4 There have been no constitutional reform packages in the light of EU membership that did not come to fruition.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 Originally, there were no specific rules relating to the transfer or delegation of power to the EU. Nevertheless, the practice was to enact an Act of Parliament approving of the delegation or transfer of powers to the EU following Treaty revision or amendment. This emerging constitutional convention was placed on a statutory basis by Sect. 5 of the European Union (Amendment) Act 2008, requiring all amendments to the Treaty enacted through the EU's ordinary revision procedure to be approved by an Act of Parliament.

The mere requirement of legislation has now been replaced by a complex series of measures found in the European Union Act 2011 (EUA 2011). This Act now includes three possible forms of procedure for the transfer or delegation of powers to the EU. First, they may require approval by an Act of Parliament and a referendum. Secondly, they may be required to be approved by an Act of Parliament. Thirdly, only parliamentary approval may be required, where a motion is passed in both the House of Commons and the House of Lords approving the transfer of power. The type of procedure required depends upon the subject matter and nature of the measure. However, given the principle of parliamentary sovereignty it is still possible to only use an Act of Parliament to transfer powers to the EU, this later Act impliedly repealing a referendum requirement in the EUA 2011. Whether this implied repeal would succeed or not may depend upon whether the EUA 2011 is classed as a constitutional statute. If so, clear and specific words will be required to repeal the referendum requirement. The European Union (Withdrawal) Act 2018 expressly repeals the European Communities Act 1972, in section 1, and the European Union Act 2011, in Schedule 9, these repeals taking effect on exit day.

⁶ Constitutional Committee of the House of Lords, The Process of Constitutional Change, 15th Report, 2010–2012 Session, HL 177.

⁷ The Government Response to the House of Lords Constitutional Committee Report 'The Process of Constitutional Change' CM 8181, September 2011.

⁸ Supra n. 5, para. 81.

A referendum and an Act of Parliament would normally be required to replace the Treaty on European Union (TEU) or the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) or to amend either of these Treaties through the ordinary revision procedure set out in Arts. 48(2) and 48(5) TFEU. Section 2 of the EUA 2011 provides a precise list of amendments which would require approval by referendum, its main theme being areas which extend the competences of the European Union or which remove limits on the current competences of the Union. Where Treaty amendment or replacement does not increase the competences of the European Union, the referendum requirement is removed. In a similar manner, Sect. 3 of the Act requires any amendment of the Treaties by the simplified revision procedure under 48(6) TFEU to be approved by a referendum and an Act of Parliament, where this would expand the competences of the EU. There is the possibility that the referendum requirement could be avoided, where the expansion of powers of the European Union requires the ability of the EU to impose new obligations on the UK, or to impose sanctions on the UK, where these obligations or sanctions are ‘not significant’ (Sect. 3(4)). A referendum and an Act of Parliament would also be required, were the UK to sign up to the European Public Prosecutor’s Office, to adopt the euro or to remove border controls (Sect. 6). In addition, a referendum and an Act of Parliament would be required to ratify the use of some passarelle clauses (Sect. 6), and certain measures of enhanced co-operation (Sect. 6), whilst their use in less contentious areas would only require an Act of Parliament. An Act of Parliament is required to expand citizenship rights (Sect. 7).

Section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972 and Sect. 18 of the EUA 2011 govern the supremacy and direct effect of EU law. Sects. 2(2) and 2(4) of the European Communities Act 1972 require that all legislation, passed or to be passed, is to be read and given effect subject to the directly effective provisions of EU law. Section 18 EUA 2011 states that

[d]irectly applicable or directly effective EU law (that is the rights, powers, liabilities, obligations, restrictions, remedies and procedures referred to in section 2(1) of the European Communities Act 1972) falls to be recognised and available in law in the United Kingdom only by virtue of that Act or where it is required to be recognised and available in law by virtue of any other Act.

UK law accepts that executive decisions are overridden by directly effective EU law. It is also clear that directly effective EU law overrides legislation enacted by the Scottish Parliament, the Welsh Assembly and the Northern Ireland Assembly.⁹ The more difficult issue concerns the extent to which directly effective provisions of EU law override Acts of the Westminster Parliament. Factortame II granted an interim injunction suspending the application of the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 the provisions of which contravened directly effective EU law.¹⁰ The principle that directly effective provisions of EU law can disapply primary legislation of the Westminster Parliament was confirmed in *Thoburn*¹¹ and more recently in HS2.¹² In addition, the High Court and Court of Appeal have recently ordered that legislative provisions be disapplied in situations where they conflict with rights found in the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (Charter). In *Benkharbouche v. Embassy of the Republic of Sudan*¹³ the Court of Appeal concluded that the State Immunity Act 1978, which granted immunity from legal regulation of the employment regulations of some embassy staff, effectively meant that an applicant could not plead the applicability of provisions of EU law to any employment law dispute. This was seen to be contrary to Art. 47 of the EU Charter. Consequently, the Court of Appeal issued a court order to disapply sections 4(2)(b) and 16(1)(a) of the State Immunity Act 1978. Similarly, the Court of Appeal issued a court order disapplying provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998 which restricted the recovery of damages for breach of data protection provisions to pecuniary loss. The Court of Appeal concluded that Arts. 7 and 8 of the Charter, read in combination with Art. 47 of the Charter, required the ability for individuals to also obtain damage for distress caused by breaches of data protection provisions. Therefore, the provisions of the 1998 statute could be disapplied.¹⁴ In Davis the High Court issued an order, the effect of which was suspended until 1 April 2016, to disapply provisions of the Data Retention and Investigatory Powers Act 2014.¹⁵ The Court of Appeal initiated a preliminary reference under Article 267 in order to determine the extent to which EU law contradicted section 1 of the Act.¹⁶

⁹ Scotland Act 1998, Sect. 29(2)(d); Governance of Wales Act 2006, Sect. 81; Northern Ireland Act 1998, Sect. 6(2)(c).

¹⁰ R v. Secretary of State for Transport ex parte Factortame II [1991] 1 AC 603.

¹¹ Supra n. 3.

¹² Supra n. 4.

¹³ Benkharbouche v. Embassy of the Republic of Sudan [2015] EWCA Civ 33.

¹⁴ Google v. Vidal-Hall [2015] EWCA Civ 311.

¹⁵ R (Davis) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2015] EWHC 2092 (Admin). Discussed in Sect. 2.4.1 below.

¹⁶ Secretary of State for the Home Department v. Davis [2015] EWCA Civ 1185.

There are, arguably, limits on the extent to which the supremacy of directly effective EU law over legislation has been accepted in UK law. First, the decision in Factortame II concerned a conflict between directly effective EU law and a later Act that only repealed the European Communities Act 1972 (ECA 1972) by implication and not expressly – i.e. there was no provision in the later Act expressly repealing the ECA 1972 or stating that the provisions of the later Act were to take effect regardless of the provisions of directly effective EU law or of the ECA 1972. As such, it is arguable that, were legislation to be enacted that expressly repealed or specifically contradicted the ECA 1972, whilst the UK remained a member of the European Union, UK courts would apply the provisions of this Act of Parliament as opposed to the directly effective provisions of EU law.¹⁷ Paul Craig would argue against this conclusion. He argues that the ECA 1972, as interpreted in Factortame II, shifted the rule of recognition defining UK law, such that UK law is not ‘law’ unless it is compatible with directly effective provisions of EU law. Craig would argue that directly effective EU law would prevail even if an Act of Parliament expressly repealed the provisions of the ECA 1972.¹⁸

Secondly, HS2 makes it clear that Factortame II only applies to conflicts between substantive provisions of directly effective EU law and UK legislation and not necessarily to situations where directly effective EU law requires certain procedures to be adhered to by decision-makers. Thirdly, HS2 makes it clear that UK law may not accept that directly effective provisions of EU law override constitutional instruments, constitutional statutes or constitutional principles of the common law.

There have been no cases applying the provisions of the EUA 2011. Commentary on the Act has focused on an assessment of its provisions or on its impact on parliamentary supremacy.¹⁹

1.3.2 There is evidence of a shift in the conceptualisation of sovereignty in UK law. Factortame II accepted that any transfer of sovereignty occurred through an Act of the UK Parliament, namely the ECA 1972. This interpretation is confirmed by Sect. 18 of the EUA 2011. This appeared to accept an absolute conception of sovereignty, with the legislature determining the extent to which sovereignty had been delegated to the EU and the UK retaining its political sovereignty over the EU. Thoburn can be seen as marking a shift towards the argument that it is the UK courts which determine the extent to which sovereignty has been transferred, albeit whilst paying attention to the intention of the legislature, as the sovereignty of Parliament is a principle of the common law. This interpretation is confirmed by the approach of the Supreme Court in HS2. HS2 can be seen as reconceptualising sovereignty in terms of constitutional pluralism, not only confirming that it is for UK law to determine the extent to which the sovereignty of directly effective EU law is recognised in UK law, but also suggesting that supremacy of EU law may reach its limit where directly effective provisions of EU law override constitutional principles.

¹⁷ See Wade 1996.

¹⁸ See Craig 2011a.

¹⁹ See Craig 2011b; Gordan and Dougan 2012, and Peers 2013.

1.3.3–1.3.4 There are no express or implied statutory restrictions on the extent to which sovereignty can be transferred or delegated to the EU. The extent to which the UK Supreme Court, formerly the House of Lords, has accepted the supremacy of directly effective EU law over the national constitution is a matter of academic discussion. The leading case on this issue is the recent Supreme Court decision in HS2. It could be argued that by accepting the principle of the supremacy of directly effective EU law at all, UK law has already accepted the supremacy of EU law over the national constitution, as this acceptance required a modification to the constitutional principle of parliamentary sovereignty. This is reinforced by the fact that Factortame II required the court to grant an injunction against an officer of the Crown, suspending the application of an Act of Parliament. This was a clear change of constitutional principle.

However, the HS2 case injects a note of caution into this assessment. Statements in the case suggest that although UK law generally accepts that statutory provisions that cannot be interpreted to comply with directly effective EU law can be disapplied, this may not be the case with regard to constitutional statutes, constitutional principles or constitutional instruments. See in particular the statement in the joint judgment of Lord Neuberger and Lord Mance:

It is, putting the point at its lowest, certainly arguable (and it is for United Kingdom law and courts to determine), that there may be fundamental principles, whether contained in other constitutional instruments or recognised at common law, of which Parliament when it enacted the European Communities Act of 1972 did not either contemplate or authorise the abrogation.²⁰

In particular, it may not be the case that directly effective EU law could override Art. 9 of the Bill of Rights 1689 which protects parliamentary privilege, preventing the courts from questioning proceedings in Parliament. Similarly, in the recent Miller case, the Supreme Court suggested that directly effective provisions of EU law would not override the requirements of parliamentary sovereignty.²¹

Lord Neuberger's and Lord Mance's statement is clearly dicta. However, it is extremely influential. No conclusive list was provided of the measures deemed to be 'constitutional', although mention was made of the Magna Carta 1215, the Petition of Rights 1628, the Bill of Rights Act 1689 (Claim of Rights Act 1689 in Scotland), the Act of Settlement 1701, the Act of Union 1707, the European Communities Act 1972, the Human Rights Act 1998 and the Constitutional Reform Act 2005.

The HS2 judgment also appears to confirm a shift in attitude of the UK courts towards the adoption of constitutional pluralism. As was the case with the judgment of Laws LJ in Thoburn, the Supreme Court is clear to point out that it is for UK law, enacted through valid legislation at Westminster and decisions of the UK courts, to determine the extent to which supremacy is granted to directly effective EU law. Despite this, it is also clear that UK courts, generally, favour EU-friendly interpretations of legislation. However, this friendliness cuts both ways. As HS2 also illustrates, where there are conflicting interpretations of EU law, one of which would be compatible with the constitution and the other not, UK courts will prefer the interpretation that complies with the national constitution.²²

²⁰ [2014] UKSC 3, para. 207.

²¹ Miller, supra n. 5, paras. 60 to 62 and para. 67.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 There are two sources of rules concerning the participation of the Westminster Parliament in the EU decision-making process. First, there are statutory provisions found in the EUA 2011 that require specific participation of the national Parliament before a Minister is able to approve an EU decision. Secondly, there are internal rules of Parliament designed to facilitate the participation of Parliament in the EU decision-making process.

Requirements of the European Union Act 2011 Some decisions cannot be adopted without an Act of Parliament, either on its own or in addition to a referendum. In particular, an Act of Parliament and a referendum are required before a Minister can adopt decisions on common EU defence or adopt decisions under Art. 4 of Protocol 21 on freedom, security and justice (Sect. 6). An Act of Parliament is required to approve of decisions modifying the election of Members of the European Parliament (MEPs); conferring more jurisdiction to the European Court of Justice (CJEU); changing the EU's system of own resources; changing the number of EU Commissioners; restricting the free flow of capital and to replace Protocol 12 (Sect. 7).

The Act also requires an Act of Parliament to approve decisions made under Art. 352 TFEU. This requirement is subject to two exceptions. First, with regard to a matter of urgency, where the measure, and the urgent nature of the measure, have been approved by a resolution of both Houses of Parliament, then the measure need only be laid before Parliament (Sect. 8). Secondly, where the measure taken under Art. 352 is equivalent to a previous measure taken under Art. 352; or prolongs or renews a measure already taken under Art. 352; or extends a measure taken under Art. 352 to another Member State or third country; or consolidates previous measures taken under Art. 352 with no change of substance, then the measure need only be laid before Parliament (Sect. 8).

The Act also requires parliamentary approval of both Houses for measures relating to other areas, including, inter alia, the enhancement of judicial co-operation in civil matters (Sect. 9), the free movement of services and social security provisions (Sect. 10).

²² See the recent lecture by Lord Reed recognising the shift in approach of the Supreme Court: http://www.lincolnsinn.org.uk/images/word/education/euro/EU_Law_and_the_Supreme_Court.pdf.

Requirements of the parliamentary rules The European Scrutiny Committee of the House of Commons scrutinises proposals for legislation, white and green papers from the Commission and also other documents that are laid before Parliament on an ad hoc basis from the Government. The House of Lords European Union Committee scrutinises draft legislation, documents submitted by one institution of the European Union to another, and draft decisions made under Title V and Title VI TFEU.

The Government decides whether an EU document should be presented for scrutiny. This is carried out by the Cabinet Office, assisted by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for Title V and Title VI TFEU issues, and the Treasury with regard to the EU budget. Each document laid before Parliament is accompanied by an Explanatory Memorandum, written by civil servants, which includes a summary of the EU document, the legal policy, the financial implications, the view of the Government on the measure and also the relevant timetable for the measure before the Council of Ministers.

The European Scrutiny Committee of the House of Commons meets weekly to examine documents and reports to the House of Commons as to whether there is a need for further reconsideration of the document in the Committee, or for further debate on the floor of the House. The Committee cannot require that a debate be held. The Government has to find time to hold such a debate. The Committee can also write reports and frequently questions Ministers on EU issues. In the parliamentary session for 2011–2013, the Committee scrutinised 980 documents, of which 506 were reported as legally or politically important. It held only 38 debates in Committee and 12 debates on the floor of the House.

The European Union Committee of the House of Lords also meets weekly, supplemented by a series of Sub-Committees dedicated to specific areas of EU law, with the Committee also making arrangements to sift documents during the parliamentary recess. The Committee Chair sifts through the documents to determine whether they should be cleared or considered for further debate either in one of the Sub-Committees or on the floor of the House of Lords. If the European Union Committee recommends debate on the floor of the House of Lords, time must be found for this debate. Most documents are either cleared or debated in one of the European Union Sub-Committees.

The House of Commons Scrutiny Reserve Resolution of 17 November 1998 and the House of Lords Scrutiny Reserve Resolution of 16 March 2010 require that a Minister not agree to a decision unless scrutiny has been completed, or that this requirement be waived. For scrutiny to be completed for the House of Commons, the document must either be cleared through Committee, or a debate on the floor of the House must be held and the House of Commons must pass a resolution approving the measure. For scrutiny to be completed by the House of Lords, the measure must either be cleared at the sifting stage, or cleared by a Sub-Committee of the European Union Committee, or a debate on the matter must be held in the House of Lords. However, this requirement is only politically and not legally binding. There is criticism that Ministers often abstain or acquiesce on a measure that has not been cleared, considering this to adhere to the rules, as they have not ‘agreed’ to the measure.

1.4.2 There have been two referendums in the UK relating to the European Union – the referendum in 1975 on continuing membership and the referendum on 23 June 2016 voting to leave the EU. The 1975 referendum was the first major UK-wide referendum. In addition to referendums concerning EU membership, the UK has held a series of referendums on devolution issues, most recently on Scottish independence, and one referendum on the modification of the voting process to proportional representation.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.3 There have been no EU-specific amendments. The lack of a clear set of EU-related constitutional amendments is due to the ease with which the UK constitution can evolve. This flexibility can be advantageous. However, it means that there can sometimes be little public debate surrounding the relationship between the EU and the national parliaments. A debate on these issues would be welcomed to ensure greater awareness of the role of Europe and to provide greater legitimacy and democratic accountability of the European law-making process.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Fundamental rights are predominantly protected in UK law by the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998), which incorporates the European Convention on Human Rights into English law. However, the Conservative Government had planned to ‘scrap’ the Human Rights Act and replace this with a British Bill of Rights.²³ Courts do not have the power to strike down legislation enacted by the Westminster Parliament. However, courts must interpret legislation in a manner compatible with Convention rights, so far as it is possible to do so (HRA 1998 Sect. 3). Courts may read words into legislation, as well as read down broad words, to achieve Convention-compatibility.²⁴ Where this is not possible, courts of the level of the high court or above may issue a declaration of incompatibility. This declaration of incompatibility does not affect the legal effect, validity or force of the legislation declared incompatible with Convention rights (HRA 1998 Sect. 4).

²³ Queen’s Speech 2015, <https://www.gov.uk/government/speeches/queens-speech-2015>. Following the snap general election, the current minority Conservative Government has delayed plans to replace the Human Rights Act until after Brexit.

²⁴ See Ghaidan v. Godin-Mendoza [2004] UKHL 30 and Home Department v. AF (No 3) [2009] UKHL 28.

Legislation declared incompatible may be modified by secondary or primary legislation (HRA 1998 Sect. 10). It is also unlawful for a public authority to act in a manner incompatible with Convention rights (HRA 1998 Sect. 6). The devolved legislatures do not have the power to enact primary or secondary legislation that is contrary to Convention rights (Scotland Act 1998, Sect. 29(2)(d); Governance of Wales Act 2006, Sect. 81; Northern Ireland Act 1998, Sect. 6(2)(c)).

In addition, UK law recognises fundamental/constitutional principles of the common law. These principles extend beyond human rights to incorporate aspects of the rule of law, including legal certainty and non-retroactivity. Constitutional principles are used when interpreting the common law, administrative acts and primary and secondary legislation. In particular, UK courts have developed the principle of legality whereby legislation will only be interpreted in a manner contrary to constitutional principles of the common law where there are clear and precise words to indicate that Parliament specifically intended to legislate contrary to these principles.²⁵ Constitutional principles of the common law are also used to develop specific heads of judicial review. For example, the principle of legal certainty has been used to develop a doctrine of substantive legitimate expectations.²⁶ The principle of proportionality is recognised, but it is not currently a general standard of judicial review in UK law.²⁷ However, there are dicta in recent judgments of the UK Supreme Court which suggest that English law may be on the verge of accepting proportionality as a general standard of review. In Kennedy,²⁸ Lord Mance recognised that both proportionality and the traditional test of *Wednesbury*²⁹ unreasonableness require the courts to consider issues of weight and balance when determining whether the outcome of an exercise of discretionary power is unlawful. Moreover, both proportionality and unreasonableness can be applied more or less stringently, depending on the circumstances of the case. Consequently, the real distinction between the two tests is not that a test of proportionality is necessarily more stringent than a test of unreasonableness, but rather that proportionality brings the advantage of structure to the judicial review of discretionality power. Similar dicta is found in Pham,³⁰ where Lord Mance repeated his observations in Kennedy, with similar statements found in the judgment of Lord Carnwath. In Keyu arguments were specifically put to the Supreme Court for the adoption of proportionality as a general test of review.³¹ Nevertheless, the Supreme

²⁵ See R v. Home Secretary ex parte Pierson [1998] AC 539, R v. Lord Chancellor, ex parte Witham [1998] QB 575, R v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex parte Simms [2000] 2 AC 115.

²⁶ R v. North and East Devon Health Authority, ex p Coughlan [2001] QB 213.

²⁷ R (ABCIFER) v. Defence Secretary [2003] EWCA Civ 473.

²⁸ Kennedy v. Charity Commission [2014] UKSC 20.

²⁹ Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v. Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 KB 223.

³⁰ Pham v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2015] UKSC 19.

³¹ Keyu v. Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2015] UKSC 69.

Court declined the opportunity to adopt proportionality as a general standard of review in English law.³² Lord Neuberger concluded that such a large constitutional change should be made by a court composed of nine as opposed to five Justices of the Supreme Court. Although the judgments in Keyu contain references to the dicta found in Kennedy and Pham, they also contain statements which suggest that the test of proportionality may only be suitable for cases involving rights.³³

It is clear that the test of proportionality is applied by UK courts when applying EU law, when required by Convention rights through an application of the HRA 1998, in applying common law fundamental rights and when determining whether public policy reasons can justify renegeing on a substantive legitimate expectation.³⁴ The UK courts apply a four stage test of proportionality: (i) whether the objective is sufficiently important to justify restricting a fundamental right; (ii) whether there is a rational connection between the restriction placed on the right and this objective; (iii) whether a less intrusive restriction could have been used to achieve this objective and (iv) whether a fair balance was struck between the right and the objective.³⁵ The UK courts use deference when applying the test of proportionality, modifying the stringency with which it is applied according to subject matter, focusing on the relative constitutional and institutional features of the courts, the legislature and the executive. The nature of the proportionality test has been influenced by EU law, the case law of the ECHR and provisions found in other common law countries, particularly Canada.

2.1.2 There is currently no general provision in UK law establishing the extent to which all fundamental rights can be restricted. When applying Convention rights, UK law adopts the proportionality test used to determine the extent to which certain Convention rights may be limited to achieve a legitimate aim.

2.1.3 The rule of law is recognised as a constitutional principle of the common law. Section 1 of the Constitutional Reform Act 2005 states that nothing in the Act affects ‘the existing constitutional principle of the rule of law’. The rule of law is both formal and substantive.³⁶ To date, ‘breach of the rule of law’ is not a head of judicial review in and of itself. Nevertheless, the rule of law is justiciable. The various heads of judicial review exemplify the rule of law, by ensuring that administrative actions are controlled by the judiciary.³⁷ The rule of law is used to interpret the scope of heads of judicial review, to ensure that legal principles prevent arbitrary decision-making by the executive. It is also used as a justification

³² Ibid.

³³ This approach is confirmed in Youssef v. Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2016] UKSC 3, paras. 55–56.

³⁴ R (Nadarajah) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] EWCA Civ 1363.

³⁵ Bank Mellat v. Her Majesty's Treasury (No. 2) [2013] UKSC 38, [2013] UKSC 39.

³⁶ R v. Secretary of State for the Home Department ex parte Pierson [1998] AC 539, 591 (Lord Steyn).

³⁷ R (Cart) v. Upper Tribunal [2011] UKSC 28, [2012] 1 AC 663, para. 37 (Lady Hale).

for the creation of new heads of judicial review and of the principle of legality.³⁸ However, given the competing principle of parliamentary legislative supremacy, when courts strike down executive measures, it is possible for Parliament to re-enact these measures, even retrospectively.³⁹

Courts will also ensure that administrative bodies take into account possible implications for the rule of law as a relevant consideration. A failure to take into account a relevant consideration may mean that a decision of the administration will be quashed.⁴⁰ However, courts may defer to the executive as regards the extent to which rule of law considerations are to be balanced with other interests, particularly the balance between upholding the rule of law and maintaining national security.⁴¹ The rule of law may also require the administration to produce guidelines explaining how it will exercise its discretion, where discretion is used to mediate the impact of a blanket provision restricting a fundamental right.⁴² Courts may also scrutinise these guidelines to ensure their compatibility with Convention rights.⁴³

The rule of law also underpins the constitutional principle of open justice. This principle requires judicial cases to be heard in public, unless private hearings are strictly necessary to ensure justice between the parties and the requirements of privacy are kept to an absolute minimum.⁴⁴ It also requires disclosure to newspapers of information placed before the court where this is required for serious journalistic purposes.⁴⁵ The principle of open justice can be restricted where there are good reasons, or where its restriction is required by clearly-expressed wording in legislation. It is for courts to determine the scope of the constitutional principle of open justice.⁴⁶

The right to judicial review is regarded as a constitutional principle of the common law. It is a long-standing principle of the common law that courts will require extremely clear words in legislation to oust judicial review of a specific decision.⁴⁷ Although it is possible for legislation to be enacted that does oust ³⁸ See R v. Home Secretary ex parte Pierson [1997] UKHL 37; R v. Lord Chancellor, ex parte Witham [1998] QB 575, R v. Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex parte Simms [2000] 2 AC 115.

³⁹ Ahmed v. Her Majesty's Treasury [2010] UKSC 2, where the courts used the principle of legality to strike down the Terrorism (United Nations Measures) Order 2006. The impact of this decision was reversed, retrospectively, by the Terrorist Asset-Freezing (Temporary Provisions) Act 2010, itself replaced by the Terrorist Asset-Freezing etc. Act 2010 which effectively replicated the executive orders, placing them on a legislative footing and thereby immune from judicial review.

⁴⁰ R v. Coventry Airport, ex parte Phoenix Aviation [1995] 3 All ER 37 and R (Cornerhouse) v. Director of Serious Fraud Office [2008] UKHL 60.

⁴¹ R (Cornerhouse) v. Director of Serious Fraud Office [2008] UKHL 60.

⁴² R (Purdy) v. DPP [2009] UKHL 45.

⁴³ R (Nicklinson) v. Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38.

⁴⁴ Bank Mellat v. Her Majesty's Treasury (No. 2)[2013] UKSC 38, [2013] UKSC 39.

⁴⁵ R (Guardian) v. City of Westminster Magistrates Court [2010] EWCA Civ 420.

⁴⁶ Kennedy v. Charity Commission [2014] UKSC 20, and A v. British Broadcasting Corporation [2014] UKSC 25.

⁴⁷ Anisminic v. Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 2 AC 147 and R (Cart) v. Upper Tribunal [2011] UKSC 28.

judicial review, such clauses are strongly criticised by the judiciary and academic commentary.⁴⁸ There are also judicial dicta which state that, were legislation to be enacted that abolished judicial review, courts would not recognise such legislation as a valid Act of Parliament.⁴⁹ The Court of Appeal has also recognised access to the court as a fundamental right. This prevents individuals from being impeded in their access to courts, but does not extend to a positive obligation to provide information on legal rights.⁵⁰ The principle may, however, provide a means of challenging restrictions on the provision of legal aid, were this to prevent effective access to the courts.⁵¹ The principle was recently used to prevent the setting of fees that made it practically impossible for individuals to bring a case before a tribunal.⁵²

There is no specific constitutional principle that non-published laws are invalid. However, there is a requirement to publish primary legislation, as well as national statutory instruments. Circulars and policy documents need not be published. However, where a policy has been published, an individual has a right to have his case determined according to the published policy and not according to a secret, unpublished policy that contradicts the requirements of the published policy.⁵³ Also, if a policy informs discretionary decision-making, where those affected by that discretion would expect to have a right to make representations to the public body as to how the public body's discretion should be exercised, then the policy must be made available.⁵⁴ However, it may not be the case that non-publication renders the measure invalid.⁵⁵ UK law has also developed a principle of notice. Notice of an individual decision is required before it can have the character of a determination with legal effect.⁵⁶

Legal certainty is also recognised as a constitutional principle of the common law. There is no specific legal principle of non-retroactivity and it is possible, though rare, for legislation to be enacted with retrospective effect, even if this adversely affects an individual's rights previously upheld by the courts.⁵⁷ However,

⁴⁸ See for example the strongly-worded comments of Lord Woolf, reacting to the proposal to oust judicial review for immigration decisions. <http://www.law.cam.ac.uk/faculty-resources/download/lord-woolf-squire-centenary-lecture-the-rule-of-law-and-a-change-in-constitution-transcript/1415/pdf>. The clause was eventually removed from the Bill.

⁴⁹ R (Jackson) v. Attorney General [2005] UKHL 56, [2006] 1 AC 262, para. 102 (Lord Steyn) and at para. 107 (Lord Hope); AXA General Insurance v. Lord Advocate [2011] UKSC 46, [2012] 1 AC 868, at para. 51 (Lord Hope).

⁵⁰ R (Children's Rights Alliance) v. Secretary of State for Justice [2013] EWCA Civ 34.

⁵¹ R (Public Law Project) v. Secretary of State for Justice [2014] EWHC 2365 (Admin).

⁵² R (Unison) v. Lord Chancellor [2017] UKSC 51.

⁵³ Walumba Lumba v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2011] UKSC 12.

⁵⁴ Walumba Lumba v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2011] UKSC 12; R (Reilly) v. Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2013] UKSC 68.

⁵⁵ R (Reilly) v. Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2013] UKSC 68, [2014] AC 453, para. 65.

⁵⁶ Anufrijeva v. Immigration Appeal Tribunal [2002] EWCA Civ 1628.

⁵⁷ Recent examples include the War Damages Act 1965, the War Crimes Act 1991, the Terrorist Asset-Freezing (Temporary Provisions) Act 2010 and the Jobseekers (Back to Work Scheme) Act recently the High Court, and later the Court of Appeal, declared retrospective legislation incompatible with Art. 6 ECHR in the specific situation where the retrospective legislation enacted had interfered with the outcome of a legal case concurrently being determined by the court.⁵⁸ There is also no specific prevention of the creation of executive actions with retroactive effect, though the existence of retroactivity may be regarded as evidence of an unreasonable exercise of discretionary power.⁵⁹ There is a protection of both procedural and substantive legitimate expectations.⁶⁰ There is a stronger protection of individual substantive representations than of general policy decisions, and it is easier to require public bodies to adhere to a procedural as opposed to a substantive legitimate expectation. Public authorities may renege on an individual representation or a published policy where to do so is for the public good and is a proportionate response. The principle can also be used to ensure that published policies are applied to individuals, again subject to the proviso that the policy may not be applied where this is a proportionate response for good public policy reasons.⁶¹

The Bill of Rights requires parliamentary authority for the imposition of taxation.⁶² This does not extend to the imposition of administrative charges, penalties or obligations. There is also a residual ability of the courts to use the common law to create new criminal offences which have not been established by statute, where this is required to prevent offences that are prejudicial to the public welfare.⁶³

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 The balancing of fundamental rights and economic freedoms in EU law has not raised constitutional issues in the UK. There has, however, been considerable academic criticism of *Viking Line*⁶⁴ and Laval.⁶⁵

2013. All of these examples, apart from the War Crimes Act 1991, are retrospective legislative provisions designed to overturn court decisions quashing executive action.

⁵⁸ R (Reilly) v. Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2014] EWHC 2182 (Admin) and [2016] EWCA Civ 413. It is believed that the Government will appeal this decision. For commentary see Harlow C, ‘Judging Parliament: the Jobseekers case’ UK Const. L. Blog (3rd October 2014) <http://ukconstitutionallaw.org>.

⁵⁹ Congreve v. Home Office [1976] QB 629.

⁶⁰ R v. Devon Health Authority ex parte Coughlan [2001] QB 213.

⁶¹ R (Nadarajah) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] EWCA Civ 1363 and R (Rashid) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] EWCA Civ 744.

⁶² Article 4, Bill of Rights Act 1688.

⁶³ R v. R [1992] 1 AC 599.

⁶⁴ Case C-438/05 The International Transport Workers' Federation and The Finnish Seamen's Union [2007] ECR I-10779.

⁶⁵ Case C-341/05 Laval un Partneri [2007] ECR I-11767.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 The presumption of innocence Article 6(2) of the ECHR provides the presumption of innocence guarantee;⁶⁶ it has been held to be applicable to extradition proceedings where they are a direct consequence, and the concomitant, of the criminal investigation pending against an individual.⁶⁷ At the EU level, the presumption of innocence is clearly set out in Art. 48(1) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights. It is also listed amongst the rights of which individuals must be informed in the letter of rights introduced under the Stockholm Roadmap.⁶⁸

The Framework Decision on the European Supervision Order⁶⁹ (ESO) is an example of how ‘flanking measures’ are assisting in making the operation of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) increasingly compliant with human rights. The ESO reinforces the presumption of innocence by minimising the risk that non-residents will be remanded for many months in custody pending trial.

The Nikolics case was an EAW case on appeal from the District Court, where reliance on the presumption of innocence was unsuccessful. There ‘was a suggestion that the presumption of innocence is not in fact applied to them in the same way as non-Roma defendants’.⁷⁰ The Court found that there was insufficient evidence of discrimination; the argument was not that the issuance of the arrest warrant was for extraneous grounds, but rather the threat of discrimination upon return to Hungary, which could mean an increased likelihood of being held in remand.

2.3.1.2 Preliminary judicial review and review of evidence In England and Wales, a preliminary judicial review takes place; this is essentially an administrative review to ensure that the procedural requirements have been met. However, in its implementing laws the UK has introduced a number of grounds upon which ⁶⁶ Geerings v. the Netherlands, no. 30810/03, 1 March 2007. The confiscation order imposed on the applicant was based on a presumption of guilt. ‘It amounts to a determination of the applicant’s guilt without the applicant having been “found guilty according to law”’ (§50). The Court reiterated that this applies to both judicial decisions and statements by public officials. See Daktaras v. Lithuania, no. 42095/98, ECHR 2000-X.

⁶⁷ Ismoilov and Others v. Russia, no. 2947/06, 24 April 2008. See also Gaforov v. Russia, no. 25404/09, § 208, 21 October 2010 referring to Ismoilov.

⁶⁸ Resolution of the Council of 30 November 2009 on a Roadmap for strengthening procedural rights of suspected or accused persons in criminal proceedings, [2009] OJ C 295/01 (Stockholm Roadmap). Specifically, Directive 2012/13/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 May 2012 on the right to information in criminal proceedings, [2012] OJ L 142/1.

⁶⁹ Council Framework Decision 2009/829/JHA of 23 October 2009 on the application, between Member States of the European Union, of the principle of mutual recognition to decisions on supervision measures as an alternative to provisional detention, [2009] OJ L 294/20.

⁷⁰ Laszlo Nikolics v. The City Court of Szekszard (A Judicial Authority in Hungary) [2013] EWHC 2377 (Admin) 2013.

surrender can be resisted. These include dual criminality (where required); extraneous considerations; passage of time; human rights; or where the physical or mental condition of a wanted person would make surrender unjust or oppressive.

Even prior to the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant (EAWFD),⁷¹ requesting states did not have to show a prima facie case before extradition could be granted. As such, it continues to be the case that a review of the evidence is not undertaken. This is in line with the EAWFD and the principle of mutual recognition, and thus courts do not review the evidence prior to surrendering a person;⁷² it is left for the issuing Member State to be satisfied that sufficient evidence exists for prosecution before they issue an EAW.

In England and Wales, prior to an arrest being made pursuant to an EAW, the National Crime Agency⁷³ conducts an administrative assessment whereby it reviews the form and content of the EAW. The conditions to be satisfied are set out under Sect. 2 Extradition Act 2003 (EA); these are procedural requirements relating primarily to the contents of the EAW, which must contain: either a statement stating that the person in question is accused in the issuing Member State of the commission of a specified offence or a statement that the warrant has been issued for the purposes of arrest and prosecution, including particulars of the person's identity, any other warrant in respect of the offence, the circumstances under which it is alleged the offence was committed or the sentence imposed. If satisfied, the EAW is 'certified' and passed onto the Police who undertake to locate and arrest the requested person. This process looks only at the validity of an EAW and whether the correct boxes have been ticked and completed, but not whether the information contained is correct.⁷⁴

The administrative check does not consider substantive issues which may question the lawfulness of the issuing Member State warrant and could merit the non-execution of the EAW. Pre-arrest, such issues are not considered by a judge, since there is no check similar to that under Sect. 71 EA.⁷⁵ The initial hearing is

⁷¹ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁷² Symeou v. Greece [2009] EWHC 897 (Admin).

⁷³ The Serious Organized Crime Agency (SOCA) came into force on 1st April 2006 and was replaced by the NCA on 7 October 2013. The NCA and previously SOCA act as the UK point of contact for Interpol, Europol and as the UK Central Authority for all EAWS.

⁷⁴ See Zakrzewski v. The Regional Court in Lodz, Poland [2013] UKSC 2, para. 8.

⁷⁵ Section 71A EA (arrest warrant following extradition request) reads:

(1) This section applies if the Secretary of State sends documents to the appropriate judge under Sect. 70.

(2) The judge may issue a warrant for the arrest of the person whose extradition is requested if the judge has reasonable grounds for believing that –

(a) the offence in respect of which extradition is requested is an extradition offence, and
(b) there is evidence falling within subsection (3).

(3) The evidence is – (a) evidence that would justify the issue of a warrant for the arrest of a person accused of the offence within the judge's jurisdiction, if the person whose extradition is requested is accused of the commission of the offence;

also administrative in nature (confirming the identity, setting the date for the hearing, asking if the person consents to surrender and determining if the person is to be remanded in custody or bailed). The first opportunity at which a court can consider whether the issuing Member State's arrest warrant is lawful is during the extradition hearing, at which point the individual will have already been deprived of liberty if held on remand.

Arguments relating to the lawfulness and arbitrariness of an arrest are normally dealt with together with arguments against surrender. Arbitrariness⁷⁶ includes for example where an issuing Member State requests an individual for prosecution, when in reality they are requesting the individual for further investigation or questioning; here they are not using the EAWFD for the intended purposes. English courts have an inherent right to ensure that the process is not abused for a 'collateral and improper purpose'⁷⁷ and in some circumstances 'to question statements made in the EAW'.⁷⁸ According to Lord Sumption in Zakrzewski, this is exceptional and subject to four observations, which include looking only at administrative inaccuracies concerning material errors and not factual or evidential challenges of the alleged offence, which is reserved for the issuing Member State.⁷⁹

The English courts have made it clear that 'under the scheme of the Framework Decision the safeguard against the inappropriate issue of an EAW lies in the process antecedent to the issue of the EAW',⁸⁰ and what they receive in an EAW will be taken at face value. This has been confirmed by the Supreme Court, which has stated that there are two safeguards: first 'the mutual trust between states party to the Framework Decision that informs the entire scheme',⁸¹ trusting that the issuing Member State has submitted the truth and, secondly, the restricted abuse of power check discussed above.

(b) evidence that would justify the issue of a warrant for the arrest of a person unlawfully at large after conviction of the offence within the judge's jurisdiction, if the person whose extradition is requested is alleged to be unlawfully at large after conviction of the offence.

⁷⁶ Bozano v. France, 18 December 1986, Series A no. 111; Ćonka v. Belgium, no. 51564/99, ECHR 2002-I.

⁷⁷ Zakrzewski v. The Regional Court in Łódź, Poland, [2013] UKSC 2.

⁷⁸ Per Lord Bingham in Caldarelli v. Judge for Preliminary Investigations of the Court of Naples, Italy [2008] 1 WLR 1724 Criminal Court at the National High Court, First Division v. Murua [2010] EWHC 2609 (Admin), Dabas v. High Court of Justice in Madrid, Spain [2007] 2 AC 31 and Pilecki v. Circuit Court of Legnica, Poland [2008] 1 WLR 325.

⁷⁹ Zakrzewski v. The Regional Court in Łódź, Poland, [2013] UKSC 2, para. 13: '[I]n considering whether to refuse extradition on the ground of abuse of process, the materiality of the error in the warrant will be of critical importance, whereas if the error goes to the validity of the warrant, no question of materiality can arise. An invalid warrant is incapable of initiating extradition proceedings. I do not think that it is consistent with the scheme of the Framework Decision to refuse to act on a warrant in which the prescribed particulars were included, merely because those particulars contain immaterial errors.'

⁸⁰ Per Lord Philips in Assange v. Swedish Prosecution Authority [2012] UKSC 22, para. 79.

⁸¹ Zakrzewski v. The Regional Court in Łódź, Poland [2013] UKSC 2, para. 10.

Perhaps the most difficult to reconcile with the executing Member State obligations are judgments such as Mr. Symeou's. Mr. Symeou provided evidence that the two key witnesses against him had been held incommunicado and subjected to intimidation before agreeing to sign identical statements in a language they did not understand; statements which were immediately revoked upon return to the UK. The UK courts held that these matters were for the trial judge in the issuing Member State to consider and not factors which could displace the obligation of the UK courts to surrender him under the EAWFD.⁸² Mr. Symeou spent two years in Greece awaiting trial, including almost a year in the notorious Korydallos prison on remand having been denied bail on questionable grounds. The grounds upon which he was refused bail included the fact that he was not a resident of Greece and also that he had not shown any signs of remorse for the crime. Once the trial eventually began the case was dismissed on the basis that there was insufficient evidence, and Mr. Symeou was allowed to return to the UK.

To a certain extent the amendment to the EA attempts to address this issue. According to Sect. 21A, surrender can be refused where no decision has been taken to charge the requested individual, although this section does not create a requirement that the case be ready for trial.⁸³

2.3.2 Nullum Crimen, Nulla Poena Sine Lege

2.3.2.1 Double criminality and legality Dual criminality has been interpreted strictly by the courts. This is one example of the principle of mutual recognition applying automatically. Where the offence for which the EAW is issued falls under one of the 32 listed offences, complete trust is given to the issuing Member State that the offence for which request for surrender of a person is made falls within the stated category of offence. Quite a broad margin has been given to the issuing Member State, with courts accepting the 32 offences without review.⁸⁴

What will be noted at first glance is that the list contains a varied spectrum of crimes. Whilst some, such as murder, are easily defined and comparable across the Member States, the definition and classification of others such as swindling and rape⁸⁵ differ across the Member States, and some offences are unique to one Member State.⁸⁶

⁸² Symeou v. Greece [2009] EWHC 897 (Admin).

⁸³ A number of amendments to the Extradition Act 2003 were made by the Anti-Social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 which came into force on 22 July 2014 (The Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 (Commencement No. 4 and Transitional Provisions) Order 2014, 2014/1916).

⁸⁴ Julian Assange v. Swedish Prosecution Authority [2011] EWHC 2849 (Admin).

⁸⁵ See ibid.

⁸⁶ For example, in the Republic of Cyprus there is a fraud offence which concerns the sale of property in the areas under unlawful Turkish occupation. Whilst the UK has no equivalent offence to the Cyprus offence, this was not a bar to Garry Robb's surrender under the EAW. The reason for this was that the Cyprus offence relating to dealings with property in the territory of Cyprus under Section 64 EA, which transposes Art. 2 EAWFD, does not require the courts to consider whether the alleged conduct would constitute an offence under the law of the issuing state.⁸⁷ Nor does it require that an EAW be accompanied by a separate document certifying it.⁸⁸

The judgment in the Assange case⁸⁹ before the High Court is a good example of the courts' approach to submissions on double criminality. The defence stated that the fourth allegation would not equate to rape under the law of England and Wales, had it been fairly and accurately described. Thomas LJ first ascertained that it is only in exceptional circumstances appropriate for a court to have regard to extraneous material in order to determine the accuracy of the description of the conduct,⁹⁰ the purpose of which was solely to ensure the fairness and accuracy of the described facts and not an enquiry into the decision to prosecute a certain offence. Exceptional circumstances would arise where there has been a fundamental error, unfairness or bad faith by the issuing Member State authorities. No exceptional circumstances were found to exist in the Assange case. Nevertheless, having had the material placed before it, the court did express its view as to whether it would have made any difference had it taken the material into account. For Offence 4 the Court held that the description was fair and accurate but that in any case, it is the law of the issuing Member State which governs the classification of rape. Under the EAWFD, dual criminality is abolished for 32 offences (including for rape) and as such an enquiry like this is not ordinarily part of the EAW process. The only question is whether the offence is classified as rape in the issuing Member State. This is not to say that a real issue does not exist and in fact the Assange case reignited criticism of the EAW, the use of mutual recognition in criminal matters and the potential abuse that is created with the abolition of dual criminality without any agreed definition of the 32 offences.⁹¹

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 Trials in absentia Originally, Art. 5(1) EAWFD addressed the issue of trials in absentia, stating that where a person has been convicted having not been informed of the date and time of the hearing, his surrender may be subject to the illegal Turkish military occupation fell within the 'fraud' category of offences. Fraud is one of the 32 listed offences in the EAWFD and so dual criminality was not required.

⁸⁷ Boudhiba v. National Court of Justice, Madrid [2006] EWHC 167 (Admin). See the judgment of Lord Bingham in Office of the King's Prosecutor, Brussels v. Cando Armas and another [2005] UKHL 67.

⁸⁸ Dabas v. High Court of Justice, Madrid [2007] UKHL 6. Section 64(3)(b) imposes a double criminality requirement in respect of offences which are not listed in the EAWFD.

⁸⁹ Julian Assange v. Swedish Prosecution Authority [2011] EWHC 2849 (Admin), para. 41.

⁹⁰ The Court followed The Criminal Court at the National Court, 1st Division (a Spanish Judicial Authority) v. Murua [2010] EWHC 2609 (Admin).

⁹¹ Amongst others see: O'Shea 2011; Marin 2014; Carrera 2014.

issuing Member State giving an assurance that he will have the opportunity to apply for a re-trial of the case.

It is clear that the conditions required by Art. 5(1) EAWFD fell below the standards the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) demands. This provision has been deleted and the EAWFD amended by the Council Framework Decision relating to trials in absentia, which inserts Art. 4a.⁹² This now sets out the grounds for non-recognition of decisions rendered following a trial in absentia and the conditions for its application.

The amended EAWFD requires the issuing Member State to confirm that the individual will be 'expressly informed of his or her right to a retrial or appeal, in which he or she has the right to participate and which allows the merits of the case, including fresh evidence, to be re-examined, and which may lead to the original decision being reversed'. However, the Executing Member State has no ability or opportunity to assess the realities which will be faced by the individual upon surrender. This assurance still has a narrower scope than envisaged by the ECHR; the Executing Member State has to trust the assurance given by the issuing Member State on the basis of a simple tick on the request form.

In its implementing law, the UK introduced additional guarantees in relation to trials in absentia, not envisaged in the EAWFD. Section 20(8) EA provides that if a person has been convicted in absentia, the person must be entitled not only to a re-trial but must also be guaranteed,

- (a) the right to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing or, if he had not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so required;
- (b) the right to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him.

These guarantees have been considered by the House of Lords in *Caldarelli*⁹³ where the relevant provisions are summarised:

14. Section 20 ... if the judge decides that the person had not been tried in his presence, and had not deliberately absented himself and would not be entitled to a retrial or (on appeal) a review amounting to a retrial, he must order the person's discharge.

15. Section 21 requires the judge to consider whether the person's extradition would be compatible with his Convention rights under the Human Rights Act 1998. The section is engaged if the person is accused of the commission of an extradition offence but is not alleged to be unlawfully at large after conviction of it, if the person was convicted in his presence, if the person had deliberately absented himself from his trial or if the person, not having absented himself deliberately from his trial, would be entitled to a retrial or (on appeal) to a review amounting to a retrial.

⁹² Council Framework Decision 2009/299/JHA of 26 February 2009 amending Framework Decisions 2002/584/JHA, 2005/214/JHA, 2006/783/JHA, 2008/909/JHA and 2008/947/JHA, [2009] OJ L 81/24.

⁹³ Caldarelli (Appellant) v. Court Of Naples (Respondents) [2008] UKHL 51.

In Bicioc it was held that according to the proper interpretation of Sect. 23 EA, as a minimum it is required that a trial process must have been initiated from which the appellant has deliberately absented himself. The defendant had not deliberately absented himself from the trial, although he had made it difficult for the authorities to serve him with notice. However, the key point was that,

[i]f he had been entitled unequivocally to a right of retrial or to have his case reheard on the merits of the appeal his extradition could have been ordered. It is only because it is for the time being accepted that Romanian law does not give him that right that I must allow this appeal.⁹⁴

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 Assistance to citizens surrendered Public, non-governmental organisations providing assistance exist in the UK. These include Fair Trials International (FTI) which has been the most visible on the issue of the EAWFD. FTI provides legal assistance to individuals arrested abroad through their network of local lawyers. We would support the establishment of a public body providing assistance to residents who are involved in trials abroad, although concerns are already raised in particular in the light of recent cuts in legal aid at the domestic level in the UK. We would also recommend the establishment of EU funds for this purpose. Greater investment should be combined with more extensive use of the possibilities offered by the ESO and other mutual recognition and mutual legal assistance measures.

2.3.4.2 Statistics on outcomes The UK maintains detailed statistics on EAW requests, arrests and surrenders, which are available on the website of the National Crime Agency.⁹⁵

In terms of the number of those surrendered and subsequently found innocent, the UK does not keep such statistics. The Symeou case mentioned earlier in the Chapter has been a high profile case concerning the deficiencies of the EAW process where it concerns assessing the strength of the case against the requested individual. However, as already stated above, in the UK this is not unique to the implementation of the EAWFD, since there was previously no requirement to show a prima facie case against a requested person.

⁹⁴ Gheorghe Bicioc v. Baia Mare Local Court Romania [2014] EWHC 628 (Admin). See also The Ministry of Justice (Romanian Judicial Authority) v. Ernest-Francisc Bohm [2013] EWHC 1171 (Admin).

⁹⁵ National Crime Agency Statistics, <http://www.nationalcrimeagency.gov.uk/publications/european-arrest-warrant-statistics/wanted-from-the-uk-european-arrest-warrant-statistics>.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 Mutual recognition and the rule of law Specific reference to the rule of law has been raised in different ways before the courts.

In *Villota*⁹⁶ it was submitted that where a state whose officials have deliberately tortured a person in their custody seeks to use the EAW system, this would be a 'tainted prosecution', which would offend the rule of law. This argument did not succeed, as the Court regarded the Spanish safeguards as sufficient.

Interestingly, in *Stawicki*⁹⁷ it was argued that, in the interests of the rule of law, a person convicted and sentenced should be surrendered irrespective of how much he had changed and turned his life around since conviction. A similar line of reasoning was applied in Kolec where the court held that the District Judge was correct 'on the facts of this case the United Kingdom's obligations under international treaties, whose purpose is to underpin the rule of law in Member States, must take priority over the right to respect for family life of the appellant, his partner and his daughter'.⁹⁸

2.3.5.2 Suitability of mutual recognition in criminal matters The debate in the UK has focused more on the suitability of the application of mutual recognition in criminal matters, and whether sufficient mutual trust exists to enable such mutual recognition.⁹⁹ A number of reports and parliamentary inquiries on the extent to which mutual recognition can be applied to extradition have been conducted in the UK in recent years, including the Sir Scott Baker Review on the UK Extradition Arrangements in 2011,¹⁰⁰ the relevant inquiry by the Joint Committee on Human Rights¹⁰¹ and the first inquiry by the ad hoc Parliamentary Committee on Extradition.¹⁰² It is our view that the application of the principle of mutual recognition in criminal matters brings forward legal issues which are qualitatively different to those arising from the application of the principle in the internal market, in particular as regards the impact of mutual recognition on constitutional principles including human rights and the rule of law.

⁹⁶ Raul Angel Fuentes Villota v. The 2nd Section of the National High Court of Madrid, Spain [2014] EWHC 2623 (Admin).

⁹⁷ Stawicki v. Circuit Court of Torun, Poland [2014] EWHC 3198 (Admin).

⁹⁸ Dariusz Kolec v. Judicial Authority of Poland [2014] EWHC 2230 (Admin).

⁹⁹ On the relationship between mutual recognition and mutual trust see Mitsilegas 2012, pp. 319–372 and Mitsilegas 2006, pp. 1277–1311.

¹⁰⁰ Home Office, Independent review of the United Kingdom's extradition arrangements, 18 October 2011.

¹⁰¹ The Human Rights Implications of the UK Extradition Policy, 15th Report, session 2010–2011.

¹⁰² Select Committee on Extradition Law – First Report, The European Arrest Warrant Opt-in, HL Paper 63, Published 10 November 2014.

2.3.5.3 Role of the judiciary Within the framework of the EAWFD, the role of the judiciary has shifted to an administrator whose hands, particularly at first instance, are largely tied by the principle of mutual recognition. However with time, judges have been gaining ‘confidence’ in questioning the presumptions created by mutual recognition.

Some may consider recent cases as a sign of the judiciary softening its stance in relation to human rights arguments resisting surrender. However, when considered in greater detail, this is not the case.¹⁰³ Despite the pilot judgment of the ECtHR in Torreggiani and others v. Italy,¹⁰⁴ which identified a systemic problem resulting from a chronic malfunction of the penitentiary system, Lord Justice McCombe has clearly stated that had the Italian authorities provided greater detail in their general letter of assurance, the outcome would have been different:

For my part, I would have expected at least some information as to whether bail might be available to the Appellant in Italy and on what terms, and, if not available or if not likely to be granted, some information as to the specific institution or type of institution in which the Appellant would be confined and some information as to the prevalent conditions in that institution or those institutions.¹⁰⁵

In the common law tradition, judges have been developing jurisprudence applicable to the EAW and mutual recognition in criminal matters more broadly, on a case by case basis. The evidence required to rebut the strong presumption remains high, and something ‘approaching an international consensus is required’.

One of the questions in Assange was what was meant by a ‘judicial authority’. In essence, both the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court determined that it was for each Member State to designate their own judicial authority: ‘It is therefore entirely consistent with the principles of mutual recognition and mutual confidence to recognise as valid an EAW issued by a prosecuting authority designated under Art. 6.’¹⁰⁶ Nevertheless, Thomas LJ also recognised the importance of maintaining public confidence and mutual confidence of citizens with judges and thus accepted the need for a ‘more intense scrutiny … where a warrant is issued by a “judicial authority” who is not a judge’.¹⁰⁷ In the case of Assange, even though the EAW was issued by a prosecutor, Swedish courts had scrutinised the decision and this was sufficient to trust that due process had been followed. This again was an assertion that had already been dealt with by the courts of other Member States (i.e. Cyprus).¹⁰⁸

In Bucnys,¹⁰⁹ the Supreme Court in applying Assange developed the reasoning to state that an EAW would be valid where issued by a Ministry of Justice, provided

¹⁰³ Hayle Abdi Badre v. Court of Florence, Italy [2014] EWHC 614 (Admin).

¹⁰⁴ Torreggiani and Others v. Italy, nos. 43517/09, 46882/09, 55400/09, 57875/09, 61535/09, 35315/10 and 37818/10, 8 January 2013.

¹⁰⁵ Badre v. Court of Florence, Italy [2014] EWHC 614 (Admin).

¹⁰⁶ Assange v. The Swedish Prosecution Authority [2012] UKSC 22, para. 41.

¹⁰⁷ Ibid., para. 19

¹⁰⁸ Ibid., para. 44, citing Christou (2010).

¹⁰⁹ Bucnys v. Ministry of Justice, Lithuania [2013] UKSC 71.

that it was at the request of a court or judicial authority which did not include a prison authority. In both Assange and Bucnys, the Supreme Court developed an autonomous concept of 'judicial authority' for the purposes of the Framework Decision. This approach is particularly noteworthy in the light of the limitations to the Court's powers to refer questions for interpretation under the preliminary ruling procedure before 1 December 2014.

2.3.5.4 Proportionality test In March 2014, Sect. 157 of the Anti-Social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 introduced proportionality as a ground for refusing to surrender an individual. The Extradition Act 2003 now reads,

Section 21A Person not convicted: human rights and proportionality

- (1) If the judge is required to proceed under this section (by virtue of section 11), the judge must decide both of the following questions in respect of the extradition of the person ('D') –
 - (a) whether the extradition would be compatible with the Convention rights within the meaning of the Human Rights Act 1998;
 - (b) whether the extradition would be disproportionate.
- (2) In deciding whether the extradition would be disproportionate, the judge must take into account the specified matters relating to proportionality (so far as the judge thinks it appropriate to do so); but the judge must not take any other matters into account.
- (3) These are the specified matters relating to proportionality –
 - (a) the seriousness of the conduct alleged to constitute the extradition offence;
 - (b) the likely penalty that would be imposed if D was found guilty of the extradition offence;
 - (c) the possibility of the relevant foreign authorities taking measures that would be less coercive than the extradition of D

Section 157(4) of the Anti-Social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 further states,

In deciding any question whether section 21A of the Extradition Act 2003 is compatible with European Union law, regard must be had (in particular) to Article 1(3) of the framework decision of the Council of the European Union made on 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between member states (2002/584/JHA) (which provides that that decision shall not have the effect of modifying the obligation to respect fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles as enshrined in Article 6 of the Treaty on European Union).

Section 17A of the Practice Directions¹¹⁰ sets out a relatively prescriptive list of the offences for which surrender would be classified as disproportionate unless there are exceptional circumstances, which are listed as a vulnerable victim; a crime committed against someone because of their disability, gender identity, race, religion or belief, or sexual orientation; significant premeditation; multiple counts; extradition also sought for another offence; or previous offending history. Under 17A.5, a table sets out examples of offences:

¹¹⁰ Criminal Practice Directions Amendment No. 2 [2014] EWCA Crim 1569.

Category of offence	Examples
Minor theft (not robbery/burglary or theft from a person)	Where the theft is of a low monetary value and there is a low impact on the victim or indirect harm to others, for example: (a) Theft of an item of food from a supermarket (b) Theft of a small amount of scrap metal from company premises (c) Theft of a very small sum of money
Minor financial offences (forgery, fraud and tax offences)	Where the sums involved are small and there is a low impact on the victim and/or low indirect harm to others, for example: (a) Failure to file a tax return or invoices on time (b) Making a false statement in a tax return (c) Dishonestly applying for a tax refund (d) Obtaining a bank loan using a forged or falsified document (e) Non-payment of child maintenance
Minor road traffic, driving and related offences	Where no injury, loss or damage was incurred to any person or property, for example: (a) Driving whilst using a mobile phone (b) Use of a bicycle whilst intoxicated
Minor public order offences	Where there is no suggestion the person started the trouble, and the offending behaviour was for example: (a) Non-threatening verbal abuse of a law enforcement officer or government official (b) Shouting or causing a disturbance, without threats (c) Quarrelling in the street, without threats
Minor criminal damage (other than by fire)	For example, breaking a window
Possession of controlled substance (other than one with a high capacity for harm such as heroin, cocaine, LSD or crystal meth)	Where it was possession of a very small quantity and intended for personal use

The introduction of this proportionality review was the result of a combination of NGO pressure and the Government's cost-cutting agenda. NGOs such as FTI led campaigns to highlight the injustices resulting from the misuse of the EAW for 'trivial' offences. FTI also drew attention to the intrinsic disadvantages involved in defending oneself in a foreign country:

A single case often suffers multiple failures to respect basic rights, with for example the lack of access to a lawyer or legal aid being exacerbated by the lack of information on rights or on the prosecution case, or the lack of a quality interpreter or translations of important documents, or the inability of suspects to contact friends, family or consular officials as quickly as possible to help them avail themselves of these other basic measures quickly enough not to have their position irrevocably prejudiced.¹¹¹

To a large extent these shortcomings have been dealt with by the Procedural Guarantee measures adopted under the Stockholm Roadmap.¹¹² Perhaps the tables have turned: with the UK choosing to not opt into the Directive on access to a lawyer, concerns could now be raised about the treatment of individuals surrendered to the UK under an EAW.¹¹³

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 Our data protection law is based on EU law and is now the Data Protection Act 2018. The Information Commissioner oversees the law and regulates data holding. Our courts have been notably lukewarm in upholding data protection rights, although a recent decision of the Supreme Court has placed limits on the holding and processing of data.¹¹⁴ Our law of privacy protection is common law- and Human Rights Act-based. Domestic law did not, until comparatively recently, give a high priority to privacy protection. Startling and scandalous abuse of privacy by the UK tabloid press led to the comprehensive Leveson inquiry into press ethics and culture, the major recommendation of which was rejected by Government.¹¹⁵ For over a decade the law has improved under judicial rulings to give greater protection to privacy, very much under the influence of the ECHR.

The 2006 Directive¹¹⁶ was implemented under delegated powers (SI 2009/859). Retention was initially regulated under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA) and the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001. The UK

¹¹¹ Fair Trials International (2010) Memorandum submitted to Justice Committee – Written Evidence, Justice Committee Seventh Report, Justice issues in Europe.

¹¹² Directive 2010/64/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 20 October 2010 on the right to interpretation and translation in criminal proceedings, [2010] OJ L 280/1; Directive 2012/13/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 May 2012 on the right to information in criminal proceedings, [2012] OJ L 142/1; Directive 2013/48/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 22 October 2013 on the right of access to a lawyer in criminal proceedings and in European arrest warrant proceedings, and on the right to have a third party informed upon deprivation of liberty and to communicate with third persons and with consular authorities while deprived of liberty, [2013] OJ L 294/1.

¹¹³ On the implications of the UK opt-out from the Directive on access to a lawyer for the operation of the European Arrest Warrant, see Mitsilegas 2014.

¹¹⁴ R (T) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2014] UKSC 35.

¹¹⁵ Leveson Inquiry – Report into the culture, practices and ethics of the press, 29 November 2012, <http://www.official-documents.gov.uk/document/hc1213/hc07/0780/0780.asp>.

¹¹⁶ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

Government had been an avid supporter of the EU laws governing retention because retention was a policy it agreed with. The regulations allowed retention by network providers (PCOs) and transfer upon request by the authorities for 12 months. The Interception of Communications Commissioner has oversight of the process of access to data. He has announced (October 2014) an investigation to establish whether the police are using RIPA to circumvent press protection in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, following complaints that police have accessed electronic records to identify journalists' sources without authorisation by a court.¹¹⁷ The Information Commissioner monitors the security of stored data.

The CJEU decision in *Digital Rights*¹¹⁸ forced the Government's hand. In June 2014, the Home Secretary announced plans to present a Communications Data Bill because existing powers to combat terrorism and serious crime were 'inadequate'. It was criticised by privacy campaigners for being a 'snooper's charter'.

The result was emergency legislation based on domestic law, not EU law. This emerged in the Data Retention and Regulatory Powers Act 2014.¹¹⁹ The 'emergency' action on this Bill was heavily criticised by scholars and backbench Members of Parliament (MPs). For example, fifteen senior UK scholars in technology law, in an open letter to the House of Commons, expressed concern that the Act would increase Government access to communications data and content, for example by expanding the UK's ability to mandate the interception of communications data across the world, which are some of the first powers of their kind globally. The open letter found that the Act 'is far more than an administrative necessity; it is a serious expansion of the British surveillance state', and expressed concern that it was unnecessarily rushed through Parliament.¹²⁰ However, overall the Act is carefully drafted in an attempt to ring all the correct human rights bells and we have no written constitutional guarantee of rights. Before second reading, the Home Secretary stated, as required under the HRA 1998, that in her view, the Bill was compatible with the ECHR. Retention is required for up to twelve months. The legislation is to be repealed by 31 December 2016.

Section 1 provides that the Secretary of State may by notice require a public telecommunications operator to retain relevant communications data if the Secretary of State considers that the requirement is necessary and proportionate for one or more specified purposes. The Act has extra-territorial effect (Sect. 4).

¹¹⁷ Wintour, P. (2014, October 12). British police's use of Ripa powers to snoop on journalists to be reined in. The Guardian. <http://www.theguardian.com/world/2014/oct/12/police-ripa-powers-journalists-surveillance>. For the report see <http://www.iocco-uk.info/docs/IOCCO%20Communications%20Data%20Journalist%20Inquiry%20Report%204Feb15.pdf>.

¹¹⁸ Joined cases C-293/12 and 593/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

¹¹⁹ <http://www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/2014/27/notes/contents>.

¹²⁰ Kiss, J. (2014, July 15) Academics: UK 'Drip' data law changes are 'serious expansion of surveillance'. The Guardian. <http://www.theguardian.com/technology/2014/jul/15/academics-uk-data-law-surveillance-bill-rushed-parliament>.

The detail was in regulations (SI 2014/2042). The Act operates in a very British manner. Investigatory powers will be subject to review within a year by the Independent Reviewer of Terrorism Legislation established under the Terrorism Act 2006. The independent reviewer must consider current and future threats to the United Kingdom; capabilities needed to combat such threats; privacy safeguards; challenges faced by changing technologies; transparency and oversight; and the effectiveness of existing legislation and whether there is a case for new or amending legislation. Sections 57 and 58 of RIPA 2000 provide for the appointment of an Interception of Communications Commissioner to carry out a yearly report. The Commissioner is currently a retired senior judge. His remit includes reviewing the Secretary of State's role in issuing interception warrants and the operation of the regime for the acquisition of communications data. The Data Retention and Investigatory Powers Act (DRIPA) ensures that the Commissioner will now be required to report twice a year on these issues. The Ministerial announcement referred to establishing a privacy and civil liberties board on the US model! The Intelligence and Security Committee of Parliament heard evidence on this topic and the Government proceeded with its plan. The plan includes establishing the board as an adviser to the Independent Reviewer of Terrorism Legislation. The terrorist context of these provisions has not caused alarm for their application to all communications. There is a trust in authority in the UK that may not be present in countries that have been under totalitarian regimes.

In July 2015, the Administrative Court ruled that Sect. 1 of DRIPA and regulations made thereunder breached EU law, specifically Arts. 7 and 8 of the Charter.¹²¹ This was despite the fact that the UK Government deliberately avoided the EU framework. The Investigatory Powers Tribunal had also been tasked previously with a review of the legality of surveillance practices of General Communications HQ under existing legislation. Assuming that the alleged surveillance had taken place, it found there had been no breaches of Arts. 8 or 10 ECHR in relation to the legislative framework. Specific facts and the proportionality of the surveillance in individual cases were to be subject to further examination in closed hearings. In a subsequent judgment in February 2015, the Tribunal ruled that the practices concerning surveillance prior to the two rulings made in December 2014 and February 2015 breached the Convention because the practices were not in accordance with the law. There was insufficient publicity about safeguards. That deficiency had been rectified by the disclosures to the tribunal in its two hearings.¹²² The decisions did not make reference to the Charter of ¹²¹ D Davis et al v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2015] EWHC 2092 (Admin).

¹²² Liberty et al v. GCHQ et al [2014] UKIPTrib 13_77H (5/12/14), <https://www.privacyinternational.org/temporaipt.pdf>. The second ruling is [2015] UKIPTrib 13 77H, http://www.ipt-uk.com/docs/Liberty_Ors_Judgment_6Feb15.pdf. Also [2015] UKIPTrib 13_132 H (29 April 2015) and [2015] UKIPTrib_13_77H 2 (22 June 2015). In Privacy International v. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs [2016] UKIPTrib 15_110 CH http://www.ipt-uk.com/docs/Bulk_Data_Judgment.pdf15-110 CH, the Investigatory Powers Tribunal ruled that it was permissible to use Sect. 94 Telecommunications Act 1984 to obtain bulk communications data

Fundamental Rights. Further rulings of the tribunal held that in one case interceptions involving legally protected privilege breached Art. 8 ECHR, but in another case, MP interceptions were not given a legal immunity.¹²³ The appeal in Davis was heard in November 2015. Basically, the Court of Appeal ([2015] EWCA Civ 1185) cast doubt on the Divisional Court's ruling that the CJEU's judgment in Digital Rights set down mandatory requirements of EU law for national legislation. The object of the CJEU's criticism was the EC Directive, not national legislation. The court believed that the CJEU's ruling could affect aspects of data retention and use not covered by EU law. This would take the ruling outside EU competence. The Court of Appeal noted that Digital Rights also suggested that EU law went further than ECHR protection. In the light of this, the court referred the case¹²⁴ to the CJEU requesting an expedited hearing.

An Investigatory Powers Bill recasting surveillance laws has been published for the UK. The Bill followed a review by the Independent Reviewer of Terrorism Legislation of existing laws of investigatory powers, a review by the Intelligence and Security Committee of Parliament (ISC) and by the Panel of the Independent Surveillance Review convened by the Royal United Services Institute. All three agreed that current powers remained essential for the UK's security. There were also critical reactions in the media.

This Bill introduces the requirement for 'double-lock' approval by a minister and a judge (retired) for certain warrants, i.e. interception, equipment and bulk equipment interference, bulk data and data sets' powers. Warrants may only be issued to nine responsible intercepting bodies under three specified powers: national security, prevention and detection of serious crime and economic well-being in relation to national security. Powers must be proportionate. There is to be oversight by a new Investigatory Powers Commissioner, a senior judge. There are to be special safeguards in 'particularly sensitive material', e.g. involving lawyers, MPs, doctors and journalists. The bill deals with the duration of warrants, which in some cases may only be requested by the intelligence services, e.g. in bulk powers. There will be 'single point contacts', but no warrants, for communications data and intercept (BCD). RIPA expressly preserved Sect. 94 in Sect. 80. However, the bulk personal data system operated by the intelligence services and General Communications HQ prior to BCDs avowal (publication) in March 2015 did not satisfy ECHR requirements, i.e. it was not 'in accordance with the law'. The bulk communications data system BCD did not satisfy ECHR principles prior to its avowal in November 2015 and the introduction of a more 'adequate system of supervision' at that date. Both bulk personal data and BCD systems complied with the principles after those respective dates. The tribunal still had to consider the question of proportionality and EU law. The question of data transfer was not included. See Big Brother Watch v. UK n. 126 below.

¹²³ [2015] UKIPTrib_13_77H 2 (22 June 2015) and Caroline Lucas MP et al v. The Security Service et al [2015] UKIPTrib 14_79-CH (14 October 2015).

¹²⁴ Case C-203/15 Tele2 Sverige [2016] ECLI:EU:C:2016:970. See on return to England Secretary of State v. T. Watson [2018] EWCA Civ 70 where the court confined itself to ruling that DRIPA s 1 was inconsistent with EU law where the objective pursued by granting access to data was not restricted solely to fighting serious crime, or where access was not subject to prior review by a court or an independent administrative authority (para. 13).

connection records. The Bill retains the extra-territorial effect of the 2014 Act. Crucially, a right of appeal from the Investigatory Powers Tribunal's decisions to the Court of Appeal is introduced for the first time. The IPT can inform individuals who have been victims of 'serious errors' by surveillance bodies. In some cases existing powers, as in equipment interference, will remain in previous legislation although a new 'more explicit' regime will be introduced. Schedule 6 provides for the making of codes of practice on the operation of the powers. The Bill says nothing about use of informers and other forms of human surveillance.

The ISC of Parliament issued a critical report on the Bill in February 2016. Amongst other criticisms, it recommended laws on universal and not just professional privacy protection and stated that the Secret Intelligence Service's capabilities in equipment interference, bulk data sets and communications data are too broad and lack clarity.¹²⁵ A revised Bill was presented to Parliament and was enacted in late 2016.¹²⁶

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 The Expert is not aware of any specific case in which the constitutionality of unpublished or secret measures has arisen in an EU context within the UK. A Westlaw search shows that neither of the CJEU cases has been considered by English courts.

However, non-publication of determining criteria affecting rights has featured as a principle of constitutional significance in recent UK Supreme Court litigation. First of all, use of unpublished criteria on the basis of which decisions affecting individual entitlement were made was not uncommon in our administrative practice. Discretionary social security payments, prison administration and rights of prisoners were characterised by such practices. Widespread criticism led to publication of such criteria. There was also the risk of invocation of principles of legal certainty (and legal clarity) and legality.

¹²⁵ HC 795 (2015–16) Report on the Draft Investigatory Powers Bill.

¹²⁶ For the first Bill see https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/473770/Draft_Investigatory_Powers_Bill.pdf. For the revised Bill see http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/bills/cbill/2015-2016/0143/cbill_2015-20160143_en_1.htm and <https://www.gov.uk/government/collections/investigatory-powers-bill> for draft codes and policy statement on the bill. Criticism was made that the Bill was neither consistent with Case C-362/14 Schrems [2015] ECLI:EU:C:2015:650 nor Roman Zakharov v. Russia [GC], no. 47143/06, ECHR 2015. See Guardian Letters 15 March 2016. Following the case of Tele2 Sverige, n. 124 above, the English High Court ruled that Part 4 of the Investigatory Powers Act 2016 breaches the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights because access to data was not restricted to fighting serious crime and there was no prior review by a court or independent administrative body before access: R (Liberty) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2018] EWHC 975 (Admin). The CJEU had already referred to it by the Investigatory Powers Tribunal questions on transfer out of the EU of data and notification of data subjects affected. The government also conducted a review of the Act for necessary reforms. The reforms will not address national security matters which the government insists are outside the competence of the EU. The ECtHR ruled that RIPA 2000 breached Arts. 8 and 10 in relation to bulk intercepts and acquisition of communications data: Big Brother Watch and Others v. the United Kingdom, nos. 58170/13 and 2 others, 13 September 2018.

Primary legislation must be published in Bill form for Parliament to consider and approve. Delegated legislation must be published, but it may take effect before publication. However, criminal prosecutions depend on publication. There would be a serious risk of a delegated measure being ruled ultra vires if it determined rights and was not published. A famous scandal in the mid-1990s, which helped bring down a Government, involved the collapse of a criminal trial when it emerged that export regulations, on which the prosecution was based, had been changed without notifying Parliament or the public of the changes. A difficult question arises if unpublished criteria that are not based in law are used to influence exercise of a discretion. The courts may take the view that where rights are involved, any unpublished criteria are susceptible to challenge where they influence a decision. Where rights are not involved, it may turn on context.

In Ahmed, HM Treasury implemented UN Security Council resolutions under an Act of 1946.¹²⁷ These covered the same subject matter as was covered in Kadi, i.e. orders freezing the bank accounts of suspected terrorists. Parliament had not approved the UK implementing measures. The court ruled that the measures in vital respects went beyond the requirements of the resolutions and could not be justified by the general words contained in the 1946 Act in so far as they interfered with the human rights (common law, not ECHR) of the claimants who had been subject to asset freezing orders.

In Alvi,¹²⁸ the Supreme Court upheld the quashing (ruling legally invalid) of a decision by the Home Secretary who had relied on materials not approved under the Immigration Act by Parliament to determine whether the alien claimant could remain in the UK. Basically, if the provisions were rules determining a right to remain or not in the UK, the Immigration Act 1971 Sect. 3(2) required that they be approved by Parliament and published. This was to be distinguished from guidance which was not of legal effect:

The Act itself recognises that instructions to immigration officers are not to be treated as rules, and what is simply guidance to sponsors and applicants can be treated in the same way. It ought to be possible to identify from an examination of the material in question, taken in its whole context, whether or not it is of the character of a rule or is just information, advice or guidance as to how the requirements of a rule may be met in particular cases.¹²⁹

¹²⁷ HM Treasury v. Ahmed [2010] UKSC 2. See Sect. 2.13 above. The Supreme Court distinguished Ahmed in Youssef v. Secretary of State for Foreign etc Affairs [2016] UKSC 3.

¹²⁸ [2012] UKSC 33. See Walumba Lumba v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2011] UKSC 12 and R (Reilly) v. Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2014] EWHC 2182 (Admin); and generally Sect. 2.13 above.

¹²⁹ Ibid., para. 63 Lord Hope and paras. 41, 53 and 92.

The decision in Alvi should be compared with *Munir*¹³⁰ and *New College Ltd.*¹³¹ In both cases, the guidance was published although not approved under Sect. 3(2). In both cases the guidance did not have a coercive effect determining rights, which is a contestable conclusion. They were mere guidance and were not subject to Sect. 3(2).

My appraisal would be, given that the EU courts had upheld the importance of legal certainty in the judgments referred to, domestic UK courts would look askance at any measure taking legal effect to interfere with the rights of individuals, unless such measure was properly passed and published and satisfied the requirements of legality.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 The situations in domestic law have invariably involved domestic measures based on EU provisions or the challenge to domestic measures based on EU provisions – often accompanied by arguments based on ECHR Art. 1 Protocol 1. Domestic courts have followed the Foto-Frost jurisprudence so as not to rule on EU measures. German constitutional jurisprudence may have an influence in future developments.¹³² Now that it is accepted that the Charter applies to the UK and that no opt-out has been secured, we will see increasing arguments based on the Charter.¹³³

The relevant case law on proportionality, proprietary rights, legal certainty and legitimate expectation has all been developed in relation to domestic measures where laws have been challenged because of breaches of EU general principles and ECHR provisions. A few points need to be made.

First of all, EU general principles and ECHR rights have strengthened immeasurably the armoury of UK judges in judicial review. They have been adapted to domestic contexts. It has been a great success story in the promotion of law's neutrality and challenging arbitrary power.¹³⁴ Furthermore, our membership of the European Union and of the Convention on Human Rights has helped to subject our

¹³⁰ [2012] UKSC 32.

¹³¹ [2013] UKSC 51.

¹³² See R (HS2) v. Secretary of State for Transport [2014] UKSC 3. Note Laws LJ's dicta in Thoburn in Sect. 3.1.1 below on the limits of the general words of Sect. 2(1) ECA 1972 to authorise unconstitutional EU actions.

¹³³ See Joined cases C-411/10 and C-493/10 N.S. and Others [2011] ECLI:EU:C:2011:865 and EM (Eritrea) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2012] EWCA Civ 1336, paras. 43–48 and R (AB) v. Secretary of State of the Home Department [2013] EWHC 3453 (Admin), paras. 7–14. See the Commons European Scrutiny Committee's report HC 979 (2013–14).

¹³⁴ Birkinshaw 2014. See e.g. R (Miranda) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2016] EWCA Civ 6 where a power to stop persons at ports and airports under the Terrorism Act 2000 Sched. 7 and seize encrypted materials related to journalism (originating from the Snowden constitution to juridification, a process that will outlive any departure from ‘Europe’ by the UK.¹³⁵ The UK Government has taken measures to check the advance of judicial review.¹³⁶ Secondly, boundary disputes as to when EU law and legal principles apply have become more flexible. Originally, a rather formal approach was taken, so if a matter was not considered an EU matter, EU general principles did not apply.¹³⁷ However, in Rugby Football Union v. CIS Ltd ‘the rubric, “implementing EU law” is to be interpreted broadly and, in effect, means whenever a member state is acting “within the material scope of EU law”’.¹³⁸

The decisions involving proprietary rights in English cases have all been challenges to domestic measures based on EU treaty provisions and general principles. The courts have not imposed exacting standards of review and have found no breaches of EU law, but have found transgressions of ECHR law, as in Roth,¹³⁹ or courts have allowed public health factors to favour preventative action, as in Eastside Cheese.¹⁴⁰ The maintenance of public health had to carry great weight in the balancing process in a proportionality review. The approach to proportionality review in cases launching challenges based on the ECHR or EU law was nicely illustrated in Sinclair Collis although the approach has now been criticised.¹⁴¹ This concerned the domestic statutory and regulatory provisions banning the automatic sale of tobacco products from vending machines, which is especially important in public houses and clubs. Articles 24 and 36 EC and Art. 1 Protocol 1 ECHR were invoked. Arden LJ observed that the ECHR may provide greater protection than EC rights. The majority ruled that the ban, despite the widespread redundancy that would ensue, was not disproportionate. The measures were not, per the majority, ‘manifestly inappropriate’ under EU legal principles.

One crucial issue in relation to domestic measures concerns the question of which law applies to a challenge to domestic measures based on EU measures before the English courts. The case concerned the Tobacco Directive which was brought on a preliminary reference to the CJEU by Germany.¹⁴² The CJEU ruled revelations and material stolen from the US National Security Agency) was ruled a breach of Art. 10 ECHR insofar as the seizure was not authorised by an independent judicial authority.

¹³⁵ Birkinshaw and Varney 2016.

¹³⁶ HL 174 & HC 868 (2013–14) <http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/jt201314/jtselect/jtrights/174/174.pdf>. See Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015, Part 4.

¹³⁷ R v. MAFF ex p First City Trading Ltd [1997] 1 CMLR 250 (QBD) Laws J.

¹³⁸ [2012] UKSC 55, para. 28. Followed by Davis above [2015] EWCA Civ 1185, paras. 92 and 98.

¹³⁹ [2002] EWCA Civ 158.

¹⁴⁰ [1999] EWCA Civ 1739.

¹⁴¹ [2011] EWCA Civ 437. See Arden 2013. A more subtle approach criticising Sinclair was adopted in R (Lumsdon) v. Legal Services Board [2015] UKSC 41 where interference with a ‘fundamental freedom’ was involved. See R (GBGA) v. Secretary of State CM&S [2014] EWHC 3236 (Admin), paras. 99–110 and R (BASCA) v. Secretary of State BIS [2015] EWHC 1723 (Admin), paras. 135–148.

¹⁴² Case C-491/01 British American Tobacco (Investments) and Imperial Tobacco [2002] ECR I-11453.

for the first time that a directive was ultra vires under now Art. 114 TFEU. The proceedings in England concerned delegated legislation based on the (as yet to be ruled invalid) Directive.¹⁴³ The application was to prevent the Secretary of State making the regulations (presenting them to Parliament for approval) because of the allegedly illegal basis of their provenance.

In *R v. Secretary of State for Health*¹⁴⁴ the Court of Appeal overruled a high court judgment which had issued an injunction against the Secretary of State to prevent the making of the regulations implementing the Directive. The majority ruled that the law to govern interim relief was Community law established in the Zuckerfabrik decision and not domestic law laid down in a 1975 judgment of the House of Lords for domestic matters. This approach was upheld in the House of Lords by majority. What is of interest is the spirited dissent by Sir John Laws and Lord Hoffmann. For Laws, to refuse to allow the injunction against measures so clearly based on an illegal EC measure was an affront to the rule of law itself. For Hoffmann, the division of responsibilities within a Member State was entirely a matter of domestic law. It was domestic law which ordained the powers of a minister to formulate regulations and the procedure to follow. Community law only became involved on a 'renvoi' from Sect. 2(2) ECA 1972. The substance was governed by domestic law. By general agreement it was easier to succeed in a claim for an injunction under domestic law than under EC law. Both Laws and Hoffmann were instrumental in a new scepticism to EU law and questions of sovereignty.

In *ABNA*¹⁴⁵ the court followed the majority in Tobacco and accepted that the governing law was EC law, but found that even so, the balance was in favour of an injunction given the powerful arguments on illegality and the potential serious risks to a firm's 'trade secrets, confidential information and know-how built up over many years', which the draft regulations would require under EC law.

Some see a growing scepticism in recent decisions of the Supreme Court. *Walton v. Scottish Ministers*¹⁴⁶ contains a crucial statement by Lord Carnwath where he states, without hearing legal argument on the point, that provision of public law relief for breaches of EU law is not as of right but at the court's discretion, aligning the position precisely with domestic law.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1–2.7.3 Not applicable, as the UK is not part of the eurozone.

¹⁴³ R (on the application of Imperial Tobacco Ltd) v. Secretary of State for Health [2001] 1 All ER 850 (HL) and [2000] 1 All ER 572 (CA).

¹⁴⁴ [2000] 1 All ER 572.

¹⁴⁵ R (ABNA) Ltd v. Secretary of State for Health [2004] 2 CMLR 39.

¹⁴⁶ [2012] UKSC 44. See R (Champion) v. N Norfolk DC [2015] UKSC 52 in support.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 There are no easily available statistics listing when preliminary references have been requested by the parties in a decision before a UK court or tribunal. Recent annual reports of the Supreme Court do now include statistics on preliminary reference requests. In 2013–2014, the UK Supreme Court made two preliminary references, with 12 requests not being referred, as the Supreme Court refused permission to appeal the case from the Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court.¹⁴⁷ In 2012–2013, two preliminary references requests were made and 14 refused due to the refusal of the Supreme Court to hear the appeal in the case from the Court of Appeal.¹⁴⁸

According to statistics provided by the CJEU,¹⁴⁹ the number of preliminary references from the UK courts for the relevant period is as follows: 2001–21; 2002–14; 2003–22; 2004–22; 2005–12; 2006–10; 2007–16; 2008–14; 2009–29; 2011–26; 2012–16; 2013–14; Total – 242.

Ten cases heard by the CJEU in the period 2006–2013 concerned the validity of an EU measure in a preliminary reference sent by the UK courts. Twenty questions lodged before the CJEU by the UK courts for a preliminary reference in the period 2001 to 2013 concerned the validity of an EU measure. Of those 20, 13 were challenges to regulations and seven to directives. Only one case in 2006–2013 resulted in the annulment of the EU measure – C-351/04 IKEA Wholesale, where anti-dumping regulations were declared invalid as disproportionate and contrary to WTO findings.¹⁵⁰ Only four cases raised human rights issues, all relating to property rights.¹⁵¹ Most challenges concerned procedural issues, breaches of international law and proportionality. Two challenges were based on a lack of competence of the EU, specifically relating to the regulation of the internal market under Art. 114 TFEU.

What is the most striking constitutional issue is that challenges have mostly been brought by large corporations protecting their commercial interests. In particular, challenges were made to: taxation issues;¹⁵² environmental ¹⁴⁷ Annual Report of the UK Supreme Court 2013–2014, HC 36. <http://www.supremecourt.uk/docs/annual-report-2013-14.pdf>.

¹⁴⁸ Annual Report of the UK Supreme Court 2012–2013, HC 3, <http://www.supremecourt.uk/docs/annual-report-2012-13.pdf>.

¹⁴⁹ Court of Justice of the European Union, Annual Report 2013, Luxembourg 2014, p. 106. <http://curia.europa.eu/jcms/upload/docs/application/pdf/2014-06/qdag14001enc.pdf>.

¹⁵⁰ C-351/04 IKEA Wholesale [2007] ECR I-07723.

¹⁵¹ Case C-154/04 Alliance for Natural Health and Others [2005] ECR I-06451; Case C-453/03 ABNA and Others [2005] ECR I-10423; Case C-210/03 Swedish Match [2004] ECR I-11893; Case C-491/01 British American Tobacco (Investments) and Imperial Tobacco, supra n. 142.

¹⁵² Case C-134/13 Raytek and Fluke Europe [2015] ECLI:EU:C:2015:82; Case C-215/10 Pacific World and FDD International [2011] ECLI:EU:C:2011:528; Case C-372/06 Asda Stores [2007] ECR I-11223, Case C-58/01 Oce van der Grinten v. Commissioner for Inland Revenue [2003] ECR I-09809.

measures;¹⁵³ the classification of products as dangerous substances and therefore requiring greater regulation;¹⁵⁴ regulations designed to protect consumers;¹⁵⁵ the establishment of regulatory bodies;¹⁵⁶ regulation of fish stocks,¹⁵⁷ competition protections;¹⁵⁸ and the regulation of food products.¹⁵⁹ One challenge was brought by an individual concerned with the compatibility of regulations governing residence requirements for welfare provisions with citizenship and free movement provisions.¹⁶⁰

2.8.2–2.8.3 In some respects, the EU has a higher standard of review than UK law, as it adopts proportionality as a general head of review. However, there is academic concern that the EU has a lower standard of review in practice, particularly as regards the lower proportion of human rights challenges with regard to EU acts in EU law.¹⁶¹ Statistical surveys reveal that leave to appeal has been more readily granted by the House of Lords on human rights challenges, although these challenges were statistically less likely to succeed than other challenges.¹⁶² Most UK judicial review challenges do now raise human rights issues. There remains concern that the CJEU prioritises commercial interests and the free movement provisions over fundamental human rights. This would suggest a need for the CJEU to strengthen its standard of judicial review in human rights cases.

It is not possible to make a fair comparison of the review of legislative acts in the EU with the review of legislative acts in the United Kingdom. With regard to challenges under the Human Rights Act, the high rate at which the Government responds to declarations of incompatibility and the rigorous reports of the Joint Committee of Human Rights would suggest a willingness to provide a stringent ¹⁵³ Case C-366/10 Air Transport Association of America and Others [2011] ECR I-13755; Case C-308/06 Intertanko [2008] ECR I-04057.

¹⁵⁴ Case C-15/10 Etimine [2011] ECR I-06681; Case C-14/10 Nickel Institute [2011] ECR I-06609; Case C-343/09 Afton Chemical [2010] ECR I-07027.

¹⁵⁵ Case C-58/08 Vodafone [2010] ECR I-04999; Case C-344/04 International Air Transport [2006] ECR I-00403.

¹⁵⁶ Case C-558/07 SPCA [2009] ECR I-05783.

¹⁵⁷ Case C-388/04 South Western Fish Producers' Organisation and Others [2006] ECLI:EU:C:2006:82, removal from the Register, 6 February 2006; Case C-535/03 Unitymark [2006] ECR I-02689.

¹⁵⁸ Case C-351/04 IKEA Wholesale, supra n. 150.

¹⁵⁹ Case C-154/04 Alliance for Natural Health [2005] ECR I-06451, Case C-453/03 ABNA and Others [2005] ECR I-10423; Case C-210/03 Swedish Match [2004] ECR I-11893; Case C-491/01 British American Tobacco (Investments) and Imperial Tobacco, supra n. 142; Case C-329/01 British Sugar [2004] ECR I-01899.

¹⁶⁰ Case C-537/09 Bartlett v. SS for Work and Pensions [2011] ECR I-03417.

¹⁶¹ Chalmers et al. 2011, pp. 241–248; Williams 2004; Douglas-Scott 2002, pp. 460–461 and pp. 454–458.

¹⁶² Shah and Poole 2009.

review of human rights.¹⁶³ There would also appear to be a growing willingness of the UK courts to go beyond the requirements of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights to provide a stronger protection of human rights in areas where the Strasbourg Court grants a wide margin of appreciation.¹⁶⁴

With regard to the review of administrative actions, figures vary according to judicial review actions in the courts and the review of immigration and social and welfare cases through the tribunal system. In 2013 there were 15,700 applications for judicial review in the courts of England and Wales. Of 1,513 cases eligible for a final hearing in 2013, only 232 had reached a decision with 66% being found in favour of the applicant.¹⁶⁵ With regard to immigration cases, of the 67,449 cases determined in the Immigration and Asylum Chamber of the First-tier Tribunal in 2013/14, 56% were dismissed and the remaining 44% were upheld. In the area of Social Security and Child Support, 40% of cases determined in 2012–2013 were decided in favour of the applicant. With regard to benefit applications, 44% of Employment Seekers Allowance, 42% of Disability Living Allowance, 19% of Job Seekers Allowance and 26% of Personal Independence Payments were decided in favour of the applicant.¹⁶⁶ These figures would suggest that the UK courts are less deferential than the CJEU when reviewing administrative actions. They support the call for a stronger standard of judicial review by the CJEU, particularly with regard to the protection of human rights.

2.8.4 The UK courts have not adopted a position on the extent to which they review measures implementing EU law. UK courts would only be able to review implementation measures achieved through secondary legislation or implemented by the devolved legislatures.

2.8.5 No concerns have been raised with regard to a resulting gap in judicial review given the lack of scrutiny of legislative acts in the UK. Concerns might arise, were there to be disparities between directly effective EU law and Convention rights. Here, it is possible that the UK courts would apply Convention rights over directly effective EU law, were the two to diverge. However, it is likely that in this case EU law would be interpreted so as to be compatible with Convention rights.

2.8.6 No issue has arisen in the UK regarding the lack of equal treatment between those falling under domestic law and those falling under EU law.

¹⁶³ Ministry of Justice, Responding to Human Rights Decisions, Cm 8727 October 2013. https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/252680/human-rights-judgments-2012-13.pdf.

¹⁶⁴ R (Nicklinson) v. Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38.

¹⁶⁵ Ministry of Justice, Court Statistics Quarterly, January to March 2014. https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/321352/court-statistics-jan-mar-2014.pdf.

¹⁶⁶ Ministry of Justice, Tribunals Statistics Quarterly, January to March 2014. https://www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/319488/tribunal-statistics-quarterly-january-march-2014.pdf.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 Concerns have been expressed by the Constitutional Committee of the House of Lords as to the breadth of Henry VIII clauses which enable the executive to modify primary legislation. These concerns are expressed generally, including, though not specifically focusing upon, the Henry VIII clause found in the European Communities Act 1972. These are perhaps minimised, as the EU Committee of the House of Commons and the European Scrutiny Committee of the House of Lords would be able to raise concerns about the use of secondary legislation to implement EU law, were they to consider that this gave rise to constitutional issues.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 The principles of nulla poena sine lege and of 'open justice' can both be regarded as constitutional principles of the common law, forming part of the constitutional traditions of the UK. Privacy is an emerging principle. It would not extend to the protection of a general freedom not to be recorded.

There would be merit in national courts referring both to the ECHR and to national constitutional law protections. There is a recent trend in the case law of UK courts to place greater emphasis on the constitutional principles of the UK as opposed to the ECHR. Often these principles are cited in tandem. It may be harder to refer to constitutional principles in other legal systems of the EU. UK law, in particular, is more likely to refer to principles found in the common law of the UK, US, Australia, Canada and New Zealand.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 The UK has not seen a large amount of academic discussion as to whether the CJEU should set the standard of Charter rights in line with, or go beyond, the standard of the ECtHR. Nevertheless, there is discussion as to the extent to which UK law should mirror interpretations of Convention rights provided by the ECtHR.¹⁶⁷ UK courts have been prepared to go beyond ECtHR judgments, providing a higher protection of rights, where there is no clear case law from the ECtHR and where there is a broad margin of appreciation.¹⁶⁸ This is regarded as a power but not an obligation of the court.¹⁶⁹ Courts have provided a lower protection of rights where there are fears that the ECtHR has not appreciated the specific common law context in its judgment and where the ECtHR decision that the UK courts refuse to follow is in the process of being appealed to the Grand Chamber.¹⁷⁰

¹⁶⁷ See, for example, Wright 2009; Irvine 2012 and Sales 2012.

¹⁶⁸ P v. Cheshire [2014] UKSC 19.

¹⁶⁹ R (Nicklinson) v. Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38.

In the opinion of the author of this section of the report, there is a need for a higher degree of deference to be paid by the CJEU to the decisions of the national constitutional courts and for a greater ability for national courts to provide a higher protection of rights than that found in the Charter or in general principles of Community law. However, this is subject to two provisos. First, there is a need to take account of whether the EU has itself enacted measures which provide greater clarity than the Convention rights, providing a democratically agreed EU specification of a particular right or of the resolution of a potential conflict of rights. The Charter does not provide this level of clarity, being a combination of broadly expressed rights and principles, although some Charter provisions may provide the requisite level of clarity. In these instances, there should be less scope for deference to the national constitutional courts. Secondly, human rights adjudication in the European Union works best when it facilitates dialogue between the CJEU and the national constitutional courts. Dialogue is harmed where there is the ability for either the CJEU or the national constitutional courts to always have the last word. Therefore, whilst dialogue requires greater deference, this needs to be deference as respect, based on the reasoning of the national courts and their greater expertise in areas of national interpretations of rights as opposed to deference as submission. Moreover, there should be no absolute rules as to whether national constitutional courts or the CJEU should always have the final say as to the authoritative determination of human rights.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 There was public debate on the introduction of the European Arrest Warrant and at the time of the enactment of the implementation measures. There were also campaigns citing concerns over the civil liberties implications by human rights organisations – e.g. Liberty,¹⁷¹ Justice,¹⁷² and Fair Trials International.¹⁷³ These concerns were also reflected in parliamentary debate on the implementation measures, specifically regarding the lack of double criminality, the lack of clarity regarding the speciality rule, bail provisions, the definition of a judicial authority

¹⁷⁰ R v. Horncastle [2009] UKSC 14.

¹⁷¹ <https://www.liberty-human-rights.org.uk/tags/european-arrest-warrant>.

¹⁷² <http://www.justice.org.uk/pages/european-arrest-warrant.html>.

¹⁷³ <http://www.fairtrials.org/justice-in-europe/the-european-arrest-warrant/>.

and the potential lack of a right of appeal, and the lack of a guarantee of a retrial for those convicted in absentia.¹⁷⁴

There was less concern raised with regard to the Data Retention Directive. The UK initially lobbied the EU to adopt the Data Retention Directive. There was little scrutiny over the Data Retention (EC Directive) Regulations 2007, which implemented the Directive's requirement with regard to land lines and mobile phones, although concerns were raised in the House of Commons and the House of Lords as to the content of the Data Retention (EC Directive) Regulations 2009 and their implications for privacy. There have, however, been campaigns from civil liberties groups,¹⁷⁵ in addition to recent criticism from the Joint Committee on Human Rights over the Data Retention and Investigatory Powers Act 2014.¹⁷⁶

2.12.2 Although these issues do not arise specifically in the UK, concern has been expressed by parliamentarians and public interest groups that there is frequently insufficient time for parliamentary debate when implementing EU measures that raise constitutional issues.¹⁷⁷ This concern is exacerbated by the narrow standing requirements for direct challenges, particularly as regards the standing of public pressure groups, the use of indirect challenges through Art. 267 TFEU to predominantly protect commercial as opposed to constitutional rights, and the low level of annulment of EU measures.

2.12.3 I would support the adoption of a process to suspend the application of EU measures, pending an investigation into the legality of the measure, where important constitutional issues have been raised by a number of constitutional courts. I would also recognise the defence of unconstitutionality during an infringement proceeding. I would also support the adoption of a process of greater pre-legislative scrutiny over EU measures that raise constitutional issues. A good model for this could, perhaps, be the work of the Joint Committee of Human Rights in the Westminster Parliament, particularly if this body were able to consult widely and receive information from human rights groups and constitutional courts. This body could either be formed as a Committee with the European Parliament or a ¹⁷⁴ Broadbridge S. The Introduction of the European Arrest Warrant. House of Commons Library Paper, SN/HA/1703. <http://www.parliament.uk/business/publications/research/briefing-papers/SN01703/the-introduction-of-the-european-arrest-warrant>.

¹⁷⁵ <https://www.liberty-human-rights.org.uk/campaigning/no-snoopers-charter>. Statewatch tried to challenge the Data Retention Directive, but was not granted standing. It did, however, make submissions to the CJEU in the Case C-301/06 Ireland v. Council [2009] ECR I-00593 challenge to the Directive; see <http://www.statewatch.org/news/2008/apr/eu-datret-ecj-brief.pdf>.

¹⁷⁶ http://www.parliament.uk/documents/joint-committees/human-rights/Letter_to_Rt_Hon_Teresa_May_MP_160714.pdf.

¹⁷⁷ See, for example, the criticisms of slow response times from the Government and the lack of time for debate from the House of Lords European Union Committee, Report on 2013–14, 2014–15 HL paper 6, and its report on The Role of National Parliaments in the European Union, 2013–14, HL paper 151, and the criticisms of the House of Lords during the 2nd and 3rd reading of the Data Retention and Investigatory Powers Bill 2014 in the House of Lords (Hansard HL 16 July 2014, cols 600–665).

body at the EU level but outside of the formal EU framework. This would encourage greater dialogue to avoid constitutional crises and work towards developing a European human rights culture.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 I share concerns about the potential for an overall reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights and the rule of law in the context of EU law. I believe that this potential reduction in the standard of protection is due to a lack of wider awareness and the difficulties of protecting rights in a system of multilevel governance. These difficulties are exacerbated by the general consensus surrounding abstract rights – such as expressed in the Charter – coupled with divergence as to how these rights should apply in particular circumstances. In particular, divergence can arise due to the relative historical importance of the protection of particular human rights in different Member States.

2.13.2 Accession of the EU to the ECHR will not resolve these issues, as illustrated by the tension in UK law as to the extent to which the UK should interpret Convention rights differently from the ECtHR. I believe a better solution can be found in creating more effective means of dialogue between national courts and the CJEU, and between national parliaments and the European Parliament. This will, in turn, require greater deference to national constitutional courts, but also, in addition, greater deference by national constitutional courts to democratically determined European solutions to specific human rights issues.

I would also advocate greater pre-legislative scrutiny of human rights. However, I would prefer for this to be performed by a body similar to the Joint-Committee on Human Rights found in the Westminster Parliament and for the body to be formed at the EU level. First, this institution consults more widely than current constitutional tribunals and so is able to provide better-informed analyses. Secondly, the Joint Committee performs a less abstract form of scrutiny and is more capable of suggesting possible solutions. Thirdly, the Joint Committee is more likely to provide reasoned conclusions, which can facilitate political debate and also democratic dialogue between courts and legislatures, and between national constitutional courts and the CJEU.

2.13.3 I would advocate a change in the style of judgment of the CJEU, both allowing for dissenting opinions and encouraging greater explanation of the reasoning deployed to reach particular conclusions. I would also advocate greater attention to be paid to the arguments of the parties, particularly when dealing with constitutional issues raised by national constitutional courts or by the parties to the proceedings.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 The UK remains in essence a dualist state. International agreements have no effect in domestic law until implemented, usually by legislation. This doctrine pays obeisance to parliamentary sovereignty. Provision is sometimes made for implementation by regulations – usually a statutory Order in Council. There are many cases on interpreting domestic law in accordance with international obligations in treaties and in accordance with customary international law. There is, despite the dualist philosophy, a great degree of influence of international law in the UK domestic courts.¹⁷⁸ However, the basic approach is that the UK Government may enter whatever international agreements it wishes (see Sect. 3.2.1 below). There are no constitutional impediments to entering treaties. There are legal procedures involving ratification (see Constitutional Reform etc Act below), but treaties have no domestic effect until implemented by legislation or statutory regulations. If the Government were to enter into a very unpopular treaty, it would have to face the political consequences in Parliament, the press and media and from the public.

Outside EU areas, relevant provisions contain no references to the objectives sought by international co-operation, set no limits to the delegation of powers, and/or values and principles that ought to be upheld by the state when participating in international co-operation.

Until the Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010, treaties did not have to be laid before Parliament by law. Since the 2010 Act, treaties, subject to the conditions below, must be laid before Parliament.

Under Sect. 20, treaties may not be ratified unless (a) a Minister of the Crown has in the first instance laid before Parliament a copy of the treaty, (b) the treaty has been published in a way that he or she thinks appropriate and (c) a period (21 days which may be extended by 21 days or less (Sect. 21)) has expired without either House having resolved that the treaty should not be ratified. Subsection (3) then explains that a further procedure, which is set out in subsections (4) to (6) (see below), will apply if the House of Commons resolves that the treaty should not be ratified (whether or not the House of Lords did the same). There are exceptions to this provision. Subsection (4) provides that a treaty may still be ratified if, after the House of Commons has resolved that a treaty should not be ratified during period above, (a) a Minister of the Crown has laid before Parliament a statement explaining why the treaty should nevertheless be ratified, and (b) a 'period B' has expired without the House of Commons having (again) resolved that the treaty should not be ratified.

¹⁷⁸ Bingham 2010, Chap. 10. See Birkinshaw 2015 pp. 47–85. See Lord Mance in Keyu et al v. Secretary of State for Foreign etc Affairs [2015] UKSC 69, paras. 144–151 and R (Wang Yam) v. Central Criminal Court [2015] UKSC 76, paras. 35–38 for qualifications; see R (Bashir) v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2018] UKSC 45, para. 7.

Section 22(1) provides that the procedure under Sect. 20 does not apply if a Minister of the Crown is of the view that, exceptionally, a treaty should be ratified without the conditions of that section having been met. However, a treaty may not be ratified by virtue of subsection (1) after either House has resolved, as mentioned in Sect. 20(1)(c), that the treaty should not be ratified.

The United Nations Act 1946 (see the Ahmed case above) allows for the implementation of Security Council resolutions. The use of that Act in relation to asset freezing orders was noted above. The International Criminal Court Act 2001 gives effect to the Statute of the International Criminal Court and makes provision for offences in the Statute to become crimes under domestic law.

The Human Rights Act 1998 made provision for giving ‘further effect to rights and freedoms guaranteed under the ECHR’ but involved no transfer of power – apart from that given to domestic judges!

International obligations are implemented in a very pragmatic manner. There are no accompanying grand statements of principle, merely an attention to practical and procedural detail.

3.1.2 Not applicable.

3.1.3 There are no constitutional texts in the UK, if that means a written constitution. The Supreme Court in the Ahmed case,¹⁷⁹ observed how disparities may emerge between international measures imposing sanctions and domestic orders where there is an absence of scrutiny by Parliament.¹⁸⁰ The Foreign Affairs Committee had over a decade earlier recommended that any sanctions approved by Government should be notified to the select committee. The Government declined to accept the recommendation. The Supreme Court noted how overseas regimes had introduced procedures in primary legislation to ensure human rights protection and express authorisation for delegated powers in such cases.¹⁸¹ This has not occurred in the UK.

Ahmed was decided on domestic law. The Supreme Court rejected an application by the Government to defer the coming into force of the judgment pending amending legislation.¹⁸² The CJEU in Kadi had deferred the effect of its judgment. The Government response was to present a bill to Parliament to reverse the effects of the judgments by legislation which was enacted within days of the judgments.¹⁸³ Ten months later, the regime was contained within legislation which also provided fuller judicial protection to those subject to sanctions orders.¹⁸⁴ ¹⁷⁹ Ahmed [2010] UKSC 2 and above n. 127.

¹⁸⁰ Second Report of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee on Sierra Leone HC 116-I and Government Reply Cm 4325, (1999).

¹⁸¹ Ahmed [2010] UKSC 2, paras. 48–50.

¹⁸² Ahmed No. 2 [2010] UKSC 5.

¹⁸³ Terrorist Asset Freezing (Temp Provs) Act 2010. See generally Walker 2011.

¹⁸⁴ Terrorist Asset Freezing etc. Act 2010.

In UK law, the emphasis is once again on practicalities and efficacy rather than high principle.

3.1.4 With a constantly evolving constitution based on judicial decision, convention, legislation and parliamentary procedure it is not easy to identify any relevant material in response to this question regarding the role of the national constitution in the context of international law and global governance. UK courts take inspiration from other common law jurisdictions in formulating responses to human rights claims. Recent case law has emphasised this influence at a higher level than ECHR jurisprudence.¹⁸⁵ The UK Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has a long, sometimes controversial history (now in decline) of adjudicating constitutional case law from the Commonwealth and the written constitutions of the member countries. Appeals still concern cases dealing with capital punishment.

Parliament's primary focus is on domestic affairs. It holds the Government accountable for foreign policy (below). It now operates under a convention whereby hostilities in foreign countries by the armed forces have to have parliamentary approval after a Commons vote. Memories are still very fresh of such a vote being used to authorise invasion of Iraq in order, inter alia, to lead 'to a representative government which upholds human rights and the rule of law for all Iraqis'.¹⁸⁶

My belief is that such initiatives are more likely to come from academic input and through the Foreign Office¹⁸⁷ and bodies such as the British Council and interest groups promoting principles of good governance, access to justice and transparency.¹⁸⁸

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 Relevant legislation has been outlined above in Sect. 3.1.1.

Constitutionally, international law does not have any effect within the UK or its component countries until it is implemented by domestic legislation. However, a treaty may not violate statutory or common law rights.¹⁸⁹ Such violation could prevent ratification.¹⁹⁰

¹⁸⁵ Kennedy v. The Charity Commission [2014] UKSC 20.

¹⁸⁶ Hansard HC Debs 18 March 2003.

¹⁸⁷ <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/human-rights-and-democracy-report-2013/human-rights-and-democracy-report-2013> See HMG Strategy for Abolition of the Death Penalty (2011) FCO which includes increasing the number of abolitionist countries. See Simpson (2004). See Birkinshaw supra n. 178.

¹⁸⁸ Baroness Hale has written on the helpful interventions of NGOs in litigation involving terrorist detention cases both at home and abroad: <https://supremecourt.uk/docs/speech-131214.pdf>, p. 13.

¹⁸⁹ Walker v. Baird [1892] AC 491.

¹⁹⁰ Rees-Mogg v. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs [1994] 1 All ER 457. For the EU Act 2011 and an unsuccessful challenge, see R (Wheeler) v. Prime Minister [2014] EWHC 3815 (Admin).

Although courts will not invoke treaty obligations directly in municipal law, domestic courts will interpret legislation implementing treaty provisions in a manner that is consistent with treaty provisions.¹⁹¹ A common law presumption exists that Parliament will act consistently with international obligations. Even where a treaty is not implemented, it may be used to assist in interpretation of legislation.¹⁹² This is especially so in the case of human rights conventions.¹⁹³ In Oppenheimer v. Cattermole,¹⁹⁴ Lord Cross said that ‘the courts of this country should give effect to clearly established rules of international law’. In Kuwait Airways Corp,¹⁹⁵ Lord Nicholls continued: ‘This is increasingly true today. As nations become ever more interdependent, the need to recognise and adhere to standards of conduct set by international law becomes ever more important.’

If a statute is clear and allows no scope for the international principle to be applied then it will not be so invoked.¹⁹⁶ There is nothing that the international obligation can clarify. If the statute is clear then any exercise of discretion under the statute could not be affected by the international obligation constituting a ‘relevant consideration’ for the decision-maker.¹⁹⁷ It must be said that this approach must be questioned now. Pure dualist theories have been heavily attenuated.

Where a measure can be interpreted consistently and inconsistently with an international obligation, the former should be adopted.¹⁹⁸ The principle also applies to the interpretation of the common law.¹⁹⁹ On this basis, the ECHR had a role, although the courts oscillated in its application, in assisting the interpretation of domestic law before its formal incorporation by the HRA 1998. However, the courts could not use the ECHR directly to create rights and duties before it was implemented.

Treaties are usually implemented by legislation, or by delegated instruments. Parliament has a variety of methods to give effect to treaties by use of legislation. Implementation by delegation would invariably be by a statutory Order in Council (see above Sect. 3.1.1). Such orders are subject to light-touch scrutiny and approval.

In interpreting treaties so implemented, the courts are not constrained by the usual techniques of interpretation but apply broad principles of general acceptance ¹⁹¹ Salomon v. Commissioners of Customs and Excise [1967] 2 QB 116 (CA).

¹⁹² Corocraft v. Pan American Airways Inc. [1969] 1 QB 616, 653B-C (CA). See the diametrically opposed judgments of the Supreme Court on whether the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child could be used to assist interpretation of domestic regulations capping welfare payments. The majority ruled they could not because they were not relevant. See the powerful dissent of Baroness Hale and Lord Kerr: R (SG) v. Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2015] UKSC 16.

¹⁹³ Hunt 1997, Chaps. 4, 5 and 6.

¹⁹⁴ [1976] AC 249, 278.

¹⁹⁵ [2002] UKHL 19, para. 28.

¹⁹⁶ R v. Home Secretary ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696 and Hunt 1997; Salomon v. Comrs of C & E [1967] 2 QB 116; see Assange v. The Swedish Prosecution Authority [2012] UKSC 22.

¹⁹⁷ R v. Home Secretary ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696.

¹⁹⁸ See Lord Bingham in Garland v. BREL [1982] UKHL 2.

¹⁹⁹ Pan-American World Airways v. Dept of Trade [1976] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 257.

approaching a provision as an ‘internationally agreed instrument’ and not a national regulatory instrument.²⁰⁰ The Vienna Convention provides basic principles.²⁰¹ The context may determine whether a term employed by the treaty is to be interpreted in a manner determined by the international obligation (autonomous/sui generis) or by domestic usage.²⁰²

The Human Rights Act 1998 makes special provision for interpretation of implemented ECHR rights by UK courts.

3.2.2 In extremis, dualism holds that international law and domestic law occupy different and hermetically sealed space. As such, the doctrine is simply not correct. The relationship is described by Feldman as ‘a semi permeable membrane’.²⁰³ The doctrine has been subject to criticism for many years, but the concept still contains a kernel of truth. The reason for the UK approach is to deprive the executive of the ability to change the law of the land by prerogative power alone and without Parliament. This is a legacy of the struggle between Crown and Parliament in English constitutional history. Domestic courts will not adjudicate on claims that arise from the existence and interpretation of treaties until they are implemented into domestic law.²⁰⁴ Treaties are executive acts and cannot assume the place of legislation.²⁰⁵ UK courts will not interpret international instruments that operate within the field of international law alone.²⁰⁶

There are well known qualifications to this theory of dualism which are brought about by ius cogens and customary international law.²⁰⁷ In the latter case, for an English court to apply the doctrine, a rule has to have ‘attained the position of general acceptance by civilised nations as a rule of international conduct, evidenced by international treaties and conventions, authoritative textbooks, practice and judicial decision’.²⁰⁸ English courts have shown a reluctance to give a generous

²⁰⁰ Buchanan & Co v. Babco Ltd [1978] AC 141, at 152, R v. Home Secretary ex p Adan [2001] 2 AC 474, at 515.

²⁰¹ Brownlie 2012.

²⁰² Al Sirri v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2012] UKSC 54; R v. Guy [2013] UKSC 64. See Assange v. The Swedish Prosecution Authority, supra n. 196. On Julian Assange see UN WGAD, <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/NewsEvents/Pages/DisplayNews.aspx?NewsID=17012&LangID=E>.

²⁰³ Feldman 2011, Chap. 5, p. 142.

²⁰⁴ Rayner (Mincing Lane) Ltd v. Department of Trade [1990] 2 AC 418, 499. See Keyu and Wang Yam supra n. 178.

²⁰⁵ Thomas v. Baptiste [2000] 2 AC 1 (PC) (Lord Millet).

²⁰⁶ R (Corner House Research) v. DSFO [2008] UKHL 60, paras. 43–46 (Bingham) and paras. 59–68 (Brown). Nor will they recognise internationally defined crimes as domestic crimes until implemented under legislation: R v. (M Jones) [2006] UKHL 16. See, however, Youssef, supra n. 127.

²⁰⁷ See Bingham 2010, Chap. 10; Greenwood 2013, Ch. 14.

²⁰⁸ The Christina [1938] AC 485 at 497; Trendtex Banking Corp v. Central Bank of Nigeria [1977] QB 529 (CA); J H Rayner (Mincing Lane) Ltd v. DTI [1990] 2 AC 418.

accommodation to the principle²⁰⁹ despite an old approach that regarded such rules as a part of (or a source of) the common law.²¹⁰ Professor Feldman has written how domestic courts and Parliament have sieved international law before invoking its principles in domestic litigation or legislation.²¹¹ Feldman has also described how in cases reported in England and Wales in 2001 and 2002, only two international conventions apart from the ECHR were considered in a total of six cases.²¹² The position was broadly comparable in 2010. The UN Convention against Torture was considered in 2005 by the House of Lords and Court of Appeal.²¹³ The Supreme Court from its inception in 2009 until July 2014 (318 cases) has considered international law other than EU or ECHR provisions in 23 cases. This does not include references to other national law such as French, German, Belgian, etc.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 Negotiation and ratification are for the Crown alone but may be subject to statutory requirements. Parliamentary approval, where statutorily or, post Miller, constitutionally required, will make matters conditional and justiciable.²¹⁴

Parliament, both Houses, has an array of select committees. These can be very effective scrutineers of policy, and in some cases finance and administration. They investigate the substance of policy. The Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Commons examines the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO), diplomatic service, bodies in receipt of funds from the FCO and FCO responsibility for UK participation in international and regional multilateral organisations such as the United Nations, the OECD, NATO and the European Union. The Committee chooses its own inquiries, and calls witnesses and evidence. Witnesses in a typical inquiry include ministers and officials from the FCO, and a range of other witnesses depending on the nature of the inquiry; this may include representatives from academic and research institutions, interest groups, international organisations, former diplomats as well as journalists. Committees are often advised by expert advisers.

The usual culmination of a Foreign Affairs Committee inquiry is a report made to the House and published in hard copy and on its website.²¹⁵ The Committee

²⁰⁹ A v. Secretary of State for the Home Department [2004] EWCA Civ 1123 and [2005] UKHL 71.

²¹⁰ Triquet v. Bath (1764) 3 Burr 1478 and Blackstone Commentaries iv, 67.

²¹¹ Feldman 2011. See Sales and Clement 2008.

²¹² Feldman 2011, p. 156. He compares this paucity with the constitutional duty on South African judges in cases concerning constitutional rights to consider international law and a power to consider ‘foreign law’ under the South African Constitution Sect. 39(1).

²¹³ Supra n. 211. See Jones v. Ministry of Interior etc. [2006] UKHL 26.

²¹⁴ Rees-Mogg v. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs [1994] 1 All ER 457; Miller supra n. 5.

²¹⁵ <http://www.parliament.uk/business/committees/committees-a-z/commons-select/foreign-affairs-committee/inquiries1/>.

reaches conclusions and makes recommendations to the Government in its reports. The Government has undertaken to give a detailed response to the Committee's reports within two months of publication. The Committee's reports are 'often debated' either in the House or in Westminster Hall within the Houses of Parliament.²¹⁶

The Public Accounts Committee has undertaken inquiries into Government expenditure and is the most formal of parliamentary committees. One very famous inquiry and report on Pergau Dam produced evidence of Government misspending on overseas aid, which was crucial in a judicial review on the legality of aid expenditure.²¹⁷ The objects of the expenditure were not legally sanctioned.

3.3.2 There is no relevant legislation or practice on referendums with regard to international organisations other than the EU.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 Courts do not adjudicate on treaties in a UK context until the treaty is implemented by domestic law.

The Ahmed case had within its sights the domestic regulations implementing the UN Security Council resolutions – although some of the UK judges were very critical of Security Council practices. One must be clear. It is not an international measure that is subjected to legal scrutiny but the domestic implementing measure. However, the international measure may be examined to assess the domestic measure's meaning or legality. Has the domestic measure gold-plated the international provision impermissibly? With what has been said already, the focus is on Parliament and the common law, not the treaty.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 This has not been an issue for the courts. Charities and Parliament have raised concerns about the UK Government being in breach of international human rights law in relation to disability (e.g. the public interest group Just Fair).²¹⁸ The UK has not ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and was notably hostile to the Charter of Fundamental Rights, particularly Part IV on solidarity – although it is acknowledged that the Charter is binding on the UK. UK

²¹⁶ <http://www.parliament.uk/business/committees/committees-a-z/commons-select/foreign-affairs-committee/role/>.

²¹⁷ R v. Foreign Secretary ex p World Development Movement [1995] 1 All ER 611.

²¹⁸ http://just-fair.co.uk/hub/single/disabled_failed_by_savage_cuts/ See also R (SG) v. Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2015] UKSC 16.

Governments have been reluctant to promote economic, social and solidarity rights to the lexicon of human rights.

The EU/US Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP) met with hostile reaction in some sections of the quality press because of its alleged undermining of national democracy, legality and judicial protection.

The proposals have led to considerable concerns about democracy and legality, which have led to Early Day Motion 793 in Parliament, signed by 38 MPs from all parties,²¹⁹ a scholarly letter to the European Commission signed by 120 senior academics (including 45 from different UK universities),²²⁰ campaign groups' petitions to the Department of Business, and debate in mainstream newspapers (including the Independent and the Guardian).

The Early Day Motion by MPs has called for the removal of the Investor-State Dispute clauses, on the grounds that these would enable foreign investors to file complaints against a national government whenever investors perceive a violation of their rights and that these complaints are filed directly to international arbitration tribunals and completely bypass national courts and the judicial system; [...] there is a real risk that these provisions in the TTIP could overturn years of laws and regulations agreed by democratic institutions on social, environmental and small business policy.

One specific area of concern highlighted by healthcare workers, patients' groups and trade unions has been that the TTIP may render irreversible the privatisation of parts of the National Health Service; to this end campaigners note that Slovakia was forced to pay $22m (£13.4m) in damages after the Government reversed the liberalisation of its health insurance market.²²¹

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

A useful starting point is Sir Peter Gibson's 'The Report of the Detainee Inquiry' (December 2013) into allegations of security and intelligence services' involvement in abusive detention of suspected terrorists overseas.²²² In Abdul-Hakim Belhaj

²¹⁹ <http://www.parliament.uk/edm/2013-14/793>. See further <http://ukconstitutionallaw.org/2015/01/24/david-hart-qc-ttip-more-foreign-judges-critising-our-laws/>.

²²⁰ See https://www.kent.ac.uk/law/isds_treaty_consultation.html.

²²¹ For coverage, see Wright, O., Morris, N. (2014, January 14) British sovereignty 'at risk' from EU-US trade deal: UK in danger of surrendering judicial independence to multinational corporations, warn activists. The Independent. <http://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/politics/british-sovereignty-at-risk-from-eu-us-trade-deal-uk-in-danger-of-surrendering-judicial-independence-to-multinational-corporations-warn-activists-9057318.html>.

²²² <http://www.detaineeinquiry.org.uk/>. See also Hakim Belhaj v. Straw, the Intelligence Services etc [2017] UKSC 3 on the alleged respondents' (including the former foreign secretary) participation in the unlawful abduction, detention and rendition of the appellants and the claim's permission to proceed.

v. Straw,²²³ the Court of Appeal, allowing the appeal in relation to justiciability, gave the appellants permission to proceed in their action alleging the respondents' (including the former foreign secretary and the security and intelligence services) participation in the unlawful abduction, detention and rendition of the appellants by US agents overseas. The case reflects an interesting development on inroads into the Act of State doctrine, and the Supreme Court upheld the judgment of the Court of Appeal ([2017] UKSC 3).

Also of use is the Home Affairs Committee's report on Counter-Terrorism²²⁴ and reports by the Independent Reviewer of Terrorism Legislation.²²⁵

It should be noted that the UK-US Extradition Treaty²²⁶ and international arrest warrants²²⁷ have caused concern. While the Home Secretary's decision not to extradite Gary MacKinnon, described by the US authorities as 'the biggest military computer hack of all time', met with approval from civil liberties groups, especially because of his Asperger's syndrome, there was criticism from Labour MPs and accusations of inconsistency in treatment. Islamic prisoners with the same condition had been extradited. The Home Secretary spoke of introducing a 'forum bar' to prevent prosecutions overseas where prosecution was possible in the UK. Courts would make orders where it was not in the interests of justice to allow a prosecution overseas.²²⁸ Any such bar would provoke trenchant criticism from US authorities. A forum bar has meanwhile been introduced and was successfully relied on in the Love case involving the Asperger syndrome victim Lauri Love who was wanted by the US authorities on suspicion of hacking into FBI and other computer systems. Love will not be extradited and it is unknown whether he will face charges before English courts.²²⁹

²²³ [2014] EWCA Civ 1394. See also: Yunus Rahmatullah v. Ministry of Defence etc [2017] UKSC 1 and placing limitations on acts of state in contemporary litigation. See further Shergill v. Khaira [2014] UKSC 33.

²²⁴ HC 231 (2013–14). See also: Yunus Rahmatullah v. Ministry of Defence etc. [2017] UKSC 1.

²²⁵ <https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/terrorism-acts-in-2013>. See further the Intelligence and Security Committee Detainee Mistreatment and Rendition HC 1113 (2017–19).

²²⁶ See with regard to a Kent businessman, Akwagyiram, A. (2012, April 27) Christopher Tappin: Why was a retired Briton extradited to US? BBC News. <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-17865761>. See inter alia: R (Razgar) v. Secretary of State [2004] 2 AC 368; Norris v. Government of the USA [2010] UKSC 9; Zoumbas v. Secretary of State [2013] UKSC 74; HJ (Iran) v. Secretary of State [2010] UKSC 31 – deportation and fear of gay persecution.

²²⁷ (2013, November 27). Interpol accused of failing to scrutinise red notice requests. The Guardian. <http://www.theguardian.com/uk-news/2013/nov/27/interpol-accused-red-notice-requests>.

²²⁸ See with regard to Gary McKinnon suffering from Asperger's syndrome, (2012, October 16) extradition to US blocked by Theresa May. BBC News. <http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-19957138>.

²²⁹ Love v. Government of the USA [2018] EWHC 172 (Admin). Controversy has arisen over the case of two UK nationals fighting for ISIS who were captured by Syrian Kurdish forces in Syria when correspondence was published in the British press between the UK Home Secretary and the US Attorney General. The correspondence revealed that the UK would provide evidence to the USA for a prosecution in the USA carrying a possible sentence of death. This was alleged to be in breach of the UK's international legal obligations. A judicial review of the Home Secretary's action was commenced in England. The two men had their UK passports and UK nationality

Postscript: The impact of the UK referendum decision to leave the European Union

It is hard to summarise the constitutional implications for the UK constitution of the referendum result to leave the European Union. Some of the consequences could be extremely far-reaching – the change in the nature of the relationship between the UK and the EU, the potential splitting of the Union given the majority of votes being cast in favour of remain in Scotland and Northern Ireland, not to mention the potential consequences for parliamentary sovereignty and the protection of human rights. Nicola Sturgeon, the Scottish First Minister, called for a second referendum on Scottish independence, giving rise to a vote of the Scottish Parliament in favour of a second referendum; although this has now been left on the back-burner pending the Brexit negotiations.

The one point of constancy is that the UK does indeed remain a nation with an evolutionary and flexible constitution. The constitutional and legal debate surrounding the referendum result have brought the advantages and disadvantages of this form of constitutional design into the spotlight. With no clear legal answer to the constitutional requirements needed to trigger Art. 50 TEU, there were answers ranging from the need for an exercise of the prerogative only, the prerogative combined with a potential convention for parliamentary resolution or debate, the need for an Act of Parliament and even the need for a second referendum. There were also arguments as to whether, legally or constitutionally, the UK has to adhere to the referendum, the lack of detail in the EU Referendum Act 2015 pointing to the conclusion that the referendum is advisory only. Whilst this may encourage normative debate, the uncertainty also has consequences, particularly in times of political uncertainty, following the resignation of the Prime Minister following the referendum result. The Supreme Court clarified in the Miller decision that legislation was required, although there was no legal requirement for legislation to be subject to a legislative consent motion from the devolved legislatures.²³⁰ The European Union (Withdrawal of Notification Act) 2017 received the royal assent on 16 March 2017, paving the way for Theresa May to notify the European Council of the UK's intention to withdraw from the European Union on 29 March 2019.

In terms of the issues covered in this report, we concluded that whilst the need to incorporate the primacy of directly effective EU law may have been a catalyst for the modification of parliamentary sovereignty, the real modification to sovereignty stemmed from the courts regarding the concept as a principle of the common law and the creation of constitutional statutes, which may not be subject to implied repeal and which can place restrictions on the extent to which sovereignty is transferred to the EU. This juridification of constitutional law was also exemplified revoked: See Bowcott, O. (2018, October 9). Javed ‘appeased US’ on death penalty in Isis suspects’ trial. The Guardian.

²³⁰ R (Miller) v. Secretary of State for Exiting the European Union [2017] UKSC 5, [2017] 1 All ER 593.

in the development of the principle of legality, in the growing adoption of proportionality and the protection of human rights through the common law. Whilst Miller confirmed the primacy of directly effective EU law in the UK, and recognised the unique constitutional significance of the UK's membership of the EU, grafting a new source of law into domestic law, it focused more on this being achieved through Parliament's intention in the European Communities Act 1972. However, it also stressed the importance of constitutional statutes and the principle of legality.

The European Union (Withdrawal) Bill proposes that the Charter will no longer have effect in UK law post Brexit.²³¹ The Act 2018 will transform current EU law into 'EU-derived' laws. The supremacy of these EU-derived laws will continue to apply as regards legislation enacted prior to, but not after, Brexit.²³² This may weaken the remedies available to protect human rights. The Human Rights Act 1998 does not allow for legislation which contravenes human rights to be struck down by the courts, and it is unlikely that this will be included in any forthcoming British Bill of Rights. Nevertheless, the growing juridification of the UK constitution, influenced by both the European Union and the European Convention on Human Rights, may continue to grow, particularly in these confusing times when the constitution is in flux and with the mass media coverage of the UK Supreme Court's decision in Miller.²³³ The Supreme Court and Court of Appeal have both accepted the possibility that, in the very unlikely event that a parliamentary majority abusively sought to entrench its power by a curtailment of the franchise or similar device, the common law would be able to declare such legislation unlawful.²³⁴ It may be that the longer lasting legacy of the UK's relationship with the European Union is a growing desire for constitutionalism, be this through the growing influence of the courts or through a growing awareness of the importance of informed political debate and constitutional safeguards.

²³¹ European Union (Withdrawal) Act 2018, Clause 5(5).

²³² Ibid., Section 5(4) and see Section 5(5).

²³³ See Sect. 2.6.1 above.

²³⁴ Moohan v. Lord Advocate [2014] UKSC 67, para. 35 per Lord Hodge with Baroness Hale and Lords Neuberger, Clarke and Reed and Shindler v. Chancellor of Duchy of Lancaster [2016] EWCA Civ 469, paras. 49–50 and R (Public Law Project) v. Lord Chancellor [2016] UKSC 39, para. 20.

References

- Bingham T. (2010) The Rule of Law. Allen Lane, London.
- Birkinshaw P. (2014) European Public Law: the Achievement and the Challenge. Kluwer Law International, Netherlands.
- Birkinshaw P. (2015) Les Relations entre le Parlement, le Gouvernement et les jurisdicctions sur les questions supranationales. In: Antoine A. (ed.) Le droit public britannique: état des lieux et perspectives. Société de Législation Comparée, Paris, pp. 47–85.
- Birkinshaw P., Varney M. (2016) Britain Alone Constitutionally? In: Birkinshaw P., Biondi A. (eds.) Britain Alone! The Implications and Consequences of United Kingdom Exit from the EU. Wolters Kluwer, European Monographs No. 96, pp. 13–27.
- Brownlie I. (2012) Principles of Public International Law, 8th edn. OUP, Oxford.
- Carrera S., Guild E., Hernanz N. (2014) Europe's most wanted? Recalibrating Trust in the European Warrant System. CEPS Special Report No. 55. Centre for European Policy Studies, Brussels.
- Chalmers D., Davies G., Monti M. (2011) European Union Law, 2nd edn. CUP, Cambridge.
- Christou T. (2010) A Case Study of the EAW. The AIRE Centre, London.
- Craig P. (2011a) Britain in the European Union. In: Jowell J., Oliver D. (eds.) The Changing Constitution, 7th edn. OUP, Oxford, pp. 102–131.
- Craig P. (2011b) The European Union Act: Locks, Limits and Legality. CML Rev. 48:1881 et seq.
- Douglas-Scott S. (2002) Constitutional Law of the European Union. Pearson Education, Harlow.
- Feldman D. (2011) The internationalization of public law and its impact on the UK. In: Jowell J., Oliver D. (eds.) The Changing Constitution, 7th edn. OUP, Oxford, pp. 132 et seq.
- Gordan M., Dougan M. (2012) The United Kingdom's European Union Act 2011: 'who won the bloody war anyway?' E.L.Rev. 1:3–30.
- Greenwood Sir C. (2013) Sovereignty in Question: A View from the International Bench. In: Rawlings R., Leyland P., Young, A. (eds.) Sovereignty and the Law: Domestic, European and International Perspectives. OUP, Oxford, pp. 251–268.
- Hunt M. (1997) Using Human Rights in English Courts. Hart Publishing, Oxford.
- Irvine D. (2012) A British Interpretation of Convention Rights. PL 2012(Apr):237–252.
- Marin L. (2014) Effective and Legitimate? Learning from the Lessons of 10 Years of Practice with the European Arrest Warrant. New Journal of European Criminal Law 5(3):326 et seq.
- Mitsilegas V. (2006) The Constitutional Implications of Mutual Recognition in Criminal Matters in the EU. CML Rev. 43(5):1277–1311.
- Mitsilegas V. (2012) The Limits of Mutual Trust in Europe's Area of Freedom, Security and Justice. From Automatic Inter-state Cooperation to the Slow Emergence of the Individual. Yearbook of European Law 31(1):319–372.
- Mitsilegas V., Carrera S., Eisele K. (2014) The End of the Transitional Period for Police and Criminal Justice Measures Adopted before the Lisbon Treaty. Who Monitors Trust in the European Justice Area? CEPS Paper in Liberty and Security in Europe no. 74. Centre for European Policy Studies, Brussels.
- O'Shea L., Robinson J. (2011) Sleepwalking into Dangerous Legal Territory – Failure of the European Arrest Warrant Framework from a Human Rights Perspective. Alternative LJ 36:146 et seq.
- Peers S. (2013) European Integration and the European Union Act: an Irresistible Force meets an immovable object. PL 2013(Jan):119–134.
- Sales P. (2012) Strasbourg Jurisprudence and the Human Rights Act: A Response to Lord Irvine. PL 2012(Apr):253–267.
- Sales P., Clement J. (2008) International Law in Domestic Courts: the Developing Framework 124 LQR 388–421.
- Shah S., Poole T. (2009) The Impact of the Human Rights Act on the House of Lords. PL 2009 (Apr):347–371.

- Simpson A. (2004) Human Rights and the End of Empire: Britain and the Genesis of the European Convention. OUP, Oxford.
- Wade H.W.R. (1996) Sovereignty – Revolution or Evolution? LQR 112:568 et seq.
- Walker C. (2011) Terrorism and the Law. OUP, Oxford.
- Williams A. (2004) EU Human Rights Policies: A Study in Irony. OUP, Oxford.
- Wright J. (2009) Interpreting Section 2 of the Human Rights Act: Towards an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Human Rights. PL 2005(Jul):595–616.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Malta: Reflections on New Mechanisms for Synchrony of Values in Different Levels of Governance

Peter G. Xuereb

Abstract The report observes that the Maltese Constitution of 1964 has significantly been influenced by the British constitutional tradition. This includes references to Erskine May as the British parliamentary ‘Bible’, the Westminster model of cabinet and parliament, and the fact that the Constitutional Court has weaker powers (acts can be repealed by Parliament only). The concept of the rule of law is drawn from English constitutional textbooks, from Dicey to Wade. However, a key difference is that unlike in the UK system, Parliament in Malta is not supreme but is subject to the Constitution as suprema lex. The bill of rights in the Constitution is similar to the ECHR; some constitutional provisions are not enforceable (e.g. a clause on limitation of rights). EU and international law, broadly speaking, have not presented acute constitutional issues. Nevertheless, the report notes a gap in the protection of constitutional values at the EU level, and an even greater gap at the global level. A case is made that the national and the ‘wider’ level ought to operate in synchrony according to the same core fundamental values and principles. The report puts forward the suggestion to expand the so-called yellow card mechanism so that constitutional issues beyond proportionality and subsidiarity could be raised by national parliaments ex ante when a proposal for EU legislation is issued.

The author is and was at the time of writing Professor of European and Comparative Law, Head of the Department of European and Comparative Law in the Faculty of Law, and Chairman of the Institute for European Studies at the University of Malta; subsequently Judge at the Court of Justice of the European Union. e-mail: peter.g.xuereb@um.edu.mt.

All websites accessed 19 January 2015. Text submitted 21 January 2015.

P. G. Xuereb (✉)
University of Malta, Msida, Malta
e-mail: peter.g.xuereb@um.edu.mt

Keywords The Constitution of Malta · EU amendments in the Constitution · The Constitutional Court of Malta · Constitutional review · British constitutional influences · Fundamental rights and the rule of law · European Arrest Warrant and extraditions · Data Retention Directive and surveillance · Judicial dialogues · Supremacy · Neutrality · AJD Tuna and the principles of legitimate expectations, proportionality and justice and the adversarial principle

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The Maltese Constitution¹ of 1964, known as the Independence Constitution, was a post-Colonial constitution of the 1960s that spoke of the Queen of the United Kingdom as the Head of State of what effectively was a new, independent state within the British Commonwealth. It was amended in 1974 to constitute Malta as a Republic within the Commonwealth of Nations, by Act LVIII of 1974, and the first Maltese (non-executive) president was appointed. The Westminster model of cabinet government was selected, and Erskine May² is still the parliamentary reference point, but otherwise the model of a written constitution, replete with a reasonably extensive and judicially enforceable bill of rights inspired by the European Convention on Human Rights of 1950 (hereinafter European Convention or ECHR), and with limitations on parliamentary sovereignty, was chosen. A status of ‘active neutrality’ was enshrined in the Constitution in 1987 by an amendment made by Act IV of 1987. Membership of the European Union required some further changes, but not so as to affect the essential fundamentals of the state or in such a manner as to render the changes irreversible. Leaving the EU would be just as easy in terms of parliamentary action as was joining. An Act of Parliament passed by majority and repealing the European Union Act 2003, the national Act of Parliament providing for membership of the Union by incorporating the EU acquis, would suffice. Still, no sovereignty clause appears in the Constitution, save as to the supremacy of the Constitution over any other law, with ultimate political sovereignty implicitly lying with the people. The author’s preference de lege condenda would be for inclusion in the Constitution of an express declaration of the principle that sovereignty resides in the people.

It can be said that the Maltese Constitution is equally ‘legal’ and ‘political’. Like other constitutions of the new Commonwealth, the new Constitution preferred to spell things out as a matter of strict law rather than leave matters to residual discretion.³ As an independence constitution in origin and a republican constitution in actuality, it provides the supreme law of the land, while doing so against a heavy political and legal backdrop of evolving membership of the regional (European) and international (global) communities.

¹ <http://justiceservices.gov.mt/DownloadDocument.aspx?app=lom&itemid=8566>.

² The British Parliamentary ‘Bible’.

³ Cremona 1997, p. 77.

1.1.2 The rationale of the Constitution consists both of establishing statehood and sovereignty and of limiting the exercise of public power. While the locus of the ultimate political power is left unstated, except that the people are clearly sovereign every five years in terms of the obligatory general elections, Malta is constituted as a sovereign state and a national polity, with democratic political institutions that are clearly but not expressly subject to the rule of law and an independent judiciary called upon to enforce the Constitution and laws made under it. The Constitution both (a) declares sovereignty in international law and organises the state and (b) limits the exercise of power internally by reference to constitutional rights and liberties and checks and balances, as well as international obligations. It is hard to say that any one of these dominates. But it is clear that Parliament is not supreme (unlike in the traditional UK sense), for Parliament is subject to the Constitution as suprema lex. Professor J. J. Cremona cites Professor Sir Kenneth Wheare as stating that the supremacy of a constitution over the institutions which it creates derives from its very nature; it not only regulates the institutions but also ‘governs the government’. It is from this combination of factors that the effective application of the principle of the rule of law emerges. In Professor Cremona’s view, Art. 6 of the Constitution – the supremacy clause – merely (and redundantly, as well as dangerously – because it subjects it to possible amendment) restates this otherwise implicit principle.⁴

The observance of international law is key, as is the observance of human rights. Of the two, it is perhaps the former that is the more highly evolved, with lessons still to be learned in the area of human rights and individual remedies. Having said that, there is also room for improvement on the operation in practice of separation of powers and due checks and balances, and it is currently a question as to how and to what extent the model of cabinet government as it has evolved needs change.⁵

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 Although there was arguably no need to make provision in the Constitution for EU membership, it was thought prudent to do so. The result was the amendment of Art. 65(1) of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

⁴ Cremona 1997, p. 106.

⁵ The Today Public Policy Institute 2014 Part II paras. 26 et seq., and 72 et seq.

65. (1) Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament may make laws for the peace, order and good government of Malta in conformity with full respect for human rights, generally accepted principles of international law and Malta's international and regional obligations in particular those assumed by the treaty of accession to the European Union signed in Athens on the 16th April, 2003.

Article 65 was given this current form by the European Union Act, Act V of 2003,⁶ Art. 7. It is in virtue of this Act that Malta has acceded in due course to subsequent treaties, including the Lisbon Treaty in 2007.

It is clear that Art. 65(1) cannot operate as a permanent commitment to membership of the Union for the reason that Art. 65(1) can be amended by a majority of all the Members of the House under Art. 66(5) of the same Constitution. It was presumably thought, however, that the Constitution should contain some reference to the Union inasmuch as joining the Union was a highly controversial national political issue, not least for the reason that a considerable transfer to the Union institutions of, and limitation on, legislative power for the future was involved. However, ultimate sovereignty is clearly retained in the Constitution in the form of the maintenance of the alterability of this constitutional provision.

1.2.2 The Constitution was amended by majority in Parliament,⁷ following a non-binding referendum in favour of membership and a subsequent national election won on the basis of a mandate to take Malta into the Union. The Constitution was amended by Act No V of 2003, titled the European Union Act of 2003.

The relevant rules are in Art. 66, sub-arts. (5) and (7) (b) as follows:

(5) In so far as it alters any of the provisions of this Constitution other than those specified in sub-articles (2) and (3) of this article, a bill for an Act of Parliament under this article shall not be passed in the House of Representatives unless at the final voting thereon in that House it is supported by the votes of a majority of all the members of the House.

...

(7) In this article – (b) references to the alteration of any of the provisions of this Constitution or of the Malta Independence Act, 1964 include references to the amendment, modification or re-enactment, with or without amendment or modification, of that provision, the suspension or repeal of that provision and the making of a different provision in lieu of that provision.

The Lisbon Treaty was given effect in Malta via the application of Art. 2(2) of the European Union Act 2003, which empowers the Prime Minister to order that any new Treaty be 'treated as one with' the Treaty signed in Athens in April 2003. This was done by the Treaty of Lisbon Order (S.L. 460.20, Legal Notice 42 of 2008), which was promulgated on 1 February 2008.

⁶ <http://www.justiceservices.gov.mt/DownloadDocument.aspx?app=lom&itemid=8926&l=1>.

⁷ It may be noted in passing that the amendment of some specified provisions of the Constitution, notably the provision on the prorogation or dissolution of the House of Representatives, requires a referendum vote in favour. See Art. 66(3) of the Constitution.

1.2.3 The amendments were made as a matter of course. Ever since the controversy on membership was decided in political terms by the general election of 2003, with the Labour Party changing its policy on EU membership as a result of its defeat at the polls in an election dominated by the membership issue, national consensus has prevailed on the issue of Malta's continuing membership, which was also demonstrated by the unanimity on the vote in Parliament for ratification of the Lisbon Treaty and the consequential amendment of Maltese law. The amendments were drafted by the Office of the Advocate General.

1.2.4 There have been no further EU-related amendment proposals.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 As far as the relationship between Maltese law and EU law is concerned, this is covered by Art. 3 of the European Union Act of 2003, Chap. 460 of the Laws of Malta, which provides:

(1) From the First day of May 2004, the Treaty and existing and future acts adopted by the European Union shall be binding on Malta and shall be part of the domestic law thereof under the conditions laid down in the Treaty. (2) Any provision of any law which from the said date is incompatible with Malta's obligations under the Treaty or which derogates from any right given to any person by or under the Treaty shall to the extent that such law is incompatible with such obligations or to the extent that it derogates from such rights be without effect and unenforceable.⁸

In the first place, this provision encapsulates the transfer of legislative power to the Union effected by the signature of the Treaty(ies) and their ratification by Malta. My analysis is that this transfer occurred upon signature and then ratification by the passage and coming into effect of the European Union Act, in virtue of Art. 65 of the Constitution. Secondly, this provision encapsulates the 'supremacy' of Union law (this by effect of Art. 3(2) of the European Union Act).

1.3.2 There have been no statements on the transfer or delegation of sovereignty by the Maltese Constitutional Court itself. The author's view is that there has been, objectively speaking, a transfer pro tempore of legislative power (as long as Malta remains a Member State and the European Union Act remains in force) to the institutions of the Union in the fields of competence of the Union and subject to the Treaty procedures for the exercise of that competence, and that Maltese constitutional theory must be regarded as accommodating this. However, precisely how this would be articulated by the Constitutional Court is an open question in the absence of any indications from it on this matter.

⁸ <http://www.justiceservices.gov.mt/DownloadDocument.aspx?app=lom&itemid=8926&l=1>.

1.3.3 The limits are to be found embedded in the wording of Art. 65 of the Constitution. They are not particularly strict. It is most unlikely that the Constitutional Court would second-guess the determination of Parliament, except where the effect of a parliamentary resolution would undermine the very fabric of the Maltese state and sovereignty itself. This is because ultimate and entire sovereignty continues to reside in the Maltese state as constituted by the Constitution; Malta is a state under international law, and Malta cannot cease to be such by virtue of any action taken by Parliament under Art. 65 as it stands. However, there is a major caveat, since in theory at least there is the legal possibility of amendment of every constitutional provision, although the applicable procedure can vary and would follow one of three different modes, but with one of them available for each provision of the Constitution. Even Art. 1, constitutive of the Republican State of Malta, and Art. 6 (supremacy of the Constitution) can (at least textually and theoretically) be amended by special majority in Parliament under Art. 66(2).

Thus, any major overhaul of the State of Malta would at the very least require a two-thirds majority vote in Parliament, in some cases with a referendum result in favour, but politically-speaking, surely full consensus bordering on unanimity among the citizens of Malta would be needed. It is not known whether the constitutional revision exercise currently under way will propose a greater direct role for the people. The dynamics of the constitutional development of the Union itself and Malta with it may well play a role in any debate on these lines.

1.3.4 The Constitutional Court has not had occasion to proclaim the supremacy of EU law over the national Constitution or vice versa, for example in particular in the context of an alleged conflict between a constitutional provision and Union law. Nor, arguably, could it do so in such stark terms. The constitutional accommodation of the supremacy of EU law rather appears to take the form of an Act of Parliament passed in virtue of the Constitution and to be applied in practice by loyal co-operation and ‘co-operative interpretation/constitutionalism/dialogue’, but with the Maltese legal and constitutional system retaining a hypothetical ‘final say’ for the Maltese Constitution/Constitutional Court regarding (a) the interpretation of the Constitution, and (b) the applicability or otherwise in a particular case of an EU rule.

This is because the Constitution, in Art. 6, expressly declares that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land by declaring that:

6. Subject to the provisions of sub-articles (7) and (9) of article 47 and of article 66 of this Constitution, if any other law is inconsistent with this Constitution, this Constitution shall prevail and the other law shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be void [emphasis added].

There is, therefore, potential (perhaps only hypothetical) conflict with Art. 3(2) of the European Union Act, inasmuch as this latter provision appears to provide for the supremacy of Union law, not only in the sense of applicability in a particular case but by rendering any ‘incompatible’ Maltese law pro tanto ineffective and void of effect. The apparent conflict would be removed if the word ‘law’ in Art. 3(2) were read to exclude the Constitution, but the latter itself refers to itself in terms of being a law,⁹ and in any case the intention of the legislator in the European Union Act was clearly that of incorporating the acquis which, as is well known, predicates the ‘supremacy’ of Union law over conflicting national law ‘however framed’.

If any EU law were applicable in Malta but inconsistent with the Constitution, then presumably that would pro tanto and in that case render the European Union Act (which mandates its application) inconsistent with the Constitution (requiring its non-application), making the Act itself also pro tanto and in that case void and of no effect. This is one reading and does not exclude any other analysis or interpretation being made by the courts. However, the Maltese courts will always first seek to reconcile the Constitution and any other law with EU law as a matter of interpretation before finding any ‘conflict’ between such laws.

The Maltese legal system generally follows the line that all Maltese law will be interpreted in line with Malta’s international obligations, which include its obligations as referred to in the European Union Act 2003. The Maltese courts have unequivocally accepted the direct applicability of EU regulations and declared them to be applicable in preference to conflicting national law.¹⁰

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The Standing Committee on Foreign and European Affairs is the parliamentary body charged with checking draft Union legislative proposals for compliance with subsidiarity. In practice, Parliament is more or less dependent in this regard upon the Government for information and analysis as to the impact of proposed EU legislation on Malta generally, and the economy or industry, whether in general or in particular, lacking as it still does the resources to do this entirely independently in a satisfactory way. Key subsidiarity issues are sometimes missed. Parliament has at times sought to give itself effective autonomy in this regard, but with no lasting success as yet.

1.4.2 The first EU-related popular referendum was ‘voluntary’ and held by a Nationalist Party (conservative) Government in order to sound out the people on membership. The referendum was not mandated by the Constitution and was non-binding in legal terms. The majority Yes vote (for Union membership) result was discounted by the opposition party as being simply non-binding. Membership of the EU was then in fact decided in political terms by a general election, held within weeks of the referendum in March 2003, with the losing opposition party accepting the result of the general election as the people’s definitive verdict on EU membership. No other referendums have been held since then on purely EU matters. Maltese law (including the Constitution) does not as a rule require the holding of a referendum for constitutional change, although it does require the use of referendum in the case of some constitutional amendments and also provides for abrogative referendums. Direct democracy is not a main feature of the Maltese constitutional scene, although Governments have occasionally employed a non-binding referendum. The current constitutional revision process, which commenced in 2014 on Government initiative¹¹ but without a clearly defined starting point, is meant to consider the possible introduction of referendum as a tool of direct democracy.¹²

⁹ Article 6 speaks of ‘any other law’ (author’s italics).

¹⁰ See for example, Sansone v. Comptroller of Industrial Property, Court of Appeal, Application 15/20 of 2005, decided on 22 March 2006. See generally Sammut 2009.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 The amendment of Art. 65 of the Constitution was probably dictated by a perceived need to legitimise membership by reference to some form of transfer of power clause or constitutional competence. The opposition had been arguing that Art. 6 of the Constitution (the supremacy of the Constitution clause) precluded EU membership, and that this article would need to be deleted for Malta to be able to join; indeed the Government had received this very advice. The present author had argued that neither this nor the insertion of an ‘EU law supremacy clause’ was strictly needed nor indeed desirable, and that Member State practice as to constitutional provisions on the question of conflict of national law with EU law was widely divergent, including in the then current Member States; there has been a marked tolerance for an understated approach as long as it appeared clear that EU law would in practice be given application as and where required by EU law. However, the lack of a constitutional provision permitting and regulating the transfer of legislative power was, it seems, considered a lacuna, and the solution was the amendment of Art. 65 to provide expressly for this vis-à-vis the European Union. The Constitutional Court was not involved. It was a combination of the desire of Government to do, and appear to be doing, things constitutionally and transparently, to regulate matters rather than leaving them to later chance interpretation or attack, in combination with the relative ease of making the necessary amendment once it was realised that the Union acquis did not actually require the deletion of the supremacy clause (Art. 6), far less its substitution by an EU law supremacy clause. The general public was by now in relatively strong acceptance if not support of Union membership. Therefore, the constitutional culture, the quest to enhance the legitimacy of EU membership, the need to take the Constitution seriously and to reflect the shift of power to the supranational level, the support of the public, as well as the relative ease of the amendment procedure, all played their part in the introduction of a rather innocuous amendment to Art. 65 in the very same Act that rendered the EU acquis effective in Malta.

¹¹ The present Government had promised a constitutional convention on a possible ‘second republic’ in its electoral manifesto of 2013.

¹² Generally see, for a contribution by an independent think-thank, The Today Public Policy Institute 2014.

1.5.2 Perhaps the amendments were limited in scope due to the vehement opposition there had erstwhile been to membership of an increasingly ‘federal’ Union, often articulated in ‘loss of sovereignty’ and ‘lack of voice’ terms. The least controversial/inflammatory legal solutions were found. These were not the minimum required to allow the acquis to be put into effect. The European Union Act 2003, incorporating the Art. 65 constitutional amendment, replicated in large measure the wording of the United Kingdom’s European Communities Act of 1972. Article 3 of the Maltese European Union Act was arguably strongly enough worded in terms of ‘supremacy’ as to at least raise a question of compatibility with the Constitution, but it seems that consensus about making membership work prevailed over hypothetical, and possibly sterile, debates.

As to ‘waning constitutionalism’, there has not been any real debate on this, but politicians from both sides have commented upon the democratic deficit within the Union. This is linked to a perception that it is hard for Malta and other small Member States to obtain solidarity-inspired attention from their fellow Member States in face of the general drive for deeper European integration, the strategies adopted by more powerful or influential Member States and the difficulty still found by the national parliament to properly monitor EU proposals, as well as other related issues. The Maltese feel close to their politicians, so that the syndrome of double remoteness is, in general, missing. Further, according to surveys, the Maltese are among the citizens who feel close to Brussels and other centres of policy/law-making in the EU.¹³ Their Members of the European Parliament are among the most readily accessible. However, the feeling is one of a domineering group at the centre. Domestically, it is accepted that the Constitution is in need of review also for domestic reasons to do with a heightened need for accountability of the national government, an outdated set of provisions on neutrality and new institutional demands, among other reasons. The review process is taking some time to gather momentum but interest in the Constitution (and its review) has not diminished. Indeed, it is thought of as an important and even vital safeguard in the supranational and international contexts, and the ‘EU amendments’ made were truly on the minimalist side. It is not thought likely that any policy shift will be made on that score.

1.5.3 The author’s view is that the general opinion in Malta would be that it is vital for constitutionalism – in the sense of limited government – at national level to be intertwined with constitutionalism – in the same sense – at regional and global level. In other words, these other levels must themselves be ‘appropriately’ constitutionalised, especially if they are to be further empowered. The role of the national constitution would not change, and the global constitutional picture must be reflected in the national constitution, but this also applies in reverse. The real challenge then is to devise the regional and global constitutional compact under the form of constitutionalism and most crucially to build appropriate mechanisms of voice and solidarity (in both the procedural and substantive senses) into this regional and global constitutionalism. At regional European level, the Lisbon Treaty (building on the Constitutional Treaty) quite clearly set out to do more of this, but a gap remains. We have a much larger gap at global level. At the same time, constitutional tolerance is said to be a key value. Power is increasingly exercised at supranational level because it is being transferred to this level or even simply taken at this level. It is up to states to balance the transfer of powers to this level with added constitutionalism and constitutional values operating at this level. In the author's view, changes to national constitutions would best be designed in a context which involved the constitutionalisation of the exercise of power at the 'higher' level according to a multilevel – or (as I prefer) on a 'wider' scale (if we use the language of the 'horizontal' constitutionalism model). Both levels or spheres should operate in synchrony according to the same core fundamental values and principles. New mechanisms and instruments need to be devised for this purpose.

¹³ European Commission, Public Opinion in the EU, Standard Eurobarometer 82, Autumn 2014. http://ec.europa.eu/public_opinion/archives/eb/eb82/eb82_first_en.pdf.

We have recently witnessed the need for constitutional accommodation in most Member States to permit new Union powers or the unforeseen exercise of power at Union level. This is emerging as something of a trend. In my view – and this view was expressed at the time of the future of Europe debate at the turn of the century but resonates even more powerfully today – the final understanding and adoption of the principle of solidarity (enforcing the value claimed by the Treaty) is the key. With true and active solidarity even full integration can be achieved, but without it every step will prove tortuous and fraught with backtracking and avoidance. An active principle of procedural and substantive solidarity¹⁴ – not to be confused with a redistributive policy – would be based on a multi-level dialogic approach that applied – through the Institutions – the practice of input and output legitimacy based on taking different national interests into full account, weighing them against the common good at EU level, and then proceeding to balance the proportionate pursuit of the EU level common good by the safeguarding or accommodation of each national interest. This is a combined solidarity and common goods approach to the future parallel constitutional evolution of the Treaties and of the national constitutions. It is not only about respect for the essence of national constitutions. It goes beyond this, to respect for legitimate national interests. This practice of real solidarity requires a constitutional underpinning at both Union and national level. If put in place, it would allow for the pursuit of ambitious aims at EU level while securing maximum agreement for the required action at EU level – precisely through the solidary respect for legitimate individual national interests. Legislative and other decision-making procedures would be adapted to provide for this.

¹⁴ See Xuereb 2002.

Mechanisms of review and challenge would ensure that an objection could be made to the use of power otherwise than in accordance with this principle of solidarity. For example, I would argue that the subsidiarity yellow card procedure should be extended to the exercise of the solidarity principle (and duty). Or a parallel structure could be created. If a certain number of Member States felt that a legislative proposal did not evince a reasonable degree of solidarity, the procedure would send the proposal back for further consideration at that early stage. In fact, other grounds of a constitutional nature might be added, so that the monitoring and review by national parliaments would be made to cover other constitutional issues, such as the proper observance of human rights (for details, see Sect. 2.12.3). Such mechanisms would ensure early consultation and dialogue, and ultimately pre-empt the possibility or even certainty in some cases of ‘post-adoption challenges’ to EU measures, not only before the Court of Justice but also before national supreme courts. In the latter case any challenge would have to have its basis in national law, meaning that a clash would have occurred between Union legislation and national (possibly constitutional) law. It would be far better to recognise principles at EU level and ensure their application or enforcement at this level (with full dialogue between levels) than to adopt legislation or other measures that give rise to chagrin at national level and legal challenges at that level that would have to be settled by reference to national law. It is far more likely that the necessary accommodations will be found through a process that ensures solidarity ex ante rather than one that relies on raw majoritarianism with the possibility of subsequent challenge on grounds that require of the Court something that a sensitive Commission and political process are far better able to deliver. I have written elsewhere that

[a]s recent events in the Union have shown, state sovereignty needs to be constantly re-evaluated. Otherwise national interest will be pursued not through cooperation, but through the power of the veto, and even when this obstructs the pursuit of the wider common good. This makes it a constitutional issue for all the Member States and the Union as a whole.¹⁵

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Since 1961, Malta’s constitutional documents have featured a list of fundamental rights with corresponding action for enforcement. The Constitution of 1964 is the main document but the list of rights was enhanced by the European Convention Act of 1987, which extended the same right of action to the new rights derived from the European Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 1950 (ECHR). As to the general principles, they have tended to emerge almost as a matter of custom in the ‘gurisprudenza’ (judgments) of the courts, especially of the First Hall of the Civil Court in its constitutional jurisdiction, and of the Constitutional Court. General legal principles are not applied in a way that they could be considered as sources of fundamental rights protection.¹⁶

¹⁵ See Xuereb 2012, p. 169.

2.1.2 Article 32 of the Constitution provides as follows:

Whereas every person in Malta is entitled to the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual, that is to say, the right, whatever his race, place of origin, political opinions, colour, creed, sex, sexual orientation or gender identity, but subject to respect for the rights and freedoms of others and for the public interest, to each and all of the following, namely – (a) life, liberty, security of the person, the enjoyment of property and the protection of the law; (b) freedom of conscience, of expression and of peaceful assembly and association; and (c) respect for his private and family life, the subsequent provisions of this Chapter shall have effect for the purpose of affording protection to the aforesaid rights and freedoms, subject to such limitations of that protection as are contained in those provisions being limitations designed to ensure that the enjoyment of the said rights and freedoms by any individual does not prejudice the rights and freedoms of others or the public interest [emphasis added].

This preambular set of limitations is reflected in specific provisions legitimising derogation in the case of each right (except for protection from inhuman or degrading treatment), such as ‘by a provision of law which is reasonably required in the interest of public safety, public order, public morality or decency, public health or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others’. Several provisions speak both of ‘reasonably required’ and ‘reasonably justifiable in a democratic society’. The standard is substantially similar to that of the ECHR.¹⁷

2.1.3 While the rule of law underpins its entire edifice, there is no direct reference to this principle in the Constitution.¹⁸ Under threat at certain points in history, it has been strengthened from time to time. For example, as a reaction to the non-appointment of Constitutional Court judges between 1972 and 1974, the Constitution now provides an automatic mechanism for the constitution of the Court in default of specific nominations (Art. 95(5) of the Constitution). Other aspects include access to justice, the hierarchy of the courts and the system of appeals. Again, at one stage it seemed as if the First Hall of the Civil Court was subverting the hierarchical system by insisting that its ‘original’ jurisdiction gave it a power of review over the Constitutional Court, centring around the issue of how an alleged breach of fundamental rights by the Constitutional Court itself was to be remedied if not by a new action before the First Hall in its constitutional jurisdiction.¹⁹ In the course of such traumatic episodes, the language of the rule of law has tended to be heard.

¹⁶ Azzopardi 2012.

¹⁷ Cremona 1997, p. 82.

¹⁸ An initial discussion document was produced in September 2014 by ‘The Today Public Policy Institute’ (TPPI), with a view to launching a public debate on constitutional reform on these lines. The TPPI has recommended that this and other principles be considered for incorporation in the Constitution via a future Constitutional Convention amending the Constitution. The Today Public Policy Institute 2014, paras. 22–25.

The concept is drawn upon in legal education and training from English constitutional text-books and authors, from Dicey to Wade, and Lords Denning and Bingham, and is a point of reference in our constitutional judgments. Access to justice is a key principle. In the fundamental rights context it takes the form of the (relatively recent) right of action safeguarded by the Constitution and available for the protection and enforcement of the rights listed in Arts. 33 to 45, as well as the rights covered by the European Convention Act 1987. The novelty of this right of action was that it was made available also in the case of potential ('likely') breaches of a fundamental right. However, there is a proviso to the availability of this right of action. The proviso in Art. 46(2) reads: 'Provided that the Court may, if it considers it desirable so to do, decline to exercise its powers under this sub-article in any case where it is satisfied that adequate means of redress for the contravention alleged are or have been available to the person concerned under any other law.' The non liquet permitted here is unusual for the Maltese legal system.²⁰ Ultimately, as Professor J. J. Cremona, the main author of the 1964 Constitution, has written, it is allegiance to the rule of law that provides for the proper working of the Constitution. The clear implication is that it is not some document that of itself guarantees the rule of law but a vigilant people that will use the Constitution, whether regarding proper law-making, independence of the judiciary, hierarchy of the courts or human rights provisions to guarantee the rule of law in practice.²¹ Of course, the document must be so orientated. Access to justice, a fair trial, enforcement of civil rights by an impartial and independent tribunal, and other key elements of the impartial application of law and administration of justice are enshrined in the so-called right to the protection of the law in Art. 39 of the Constitution. Principles stemming from the rule of law, such as due process, fairness, fair hearing and audi alteram partem are recognised as fundamental rights as a result of Art. 6 ECHR, made part of Maltese 'supreme' law by the European Convention Act of 1987.²²

The Constitution provides that laws shall only come into effect when published, but that Parliament may make laws that are retroactive. Art. 72 provides:

- (1) The power of Parliament to make laws shall be exercised by bills passed by the House of Representatives and assented to by the President. (2) When a bill is presented to the President for assent, he shall without delay signify that he assents. (3) A bill shall not become law unless it has been duly passed and assented to in accordance with this ¹⁹ See on this, Mifsud Bonnici 2004, paras. 15–28.

²⁰ See further, Mifsud Bonnici 2004, Chapter VI.

²¹ Cremona 1997, p. 118.

²² Azzopardi 2012.

Constitution. (4) When a law has been assented to by the President it shall without delay be published in the Gazette and shall not come into operation until it has been so published, but Parliament may postpone the coming into operation of any such law and may make laws with retrospective effect.

While Parliament may make laws with retroactive effect, Art. 39(8) of the Constitution entrenches the principle that a person cannot be convicted of a crime if the act or omission, when it took place, did not constitute such an offence.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 There have been no cases specifically on this matter. However, issues can arise where economic freedoms clash with classic rights as interpreted and applied in Malta in certain cases. For example, abortion, seen as an assault on ‘life’, remains a criminal offence under Maltese law. On this basis attempts to provide this ‘service’ (as described by the Court of Justice) in Malta or to procure or otherwise arrange for it to be obtained outside Malta have met with police or other action. There has been one difficult case in which a father attempted to stop his partner from proceeding abroad for an abortion. Another example involved the surgical separation of twins that were joined at birth where one of them (the more viable one) stood a chance of surviving if the operation were carried out, but with the certain knowledge that the other would die ‘during’ any operation to separate them and that both would certainly die without any surgical intervention. The matter was finally decided in an English court (where the twins had been taken) in favour of the operation (carried out in the UK),²³ but the outcome would conceivably have been different in a Maltese court (and hospital), and any economic right or freedom of movement right in play might possibly have been relegated to second place by a Maltese court.

As far as social rights are concerned, Malta is a Republic ‘founded on work and fundamental rights and freedoms’ (Art. 1(1)) and ‘committed to social progress among nations’ (Art. 1(3)), and the Constitution seeks to protect social principles by declaration (non-justiciable principles) in Chap. III. This creates a very strong presumption in favour of these principles and a strong rule of interpretation that all legislation must be in conformity with them. Thus, the Maltese courts are called upon to ensure balance between economic aims and rights, and social aims and individual rights. Nevertheless, as has been strongly asserted by a group of NGOs in their recent replies and recommendations in response to a Government consultation exercise on the protection of human rights, second generation rights sadly remain non-justiciable as such, and third generation rights are totally absent from the Constitution.²⁴ Any future constitutional review must remedy this situation.²⁵

²³ Dyer 2000.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 The Constitution provides for the presumption of innocence in Art. 39(5) as follows:

Every person who is charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed to be innocent until he is proved or has pleaded guilty: Provided that nothing contained in or done under the authority of any law shall be held to be inconsistent with or in contravention of this sub-article to the extent that the law in question imposes upon any person charged as aforesaid the burden of proving particular facts.

This does not appear to have caused any difficulty for application of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) regime. The fact that Art. 39(5) has not been amended means that there has not been any articulation of a ‘compromise’ if any was considered necessary as a result of the introduction of the EAW.²⁶ It is arguable that Art. 34 of the Constitution, which protects the right to freedom from arbitrary arrest or detention, could have been amended in order to better allow textually for the operation of the EAW. Nevertheless, it does not seem to have caused any problems or raised any controversy in practice. According to the European Commission Report of 2011 on the first five years of the operation of the EAW, Malta has not had problems applying the EAW regime.²⁷ The grounds on which execution of an EAW has been refused relate to (a) ne bis in idem,²⁸ and (b) prescription.²⁹

²⁴ Aditus et al. 2014, para. 18.

²⁵ See The Today Public Policy Institute 2014, paras. 22–25 and 64.

²⁶ The EAW was introduced by the Extradition (Designated Foreign Countries) Order of 7th June, 2004 as amended, S.L. (Subsidiary Legislation) No. 276.05, under powers given by the Extradition Act 1982, Chapter 276 of the Laws of Malta. <http://www.justiceservices.gov.mt/DownloadDocument.aspx?app=lom&itemid=9718&l=1>.

²⁷ COM (2011) 175 final, Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on the Implementation since 2007 of the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European Arrest Warrant and the Surrender Procedures between Member States. See Sammut 2012, p. 460 at pp. 469–470, who states that ‘there are no specific problems involving Malta as (sic.) the AFSJ in criminal matters’.

²⁸ Article 39(9) of the Constitution and Art. 14 of S.L. 276.05.

²⁹ Filletti (undated).

2.3.1.2 The courts will not simply rubberstamp a request for extradition, but will ensure that the evidence produced is satisfactory.³⁰ There is no report of a request being reviewed on the ground of a claim of innocence by the person concerned.³¹

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena, sine lege

2.3.2.1 These principles are set out in Art. 39(8) of the Constitution, which provides that:

No person shall be held to be guilty of a criminal offence on account of any act or omission that did not, at the time it took place, constitute such an offence, and no penalty shall be imposed for any criminal offence which is severer in degree or description than the maximum penalty which might have been imposed for that offence at the time when it was committed.

In my opinion, these principles are given the same level of protection today, and will be a ground for refusing extradition in principle. The dual criminality principle is regulated by Art. 10 of the Extradition Act and Art. 18 of the Extradition Order (S.L. 276.05), and there has not been any real criticism on this score.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 Under Art. 39 of the Constitution every person charged with a criminal offence is entitled to be present and to make his defence during related judicial proceedings. These rights are recognised by Art. 15 of the Extradition Act with regard to committal proceedings. The Maltese courts have not had occasion to review the standard of protection in this context.

³⁰ See Art. 15, S.L. (Subsidiary Legislation) No. 276.05. For example see Police v. Andriy Petrovych Pashkov – Court of Criminal Appeal – 10/9/2009. Extradition Act (Chapter 276) – Evidence collected in the requesting country: Documents purporting to set evidence heard on oath in the requesting country are admissible as evidence in extradition proceedings, although the witnesses were not heard in the course of judicial proceedings. The Act does not require that the witnesses must have been heard by a judicial authority. Although witnesses are heard according to the applicable procedure in the requesting country, the evidence has to be confirmed on oath or by affirmation or declaration, and must be duly authenticated according to law. In this case the documents filed by the prosecution did not show or disclose that the declarations made by the various persons heard by the authorities in the requesting country had been confirmed on oath or by declaration or affirmation. The Court of Appeal held that in the absence of such oath, declaration or affirmation, the documents were not admissible as evidence for the purposes of the Extradition Act.

³¹ See Cremona 1997, p. 118 and Dyer 2000.

2.3.4 Fair Trial – Practical Challenges

2.3.4.1 All persons are entitled to legal assistance, legal aid and translation services.³² There is no particular NGO at the present time providing funding or assistance. I would support the creation of such a system as is proposed as an important counterweight to the disadvantages faced by persons facing criminal proceedings abroad, some of whom may well be innocent and in need of support and an informed liaison with the national authorities.

2.3.4.2 Based on the CEPS report mentioned in the Questionnaire regarding extraditions between 2005 and 2011, an attempt was made to identify cases through the study of media sources to ascertain the outcome of extraditions by reference to guilt or innocence as subsequently determined, with no result.

2.3.5 Effective Judicial Protection: Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 There has been no constitutional case lodged on the lines of the Estonian case or similar. Nor has there been real debate as to the compatibility of mutual recognition and the rule of law, although misgivings have been expressed in the criminal field to the effect that the automatic application of mutual recognition could lead to a possible breach of fundamental rights by individuals falling into the gap between two or more legal systems.³³

2.3.5.2 There has been no real debate on the suitability of the transposition of mutual recognition from internal market to criminal law. The author would agree with the view expressed by an academic colleague to the effect that '[c]riminal law must be based upon legal certainty and must be a condition (sic) of public trust. It must be based on the rule of law and for these reasons may not be equated with the economical (sic) field'.³⁴ Indeed, a balance needs to be struck around the concept of legal certainty according to real need, which raises the issue of proportionality.

2.3.5.3 Sammut has written that:

[A] further pivotal difference concerns the mode and effect of recognition. Mutual recognition in the internal market involves the recognition of regulatory controls and standards and is geared towards the national legislator and administrators. In the criminal field it involves the recognition and enforcement of court decisions by judges in order to primarily facilitate the free movement of enforcement rulings. While the principle of borderless Europe applies in both cases, one has to be more careful in the criminal field. So fundamental rights are an issue but there is more than that.³⁵

³² Article 11(1A) of the Extradition (Designated Foreign Countries) Order, S.L. 276.05.

³³ See for example, Sammut 2012, p. 470.

³⁴ Ibid.

2.3.5.4 There have been no such calls in the sense of public statements on the desirability of the introduction of a proportionality test or for the (re-)introduction of some measure of judicial review. However, the concern expressed in some Member States is perfectly understandable on such points as the provision or otherwise of sufficient evidence of a case to answer, or whether an offence is sufficiently serious, or whether there is a sufficient link between the offence and the country to which the individual is to be extradited. In the author's view, there would need to be a fair balance in the standard of review set and possibly a maximum harmonisation approach taken. The German Government's call for a possible 'revision' of the rule of law in the EAW case is of interest, in my view, for the reason that it might lead, if not to a review of 'the concept of the rule of law', then at least to a restatement of an acceptable form of the common constitutional tradition of essential procedural safeguards in an extradition context, to be observed by all Member States. Equally, it is possible that best practice can indicate, with benefit to all interests involved, the re-instatement along standard lines of judicial review in civil and commercial matters.

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

A tangential aspect that has arisen and that straddles the 'national' and 'European' occurs in the i-gaming field, and may occur in other areas in the future. Some Member States are seeking to have their criminal law provisions, allied to a national requirement for the licensing of certain economic activity (for example, the provision of betting services), acquire automatic recognition and enforcement in other Member States and by EU law itself. This is even without formal harmonisation of criminal law at EU level, and sometimes via such methods as the promotion of Council of Europe Conventions on administrative, police and judicial co-operation.³⁶ This prospectively raises acute issues not only for human rights or fundamental freedoms, but fundamentally for the interplay between constitutionally and Treaty-granted and protected economic rights on the one hand, and the limits of national sovereignty in criminal law on the other hand.

³⁵ Ibid.

³⁶ Mizzi, D. (2014, July 11). Malta seeks European Court ruling over sport betting convention. Malta Today. http://www.maltatoday.com.mt/news/national/41098/malta_seeks_european_court_ruling_over_sport_betting_convention#.VLZAZnt4FIY.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 Directive 2006/24³⁷ was implemented by Legal Notice No. 198 of 2008, which amended Subsidiary Legislation (hereinafter S.L.) 440.01³⁸ – the Processing of Personal Data (Electronic Communications Sector) Regulations of 2003. In connection with these same Regulations, the Court of Appeal has held that any limitation on a human right (in this case the right to privacy) as protected by the Constitution, the European Convention Act of 1987 and the ECHR is to be interpreted restrictively and applied in strict accordance with the law.³⁹ Apart from the disproportionate burden on the service provider if a police or security services request made under an exception is too widely drawn (as was found in this case), the human rights aspect was vital. The request in the particular case was such as to cover a wide area and potentially a very large group of persons, almost all of whom would be totally unconnected with any alleged offence (arson attacks). The Court noted the dangers of the wholesale placing of large groups of persons under suspicion, and the disclosure of data related to them without their knowledge, referring even to the road to totalitarianism and shades of a police state.⁴⁰ Nor was such a strategy the only reasonable option for the police. The judgment therefore applies a form of reasonableness or proportionality to the facts. The case was decided before the implementation of the EU Directive, but is of interest in that it decided issues similar to the ones that featured in the annulment of the Directive.

Apart from being evidence of the application by the Maltese courts of a proportionality principle as a general principle of Maltese law and EU law when interpreting and applying Maltese law implementing EU law, the case also shows that the Maltese courts would be likely to regard a blanket rule on retention as a violation of the constitutional rights to privacy and integrity of the home and property under Art. 38 of the Constitution, and to freedom of expression, including the right to receive information and ideas, to communicate ideas and information without interference, as well as to freedom from interference with correspondence

³⁷ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

³⁸ http://www.idpc.gov.mt/dbfile.aspx%5CSL440_01.pdf.

³⁹ Mobisile Communications Ltd. v. Kummissarju Ghall-Protezzjoni Tad-Data, Court of Appeal (Inferior Jurisdiction), Ref. No. 15/2006 decided on 3 October 2007.

⁴⁰ In the Court's words: 'Muxx langas tollerat illi l-utenti kollha, indiskriminatament, jitqegħdu taht suspect biex a xelta tagħha, il-Pulizija tkun tista' tgharbilhom bil-process ta' eliminazzjoni. Jekk dan jithallha jsir ikun qed javvicina l-qaghda għal dak ta' stat polizjesk jew totalitarju li man-nozzjoni ta' socjeta` demokratika u libera, kif na fuha, ma għandu xejn x' jaqsam.' (at p. 28 of the relevant judgment). Translation by the author: 'Nor is it allowable for all users, indiscriminately, to be placed under suspicion with the Police then exercising discretion as to whom among them to eliminate from the investigation. That would be to approach the modus operandi of a police or totalitarian state, and one that is far removed from what is acceptable in a free and democratic society as we know it.'

under Art. 41 of the Constitution. Police and security service powers are hedged around with strict controls and the need for high-level authorisation, and then apply only in the case of serious crimes or threats to public security. Data cannot be held for longer than is necessary, nor used for any purposes outside those stipulated by law, and communication and transfer are strictly controlled.

There have been no specific cases on the law implementing Directive 2006/24 as such, but the above is indicative. The Maltese courts would apply general principles to ensure a balance between powers and rights, as demonstrated by the Mobisle Communications Ltd. case above. The relevant provisions of the Constitution, however, do not reflect the digital age nor the essence of the core right to privacy of information in such an age. They are sorely in need of revision since as they stand, it is arguable that they themselves do not protect core rights as recognised by other applicable human rights documents, including the ECHR and the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights (Charter). A person is therefore more likely to turn to these latter documents, and the European Convention Act 1987 (Art. 32), when appropriate, in order to rely on a right to privacy that will then be circumscribed by the relevant EU-led legislation as well as by ‘what can be shown to be reasonably justifiable in a democratic society’ according to the terms of the Constitution.⁴¹ Article 32 of the Constitution states that ‘every person in Malta is entitled to the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual, that is to say, the right, ... but subject to respect for the rights and freedoms of others and for the public interest, to ... respect for his private and family life’. However, Art. 32 is not legally enforceable.⁴² It is only possible to sue in the Maltese courts on grounds of ‘private and family life’ under Art. 8 of the European Convention Act 1987 (ECA 1987) and not under Art. 32 of the Constitution itself. Unusually for an ordinary piece of legislation, the ECA 1987 is enforceable through the competent courts.⁴³ It can, however, be repealed via a simple majority vote in Parliament. Thus, the protection afforded by the ECA 1987 is not considered to be on par with the provisions in Chap. IV (Arts. 33–45) of the Constitution which are entrenched⁴⁴ and require a two-thirds majority in Parliament to be amended.

Maltese law, as amended by the implementing law, has not been amended since the annulment of the Directive in April 2014. There is no official indication as to what action will be taken if any; however an inter-ministerial committee has been set up with a view to evaluating the situation and recommending an appropriate response.

⁴¹ The principal ‘let-through’ phrase found in both Arts. 38 and 41 of the Constitution.

⁴² See Art. 46. Article 32 is the only Article in Chapter IV of the Constitution entitled ‘Fundamental Rights and Freedoms of the Individual’ which is not enforceable before a court of law.

⁴³ Generally, see Conference of European Constitutional Courts, XIIth Congress.

⁴⁴ By virtue of Art. 66 of the Constitution.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 There has been no constitutional case on this. Certainly, it has been seen that there can be a strong political backlash if Parliament feels that it is not being kept sufficiently informed of administrative action. As things stand, Art. 72 of the Constitution requires all laws, of whatever nature, to be published in order to have effect. Therefore the concept of ‘secret legislation’ is a contradiction in terms. It is in this light that I would expect the Maltese Constitutional Court to react negatively to any call to apply the Heinrich judgment, as going a step too far.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 Although Malta had similar problems as other Member States regarding sugar stocks upon EU membership,⁴⁵ the stocks were lower than in the Central and Eastern European states (leading to a 1 million EUR fine in the case of Malta), and the Maltese courts have not been called upon to consider the issue or the general principles of law mooted here.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 The constitutionality of the European Stability Mechanism (ESM) was not overtly the primary issue for the Maltese Parliament. However, constitutional questions were especially at the root of interventions in Parliament made by former Prime Minister Alfred Sant.⁴⁶ These included accountability to Parliament for use made of the European Financial Stability Facility, with the ratification treaty including a new clause that Malta’s representatives on the ESM Boards of Governors and Directors were to report annually to the House Public Accounts Committee. Otherwise, the Government of the day argued that ratifying the ESM was in the national interest as it offered a better financial alternative, with a surer cap on Malta's exposure (of some 160 million EUR)⁴⁷ than the alternatives employed or which might be employed. The financial calculations appeared to dominate the parliamentary debate, but with underlying considerations of viability and control playing their part. There was no debate about the irreversibility or unconditionality of the commitment, as the issue was treated mainly as an issue of manageability.

⁴⁵ Grech, H. and Camilleri, I. (2005, April 10). Malta Risks Paying Millions in EU Fine over Sugar Hoarding. Sunday Times of Malta. <http://www.timesofmalta.com/articles/view/20050410/local/malta-risks-paying-millions-in-eu-fine-over-sugar-hoarding.93850>. See also: Camilleri, I. (2006, November 14). EU Fines Malta Nearly 1 Million Euros. Times of Malta. <http://www.timesofmalta.com/articles/view/20061114/local/eu-fines-malta-nearly-euro-1m.35396>.

⁴⁶ (2012, July 7). EU Financial Treaty Ratified. The Times of Malta. See also: Dalli, M. (2012, June 19). Malta supports ESM bailout for Spain. Malta Today. <http://www.maltatoday.com.mt/news/national/18986/malta-supports-esm-bailout-for-spain-20120619#.VBA9uGN7SQc>.

2.7.2 General discussion about the constitutionality of other proposed measures has taken place internally in the financial institutions, the financial press and some conferences.⁴⁸ Amending the Constitution to allow for the Fiscal Compact's 'golden rule' required some debate,⁴⁹ but in the end the consensus not to act by amendment of the Constitution prevailed.⁵⁰

2.7.3 Malta has not been subject to a bailout/austerity programme. The author's view is that many in Malta would share much of the reasoning of the Constitutional Court of Portugal. It is worth recalling that the social progress of all nations is a fundamental principle and policy objective of the Constitution of Malta.⁵¹

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 With regard to indirect judicial review via preliminary references, the answer is that there has been one case where a question was raised as to the validity of Regulation 530/2008 and of Art. 7(2) of Regulation 2371/2002. The Court of Justice found Regulation 530/2008 to be partially invalid.⁵²

2.8.2 The author shares the view that the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) has demonstrated a propensity in the past to apply a liberal standard of review to EU measures. The national standard on the other hand requires a searching enquiry into the matter on the basis of general principles of law. Certainly, any review of an allegation of a breach of fundamental rights will apply a

⁴⁷ For the Budget for 2015, the totals of Government revenue and expenditure are projected at around 3.5 billion euros and 3.7 billion EUR, respectively. See for example, <http://www.act.com.mt/articles-publications/Budget-Measures-Implementation-2015.php>.

⁴⁸ See for example, Central Bank of Malta 2013.

⁴⁹ Camilleri, I. (2012, March 3). No Decision yet on Constitutional Change. Times of Malta. <http://www.timesofmalta.com/articles/view/20120303/local/No-decision-yet-on-the-constitutional-change.409377>.

⁵⁰ For a full run-down of the Fiscal Compact ratification and related arguments in Malta, see European University Institute 2013.

⁵¹ Article 1(3), Constitution of Malta.

⁵² Case C-221/09 AJD Tuna [2011] ECLI:EU:C:2011:153.

strict standard of compliance, and it may be that the latest Kadi judgment,⁵³ among some others, will bring the CJEU closer to the national ‘norm’. Importantly, it seems to indicate the possible emergence of a ‘new constitutionalism’ in the EU legal order, with human rights occupying a (more) central place in EU legal order discourse. At the same time, as has been noted by some, this seems to imply a (welcome) shift in focus from the market integration imperative to a broader constitutional, political and social underpinning for the rule of law in the EU legal order.

2.8.3 The Constitutional Court has exercised the power under Art. 6 of the Constitution to uphold the supremacy of the Constitution, including its human rights provisions, relatively vigorously.⁵⁴ Yet it has been criticised for its stance that even where the European Court of Human Rights has ruled against the government in regard to the application of a law found to be in breach of human rights, the Constitutional Court considers itself unable to affect the (legislative) position for the future by declaring the legislative act in question ‘null’, which would apparently be seen as ‘abrogating’ the Act and as something that only Parliament is empowered to do.⁵⁵ Of course, the Constitutional Court will declare anti-constitutional laws and acts to be ‘to the extent of the inconsistency, void’, in accordance with Art. 6 of the Constitution.⁵⁶ All apparently turns on a claimed distinction between the meaning and effect of the terms ‘null’ (not used in the Constitutional provision) and ‘void’ (the term actually used). It is considered by the Constitutional Court to be a matter for Parliament to repeal the offending legislation. This could well be a vestige of the British constitutional influence, and may on this score provide a unique source of contrast with the position generally held in continental constitutional law.

2.8.4 There is no Constitutional Court ruling on the review of measures that implement EU legislation. The view of the author is that the Maltese Court would review the Maltese legislation/measures first and foremost under the Constitution, while interpreting the relevant EU legislation sought to be implemented according to EU norms, including the general principle of protection of human rights and the Charter of Fundamental Rights, but would carry out the review primarily in the

⁵³ Joined cases C-584/10 P, C-593/10 P and C-595/10 P Commission and Others v. Kadi [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:518.

⁵⁴ See generally, Mifsud Bonnici 2004. See also Zammit 2008.

⁵⁵ See the controversy between Dr. Giovanni Bonello, former judge at the European Court of Human Rights, and Chief Justice Dr. Silvio Camilleri, with excerpts available at: Chief Justice Clarifies Position, The Judiciary 2013. <http://www.judiciarymalta.gov.mt/newsdetails?id=86> and <http://www.judiciarymalta.gov.mt/home?l=1>. See also the comment by former Chief Justice and Judge at the European Court of Human Rights, Dr. Giuseppe Mifsud Bonnici in Bencini, A. (2013, May 26) Constitutional supremacy is self-evident. Times of Malta. <http://www.timesofmalta.com/articles/view/20130526/opinion/Constitutional-supremacy-is-self-evident>.

⁵⁶ 471246. See also The Today Public Policy Institute 2014, para. 79, where The Today Public Policy Institute observes that the Executive and the Legislature have ‘in effect usurped’ the power of the Constitutional Court to determine the validity or otherwise of laws under the Constitution.

⁵⁶ See Degaetano 2008.

context of the Constitution and of the European Convention Act of 1987. In my opinion, it would be theoretically (and very hypothetically) open to an applicant to argue that the Court should apply a higher standard than was being argued was the EU standard of protection, but he would need to do so by reference to a clear opposing prescription in the Constitution.

2.8.5 It is not suggested that the standard of review in Europe is considered to be necessarily lower than it is in Malta. The Maltese courts will, in practice, review measures implementing EU law for alleged breach of human rights. Also, I opine that the Maltese courts are likely to presume equivalence of protection, but will apply any higher standard as mandated by EU law and the Constitution itself. It is unclear what the courts would do if a lower standard of protection were indicated by EU law. This is hypothetical, as the European Convention provides a minimum standard in both spheres, and it has not been the subject of a statement by the Constitutional Court. Arguably, however, the Court would be obliged under the Constitution to apply the higher national standard according to the Constitution and the European Convention Act of 1987, and certainly up to the minimum standard of the ECHR.⁵⁷

2.8.6 The broad issue of differential treatment has not been raised. In the author's view, it is highly unlikely that different standards would be applied in the absence of objective justification in a democratic society (if such were possible). The domestic protection would operate as the minimum standard at all events, as the human rights provisions apply to all persons present in Malta.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 There has indeed been an increase in, and possibly also a shift to, the use of ministerial power, through subsidiary legislation, for the implementation of EU directives.⁵⁸ The result is one of less transparency, as well as less awareness, for all involved in the legislative process and afterwards. It may also be that in some areas the resulting complex of legislation in a particular area lacks cohesiveness or even coherence. To this may be allied the issue of 'copy/pasting' directives into national law. Again there are implications here for the democratic process, and ultimately the perception of EU legitimacy.

Another issue may be the apparent willingness of the CJEU to defer the application of the principle of proportionality to national laws which come up for scrutiny as possibly infringing this principle of EU law, as well as fundamental Treaty law, to the national courts. The gaming sector is an example. The argument runs that if the rule of law means the uniform application in practice of fundamental treaty rights in all Member States, then to leave the ultimate determination of the proportionality of national measures which allegedly unjustifiably restrict the exercise of those rights to the national courts could militate seriously against the proper and uniform application of EU law, to the detriment of individuals seeking to exercise their rights under EU law.

⁵⁷ See further Azzopardi 2012.

⁵⁸ There are no specific criteria in Maltese constitutional law for what has to be enacted as parliamentary statutes, except for the incorporation of certain treaties where an Act of Parliament is required.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 Certainly, the rights and principles mentioned in the questionnaire, such as nulla poena sine lege and the right to judicial protection, could be among the candidates for principles that form part of the ‘common constitutional traditions’. It might also secure broader agreement for permitting a move away from Art. 53 of the Charter if a new Convention were held in order to debate values in Europe, with a view to identifying common values (whether traditional or not), possibly on the basis of a report to be prepared by a team of experts. However, it is not clear that moving away from Art. 53 would be a good thing. Professor J. H. H. Weiler has famously argued⁵⁹ for the retention of national legal systems as autonomous national laboratories of human rights, involving a bottom-up approach to the evolution of human rights. It is also for the Fundamental Rights Agency to monitor developments in the Member States with a view to identifying such commonalities.

2.10.2 The suggestion that courts making a reference might give more information to the Court of Justice as to the issues of national law – including constitutional law and the values that are thereby upheld – probably already exists as part of the exhortation for loyal co-operation between courts envisaged in the preliminary ruling procedure, at least in theory. This could be built upon if the national courts could be permitted to not ‘settle’ difficult questions of national law before making the reference (as the CJEU has requested in the past) but to submit the issue in the round, while of course limiting the formal questions to questions of EU law. Consensus issues such as the rule of law and so on – especially the principles underlying the rights – could with benefit from the subject of another democratic Convention (say on the Application in Practice of the Charter and the European Convention), an exercise which may or may not lead to treaty revision, but should lead to consensus or better mutual understanding.

⁵⁹ Weiler 1999.

2.11 Article 53 of the EU Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 This is a difficult question for the EU, going forward. On one view, Art. 53 was part of the ‘deal’ in accepting the Charter as a legally-binding and enforceable document. It is part of the constitutional compact, based on a particular analysis of Member State systems and concepts of Union and citizenship (national and Union). Altering it would be seen as a fundamental Treaty change. The balance (resolution of conflict) between rights in a society, as long as a minimum standard is observed for each right, is a matter of national values and culture. It may also be related in some cases to ‘national identity’, arguably as protected by the national constitution. A full case (straddling law, society, culture, family, international relations, politics and so on) would need to be made for abandoning the national dimension of human rights (societal) development, which on the whole has tended towards a heightening of protection of rights, in favour of what can otherwise lead to a Europe-wide – indeed Union-led – search for, and commitment to, the lowest common denominator also in a cultural and values sense. One might also ask what role would be left for the national legislator and the national judge. There has been little discussion of these issues in Malta. In general, most are content that the standard of the ECHR, allied to the Charter, would likely apply.⁶⁰ However, in the parliamentary debates leading up to the adoption of Act XIV of 1987 (the European Convention Act), it was emphasised that the European Convention standard would apply where the Convention gave greater protection, and that the principle should always be that the human rights provisions with the more extensive ‘definition’ should prevail. Also, it is realised that the EU legal order may take protection beyond the European Convention standard, and that this could lead to another layer of conflict as to the ‘right’ balance of rights. In short, clearer thinking is needed on the relationship between rights and values.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 There was no public debate in Malta on constitutional rights at the time of implementation of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision⁶¹ or adoption of the EU Data Retention Directive.

2.12.2 There have not been any occasions from which conclusions can be drawn in this regard, as there has never been constitutional controversy over the implementation of any EU law. In my opinion, the same scenario as occurred in Sweden and Germany could arise in Malta, but it is more likely that the issue would be flagged at an early stage and a solution of some kind would be found before the stage of implementation, especially on the issue of full debate.

⁶⁰ See Cremona 1997, p. 84.

⁶¹ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

2.12.3 I would prefer the emphasis to be on a system whereby such issues were flagged in advance of adoption, indeed ex ante at the time of the proposal of EU legislation, possibly on the model of the subsidiarity control, with the possibility of an ex post challenge before the Court of Justice if an allegation of breach of general principles or a challenge on other valid grounds could be made. However, as to the grounds for challenge, it is a question for discussion and study whether any challenge would be adequately governed by Art. 263 TFEU, including by reference to the principles set out in Art. 4(2) TEU and Arts. 52 and 53 of the Charter. The matter could perhaps be raised by a number of constitutional courts and/or parliaments.

Therefore, in other words, I think that ‘EU un/constitutionality’ under the Treaties (I believe we can use this language since Lisbon at least) lends itself to an ex ante control as stated above. Indeed I would go further. In my view the ex ante control mechanism applied in the case of subsidiarity should be extended to all ‘constitutional’ issues, therefore including the principle of proportionality and, generally, all general principles of Union law (many of which, after all, are ‘derived’ from the common constitutional traditions of the Member States). This would allow proposals which are perceived to be problematic also from the national constitutional perspective to be flagged at an early stage, and would pre-empt both ex post challenges and outright ‘rebellions’ via national court proceedings that would otherwise result purely from the failure to address the EU-level constitutional arguments in their proper political forum at the earliest possible stage. The wider applicability of the yellow card procedure would allow for – indeed secure – proper and timely (early) consideration by the Commission of all constitutional implications and minimise the risk of any failure to consider and ‘accommodate’ (as and if necessary) national concerns about the proposed exercise of Union power as judged against the overriding norms of EU law. It would give national parliaments a mechanism for raising issues of national constitutional concern about the proper exercise of Union power according to EU norms at that early stage. It would be an exercise in solidarity and fit perfectly with the multi-level constitutional approach. It would then become far more likely that any domestic control would be focused on the domestic constitutionality or otherwise on the domestic implementing measure, treated as a separate issue from the EU constitutionality of the EU measure under the Treaty. Otherwise, of course, there could be ex post control before the Court of Justice, with the possible finding that an EU norm contradicts EU constitutional principles. But the rather damaging scenario of the Court of Justice having to annul an adopted measure because (or at least so it would damagingly appear from the perspective of synchrony between the EU constitutional safeguards and Member States’ constitutions), of a national Constitutional Court objection would be much diminished. Moreover, fuller and more open democratic constitutional debate would be the result, with all the benefits of real multi-level constitutional dialogue.

2.13 The Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 I have some concern about the apparent reluctance/incapacity of the Court of Justice to engage (possibly due to the absence of fuller Treaty powers) in an in-depth review of EU law and of national implementing law by fully applying the constitutional principles applicable, including the principle of subsidiarity, the principle of proportionality (including to national measures adopted to implement EU law) and settling human rights ‘values issues’, from an EU legal order perspective, thus omitting to give, in many cases where such clarity is warranted, a clear indication to the Member States that EU law is considered valid and applicable/inapplicable in certain ways. In exercising this jurisdiction, the Court of Justice would be guided by the (possibly revised) principles referred to in Sect. 2.12.3 above.

2.13.2 Exceptions have on the whole been made due to necessity and as proportionate, as in the case overall of the European Arrest Warrant. Nevertheless, the system may be permitting a lowering of standards in the European context, and permitting Member States to deny certain Treaty rights without fullest accountability. In my view, the ex ante and ex post controls in place against possible excesses can be improved, even from an ‘efficiency in integration’ perspective, for doubts and differences in Member States need to be ironed out before the stage of implementation if EU law is to be applied uniformly throughout the Union at the point when this is supposed to happen. At that stage it should be clear that the EU measure is legitimate, both because it is consonant with EU constitutionality and fully respectful of essential national constitutionality. Any shortcomings have probably been due to inadequate awareness, itself possibly due to the Union decision-making structures not being fully geared to the constitutional dialogue needed between the Union institutions and the Member States, and also due to some deficiency in the rules to be applied in such debate, i.e. the constitutional metarules – such as the reach of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality (including the ability to raise a reasoned objection on the basis of the latter principle as part of the ex ante monitoring of EU proposals in national parliaments).

In my view, as long as the system ensures that subsidiarity and proportionality are applied at all levels, and access to a court in order to test their application is guaranteed, then the Court of Justice must be permitted to review Union acts and also national implementing acts for conformity with such acts. An EU Constitutional Court, as has been advocated by some over the years, might be the best candidate for such a role. At this point it then becomes important for the European Convention regime to operate with effectiveness upon the EU legal order, including upon the judgments of the Court of Justice, without unquestioned and irrebuttable presumptions as to equivalence of protection or compliance, but with application of a review function over the prior control by the Court of Justice over the exercise of any margin of appreciation. The ECHR's minimum floor of protection would operate as such, preventing action from swinging beyond the extreme on any one side of a conflict of rights (values) issue. There would end the role of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg (ECtHR). Otherwise, it would be for the Court of Justice (or a Union Constitutional Court) to determine whether an EU law was or was not respectful of EU constitutional law in all its aspects – including respect for common constitutional traditions and the essence of each Member State constitution.

2.13.3 No constitutional issues have been raised by the Maltese courts in a preliminary ruling request. However, as a matter of personal opinion following on from previous replies, the responsiveness of the CJEU will take the form of a revised role for the CJEU – or for a Union Constitutional Court if one were created. The Court would have a defined constitutional jurisdiction modelled on the very multi-level or horizontal (as I prefer) constitutionalism of the Union. Due deference would need to be paid to the essence of each national constitution, and to national identity as protected therein, while the principles of constitutional validity would be fully and better articulated and enforced at each ‘level’ (in each sphere). Comparative law techniques would serve as the basis for identifying and interpreting rights as part of the common constitutional traditions of the Member States. Similar rules would apply for establishing common values, which could also be articulated in the Treaty. Besides a strict review of EU measures, I would also favour dialogue about diversity, possible convergence through dialogue and then a degree of EU-level judicial review of national implementing measures for their observance or failure to observe the limits of the permitted exceptions to the exercise of Treaty rights and respect for recognised human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Treaty and the Charter oblige Member States to observe the Charter in implementing EU law. The EU Court must exercise full competence in this matter, including as to the limits on any margin of discretion permitted a Member State, while taking due account of such essential constitutional ‘essence’ as may be asserted.

2.13.4 In my view it would be legitimate to ask national institutions to be more pro-active in upholding the rule of law at Union level by ensuring a proper mesh with the national level. This could be done through proper implementation by the legislature or proper guidance by the national constitutional court, which could perhaps be given an advisory jurisdiction in such matters,⁶² without encroaching on parliamentary privileges such as the latter's role in monitoring the principle of subsidiarity and, I would add, proportionality, which is also properly seen as a constitutional principle. The national constitution should make as clear as possible what is within its essence (within the meaning of Art. 4(2) TEU) even if this means a new constitutional exercise at national level, possibly on the basis of a template to be prepared by the drafters of this Treaty provision.⁶³ It is important that reference also be made to the other key constitutional value of the Union, namely solidarity, to emphasise the obligation to safeguard human and fundamental rights but above all the dignity of the person in all circumstances of Union action in each Member State. In this way the human dignity of the citizen will be placed first and foremost in the EU constitutional schema that consists both of the Treaty and national constitutions in the context of human and fundamental rights protection. True two-way loyalty, solidarity and goodwill in a properly synchronised constitutional space in the Union, offering respect for national identity and essential constitutional provision in each Member State, arguably require a fuller monitoring mechanism than only in relation to the principle of subsidiarity and only in virtue of a rather large number of objections. As far as respect for Art. 4 TEU is concerned, an ex ante objection procedure, and an ex post judicial review by the Court of Justice in dialogue with the national constitutional court, might be contemplated. The author believes that the opportunity should be taken as it arises to refine and develop Art. 4 (2) TEU, possibly by identifying the essential values constitutive of national identity (possibly on a 'compatibility with common traditions' test) and as highlighted in apposite national constitutional provisions.

⁶² I envisage a kind of ex ante advisory constitutional jurisdiction, where the court indicates how in abstracto it would tend to view a certain issue from the constitutional perspective. This is different from the situation that exists in Malta, where the Constitutional Court has no advisory jurisdiction. It simply sees itself as having no competence to declare laws invalid, and it is of no effect if the ECtHR has declared them to be in breach of the Convention and therefore of the European Convention Act of Malta. This reduces the judgments of the ECtHR to mere ‘advisory’

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 As to transfer of powers, reference has been made above to the 'EU amendment' made to Art. 65 of the Constitution on the exercise by Parliament of its legislative power. Not framed expressly as a transfer of power clause, but rather as an enabling and delimiting (limitation) clause that focuses on the exercise – by objective or purpose – of legislative power by the Parliament of Malta, the clause does not in express terms 'permit' but rather appears to 'recognise' the (therefore, presumably, inherent) capacity of the Maltese Parliament to transfer legislative opinions, except in the case of the solution proposed here, where the judgment of the Constitutional Court would be applied.

⁶³ Art. 4(2) TEU could be further developed from a synchrony, and mutual respect and loyalty, perspective.

power pro tempore and pro tanto to the EU institutions or any international organisation or other entity by assuming international obligations which have that effect.

There is a general listing of particular objectives and of specific values and principles to be upheld when participating in international co-operation, such as might condition, and delimit the scope for, the exercise of this power. The power under Art. 65 must be exercised ‘for the peace, order and good government of Malta’ and ‘in conformity with full respect for human rights, generally accepted principles of international law and Malta’s international and regional obligations in particular those assumed by the treaty of accession to the European Union signed in Athens on the 16th April, 2003 [emphasis added]’. The words in italics indicate by reference that the objectives must be in conformity with the principles of international law and Malta’s obligations under the Treaty of Accession to the EU. The provision therefore enshrines a loyalty obligation to the international rule of law and to the objectives and values that Malta shares as a member of the international community governed by international law and as a Member State of the European Union.

Additionally, Art. 1(3) of the Constitution declares that ‘Malta is a neutral state actively pursuing peace, security and social progress among all nations by adhering to a policy of non-alignment and refusing to participate in any military alliance ...’ (see further in Sect. 3.1.3).

By Art. 3(1) of the Ratification of Treaties Act, Act V of 1983,⁶⁴ where a treaty is one which affects or concerns (a) the status of Malta under international law or the maintenance or support of such status, or (b) the security of Malta, its sovereignty, independence, unity or territorial integrity, or (c) the relationship of Malta with any multinational organisation, agency, association or similar body, such treaty shall not enter into force with respect to Malta unless it has been ratified or its ratification has been authorised or approved in accordance with the provisions of the Act. The Act then provides in Art. 3(2) that in the case of (a) or (b) above, or where the treaty contains a provision which is to become, or be enforceable as, part of the laws of Malta, the ratification or the authorisation or approval of the ratification shall be by Act of Parliament. Article 3(3) expressly provides that no treaty shall become, or be enforceable as, part of the law of Malta except by or under an Act of Parliament. Here then, we have a strong form of dualism as far as concerns treaties falling within the scope of Art. 3(1). On the other hand, as to treaties that do not fall within the scope of Art. 3(1), Art. 5 provides that the Government’s powers are not similarly constrained. Authorisation to ratify the Treaty of Accession of 16 April 2003 was given to the Government by Art. 6 of the European Union Act 2003.

There are no provisions in the Constitution specific to any international organisations or institutions other than the EU via reference to the Treaty of Accession of 2003.

⁶⁴ <http://justiceservices.gov.mt/LOM.aspx?pageid=27&mode=chrono&gotoid=304>.

3.1.2 Article 65 was amended by Art. 7 of the European Union Act 2003 to include express reference to the ability of Parliament to legislate ‘in conformity with’ the obligations assumed by membership of the Union.⁶⁵ It does not use the language of power to transfer or delegate powers. The wording appears to effect a ‘clarification’ of the ‘breadth’ of the Maltese Parliament’s powers, which are assumed to include the power of transfer or delegation to organisations such as the EU. This would tally with the minimalist logic of a ‘nation-oriented’ or ‘domestic-centred’ constitution that sees and presents things from a domestic perspective (the powers of Parliament and their extent, rather than expressly conferring a transfer of power competence which would allow it to be said that a transfer had taken place) even if international obligations are undertaken that will at least pro tempore radically alter the legislative dynamic and bring into play a multilevel system of governance and constitutionalism. I believe this was partly a matter of constitutional culture, and perhaps partly a matter of deliberate political judgment as to what was acceptable to the people in 1993, as well as practicable (including acceptable to the opposition) in terms of constitutional amendment in order to ‘accommodate’ the idea of EU membership, as well as partly the fact that the future of Europe debate was still in train and academic rationalisations about European constitutionalism were in their youth, if not infancy. The language is the neutral language of stating that Parliament may legislate in order to transpose/transform a treaty (and obligations thereby assumed) into Maltese law – the classic dualist approach to international treaty law – without really addressing the fundamental constitutional issue of transfer of powers head on. In other words, the relative obligations are regarded as ‘assumed’ already by the treaty of accession, but made binding in Malta by virtue of the European Union Act passed in accordance with the parameters set out in Art. 65. Again, it seems that all drafting was done by the Advocate General’s office.

3.1.3 The courts, the Government or Parliament have not sought to re-open the question considered in the previous paragraph. On the other hand, it is different with regard to Malta’s neutrality, which might be seen as an obstacle to full international co-operation whether at EU or even global level. Malta’s neutrality was introduced, defined and enshrined in the Constitution in 1974, with amendment in 1987, in Art. 1(3) of the Constitution which reads:

Malta is a neutral state actively pursuing peace, security and social progress among all nations by adhering to a policy of non-alignment and refusing to participate in any military alliance. Such a status will, in particular, imply that: (a) no foreign military base will be permitted on Maltese territory; (b) no military facilities in Malta will be allowed to be used by any foreign forces except at the request of the Government of Malta, and only in the following cases: (i) in the exercise of the inherent right of self-defence in the event of any armed violation of the area over which the Republic of Malta has sovereignty, or in pursuance of measures or actions decided by the Security Council of the United Nations; or (ii) whenever there exists a threat to the sovereignty, independence, neutrality, unity or territorial integrity of the Republic of Malta; (c) except as aforesaid, no other facilities in Malta will be allowed to be used in such manner or extent as will amount to the presence in Malta of a concentration of foreign forces; (d) except as aforesaid, no foreign military personnel will be allowed on Maltese territory, other than military personnel performing, or assisting in the performance of, civil works or activities, and other than a reasonable number of military technical personnel assisting in the defence of the Republic of Malta; (e) the shipyards of the Republic of Malta will be used for civil commercial purposes, but may also be used, within reasonable limits of time and quantity, for the repair of military vessels which have been put in a state of non-combat or for the construction of vessels; and in accordance with the principles of non-alignment the said shipyards will be denied to the military vessels of the two superpowers [emphasis added].

⁶⁵ Art. 65 of the Constitution reads: ‘65. (1) Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, Parliament may make laws for the peace, order and good government of Malta in conformity with full respect for human rights, generally accepted principles of international law and Malta’s international and regional obligations in particular those assumed by the treaty of accession to the European Union signed in Athens on the 16th April, 2003.’

As I have written elsewhere,⁶⁶ it is arguable that the second clause of paragraph (e), in particular, may be regarded as redundant in light of the ending of the Cold War (at least the first one, for we may be on the threshold of the second). It has also been argued that the entire provision centres around a policy of ‘non-alignment’ (as between ‘the superpowers’ – which may now be more than the ‘old’ two, at least in prospect), rather than strict neutrality, and that non-alignment is not a fixed concept in international law but must bear reference also to the climate of the time when the provision was adopted. This type of reasoning calls much into question, also in light of the evolution of the role and competence of the Union in the sphere of Foreign and Security Policy. One recalls the duty of loyalty under the Treaty but also the objectives of the Union especially post-Lisbon. Indeed, the provision speaks of an ‘active’ neutrality, one that is intended to actually permit Malta to be pro-active in the pursuit of peace, security and social progress among all nations. This does not indicate a passive stance. While participation in a military alliance is excluded (Malta was told in the course of membership negotiations that the EU was not such and was not to become such), the ban on the use of Maltese facilities by foreign military forces is open to a number of exceptions, one of which is the pursuance of measures or actions decided by the Security Council of the United Nations. This all shows that the matter is not clear cut, and that some think that an attempt at ‘clarification’ of Malta’s international active neutrality status should be made in any constitutional review exercise that may be undertaken if this status is to be generally understandable within the context of our membership of the EU and within the new global context. Therefore, the neutrality clause is one clause that has been identified as being in need of review/revision in light of developments relating to Malta’s EU role and to changes on the international scene.

3.1.4 The declared constitutional commitment of Malta to the social progress of all peoples will be commented upon in response to question 3.5. Suffice to point out here that Art. 1(3) commits Malta to actively pursue some global desiderata. Malta's neutrality was seen as a means to that end. The commitment is to actively use our status as a non-aligned independent state with a wide range of commercial, cultural and philosophical ties as well as proximity to the two main sides of the Mediterranean putting us on the frontier with the Arab world and Africa, and placing us at the centre of all Mediterranean states, and to do so for peace, prosperity and justice. Malta's foreign policy has rested on these pillars ever since. It might be termed Malta's international vocation, as enshrined in its Constitution. Any revision of the Constitution can be expected to build upon the perceived international vocation of Malta going forward into the future. I therefore certainly do not exclude the possibility of developing this clause into one mandating a more general pro-active and active approach to upholding democracy, the rule of law and human rights in the context of global governance, while placing this also in the context of EU membership.

⁶⁶ See Xuereb 2001, 2006. See also EC Directorate, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Department of Information Report, 1990, pp. 153–154.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 As emerges clearly from Art. 65 of the Constitution, and Art. 3 of the Ratification of Treaties Act of 1983 as amended, Malta is in principle a dualist state. Although there has been no real debate on this in Malta, Malta is aware of the fact that some other Member States adopt a monist stance – at least when it comes to membership of the EU, but often as a general stance. There have been no arguments in favour of abandoning the dualist stance, although again Malta is aware that the European Union Act 2003 has the effect of making 'directly applicable' EU law directly applicable in Malta, and that this is not a strict dualist position, but then it is recognised that EU law is not ordinary international law. In short, in my view constitutional constructs and doctrines apply as modified and transformed in the EU membership context. We need to be constantly aware of the sui generis nature of the EU and its legal order. It is this new order that can then help explain, inform and give language to the new constitutionalism in Malta itself and at the same time to the regional and world orders now evolving.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 There have been occasional calls for a greater role ex ante in foreign affairs for the Maltese Parliament. For example, it was a cause of some chagrin when a commitment was given in relation to Partnership for Peace involvement (re-activation) without any reference, far less discussion, in the House, leading to the resignation of the head of the Maltese representation in Brussels.⁶⁷ Another example is the granting of permission for warships to use Maltese shipyards.

In terms of thinking about Parliament's involvement at the stage of implementing international commitments, a useful starting point is the case of the EU, with two key examples being the need to transpose directives and the ex ante scrutiny or ex post challenge of Commission proposals/adopted legislation for compliance with the principle of subsidiarity. A key development, in the author's view, would be the ex ante scrutiny of a European Commission proposal or any Union act for compliance with human rights in accordance with the national constitution. Issues have arisen in Malta in relation to the principle of proportionality, where Malta took the position that a proposal went against the principle but had to accept the Commission's stance that the procedure of ex ante control does not extend to this principle, despite the wording of the title of Protocol No 2. The Latvian example on the IMF conditionality given in the questionnaire shows that other issues can arise, in the broader context of global governance, in relation to other general principles of law, which should be recognised as having constitutional status.

3.3.2 The Constitution neither expressly permits nor prohibits the holding of referendums on international organisations or international treaties. This does not mean that a referendum may not be held, but simply that it has no constitutionally binding effect, so that any result is binding only in political terms. Such was the referendum of 2003 on the question whether Malta should join the European Union.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 There is no mechanism in Maltese law for the review of Treaties and measures adopted under international law, separate from the challenge of the Maltese implementing decisions or laws under the Constitution. In this connection, the institution of a mechanism at EU level for the challenge of a prospective EU measure for breach of some general principle of law would allay the need for an individual Member State to raise the issue of validity of EU law under constitutional law ex post, for it would raise the issue as a 'constitutional' issue under EU law of the validity of the measure of another international organisation directly within the EU. There should, however, be some mechanism which would permit a Member State to participate in the Union review process. Similar thinking ought to take place in the context of global governance.

⁶⁷ Vella, M. (2012, April 20) Update 2 Government reacts to Labour motion for Richard Cachia Caruana's resignation. Malta Today. <http://www.maltatoday.com.mt/news/national/17598/labour-motion-calls-for-resignation-of-richard-cachia-caruana-20120420#>.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 The debate as to ‘social Europe’ at the time of the referendums on the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe (the so-called and ill-fated ‘Constitutional Treaty’) was closely followed in Malta. The social dimension of the Treaties is an important one in Malta’s eyes. The accountability of the institutions, and of all decision-makers, including in the economic sphere, and of the new ‘European’ regulators, is a matter of real interest, which many in Malta trust will continue to be addressed at all levels and especially throughout the sphere of economic and financial governance. It would be well for the principles and liabilities to be expressly spelt out and for appropriate investigative mechanisms to be put in place, thus mirroring political accountability under the national constitutions. There is every reason to extend this, possibly by EU initiative, to non-EU, global financial and economic institutions.

3.5.2 Malta has not been subject to a bailout and austerity programme. It has watched with concern as others have defaulted or been rescued, and it has been with a degree of chagrin that Malta has had to accept the imposition of central solutions against the wishes and to the sacrifice of whole populations while proper accountability and punishment appear to have been lacking both in the public and in the private spheres in those Member States in which the worst defaults were committed. Nor have Member States been able to agree easily on the solutions, demonstrating that solidarity could be better organised and underpinned by the European constitutional level.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 Regarding the proposition about the erosion of constitutional rights, the rule of law, judicial review, democratic control, or accountability in the face of global threats or pressures, Malta has not remained entirely untouched but has, in general, not had to adopt draconian anti-terrorist legislation and so on of its own beyond what has been adopted at European Union or other wider international level.

References

- Aditus et al. (2014) NGO Submissions to the Ministry for Social Dialogue, Consumer Affairs and Civil Liberties (Human Rights & Equality Consultation) March 2014. http://aditus.org.mt/Publications/scopinginput_032014.zip.
- Azzopardi A. (2012) Malta. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1, Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 627–640.

- Central Bank of Malta (2013) The Evolution of Economic Governance in the European Monetary Union. http://www.google.com.mt/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=&esrc=s&source=web&cd=5&cad=rja&uact=8&ved=0CDYQFjAE&url=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.centralbankmalta.org%2Fupdates%2Fdownload%2Fpdfs%2FEconomic_governance_reform.pdf&ei=yEYQVLnFG8iR7AaCroHACg&usg=AFQjCNP5W4tDMhfRKKI8EA3QJCZBJqodGw&bvm=bv.74649129,d.ZGU
- Constitutional Court of the Republic of Malta. Report. The relations between the Constitutional Courts and the other national courts, including the interference in this area of the action of the European courts. XII Congress of the Conference of European Constitutional Courts, Brussels, 13–17 May 2002. <http://www.confeuconstco.org/reports/rep-xii/Malta-EN.pdf>.
- Cremona J.J. (1997) The Maltese Constitution and Constitutional History since 1813, 2nd Edition. Publishers Enterprises Group (PEG) Ltd., San Gwann.
- Degaetano V. (2008) Report for Malta. Problems of Legislative Omission in Constitutional Jurisprudence. Questionnaire for the XIV Congress of the Conference of European Constitutional Courts, 2–7 June 2008, Vilnius. <http://www.judiciarymalta.gov.mt/home?l=1>.
- Dyer C. (2000) Conjoined twins separated after long legal battle. BMJ 321(7270):1175 et seq.
- European University Institute (2013) Constitutional Change through Euro Crisis Law: Country Reports on the impact of crisis Instruments on the legal structures of the EU Member States. Malta. <http://eurocrisislaw.eui.eu/country/malta/topic/fiscal-compact/>.
- Fillett S. (Undated) Replies to Questionnaire regarding the European Arrest Warrant and its implementation in the Member States of the EU. In the European Arrest Warrant database. <http://www.law.uj.edu.pl/~kpk/eaw/data/malta.html>.
- Mifsud Bonnici G. (2004) Constitutional Procedure Relative to Fundamental Rights and Freedoms. Midsea books, St. Venera.
- Office of Official Publications of the European Union (2014) Malta u l-Qorti tal-Gustizzja Tal-Unjoni Ewropea (Malta and the Court of Justice of the European Union). Curia, Luxembourg.
- Sammut I. (2009) The EU and Maltese Legal Orders: What Kind of Marriage Between Them? In: Xuereb P.G. (ed.) Malta in the European Union: Five Years On and Looking to the Future. Malta, European Documentation and Research Centre, University of Malta, pp. 97–112.
- Sammut I. (2012) Malta. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 461–482.
- The Today Public Policy Institute (TPPI) (2014) A Review of the Constitution of Malta at Fifty: Rectification or Redesign? <http://www.tppi.org.mt/~user2/index.php/reports>.
- Weiler J.H.H. (1999) The Constitution of Europe. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Xuereb P.G. (2001) Constitutional Questions Raised by the Proposed Accession of Malta to the European Union in the General Context. In: Kellermann A. de Zwaan J.W., Czuczaj J. (eds.) EU Enlargement: The Constitutional Impact at EU and National Level. TMC Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 229–242.
- Xuereb P.G. (2002) The Future of Europe: Solidarity and Constitutionalism. Towards a Solidarity Model. E.L.Rev. 6:643–662.
- Xuereb P.G. (2006) Malta. In: Kellermann A., Czuczaj J., Blockmans S., Albi A., Douma W.T. (eds.) (2006) The Impact of EU Accession on the Legal Orders of the New Member States and (Pre-) Candidate Countries. TMC Asser Press, The Hague, pp. 409–419.
- Xuereb P.G. (2012) A Common Goods' Understanding of Europe and the World. In: Bekemans L. (ed.) A Value-Driven European Future. Peter Lang, Brussels, pp. 159–180.
- Zammit D.E. (ed.) (2008) Maltese Perspectives on Human Rights. Malta University Press, Malta.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Netherlands: The Pragmatics of a Flexible, Europeanised Constitution

Leonard Besselink and Monica Claes

Abstract The Constitution of the Netherlands, which dates back to 1814–15, is an evolutionary constitution, based on incremental historical developments. A notable feature is that the Constitution bans constitutional review of Acts of Parliament and of treaties. A bill of rights was introduced in 1983; however, it omits a number of rights included in the ECHR and the EU Charter. Constitutional rights are not justiciable, in the sense that they cannot be invoked against primary legislation. The ECHR and the EU Charter are often regarded as providing stronger protection. Due to historical reasons, the notions of sovereignty and the people as the ultimate source of public authority have been absent in the Dutch legal and public discourse. The Dutch Constitution does not have the centrality to public debate that constitutions have in other Western countries. A salient feature of the Constitution is that although it does not mention the EU or the ECHR, it opens the legal order for both nearly unconditionally, granting them primacy over any conflicting national law. Contestation and conflict sensitive and fundamental constitutional issues are rare in the courtroom or in legal terms. Court cases have raised the question whether national institutions can derive powers from an EU measure directly, e.g. when Leonard F. M. Besselink is Professor of Constitutional Law at the University of Amsterdam.

e-mail: 1.besselink@uva.nl.

Monica Claes is Professor of European and Comparative Constitutional Law at the Law Faculty of Maastricht University. e-mail: Monica.Claes@maastrichtuniversity.nl.

This paper was finalised in June 2016, and only occasionally have later developments been incorporated.

All websites accessed 30 June 2016.

L. Besselink (✉)
University of Amsterdam, Amsterdam, The Netherlands
e-mail: 1.besselink@uva.nl

M. Claes
Maastricht University, Maastricht, The Netherlands
e-mail: Monica.Claes@maastrichtuniversity.nl

imposing the obligation to repay EU subsidies, and whether an international technical standard that is available only after payment can be legally binding on individuals.

Keywords The Dutch Constitution · Amendment of the Constitution regarding EU and international law/Europeanisation of the Constitution · The Supreme Court of the Netherlands · Evolutionary constitutionalism · Ban on constitutional review of Acts of Parliament and of treaties · European Arrest Warrant and extraditions · Data Retention Directive · Fundamental rights · ECHR · EU Charter · Absence of discourse on sovereignty and people as the source of public authority · Repayment of subsidies · Binding nature of unpublished international technical standards

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

In this report we explain some of the apparent paradoxes pertaining to the constitutional system of the Netherlands. For a proper understanding of the constitutional situation in the Netherlands, one should be acutely aware of the distinction between the formal constitution, of which the Grondwet (literally ‘Basic Law’) is the central part, and the substantive constitutional rules contained in the other sources that are generally considered to be part of Netherlands’ constitutional law, which include international and European treaties providing for fundamental rules concerning the exercise of public authority, in particular human rights treaties, and certain general principles of constitutional law in a democratic state under the rule of law. The Grondwet does not mention Europe, neither the European Union nor the European Convention on Human Rights, although – as we explain in Sect. 1.2.1 – it opens nearly unconditionally the legal order for both, granting them primacy over any conflicting national law. Hence, in the absence of any mention of Europe, the constitutional order turns out to be strongly Europeanised. Another paradox is that the Grondwet is entrenched and its amendment cumbersome (see Sect. 1.2.2), but the primacy of European law and directly effective international law, combined with a constitutional practice and political culture in which the formal constitution does not occupy an important place (as we explain in Sects. 1.1.1–1.1.2 and 1.3), provide it with great flexibility. We sketch in Sect. 2 the constitutional pragmatics with regard to specific constitutionally sensitive topics, such as fundamental rights protection and the constitutional principles concerning the rule of law with regard to the European Arrest Warrant and Data Protection. In Sect. 3, we describe briefly how this opens the legal order to the various forms of global governance.

1.1.1–1.1.2 The Constitution of the Netherlands is of the historical type: it is based on more or less incremental developments.¹ The current formal constitution, the Grondwet,² is generally considered to date back to the one issued in 1814, which constituted a constitutional monarchy in the Netherlands, and to 1815, when this was amended to implement the results of the Vienna Congress.³ The 1848 revision, adopted against the backdrop of revolutions in Europe, introduced a system of parliamentary democracy, and defines the constitutional system of the Netherlands to date. The year 1848 is also when Art. 115 was adopted, which stated that ‘statutes are inviolable’. In 1983 the text of the Constitution was modernised and simplified, and a bill of rights was introduced in the opening chapter of the Constitution. Article 115 was reformulated and renumbered, so that Art. 120 now provides that ‘Courts shall not review the constitutionality (grondwettigheid) of Acts of Parliament and treaties’, where grondwettigheid refers to the compatibility of Acts of Parliament and treaties with the provisions of the Grondwet.

The Dutch Constitution can be characterised as an ‘open constitution’: it does not set up a closed system. It is generally agreed that the broader constitution is made up of several components, of which the written document entitled ‘Constitution for the Kingdom of the Netherlands’ is only one, be it the central, part. In the Dutch language, a distinction can be made between the document containing the formal Constitution (‘Grondwet’) and the broader category of fundamental rules and principles governing the relationships between the state organs, between the domestic and the international legal orders and between the state and the individuals (‘constitutie’). This resembles the distinction between Grundgesetz and Verfassung in German constitutional law. In addition to the Grondwet, the constitutie also includes unwritten principles, constitutional conventions, some international treaties, the Charter of the Kingdom,⁴ and certain organic laws and decrees.⁵

¹ Besselink 2014b, pp. 1189 et seq.

² For provisions prior to 2004, the translation used is the version by Besselink 2004b; later provisions are our own, given certain shortcomings of the English version published by the Government of the Netherlands at <https://www.government.nl/documents/regulations/2012/10/18/the-constitution-of-the-kingdom-of-the-netherlands-2008>.

³ The Republic of the United Provinces (1581–1795) did not have a single written constitution in the modern sense of the word, although there were several constitutional documents and charters such as The Union of Utrecht (1579) and the Act of Abjuration (1581). In 1798, a constitutional document, the Staatsregeling voor het Bataafse Volk, established the Batavian Republic, but it was short-lived and abolished already in 1801.

⁴ The Charter operates as the basic law of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, which includes the country in Europe (the Netherlands to which the Caribbean islands of Bonaire, St. Eustatius and Saba were added in 2010), as well as (currently) Aruba, Curaçao and Sint Maarten. It ranks higher than the Constitution.

⁵ These are normal Acts of Parliament (and some royal decrees) and do not have a higher rank or stronger force of law. They are considered ‘organic’ because they concern the organisation of the state and provide an elaboration of constitutional provisions from the Grondwet or otherwise unregulated constitutional matters. Examples are the Act on Municipalities and the Act on the

The Constitution (Grondwet) is unostentatious, simple, sober and short. It contains no grand concepts such as sovereignty,⁶ no preamble, no invocatio dei, no Staatszielen. It does not mention the symbols of the state, the flag, the anthem or the motto, or any other elements that would be considered Verfassungskitsch. The main reason for this is that the Netherlands Constitution is not revolutionary, that is to say adopted to make a clear break with the past, nor does it sanction the sovereignty of the state or establish a new regime. It is rather an evolutionary, ‘long-term constitution’, based on more or less incremental historical developments, aimed at codifying a state of affairs, rather than modifying the political system for the future.⁷ In 2006, the National Convention promoted the idea of a preamble to the Constitution, in order to give expression to some evident fundamental values of Dutch society and strengthen the Dutch national identity.⁸ The 2009–2010 Constitutional Committee, however, did not see the added legal and political value of such a preamble, and pointed to the fact that it was unlikely that consensus would be found on its text, for instance on whether it should contain an invocatio dei. This also has to do with the fact that the Netherlands sees itself as a country of ‘minorities’ that keep one another in check. This consociationalism implies that Dutch politics and governance are characterised by a common striving for broad consensus on important issues, within both the political community and society as a whole. The Constitution is only to a limited extent considered to express the ‘national identity’ of the state, the political community or the people of the Netherlands. The values it protects are, on the whole, values that the Netherlands shares with other nations.

The 2009–2010 Constitutional Committee did recommend the adoption of a general clause that would express the most fundamental features of the Constitution – which have never been written in the constitutional text before – namely that the Netherlands is a democratic state under the rule of law, that the government respects and protects human dignity, fundamental rights and fundamental principles, and that public authority can be exercised only pursuant to law.

This part of the advice of the Committee was picked up by the Upper House, and a bill adding a general preliminary clause to the text of the Constitution has recently been introduced in Parliament. Yet, the text proposed reads very differently, stating Provinces, and the royal decree providing for the rules of procedure of the Council of Ministers. The rules of procedure for the States-General (the Netherlands Parliament) are autonomous decisions of each of the two Houses of Parliament that provide detailed rules on the parliamentary system and its practice.

⁶ On (absence of) the concept of sovereignty in the Dutch constitutional discourse on European integration, see De Witte 2004.

⁷ Besselink 2004a, b, p. 18.

⁸ Nationale Conventie, Hart voor de publieke zaak. Aanbevelingen van de Nationale Conventie voor de 21e eeuw (Caring for the public cause: recommendations of the National Convention for the 21st century), September 2006, pp. 42–43.

merely that ‘[t]he Constitution guarantees democracy, the rule of law and fundamental rights’.⁹

In the Dutch constitutional culture, the Constitution and constitutional law play only a limited role in politics and in the public debate.¹⁰ In this respect, the Constitution is not ‘a living document’: it is considered first and foremost as a document for the government and public authorities, not for society and the citizens. But even in the legal scene, the Constitution does not play the lead role: issues of constitutionality of legislation are often downplayed as they are not justiciable in any case, while compatibility with fundamental principles is often phrased in terms of compatibility with human rights treaties, such as the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). The legal and political authority of the Constitution is thus overshadowed by European and international (human rights) law (mainly ECHR and EU law), which operates as a substitute constitution. Even the Council of State, the Government’s prime advisor on the legality of legislation, does not place the Constitution and constitutional law at the centre of attention, but rather looks to the ECHR and other international treaties to draw the legal lines that should not be crossed. The limits of governmental and legislative action are found in international treaties, which were only meant as a European minimum level below which no state should go, rather than within the country’s own constitution. Paradoxically, this silence with regard to the Constitution and its underlying values is often seen as desirable and good: the Constitution reflects the constitutional settlements of the past,¹¹ political compromises that should not be too easily challenged. Silence on constitutional matters is seen as a sign of constitutional peace and harmony.¹² This is reinforced by an uncertain attitude relating to constitutional interpretation and contestation: the Constitution says what it says, no more and no less, and constitutional change should be brought about by constitutional amendment, often piecemeal, ‘to keep the Constitution up to date’. Neither the Legislature, nor the Council of State, the Government nor the courts see it as their role to develop a ‘living Constitution’, to take the lead in adapting it to the changes of time through interpretation, or indeed to present themselves as the ‘ultimate interpreter’ of the ¹² Tijn Kortmann, a leading scholar in constitutional law, considered the lack of discussion on the Constitution a sign of its strength: ‘a constitution that is not “living” is not necessarily dead as a doornail’, but may be well-accepted in the hearts and minds of politicians, civil servants and the general public. On the latter point: he did not consider it a loss that the Constitution was not known among the general public, as it was generally of very little avail to them. See Kortman 2008, p. 15.

⁹ ‘De Grondwet waarborgt de democratie, de rechtsstaat en de grondrechten’. This Bill was introduced in the Lower House on 9 July 2016, TK [Parliamentary Documents] 34 516, Nos. 1–3.

¹⁰ See e.g. Oomen 2009, pp. 55–79; Oomen and Lelieveldt 2008, pp. 577–578.

¹¹ In his speech at the occasion of the presentation of the report of the Royal Committee on the Constitution, Donner, the current vice president of the Council of State, then Minister for Justice, labelled the Constitution as ‘gestold verleden’, ‘history solidified’, and expressed the view that the Constitution mainly settles political conflicts of the past. It offers a legal framework, rather than an inspiration for the government or even less so for society. See <https://www.rijksoverheid.nl/documenten/toespraken/2010/11/11/toespraak-minister-donner-bij-in-ontvangst-nemen-advies-staatscommissie-grondwet>.

Constitution. The absence of a constitutional court, and the political and pragmatic nature of constitutional review by the Advisory Council of State, stand in the way of developing a thorough and sophisticated discourse, and of developing a Dogmatik comparable to for instance the German, Italian or Spanish debates, which are heavily affected by the close relationship between the academic community and the constitutional court.¹³

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 The European Union and Dutch membership do not feature in the text of the Constitution. Nevertheless, the Dutch Constitution has been revised once in the light of European integration. In 1953, in light of the then recently established European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC) and the planned European Defence Community (EDC), and with a view to further European integration, the chapter on foreign relations was adapted. It opens with a provision proclaiming that '[t]he government shall promote the development of the international legal order' (Art. 90). In order to make it clear beyond doubt that it is constitutional for powers to be transferred, Art. 67 (now Art. 92) declares that legislative, executive and judicial powers can be transferred to international institutions pursuant to a treaty. In addition, and again with a view to ensuring the smooth participation of the Netherlands in the international legal order generally and European integration specifically, the famous Arts. 65 and 66 were adopted. These provisions, now numbered Arts. 93 and 94 of the Constitution, provide for the direct effect of treaty provisions that are 'binding on anyone' and have duly been published, and award them primacy over conflicting provisions of national law.

The practical effect of these early amendments to date is that there is a high level of fit between European law and the Dutch constitutional environment. While Dutch judges may for a while have struggled with the concept of direct effect and were reluctant – given the traditional inviolability of primary legislation – to actually set aside national law in favour of international treaties and European law, adoption of the case law of the European Court of Justice (ECJ) on direct effect and primacy of EU law was rather smooth in the Netherlands.

1.2.2 In terms of the amendment procedure, the Constitution is rigid. The procedure for constitutional amendment is cumbersome and lengthy. It requires the approval by two consecutive parliaments with elections in between, and approval by a two-thirds majority in both Houses the second time. Twenty-three amendments have been passed between 1814 and 2008, that of 2008 being the last one to date, but several have been rather marginal.

¹³ For a striking analysis of the situation in Germany, see e.g. Möllers 2011, pp. 283–408.

1.2.3–1.2.4 The consecutive amendments of the European Treaties have never given rise to constitutional amendment. When the Maastricht Treaty was being adopted, there was some debate among constitutional lawyers on whether approval of that Treaty required the procedure in Art. 91(3) of the Constitution. If a transfer of powers conflicts with the Constitution or would lead to such conflicts, approval of such transfer requires a two-thirds majority in both Houses of Parliament (Art. 91 (3) of the Constitution).¹⁴ Thus, the fact that a Treaty tabled for approval conflicts with the Constitution does not mean that it cannot be approved and ratified: it merely means that approval requires a two-thirds majority in both Houses. This comes close to what is required to amend the Constitution, but is less demanding, as it does not require approval by two consecutive parliaments and elections in between. Moreover, the approval with a two-thirds majority does not formally amount to an amendment of the Constitution. Since Treaties take precedence over the Constitution in any case, such amendment would not be necessary.

The procedure has never been followed for approval of the EU Treaties, which were thus never considered to conflict with the Constitution.¹⁵ The provision has been interpreted as requiring a special majority only in cases of direct conflict between a provision of a Treaty and a specific provision of the Constitution. In other words, a tension with the spirit of the Constitution or principles and values underlying it is not considered sufficient to require special treatment. There was some discussion when the Treaty of Maastricht was tabled for approval, but the Government insisted that there was no conflict between the Treaty and the Constitution, and proceeded to ask Parliament for its approval in accordance with the ordinary procedure, i.e. by way of an ordinary Act of Parliament.¹⁶ The Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) and the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union (Fiscal Compact) have also been approved as normal treaties by an ordinary Act of Parliament, and with strong support in Parliament. The Fiscal Compact did not give rise to constitutional amendment, notwithstanding its requirement in Art. 3(2) to introduce a balanced budget rule through ‘provisions of binding force and permanent character, preferably constitutional, or otherwise guaranteed to be fully respected and adhered to throughout the national budgetary processes’. Because the budget is adopted by an Act of Parliament of the same rank as any other Act of Parliament, this could, strictly speaking, only be achieved by incorporating such a rule in the Grondwet. It was, however, implemented in primary legislation, the Wet HOF (the Sustainable Public Finances Act – ‘Wet Houdbare Overheidsfinanciën’).

¹⁴ The decision as to whether the special procedure must be followed is made by a simple majority in both Houses.

¹⁵ The only European treaty that was approved with a two-thirds majority in application of (what is now) Sect. 91, para. 3 of the Constitution, was the unsuccessful Treaty establishing the European Defence Community in 1954. Outside the context of the EU, the provision has been explicitly applied only twice: concerning the Act approving the Agreement Concerning West New Guinea (Stb. 1962, 363), and concerning the Act approving the Statute of the International Criminal Court (Stb. 2001, 343). For a critical examination of the practice and related procedural conundrums, see Besselink 2003, pp. 471–480 and Besselink 2002–2003.

¹⁶ Heringa 1992, pp. 749–866. Heringa pointed to the provisions on EMU, which he considered to be at odds with Art. 106 of the Constitution which provided (and still does): ‘The monetary system shall be regulated by Act of Parliament’ and the provisions on visa policy and electoral rights for EU citizens. In all cases, the Constitution endows a task to the Dutch legislature. Most scholars did not agree with Heringa’s views, and neither did the Government. More recently, questions have been raised about whether the extension of EU economic governance can be reconciled with Art. 105 of the Constitution, which allocates budgetary power to the Government and Parliament acting jointly.

The idea has been floated to make further steps in the process of European integration dependent on a stricter procedure and enhanced democratic legitimacy. One such proposal aims at amending the Constitution to require a two-thirds majority for the approval of all EU Treaties (amending treaties and accession treaties) as well as decisions to proceed to simplified revision.¹⁷ It has been approved in a first reading by the Lower House and is pending in the Upper House at the time of writing (June 2016).

More recently, in the wake of David Cameron’s referendum promise to the British people, Burgerforum EU, a private initiative, asked for a referendum in cases of further transfers of powers to the EU. The request was rejected in the Lower House, but a motion was passed asking a report of the Council of State on whether there is a competence creep and whether additional democratic guarantees could be introduced. The Council of State issued its report in the summer of 2014, and a parliamentary debate was held in the summer of 2015, when the Foreign Minister firmly rejected the idea of ‘creeping competences’.

The entire Constitution continues to apply when the Government or other state organs act in the context of the European Union.¹⁸ These bodies cannot, for instance, infringe on their constitutional obligations when participating in the Council of Ministers or other organs in which they represent the state. The relationship between the Dutch Government and Parliament is governed by the usual rules, and the conventional principles of ministerial responsibility and the duty to inform Parliament and so forth continue to apply. Government-Parliament relations are the same in the context of EU decision-making as they are in purely national matters.

Provisions of the Constitution that seem to be at least incomplete in the context of membership are simply read in the light of EU law and are further specified in ordinary law. Thus, for instance, Art. 3 of the Constitution stating that ‘[a]ll Dutch nationals shall be equally eligible for appointment to public service’ is read as applying also, where relevant and with the exceptions allowed under EU law, to EU citizens. Article 4 which provides that ‘[e]very Dutch national shall have an equal right to elect the members of the general representative bodies and to stand for election as a member of those bodies, subject to the limitations and exceptions prescribed by Act of Parliament’ is not considered to infringe EU law, as it does not say that the same does not apply, in particular cases, to EU citizens.

¹⁷ Voorstel van rijkswet van de leden Herben en Van der Staaij houdende verklaring dat er grond bestaat een voorstel in overweging te nemen tot verandering in de Grondwet, strekkende tot invoering van het vereiste van een meerderheid van twee derden van het aantal uitgebrachte stemmen in de Staten-Generaal voor de goedkeuring van verdragen betreffende de Europese Unie (Bill of the members Herben and Van der Staaij with a view to declare that there is reason to consider the amendment of the Constitution, to the effect that a requirement of a two-thirds majority for the approval of treaties concerning the European Union), 30 874 (R 1818). The private members’ bill was introduced on 22 November 2006 and adopted in the Lower House on 22 September 2015.

¹⁸ See the report of the Royal Committee on the Constitution, Rapport Staatscommissie Grondwet 2010, pp. 105–106.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1–1.3.2 The Constitution has never been considered an obstacle to accession to the European Communities, the amendment of the European Treaties or to the domestic effect of European law. The concept of ‘sovereignty’, whether external or internal, popular or national, does not play a key role in the constitutional discourse. It is absent from the text of the Constitution. The idea that all public authority derives from the people or the nation as the ultimate holder of those powers has been virtually absent from the Dutch constitutional discourse: one tries to do without, both in theory and in constitutional practice. In many ways the very recent surge of ‘sovereignty’ in certain political circles and to some extent in academia is relatively novel.

The explanation for the overall lack of importance of sovereignty is historical. It has a long tradition that goes back at least as far as the Republic of the United Provinces, the political confederacy that was the result of the revolt against the ruling Spanish overlord, Philip II, and lasted from 1579 to 1795. Within this confederal state, sovereignty was not located at the federal level, but in the provinces that composed it. This state of affairs was not intentional in as much as initially a search was undertaken to find a replacement for the abjured sovereign, but no suitable foreign prince who would be sufficiently pliable to the wishes of the provincial and local (particularly the cities of Amsterdam and Rotterdam) authorities could be found. Consequently, the republic ended up doing without a sovereign at national level and instead worked on the basis of consensus among the allegedly sovereign provinces. Seeking consensus instead of asserting sovereignty became part of the political DNA of the Netherlands’ political culture. And to this day, we are faced with a state and a Constitution that leave the notion of sovereignty, if at all existent, at most implicit.

1.3.3 The issue of limits to participation in European integration is a political question rather than a legal constitutional one. Sovereignty being largely absent from the legal doctrinal debate, both in the context of European integration and more generally, the question of ultimate authority and the source of all state power is left undecided.

This has made for a very smooth adaptation to EU membership, since no core principles, no inalienable principles or values require protection against the majority of the day or against the outside world. The controlimiti developed in other Member States are not developed in Netherlands constitutional doctrine. There is no Solange case law, if only because constitutional rights are less enforceable than EU law and fundamental rights. EU law was thus never considered a threat to national constitutional rights. No Dutch court has ever claimed jurisdiction to review the validity or applicability of EU law, or developed a theory of ultra vires acts; no court has ever formulated a view on ‘national identity’ or ‘constitutional identity review’.

This all sits well with Dutch consociationalism and corporatism and the socially embedded patterns of democracy that have prevailed in the Netherlands, which to a large extent result from the perception of being a country of permanent minorities. Indeed, in terms of religious denomination the Netherlands was a country of permanent religious minorities for centuries, guaranteed by freedom of (religious) conscience, although it is also true that overall there was a dominant role for the Dutch Reformed Church, with periods of greater and lesser toleration of other Christian and of non-Christian religions.¹⁹ These realities forced a culture of consociationalism, toleration and pragmatic consensualism, which may now be under pressure after secularisation has created a new situation of a large majority of public agnosticism, which is more and more frequently framed – also by liberals – as standing in opposition against a threatening minority of migrant aliens of Muslim faith.²⁰

Consociationalism and socially deeply-embedded democracy contributed to a constitutional culture where sovereignty claims were avoided, and that proved fertile soil for the reception of European law. Also, the theory of constitutional pluralism sits well with Dutch constitutional theory: European constitutional pluralism could be only a new, transnational guise of a broader pluralism, which was perhaps most elaborately theorised politically and philosophically as ‘soevereiniteit in eigen kring’, sovereignty within one’s own sphere. This idea was developed in Calvinist circles, initially by Kuyper in the late 19th century²¹ and in a more profound philosophical sense by Herman Dooyeweerd²² as a counterpart of Catholic doctrines of ‘subsidiarity’ and the social-democratic theory of ‘functional

¹⁹ Freedom of religion was guaranteed as freedom of conscience in Art. XIII of the Union of Utrecht of 1579, which became the constitutional charter of the Republic. This did not encompass freedom to profess or manifest religion publicly, which was subject to restrictions of public order. Thus, Jews, Catholics, Lutherans and dissident protestants such as the Anabaptists were tolerated but could not openly profess their faith in all the provinces and cities. For Catholics there was a constitutional prohibition between 1848 and 1987 to hold religious processions in places where they had not customarily been held in 1848 (Art. 167, Grondwet 1848).

²⁰ Issues of racism that were previously reigned in come out in the open; in a recent opinion poll nearly two-thirds of respondents found that ethnic profiling by the police is acceptable in the fight against crime, and less than one-third consider it a form of racism; see <https://www.noties.nl/v/get.php?a=peil.nl&s=weekpoll&f=2016-06-05b.pdf>.

²¹ Kuyper 1880.

²² Dooyeweerd 1984.

decentralisation' (note that, by the second half of the 19th century, these social groups of the various religious denominations, 'neutrals' and socialists became strongly organised in what were later called 'pillars', each having their own churches and meeting halls, sports clubs, cultural and literary clubs, insurance companies, newspapers, radio and television broadcasting, trade unions, political parties and political doctrines and theories).

In the present situation in which important social determinants of the old constitutional culture have eroded, however, in political circles, in academia and in government circles the question has been raised whether the Dutch legal order should continue to be so open towards the European Union, and whether the Constitution could not or should not provide a bulwark against the incoming tide of European law. A symptom of this was that the Netherlands was one of the Member States to reject and thereby cause the defeat of the Constitutional Treaty, and is no longer all that Europhile.

The Constitution does not specify conditions for the conferral of powers to international institutions, nor does it indicate explicit limits to such conferral. Neither does it contain an immutable core that cannot be transferred. The Dutch Constitution remains agnostic towards fundamental questions of European integration that have arisen elsewhere. In line with the historic absence of a legal sovereignty debate, constitutional doctrine is rather pragmatic. Thus it would seem that at the end of the day, the Netherlands can commit 'constitutional harakiri' or at least, there are no legal constitutional obstacles prohibiting the transfer of powers that elsewhere are labelled as essential state functions or the core of the constitution.

Over time, some limits have been suggested, but these have been few and far between. Until 1983 the provision that allows for the approval of treaties that diverge from the Constitution by qualified majority in Parliament, now Art. 91(3) Grondwet, allowed such divergence 'if the development of the international legal order so requires'. These quoted words – which suggest a condition and possibly a limit to transfer of powers – were dropped in 1983 as 'superfluous'.²³ The provision was considered to be essentially procedural in nature, not one to determine when a treaty diverges from the Constitution. Although it was conceded that the language did provide a touchstone, preference was given to no such clause over 'vague, shifting and incomplete criteria', all the more since the need to diverge by treaty from the Constitution could possibly be dependent on considerations that are quite different from the 'development of the international legal order'.²⁴

When in 1953 the possibility was created to diverge by treaty from the Constitution, the Government expressed the view that such divergence only exists when there is a divergence from a concrete provision,²⁵ but it also conceded in response to two members of the Lower House, that the Kingdom could not become a party to a treaty if that would amount to giving up the 'foundations or essentials of the national legal order, for instance the monarchical-parliamentary system, even to the extent that these are not incorporated in the Constitution [Grondwet] for the sake of the development of the international legal order.²⁶ These two, seemingly incompatible positions can be reconciled by distinguishing on the one hand the divergence from specific and concrete provisions as the legal constitutional standard for determining the application of the requirement of a qualified majority from, on the other hand, the existence of treaties to which the Kingdom could not become a party even with the qualified majority provided for in Art. 91(3) of the Constitution by the standards of political propriety and acceptability.

²³ Parliamentary documents, Tweede Kamer 1977–1978, 15049 (R 1100), No. 3, p. 5.

²⁴ Parliamentary documents, Tweede Kamer 1979–1980, 15049 (R 1100), No. 10, pp. 7–8.

²⁵ Handelingen Eerste Kamer [Proceedings of the Upper House], 1952–1953, pp. 480 and 484.

Much later, in November 1999, the Council of State (Raad van State) gave an advisory opinion on the implementation acts concerning foreign jurisdictions in the Netherlands (the Scottish Lockerbie court), in which it suggested that the Kingdom could not become a party, not even under the procedure in Art. 91(3) of the Constitution, to treaties that conflict with ‘essential constitutional guarantees, especially the fundamental rights of chapter 1 of the Constitution’, if ‘the conflict with fundamental rights is so fundamental as to make ratification of such treaties unacceptable’; also, it found that the EU Treaties and the European Convention on Human Rights could be an obstacle to ratification.²⁷ Although the Netherlands Council of State has begun to think of itself as a kind of constitutional council, these points can be considered a political assessment in light of the matter at hand, rather than an authoritative constitutional interpretation, guiding the constitutionality of transfers of sovereign powers. This is evident from the predominant assertions that always accompany these same interventions, which insist that divergences between a treaty and the Constitution only exist when a treaty conflicts with concrete provisions of the Constitution, not when sovereignty transfers as such are concerned. This was evident in the Council’s advisory opinion on cruise missiles of 23 December 1983, in which it made clear that a mere limitation, infringement or transfer of sovereignty is as such not in conflict with the Constitution,²⁸ that the question how far a transfer could go was not a matter of constitutional law but a political assessment,²⁹ and that a discrepancy with one or more specific provisions of the Constitution is required for there to be a conflict with the Constitution.³⁰

All this should not be taken to mean that there is no debate on the limits of European integration: ‘sovereignty’ is now hotly debated, and is key to the Eurosceptic discourse. Both the ECHR and the EU are described as threats to Dutch sovereignty. But the concept is not used in the legal debate, and as such, the consequences of European integration for Dutch sovereignty (however conceived) are under-theorised. It could even be said that constitutional law and constitutional

²⁶ Ibid., p. 480, left column.

²⁷ Advisory Opinion, Raad van State, 19 November 1999, Parliamentary documents, Tweede Kamer 1999–2000, 26 800 VI A, p. 6.

²⁸ Parliamentary documents, Tweede Kamer 1983–1984, 17 980, A, p. 2, middle column.

²⁹ Ibid., p. 4, left column.

³⁰ Ibid., p. 3, left column.

theory have not been able to offer a framework to conceptualise the participation of the Netherlands in European integration.

1.3.4 The acceptance of primacy The primacy of EU law is not phrased in terms of sovereignty or the conferral of powers to the EU. The majority of constitutional lawyers, joined by the criminal chamber of the Hoge Raad, do not even consider the primacy of EU as deriving from the Constitution but from EU law autonomously. The constitutional provisions, which are perfectly apt to sanction the doctrines of direct effect and primacy as they have been developed by the ECJ, are not seen to regulate the domestic effect of EU law. Predominantly, scholars and courts distinguish between the direct effect and primacy of international treaties (deriving from the Constitution) and the direct effect and primacy of EU law (deriving from the very nature of EU law as set out by the Court of Justice in *Van Gend en Loos*³¹ and *Costa v. ENEL*³²).

Fundamental issues of European integration, or major steps in the process, which have given rise to constitutional case law elsewhere, such as the Maastricht Treaty, the Lisbon Treaty or the European Arrest Warrant (EAW), have never been decided by the courts. These are considered political issues which are not for the courts to decide.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 Ever since the adoption of the EEC Treaty in 1957, democracy – and more particularly parliamentary representation of citizens – has been a matter of great concern within the Dutch Parliament, the States General (Staten-Generaal). What was later referred to as the ‘democratic deficit’ was identified in the parliamentary debates already at the time the EEC Treaty was approved in 1957: the limitation of democratic representation at national level was not accompanied by parliamentary representation at the European level.³³ It is still a key concern in parliamentary debates with every amendment of the founding treaties. This also implies that right from the beginning, and at least until the moment a strong parliament had been established at European level, the role of the national parliament was viewed as part of an overall European political system.

One of the particularities of the debate in the Netherlands is the importance attributed to the European Parliament: its lack of formal powers of co-decision has been a major justification for a role for the national parliament, and its possession of co-decisive powers as a justification to tone down that role. Nevertheless, the Dutch Parliament has always been active in scrutinising European affairs, at least in certain policy sectors. In the Act on Approval of the EEC and Euratom Treaties of 1957, it was stipulated that the Government was to send Parliament an annual overview of the development of European integration. This is the legal basis for an annual debate on European integration, since 1999, called ‘the State of the Union debate’ in which Dutch Members of the European Parliament (MEPs) participate.³⁴ Possibly the very first national parliamentary Resolution on guaranteeing the role of a national parliament was adopted by the Netherlands Lower House (Tweede Kamer) on 11 January 1967:

³¹ C-26/62 Van Gend en Loos v. Administratie der Belastingen [1963] ECR 00003.

³² C-6/64 Costa v. ENEL. [1964] ECR 01141.

³³ At the time, this may have been inspired by similar concerns expressed in the Bundestag. The proposals for a resolution of the Bundestag were included in the parliamentary documents of the States General, see Bijlagen Handelingen TK [Parliamentary Documents Lower House] 1956–1957, 4725, No. 14.

The House, ... judges that the Netherlands Government shall not agree to definitive decisions in the Council on Community measures concerning the size and distribution of the tax burden unless it has previously consulted the Netherlands Parliament.³⁵

A similar veto right was introduced in the acts approving the Schengen Convention, the Maastricht Treaty, and repeated in the acts approving the Nice and Amsterdam treaties, as regards binding EU decisions on justice and home affairs. These were largely abolished on the approval of the Lisbon Treaty with the justification that those decisions were at that time within the powers of the European Parliament as a co-legislator. This shows the old concern for democratic parliamentary representation at the European level as adequate compensation for diminished democratic legitimacy at the national level. On a critical note, one must wonder whether that can fully be the case, in as much as the European Parliament (EP) cannot hold individual members of the Council or European Council to account; the Netherlands Parliament could, however, effectively sanction a minister or the prime minister for positions taken there. The assumption that accountability towards the EP is sufficient could give rise to the misunderstanding that the Dutch members of the Council and European Council are not accountable to the national parliament.³⁶ The pernicious effect of the Dutch approach to the democratic deficit could lead to ministers taking even less responsibility for what they agree or failed to agree to in Brussels than the low level of responsibility they are currently prepared to carry, and towards an increasingly EU-critical public opinion.³⁷

³⁴ The idea of an annual report may have been inspired by a similar undated resolution of the French Assemblée, reproduced in the Lower House parliamentary documents: ‘a. Le Gouvernement devra présenter annuellement au Parlement, en vue de son approbation, un compte rendu de l'application du Traité de Communauté Economique Européenne et des mesures économiques fiscales et sociales intervenues dans la Communauté, en exposant les mesures qu'il a prises ou qu'il entend prendre pour faciliter l'adaptation des activités nationales aux nouvelles conditions du Marché.’

³⁵ Motie (Resolution) introduced by MPs Berg c.s. 11 January 1967. Bijlage Handelingen Tweede Kamer (Appendix to the Minutes of the Lower House), 1966–1967, 8556, No. 8.

³⁶ For an analysis of the influence on parliamentary scrutiny after the abolition of the parliamentary veto right, see Besselink 2012a.

³⁷ Eijsbouts 2014, pp. 13–15.

1.4.2 When the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe was up for approval and several Member States decided to hold a referendum on it, the Dutch Government followed suit at the request of three pro-European Members of Parliament. The Constitution does not provide for referendums, but it does not forbid them either, as long as they are advisory only.³⁸ Although between 2002 and 2005 there was a Temporary Referendum Act containing general rules for advisory corrective referendums, no national referendum had been held in the Netherlands for nearly 200 years. There was, thus, no experience with the instrument when the referendum on the Constitutional Treaty was held on the basis of a separate Referendum Act in June 2005.

Asked for advice about the referendum, the Council of State stated – in a fairly sober and balanced opinion – that given the character of the Treaty, its ratification could to a certain extent be compared to an amendment of the Constitution, and a referendum would offer a realistic means to involve voters. When the Dutch people voted the Constitutional Treaty down and the Lisbon Treaty was up for ratification, that opinion would haunt the Council. The Government consulted the Council again, asking whether approval of the Lisbon Treaty would require a referendum, given that it largely resembled the Constitutional Treaty. This time, the Council of State opined that the Lisbon Treaty, in view of its contents, method and ambition, fitted in the existent process and that the changes made after the referendum (abandoning the concept of one written constitutional document, the deletion of the Charter from the body of the Treaty, the clearer demarcation of the competences of the Union and the omission of the symbols of European unification) had to be seen as a whole, and justified the choice for a ‘normal’ approval by way of an ordinary Act of Parliament and for not holding a referendum.³⁹

Among ideas to make further European integration dependent on more strictly democratic procedures, we already mentioned the bill introducing a qualified majority of two-thirds of the vote and the request for referendums that was rejected in the Lower House (see Sects. 1.2.3–1.2.4 above).

In the meantime, the same private initiative that requested referendums for further transfers of powers managed to collect 300,000 signatures to require a referendum on the Act approving the Association Agreement with Ukraine under the new Consultative Referendum Act 2014.⁴⁰ The promoters of the referendum acknowledged that the Act might not be the best subject for an EU referendum, but they considered it the only feasible manner to have the European project put before the people. The attempt of a citizen to ask the Council of State for an injunction against the referendum was declared inadmissible for lack of personal interest.⁴¹ In the referendum, 61% of voters voted against the Act, with a turnout of 32% – the ‘no’ vote comprising less than 20% of the electorate (which is slightly lower in proportion to the Members of Parliament who voted against the approval of the Association Agreement).⁴² The result is not binding, but the Government must reconsider. The Prime Minister announced that the Association Agreement would not be ratified ‘unconditionally’, but postponed any decisions until after the Dutch EU presidency in the first half of 2016. In the meantime, the Netherlands Government negotiated a decision of 15 December 2016 of the European Council, mainly of an interpretative nature, to the Association Agreement, which was subsequently approved by Parliament.⁴³ The Consultative Referendum Act was revoked in 2018.

³⁸ A binding referendum is unconstitutional, since the power to create Acts of Parliament – and therefore the power to approve treaties – is vested explicitly in the legislature: the Government and Parliament jointly, in accordance with the procedure laid down in Arts. 81–88 of the Constitution.

³⁹ Advisory Opinion of the Council of State, 15 February 2008, W01.08.0004/I/K, Kamerstukken II 2007/08, 31 384 (R 1850), No. 4.

⁴⁰ Wet van 30 september 2014, houdende regels inzake het raadgevend referendum (Wet raadgevend referendum).

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 Not applicable.

1.5.2

(a) The Constitution has not been amended thus far, for several reasons. First and foremost, the constitutional framework is considered sufficient to support participation in the European Union. There is, thus, no perceived need for constitutional amendment. Secondly, constitutional amendment is tedious and difficult, and politicians seek to avoid it when they can. Thirdly, the political elite may well prefer the current flexibility towards European integration and would prefer not to make it more difficult for the state to make a political decision to participate in further steps in European integration. In the Dutch constitutional culture, this type of decision is considered first and foremost a political decision, which should not be in the hands of lawyers and courts, but of politicians, i.e. the representatives of the people in Parliament, as well as the Government.

(b) There is no widely shared feeling among constitutional scholars that the European deficit in the Dutch Constitution threatens the societal relevance of the Constitution. In fact, there is a widely shared consensus among constitutional lawyers that the relevance of the Constitution is limited generally, because of the absence of constitutional review, and the particular structure of the fundamental chapter in the Constitution that generally allows the legislature to restrict the rights the Constitution grants to individuals. So on the whole, there is not a general feeling of ‘waning constitutionalism’ as a consequence of European integration.

⁴¹ Afdeling bestuursrechtspraak (Raad van State), decision of 26 October 2015, ECLI:NL:RVS:2015:3399.

⁴² Under the Act, the outcome of the referendum is valid if 30% of voters turn out. The outcome is not binding, but it appears politically difficult to ignore the clear majority of the vote, even though the no-vote represents only a small minority of the electorate.

⁴³ See European Council Conclusions, Brussels, 15 December 2016, EUCO 34/16, Annex.

1.5.3 In line with the recommendations of a majority of the 2009–2010 Constitutional Committee, the authors of this report are in favour of introducing the requirement of a qualified majority of two-thirds of the vote in Parliament for the approval of treaties that have a major influence on the functioning of the constitutional order of the Netherlands – this would typically apply to the amendment of the founding Treaties of the European Union. We support the view of half of the members of that Committee that it is desirable to subject the application of international decision-making to the minimum requirements of a democratic state under the rule of law, as the Committee proposed to introduce in a new first article of the Constitution (see above Sect. 1.1). This we perceive not as a brake on European integration or on international cooperation, but as both mirroring and actively contributing to the substantive constitutionalisation of the European and international legal orders.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Fundamental rights are contained in the first chapter of the Constitution. General principles, such as legal certainty and proportionality, are not as such mentioned in the text of the Constitution. Constitutional rights do not, however, offer strong protection against the primary legislature. The Constitution proclaims rights, but then often allows the primary legislature to limit these rights, without, however, carving out the precise conditions for such limitations.⁴⁴ Moreover, constitutional rights are not justiciable in such cases, given the absence of judicial review of Acts of Parliament against the provisions of the Constitution. International conventions, such as the ECHR, the ICCPR and the EU Charter are better enforceable than rights contained in the Constitution. As a consequence, the Constitution is also often considered to be less meaningful in the political process than human rights treaties, more specifically the ECHR.

2.1.2 There is no general limitation clause in the Constitution, and the specific provisions containing rights offer the legislature significant leeway to restrict rights.

⁴⁴ By way of example: Art. 8 reads: ‘The right of association is recognized. This right may be restricted by Act of Parliament in the interest of public order.’

2.1.3 The principle of ‘rechtsstatelijkheid’ (rule of law) is not laid down in the text of the Constitution, but is considered a general principle of law. Several elements of the rule of law are included in the constitutional text, such as the right to be heard (Art. 17 Constitution). The case law in this matter, however, is mainly built on Art. 6 ECHR.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 Given the limited legal effectiveness of constitutional rights, EU law is hardly considered a threat to those rights in general. It has been argued, however, that EU law does contain a bias in favour of free movement over fundamental rights,⁴⁵ while others have argued that EU law offers sufficient ways to balance fundamental rights and economic freedoms, and that there is no bias for one over the other.⁴⁶ Some authors have argued that the advent of the binding EU Charter increases fundamental rights protection in the Netherlands, given the procedural advantages of EU law over ECHR law.⁴⁷

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

Overview of the national implementation of the EAW and the human rights clause The EAW was implemented in Dutch legislation in the Overleveringswet 2004 (OLW).^{48,49}

This Act contains a number of provisions that seem to add fundamental rights guarantees over and above what the Framework Decision⁵⁰ provides for.

First, Art. 11 of the OLW provides for a general fundamental rights exception if the court has sufficient grounds founded in facts and circumstances to suspect a ‘flagrant breach’ of the ECHR.⁵¹ It does not mention Art. 6 TEU or the EU Charter

⁴⁵ John Morijn 2006.

⁴⁶ Sybe de Vries 2016.

⁴⁷ Morijn et al. 2015.

⁴⁸ The authors are grateful for very significant preparatory research on this question by Xanthe Born.

⁴⁹ Law on the surrender of persons (Overleveringswet), Stb. 2004, 195, 11 May 2004.

⁵⁰ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁵¹ ‘Overlevering wordt niet toegestaan in gevallen, waarin naar het oordeel van de rechtbank een op feiten en omstandigheden gebaseerd gegronde vermoeden bestaat, dat inwilliging van het which are explicitly mentioned in Art. 1(3) of the Framework Decision. The provision is extremely restrictive, as it is reserved to cases of suspicion of ‘flagrant breach’ of the ECHR. Both elements are remarkable: in the implementation of EU law, EU fundamental rights – mainly the EU Charter – are primary, rather than the ECHR, even if the latter provides the minimum level of protection and defines the interpretation of the Charter (Art. 52(3) Charter). The restriction to cases of ‘flagrant’ breaches offers less protection than the ECHR, as the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) does not impose such a high threshold in cases of violations of Art. 3 ECHR. As such, this restriction would also infringe the duty contained in the Charter to respect the minimum level of protection contained in the ECHR (Arts. 52(3) and 53 Charter). The Dutch court that is competent to hear EAW cases as a court of sole instance from which no appeal is possible, the District Court of Amsterdam, has solved this problem to some extent by qualifying a breach of Art. 3 ECHR as ‘flagrant’ in itself.⁵² Yet, arguments based on unfair trial have not been very successful in the Netherlands, and the courts have typically made reference to *Jeremy F*⁵³ and the ECtHR. Whenever a court had doubts about the prison conditions in the requesting Member State, after the judgment of the ECtHR in *Varga*⁵⁴ and in view of the pending reference by the Hanseatisches Oberlandesgericht in Bremen to the Court of Justice of the European Union in Aranyosi,⁵⁵ the court would suspend all pending cases concerning delivery to Hungary.⁵⁶ Below we discuss how courts have acted subsequent to Aranyosi (Sect. 2.3.1 in fine).

verzoek zou leiden tot flagrante schending van de fundamentele rechten van de betrokken persoon, zoals die worden gewaarborgd door het op 4 november 1950 te Rome tot stand gekomen Europees Verdrag tot bescherming van de rechten van de mens en de fundamentele vrijheden.’ (Surrender shall not be allowed in cases where, in the opinion of the court, there is justified suspicion, based on facts and circumstances, that granting the request would lead to flagrant breach of fundamental rights of the person concerned, as guaranteed by the [ECHR]).

⁵² Rb. Amsterdam, 22 October 2010, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2010:BO1448.

⁵³ Case C-168/13 PPU F. [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:358.

⁵⁴ ECtHR, 10 March 2015, Varga and Others v. Hungary, Nos. 14097/12, 45135/12, 73712/12, 34001/13, 44055/13 and 64586/13.

⁵⁵ Joined cases C-404/15 and C-659/15 PPU Aranyosi and Căldăraru [2016] ECLI:EU:C:2016:198.

⁵⁶ See Rb. Amsterdam, 17 November 2015, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2015:7977 and press release by the District Court of Amsterdam, 31 December 2015, <https://www.rechtspraak.nl/Organisatie-en-contact/Organisatie/Rechtbanken/Rechtbank-Amsterdam/Nieuws/Paginas/Schending-mensenrechten-in-Hongaarse-gevangenissen.aspx>.

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1–2.3.1.2 To the chagrin of the European Commission,⁵⁷ a defence of innocence is provided for in the Overleveringswet as an additional ground for refusal beyond those mentioned in the Framework Decision. The District Court has to refuse surrender if it is impossible that a suspicion of guilt can apply to the requested person with regard to the facts for which his surrender is requested (Art. 28(3) OLW). The District Court of Amsterdam must examine the claim of innocence of the requested person, which must be made prior to the hearing and supported with evidence during the hearing (Art. 26(4) OLW).

Although there is abundant case law on the EAW combined with the presumption of innocence, in the published case law there are only two decisions in which reliance on this principle has provided grounds to refuse surrender. The judicial assumption is that it is for the issuing state to assess such appeals, as they have full knowledge of the case file. Exemplary is the case of 25 April 2008⁵⁸ in which the Court stated that reliance on the presumption of innocence in the sense of Art. 6 ECHR is irrelevant in surrender proceedings in the executing state and must be left to the issuing authority. This is remarkable, as Art. 26(4) OLW is explicit that the Court must examine any claim concerning the presumption of innocence.

Of the two cases in which reliance on the principle of innocence was successful, in one case the requested person was able to produce a hospital report showing that he was in treatment for viral hepatitis A and B at the time he was said to have committed criminal offences in Germany. The court considered this report sufficient to prove that he was innocent.⁵⁹

In the other case, the requested person produced a document that proved he was preventively detained at the time some of the criminal offences were committed for which his surrender was requested, which led the Court to decide to refuse the EAW partially, that is to say for the offences for which the actual presence of the requested person during the commission of the criminal offences was necessary. His physical presence was not necessary for the commitment of the other offences and thus his surrender was allowed for those.⁶⁰

Finally, it must be signalled that although the Netherlands' implementing legislation does not incorporate a proportionality test, the Court often reviews the ⁵⁷ Report from the Commission based on Art. 34 of the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, Brussels: 23 February 2005, COM(2005) 63 final, p. 8; criticism on the part of Dutch criminal lawyers has come amongst others from R. Malewicz 2006, p. 498, is shared by H. Sanders 2012, par. 6 and partly by V.H. Glerum 2013, p. 622. Sanders does not agree, however, with the Commission's assumption that the claim of innocence as a ground for refusal requires an examination in substance of the case; see Sanders 2011, pp. 119–120.

⁵⁸ ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2008:BD2475, District Court of Amsterdam, 25 April 2008, para. 9.

⁵⁹ ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2011:BR3388, District Court of Amsterdam, 27 July 2011.

⁶⁰ Ibid.

proportionality of a surrender.⁶¹ It will not surrender when it is considered disproportionate. This arguably constitutes a further breach of EU law as it adds a further ground for refusal that is not provided for in the Framework Decision.

It must be noted that the Court distinguishes ‘systemic proportionality’, i.e. that powers of the OLW to surrender a person may not exceed what is necessary to realise the objectives of the Framework Decision, from the proportionality of a surrender in a concrete case in light of the particular circumstances. The latter form of proportionality review is justified by the Court under reference to a Council Recommendation that holds that

[c]onsidering the severe consequences of the execution of an EAW as regards restrictions on physical freedom and the free movement of the requested person, the competent authorities should, before deciding to issue a warrant, bear in mind, where possible, considerations of proportionality by weighing the usefulness of the EAW in the specific case against the measure to be applied and its consequences.⁶²

It is only in the second type of proportionality review that an appeal has on rare occasions been successful. The criterion is that the surrender must be ‘disproportionally burdensome’ (onevenredig bezwarend). This has only succeeded in cases of very serious health situations that involve the certainty or high chance of death of the surrendered person.⁶³

In November 2015, the Court of Amsterdam suspended the surrender of a suspect to Hungary, and asked the Hungarian requesting authorities for more information about the prison conditions. The court referred to the preliminary reference sent by the Hanseatisches Oberlandesgericht in the Aranyosi case, in which that court cited a European Committee for the Prevention of Torture (CPT) report and the case law of the ECtHR, and held that there were indications of infringements of Art. 3 ECHR.⁶⁴ Since the decision of the ECJ in Aranyosi, the Amsterdam court has regularly applied it, and requested additional information on prison circumstances, or rejected claims that there was a real risk of inhuman or degrading treatment under Art. 4 Charter, for instance on the basis of additional

⁶¹ Out of 911 published judgments on the European Arrest Warrant decided by the Amsterdam District Court up to June 2016, the combined search terms of ‘Europees aanhoudingsbevel’ and ‘evenredigheid’ yield 59 hits; the combination of the search terms ‘Europees aanhoudingsbevel’ and ‘onevenredig bezwarend’ (‘disproportionally burdensome’), which is the criterion for proportionality in the individual case, leads to 34 hits.

⁶² See District Court Amsterdam 30 December 2008, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2008:BG9037, para. 6.3; the reference is to the Handbook on how to issue a European Arrest Warrant, 8216/1/08 REV 2 COHEN 70 EJN 26 EUROJUST 31, para. 3 ‘Criteria to apply when issuing an EAW – principle of proportionality’, p. 14. http://www.consilium.europa.eu/ueDocs/cms_Data/docs/polju/EN/EJN757.pdf.

⁶³ Two cases are District Court Amsterdam 1 March 2013, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2013:BZ3203, which is the standard to which later judgments refer, and District Court Amsterdam, 26 June 2012, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2012:BY8250.

⁶⁴ Rb Amsterdam 11 November 2015, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2015:7977.

information granted by the Romanian authorities,⁶⁵ or on the basis of general information on prison conditions in Poland.⁶⁶

2.3.2 Nullum crimen sine lege praevia

2.3.2.1 A study undertaken in 2010 indicated that until June 2010 in approximately a quarter of the cases, the courts undertook some form of dual criminality test.⁶⁷ Since 1 June 2010 approximately 300 judicial authorities have assessed around 300 EAWs in which dual criminality played a role. A test whether the relevant offence is listed in the OLW (that is identical to that of the Framework Decision) suffices. Until 2008, the courts would request the legislation of the issuing state from the issuing authority in translation (in English), but the Hoge Raad (Dutch Supreme Court) criticised this as being in conflict with the principles underlying the Framework Decision.⁶⁸ Since then, in cases of doubt, the courts will rely on the descriptions in the warrants and translate that into terms of Netherlands criminal offences, in order to assess whether the judicial authorities of the issuing state could reasonably have identified the offences as listed offences. But rarely has this been an obstacle to the surrender of the requested person. There are around 30 cases (out of slightly over 650) before the District Court of Amsterdam to be found where the requested person claimed that the listed offence and the facts as described in the EAW were in ‘obvious conflict’. In three cases, this claim proved to be successful.⁶⁹

2.3.3 Trial In Absentia

2.3.3.1 The optional grounds for refusal in the revised Framework Decision of 2009 concerning trial in absentia is implemented differently and turned into a mandatory ground for refusal in the OLW (Art. 12). In the literature, this is justified with reference to the *Wolzenburg*⁷⁰ judgment of the Court of Justice, and it is pointed out ⁶⁵ Rb Amsterdam 2 May 2016, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2016:2629 (Romania). The court considered the information granted by the Romanian authorities sufficient to decide that the prison conditions had been improved since the decisions of the ECtHR relating to the relevant prison.

⁶⁶ Rb Amsterdam 24 May 2016, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2016:3081 (Poland). The court considered the evidence adduced (ECtHR decisions dating back to 2009 and 2010 and a CPT report of 2014) insufficient to qualify the general prison conditions in Poland as a real risk of inhuman and degrading treatment.

⁶⁷ Kurtovic and Langbroek 2010, p. 4.

⁶⁸ HR 8 July 2008, para. 3.5.2, ECLI:NL:HR:2008:BD2447.

⁶⁹ District Court of Amsterdam, 26 August 2011, para. 5, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2011:BR7003; District Court of Amsterdam, 7 October 2011, para. 4, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2011:BT7217; District Court of Amsterdam, 25 June 2013, para. 4.1, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2013:3852.

⁷⁰ Case C-123/08 Dominic Wolzenburg [2009] ECR I-09621.

that the implementing act does not broaden the cases in which surrender is to be refused. In the judgment of 16 June 2016 of the District Court of Amsterdam which followed up the judgment of the Court of Justice of 24 May 2016 in the case of *Pawel Dworzecki*⁷¹ that the district court had referred, it relied moreover on the written answer of the Netherlands Government to a question posed by the Court of Justice on the reasons for introducing this mandatory ground. The Government stated that the reason for this was ‘the protection of the right to a fair trial and for reason of creating clear and transparent criteria for the judicial authorities to decide whether to refuse the execution of an EAW’.⁷² In Dworzecki, the issue concerned the question to what extent an executing judicial authority must ascertain whether the person tried in absentia had been informed of the trial, or must rely on an assessment by the issuing authority. Dworzecki and its follow-up clearly demonstrate how the principle of mutual recognition is subjected to restrictions informed by the right to a fair trial and the principle of legal certainty.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 As was the case elsewhere, questions were also raised in the Netherlands about the usefulness and necessity of the Data Retention Directive.⁷³ During the parliamentary proceedings leading to the adoption of the Data Retention Act 2009, the issue of privacy was heavily debated.⁷⁴ The core issue was whether the Act would pass muster in the light of the right to privacy as protected under Art. 8 ECHR and Art. 10 of the Constitution. Given the fact that the Constitution does not contain a general reference framework for limitation (see above Sect. 2.1.1), the focus of attention was on Art. 8 ECHR. In the Upper House (the Dutch Senate), reference was made to the Vorratsdatenspeicherung decision⁷⁵ of the German Federal Constitutional Court. In light of possible effects on privacy, in the end the choice was made for a retention period of one year for fixed and mobile telephony

⁷¹ Case C-108/16 PPU Dworzecki [2016] ECLI:EU:C:2016:346.

⁷² District Court Amsterdam 16 June 2016, ECLI:NL:RBAMS:2016:3643, para. 5.4 in fine.

⁷³ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁷⁴ On the background and application of the Dutch implementing Act, see G Odinet et al., The Dutch implementation of the Data Retention Directive. On the storage and use of telephone and internet traffic data for crime investigation purposes, Eleven International Publishing (2014); WODC Report 310a, (2014), available at <https://www.wodc.nl/onderzoeksdatabase/ov-201402-the-dutch-implementation-of-the-data-retention-directive.aspx> (the WODC is the Research and Documentation Centre of the Ministry for Security and Justice and aims to make a professional contribution to development and evaluation of justice policy set by the Ministry).

⁷⁵ BVerfG, Urteil des Ersten Senats vom 02. März 2010 - 1 BvR 256/08 - Rn. (1-345), BVerfGE 125, 260.

and six months for internet data (as opposed to 18 months in the original proposal and 12 months after the debate in the Lower House).

The Senate remained critical and kept an eye on European developments pertaining to data retention. For example, the Senate's objections to data retention were voiced in the permanent justice committee's report on the assessment of the Data Retention Directive.⁷⁶ These concerns included a brief yet convincing analysis of the absence of pressing social need, and that not enough attention was being paid to the proportionality of the measure.

The Data Retention Act was never challenged in court, until the Court of Justice invalidated the Data Retention Directive in Digital Rights.⁷⁷ In several criminal cases courts have rejected the argument that evidence used on the basis of data retained under the Act could not be used, since the EU Directive on which it was based had been declared invalid. The reason for this rejection is that it is not the Data Retention Act 2009 that allowed the use of that information, but the relevant provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Moreover, the case law of the Hoge Raad is very restrictive in disallowing unlawfully procured evidence: the unlawfulness that resides in an infringement of the right to a fair trial is distinct from that of other fundamental rights, in the sense that an infringement of, for instance, the right to privacy must be shown also to amount to an infringement of the right to a fair trial, which is not necessarily so.⁷⁸

A different case ended in the Tax Chamber of the Court of Appeal of 's-Hertogenbosch, on 27 March 2015, that found that the use of the data collected with police cameras for the purpose of uncovering tax fraud in relation to the private use of company cars, and for which the data retention period was set in the tax legislation at seven years, had an adequate legal basis and was not disproportionate in the case adjudicated. It considered in this respect that the data retained in this case did not concern data retention in the sense of the Directive, and that Digital Rights did not affect the tax legislation. It then reviewed this legislation against Art. 8 ECHR. It stated that the seven-year period was related to the not unreasonable time limit for the tax authorities to be able to assess or re-assess tax obligations of citizens, and that it was up to the legislature to attune the tax legislation with the principles of data protection.

Given the extensive reliance on telecommunications in criminal cases and law enforcement, it is questionable whether Dutch courts would easily have come to a judgment like the Court of Justice. However, once either the European Court of Justice or the European Court of Human Rights has adjudicated, Dutch courts mostly apply the reasoning of the relevant European court to cases they are confronted with.

⁷⁶ Evaluation of the Data Retention Directive (Evaluatie van de richtlijn gegevensbewaring), a report of the Committee to the Council and the European Parliament, (Richtlijn 2006/24/EG). Preparatory Memorandum (Senate), 2010/11, 32 797, A.

⁷⁷ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

⁷⁸ A major example is Court of Appeal [Gerechtshof] Amsterdam, 27 May 2014, ECLI:NL:GHAMS:2014:2028.

This was the case with the District Court of The Hague that rendered the Act inoperative on 11 March 2015 in summary proceedings.⁷⁹ The power of civil courts to render inoperative any legislative act if it is ‘manifestly unlawful’ is based on case law of the Hoge Raad and extends to manifest incompatibility with directly effective provisions of treaties or of decisions of international organisations, or with directly effective EU law.

Before the Act was rendered inoperative, a Member of Parliament had presented a bill with a view to withdrawing the Act of 2009 and reinstating the prior regime. The Council of State has criticised the bill for not sufficiently distinguishing between general data and data related to the investigation of (serious) crime, thus not complying with Digital Rights sufficiently.⁸⁰ The bill is pending in the Lower House (June 2016).

The Government published a preliminary draft of its own intended legislation for consultation with the general public in November 2014, which introduced a somewhat stricter judicial scrutiny prior to requesting data, a limitation to more serious criminal offences as regards the possibility to request data and the obligation to store data within the EU. This legislation was criticised by several NGOs, amongst other reasons because it still did not differentiate between the retention of general data indiscriminately and the retention of data of suspects or related to suspicions of criminal offences and the proportionality of the time limits. A year later, the Government announced that a bill had been approved by the Council of Ministers and would be submitted for advice to the Council of State. Since at the time of writing of this report (July 2016) the bill has not been introduced in Parliament, we may assume that the Council of State had objections, which the Government has not yet been able to overcome.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 The legislation in the Netherlands concerning the publication of legislative, regulatory, delegated and executive acts is such that the principle of legal certainty prevails: citizens cannot be bound by unpublished legislation of any kind.⁸¹ The principle of publicity of legislation does not mean, however, that executive regulations that have no external effect towards citizens are not published and does not mean that they are invalid. The only effect of unpublished legislation or rules or regulations is that they cannot bind citizens.

For the purpose of the effect of international treaty provisions or of decisions of international organisations, the general rule is that they must be published in the

⁷⁹ Rb Den Haag, Decision of 11 March 2015, ECLI:NL:RBDHA:2015:2498.

⁸⁰ The bill and the advisory opinion of the Council of State are published in the parliamentary documents, Tweede Kamer, 33 939, Nos. 1–3.

⁸¹ See also Sect. 3.4.1 for reference to relevant case law.

Tractatenblad (the official journal in which treaties and certain decisions of international organisations are published)⁸² and they are considered to have been so published as of the first day of the second calendar month after the date of issue of the relevant Tractatenblad. However, personal notification of the relevant treaty provisions (or provisions of decisions of international organisations) to the persons involved in order to bind them, is regarded as publication with regard to them if this binding effect is mentioned in the notification.⁸³

Quasi-legislation (beleidsregels), that is to say executive regulatory acts without a basis in an Act of Parliament – usually instructions or guidelines concerning the manner in which a public authority shall exercise administrative discretion – can be relied on by citizens if they are published; they create the reasonable expectation that the relevant authority will act in accordance with the policy announced.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 Here, what we mentioned above applies: once either the European Court of Justice or the European Court of Human Rights has adjudicated, Dutch courts mostly apply the reasoning of the relevant European court to cases they are confronted with, but prior to that there is a distinct deference towards the legislature.⁸⁴ See also Sect. 2.8 below.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 In its advisory opinion on the approval of the ESM Treaty and the decision amending Art. 136 TFEU, the Council of State signalled that it considered the democratic control mechanisms deficient. Starting from the presumption that control mechanisms should be organised at the level of the decisions, it voiced its strong preference for a European mechanism, which national parliaments could only partially compensate for. Nevertheless, the Council of State considered the economic urgency of the matter and the choice for a common mechanism to be more important than the deficiencies that it signalled. Given the absence of involvement of the EP, the Council of State was of the opinion that there should be a guarantee in national law securing the democratic control of the acts of the minister in ESM decision-making. Furthermore, it urged the legislature to foresee that an increase of the capital could only be approved after agreement by the Parliament.

⁸² Rijkswet goedkeuring en bekendmaking verdragen (Act on the Approval and Publication of Treaties), Arts. 16–19.

⁸³ Rijkswet goedkeuring en bekendmaking verdragen, Art. 20.

⁸⁴ See Claes and Gerards 2012, p. 643, with references to relevant legal commentary.

The Lower House has adopted a resolution specifying that every decision to grant financial assistance outside of the pledged amount of capital will be tabled in the Lower House because the transfer of these funds directly impacts the budgetary power of Parliament. The Government has promised to respect the resolution in a policy note on how it will involve Parliament in these decisions. Any application outside of the pledged amount of capital will be agreed with the Lower House. With respect to individual applications falling within the pledged amount, the Government will closely inform the Chamber. Legal commentators have described this ‘working agreement’ as an empty shell, arguing that in practice and towards the other Member States, the Government will be bound by the obligation, even if the Parliament would veto it. As such, this working agreement can only have political effects.⁸⁵

Geert Wilders, leader of the Eurosceptic and populist Party for Freedom (PVV), brought proceedings in court asking for an injunction preventing the state from approving and ratifying the ESM Treaty. At the time, the Government did not have full powers: the Government had resigned and elections were impending. The judge denied the action, holding that the claim asked him to intervene in the legislative process, which the Constitution bestows on the Government and the Parliament acting together (Art. 81 Constitution). The decision is fully in line with the very restricted role of the courts in European integration policy and political participation in the EU.⁸⁶

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1–2.8.4 Dutch courts have never claimed jurisdiction to review the constitutionality of EU secondary law. The primacy of EU law is deeply ingrained in the minds of Dutch lawyers, and it is so on grounds of the very nature of EU law.⁸⁷ Even the very open norms of the Constitution concerning the applicability and primacy of international treaties are not considered applicable in this respect. Constitutional review of EU law is out of the question. There is no equivalent of Solange in the Netherlands.

More recently, scholars have spoken about the added value of the EU Charter over and beyond the ECHR. The Dutch system of fundamental rights protection is highly dependent on human rights treaties, mainly the ICCPR and ECHR. The Charter is viewed as an additional tool in the hands of the Dutch courts.⁸⁸ One example from the judicial practice is the case of foreigners claiming to be eligible for an asylum residence permit on grounds of their sexual orientation. The Administrative Jurisdiction Division of the Council of State, upon a preliminary reference to the ECJ, decided that if the Secretary of State holds a claimed sexual orientation for an established fact, or deems it credible, it is, according to the X, Y and Z decision of the Court of 7 November 2013,⁸⁹ in breach of Arts. 9 and 10 of Directive 2004/83⁹⁰ to require restraint from an applicant in giving substance to his orientation in his country of origin, even if the ECtHR seems to require restraint from an applicant if this allows him to prevent inhuman treatment.⁹¹

⁸⁵ Diamant and van Emmerik 2013, p. 102.

⁸⁶ Rb Den Haag, Decision of 1 June 2012, ECLI:NL:RBSGR:2012:BW7242.

⁸⁷ See e.g. Morijn et al. 2015, p. 124.

However, there has been at least one instance where a Dutch court, in this case the College van Beroep voor het Bedrijfsleven,⁹² has applied the *Bosphorus*⁹³ presumption and applied only a marginal review of a decision applying EU law.⁹⁴ This approach, whereby a national court would decline to review compliance with the ECHR on the basis of the Bosphorus presumption, could threaten the protection of human rights. Such a stance, however, misinterprets Bosphorus, since it concerns only the review by the ECtHR itself and presumes that the national courts and the ECJ have actually applied the EU fundamental rights standards. The case pre-dates the entry into force of the Charter, and the presumption does not seem to have been applied since.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 The question whether the Dutch constitutional system has a rule of parliamentary reservation of law, e.g. that penalties (also beyond criminal law), taxes, obligations, etc., must only be imposed by a parliamentary statute, and whether this

⁸⁸ This assumption is central to e.g. Morijn et al. 2015; Barkhuysen et al. 2011, sect. 3; Van Harten and Grootelaar 2014.

⁸⁹ Joined cases C 199/12 to C 201/12 X and Others [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:720.

⁹⁰ Council Directive 2004/83/EC of 29 April 2004 on minimum standards for the qualification and status of third country nationals or stateless persons as refugees or as persons who otherwise need international protection and the content of the protection granted, [2004] OJ L 304/12.

⁹¹ With reference to F.G. v. Sweden, No. 43611/11, 16 January 2014 and M.E. v. Sweden, No. 71398/12, 26 June 2014.

⁹² The highest administrative court for social and economic matters.

⁹³ Bosphorus Hava Yolları Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Şirketi v. Ireland [GC], No. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

⁹⁴ Nevertheless, the court also emphasised that in a non-EU related case, and applying the normal standards, the ECtHR had not found a violation of Art. 6 ECHR, CBB, 24 April 2008, ECLI:NL:CBB:2008:BD0646. See also Rb Den Haag, 23 June 2009, ECLI:NL:RBSGR:2009:BJ0893 (where Bosphorus was referred to, but not applied).

rule has been affected by EU/international law, is an intricate issue which has various aspects.

Briefly, the Constitution (Grondwet) reserves several issues to a parliamentary legislative act, wet. These include the restriction of the exercise of certain fundamental rights (rules on extradition (Art. 2(3) Const – which also provides that extradition can only take place pursuant to a treaty); the right to leave the country (Art. 2(4) Const); the right to vote and to be elected (Art. 5); the right to profess one's faith or belief (Art. 6(1)), although the exercise in public places can be restricted with a view to traffic safety and to prevent disorder (Art. 6(2)) on the basis of delegation by Act of Parliament; freedom of expression (Art. 7, with the exception of 'radio and television' that can be regulated pursuant to an Act of Parliament); freedom of association (Art. 8); restriction of freedom of assembly and of demonstration for any objective, while the restriction, on the basis of delegation by Act of Parliament, can only be with a view to regulate traffic and prevent disturbances of public order). Other restrictions of constitutional rights require a basis in an Act of Parliament, but if one exists, executive authorities or decentralised authorities can also restrict the exercise of those rights. Note that there is an absolute prohibition of censorship, which cannot be introduced even by Act of Parliament.

Other matters reserved for Parliament primarily concern organisational matters, e.g. concerning kingship (permission to marry, exclusion from the succession to the throne, on appointment of a successor if there is none under the constitutional rules, regency, etc.); electoral rules; personal pay and remuneration of the king, Members of Parliament and of Government; the establishment and abolition of provinces and municipalities and other public bodies; judicial procedure, etc.

There have been no specific problems raised with regard to these in the context of European integration, except the question we already mentioned concerning the currency at the time of the approval of the Maastricht Treaty.⁹⁵ This is mainly because legislation as constitutionally required has been passed that provides a sufficient legal basis (such as the Act implementing the EAW Framework Decision discussed in Sect. 2.3 of this report).

There is another issue which does not regard the specific provisions of the Constitution, but the general principle of legality. In the context of criminal law this requires a prior provision in an Act of Parliament before a certain behaviour or act can be punished, as in other countries (also enshrined in Art. 16 Constitution). As a broader principle of public law, the exercise of public authority that affects the rights and duties of citizens or factually is burdensome for them, requires a basis in an Act of Parliament. There is general consensus about this.

There has been an ongoing discussion whether acts of the European Union (previously EC) are a sufficient basis. In administrative law the dominant view was and still is that a directive cannot provide such a legal basis; however, there have been differences of view as regards the question whether a regulation can provide such a basis – in particular as regards the possibility of imposing the obligation to repay (EU) subsidies if these were disbursed without legal grounds.

⁹⁵ See above n. 16.

The brief answer on the rather complex developments in the case law is that by and large this is now also the view of the courts. In particular, administrative courts assume that a national public authority can derive powers from primary EU law directly, although it is mainly national law that determines which national authority is competent; moreover, national law can regulate the manner in which this authority exercises its powers. Apart from certain powers being assumed or granted under EU law (which generally addresses Member States, not specific authorities), it may in practice be required that there is a national legal basis in an Act of Parliament for empowering a public authority (sometimes referred to as double legality).

With regard to secondary EU law the courts and academic doctrine hold that a directive cannot be the exclusive basis of a public authority's powers; there must be an Act of Parliament that determines which public authority can hold a power that may exist in EU law. The same view still prevails as regards regulations, but recent case law of the Council of State and the College van bestuur voor het bedrijfsleven (The Trade and Industry Appeals Tribunal, also known as Administrative High Court for Trade and Industry)⁹⁶ suggests that if an obligation exists under EU law, a material competence under EU law is presumed and can suffice to render an authority competent.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

The particular nature of the Netherlands constitution, comprising not only the Grondwet but also human rights treaties that form an integral part of it – especially the ECHR and the UN Conventions – suggests that the commonality of constitutional traditions is in a sense incorporated into the constitutional body of fundamental rights norms. Nevertheless, it is useful to note that the provisions of international human rights treaties are meant as minimum norms, with the exception of the treaties that provide peremptory norms from which no derogation is possible, such as the UN Conventions on Genocide and on Torture. Specific norms contained in the Constitution with a higher level of protection are the absolute prohibition of censorship under Art. 7 of the Grondwet, and the right to equal financial treatment of both public and private schools (Art. 23 Grondwet). These are not matched by the human rights treaties nor can they be said to be common to the constitutional fundamental rights acquis of the other EU Member States. We can say that the supplementary role that the common constitutional traditions are assigned under Art. 6(3) TEU can contribute to the dynamics of fundamental rights protection in ⁹⁶ This is a specialised administrative court which rules on disputes in the area of social-economic administrative law, including competition law and telecommunications law.

Europe. For instance, the very restricted scope for prior permission to publish certain expressions in the case law of the ECtHR is probably inspired by the fact that this is absolutely prohibited in countries like Germany and the Netherlands. This ECtHR case law in turn translated into the ECJ taking a much more protective line than the Court of First Instance in the Connolly cases.⁹⁷ Similarly, changing attitudes towards equal treatment and non-discrimination, for instance on the basis of sexual orientation, leading to acknowledgment of same sex marriage – controversial as it may be – may also be an example of a certain dynamic that translates into changed conceptions of rights protection in the European and EU context. Perhaps the German understanding of the right to privacy in the sense of data protection is a more important and better example. Thus, what at one moment in time is a specific national understanding may either lead to a broader consensus translating into European and EU law, or to the ECJ picking up on it, creating a broader common constitutional tradition subsequently.

The dynamics can also go in another direction, as Melloni shows. The Spanish Constitutional Tribunal chose to abandon its more protective standard of a fair trial – the right to retrial after conviction in absentia – to the standard that the ECJ determined to be the uniform EU standard, also outside the scope of EU law.⁹⁸

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 As explained, the ECHR is of special importance in the Dutch legal system of fundamental rights protection, given the prohibition of judicial constitutional review. Review in the light of directly effective treaty provisions is the only tool in the hands of courts to review primary legislation. When conducting such review on the basis of Art. 94 of the Constitution, judges remain very well aware of another provision in the Constitution, Art. 120, which institutes a ban on constitutional review. Accordingly, the courts are reluctant to interpret the ECHR broadly and to offer higher protection than follows from the case law of the ECtHR. Indeed, Art. 94 allows courts to disapply provisions of primary legislation only when such application is incompatible with directly effective provisions. The courts feel that only the interpretation given by the ECtHR makes such application incompatible, not their own more stringent reading of the ECHR. Accordingly, the courts consider themselves bound by the interpretation of Strasbourg, and the ECHR minimum standard tends to become the national maximum standard.⁹⁹ Article 53 ECHR thus does not lead to higher judicial standards in the Netherlands. There are only a few aspects of the national constitutional human rights protection that are considered to offer more protection than the ECHR, namely with respect to constitutional provisions usually allowing restrictions on constitutional rights only if they are based on an Act of Parliament, and in some cases further limited to only a few public policy objectives, such as public order and safety in the clause on the protection freedom of religion (Art. 6(2) Constitution). Yet, this is of little avail to individuals seeking protection against primary legislation, given that the courts are prohibited from reviewing Acts of Parliament against the provisions of the Constitution, if the constitutionality depends on the compatibility of an Act of Parliament with the Constitution. Only if this is not the case, for instance when it concerns the compatibility of municipal by-laws with the more limited range of objectives for which certain fundamental rights can be restricted as compared with the ECHR, the national courts can provide more protection than the ECHR. In this regard the absolute prohibition of censorship in Art. 7 of the Constitution, which prohibits prior permission for any expression whatsoever, is also worth mentioning, as it goes further than Art. 10 ECHR. Although the latter provision does not as such prohibit censorship, the ECtHR allows for the requirement of prior permission, albeit in exceptional circumstances, whereas under the Netherlands Constitution prior permission cannot be allowed under any circumstances at all.

⁹⁷ Case C-274/99 P Connolly v. Commission [2001] ECR I-01611, as compared to the CFI in the same case Joined cases T-34/96 and T-163/96 [1999] FP-I-A-00087; FP-II-00463.

⁹⁸ See Besselink 2014a.

It is important to emphasise that Art. 53 Charter does not automatically make the ECHR minimum the maximum standard. Article 53 Charter does allow for higher protection on national constitutional grounds, unless such higher protection would amount to an infringement of EU law.

For the moment, the Charter is seen as increasing the protection of individuals in the Netherlands, rather than threatening the national protection. However, given the importance of the ECHR in the Dutch legal order, a lowering of the ECHR standards would be considered problematic. Yet, in light of Art. 52 of the Charter, the level of protection in EU law (whether in the Charter or primary or secondary EU law) should never fall below the minimum standard of the ECHR.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1–3.1.3 Participation in the European Union, the ratification of the European (amendment) Treaties and the effect of EU law in the domestic legal order have always been based on the general provisions concerning international treaties and international organisations. The same rules of Arts. 90–94 thus apply. Powers can be conferred on international organisations by recourse to international treaties, which require simple majority approval in Parliament, unless they deviate from the Constitution or necessitate such deviation. If that should be the case, approval requires a two-thirds majority of the votes cast. The procedure has been followed in the case of the EDC Treaty, the Treaty of 15 August 1962 with Indonesia concerning Western New Guinea and for the approval of the Statute of Rome concerning the International Criminal Court (ICC). In the latter case, the Government did not consider the treaty as ‘deviating from the Constitution or necessitating such deviation’, but the Council of State opined that it did. The Government tabled the Approval Act on the basis of Art. 91(3) ‘to the extent necessary’. The Act did not specify to what extent the treaty deviated from the Constitution, and did not stipulate the precise provisions of the Constitution from which the treaty could supposedly deviate.

⁹⁹ See Hoge Raad, 10 August 2001, ECLI:NL:HR:2001:ZC3598; see more generally, Gerards 2010.

These treaties did not require prior amendment of the Constitution. In the case of a conflict between a treaty in force and the Constitution, the former takes precedence.

Given the liberal and open approach to international cooperation, there has not been a need to incorporate specific provisions in the Constitution with respect to the ECHR, NATO, the ICC or any other international organisation.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 On the basis of Arts. 93 and 94 of the Constitution, provisions of treaty law that are ‘binding on anyone’ can be directly applied in the domestic legal order, and must be awarded priority over all provisions of national law, including the Constitution. The case law suggests that the expression ‘binding on anyone’ is equivalent to ‘direct effect’ as we know it in EU law.

The doctrine of direct effect has as a consequence that citizens cannot be bound by international norms that do not create rights or obligations for citizens directly, and to that extent can be said to protect citizens from the mutual understandings, technical or general as they might be, that might impose obligations. This could be done either by the competent state institutions like the legislature or in some cases the executive. But compliance with international agreements could also voluntarily or unilaterally be secured through private behaviour. Thus, compliance with international technical standards by industry can be achieved without state (legislative or executive) intervention. Similarly, international or transnational understandings between non-state actors can be effectuated without recourse to state intervention – whether it be the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN) standards on internet domain names, or accounting standards issued by the International Accounting Standards Board (IASB). This has always been the case, and remains so a fortiori in the context of a globalising economy and social environment.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 We have to distinguish between democratic control as regards governmental activities in negotiating treaties and its contribution to decision-making within international organisations established by treaties on the one hand, and democratic control over international governance and rule-making in which either government officials are involved together with non-state actors or in which there is no involvement of the Government or its officials.

Democratic control is constitutionally exercised through parliamentary institutions over the first category of acts. The Government is under the obligation to inform Parliament of the treaties it negotiates under the Act on the Approval and Publication of Treaties (Art. 1), and does this periodically by submitting a list of instruments that have been negotiated with an indication of the objective and whether they concern a politically sensitive or important matter. The practice of both the Lower House and Upper House as to the scrutiny of this list leaves much to be desired; often there is no more (and often less) than a superficial consultation between a committee of the House with the Minister of Foreign Affairs.¹⁰⁰ As was mentioned in Sect. 3.1, both Houses have to approve each treaty.

As regards the scrutiny of decision-making within international organisations other than the European Union, there is hardly any systematic parliamentary activity, even though decisions can be directly effective and then have priority over any conflicting legislation.

As regards the second type of activity, that is to say international governance and rule-making beyond the state, it may be useful at the outset to recall the consociationalist tradition of the Dutch constitutional tradition, in which democratic institutions had broad and deep foundations in society and its structures, well beyond the state as such (see Sect. 1.3 above). This has meant that certain democratic institutions, such as political parties and the media, have traditionally not been associated, let alone identified, with the state. ‘Self-regulation’ by sectors of the economy and non-state public actors, such as trade unions and employers organisations, both by themselves and together have been regarded as equivalent to state regulation. This has been officially promoted for instance in the fields of labour relations, wages, targets for employment of disadvantaged groups such as women or persons with disabilities, and in some cases sanctioned by state institutions, such as the legislature and the Government. Informal forms of governance beyond the state are an old phenomenon in the Netherlands. Resources of legitimacy have thus traditionally not been identified with the state, and this might contribute to a relative openness to globalisation and its legitimacy, which suits the Netherlands well in as much as its economy is one of the most exposed to the international financial, social, technological, fiscal and trade environment.

¹⁰⁰ For a critical analysis, see Besselink 2007.

There is obviously a potential problem with this approach that can be put in terms of the medieval canon law adage quod omnes tangit ab omnibus approbari debet, that can already be found in the Codex Iustiniani,¹⁰¹ where it applied within private law, but was extended to the public sphere by the conciliarist canon lawyers in the eleventh and twelfth centuries: who are the omnes that are affected and must approve? What standard of being affected should apply? Are ‘all that are affected’ only the direct ‘stakeholders’ that are actually affected, or should this include those who are potentially affected? Or are in a democracy all citizens stakeholders, and all citizens to be considered as actually or potentially affected?

The broadest democratic understanding of globalisation would require parliamentary involvement in the scrutiny of international decision-making in which the Government or its officials are involved, but parliamentary involvement might also be required with regard to the forms of rule-making and governance beyond the state, at any rate when Government or its functionaries are involved in making them, that is to say in hybrid forms of informal rulemaking and governance. This, however, is requiring more than a parliament like the States General of the Netherlands at present is aware of. Hence, globalisation has lead on the one hand to the appeal of certain scholars in the field of public administration to abolish the Parliament.¹⁰² On the other hand, there are pleas for more parliamentary awareness and attention to systematic scrutiny of international governance and decision-making in the ever denser and less transparent web of ministers, diplomats and civil servants in formal and informal networks, which should be paired with a more systematic parliamentary follow-up of the work that is already done by parliamentary delegations to such institutions as the World Bank and the IMF’s Parliamentary Network,¹⁰³ the Netherlands parliamentary delegations that every year form part of the delegation to the United Nations, and the delegations that are members of the NATO and Council of Europe Parliamentary Assemblies.¹⁰⁴

¹⁰¹ ‘CJ.5.59.5.2: Imperator Justinianus. Tunc etenim, sive testamentarii sive per inquisitionem dati sive legitimi sive simpliciter creati sunt, necesse est omnes suam auctoritatem praestare, ut, quod omnes similiter tangit, ab omnibus comprobetur.’ ([On guardianship.] Emperor Justinian. For in such cases [acts of guardianship that dissolve the guardianship] the guardians, whether testamentary statutory or appointed with or without inquiry, must all give their consent, so that what touches all, must be approved by all.) Translation by Fred Blume, <http://uwdigital.uwyo.edu/islandora/object/wyu%3A45047#page/284/mode/2up/search/5-59>.

¹⁰² In ’t Veld, R. (2002, March 22). Volksvertegenwoordiging moet worden afgeschaft (Parliament should be abolished). NRC Handelblad.

¹⁰³ See <http://www.parlnet.org/about>.

¹⁰⁴ See Besselink, above n. 98, part III.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 Here also we distinguish between forms of international law that exist under treaty law and informal international or transnational law that is made by non-state actors.

Public international law: educational sanctions against Iran As regards the first, a good example of the Dutch courts taking a ‘constitutionalist’ approach to international law is when they adjudicated the implementation of UN sanctions against Iran under Security Council Resolution 1737. This Resolution under Chapter VII of the UN Charter contains a paragraph in which the Council ‘[c]alls upon all States to exercise vigilance and prevent specialized teaching or training of Iranian nationals, within their territories or by their nationals, of disciplines which would contribute to Iran’s proliferation sensitive nuclear activities and development of nuclear weapon delivery systems’. The EU adopted a Common Position on 27 February 2007 which provides that the Member States shall, in accordance with their national legislation, take the necessary measures to prevent specialised teaching or training of Iranian nationals, within their territories or by their nationals, of disciplines which would contribute to Iran’s proliferation sensitive nuclear activities and to the development of nuclear weapon delivery systems.¹⁰⁵

This was implemented by a sanctions measure which prohibited access to data and locations mentioned in a list, and the provision of specialised, nuclear proliferation sensitive education to Iranian nationals, with the exception of academic undergraduate studies, unless exempted by the Minister. Perhaps this very strict sanctions regime was inspired by the fact that in the early 1970s, Abdul Qadeer Khan was trained in the Netherlands and put his expertise into developing the nuclear bomb for Pakistan. He also offered the designs to other states, allegedly Libya, North Korea, Iran and China, as well. However that may be, in the Iranian sanctions case the courts struck down the finding that the measure unlawfully discriminated between Iranian students and non-Iranian students unnecessarily and in an unjustified manner that is contrary to Art. 26 ICCPR and the ECHR (Art. 14 in connection with Protocol no. 1, Art. 2 and Protocol no. 12). The Hoge Raad held that the Security Council Resolution as well as the EU Common Position were binding and directly effective on the basis of Art. 94 Constitution, but indicated that the sanctions had to be in conformity with national law. It left an amount of discretion as to how to achieve the aims of the Resolution, thus necessitating acting in conformity with such international obligations as are contained in the ECHR and ICCPR.

¹⁰⁵ Article 6, Council Common Position 2007/140/CFSP of 27 February 2007 concerning restrictive measures against Iran, [2007] OJ L 61/49.

The Hoge Raad explicitly referred to the Court of Justice's judgment in Kadi I,¹⁰⁶ as the courts of lower instance had done. This confirms again that Dutch courts are prepared to take constitutionalist concerns into account by relying primarily on international human rights sources, in particular if they can find some precedent in the case law of the European Courts or other authoritative international bodies.

Informal international law: technical standards Many informal standards and rules that have been developed in a transnational context by non-state actors are of a technical nature, whatever the field of application of those standards.^{107,108} Many of the standards in the field of finance are turned into hard law via EU law, for instance the Basel Committee's standards on banking solvency, the International Organization of Securities Commission's (IOSCO) standards on trading in stock and financial trading instruments and the IASB standards on accounting have found their way into the EU Capital Requirement Directive, the Prospective Directive, the Markets in Financial Instruments Directive and the International Accounting Standards Regulation. These are then implemented or directly applied domestically.

As far as the informal international output is not mediated through EU law, the constitutional rules determining the position of formal international law in the national legal order are not really applicable in as much as these relate to treaty or treaty based law. Yet, these informal standards are applied also in law, even in the case law of the highest courts, although often this is most evident in the opinions of the Advocate General to the Hoge Raad. None of these cases have concerned in any manner a conflict between domestic law and the applicable standard, but have always involved the application of an international standard in order to determine the appropriate, but open or vague domestic legal norm.¹⁰⁹

Finally, we may refer to the Dutch case law on the principle of publicity of legislation¹¹⁰ of standards that are developed by private actors (often based on international standards or agreements) to which national legislation refers, thus rendering the private standard binding on everyone. This illustrates the approach

¹⁰⁶ Joined cases C-402/05 P and C-415/05 P Kadi and Al Barakaat International Foundation v. Council and Commission [2008] ECR I-06351.

¹⁰⁷ Hoge Raad 14 December 2014, ECLI:NL:HR:2012:BX8351.

¹⁰⁸ On private and hybrid standard setting in the Netherlands (and its elation to international and European standard setting by the ISO and ESO), Stuurman 1995; Evers 2002; Evers 1999, pp. 1814–1815; Stuurman and Wijnands 2002.

¹⁰⁹ For a case study on the Netherlands with regard to standards issued by the Basel Committee, IOSCO and IASB, see Besselink 2012b. Case law applying standards in this field is Hoge Raad, 25 November 2005, LJN: AU2275; Hoge Raad 24 April 2009, LJN: BG8790; references, sometimes elaborately, by the Advocate-General in HR 13-11-2009, LJN: BG5866; HR 16-11-2007, LJN: AZ7371. A case concerning the liability of the DNB as successor to the supervisory agency Verzekeringskamer, is Hoge Raad, C04/279HR 13-10-2006, LJN: AW2077, in which it concludes to a marginal form of review, taking into account the discretion of the supervisor. The Advocate-General in this case explicitly referred to the first of the Basel Committee's 'Core Principles for Effective Banking Supervision', concerning 'legal protection' for the supervisors as a starting point for the assessment of liability.

¹¹⁰ See also Sect. 2.5 above.

taken to private regulation. In the leading case on this matter, Knooble,¹¹¹ the issue was that a technical standard that was legally binding on architects and builders was available only after payment of a considerable sum of money to the standardisation institute involved, the Netherlands Standardization Institute (NEN), whose major income derives from such payments. Knooble complained in court that by legislative reference to the relevant NEN-standards, these became binding on private citizens; however, these have not been published in conformity with the Constitution and organic legislation on the publication of legislative acts, and hence were not binding on it. At first instance the District Court of The Hague held that indeed the relevant standards became legislation and hence would need to be published in accordance with the relevant constitutional and legislative provisions, in the absence of which they could not be binding. On appeal, the Court of Appeal of The Hague reversed this judgment. The reversal was upheld by the Hoge Raad. It considered that the references in the applicable legislation did not render the standards binding legislation: the NEN-standards have not been set by a body pursuant to a legislative power attributed or delegated to it by the Constitution or an Act of Parliament, and are hence not legislative acts which need to comply with the applicable rules on publication and accessibility of legislative acts.^{112,113} Significantly, the Hoge Raad added that although the standards are not legislative in character, they are indeed ‘norms’ that are generally binding on private parties.¹¹⁴ This confirms the view that citizens can be bound both by official legislation as well as by privately established norms that are generally binding by reference to them in official legislation.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 The Netherlands has a set of social rights provisions in the first chapter of the Constitution, and is a party to all human rights instruments that guarantee social rights, both in the UN and European contexts. However, the legal status of these rights is quite weak. Neither the national constitutional nor the international social rights provisions are deemed enforceable in court and they are generally considered to not be directly effective. In the political discourse, with few exceptions, these rights do not play a prominent role, and usually only play any role at all in a rather distant background.

¹¹¹ District Court The Hague 31 December 2008, ECLI:NL:RBSGR:2008: BG8465; Court of Appeal The Hague 16 November 2010, ECLI:NL:GHSGR:2010:BO4175; Hoge Raad [Supreme Court] 22 June 2012, ECLI:NL:HR:2012:BW0393 respectively.

¹¹² Ibid., para. 3.8.

¹¹³ The Netherlands Raad van State [Council of State] reached a similar conclusion in a case decided on 2 February 2011, ECLI:NL:RVS:2011:BP2750.

¹¹⁴ HR 22 June 2012, para. 3.12.

One exception might be the debate in 2014 and 2015 on the most minimal support for illegal migrants that have lost the right to remain and are supposed to leave the country, the so-called ‘bed, bath and bread’ facility, which even nearly led to a cabinet crisis in 2015.

In decisions of the European Committee of Social Rights, the supervisory committee of the European Social Charter (published 1 November 2014), in two cases brought by the Council of European Churches v. the Netherlands (No. 90/2013) and the European Federation of National Organisations working with the homeless (FEANTSA) v. the Netherlands (No. 86/2012), the Committee held that withholding food, water, housing and clothes from aliens who are not lawfully residing in the Netherlands is an infringement of Art. 13(4) and 31 of the European Social Charter.

Although these provisions of the European Social Charter are not directly effective in the sense of Art. 94 Constitution, nor are the views of the Committee legally binding, the Centrale Raad van Beroep, the competent highest administrative court, decided that the views of the Committee must be taken into account in its interpretation and application of Arts. 3 and 8 ECHR. On that basis it gave an injunction to provide for a basic arrangement of facilities, to wit a shower, a bed for the night, breakfast and an evening meal ('bed, bath and bread') during a period of two months in relevant cases.¹¹⁵ This case law necessitated a policy change for the Government of the day, which nearly collapsed under the divergences within the coalition over the details of arranging for the minimum facility, which was overcome by a political compromise, the details of which remain unclear in practice, but which gives municipalities leeway to provide minimum support.

References

- Barkhuysen T., Bos A.W., ten Have F. (2011) Een verkenning van de betekenis van het Handvest van de Grondrechten van de Europese Unie voor het privaatrecht. Deel 2: De verhouding van het Handvest tot het EVRM en de meerwaarde van het Handvest (An exploration of the meaning of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union for private law). Nederlands Tijdschrift voor Burgerlijk Recht (NTBR) 28(10):547–557.
- Besselink L.F.M. (2002–2003) De constitutionele bepalingen over verdragen die van de Grondwet afwijken en de opdracht van bevoegdheid aan internationale organisaties (The constitutional provisions on treaties that diverge from the Constitution and on the attribution of powers to international organisations). Kamerstuk [Parliamentary Document] 27 484 (R 1669), 2002–2003, nr. 289, second reprint.
- Besselink L.F.M. (2003) Becoming a party to treaties which diverge from the Constitution. EPL 9 (4):471–480.

¹¹⁵ Centrale Raad van beroep 17 December 2014, ECLI:NL:CRVB:2014:4259.

- Besselink L.F.M. (2004a) Constitutional Law of The Netherlands. Ars Aequi Libri, Nijmegen.
- Besselink L.F.M. (2004b) The Kingdom of the Netherlands: the Charter and Constitution. Ars Aequi Libri, Nijmegen.
- Besselink L.F.M. (2007) Parlement en buitenlandse politiek – Een drieliuk over constitutionele relaties tot de buitenwereld (Parliament and foreign policy: a triptych on constitutional relations with the world outside). In: Publikaties van de Staatsrechtkring – Staatsrechtconferenties (Publications of the Constitutional Law Society – The Constitutional Law Conferences), volume 10. Wolf Legal Publishers, Nijmegen, pp. 177–204.
- Besselink L.F.M. (2012a) The Parliamentary Legitimacy of the European Union: The Role of the States General in the European Union. Utrecht Law Review 8(1):28–50.
- Besselink L.F.M. (2012b) Informal International Lawmaking: Elaboration and Implementation in The Netherlands. In: Berman A., Duquet S., Joost Pauwelyn J., Wessel R.A., Wouters J. (eds.) Informal International Lawmaking: Case Studies. Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher, The Hague, 97–140. E-published at http://www.fichl.org/fileadmin/fichl/documents/LOTFS/LOTFS_3_Web.pdf.
- Besselink, L.F.M. (2014a) Parameters of Constitutional Conflict after Melloni. E.L.Rev. 39(4):531–552.
- Besselink L.F.M. (2014b) The Kingdom of the Netherlands. In: Besselink L.F.M., Bovend'eert P., Broeksteeg H., de Lange R., Voermans W. (eds.) Constitutional Law of the EU Member States. Kluwer, Deventer, pp. 1189 et seq.
- Claes M., Gerards J. (2012) The Netherlands. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 641–704.
- De Vries S. (2016) Grondrechten binnen de Europese interne markt: een tragikomisch conflict tussen waarden in de ‘Domus Europaea’ (Fundamental rights within the internal market: a tragicomedy on a conflict of values in the ‘domus europaea’). SEW tijdschrift voor Europees en economisch recht 44(3):99–109.
- De Witte B. (2004) Do Not Mention the Word: Sovereignty in Two Europhile Countries: Belgium and The Netherlands. In: Walker N. (ed.), Sovereignty in Transition. Hart Publishing, Oxford.
- Diamant M., van Emmerik M.L. (2013) Het Nederlandse budgetrecht Europees perspectief (The power of the purse under Dutch constitutional law in European perspective). Tijdschrift voor Constitutioneel Recht 4(2):94–129.
- Dooyeweerd H. (1984), A New Critique of Theoretical Thought, (4 vols.), Philadelphia 1953–1957. Reprint Paideia Press, Ontario.
- Eijsbouts W.T. (2014) Rutte onaardig, onwaardig, schaamteloos (Prime Minister Rutte unkind, undignified, shameless) Hogendorp Centrum, Amsterdam 2014.
- Evers G.J. (2002) Blind vertrouwen? Een onderzoek naar de toepassing van certificatie ten dienste van de handhaving van wettelijke voorschriften (Blind Trust? A study of the use of certification and standardisation for the enforcement of legal requirements). Boom Juridisch Uitgevers, The Hague.
- Evers G.J. (1999) Een normalisatieregel is geen algemeen verbindend voorschrift (A normalisation rule is not a generally binding regulation). Nederlands Juristenblad NJB 38:1814–1815.
- Gerards J.H. (2010) Samenloop van nationale en Europese grondrechtenbepalingen – hoe moet de rechter daarmee omgaan? (Concurrence of national and European fundamental rights provisions). Tijdschrift voor Constitutioneel Recht 3:224–255.
- Glerum V.H. (2013) De weigeringsgronden bij uitlevering en overlevering: een vergelijking en kritische evaluatie in het licht van het beginsel van wederzijdse erkenning (Grounds for refusal in extradition and surrender cases: a comparison and critical evaluation in light of the principle of mutual recognition). Wolf Legal Publishers, Nijmegen.

- Heringa A.W. (1992) De verdragen van Maastricht in strijd met de Grondwet. Goedkeuring met twee derde meerderheid? (The Maastricht Treaties are in conflict with the Constitution. Approval by two-thirds majority?). Nederlands Juristenblad NJB 67(24):749–866.
- Kortman, C.A.J.M. (2008) Wegwerprecht, oude dame of frisse juf?, De Grondwet herzien. 25 jaar later, 1983–2008 (Disposable law, old lady or young damsels?), pp. 7–25. E-published at <https://www.rijksoverheid.nl/binaries/rijksoverheid/documenten/rapporten/2008/04/11/de-grondwet-herzien-25-jaar-later/boekgrondwetherzienjanuari.pdf>.
- Kurtovic E., Langbroek P. (2010) Uitgeleverd aan overlevering? De Nederlandse overleveringspraktijk beschreven, gevolgd door een discussie over de effectuering van fundamentele rechten van verdachten en veroordeelden (Handed over to surrender? The Dutch surrender practice described, followed by a discussion of the effectiveness of the fundamental rights of suspects and convicted persons). Delikt en Delinkwent 40(7):831–856.
- Kuyper A. (1880) Soevereiniteit in eigen kring (Sovereignty within one's own sphere). JH Kruyt, Amsterdam.
- Malewicz R. (2006). De Overleveringswet in de praktijk (The Act on Surrender in practice). Strafblad 2006(6):491–499.
- Möllers C. (2011) Legalität, Legitimität und Legitimation des Bundesverfassungsgerichts. In: Möllers C., Jestaedt M., Lepsius O., Schönberger C. (eds.) Das entgrenzte Gericht. Eine kritische Bilanz nach sechzig Jahren Bundesverfassungsgericht. Suhrkamp, Berlin, pp. 283–408.
- Morijn J. (2006) Balancing Fundamental Rights and Common Market Freedoms in Union Law: Schmidberger and Omega in the Light of the European Constitution. ELJ 12(1):15–40.
- Morijn J., Pahladsingh A., Palm H. (2015) Vijf jaar bindend Handvest van de Grondrechten: wat heeft het de rechtzoekende opgeleverd? (What has five years of the binding Charter of Fundamental Right brought the litigant?) Nederlands Tijdschrift voor Europees Recht NTER, 2015(4):123–133.
- Oomen B. (2009) Constitutioneel bewustzijn in Nederland: Van burgerschap, burgerzin en de onzichtbare Grondwet (Constitutional awareness in the Netherlands: on citizenship, civic responsibility and the invisible Constitution). Recht Der Werkelijkheid, 30(2):55–79.
- Oomen B., Lelieveldt H. (2008) Onbekend maar niet onbemind: Wat weten en vinden Nederlanders van de Grondwet? (Unknown but not unliked: what do Dutchmen know about the Constitution and what do they think of it?). Nederlands Juristenblad NJB, 83(1):577–578.
- Royal Committee on the Constitution (2010) Rapport Staatscommissie 2010. E-publication at <https://www.rijksoverheid.nl/documenten/rapporten/2010/11/11/rapport-staatscommissie-grondwet>.
- Sanders H. (2011) Handboek overleveringsrecht. Intersentia, Antwerpen/Cambridge.
- Sanders H., Overlevering (Surrender). Delike en Delinkwent 42(24):247–256.
- Stuurman C. (1995) Technische normen en het recht (Technical standards and the law). Kluwer, Deventer.
- Stuurman C., Wijnands H.S.A. (2002) Legal Aspects of Standardisation in the Netherlands. In: Falke J., Schepel H. (eds.) Legal Aspects of Standardisation in the Member States of the EC and EFTA, Volume 2, Country Reports. Office for Official Publications, Luxemburg, pp. 557–624.
- Van Harten H., Grootelaar H. (2014) Doorwerking van het Handvest van de Grondrechten van de Europese Unie in de Nederlandse rechtspraak: een kwantitatieve stand van zaken (The effect of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union in the Dutch case law: a quantitative state of affairs). Nederlands Tijdschrift voor de Mensenrechten, NTM-NJCMBull (39):182–200.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Luxembourg in the Context of EU and International Law as ‘Higher Law’

Jörg Gerkrath

Abstract The Constitution of Luxembourg (1868) is characterised in the report as rather a historic and political document than a truly normative one. Its style and wording are typical of a 19th century document, and thus there is a difference between the written document and the ‘living constitution’. The chapter on fundamental rights is relatively brief and fragmentary, with some widely recognised principles missing; the standards do not go beyond the standards of the ECHR. Luxembourg has embarked on a process of adopting a new Constitution, which is broadly set to continue the evolutionary constitutional tradition. In the Luxembourgish legal order, international law is regarded as ‘higher law’, a doctrine that is expected to be formalised in the new Constitution. The powers and history of the Constitutional Court, which started its work in 1998, are described as rather limited compared to other European constitutional courts; the proposed new Constitution envisages its abolition, to be replaced by the Supreme Court. EU and international measures are immune from constitutional review, and there has never been a challenge to national measures implementing EU law. However, some reservations with regard to the European Arrest Warrant have been expressed by the Conseil d’Etat. Luxembourg’s approach to extradition for offences of political nature is more protective than elsewhere.

The author is Professor of European Law at the University of Luxembourg. e-mail: jorg.gerkrath@uni.lu.

The author expresses his gratitude to Dr. Magdalena Lickova and Dr. Maria Pichou, postdoctoral researchers at the University of Luxembourg, for their precious research support and valuable comments on the draft responses to the present questionnaire.

All websites accessed 27 February 2015. Text submitted 10 March 2015.

J. Gerkrath (✉)
University of Luxembourg, Luxembourg, Luxembourg
e-mail: jorg.gerkrath@uni.lu

Keywords The Constitution of Luxembourg • Amendment of the Constitution regarding EU and international law • The Constitutional Court of Luxembourg Political/evolutionary constitutionalism • Fundamental rights • International law as higher law

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The Constitution of Luxembourg (Constitution) falls within the category of constitutions tending to be more ‘evolutionary’ in nature.¹ Although it is clearly part of the positive law in force, it is at the same time considered rather a historic and political document than a truly normative one. It has developed over the last 200 years in response to political change and historic events. The country, of which its international status as a Grand Duchy, independence and current borders were established by international agreements (Final Act of the Vienna Conference in 1815 and the Treaties of London of 1839 and 1867), suffered through a little over 50 years of constitutional instability before it settled, in 1868, into its current Constitution. Although it was revised 34 times between 1919 and 2009, Luxembourg’s Constitution is thus one of Europe’s oldest written constitutions remaining in force.² Many of its provisions even date back to Luxembourg’s first liberal constitution of 1848, which itself was greatly inspired by the Belgian Constitution of 1831. Its style and wording are thus typical of a 19th century document.

Consequently there is quite a difference between the written document and the ‘living constitution’, for instance regarding the relations between the main political organs of the state. A constitutional court with limited powers was established only in 1997. It does not have the power to invalidate legislative acts, which can only be submitted to it by ordinary courts through a preliminary ruling procedure.

Luxembourg has embarked on a process of modernising its Constitution more generally. A proposal to amend the Constitution deposited with the Chambre des Députés (the unicameral Parliament of Luxembourg, hereinafter Chambre) on 21 April 2009 (hereinafter 2009 Revision Proposal)³ is expected to be finalised and submitted to referendum in early 2018. This revision will result in a widely amended and restated Constitution, to be adopted in accordance with the current revision procedure, continuing Luxembourg’s evolutionary tradition. At the time of writing (February 2016), the Revision Proposal is still being discussed within the Parliamentary Committee on Institutions and Constitutional Amendment, in the form of a revised working draft prefiguring the future Constitution of 2018 (hereinafter Working Draft).

¹ The text of the Luxembourgish Constitution in French can be accessed at: http://www.legilux.public.lu/leg/textescoordonnes/recueils/Constitution/constitution_gdl.pdf.

² For further developments see: Gerkrath and Thill 2014; and Gerkrath 2012.

³ Proposition de révision portant modification et nouvel ordonnancement de la Constitution of 21 April 2009, doc. parl. No. 6030. Cf. Gerkrath 2013, pp. 449–459.

Due to its historical relationships with the Netherlands and Belgium, Luxembourg's constitutional tradition has been strongly influenced by the constitutional traditions of these countries. The first advisory opinion of the Conseil d'Etat (State Council with advisory powers, also highest administrative court until 1996) on the 2009 Revision Proposal makes frequent reference to the Belgian and Dutch Constitutions.⁴

1.1.2 The role of the Constitution has never been subject to extensive theoretical debate in Luxembourg. In a very pragmatic manner, the long-standing leading handbook on the Constitution describes its objective as 'to determine the constitutional basis of the state, to guarantee the rights and freedoms of the citizens and to organise the public powers'.⁵ Divided into 13 chapters and 125 articles, dedicated mostly to institutional and organisational aspects, the Constitution does not include a preamble, which could provide information about its leading rationale. Compared to other constitutions, the part on fundamental rights appears to be neglected, whereas the rules on the functioning of the state and on the exercise of the powers by the institutions are developed in greater detail. The Constitution of the Grand Duchy does not contain a special chapter on international relations; neither does it contain any provision on EU membership.

Luxembourg's Constitution establishes the principles on which the state is based, regulates the powers of state organs and guarantees fundamental rights. With respect to the sovereignty and organisation of Luxembourg, the Constitution makes it clear that the Grand Duchy is a democratic, free, independent and indivisible state headed by a constitutional monarch and governed by a system of parliamentary democracy. Sovereignty resides in the Nation but is exercised by the Grand Duke in accordance with the Constitution and national law (Art. 32(1)).

The Constitution specifically mentions the executive, legislative and judicial branches of Luxembourg's system of government, as well as the Conseil d'Etat, the main advisory organ, which understands its proper role as 'guardian of the Constitution'⁶ and exercises a moderating function within the parliamentary procedure similar to that of a second chamber.

Although not specifically mentioned in the Constitution, the rule of law is undoubtedly present in Luxembourg's constitutional system (see more in Sect. 2.1.3). However, any perceived lack in the current Constitution is expected to be rectified in the restated Constitution, as the second unnumbered paragraph of

⁴ Opinion Conseil d'Etat 6 June 2012, No. 48.433, doc. parl. No. 6030/06.

⁵ See Majerus 1983, p. 42.

⁶ <http://www.conseil-etat.public.lu/fr/historique/index.html>.

Art. 2 of the 2015 Working Draft includes an express recognition that Luxembourg is founded on the principle of the rule of law and on respect for human rights.⁷

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 With regard to EC/EU membership, Luxembourg has pursued a strategy of minimal adjustments. The Grand Duchy ratified the Treaty establishing the European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC Treaty) and the Treaty instituting the European Defence Community (EDC Treaty) in absence of any constitutional provision on the transfer or delegation of powers to international organisations. Contrary to the opinion of the Government, which thought that the Constitution implicitly allowed such a transfer, the Conseil d'État assumed that the Constitution did not. Regarding at least the ECSC Treaty, the Conseil d'État believed that ratification was possible on the basis of customary constitutional law, without however indicating the exact origin and content of these customary rules. It must be inferred that it had in mind the prior participation of Luxembourg in the Zollverein, the German Confederation and the Benelux Union, which had also occurred in the absence of any written constitutional clause.

For reasons of expediency, the Conseil d'État did not oppose the legislature's approval of both treaties, but urged an immediate constitutional amendment to correct the perceived lacuna. Although the Chambre approved the ECSC Treaty on 23 June 1952 and the EDC Treaty on 24 April 1954, respectively, it took another two years for the necessary constitutional amendments to be adopted.

Thus, on 25 October 1956, the Constitution was amended to add Art. 49bis, which allows for 'the exercise of powers reserved by the Constitution to the legislative, executive, and judiciary branches to be temporarily vested, by treaty, in institutions of international law'. Simultaneously, Art. 37 was modified to require such treaties to be approved by a law meeting the voting requirements established for a constitutional amendment in Art. 114. The regrettable wording of Art. 49bis, allowing only 'temporary' transfer of competences, is to be modified in the course of the current revision procedure. In the past this provision has always been construed very widely and has not hampered any ratification of subsequent EC/EU founding, revision or enlargement treaties. A proposal made in 2009 to introduce an entire new chapter on the European Union was ultimately withdrawn without debate.

Only two subsequent constitutional amendments have been adopted, in 1994 and 1999, to address Luxembourg's obligations under the EU treaties. Nothing in the amendments refers explicitly to the EC, the EU or to European integration.

⁷ In absence of any official English version, all translations of the original French legal and constitutional texts and judgments are those of the author.

First, at the moment the Maastricht Treaty was signed and ratified, the Constitution explicitly reserved voting rights or candidature in national and municipal elections for Luxembourgers (Arts. 9 and 107). However, Art. 114 – on constitutional revision – required dissolution of the Chambre in order to amend the Constitution. As voting rights for EU citizens were not considered to be self-executing but requiring the adoption of secondary EU legislation and in order not to slow down the ratification of the Maastricht Treaty, the Conseil d'État opined that an immediate constitutional amendment was not obligatory. Thereafter, over the next two years, discussion revolved around the compatibility of the Constitution with the Maastricht Treaty and the adequacy of the Art. 114 amendment procedure with regard to European integration. Without modifying Art. 114 at that stage, Arts. 9 and 107 were finally amended by a revision Act of 23 December 1994, permitting the law to confer by exemption the right to exercise political rights on non-Luxembourg nationals.

Secondly, the Constitution initially reserved access to public employment to Luxembourg citizens (Art. 10bis(2), formerly Art. 11(2)). In the aftermath of a judgment of the European Court of Justice (ECJ) from 2 July 1996,⁸ the Constitution had to be revised.

Following its previous and invariable case law since 1980, the ECJ indeed held that the general prohibition for non-Luxembourgers to work in the public service exceeded the limits of the exception provided for in Art. 48(4) EC. In not complying with its obligation ‘to open the areas in question to nationals of other Member States by restricting application of the nationality condition to only those posts which actually involve direct or indirect participation in the exercise of powers conferred by public law and duties designed to safeguard the general interest of the State or of other public authorities’, Luxembourg failed to fulfil its obligations under the Treaty.

In reaction to a draft revision, the Conseil d'État did not agree in the first place that a revision was necessary because the Constitution did not formally restrict the access of non-Luxembourgers to employment in the public service and, hence, would not contradict Art. 48(4) of the (Maastricht) Treaty.

However, in the context of the delivery of its opinion on the bill opening the public service to EU citizens, the Conseil d'État accepted the argument that this proposal would require the revision of Art. 10bis(2) (formerly Art. 11(2)). As a result, Art. 11(2) was then revised in April 1999, stating that the law determines the eligibility of non-Luxembourgers for public employment.⁹

1.2.2 Until 2003, under the original rigid amendment procedure (Art. 114), there were three major constraints to amending the Constitution. First, the requirement to dissolve the Chambre after the vote of a declaration to amend nominated provisions of the Constitution and to re-elect the Chambre, which then had the power to amend these provisions. Secondly, the assent of the Grand Duke (even though this became a formality after 1919) and, thirdly, a positive vote from two-thirds out of a quorum of three-quarters of the 60 Members of Parliament (MPs) being present. This, in practice, set the required majority at 30 out of at least 45 members present. Consequently, the main constraint was not this so-called ‘double qualified majority’, but the preceding phases of the declaration to amend, i.e. the dissolution and re-election of the Chambre.

⁸ Case C-473/93 Commission v. Luxembourg [1996] ECR I-03207.

⁹ The effective opening of Luxembourg’s public service results from the Law of 18 December 2009 and a Grand Duchy Regulation of 12 May 2010 which lists the employment positions that ‘involve direct or indirect participation in the exercise of public power’ and which are, therefore, reserved for nationals.

The rigidity of the initial procedure was considered to hamper the desired general overhaul of the Constitution as well as quick adaptations to EU requirements. All of the above-mentioned EU-related amendments were, however, adopted successfully – although sometimes with some delay – under the initial procedure.

In the context of the 1994 revision, regarding the voting rights of EU citizens, there was a rather heated discussion of the need to change the single constitutional amendment procedure in favour of a so-called ‘dual’ procedure. An attempt had been made to modify the constitutional amendment procedure to provide for two alternative constitutional amendment procedures: a less rigorous (and faster) procedure for amendments needed to ensure conformity with treaty obligations and a more rigorous (and somewhat slower) procedure for all other constitutional amendments. The Conseil d’État opposed the creation of such a dual system, preferring to retain a single procedure. The 2003 amendment conserved the single process but shortened the time needed to complete the process, by discarding the requirement for dissolution of the Chambre between the first and second votes on a constitutional amendment.

Today any revision thus requires two consecutive votes of the Chambre by a majority of at least two-thirds of its members. Voting by proxy is not permitted. There must be an interval of at least three months between the two votes. If within two months of the first vote more than one quarter of the 60 members of the Chambre or 25,000 voters submit a petition, the text adopted at first reading is put to a referendum. In this case there is no second reading in the Chambre, and the revision is passed if it receives a majority of valid votes. As any revision of the Constitution takes the form of a law, the bills and proposals for constitutional reform follow the normal legislative procedure, unless otherwise specified.

Article 114(2) requires a majority of two-thirds of the members of the Chambre, without providing a quorum, but also without permitting proxy voting. Thus, the qualified majority required for the adoption of revision Acts was extended to two-thirds of all members of the House, in total 40 members. This is still a relatively high majority, maintaining the solemnity of constitutional revision and, thus, the rigidity of the Constitution. In practice, most revision Acts are adopted unanimously. Note that since the 2003 amendment, the Chambre is clearly the sole holder of revision power. The ability to submit a text adopted on first reading to a referendum is to be regarded as a safeguard in this regard and has not yet been used.

In practice, the formal distinction between constitutional amendment Acts and ordinary legislative acts is blurred by the existence of specific acts, which can only be adopted in accordance with the special majority requirement of Art. 114(2). The Constitution provides for four such cases: ratification of treaties transferring sovereign competences (Art. 37 in combination with Art. 49bis); declaration of war (Art. 37); determination of the number of MPs to be elected in each district (Art. 51); and a nationality condition for mayors and their deputies (Art. 107).

1.2.3 As mentioned in Sect. 1.2.1, the two EU-related amendments adopted in 1994 and 1999 aimed to eradicate explicit conflicts between the wording of the Constitution and the requirements of EU law. Both can be considered as minor amendments, as they simply allowed the legislator to provide for the necessary adaptations allowing nationals of other Member States to exercise rights stemming from EU law in Luxembourg.

No obstacles other than the requirements of the amendment procedure have been encountered, and no external advice from legal scholars or experts has been sought.

1.2.4 Constitutionalising Luxembourg's EU membership has been put on the agenda by the opinion of the Conseil d'État of June 2012 on the pending constitutional amendment proposal from April 2009. Although the Grand Duchy is one of the founding states of the European Union, its present Constitution does not contain any reference to this membership or to its constitutional foundations and implications.

A previous parliamentary proposal made by an MP in 2009 to introduce a completely new chapter on the European Union has never been discussed in substance. It was withdrawn from the registry of the Chambre without explanation when the Committee on Institutions and Constitutional Amendment started working on the more general proposal of restatement of the Constitution in November 2009.

In its opinion of June 2012, the Conseil d'État recommends constitutionalising Luxembourg's participation in the process of European integration via a new Art. 5. Furthermore, the Conseil d'État suggests further insertions: a reference to the voting rights of European citizens, an adoption of the ECJ's formula with respect to access to public employment, and codification of the Grand Duke's power to adopt regulations in order to assure compliance with the legal instruments adopted by the European Union, rather than proceeding by parliamentary statute. As previously mentioned, the 2009 Revision Proposal has yet to come to fruition, but a version thereof is expected to be approved sometime in 2018.

The Working Draft as it stands in February 2015 contains a total of five proposals for EU-related amendments. The new Art. 5 reads: 'The Grand-Duchy of Luxembourg participates in European integration. The exercise of powers of the state may be transferred to the European Union and to international institutions by an Act of Parliament adopted by qualified majority.' Article 10, on the political rights of Luxembourg citizens, would be supplemented by a second paragraph stating: 'The law organises the exercise of political rights by citizens of the European Union.' Article 11 contains a reference to the ECJ's well-established case law regarding access to public employment. It provides that: 'The law determines access to public employment. It may reserve for Luxembourgers public employment including direct or indirect participation in the exercise of public authority and in the functions having as their object the safeguard of the general interests of the state.' Article 49(3) allows the Grand Duke to 'adopt the necessary regulations for application of the legal acts of the European Union'. Finally, Arts. 90 and 98 provide for the ex ante control (through consultative opinions of the Conseil d'État) and ex post review (by binding decisions of the courts) of Acts of Parliament and regulations with regard to 'higher law', namely the Constitution, international treaties, EU legislation and the general principles of law. According to Art. 98, '[t]he courts shall apply Acts and regulations only in so far as they conform to the norms of higher law'.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 Since its amendment in 1956, the Constitution authorises the temporary transfer of the exercise of legislative, executive and judicial powers to institutions established under international law (Art. 49bis). The ratification of such treaties needs to be approved by the Chambre following the special two-thirds majority requirement applicable to constitutional amendments (Art. 37).

The Constitution does not contain any explicit rule on the legal value of international or European Law within the domestic legal order. Nonetheless, according to well-settled case law and the position of the Conseil d'État as well as Luxembourgish scholars, self-executing international treaties enjoy full primacy with regard to the provisions of internal law, including the Constitution itself.¹⁰

The case law on this point was developed from the early 1950s when first the Cour de cassation (the highest civil court) and subsequently the Conseil d'État (as the former highest administrative court) reversed the previous position that judicial control of the compliance of Acts of Parliament with international treaties was not possible because of the principle of separation of powers.¹¹

According to the reference decision of the Conseil d'État in 1951, 'an international treaty incorporated into domestic law by a law of approval is law of superior essence having a higher origin than the will of an internal organ. It follows that in the case of conflict between the provisions of an international treaty and those of a subsequent national law, international law must prevail over national law.'¹²

The wording of this decision is clearly very wide, as the judgment states without distinction that an international norm prevails over the will of any internal organ. It will be noted, however, that in 1956 the Chambre expressly rejected a governmental constitutional amendment bill, which provided that ‘[t]he rules of international law are part of the national legal order. They supersede all other law and national provisions.’ According to this draft, primacy would have encompassed constitutional provisions.

¹⁰ Kinsch 2010, p. 399.

¹¹ Cour de cassation, arrêts des 8 juin 1950, Pasicrisie lux. 15, p. 41, et 14 juillet 1954, Chambre des métiers c. Pagani, Pasicrisie lux. 16, p. 151; JT 1954, p. 694, note Pescatore 1962.

¹² Conseil d'Etat, (Comité du contentieux), 28 juillet 1951, Dieudonné c/Administration des contributions, Pas. lux. t. XV, p. 263.

The Conseil d’État, however, implicitly accepted such a general primacy in an opinion of 26 May 1992 on the draft Act Approving the EU Treaty. Indeed, it considered that [i]t should be borne in mind that under the rule of the hierarchy of legal norms, international law takes precedence before national law and, in the case of conflict, the courts shall dismiss domestic law in favour of the Treaty. As it is important to avoid a contradiction between national law and international law, the Conseil d’État insists that the related constitutional amendment take place within due time to prevent such a situation of incompatibility.

In the case of conflict of an international or European engagement with the Constitution or legislative acts, national standards should be subject to a constitutional revision or amendment before the international commitment is approved by the competent national authorities. Once approved, the respective international norms enjoy, in the pure monistic tradition, full primacy over rules of domestic law, even of constitutional value.¹³

This rule also applies to the secondary legislation of the European Union.¹⁴ All (civil and administrative) courts have accepted the full supremacy and direct effect of EU law in the very terms of the ECJ’s case law, to which they regularly refer.

Acts of the Chambre approving international treaties are explicitly excluded from the competence of the Constitutional Court (Art. 95ter(2)). In Luxembourg, this is considered as a consequence of the primacy of international treaties. In effect this means that cases such as Lisbon and ESM in Germany cannot arise in Luxembourg. Acts of the Chambre transposing or executing obligations deriving from secondary EU legislation are not explicitly excluded from the Constitutional Court’s competence. Until now, no such Act has, however, been submitted to the Constitutional Court as a preliminary question by an ordinary court. The opinion seems to prevail that the ‘immunity’ of Acts approving treaties also covers Acts implementing secondary EU legislation.

1.3.2 Luxembourg’s Constitution has never been based on a conception of absolute sovereignty. In the absence of any clause on the transfer or delegation of sovereignty, the Conseil d’État stated already in 1952 that ‘[a] state may and must renounce certain parts of its sovereignty if the public good, the ultimate purpose of the state’s organisation, requires it’.¹⁵ As the Constitutional Court may not review the constitutionality of Acts approving international treaties, there is no pertinent case law from this court.

¹³ Cour d’appel, arrêt du 13 novembre 2001, No. 396/01 V, Annales du droit luxembourgeois, 2002, éd. Bruylant, p. 456. Cour supérieure de justice (assemblée générale), arrêt du 5 décembre 2002, No. 337/02, Annales du droit luxembourgeois, 2003, éd. Bruylant, p. 683.

¹⁴ Conseil d’Etat, 21 novembre 1984, Pasicrisie lux. 26, p. 174.

¹⁵ Opinion on the Ratification of the ECSC Treaty, doc. parl. No. 395/2, p. 3.

One of the particular characteristics of Luxembourg's domestic legal order lies in the fact that its very existence results from international law. Established as an independent state by the Final Act of the Congress of Vienna of 9 June 1815, the Grand Duchy's independence was confirmed by the Treaties of London of 19 April 1839 and 11 May 1867. Therefore, far from constituting a threat to national sovereignty, international law is understood in Luxembourg as a 'vital guarantee of the existence and survival of the state'.¹⁶ Moreover, Luxembourg's courts have had no difficulty in recognising the pre-eminence of international law and the primacy of EU law, including in respect of a constitutional provision.¹⁷ This state of affairs also explains why it was not considered necessary to write a provision into the Constitution that would more explicitly authorise transfers of competences to the Union.

In Luxembourg, the Constitution long ago ceased to be the only supreme law. At the time of ratification of the Maastricht Treaty, some criticised the 'suspension' of the Constitution which occurred, in that ratification of the Treaty took place before the constitutional amendment giving citizens of the Union the right to vote in municipal elections.¹⁸ There is now a consensus about the existence of a set of norms ranked as supra-legislative and designated by the term 'higher law', comprising the Constitution, international law and the general principles of law. It is within the remit of the Conseil d'État to monitor the compliance of draft bills and draft regulations with these rules of higher law. The amended Act of 12 July 1996, reforming the Conseil d'État, states in its Art. 2(2) that '[i]f it considers a draft bill to be contrary to the Constitution, to international agreements and treaties, or to the general principles of law, the Conseil d'État shall state this in its Opinion. It shall do the same, if it considers a draft regulation to be contrary to a rule of higher law.'

1.3.3 There are no limits ratione materiae with regard to the extent to which powers can be transferred to the EU, as there are no such limits to constitutional amendments in general. Neither the text of the Constitution nor case law nor constitutional commentary refer to such limits under Luxembourgish law.

The Grand Duchy is an 'independent' state (Art. 1). The same statement appeared in the previous constitutional texts of 1848 and 1856. These earlier constitutions, however, very clearly put this independence into perspective by going on to declare that Luxembourg was 'part of the German Confederation'. The 1856 text went even further by stating that the Grand Duchy 'participates in the rights and obligations arising from the Federal Constitution. These rights and these obligations cannot be derogated by the internal legislation of the country.'

Be it a matter of the past within the German Confederation or of the present within European integration, the constitutional proclamation of independence has never stopped the Grand Duchy from participating in integration exercises with a constitutional dimension. Moreover, at no time has the preservation of the independence of the state ever been seriously discussed as a possible limit to Luxembourg's participation in the European integration process.¹⁹

¹⁶ Cf. Wivenes 2002, p. 267 et seq.

¹⁷ Cf. Pescatore 1962, p. 97 et seq.; Wivenes 2002, p. 21; Kinsch 2010, p. 399.

¹⁸ Cf. Bonn 1992.

Its successive incorporation in the German Confederation (1815–1866), the 'Zollverein' (1842–1918), the Belgo-Luxembourg Economic Union (from 1921) and the Benelux Union (from 1944) have, on the contrary, enabled Luxembourg to acquire indispensable experience for being prepared for the legal implications of its membership of the European Communities and Union.

The unfortunate wording of Art. 49bis allowing transfers of such powers to international institutions only temporarily has been interpreted very widely and has not in practice prevented any transfer of competencies to the EC or the EU, which are known to be based on treaties concluded for unlimited duration.

Article 5 of the pending Working Draft will thus remove this inconsistency, stating: 'The exercise of state powers can be transferred to the European Union and international institutions by a law adopted by qualified majority.'

1.3.4 The Constitution is silent about its status as supreme law in the national legal system. The Constitutional Court can be asked through preliminary questions from the ordinary courts to review the constitutionality of legislative acts (Art. 95ter). However, its judgments have only declaratory value. An Act declared contrary to an article of the Constitution will have to be set aside by the ordinary court that raised the question and all other courts that intervene in the same case. It will, however, remain in force unless the Chambre adopts an Act to modify or abrogate it. In practice, the Chambre has decided in several such cases to amend the Constitution in order to abolish the inconsistency, rather than to modify the legislative act. Finally, as a consequence of the supremacy of the Constitution, none of its provisions may be suspended (Art. 113).

Legislative acts approving international treaties are explicitly excluded from the competence of the Constitutional Court (Art. 95ter (2)). This is understood in Luxembourg as a consequence of the primacy of international law.

More than an EU-friendly interpretation, the Luxembourgish courts have adopted an attitude of deference towards international law in general and EU law in particular, often echoing the case law of the ECJ word for word. Indeed, since the 1950s they have confirmed that international treaties enjoy primacy over domestic law because they are considered as higher law in essence.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 Luxembourg's Constitution does not contain specific amendments concerning the rules governing the participation of the Chambre in EU affairs. Although Prime Minister Juncker suggested such an amendment in the course of the ratification procedure of the Lisbon Treaty in 2009, the Chambre did not accept his proposal. It allegedly feared that it was not sufficiently staffed to face this responsibility.

¹⁹ Cf. Wivenes 2002, p. 267 et seq.

Thus it is a simple ‘Memorandum on Cooperation between the Chambre and the Government of the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg in the Field of EU Policy’, which is annexed to the rules of procedure of the Chambre, that governs the rights and duties of both institutions in this respect.²⁰ Introduced on 7 May 2009, this memorandum contains in particular rules on the right of the Chambre to be informed on issues of European policy.

The Lisbon Treaty recognises the right of national parliaments to contribute actively to the good functioning of the Union (Art. 12 TEU). From the review of official documents of the European institutions to the transposition of directives into national law, the action of the Chambre in the political sphere of the European Union is thus manifold.

National parliaments are indeed involved by monitoring the activity of their respective national governments on the European level. In the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, a parliamentary committee invites the ministers to its sessions before and after Council meetings.

The Chambre contributes to the monitoring of respect of the subsidiarity principle laid down in the Treaty of Lisbon.²¹ Beyond these two main powers, the Chambre participates in inter-parliamentary cooperation within the Union. Inter-parliamentary meetings are held mainly within the framework of the Conference of Parliamentary Committees for Union Affairs of Parliaments of the European Union (COSAC) and the Conference of Presidents of Parliaments of the European Union. Information on the analysis of EU documents is transmitted between national parliaments through the platform for EU Interparliamentary Exchange (IPEX) database.

The control exercised by the Chambre over the Government in the field of European affairs appears altogether rather modest compared to practices in other Member States. There are no elements of this control that merit recommendation more widely as a best practice.

1.4.2 Direct democracy only plays a limited role in Luxembourg’s parliamentary system. Introduced in 1919 for legislative matters (Art. 51(7)) and in 2003 for constitutional amendments (Art. 114), referendums have only been organised three times: in 1919 on the dynastic question and on economic union to be concluded with France or Belgium; in 1937 on a bill allowing dissolution of the Communist party; and in 2005 on the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe. An Act of 4 February 2005 lays down the more detailed rules on the organisation of referendums.²²

²⁰ Aide-mémoire sur la coopération entre la Chambre des députés et le Gouvernement du Grand-Duché de Luxembourg en matière de politique européenne.

²¹ See Gennart 2013.

²² Loi du 4 février 2005 relative au référendum au niveau national, Mémorial A, No. 27 of 3 March 2005, p. 548.

The very first referendum on constitutional amendment will most likely be organised in early 2018 on the currently pending Revision Proposal. On 7 June 2015, three questions regarding the debated elements of the future Constitution were put to a consultative referendum. One question related to granting voting rights to foreign residents in national elections, while the other two were on reducing the minimum age for voting and limiting the duration of ministerial mandates. All three proposals were rejected.

The only referendum related to EU matters was held on 10 July 2005 on the ratification of the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe.²³ As a result, 56.52% of the voters said ‘Yes’. Luxembourg is indeed regarded as one of the EU’s most enthusiastic Member States, and most prominent political figures supported the Constitution for Europe, with both the governing coalition and the main opposition parties campaigning for a ‘Yes’ vote. On 28 June 2005, the Chambre had already approved the ratification of the treaty at its first reading. The poll was consultative in nature, but Parliament agreed to abide by the people’s majority vote. The then Prime Minister Jean-Claude Juncker said he would resign if the referendum resulted in a ‘No’ vote.

In connection with this referendum, the question arose whether EU citizens other than Luxembourgish citizens should be allowed to vote, which was finally decided in the negative.²⁴ The statement of reasons of the Act on the basis of which the referendum was organised does not refer to any specific rationale as to the constitutional procedure chosen to approve the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe. However, the draft Act concerning this referendum notes that:

While the referendum is, from the legal point of view, of advisory character, the legislature will nevertheless feel politically bound by the popular verdict. Therefore, it is necessary to measure the challenges raised by the consultation to be held on 10 July 2005. Due to the exceptional nature of referendums in our history, the results will leave a lasting imprint on the political life of our country.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 As mentioned above (Sect. 1.2.1), EU-related amendments have been limited to the strictly necessary in order to overcome constitutional provisions that had become contrary to EU law achievements: namely the right of workers from other ²³ La loi du 14 avril 2005 portant organisation d'un référendum national sur Traité établissant une Constitution pour l'Europe, signé à Rome, le 29 octobre 2004. For discussion concerning this referendum see Dumont et al. 2012.

²⁴ P. 3 of the Projet de loi portant organisation d'un référendum national sur le Traité établissant une Constitution pour l'Europe, signé à Rome, le 29 octobre 2004, parl. doc. No. 5443.

Member States to have access to employment (Art. 45 TFEU) and the right of citizens of the EU to vote and to stand as a candidate in European Parliament and municipal elections.

1.5.2 The absence of EU amendments is characteristic for such a very small Member State, founded by international treaties and in which integration into the EU is perceived as a question of national interest.

The rigidity of the initial constitutional revision procedure certainly dissuaded Luxembourg from passing constitutional amendments that were not considered absolutely necessary. Twice, in the 1950s and in the 1990s, Luxembourg tolerated what were most likely unconstitutional treaty ratifications in order not to slow down the entry into effect of the ECSC and Maastricht treaties. A prior constitutional amendment would indeed have required the dissolution and re-election of the Chambre.

Luxembourg's constitutional culture, which may be summarised as pragmatic and somewhat deferent to international and European law, also explains to some extent the sentiment that EU-related amendments are superfluous. In addition, the level of public support for the EU has always been one of the highest throughout the Union and is shared by all political parties in Parliament. European integration has never been conceptualised in Luxembourg as a threat to constitutional rules, principles or values. Thus, only constitutional rules that have become explicitly contrary to requirements of EU law have been amended.

In the past, several scholars have underlined the fact that the current Constitution has to some extent become obsolete and urgently needs to be adapted in order to eradicate all the 'fictions' stemming from a wide difference between the old written document and the current constitutional practice.²⁵ It was not, however, until the advisory opinion of the Conseil d'État of June 2012 on the pending Revision Proposal that the introduction of EU related amendments were put on the agenda. The initial revision proposal as tabled in April 2009 by the Committee on Institutions and Constitutional Amendment only addressed internal constitutional issues.

Concerns with regard to 'waning constitutionalism' that have indeed been expressed in Luxembourg were in fact never linked to missing EU clauses but to the growing difference between the text and practice of the Constitution. As direct effect and primacy of EU law have never been put into question in the Grand Duchy, it was rather argued that the introduction of specific constitutional clauses with regard to the EU was unnecessary.

1.5.3 Within the EU, the far-reaching exercise of powers at supranational level requires a set of constitutional rules ensuring that these powers are exercised according to shared constitutional values and in the respect of a common standard of fundamental rights. This set of rules can only result from 'European constitutional law' understood here as a combination of the Member States' national constitutions, the 'EU constitution', the ECHR and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU. The harmonious coexistence of these different legal sources and their complementary relation needs to be organised by clauses of reciprocal reference and mutual respect. In this understanding, 'Europe clauses' in the national constitutions have an important role to play, as it is shown for instance by Art. 23 of the German Basic Law. It is important to amend the national constitution in order to contribute to ensuring that the exercise of delegated powers on the Union level observes the same standards as exercise on the national level. Amendments should at least include a general clause on membership within the EU, a clause on the transfer of powers and its limits and a clause on the participation of the national parliament in EU affairs.

²⁵ See the explanatory memorandum to the 2009 amendment proposal, doc. parl. 6030/01 and the included references.

Luxembourg's experience as one of the founding members shows, however, that it is also possible to participate successfully in the process of European integration for more than sixty years without any amendment of the Constitution referring explicitly to the EU or EU law and on the foundation of a constitutional provision that allows only temporary delegation of powers to international institutions. The absence of a Europe clause has never been considered as a lacuna endangering constitutional values or fundamental rights standards. The intended amendments within the current revision procedure are rather seen as a commitment to European integration and an overdue adaptation of the Constitution to the legal reality.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 The Constitution contains Chapter II 'On public freedoms and fundamental rights' (Arts. 9 to 31). This chapter has been construed progressively through different constitutional amendments. It is relatively brief and combines different types of safeguards (acquisition of citizenship, human rights, political rights, economic and social rights) without, however, embracing a clear structure. Some widely recognised principles such as a general prohibition of discrimination or a general requirement of fair trial are missing. On the whole, compared to other domestic constitutional or international documents dealing with fundamental rights, Chapter II of the Luxembourgish Constitution appears fragmentary.

The general principles referred to above are not expressed as such, although the principle of legal certainty transpires through several specific constitutional safeguards such as the right to a judge, the principle nulla poena sine lege and the prohibition of unlawful expropriation. Moreover, the principle of proportionality is anchored in the current draft of the 2009 Revision Proposal as one of the parameters to be taken into account when restrictions to fundamental freedoms are envisaged.²⁶

The 2009 Revision Proposal appears more ambitious, as it introduces a wider range of safeguards and their better organisation. Having said that, while the suggested changes to the organisation have been inspired by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union²⁷ (Charter), this draft has been already criticised because some safeguards that are typically anchored in international human rights instruments are missing.²⁸

The most relevant fundamental rights and public freedoms are discussed in Sects. 2.3–2.5.

The judicial enforcement of the constitutional safeguards is primarily a matter for the domestic ordinary courts, as opposed to the Constitutional Court, the competence²⁹ (and history)³⁰ of which are rather limited compared to other European constitutional courts. It can only review Acts of Parliament upon a preliminary request made, in a given proceeding, by an ordinary court. Private parties are not allowed to file individual complaints. Moreover, the Constitutional Court has not been endowed with the competence to assess the relation between the Constitution and international law, including such instruments as the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR). In this respect also it was for the ordinary courts to set the standard, which they did when the Cour d'appel (Court of Appeal) confirmed that the ECHR takes precedence over domestic rules, including the Constitution.³¹

Within its limited scope of action, the Constitutional Court has ‘progressively’ interpreted Art. 14 of the Constitution in particular³² and extended the narrowly

²⁶ See above Sect. 2.1.2.

²⁷ See the explanatory memorandum to the initial draft of the Constitution revision: ‘For Chapter 2 on civil liberties and fundamental rights, the Commission on Institutions and Constitutional Revision proposes a new structure arranged like the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, around the terms dignity, equality and freedom. The guarantees in the social and economic field as well as in the environment, and the rights that citizens can claim when facing the public administration are organised under the terms solidarity and citizenship’. Doc. parl. No. 6030, p. 6.

²⁸ See Spielmann 2011, p. 582, referring to the opinion of the Commission européenne pour la démocratie par le droit (Commission de Venise), Opinion No. 544/2009, CDL-AD(2009)059.

²⁹ See Gerkrath 2008, p. 9.

³⁰ The Luxembourgish Constitutional Court started its work in 1998, and as of February 2015 has issued 116 judgments.

³¹ CSJ (appel corr.), 13 November 2001, No. 396/01, see Friden and Kinsch 2001. On the relation between the Luxembourgish Constitutional Court and the ECHR, see Ravarani 2001, pp. 37–42.

³² Spielmann 2011, p. 578 and p. 583. For the interpretation of Art. 14 of the Constitution, see judgments of the Constitutional Court, No. 12/02 of 22 March 2002, Mém. A – 40 of 12 April 2002, p. 672; (on this judgment see Braum 2008, p. 77); No. 23/04 and 24/04 of 3 December 2004, Mém. A – 201 of 23 December 2004, p. 2960; No. 41/07, 42/07 and 43/07 of 14 December 2007, Mém. A – 1 of 11 January 2008, pp. 2–8.

drafted principle of equality beyond the text of the Constitution: while the text of the Constitution reserves this principle for Luxembourgish citizens only, the Constitutional Court has extended it to foreigners,³³ holding that the principle of equality ‘is applicable to each individual concerned by Luxembourgish law, if rights or personality are concerned’.³⁴ On the other hand, commentators have noted the restrictive approach embraced by the same Constitutional Court in respect of citizenship (nationalité). According to some, this case law is at odds with the approach embraced by the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR).³⁵

As the constitutional restatement intends to abolish the existing Constitutional Court, it will be up to a new supreme court to ultimately decide on the conformity of Acts of Parliament with the Constitution and international treaties. Provisions that are declared contrary to the Constitution or international treaties would then become invalid after the publication of the judgment (Art. 98(2)). The main reason for abolishing the Constitutional Court seems to be the wish to unify the judicial system under one Supreme Court and the resulting possibility for that court to merge review of conformity with international treaties and review of conformity with the Constitution.

2.1.2 The Constitution does not foresee a provision equivalent to Art. 31(3) of the Polish Constitution. However, the latest Constitutional Working Draft contains a new disposition which reads as follows:

Any limitation on the exercise of fundamental rights, civil liberties and the rights of the person subject to legal proceedings as provided for by the Constitution must respect their essential content. In accordance with the principle of proportionality, limitations may be made only if they are necessary in a democratic society, and genuinely meet objectives of general interest or the need to protect the rights and freedoms of others.

Concerning limitations to the principle of equality (Art. 10bis) by legislative acts, the Constitutional Court has developed a specific doctrine. According to its jurisprudence, legislative acts may submit certain categories of persons to different legal regimes as far as this difference proceeds from objective disparities, is rationally justified, adequate and proportionate to its aim. This formulation will be codified within Art. 16 of the Constitutional Working Draft.

2.1.3 The concept of the rule of law does not appear as such in the text of the Constitution. As noted above, the Constitution nevertheless contains specific expressions of the principle of legality, such as safeguards in the context of criminal proceedings (Arts. 12 to 14), and the prohibition of expropriation without statutory basis, fair compensation and for reasons other than for a public cause (Art. 16).

³³ Cour constitutionnelle, 13 November 1998, No. 2/98.

³⁴ See also the judgment of the Appeal Court (4th ch.) of 6 November 2013: ‘[T]he constitutional principle of equality is applicable to all individuals affected by Luxembourgish law, and violation of this principle can be raised by a foreigner.’ For a comment, see Kinsch 2014, pp. 84–85.

³⁵ Spielmann 2011, p. 585.

The notion of the rule of law (État de droit) appears in the current Working Draft which foresees the following new wording of Art. 2 of the Constitution: '[Luxembourg] is based on the principles of the rule of law and respect for human rights.'³⁶

Article 13 of the Constitution guarantees the right of a person not to be re-assigned, against the person's will, to a court other than that designated by law. Article 86 of the Constitution spells out another aspect of the regular administration of justice by foreseeing that no court can be established otherwise than by law, and by prohibiting the establishment of extraordinary courts.

As regards the enforcement of constitutionally guaranteed rights, it should be noted that private parties do not have direct access to the Constitutional Court. However, the ordinary courts have the possibility to seize the Constitutional Court with a preliminary ruling request concerning the constitutionality of an Act to be applied in the pending proceedings. More specifically, when a party raises a question as to the conformity of a law with the Constitution before a court, the latter has to seize the Constitutional Court unless it considers that a decision on such a question is not necessary, the question is unfounded or that the Constitutional Court has already ruled on it.³⁷

Also, '[c]ourts and tribunals may apply general and local decisions and regulations only in so far as these comply with the laws' (Art. 95). The notion of 'laws' has been given a broad meaning, encompassing also the domestic Constitution and international treaties.³⁸ In this way, the ordinary courts can reach out to the constitutional safeguards as well as to international safeguards related to fundamental rights, with the latter taking precedence over the former.

The rule that only published laws can be valid is anchored in the Constitution: 'Any law, order or regulation of general or municipal administration is not binding until it has been published in the form determined by law' (Art. 112). Further details on the requirement of publication of laws are provided in Sect. 2.5.

The principles of legal certainty and non-retroactivity, and the principle of nulla poena sine lege are anchored in Arts. 12 and 14 of the Constitution. However, these provisions do not explicitly contain some of the specific aspects of these principles mentioned above, such as the applicability of these principles to administrative matters or a general prohibition of retroactivity.

³⁶ See in this respect Ergec 2009, pp. 180–184.

³⁷ See Art. 95ter of the Luxembourgish Constitution and Act dated 27 July 1997 portant organisation de la Cour Constitutionnelle (creating the Constitutional Court).

³⁸ Cour adm. 8 December 2011, No. 28818 C.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 The balancing of fundamental rights with economic free movement rights has not raised any constitutional issues in Luxembourg to date. No relevant case law has been developed on this question before or after the ECJ's judgments in Schmidberger and Omega.³⁹ In the Expert's view, the domestic courts would give precedence to free movement rights guaranteed by the EU treaties over fundamental rights enshrined in the Constitution unless consistent interpretation were possible.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The EAW and the Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 The European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision⁴⁰ (EAWFD) was introduced in Luxembourg by virtue of the Loi du 17 mars 2004 relative au mandat d'arrêt européen et aux procédures de remise entre États membres de l'Union européenne (Act of 17 March 2004), published in Mémorial A No. 39 of 22 March 2004, and modified later with the Loi du 3 août 2011 (the Act of 3 August 2011).

The Conseil d'État is considered to be the 'Guardian of the Constitution' with an advisory function to control a priori all proposals and bills referred to it by the Grand Duke and the Government. As an advisory organ, the Conseil d'État was called to give its Opinion regarding the compatibility of the EAWFD bill with the 'norms of higher law', that is, the Constitution, international treaties and the general principles of law.⁴¹

No specific references or concerns regarding the principle of the presumption of innocence are found in the Opinion. Neither have the national courts had the opportunity to address this principle in the context of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW). According to the legal commentary, the principle of the presumption of innocence constitutes a general principle of Luxembourgish law, which draws its content from Art. 6(2) ECHR and Art. 14(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.⁴²

There is considerable discussion in the Opinion on the nature of the legal instrument (a framework decision) which was selected to address and regulate, on

³⁹ Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659 and Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609.

⁴⁰ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁴¹ Opinion Conseil d'État of 19 December 2003, doc. parl. No. 5104/1.

⁴² Penning 2013, p. 103.

the EU level, an issue closely linked to the exercise of state sovereignty. Specifically, the Conseil d'État considered whether the EAWFD would affect Luxembourg's international obligations under other international treaties on extradition. After examining the relevant provisions, the Conseil d'État concluded that there is no incompatibility between them and the EAWFD.⁴³

According to the Conseil d'État, the EAWFD does not raise any difficulties in Luxembourg's constitutional order, because the Framework Decision was adopted by unanimity and had no binding effect until it was transposed into national law.⁴⁴ The legal instrument of the EAWFD is justified for a number of reasons: it is of a general nature and does not seek to introduce a specific procedure for prosecuting certain forms of criminality; the objective of creating a European area of justice imposes the obligation to reduce obstacles to cooperation on criminal investigations or the enforcement of penalties between the judicial authorities of Member States as much as possible. Even though the EAWFD may resemble an EU directive, it still constitutes an instrument of intergovernmental cooperation.

The Conseil d'État has emphasised the traditional character of extradition requests between sovereign states and underscored the special interest that a country of the size of Luxembourg has in the issue of extradition. It is not surprising that extradition was the subject of an early domestic Act incorporating the provisions of international treaties on extradition. Luxembourg was among the states to sign and ratify the European Convention on Extradition of 13 December 1957, and the Benelux Treaty on Extradition and Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters of 27 June 1962.

Following this tradition, the Conseil d'État is of the view that the simplification of the rules and procedures on the extradition mechanism is compatible with the efforts on the European level to intensify the collaboration between Member States. The Conseil d'État recognises, however, that the EAWFD has caused a rupture between the extradition law based on international conventions and the new European area of justice.⁴⁵ It is no longer the executive organs that decide whether it is appropriate to grant an extradition request, but the judicial authorities that decide to extradite a person by applying a European arrest warrant. The Government, through the Ministry of Justice, intervenes only when there is a conflict between a European arrest warrant and a request for extradition by a third state.

The relevant constitutional provisions are the following: 'No one may be prosecuted except in the cases specified by the law and according to the prescribed procedure. No one may be arrested or detained except in the cases specified by the law and according to the prescribed procedure. Every person must be informed without delay of the means of legal recourse they have at their disposal to recover their freedom' (Art. 12). 'No one may be deprived against his will of the judge that the law assigns to him' (Art. 13). 'No penalty may be established or applied except by virtue of the law' (Art. 14).

⁴³ Opinion No. 5104/1, n. 41, p. 3.

⁴⁴ Ibid.

⁴⁵ Ibid., p. 2.

According to the 2009 Revision Proposal, the new relevant provisions introduce some minor additional safeguards to the aforementioned articles. According to Arts. 18, 19 and 20 of the new draft, no one may be prosecuted, arrested or deprived of his liberty except in the cases provided by law and in the form prescribed. No one can be arrested except by a reasoned order of a court, which must be served at the time of the arrest or at the latest within 24 hours. Everyone shall be informed promptly of the reasons for his arrest or deprivation of liberty, the charges against him and the legal remedies available to regain their freedom. Everyone has the right to have his case brought before a court established by law. No penalty may be established or applied except by virtue of the law.

Finally, it is worth mentioning that the Act of 17 March 2004, which transposed the EAWFD in Luxembourg, provides in Art. 18 that if the issuing authorities intend to prosecute the surrendered person for an offence committed prior to his or her surrender, other than that for which he or she was surrendered, they are obliged to submit a request for consent to the Luxembourgish authorities. Consequently, Luxembourg preserved its entitlement to the 'speciality' rule referred to in Art. 27, and no consent on behalf of Luxembourg can be presumed if the surrendered person is prosecuted (or sentenced or detained) for an offence other than the offence providing grounds for the EAW.

2.3.1.2 Because of the general character of the crimes listed in the EAWFD, the Conseil d'État, quoting the example of the Belgian legislator, proposed in its Opinion that the judicial authorities in Luxembourg, upon receiving a European arrest warrant, should exercise a judicial review in order to assess whether the facts of the case fall within the definition of the crimes listed in the EAWFD.

However, the Legal Committee of the Parliament decided not to follow the suggestion of the Conseil d'État.⁴⁶ The reasoning was that such a judicial review, provided in law, might be interpreted by the courts as a thorough and substantial judicial review of an extradition request.⁴⁷ According to the Committee's reasoning, even if the law does not expressly provide for a judicial review, the judicial authorities in Luxembourg would still exercise some kind of judicial review. The exercise of such judicial review would not provoke any difficulties, because the general concepts of the crimes listed in the EAWFD are already recognised and have a common connotation in Luxembourgish law. The Parliamentary Committee underlined that in any case, the judicial authorities in Luxembourg would still have the possibility to submit a request for a preliminary ruling to the Court of Justice of the EU, in case of difficulties in interpretation.

Article 7 of the Act of 17 March 2004 provides for the procedure for execution of an EAW. When the requested person is arrested, the executing judicial authority shall inform the person of the European arrest warrant and of its contents, of the possibility of consenting to surrender to the issuing judicial authority and also of his or her right to be assisted by legal counsel and by an interpreter, if necessary. Within 24 hours of his or her arrest, the requested person is brought before a judge, who controls the person's identity. A hearing takes place on the issue of detention, where the judge takes into consideration both the facts mentioned in the EAW and the person's statements. The requested person may at any time submit a request for his or her release to the Chambre du Conseil du tribunal d'arrondissement. The latter shall order his or her release only if the procedure of arrest has been irregular, and this irregularity has brought about a grave violation of his or her human rights, or if there are safeguards from which the requested person will not benefit if surrendered to the issuing state.

⁴⁶ Rapport no 5104/4 de la Commission Juridique de la Chambre des Députés of 3 March 2004, hereinafter the 'Report'.

⁴⁷ Ibid., p. 7.

According to the Premier Avocat Général of the Parquet Général (Luxembourg), the role of the executing judicial authorities is not to deliver a judgment on the innocence of the requested person, but to apply the Act of 17 March 2004 and review whether all the legal requirements have been met for his or her surrender after the issue of an EAW.⁴⁸ The review does not constitute a review of evidence but a review of the legal conditions for the applicability of the law.

According to research conducted by the Service of Legal Documentation of the Parquet General (Public Prosecutor's Office) in Luxembourg, as at 26 January 2015 there have been five cases brought before the Tribunal d'Arrondissement de Luxembourg (District Court) regarding extradition requests in the context of the EAWFD. None of them have involved a claim of innocence by the arrested person.

There was one case in which the Procureur General d'État (Attorney General of the State), by virtue of Art. 5(6) of the Act of 17 March 2004, refused to extradite a person who was born in Luxembourg because execution of the sentence in Luxembourg was deemed more appropriate given the person's links to Luxembourg.⁴⁹ In another case, the arrested person resorted to the Luxembourgish court claiming health reasons in order to avoid extradition to another Member State. The claim was not accepted by the court, as health reasons do not constitute a legal obstacle to extradition under the EAWFD regime.⁵⁰

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 In its Opinion on the bill transposing the EAWFD in Luxembourg, the Conseil d'État clearly stated that the abolition of the rule of double criminality in the context of the EAWFD would not affect the principle of legality of crimes. According to the Opinion, even if the act committed within the territory of the issuing state may not constitute a criminal offence in the state being asked to execute the extradition, the criminal prosecution of the perpetrator does not violate the principle of nullum crimen sine lege (or the principle of nulla poena sine lege in the case of a European arrest warrant for enforcement of a custodial sentence), because of the principle of territoriality of criminal law. The reasoning is that the person concerned, when committing the act, was on the territory of the issuing state and was required to respect the laws of that state, even if they differ from those of the state of execution of the European arrest warrant.⁵¹ However, in its conclusion, the Conseil d'État expressed some reservations with regards to the crimes listed in the EAWFD in a generic way, as such a general list may contribute to legal uncertainty.

⁴⁸ Interview with the Premier Avocat Général of the Parquet Général (Luxembourg), Jeannot Nies, conducted on 27 February 2015.

⁴⁹ No. Judoc: 99864977, Tribunal d'Arrondissement de Luxembourg, 109/19.01.2007.

⁵⁰ No. Judoc: 99864974, Tribunal d'Arrondissement de Luxembourg, 2369/12.12.2006.

The Legal Committee of the Parliament provided a detailed analysis on the rule of double criminality in the context of the EAWFD. According to the Report, the text of the Framework Decision is a compromise between two different approaches: the first approach calls for a mechanism of mutual recognition of all the judgments in criminal matters rendered by the Member States' judicial authorities; the second approach focuses on the prior harmonisation of criminal law at the EU level before the systematic recognition of the decisions of the Member States. The mutual recognition of judicial decisions without prior harmonisation of the relevant criminal legislation presupposes abandonment of the rule of double criminality.

The Parliamentary Committee recalled that the principle of double criminality does not require the elements of a particular offence to be the same in the two states concerned or to fall under the same qualification. In order to reconcile the conflicting positions of individual Member States, some of which are in favour of the complete abolition of the principle of double criminality while others seek to maintain what they consider as an elementary procedural guarantee, the EAWFD maintains the rule of double criminality except in the case of 32 offences set out in a generic list. According to the Report, the rule of double criminality is not abolished between Member States, except for with regard to offences that are considered to be particularly serious. The system in place is a 'variable geometry system'.⁵²

There is no case law dealing with the principle of legality of crimes or the abolition of the rule of double criminality in the context of the EAWFD. The relevant constitutional provision is Art. 14, which has been transposed mutatis mutandis in Art. 20 of the new draft Constitution: 'No penalty may be established or applied except by virtue of the law.'

⁵¹ Opinion No. 5104/1, n. 41, p. 4.

⁵² Report No. 5104/4, n. 46, p. 3.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 No constitutional issues regarding in absentia judgments have been raised. National courts have not had the opportunity to revisit the standard of protection for in absentia judgments in the context of the EAWFD.

The right to have access to the courts is provided in Art. 13 of the Constitution and in the new Art. 19 of the draft Constitution. The national courts have not dealt with the protection of this right to date. According to legal commentary in Luxembourg, the national courts would likely apply Art. 6 ECHR as such, and not the general principles of EU law regarding the protection of this right.⁵³

Article 19 of the Act of 17 March 2004 provides that where the EAW has been issued for the purposes of executing a sentence or a detention order imposed by a decision rendered in absentia and if the person concerned had not been summoned in person or otherwise informed of the date and place of the hearing which led to the decision rendered in absentia, surrender may be subject to the condition that the issuing judicial authority gives adequate assurance that the person who is the subject of the European arrest warrant will have an opportunity to apply for a retrial of the case in the issuing Member State, and to be present at the hearing. The Conseil d'État did not have any observations regarding this provision that transposes Art. 5 (1) of the EAWFD.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 The issue of surrender of nationals was raised both in the discussions of the Conseil d'État and of the Legal Committee of the Parliament in the process of adopting the Act of 17 March 2004. Luxembourg had made a reservation to the European Convention on Extradition of 13 December 1957, stating that there would be no extradition of Luxembourg citizens (and residents with strong links to Luxembourg) to other states. Article 7(1) of the Act of 20 June 2001 on extradition incorporates this reservation by stating that Luxembourg shall not extradite Luxembourg nationals. In the context of the EAWFD, the Conseil d'État pondered on whether such a rule is out of date, and underlined the political reluctance to abandon this rule. Both the Conseil d'État and the Legal Committee of the Parliament have recognised that the obligation to extradite nationals constitutes a necessary step for the creation of the European Area of Freedom, Security and Justice.

However, Art. 20 of the Act of 17 March 2004 provides that where a person who is the subject of an EAW for the purposes of prosecution is a national of Luxembourg, surrender may be subject to the condition that the person, after being heard, is returned to Luxembourg in order to serve the custodial sentence or detention order passed against him in the issuing Member State. The same applies for residents of Luxembourg who have established links with the country. This provision enacts the requirements of Art. 5(3) of the EAWFD.

⁵³ Wivenes 2000.

The Conseil d'État has emphasised that the requirements of Art. 12 of the Constitution need to be taken into consideration upon an arrest in the context of the EAWFD. Article 12 refers to the right to liberty and to protection from illegal arrest. According to the Conseil d'État, the type of hearing that would be granted to the arrested person when brought before the national court was not clear in the proposed bill. Although verifying the identity of the arrested person is considered appropriate, it is hardly conceivable that the national judge could conduct an investigation on the facts and the charges against the requested person. The judge is limited in principle to asking the person whether he intends to make any statements about the facts which form the basis of the European arrest warrant and to acknowledging and registering these statements, thereby complying with the provisions of Art. 14 of the Framework Decision.

Pursuant to this proposal, Art. 8 of the Act of 17 March 2004 provides that the arrested person should be brought before an investigative judge within 24 hours of the arrest. The investigative judge registers any statements the arrested person may declare and provides a hearing regarding his or her detention. The investigative judge decides whether the arrested person will be held in detention on the basis of the arrest warrant, by taking into consideration the circumstances of the case and the statements of the arrested person.

As underlined by the Premier Avocat Général of the Parquet Général (Luxembourg), travels expenses are always covered by the issuing authority, while the assistance of a lawyer and of an interpreter, if necessary, is provided by Luxembourg during all proceedings taking place in Luxembourg.⁵⁴

2.3.4.2 According to the Premier Avocat Général of the Parquet Général (Luxembourg), the executing judicial authorities in Luxembourg do not follow up on cases of people who have been extradited, as these cases fall outside of Luxembourg's jurisdiction.⁵⁵

Article 8 of the Act of 17 March 2004 provides that if a person held in Luxembourg on the basis of an EAW is surrendered to the issuing authority and is acquitted or dismissed in the issuing state, his or her detention in Luxembourg does not give right to compensation under the Law of 30 December 1981 on Inoperative Preventive Detentions.

The data regarding extradition requests and surrenders in Luxembourg is summarised in Table 1, which was compiled on the basis of the (incomplete) annual reports of the Ministry of Justice of Luxembourg on judicial activities for the period 2004–2013:

⁵⁴ According to his estimate, no (or only a few) Luxembourgers have ever been extradited from Luxembourg. Interview with the Premier Avocat Général of the Parquet Général (Luxembourg), Jeannot Nies, conducted on 27 February 2015.

⁵⁵ Ibid.

Table 1 Data on extradition requests issued and executed in Luxembourg in 2004–2013 on the basis of the annual reports of the Ministry of Justice of Luxembourg

Judicial year	Extraditions	EAW Ministère Public/Parquet Général of Luxembourg	EAW Parquet Général of Diekirch Issued/received
2004–2005	2	35 received	7/3
2005–2006	25	15 received	5/2
2006–2007	–	–	1/7
2007–2008	–	–	–
2008–2009	–	–	1/7
2009–2010	–	–	2/3
2010–2011	–	–	0/4
2011–2012	–	–	0/2
2012–2013	–	–	7/3

Source Author, on the basis of annual reports of the Ministry of Justice of Luxembourg

Table 2 Data on extradition requests issued and executed in Luxembourg in 2005–2009

	EAW issued in Luxembourg	EAW executed in Luxembourg
2005	42	24
2006	35	22
2007	44	15
2008	40	22
2009	46	26

Source European Commission 2011 Report (2011 Report of the EU Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on the implementation since 2007 of the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, COM(2011) 175 final, p. 12.)

The aforementioned numbers in Table 1 may, however, be inaccurate due to a lack of sufficient information specifically regarding EAWs in the annual reports. According to the 2011 Report of the EU Commission, 207 European Arrest Warrants were issued and 109 were executed in Luxembourg from 2005–2009.⁵⁶ The EAWs issued and executed in Luxembourg during this period are summarised in Table 2.

⁵⁶ <http://www.europaforum.public.lu/fr/actualites/2011/04/comm-mandat-arret-europeen/index.html>.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 Luxembourg is party to the European Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters of 20 April 1959, and has made a reservation to this convention. According to this reservation, Luxembourg applies the following legal requirements when executing requests for search and seizure of property (letters rogatory for search and seizure):

- (a) the offence underlying the request must be punishable both under the law of the requesting Party and of the executing Party;
- (b) the offence underlying the request must give rise to extradition from the requested country;
- (c) the execution of the request must be consistent with the law of the requested Party.

More precisely, Luxembourg has declared that any requests rogatory for search or seizure will be executed in so far as they relate to facts which give rise to extradition under the European Convention on Extradition, and if a national court has authorised the execution in accordance with its law.

The Conseil d'État has underlined that the EAWFD is designed to replace the provisions of the European Convention on Extradition vis-à-vis relations between EU Member States. In its Opinion, the Conseil d'État emphasised the new legal regime under the EAWFD. The Conseil d'État declared that even in the absence of an express link between the EAWFD and the European Convention on Mutual Assistance in criminal matters, the risk of the EAWFD having an impact on the reservation made by Luxembourg cannot be completely ruled out. The Conseil d'État argued that the reference to the European Convention on Extradition regarding the requirement of dual criminality becomes inoperative in relations with other EU Member States, and that any reference to the provisions of this Convention must now be understood as a reference to the provisions under the new regime. Therefore, the Conseil d'État deemed the reservation made by Luxembourg in favour of the new legal regime to be inoperative.

The Conseil d'État did raise some constitutional concerns regarding the EAWFD. The Framework Decision does not enumerate offences of political nature among the grounds for refusal to execute a warrant.⁵⁷ Admittedly, Art. 1(3) of the EAWFD,⁵⁸ by its reference to Art. 6 TEU, affects neither the law on asylum nor the right of a state to refuse to execute an EAW when the surrender is sought for political purposes. However, both the Act of 20 June 2001 on extradition and the European Convention on Extradition (Arts. 3(1) and (2)) distinguish requests for extradition which are related to political offences from extradition requests which pursue a political goal. According to the Conseil d'État, this distinction and rule do not have a constitutional value.⁵⁹ The Conseil d'État refers to the cautious position that Luxembourg took with regards to the European Convention against terrorism, where Luxembourg did not make any reservation regarding its obligation to extradite because of the political nature of the offence. However, Luxembourg does not accept or apply in a generic way the principle laid down in Art. 5 of the European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism,⁶⁰ namely that no offence may be regarded by the Member State as a political offence, as a fact connected with such an offence or as an offence inspired by political motives. A similar stance is to be expected by Luxembourg regarding refusal to execute a warrant if the offence for which the warrant was issued was of political nature.

⁵⁷ Opinion No. 5104/1, n. 41, p. 5.

⁵⁸ ‘Nothing in this Framework Decision may be interpreted as prohibiting refusal to surrender a person for whom a European arrest warrant has been issued when there are reasons to believe, on the basis of objective elements, that the said arrest warrant has been issued for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing a person on the grounds of his or her sex, race, religion, ethnic origin, nationality, language, political opinions or sexual orientation, or that that person's position may be

Regarding the abolition of the exequatur in civil and commercial matters, an empirical study of the exequatur orders issued by the District Court of Luxembourg in the period of 2008–2009 (that is before the period that the abolition of the exequatur became effective by virtue of Regulation 1215/2012) has been conducted.⁶¹ In statistical terms, the District Court of Luxembourg declared executory on the territory of Luxembourg the totality of the decisions presented in the exequatur orders. The speed with which the exequatur orders were rendered is impressive: 80% of the orders were rendered within a week. Only 4.4% of the enforcement orders were subject to appeal before the Luxembourg Court of Appeal, of which only two (0.6%) were successful. In the first case the request in exequatur was found inadmissible ratione materiae,⁶² and in the second case the court found that the defendant's rights were violated as he had not been duly notified about the case against him in the first place.⁶³

2.3.5.2 Apart from the discussion on the suitability of the legal instrument (Framework Decision) in the Conseil d'État, no discussion on the appropriateness of mutual recognition on criminal law matters has been raised in Luxembourg. The Conseil d'État has underscored the importance of the goal of establishing an Area of Freedom, Security and Justice in Europe.

2.3.5.3 No concerns regarding any change in the role of national courts have been expressed in Luxembourg. In general, it is safe to argue that there is a strong commitment to the EU mechanisms.

prejudiced for any of these reasons.' Recital (12), Council Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA, n. 40.

⁵⁹ Opinion No. 5104/1, n. 41, p. 6.

⁶⁰ Concluded at Strasbourg on 27 January 1977.

⁶¹ Muller and Cuniberti 2013, p. 6; see also Cuniberti and Rueda 2010.

⁶² Judgment CA Luxembourg, 7 January 2010, No. 34658.

⁶³ Judgment CA Luxembourg, 10 February 2011, No. 35005.

2.3.5.4 Article 3 of the Act of 17 March 2004 provides for a proportionality test applicable upon both the issuance and the execution of an EAW. Specifically, an EAW may be issued only for offences punishable by law with a custodial sentence or a detention order for a maximum period of at least twelve months, or when a custodial sentence or a detention order has been imposed for sanctions prescribed for a period of at least four months.

Regarding the execution of an EAW, Art. 3(3) provides for a proportionality test even for the offences which escape the rule of double criminality. Consequently, the Luxembourgish authorities shall review whether the 32 enumerated offences are punishable in the issuing state with a custodial sentence or a detention order for a maximum period of at least three years.

The introduction of these proportionality tests was the object of analysis in the Opinion of the Conseil d'État and in the Report of the Parliamentary Committee.⁶⁴ Drawing analogies from the French Conseil d'État, both the Conseil d'État and the Parliamentary Committee emphasised the necessity for the issuing state to provide proof that the offence for which an arrest warrant is issued is punishable under the national law with a custodial sentence or a detention order of a specific threshold of severity. This condition responds to the requirements of the constitutional order. Therefore, it is not sufficient that the offence for which an EAW is issued falls within the scope of the exhaustive list of the 32 offences which escape the review of dual criminality, but the offence must also be sufficiently serious for the authorities in Luxembourg to execute the EAW.

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

To the Expert's knowledge no further constitutional issues have arisen in Luxembourg's case law and legal commentary, or do arise in his view in relation to European criminal law in the Grand Duchy.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 According to the Constitution: 'The home is inviolable. No domiciliary visit may be made except in cases and according to the procedure laid down by the law' (Art. 15); 'The secrecy of correspondence is inviolable. The law determines the agents responsible for the violation of the secrecy of correspondence entrusted to the postal services. The law determines the guarantee to be afforded to the secrecy of telegrams' (Art. 28).

⁶⁴ Opinion Conseil d'Etat of 19 December 2003, doc. parl. No. 5104/1, p. 9 and Report No. 5104/4, n. 46, p. 6.

However, no constitutional issues have been raised in Luxembourg with regard to the implementation of the Data Retention Directive⁶⁵ (DRD) or with regard to its application by the courts. The retention of data had already been allowed in Luxembourg before the adoption of the Data Retention Directive on the basis of the ‘Privacy and Electronic Communications Act’ of 30 May 2005.⁶⁶

The national implementing act of the DRD of 13 July 2010 has not been challenged in the national Constitutional Court nor in any other court on grounds of the legality of the Directive.

There is no previous jurisprudence as regards the constitutionality of data retention in Luxembourg. There is also little case law of the national Constitutional Court and no cases involving a clear definition of the right to privacy versus law enforcement measures. It is therefore not possible to derive whether or not a court, when dealing with a national measure comparable to the DRD, would raise a constitutional issue or – as this is possible in the Luxembourgish legal order – directly in view of the ECHR. If asked to speculate (not based on previous case law), from a Luxembourgish perspective it is rather unlikely that a comparable measure would be struck down in its entirety.

While the transposition of the DRD in the Luxembourgish legal system does not seem to have raised particular issues,⁶⁷ it is noteworthy that, following the ECJ judgment annulling the DRD, Luxembourg decided to amend its national law and has in the meanwhile launched the legislative procedure in this respect. On 7 January 2015, the Ministry of Justice filed a proposal which modifies both the domestic Code of Criminal Procedure and the domestic Act implementing the DRD, i.e. the Act of 30 May 2005 laying down specific provisions for the protection of persons with regard to the processing of personal data in the electronic communications sector (Privacy and Electronic Communications Act 2005) (hereinafter Proposal).⁶⁸

The Proposal concerns both traffic data (Art. 5 of the Privacy and Electronic Communications Act 2005) and location data other than traffic data (Art. 9 of the Privacy and Electronic Communications Act 2005), and brings four main amendments to the existing domestic rules. The Proposal also foresees that a grand-ducal decree will be adopted in order to lay down detailed enforcement rules to ensure the ⁶⁶ Loi du 30 mai 2005 relative aux dispositions spécifiques de protection de la personne à l’égard du traitement des données à caractère personnel dans le secteur des communications électroniques et portant modification des Arts. 88-2 et 88-4 du Code d’instruction criminelle, Mémorial A-73, 7 June 2005, p. 1144.

⁶⁵ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁶⁷ In this respect, see Cole and Boehm 2012.

⁶⁸ Doc. parl. No. 6763 Projet de loi portant modification du Code d’instruction criminelle et de la loi modifiée du 30 mai 2005 concernant la protection de la vie privée dans le secteur des communications électroniques.

integrity and confidentiality of the data. The Proposal provides for access for law enforcement bodies to the retained data on the basis of an exhaustive list of criminal offences, which carry a sentence of at least one year (previously the crimes concerned were not listed). The Proposal further stipulates that the retained data must be irrevocably and without any delay deleted upon expiration of the retention period. Electronic communication providers are no longer permitted to store the data in an anonymised form after the expiration of the retention period. Finally, the Proposal foresees that data shall be stored on the territory of the European Union and increases the penalties in case of non-compliance with the Privacy and Electronic Communications Act 2005 to a sentence of six months to two years of imprisonment.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 To the Expert's knowledge, the issue of unpublished EU legislation has not arisen as such in domestic case law or in the public debate. As the Luxembourgish language is not an official language of the EU and French is the official legal language in Luxembourg, no issue of EU legislation unpublished in the national language could arise in any case.

The main rules to be referred to in this context are Arts. 112 and 36 of the Luxembourgish Constitution. According to Art. 112, '[a]ny law, order or regulation of general or municipal administration is binding only once published in the form determined by law'. In 1901, la Cour observed that '[a]t all times and in all legislation, there has always been the immutable principle that no law shall become mandatory without being published'.⁶⁹ Statutory and regulatory acts generally enter into force four days following their publication in the Mémorial, i.e. the Luxembourgish official journal.

Given that, in the Luxembourgish legal system, international treaties ratified by Luxembourg take precedence over domestic law including the domestic Constitution, the requirements as to publication apply to international agreements. In this context Art. 36(3) indeed prohibits the existence of 'secret treaties'. Acts approving international treaties are published in the Mémorial together with the text of the international treaties concerned.

With regard to EU secondary legislation, the publication obligation can be satisfied in Luxembourg by referring to the publication of the given act in the Official Journal of the EU.

⁶⁹ Cour, March 9 1901, Pasicrisie luxembourgeoise 6, p. 297.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 No standard of protection issues have apparently ever been raised in Luxembourg with regard to the standard of protection of property rights, legal certainty, legitimate expectations, non-retroactivity or proportionality in relation to EU measures. Again, the far-reaching understanding of primacy of EU law, the lack of competence of the Constitutional Court and the rather underdeveloped standards of fundamental rights in the Constitution may explain this finding.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 (a) Luxembourg's commitment to the European Financial Stability Facility (EFSF) amounts to 1.947 billion EUR. The ESM capital subscription made by Luxembourg amounts to 1.753 billion EUR, of which 0.2 billion is as paid-in capital. The total participation of Luxembourg in the European Stability Mechanism (ESM) and EFSF amounts to 3.753 billion EUR.⁷⁰ The GDP of Luxembourg in 2013 has been estimated at approximately 45 billion EUR⁷¹ and the Luxembourgish budget for 2015 (expenses) is foreseen at approximately 15.658 billion EUR.⁷²

The constitutionality of the commitment under the ESM has not been put into question although some objections to the laws approving the respective aspects related to the ESM⁷³ amendment of Art. 136 TFEU were voiced during the legislative procedure.⁷⁴

⁷⁰ See Rapport de la Commission des Finances et du Budget, 22 June 2012, doc. parl. No. 6334/2, p. 2 and p. 8.

⁷¹ See http://www.statistiques.public.lu/stat/TableViewer/tableView.aspx?ReportId=1434&IF_Language=fra&MainTheme=5&FldrName=2&RFPPath=22.

⁷² See <http://www.budget.public.lu/#!/bleck>.

⁷³ La loi portant approbation de la décision du Conseil européen du 25 mars 2011 modifiant l'article 136 du traité sur le fonctionnement de l'Union européenne en ce qui concerne un mécanisme de stabilité pour les Etats membres dont la monnaie est l'euro; loi portant approbation du traité instituant le mécanisme européen de stabilité, signé le 2 février 2012 à Bruxelles; loi relative à la participation de l'Etat au mécanisme européen de stabilité. For the text of these legislative acts see: Mémorial A-135, 5 July 2012, p. 1706. http://www.chd.lu/wps/PA_RoleEtenduEuro/FTSByteServletImpl/?path=/export/exped/sexdadata/Mag/129/168/112687.pdf.

⁷⁴ For an overview of the position of Luxembourg on the euro crisis and its management as well as on the legislative discussion, see Kroeger 2014.

The Conseil d'État has also expressed several objections.⁷⁵ It has pointed out the absence of a fiche financière, i.e. a financial statement that has to be associated with all Acts burdening the state budget. Also, the Conseil d'État has expressed some perplexity as to the specific features of the ESM, its adjustments having preceded its actual launch, which leaves the impression that the EU Member States are following rather than shaping economic realities. Interestingly, the Conseil d'État has expressed the position that the ESM must evolve as a part of the EU institutions and must not drift towards the intergovernmental method that some of the Member States seem to favour. Moreover, the Conseil d'État has questioned the arguably insufficient size of the capital of the ESM (700 billion EUR) in the light of the real needs of the Member States in difficulty as well as the needs of European banks. Finally, the Conseil d'État has expressed its general regret with regard to the unsatisfactory management of the public debt in the eurozone and the systemic nature of the financial crisis therein. In its view, the statement of reasons of the legislative proposal could have been more analytical and could have spelled out the position that Luxembourg should defend in the context of the ongoing discussion in Europe.

(b) See the reply in (a) above.

(c) In Luxembourg, debate on the unconditional nature of the commitments does not seem to have arisen.

2.7.2 No debate on other proposed measure seems to have taken place in Luxembourg. This may also be due to the fact that Luxembourg has not been subject to any austerity regime and, rather to the contrary, benefits from the presence of the ESM on its territory. In this respect, it is noteworthy that the predecessor of the ESM, the European Financial Stability Facility (relevant for financing programmes pre-existing the establishment of the ESM), was not an international organisation but a private law entity (société anonyme) established under Luxembourgish law. For this reason the Conseil d'État criticised the initially broad scope of the immunity of jurisdiction and execution granted to the EFSF (which was suggested to be similar to that granted to the ESM) as contrary to Art. 6 ECHR and Art. 10bis of the Constitution.⁷⁶ In response to this critique, the draft Act regarding Luxembourg's participation in the ESM was modified.

2.7.3 The question on bailouts is not applicable to Luxembourg. Economic issues have been dealt with recently by Luxembourg, but their nature cannot be compared with those that have been tackled in relation to austerity programmes. The unsatisfactory competitiveness of Luxembourg has been pointed out. As of 2013,

⁷⁵ See Opinion of Conseil d'Etat dated 6 March 2012, on Projet de loi portant approbation de la décision du Conseil européen du 25 mars 2011 modifiant l'article 136 du traité sur le fonctionnement de l'Union européenne en ce qui concerne un mécanisme de stabilité pour les Etats membres dont la monnaie est l'euro, doc. parl. No. 6334/1.

⁷⁶ Complementary Opinion Conseil d'Etat, doc. parl. No. 6406/3, 12 June 2012, p. 2.

Luxembourg has modified its system of pensions and the system of automatic wage increases has been limited in order to bring such increases in line with the economic reality.⁷⁷

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 (a) There are unfortunately no reliable statistics available in Luxembourg concerning the number of cases in which the applicants have requested preliminary rulings with regard to the validity of EU measures. In the time frame since 2001, only two cases were identified after a thorough research of the case law of the respective civil, social and administrative courts.

First, in a case brought to the Conseil supérieur des assurances sociales, the applicant challenged the validity of Regulation 1408/71 (on the cooperation between social security systems) with regard to former Art. 48(2) EC (now Art. 45 (2) TFEU) on the free movement of workers. It was argued that the application of the residence clause in Art. 71 of that Regulation constitutes indirect discrimination on grounds of nationality with regard to unemployed frontier workers.⁷⁸

Second, in a case brought to the tribunal administratif, the applicants challenged the validity of Directive 2003/87/CE (of 13 October 2003, establishing a scheme for greenhouse gas emission allowance trading within the Community) based on the ground that the Directive would not sufficiently take into account the specific situation of the steel industry within global competition.⁷⁹ The courts did not submit a reference for a preliminary ruling to the ECJ in either of these cases.

(b) From 2006 to the end of 2014, Luxembourgish courts sent 26 preliminary ruling requests to the ECJ. All of them were interpretative questions, and not a single one contested the validity of an EU measure.

2.8.2 In the Expert's view, it does not seem that the standard of judicial review by the EU courts is considered lower than that of the domestic courts from a Luxembourgish point of view. Moreover, the domestic courts commonly give the impression that they share the standards of review applied by the EU courts, to which they refer quite extensively.

2.8.3 The approach of the Constitutional Court reviewing the constitutionality of legislative acts could be considered – at least statistically – as rather vigorous. In almost one-third (36) of its currently (by 20 February 2015) 116 decisions, it has declared provisions of legislative acts contrary to articles of the Constitution. Its control is, however, very limited in scope, as it can only review the constitutionality of such provisions in response to preliminary questions from ordinary judges that must precisely indicate the contested provisions and the relevant articles of the Constitution. It has furthermore been shown that the Constitutional Court apparently recognises a wider margin of appreciation for the legislator in the field of economic and social law that in the field of civil and family law.⁸⁰

⁷⁷ Cf. Kroeger 2014, point I.1.

⁷⁸ Arrêt du 3 décembre 2007, ADEM 2006/0094.

⁷⁹ Arrêt du 5 avril 2006, nos. 20372 et 20373 du rôle.

If the Constitutional Court declares a legislative provision contrary to the Constitution, the ordinary judges who have to decide on the case are obliged to disregard that provision, which, however, remains formally in force.

The Conseil d'État also plays an important role as a guardian of the Constitution. Its function is to assess ex ante the conformity of all draft legislative acts and grand-ducal decrees with norms of higher law, comprising the Constitution, international treaties and the general principles of law. The Chambre in general follows its opinions.

Unfortunately, there are no further reliable statistical data available on the proportion of challenges to the validity of a domestic Act of Parliament that have led to annulment of the Act in question.

2.8.4 On the one hand, the Constitutional Court is not entitled to review legislative acts approving international treaties. Acts of the Chambre transposing or executing obligations deriving from secondary EU legislation are not explicitly excluded from the Constitutional Court's competence. Until now, no such Act has, however, been submitted to the Constitutional Court in the context of a preliminary question from an ordinary court. The opinion seems to prevail that the 'immunity' of Acts approving treaties also covers Acts implementing EU legislation. No legislative act implementing EU legislation has ever been submitted to the Constitutional Court.

On the other hand, the ordinary courts may not review the constitutionality of legislative acts at all and, regarding the conformity of the latter with international law, they usually apply the principle of primacy very strictly. Thus, no judgment reviewing national measures implementing EU legislation against national or ECtHR standards of protection of rights could be identified.

2.8.5 To the Expert's knowledge no concern has been expressed in Luxembourg about a gap in judicial review resulting from an allegedly lower standard of review by the ECJ. As the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Luxembourgish Constitution do not go beyond the standard of the ECHR in many respects, the accession of the EU to the ECHR does not raise concerns about a potential gap in judicial review either.

2.8.6 The issue of equal treatment of individuals falling within the scope of EU law and those falling within the scope of domestic protection of constitutional rights has only been raised once when the Chambre adopted the measure implementing ⁸⁰ Cf. Kinsch 2008 at p. 89.

Directive 2004/38 on the free movement of citizens of the EU.⁸¹ In order to avoid any situations of ‘reverse discrimination’, Art. 12 (3) of the Act of 29 August 2008 on free movement of persons and immigration contains a clause stating that ‘[f]amily members of a Luxembourgish citizen … are equated with family members of a citizen of the EU’.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 No other significant issues have arisen in Luxembourg with regard to constitutional rights or the rule of law in relation to EU law.

The transposition and implementation of EU measures by grand-ducal decrees is undeniably seen as a way to increase the speed of implementation, as well as the Grand Duchy’s ranking on the European Commission’s scoreboards. Every year, the Government as well as the Chambre proudly announce the progress made in this respect. The matter is currently determined by an Enabling Act (loi d’habilitation) adopted by the Chambre in 1971, which is criticised because of technical insufficiencies and its limited scope, but is considered indispensable in principle. The Working Draft of the current constitutional amendment procedure foresees the addition of an article to the Constitution that will explicitly give the executive power the competence to transpose and implement EU measures by grand-ducal decree.

Acts of Parliament will thus lose some of their importance in national legislation because of the perceived need to streamline the procedures for the transposition and implementation of secondary EU legislation. In so far as ever more important sections of national legislation are directly conditioned by Union law and legislators face strict deadlines for the transposition of directives, the Chambre has adopted an Enabling Act conferring the competence to proceed on the executive exercising its regulatory competence.⁸²

This Act, however, is limited in scope and has not really proven an ‘appropriate and effective response’ to the problems encountered.⁸³ The inclusion of a new Art. 45 in the Constitution, set out in the 2015 Working Draft and which obligates the ⁸¹ Directive 2004/38/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 29 April 2004 on the right of citizens of the Union and their family members to move and reside freely within the territory of the Member States amending Regulation (EEC) No 1612/68 and repealing Directives 64/221/EEC, 68/360/EEC, 72/194/EEC, 73/148/EEC, 75/34/EEC, 75/35/EEC, 90/364/EEC, 90/365/EEC and 93/96/EEC, [2004] OJ L 158/77.

⁸² Act of 9 August 1971 (as amended) ‘on the execution and sanctioning of decisions and directives and the sanctioning of regulations of the European Communities in the economic, technical, agricultural, forestry, social and transport spheres’.

⁸³ Cf. Schmit 2013, p. 5 and Weirich 1986, p. 966.

Head of State to adopt all the necessary regulations for the application of legally binding acts of the European Union, will eradicate a number of legal uncertainties in this area.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 In the Expert's view, 'common constitutional traditions' is a very broad and rather vague concept that has helped the ECJ to legitimise its jurisprudence that introduces fundamental rights as general principles of law in the EU legal order. This concept may certainly encompass the constitutional rights and principles addressed in the Questionnaire as well as the rights and principles enshrined in the ECHR or within the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU. However, in the Expert's view, the broadness of the concept does not allow for the deduction of a precise normative substance and a clear-cut scope of these rights and principles that would be shared by all of the Member States.

It appears difficult to infer the existence of a 'common constitutional tradition' from an element considered in a single Member State as an element of its constitutional identity. To be considered as a 'common constitutional tradition', such a right or principle does not need to be part of a Member State's identity. It would be sufficient that it has been recognised as an element of constitutional law by the Constitution itself or any relevant case law.

2.10.2 For reasons of uncertainty regarding their content and scope, it seems difficult to envisage how these 'common constitutional traditions' could become a more direct and relevant source of EU law. Within the judicial dialogue between national judges and the ECJ, there might, however, still be merit in invoking these traditions at least in so far as it would be possible to establish the existence of a commonly shared standard based on a serious study of comparative case law stemming from a large group of Member States. The question is whether this is reasonably feasible for national courts when sending a preliminary ruling reference to the ECJ.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 There has been no discussion in Luxembourg on whether the Court of Justice was justified in setting the standard of protection of Charter rights at the level of the ECHR. There are no constitutional rights or principles protected under the Luxembourgish Constitution or by the national courts where a significantly higher level of protection can be identified in comparison with the standards set by the ECtHR.

In the Expert's view, higher standards at national level and a greater deference to national constitutional or supreme courts should be allowed by the ECJ whenever the courts of the relevant Member State can reasonably argue that this higher standard is an element of its constitutional identity as protected under Art. 4 TEU. The national courts should, however, also seek to avoid conflicts between supposedly different standards by seeking to interpret the relevant national constitutional rights and principles, as far as possible, in the light of the corresponding provisions of the ECHR and the Charter, even in cases which do not fall within the scope of the latter.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 (a) There has been no significant public deliberation on constitutional rights in Luxembourg, neither at the time of adoption nor at the time of national implementation of the EAWFD. The debate was exclusively held within the Conseil d'État and the Chambre during the legislative implementation procedure. No objection based on the safeguards for constitutional rights was raised.

(b) The same applies with regard to the adoption and implementation of the DRD.

2.12.2 From a Luxembourgish point of view, no important constitutional issue has ever been raised at the stage of implementing EU law. For the reasons already explained, the domestic system of constitutional review has never experienced a challenge made to national legislation implementing EU law.

In the Expert's view, the members of the national governments should raise such important constitutional issues when deliberating new EU legislation within the Council of Ministers. In order to be aware of such issues before the final adoption of an EU act, Member States should establish internal advisory procedures alerting the Government of any foreseeable constitutional implications of an envisaged EU act. In Luxembourg such a preliminary opinion could be prepared by the Conseil d'État. A wider consultation including the Chambre and other bodies and NGOs would probably be difficult to accomplish within the usual time constraints.

2.12.3 The Expert would indeed support a recommendation to suspend the application and carry out a review of EU measures, if important constitutional issues have been identified by a number of constitutional courts, even though some Member States' constitutional courts do not review the constitutionality of EU measures or national implementation acts of these measures. A Member State like Luxembourg would indeed be excluded from such a mechanism for the time being.

The problem would be to define what an 'important' constitutional issue exactly is, and what number of national constitutional courts would be considered sufficient to initiate such a suspension procedure. Another practical problem would arise from the fact that such issues might be raised over a long period after the adoption of the EU measure according to the features of the national systems of constitutional review providing for ex ante review, ex post review or a combination of both.

The Expert would not support a general recommendation to recognise as a defence on the part of a Member State in an infringement proceeding that unconstitutionality has been identified in accordance with the domestic system of control of constitutionality. On the one hand, such a defence would not be applicable to Luxembourg and, on the other hand, it should be strictly limited to infringement proceedings that concern the implementation of an EU measure that is considered in the particular Member State as contrary to an element of the constitutional identity of that Member State.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 From a Luxembourgish point of view (but also as a general position), the Expert does not share the concerns of an 'overall reduction' in the standard of protection of constitutional rights and the rule of law in the context of EU law. With regard to the standard of protection under Luxembourgish constitutional law, it might even be argued that there has been an overall increase of the standard of protection of fundamental rights due to the combined influence of the case law of the ECtHR and of the ECJ. The alleged reductions in the standard of protection linked in particular to the EAWFD and the DRD cannot be confirmed with regard to the Grand Duchy.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 As outlined in Sect. 1.3.1, although Art. 49bis provides only for temporary transfers of powers, it has been interpreted broadly in order to be compatible with the accession of Luxembourg to the EU Treaties.

In 1956, the Conseil d'État considered it more appropriate to retain the temporary character of the delegation of powers, as it emphasised the precariousness of any consented devolution to international institutions.⁸⁴ No other limits to the transfer of powers are provided for in the Constitution. However, Art. 1 of the Constitution postulates the values upheld in Luxembourg in general and not in the specific context of international cooperation: democracy, liberty, independence and the indivisibility of the state.

⁸⁴ Doc. parl. No. 25 (516), p. CCIV.

Regarding the ratification of international treaties, Art. 37 of the Constitution provides that treaties are operative after having been approved by law and published in the form specified for the publication of laws. Secret treaties are abolished. International treaties that transfer powers to international institutions need to be approved by Parliament, according to a special majority requirement of two-thirds of the members, similarly to the constitutional amending procedure as provided by Art. 114. Reservations to international treaties by Luxembourg require legislative approval as well.⁸⁵ Article 95ter(2) explicitly prohibits the Constitutional Court from reviewing Acts of Parliament which transpose international treaties in the domestic legal order.

There is no reference to international customary law in the Constitution or in the draft text of the Constitution which is under consideration.

Luxembourg is a founding member of the United Nations, NATO and the International Criminal Court (ICC). Article 118 of the Constitution provides that its provisions do not constitute an obstacle to the approval of the ICC Statute and to the exercise of Luxembourg's obligations under the ICC Statute.⁸⁶ The draft text of the Constitution contains a similar provision in Art. 107. Luxembourg also accepts the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice as compulsory, ipso facto and without the requirement of reciprocity, in any disputes arising after 1930, regarding situations or facts subsequent to its signature, except in cases where the parties have agreed or shall agree to have recourse to another procedure or to another method of pacific settlement.⁸⁷

3.1.2 Article 49bis was introduced in 1956 by a constitutional amendment. This provision essentially raised two controversial questions: the position of the article in the Constitution's structure and its content. Regarding the first question, the Conseil d'État opined that this provision needs a distinct position in the Constitution because it introduces a derogation to the exercise of the sovereign powers (executive, legislative and judicial) that are also regulated in Arts. 33–49. Moreover, this provision deals with the exercise of a new type of power, which is also linked to sovereignty. For these reasons the Conseil d'État proposed the addition of a new Article, 49bis, instead of incorporating a new paragraph in the existing provisions. As for the choice of the wording ‘institutions of international law’, the Conseil d'État had originally proposed the phrase ‘international institutions’. This proposal, however, was not retained by the Parliamentary Committee, which opted for the ⁸⁵ ‘Approbation des traités’ in Besch 2005, p. 143.

⁸⁶ Original French text: ‘Les dispositions de la Constitution ne font pas obstacle à l'approbation du Statut de la Cour Pénale Internationale, fait à Rome, le 17 juillet 1998, et à l'exécution des obligations en découlant dans les conditions prévues par ledit Statut.’

⁸⁷ See <http://www.icj-cij.org/jurisdiction/index.php?p1=5&p2=1&p3=1&code=LU>.

term ‘institutions of international law’ in order to encompass not only international but supranational institutions as well.⁸⁸

Drawing inspiration from the Belgian Constitution of 1831, Art. 37 was last modified by the 1956 constitutional amendment. During the revision, Art. 37 was at the centre of a debate between the Government and the Conseil d'Etat. The Parliament declared its intention to systemise and integrate all the constitutional provisions on international relations in one chapter, while the Government proposed the addition of a series of new articles to Art. 37 in order to exhaustively consolidate all the constitutional provisions on international relations. These proposals were weighed with care by the Conseil d'Etat, which opted for the solution of adding only a new Art. 49bis, leaving the structure of the Constitution intact.

The amendment of 1956 did not alter the principle of the approval of international treaties by Parliament. The constitutional amendment only specified the form that this approval would take, by adding the requirement of approval by a law. In its Opinion of 10 July 1956, the Conseil d'État underlined the distinction between the enforceability of the approving law and of the international treaty. They are two different procedures, which may take place simultaneously or separately, but both need to be compatible with the corresponding constitutional provisions. The Conseil d'État adopted, finally, one formal requirement, that of the publication of the approving law.

Article 48 of the proposed draft Constitution contains a similar provision to Art. 37 regarding the ratification of international treaties. Instead of naming the Grand Duke, the provision states that the ‘Head of State’ shall be responsible for concluding international treaties. The draft provision includes a reference to the procedure for the termination of an international treaty, similar to the procedure foreseen for the conclusion of a treaty, which is not included in the current version of Art. 37. The new draft article also states explicitly that the Head of State shall adopt all necessary regulations for the application of EU law in Luxembourg.

Article 118 was introduced in 2000 to allow for the approval of the ICC Statute and the participation of Luxembourg in the ICC. The Conseil d'État emphasised the principle of complementarity of the ICC vis-à-vis the national courts. The ICC was considered as advancement for the international protection of human rights, but the relevant constitutional amendment provoked difficulties. In its Opinion of 4 May 1999, the Conseil d'État stated that the non-recognition of immunity for state officials might not be consistent with Art. 4 of the Constitution, which provides for the inviolability of the Grand Duke, with Arts. 68–69 on the immunity of Members of Parliament and with Arts. 82 and 116, which deal with the criminal responsibility of ministers. However and contrary to the position of the French Constitutional Court, the Conseil d'État in Luxembourg concluded that the ICC Statute was not incompatible with the Constitution, because the ICC Prosecutor’s investigation procedure is based on consultations with the state authorities concerned. The Conseil d'Etat did not consider it appropriate to revise all the relevant constitutional provisions concerning the immunity of state officials. According to the Conseil d'Etat, Art. 118 intended to neutralise any obstacle that the Constitution might pose to the creation and function of the ICC.⁸⁹ The Parliamentary Committee accepted the opinion of the Conseil d'Etat. Article 118 was considered the necessary step for the adaptation of the Luxembourgish constitutional legal order to the ICC Statute.⁹⁰ Since the approval of the ICC Statute has already taken place and is no longer relevant, the new draft Art. 107 provides that the Constitution shall not hamper Luxembourg's obligations under the ICC Statute.⁹¹

⁸⁸ Doc. parl. No. 25 (516), p. CCIV.

All these amendments and the current Constitution revision process constitute an expression of Luxembourg's commitment to European integration and its long-standing deference to international law.

3.1.3 Article 49bis, which provides for the transfer of powers to international institutions only temporarily, is to be modified in the course of the current revision procedure.

3.1.4 In the Expert's view, the relevant constitutional provision, Art. 49bis, regarding the temporary limits of the delegation of powers to international institutions, indeed requires amendment. However, there seems to be a consensus not to include any other limits to such delegation. Furthermore, an explicit reference to the status of international law vis-à-vis the national legal order may also be in order. However, the constitutional revision procedure is still ongoing and the protection of constitutional rights is included in the discussions.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 In the Constitution, there is no express reference to the legal status of international treaties in domestic law. However, as discussed in Sect. 1.3.1, the Conseil d'État as well as the Cour de cassation have firmly confirmed that in the case of conflict between a rule of domestic law and a rule of international law that has direct effect in the domestic legal order, the rule of the international treaty shall prevail.⁹²

Regarding Art. 37 of the Constitution, there is jurisprudence clarifying the following issues: types of international treaties, procedure for the promulgation of international treaties, interpretation and suspension of international treaties, the

⁸⁹ Doc. parl. No. 4634/1, p. 1.

⁹⁰ Rapport de la commission des Institutions et de la Revision constitutionnelle du 6 juillet 2000, doc. parl. No. 4634/2.

⁹¹ Original French text: 'Art. 107 Les dispositions de la Constitution ne font pas obstacle aux obligations découlant du Statut de la Cour pénale internationale.'

⁹² Conseil d'Etat, 28 July 1951, Pasicrisie 15, p. 263. See also Cour de Cassation, 8 June 1950, Pasicrisie 15, p. 41 and Cour de Cassation, 14 July 1954, Pasicrisie 16, p. 151.

conflict between an international treaty and national law and the power of the Grand Duke to delegate his authority to conclude international treaties.

Regarding types of international treaties, in 1960 the Cour de Cassation decided that the procedure used for the conclusion of an international treaty does not affect the determination of its legal status domestically, because the procedure, the type of obligations and even the terminology used for a treaty are determined on the international level by diplomatic means. Despite their diversity, all international treaties are equipped with the same binding effect in Luxembourg.⁹³ Furthermore, the jurisprudence has confirmed that no specific form of international treaty is required for the regularity of an international instrument duly approved by law.⁹⁴

Regarding the procedure, as early as in 1949 the national courts declared that international treaties are not enforceable or judiciable unless approved by Parliament and published in the Mémorial.⁹⁵ Interestingly, in 1889, the court in Luxembourg declared that international arrangements which have not been the subject of a published Act or of a general administrative measure would not create any obligations for Luxembourgers.⁹⁶

3.2.2 The traditional distinction between monist and dualistic approaches to international law is outdated. When researching the issue of the interaction between the international and domestic legal orders, a strictly dualistic approach is not effective in capturing the perplexity of the different normative structures set in place for the protection of fundamental rights or the different levels of international obligations of states. Even using the term ‘different legal orders’ has a dualistic connotation and refers to a more enclosed system of hierarchical legal orders. Such an enclosed system of hierarchical legal orders, however, does not correspond to reality, given the international protection of human rights regime and the case law of both the Court of Justice of the European Union and the European Court of Human Rights.

No legal commentary exists on the applicability of monism and dualism in Luxembourg. Luxembourgish institutions and courts have adopted a progressive view on the position of international law in the national legal order, following a somewhat monistic approach, should this term still be considered relevant.

3.3 Democratic control

3.3.1 (a) As regards constitutional rules on parliamentary involvement with regard to the initial negotiations and ratification of international treaties, the Chambre is not involved in the negotiation of treaties but intervenes prior to ratification. The ⁹³ Cour, 3 December 1960, Pasicrisie 18, p. 223.

⁹⁴ Cour de Cassation, 21 Décembre 1961, Pasicrisie 18, p. 424.

⁹⁵ Trib.Lux., 21 December 1949, Pasicrisie 15, 25.

⁹⁶ Cour, 2 August 1889, Pasicrisie 3, p. 123.

approval of an international treaty by the Luxembourgish legislator and the subsequent publication of the approving Act are indeed the necessary conditions that have to be fulfilled so that the international treaty can be ratified internationally⁹⁷ and so that it can produce domestic legal effects⁹⁸.

An international treaty is approved by a legislative act (see Art. 37 of the Constitution) and follows the same rules as approval of an Act of Parliament dealing with domestic affairs (except for treaties conferring the execution of legislative, executive or judicial powers temporarily to an international body; in such case the special majority requirements under Art. 114(2) of the Constitution related to constitutional amendments are to be followed). The legislative act is a purely formal measure by which the national legislator approves the treaty and possible reservations to the treaty.⁹⁹ Due to the requirements related to the publication of Acts approving international treaties, it seems that simplified (executive) international agreements cannot produce legally binding domestic effects (unless submitted to the publication procedure).¹⁰⁰ While the legislature can block the ratification of an international treaty by not approving it, legislative approval does not oblige the executive power to proceed with the ratification on the international plane.

(b) Under the Constitution, and apart from the EU-specific rules on the involvement of national parliaments based on the principle of subsidiarity (see Sect. 1.4.1), the Chambre is not endowed with any post-ratification monitoring/implementation powers as regards international treaties that have been ratified by Luxembourg (and internally approved and published). However, as a matter of practice, the Luxembourgish legislator is present through its delegations within various international and European fora, such as NATO, Benelux and the Interparliamentary Conference on Common Foreign and Security Policy and Common Security and Defence Policy.

3.3.2 As noted in Sect. 1.4.2 above, referendums in Luxembourg have remained rare and have only been used three times to date (February 2015), including in 1919 on the economic union to be established with France or Belgium. For EU-related referendums, see Sect. 1.4.2.

No constitutional ban applies to referendums concerning international treaties.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 The relationship between domestic Luxembourgish law and international law is determined by a strong deference to international law. The best illustration of this ⁹⁷ Kinsch 2010, pp. 403–404.

⁹⁸ Trib. Lux., 21 December 1949, Pas. 15, p. 25.

⁹⁹ Kinsch 2010, p. 402.

¹⁰⁰ Ibid., p. 403.

approach is Art. 95ter(2) of the Constitution that explicitly prohibits the constitutional review of Acts of Parliament approving international treaties by the Constitutional Court. To the Expert's knowledge, the domestic courts have not challenged international law norms in order to protect domestic legal standards. However, the domestic tribunals are likely to insist on the requirement that only international treaties that have been published as required can produce legal effects in the domestic legal system. Also, the Luxembourgish tribunals have engaged in the analysis of the direct applicability of specific international treaties referred to in cases pending before them. This analysis has been flawed with some inconsistency. Legal scholars have referred, in this respect, to the evolution of the stance taken by the Luxembourgish Cour de cassation (as well as by lower domestic courts) on the direct applicability of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.¹⁰¹

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 To the Expert's knowledge, the above concerns have not been translated into a significant constitutional discourse.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 As was discussed in greater detail in Sect. 2.3.5.1, the Conseil d'État has raised some constitutional concerns regarding the EAWFD, which does not allow for refusal to execute a warrant where the offence is of political nature.¹⁰² However, both the Act of 20 June 2001 on extradition and the European Convention on Extradition (Arts. 3(1) and (2)) distinguish requests for extradition which are related to political offences from extradition requests which pursue a political goal. In the context of the EAWFD and its relation to other international law instruments, the Conseil d'État has underlined that it may seem surprising at first that a framework decision based on Art. 34 TEU provides for rules which substitute rules resulting from Member States' international treaties elaborated within the framework of the Council of Europe, such as the European Convention on Extradition and the Additional Protocols and the European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism. Regarding the European Convention on the Suppression of Terrorism, Luxembourg has not made any reservation to its obligation to extradite a person even when the relevant offence may be of political nature. Article 5 of the Convention against Terrorism provides that it shall not be interpreted 'as imposing an obligation to extradite if the requested State has substantial grounds for believing that the request for extradition for an offence mentioned in Art. 1 or 2 has been made for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing a person on account of his race, religion, nationality or political opinion, or that that person's position may be prejudiced for any of these reasons'. However, according to the Conseil d'Etat, Luxembourg does not accept or apply broadly the principle laid down in Art. 5 of this Convention. A similar approach is to be expected by Luxembourg regarding any refusal to execute a warrant if the offence for which the warrant was issued is of political nature.

¹⁰¹ Ibid., pp. 403–405.

¹⁰² Opinion Conseil d'Etat, 19 December 2003, doc. parl. No. 5104/4, p. 5.

References

- Besch M. (2005), Traité de légistique formelle. Publication of the Conseil d'Etat du Grand-Duché de Luxembourg, Luxembourg.
- Bonn A. (1992) La Constitution suspendue. Letzebuerger Land 24:15 et seq.
- Braum, S. (2008) Das Prinzip der Strafgesetzbarkeit. Pasicrisie luxembourgeoise 34:77 et seq.
- Cole M.D., Boehm F. (2012) Report on the Luxembourgish transposition of the Data Retention Directive prepared for the European Institute for Media Law. http://www.emr-sb.de/tl_files/EMR-SB/content/PDF/Gutachten%20Abgeschlossene/INVODAS_Country%20Report%20Luxembourg.pdf.
- Cuniberti G., Rueda I. (2010) Abolition of Exequatur – Addressing the Commission's Concerns. University of Luxembourg Law Working Paper No. 2010/03.
- Dumont P., Fehlen B., Kies R., Poirier P. (2012), Le référendum sur le Traité établissant une Constitution pour l'Europe, Rapport élaboré pour la Chambre des Députés. STADE – Études sociologiques et politiques sur le Luxembourg. Université du Luxembourg, Luxembourg. <http://www.chd.lu/wps/wcm/connect/a0c135804e295b92b693f7010df100bc/referendum2005.pdf?MOD=AJPERES>.
- Ergec R. (2009) Deux concepts constitutionnels nouveaux: l'État de droit et la dignité humaine. Journal des tribunaux Luxembourg 6:180–184.
- Friden G., Kinsch P. (2001) La pratique luxembourgeoise en matière de droit international public. Annales du droit luxembourgeois 11:437–455.
- Gennart M. (2013), Le contrôle parlementaire du principe de subsidiarité. Droit belge, néerlandais et luxembourgeois. Larcier, Brussels.
- Gerkrath J. (2008) Compétence et recevabilité des questions préjudiciales. Pasicrisie luxembourgeoise 34(1–2):9 et seq.
- Gerkrath J. (2012), Chapter 12 Constitutional amendment in Luxembourg. In: X. Contiades (ed.) Engineering Constitutional Change – A Comparative Perspective on Europe, Canada and the USA. Routledge, London, pp. 229–255.
- Gerkrath J. (2013) Some remarks on the pending constitutional change in the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg. EPL 19(3):449–459.
- Gerkrath J., Thill J. (2014) The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg. In: Besselink L. (et al.), Constitutional law of the EU member states. Kluwer, The Hague, pp. 1085–1145.
- Kinsch P. (2008) L'égalité devant la loi. Pasicrisie luxembourgeoise 34(1–2):85 et seq.
- Kinsch P. (2010) Le rôle du droit international dans l'ordre juridique luxembourgeois. Pasicrisie luxembourgeoise 36(1–2):399–415.
- Kinsch P. (2014) Le privilège de juridiction des Luxembourgeois et le principe constitutionnel d'égalité. Journal des tribunaux Luxembourg 13:84–85.

- Kroeger M. (2014) Luxembourg. Constitutional Change through Euro Crisis Law: A Multi-level Legal Analysis of Economic and Monetary Union. http://eurocrisislaw.eui.eu/country/luxembourg/topic/tfeu/#_ftnref10_981.
- Majerus P. (1983) L'Etat luxembourgeois. Editpress, Esch-sur-Alzette.
- Muller M., Cuniberti G. (2013), Une étude empirique sur la pratique de l'exequatur dans la Grande Région. Journal de Droit International 140(1):83 et seq.
- Penning P. (2013) L'homme de droit face aux Droits de l'Homme. In: Gennart M. (ed.) Quo Vadis Droit Luxembourgeois: Réflexions sur l'évolution des sources et techniques normatives. Larcier, Brussels, pp. 103–122.
- Pescatore P. (1962), L'autorité en droit interne, des traités internationaux. Pasicrisie Luxembourgeoise 18:97 et seq.
- Ravarani G. (2001) La Cour constitutionnelle luxembourgeoise et la Convention européenne de sauvegarde des droits de l'homme et des libertés fondamentales. Journal des Tribunaux, Luxembourg 14:37–42.
- Schmit P. (2013) La transposition et la mise en œuvre des actes normatifs de l'Union européenne en droit national. Rapport du Conseil d'État, Colloque des Conseils d'État du Benelux, Luxembourg, 10 October 2013. http://www.conseil-État.public.lu/fr/actualites/2013/10/C_Colloque_Benelux/index.html.
- Spielmann D. (2011) Dans l'esprit de l'Interlaken: Quels droits fondamentaux pour la Constitution luxembourgeoise? In: Mélanges en l'honneur de Jean-Paul Costa. Dalloz, Paris, pp. 575–586.
- Weirich M. (1986) L'application du droit communautaire au Grand-Duché de Luxembourg. In: Livre jubilaire de la Conférence Saint-Yves. Saint Paul, Luxembourg, pp. 965–1004.
- Wivenes G. (2000) L'application des principes généraux du droit communautaire par les juridictions luxembourgeoises. Rapport en vue du colloque organisé par la Cour de cassation française, Paris, 4–5 December 2000. https://www.courdecassation.fr/venements_23/colloques_activites_formation_4/2000_2038/generaux_droit_9463.html.
- Wivenes G. (2002) Le droit européen et les constitutions nationales. Luxembourg. In: Lord Flynn of Hadley and Andenas M. (eds.) FIDE XX. Congress London 2002, Vol. 1, pp. 267 et seq.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Role of the Danish Constitution in European and Transnational Governance

Helle Krunke and Trine Baumbach

Abstract The Danish Constitution originates from 1849. Its human rights catalogue, which stems from 1953, is described in the report as old and not very comprehensive; in many cases the ECHR goes further in protection. Denmark does not have a constitutional court, and courts take a deferential approach to judicial review; up until 2015, only one Act had been annulled on the grounds of unconstitutionality. The Danish concept of democracy builds on a strong Parliament and reluctant courts, which are careful not to act in a ‘political’ manner. Regarding constitutional amendments, the Danish Constitution has not undergone changes in relation to EU membership. This is partly attributed to the difficult amendment procedure involving two (different) referendums and a high turnout requirement. In practice, Danish parliamentary control over Government in EU decision-making has widely come to be regarded as one of the strongest in Europe. However, with regard to domestic implementation, in 2015 Parliament expressed concern that the Helle Krunke is Professor of Constitutional Law, Centre for European and Comparative Legal Studies (CECS), Faculty of Law, University of Copenhagen, Denmark, and First Vice-President and member of the Executive Committee for the International Association of Constitutional Law (IACL). e-mail: Helle.Krunke@jur.ku.dk.

Trine Baumbach is Professor of Criminal Law, Centre for Public Regulation and Administration (CORA), Faculty of Law, University of Copenhagen, Denmark. e-mail: Trine.Baumbach@jur.ku.dk.

Helle Krunke wrote Part 1, Part 2, Sects. 2.1, 2.2, 2.4–2.13 and Part 3. Trine Baumbach wrote Part 2 and Sect. 2.3. We would like to thank the student assistants who assisted us in gathering the relevant material for the questionnaire: Stine Frey, Marieke Mitchel, Kirstine Mose and Sofia Cerqueira Rasmussen.

All websites accessed 1 December 2015. Text submitted 22 June 2015.

H. Krunke (✉)

Faculty of Law, Centre for European and Comparative Legal Studies (CECS), University of Copenhagen, Copenhagen, Denmark

e-mail: Helle.Krunke@jur.ku.dk

T. Baumbach

Faculty of Law, Centre for Public Regulation and Administration (CORA), University of Copenhagen, Copenhagen, Denmark

e-mail: Trine.Baumbach@jur.ku.dk executive had implemented EU directives by administrative acts in nine out of ten cases. Other constitutional issues that have arisen include considerable debate regarding the Laval line of cases, given the strong Scandinavian welfare system and the tradition of ordinary collective agreements. Another concern that has been raised by the Danish Supreme Court is that the use of teleological interpretation in a number of ECJ cases has affected legal certainty and foreseeability, which are at the centre of the Danish understanding of the rule of law.

Keywords The Constitution of Denmark • Absence of EU amendments
Difficult amendment procedure involving two referendums • Danish Supreme Court • Judicial review • ECHR • Deference of courts • Implementation of EU law by governmental regulations • Laval and impact on collective action, posted workers and the Scandinavian welfare system • European Arrest Warrant and extraditions • Data Retention Directive • Teleological interpretation, legal certainty and foreseeability of law

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1–1.1.2 The Danish Constitution falls within the evolutionary category. The original Constitution from 1849 was influenced by the Enlightenment and French philosophers such as Montesquieu. Hence, focus was on the ideas of separation of powers and human rights. However, in Denmark it was a ‘peaceful’ revolution. The Danish King chose to cede power to the people, and this way Denmark changed its form of state from an absolute monarchy to a constitutional monarchy. In the first phase after the adoption of the Constitution the King still had several competences, for instance he appointed and dismissed the Government. However, this was changed, and since 1901 Denmark has had negative parliamentarianism – first as a constitutional convention and since 1953 with a legal basis (Art. 15) in the Constitution. Until 1915, many groups in society, including women, did not have the right to vote. However, in 1915 the Constitution became a ‘democratic’ constitution providing women, servants, people living in poverty, criminals and the mentally ill with the right to vote. While the Danish Constitution is concerned with both the organisation of the state and rights, more provisions concern the organisation of the state (institutions, competences, etc.). It is interesting that the first Articles of the Constitution concern the Danish territory, the form of government and separation of powers. Human rights are regulated in Chap. 8 of the Constitution (Arts. 71–85). The Constitution has a total of 89 provisions.

1.2 The Amendment of Constitutions in Relationship to the European Union

1.2.1 The Danish Constitution has not been amended in relation to EU membership.

1.2.2 The amendment procedure in Art. 88 of the Constitution is characterised by being extensive and by involving the people twice. After Parliament has adopted an amendment bill, an election must be held. The new Parliament must adopt the same bill, and within 6 months a referendum on the bill must take place. In this referendum a majority of those voting and at least 40% of those entitled to vote must vote in favour of the bill, which takes effect upon signature by the King. It is quite difficult to change the Danish Constitution, and the requirement of 40% is especially difficult to obtain.¹

1.2.3 Not applicable.

1.2.4 Since the Danish Constitution does not mention EU membership, the Constitution would provide the reader with a more realistic picture of the competences and allocation of powers if the EU were mentioned in the Constitution. Such a development has taken place in the other Nordic EU Member States (Sweden and Finland). Furthermore, it might be relevant to write down some of the procedures connected to national decision-making processes, for instance the existence of the European Policy Committee and the mandate procedure. Some countries such as Germany, France and Portugal have strengthened the role of the national parliament in the constitution in connection with ratification of the Lisbon Treaty.² Denmark could consider whether this would be desirable in order to re-establish the power balance between the Parliament and the Government in light of EU cooperation. Another question which could be considered is the criteria for calling a referendum when Denmark wants to enter a new EU treaty. According to Art. 20, a referendum must be held if the accession to a treaty involves the transfer of powers granted to Danish authorities by the Constitution and fewer than five-sixths of the members of Parliament support such accession. As will be seen in Sect. 1.3.1, transfer of sovereignty is regulated in Art. 20 of the Constitution. This means that quite technical treaties such as the Amsterdam Treaty and the European Patent Convention have been subject to a referendum, whereas the Lisbon Treaty which entailed institutional changes that affected the democratic structure of the EU required no referendum. Hence, one might ask whether Art. 20 reflects the importance of the treaties, especially in the eyes of the electorate.³ These are examples of issues which could be considered in a revision of the Constitution.

¹ For more details on constitutional change in Denmark, see Krunk 2013, pp. 73–92.

² See for instance Piris 2010, p. 126.

³ Krunk 2013, pp. 542–570, especially pp. 569–570.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 Two constitutional provisions regulate Denmark's participation in international cooperation:

Art. 19 Subsection 1: The King shall act on behalf of the Realm in international affairs, but, except with the consent of the Folketing [Parliament], the King shall not undertake any act whereby the territory of the Realm shall be increased or reduced, nor shall he enter into any obligation the fulfilment of which requires the concurrence of the Folketing or which is otherwise of major importance; nor shall the King, except with the consent of the Folketing, denounce any international treaty entered into with the consent of the Folketing.

Art. 20 Subsection 1: Powers vested in the authorities of the Realm under this Constitutional Act may, to such an extent as shall be provided by statute, be delegated to international authorities set up by mutual agreement with other states for the promotion of international rules of law and cooperation.

Subsection 2: For the enactment of a Bill dealing with the above, a majority of five sixths of the Members of the Folketing shall be required. If this majority is not obtained, whereas the majority required for the passing of ordinary Bills is obtained, and if the Government maintains it, the Bill shall be submitted to the electorate for approval or rejection in accordance with the rules for referendums laid down in Section 42.⁴

Article 20 entered the Constitution during the last revision in 1953. Inspired by the Coal and Steel Union, it was foreseen that Denmark might want to join some form of supranational cooperation in the future. By introducing Art. 20 into the Constitution it would not be necessary to amend the Constitution following the Art. 88 procedure in order to enter a supranational organisation. The procedure in Art. 20 is not as extensive as the Art. 88 procedure. Obviously, in a country with EU sceptic voters but a majority of politicians in favour of EU cooperation, there might be a political interest in entering into EU treaties through the simplest possible procedure.

1.3.2–1.3.3 Since the 1953 Constitution allows for the transfer of sovereignty to supranational organisations, the Constitution is not based on an absolute sovereignty line of thinking. The system in the Constitution is very much related to procedure: the more intense the international cooperation, the more complex a procedure must be followed to enter it. This is reflected in the degree of involvement of Parliament and the electorate in the decision-making process. If it is 'normal' international cooperation, the Art. 19 procedure will be sufficient. If sovereignty is transferred, then the Art. 20 procedure is necessary and, if the cooperation is even more intensive and the transferred competences are not specified, the Art. 88 procedure will be required. This means that the transfer of competence is primarily a question of procedure.

⁴ All quotes from the Constitution are from the translation of the Danish Constitution at the homepage of the Danish Parliament: https://www.thedanishparliament.dk/~/media/pdf/publikationer/english/my_constitutional_act_with_explanations.ashx.

There are few limits to the extent to which powers can be delegated to the EU through the Art. 20 procedure. As mentioned, the transferred competences must be specified according to Art. 20. All legislative, executive or judicial power cannot be transferred.⁵ Neither can the power to change the Constitution⁶ nor the power to transfer sovereignty in Art. 20.⁷ The power to decide the age of voting can probably not be transferred.⁸ Provisions on national elections and on the competence of the Court of Impeachment are also excluded from transfer.⁹ Powers that are not held by any Danish authority can also not be transferred; for instance, human rights protection must be respected.¹⁰ The latter was also emphasised by the Supreme Court in the Maastricht judgment.¹¹ It also follows from this judgment that Denmark must remain an independent state, which is a constitutional precondition for a transfer of powers under Art. 20. However, even if Denmark should want to enter a treaty which falls outside what is possible according to Art. 20, it would be possible to enter such treaty through an amendment of the Constitution. The Constitution of Denmark has no eternity clauses.

1.3.4 Denmark has a dualistic system. This can be interpreted from Art. 19 and from case law.¹²

The Maastricht judgment and the Lisbon judgment have contributed to the interpretation of Arts. 19 and 20. The legal question in the Maastricht judgment was whether the Art. 20 procedure was sufficient when Denmark entered into the Maastricht Treaty. The legal question in the Lisbon Judgment was whether the Art. 19 procedure was sufficient when Denmark entered into the Lisbon Treaty. As regards the question of supremacy of EU law, the Supreme Court has not accepted supremacy in relation to the Danish Constitution.

In the Lisbon case the Supreme Court stated the following:¹³ ‘In the Maastricht judgment, the Supreme Court found, among other things, that it is for the Danish courts to decide whether EU acts exceed the limits to the surrender of sovereignty which has taken place under the Accession Act’. Paragraph 9.6 of the judgment thus reads:

9.6. ... By adopting the Accession Act, it has been recognised that the power to test the validity and legality of EC acts of law lies with the EC Court of Justice. This implies that Danish courts of law cannot hold than an EC act is inapplicable in Denmark without the

⁵ See Zahle 2006, p. 414.

⁶ See Zahle 2006, p. 413 and Andersen 1954, p. 497.

⁷ See Zahle 2006, p. 413.

⁸ Ibid.

⁹ Ibid. For a different perspective, see Jensen and Jensen 1991.

¹⁰ See Zahle 2006, pp. 413.

¹¹ See U 1998.800H.

¹² See for instance Rytter 2012, p. 189, U 2006.700H, U 2010.1035 and U 2010.1547H.

¹³ Supreme Court judgment of 20 February 2013, Case No. 199/2012, p. 15, U 2013.1451H, p. 1518. See translation of the judgment at the homepage of the Danish Supreme Court: <http://www.hoesteret.dk/hoesteret/nyheder/ovrigenheder/Documents/199-12engelsk.pdf>.

question of its compatibility with the Treaty having been tried by the EC Court of Justice, and that Danish courts of law can generally base their decision on decisions by the Court of Justice on such questions being within the limits of the surrender of sovereignty. However, the Supreme Court finds that it follows from the demand for specification in s. 20(1) of the Constitution, held against the Danish courts' access to test the constitutionality of acts, that the courts of law cannot be deprived of their right to try questions as to whether an EC act of law exceeds the limits for surrender of sovereignty determined by the Accession Act. Therefore, Danish courts must rule that an EC act is inapplicable in Denmark if the extraordinary situation should arise that with the required certainty it can be established that an EC act which has been upheld by the EC Court of Justice is based on an application of the Treaty which lies beyond the surrender of sovereignty according to the Accession Act. Similarly, this applies with regard to community-law rules and legal principles which are based on the practice of the EC Court of Justice. [Author's italics]

The Court further stated that:

... the Court of Justice of the European Union is charged with settling any disputes on the interpretation of EU law, but this must not result in widening of the scope of Union powers. As mentioned above, Denmark's implementation of the Treaty of Lisbon was based on a constitutional assessment that it will not imply delegation of powers requiring application of the s. 20 procedure, and the Danish authorities are obliged to ensure that this is observed. ... if an act or a judicial decision which has a specific and real impact on Danish citizens etc. raises doubts as to whether it is based on an application of the Treaties which lies beyond the surrender of sovereignty according to the Accession Act, as amended, this may be made subject to a judicial review, as stated in paragraph 9.6 of the Maastricht judgment. The same applies if EU acts are adopted – or if the Court of Justice delivers judgments – based on such application of the Treaties with reference to the Charter of Fundamental Rights. [Author's italics]

In general The Supreme Court shows deference when reviewing the constitutionality of legislation. This means that the Court will only rule an Act unconstitutional if it is in clear violation of the Constitution. This practice has also been followed in relation to legislation on Denmark's accession to EU treaties.

Furthermore, Danish courts will normally try to interpret Danish legislation in conformity with EU law.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The EU is not mentioned in the Constitution and neither is the role of the Parliament in the EU decision-making process. The involvement of the Danish Parliament is mentioned in the Danish Act on Accession to the EU, Art. 6, part 2, according to which the Government must inform the European Policy Committee on proposals in the Council which will have direct effect in Denmark or which will require the participation of Parliament for implementation. However, in practice Parliament has significant influence. Among others, a mandate procedure has been

Table 1 EU related referendums

Date of referendum:	Referendum concerning:	Outcome:
2 October 1972	Danish accession to the EC	63.4% in favour
27 February 1986	Single European Act	56.2% in favour
2 June 1992	Maastricht Treaty	50.7% rejected
18 May 1993	Maastricht Treaty with Danish exceptions	56.7% in favour
28 May 1998	Amsterdam Treaty	55.2% in favour
28 September 2000	Third stage of the Economic and Monetary Union (one of the Danish exceptions stemming from the accession to the Maastricht Treaty)	53.2% rejected
25 May 2014	The Unified Patent Court	62.5% in favour
3 December 2015	Justice and Home Affairs Opt-Out	53.1% rejected

Source The Danish Parliament, EU Information Centre, https://english.eu.dk/en/denmark_eu/eu-referenda.

established according to which the Government will not vote in favour of a proposal in the Council if a majority in the European Policy Committee is against it.¹⁴ These developments of the Committee's control over EU Policy are written down in a number of Committee reports. Hence, even though the Danish parliamentary control system is often said to be one of the strongest in Europe, it has very little formal basis in legislation and none in the Constitution. Put in very general terms, the success of the Danish European Policy Committee lies in (1) the mandate procedure, which is respected by the Government (and is considered legally binding by some legal experts whereas others only consider it politically binding on the Government), (2) the early involvement of the Committee in the decision-making process, and (3) the Government keeping the Committee updated if a proposal changes along the way in the EU decision-making process.¹⁵ One further important factor is the Danish tradition of minority Governments, which naturally strengthens Parliament.

1.4.2 Denmark has held a number of referendums on (1) accession to the EC, (2) EC/EU treaties and (3) exceptions from the treaties. These are summarised in Table 1.

¹⁴ It is not possible to go into details about the control process. For more information on the Danish Parliament's control of EU Policy, see for instance Krunk 2007, pp. 335–348, and Krunk 2008–2009, pp. 105–107.

¹⁵ See also Krunk 2008–2009, pp. 105–107.

The most interesting referendums and certainly the best known outside Denmark are the two referendums on the Maastricht Treaty (of which the second included a number of Danish exceptions from the Treaty).¹⁶

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 Not applicable.

1.5.2 As mentioned, Denmark has not amended its Constitution in relation to the EU. One might ask why this is. In answering this, it might be useful to make a distinction between legally necessary amendments on the one hand, and amendments which are not legally necessary but driven by other purposes.

Several reasons can be given why amendments have not been legally necessary. In 1953 (i.e. the time of the last amendment of the Constitution), the Constitution was designed in such a way that it would be possible for Denmark to enter into and take part in supranational co-operation without having to amend the Constitution. According to Art. 20, powers which rest with Danish authorities can to a specific extent be transferred to an international organisation. There are few constitutional constraints on the content of Danish legislation. Therefore, there are also few constraints on the legislative competence which can be transferred according to Art. 20. Article 20 leaves some room for interpretation. Political institutions play an important role in interpreting the Constitution. The courts are traditionally careful when performing judicial review – only clear violations are viewed as violations of the Constitution.

What other potential purposes could amending the Constitution due to EU membership serve? One such purpose could be to design the Constitution such that it reflects the actual allocation of political power in the light of EU membership, and to thus formulate a Constitution which ordinary citizens can read and understand. Furthermore, there could be a desire to change the national power allocation as a result of EU membership – for instance to strengthen the national Parliament in new ways or to give constitutional effect to parliamentary control functions which already exist in political practice. Thirdly, there could be a desire to alter the provisions on transfer of sovereignty (Art. 20) in light of the experiences of the past 40 years of EU membership. For instance, as mentioned above, one might ask whether Art. 20 reflects what is important to the citizens. In which situations should a referendum be held? Or is the provision clear enough? Finally, one purpose could be to strengthen/renew the democratic legitimacy of the Constitution through a constitutional revision process which involves the electorate (the last time the electorate voted on the content of the Constitution was in 1953).

Given these purposes, why have such amendments not been made? Several reasons can be given. To date, no political majority has been in favour of a general revision. Such a revision would naturally initiate a debate on possible provisions on EU membership. Another reason is the complicated amendment procedure in Art. 88, in which the electorate must be involved twice (election and referendum). Thirdly, Art. 20 functions in practice, and it might be difficult to design a legally better functioning provision (only a different provision). Fourthly, reasons of a more political nature probably exist. Quite a far-reaching transfer of power is possible under Art. 20 (also without involving the electorate) – a large majority of politicians have thus far been in favour of Danish EU membership. As regards a general revision of the Constitution, this would raise public and political debate over a number of sensitive political questions. Fifthly, there has not been enough pressure from the electorate and/or a majority in Parliament for more influence on EU-matters in the Constitution. Finally, Denmark has a tradition of strong parliamentary involvement in EU affairs (mandate procedure, etc.) and minority Governments.

¹⁶ Krunkne 2005, pp. 339–356.

According to Hjalte Rasmussen, the absence of EU amendments in the Constitution has even resulted in a process of ‘waning constitutionalism’. He states that the Constitution has been fossilised and marginalised ‘because of the unavailability of any real amendment procedure, coupled with the application of judicial hands-off policy which precludes alternative routes to the document becoming a centrepiece of a living constitutionalism, as well as the absence of a constitutional theory’; as a result of this, ‘the constitutional limits to transfers of sovereignty have turned into rules that provide for a political essential discretionary assessment’.¹⁷ On the one hand, it is probably true that the Supreme Court could in some cases have interpreted Art. 20 in a less restrictive manner, leaving less room for the political institutions’ interpretation of Art. 20 while still staying within the limits of a traditional constitutional interpretation of the provision.¹⁸ However, on the other hand, the Supreme Court is in general traditionally careful when interpreting the Constitution and leaves much room for the political institutions’ interpretation of the Constitution.

1.5.3 In the context of enhanced EU cooperation and international cooperation in general, the national constitutions have played an important role in safeguarding democratic participation and decision-making as regards this cooperation. As regards many constitutions which are not often amended, it might be worth considering whether the electorate and/or the Parliament should have an increased role in relation to EU cooperation and other international cooperation. The institutional balance between the national institutions has been drastically pushed in many

¹⁷ Rasmussen 2008, p. 155.

¹⁸ In relation to the Danish Lisbon judgment, see Krunk 114b, pp. 542–570. As shown in the case note, it would have been possible for the Supreme Court to interpret Art. 20 in a less restrictive way, leaving less room for the political institutions’ interpretation of the provision. This was actually done by the High Court in its Lisbon judgment. However, even if this had been done, the Danish Lisbon judgment would not (necessarily) have had another outcome since a less restrictive interpretation of Art. 20 would not necessarily have resulted in the finding of a violation of Art. 20 in the case.

Member States as a result of the ever closer EU and international cooperation. Such co-operation is not a negative thing – in fact it can help solve many global problems. However, it is important to secure as much democratic participation and decision-making as possible. The national constitutions can also play an important role in relation to defining a nation's constitutional identity, values and rights. As we shall return to later, constitutional dialogue between national institutions and EU institutions, for instance dialogue between national courts and the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU), requires a clear notion of national constitutional identity and a clear way of communicating it. Although some courts contribute to such a definition and communication of national constitutional identity, a broad debate in society on national identity, values and rights is also important. No one could have foreseen such a development in globalisation, and national constitutions need to be adjusted to fit this new reality as regards democratic, institutional and rights perspectives. In some countries – such as Denmark – the need for a strengthening/renewal of the democratic legitimacy of the Constitution through public debate and a new Constitution based on this debate seem unavoidable in light of the changed globalised reality. Some specific potential areas for amendment are outlined in Sect. 1.2.4.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Human rights are regulated in Chaps. 7 and 8 of the Danish Constitution. The Constitution protects the traditional political freedoms: freedom of speech (Art. 77), freedom of association (Art. 78) and freedom of assembly (Art. 79). Furthermore, classical rights such as the right to property (Art. 73), the right to personal liberty (Art. 71), the right to privacy (Art. 72) and freedom of religion (Arts. 67, 68 and 70) are protected. The Constitution protects certain social rights (Arts. 75 and 76). Finally, some provisions outside the chapters on protection of human rights should be mentioned. The Constitution has no provision on the right to a fair trial. However, according to Arts. 3 and 64 the courts are independent, and according to Art. 63, the courts can review administrative decisions. According to Art. 65 the administration of justice must be public and oral. The human rights catalogue is old and not very comprehensive according to a modern standard. The protection provided by the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) has become increasingly important, and in many cases the Convention and the practice of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) go further in protecting human rights than the Constitution.

In general, the provisions on human rights in the Constitution are enforceable in courts. Only in a few cases has the general assumption been that part of a provision is so general that it does not contain an independent legal content/right which could be enforced in courts. One example is the first sentence of the provision on the right to property in Art. 73, '[o]wnership is inviolable'. However, it should be mentioned that part of the legal literature does not agree with the general assumption that Art. 73, part 1, first sentence, is not enforceable, and at least one judgment seems to support such an interpretation.¹⁹ Another example is part 2 of the provision on protection of social rights in Art. 75, which provides that '[a] person who is unable to support himself or his dependents, and whom no one else is under an obligation to support, is entitled to assistance from the State, while accepting the obligations that the Act relating to such assistance imposes.' However, in a ground-breaking judgment from 2006,²⁰ the Supreme Court introduced that a private party could invoke a right based directly on Art. 75, part 2 (and not only on rights according to social legislation). This means that Art. 75, part 2 is now enforceable in courts.

Denmark does not have a strong tradition of codifying general principles of law in the Constitution. The general principles of law are often unwritten principles which are enforced by the courts and mentioned in legal literature and/or underlying considerations, presumptions and values which implicitly lie behind constitutional and legislative provisions. Danish courts have a rather pragmatic approach, which means that they often apply legal principles without making direct references to them and without specifying whether the principles have constitutional rank. All of these factors contribute to a somewhat unclear picture of which legal principles exist and whether they have constitutional rank. In general, the unclear character of a 'legal principle' as an independent legal source or a source of interpretation obviously adds to this picture.

The principle of legitimate expectations is not explicitly codified in the Constitution. Nevertheless, a protection of legitimate expectations is indirectly reflected in for instance the provision on protection of property in Art. 73. In the case law, legitimate expectations are often used as legal arguments in relation to Art. 73.²¹ In at least one case from the High Court legitimate expectations have been treated as an independent source of law.²² This seems to support the idea of a general constitutional principle of legitimate expectations with constitutional rank.²³

The principle of equality as an abstract norm is not codified in the Constitution. Nevertheless, the protection of equality is reflected in a number of specific constitutional provisions, for instance Art. 70 on protection against discrimination

¹⁹ Berlin 1939, pp. 388–390; Larsen 1940, p. 60; Ross 1966, p. 665; Krunk 2010, pp. 211–223. See also U 1958.595H.

²⁰ U 2006.770H.

²¹ Krunk 2010, pp. 101–117. On legitimate expectations see also UfR 2011, p. 1365 and Mørup 2005.

²² Unpublished judgment from the High Court of 24 June 2004 (B-1626-01).

²³ Krunk 2010, pp. 106–107 and 115–117.

based on religion or origin in relation to civil and political rights. The case law is not clear in this field.²⁴

The principle of proportionality is not codified in the Constitution. However, according to legal theory the principle of proportionality must be interpreted together with constitutional rights provisions when possible.²⁵ One might say that the principle thus indirectly gains constitutional rank at least in relation to a number of rights (see below Sect. 2.1.2).

The definition of the concept of legal certainty is not entirely clear.²⁶ A very general definition would emphasise that (1) legal certainty concerns the relationship between the individual and the authorities, (2) that the individual must not be subject to arbitrary abuse of power and (3) that the state of the law must be predictable for the individual.²⁷ However, a broader definition could include the legislative process and the content of legislation including respect of fundamental rights.²⁸ Neither is the distinction between the principle of legal certainty and the principle of the rule of law clear. A recent attempt to identify the content of the two principles emphasises that the principle of legal certainty has the personal freedom of the individual, including the rights of minorities, as its main focus, while the principle of the rule of law has the separation of powers and the legality of the administration as its main focus. Furthermore, it has been stated that the rule of law is a precondition for legal certainty, and legal certainty legitimises the rule of law.²⁹ At the FIDE congress in 2014, the then Danish Supreme Court President, Børge Dahl, stated the following on the principles of the rule of law and legal certainty:

The concept of the rule of law implies a number of things. One aspect is the principle of equality before the law. Another aspect is the principle of legal certainty: Without legal certainty there can be no rule of law.

In its strictest sense, legal certainty means the elimination of arbitrariness. This again implies that the courts must act in a way that makes it possible for the citizens to plan their activities and foresee the legal consequences of their actions. In this regard, the principle of legal certainty is synonymous with a minimum degree of clarity and foreseeability in the legal system.³⁰

The Constitution does not have a general provision on protection of legal certainty. Nevertheless, the principle of legal certainty and the principle of the rule of law are reflected in a number of more specific provisions in the Constitution: Art. 3 on separation of powers; Art. 22 on promulgation; Art. 43 according to which taxes

²⁴ Two interesting judgments which perhaps support the existence of a general principle of equality are U 1960.33 H and U 1989.148/2 H.

²⁵ Jensen 1994, p. 335.

²⁶ Henrichsen 1997, Chap. 1. For instance legal certainty can be seen from an administrative law point of view or from a constitutional law point of view.

²⁷ See Henrichsen 1997, pp. 83–84.

²⁸ Ibid., p. 63.

²⁹ See Dansk Center for Menneskerettigheder og Advokatsamfundet 2012, p. 7.

³⁰ See Dahl 2014, p. 27.

must have a legal basis in an Act; Art. 62 according to which the courts must be independent of the Government and the public administration; Art. 63 on review of administrative decisions; Art. 64 according to which judges shall be governed solely by the law; Art. 65 according to which all proceedings shall to the widest possible extent be public and oral in the administration of justice; protection of personal liberty in Art. 71; the right to privacy in Art. 72; and the political freedoms set out in Arts. 77–79.

Furthermore, legal certainty is applied and sometimes referred to in case law. However, often it is not clear whether the principle is applied as a source of interpretation when interpreting legislation or whether it is applied as an independent source of law. Furthermore, it is not clear whether the principle has constitutional rank. However, a number of particularly interesting judgments which might indicate the existence of an independent principle of legal certainty and a rank above normal legislation will be mentioned here.

Two judgments from the past decade seem to indicate that not only does a principle of legal certainty exist but it also has a higher rank than normal legislation. The Supreme Court has ruled that a video tape containing an examination of a child could not be played during the trial against her foster father who was accused of abusing her sexually.³¹ Although such evidence was normally allowed according to the Administration of Justice Act, Art. 877, part 3, the Supreme Court would not allow it based on considerations of legal certainty. The reason was, among other factors, that the defendant had not been able to consult with his defence lawyer before the examination of the child or to view the video tape afterwards together with his defence lawyer.

In the second judgment it becomes even more clear that the rank of the principle of legal certainty is higher than that of normal legislation. The case concerned a Tunisian citizen who had planned to kill one of the so-called Muhammad cartoonists. Based on the Danish Aliens Act the Danish Immigration Service decided to permanently deport him because he was a danger to the state,³² and the police detained him. According to Art. 37, the courts can review the legality of such a detention. The Supreme Court stated that the review of such detention must include at least some review of the factual foundation that determines whether a foreign citizen must be considered a danger to the state. The authorities must make this possible by submitting sufficient documentation in court with the possibility for the defendant to raise objections.

In recent case law, the Supreme Court has expressed concern whether certain interpretations of EU law by the European Court of Justice have violated legal certainty. This was clear in a case from 2014 in which the Supreme Court determined whether the employer or the employee should carry the risk of the employee becoming sick during his vacation.³³

³¹ See U 2000.1751H.

³² See U 2008.2394H.

³³ See U 2014.914H.

In other words, can an employee request a new vacation period for the days he was ill? The Danish Holidays Act from 2000 was very precise on this matter, leaving the risk to the employee. The legal question was whether it was possible to interpret the Act in accordance with Directive 2003/88³⁴ and thereby in such a way that the employer should carry the risk. The Supreme Court stated that the duty to interpret national law in accordance with EU law does not apply if this would violate general principles of law such as the principle of legal certainty and non-retroactivity. Neither does this duty apply if this would lead to a contra legem interpretation of national law. The Supreme Court concluded that according to the Danish legal principles of interpretation, it was not possible to interpret the Danish Act in compliance with Directive 2003/88. This would be contra legem, which the EU principle regarding the duty to interpret national law in accordance with EU law does not require. According to the Supreme Court, such an interpretation would also constitute a violation of legal certainty and predictability which must be required when applying the law in relation to the Holidays Act from 2000 with regard to the employer. When the Supreme Court refers to legal certainty, it is not entirely clear whether it refers to it as a legal principle in EU law and/or in Danish law. The exception from the duty to interpret national law in conformity with EU law is related to the general principles of EU law.³⁵

Another example is a Supreme Court decision from 2014,³⁶ in which the Supreme Court decided to request a preliminary ruling from the CJEU in a case on age discrimination. The main question was whether an unwritten EU principle prohibiting age discrimination must prevail over a contradictory written provision in national legislation which provides a private party with a legal basis to not pay severance pay. In the preliminary questions to the CJEU, the Danish Supreme Court referred to the principle of legal certainty and the related principle of legitimate expectations. The Supreme Court asked whether it would be in accordance with EU law if the Supreme Court ruled that the principle of legal certainty must prevail over the unwritten EU principle of the prohibition against age discrimination. The latter two cases also relate to the rule of law (see below Sect. 2.1.3).

Finally, there are some Acts which provide for legal certainty in specific areas such as social policy and the administrative use of force.³⁷ In conclusion, legal certainty is without doubt a Danish legal principle, and the case law described above seems to support that the principle has a higher rank than does normal legislation (see for instance U 2008.2394H). This points in the direction of a constitutional principle with constitutional rank.

As regards the principle of the rule of law, see below in Sect. 2.1.3.

³⁴ Directive 2003/88/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 4 November 2003 concerning certain aspects of the organisation of working time, [2003] OJ L 299/9.

³⁵ Case C-80/86 Kolpinghuis Nijmegen [1987] ECR 03969, para. 13.

³⁶ Supreme Court decision of 22 September 2014, case 15/2014, 1. Afdeling.

³⁷ See LBK nr. 983 af 08/08/2013 and Lov nr. 442 af 09/06/2004.

A democratic form of government is an underlying value which is reflected in a number of articles, for instance on the right to vote in elections and referendums and political freedoms. In U 1999.1798 H, the Supreme Court, borrowing from the wording of the case law of the ECtHR but relating them to the Danish Constitution, stated that freedom of speech (Art. 77), freedom of association (Art. 78) and freedom of assembly (Art. of 79) are necessary and natural preconditions for democracy. The Danish judgment on the Maastricht Treaty seems to accept the existence of a constitutional presumption of a democratic form of government.³⁸ Hence, one could argue that a democratic form of government is a legal principle at constitutional level.

2.1.2 Although the Danish Constitution does not have a general provision stipulating the conditions under which restrictions can be imposed on rights, the specific provisions in Arts. 67, 73 and 77–79 on particular rights do. For example, Art. 73 expressly states that restrictions can only be imposed by statute. However, this also follows from the unwritten principle of legality.³⁹ Therefore, restrictions under all of the mentioned articles require a legal basis in a statute. Furthermore, as mentioned, the principle of proportionality must be interpreted together with constitutional rights provisions where possible.⁴⁰ This means that imposed restrictions on (as a minimum) the rights described in Arts. 67, 70, 73 and 77–79 must be proportional.⁴¹ Finally, an imposed restriction must have a legitimate purpose. Such purpose must follow from the specific rights provisions.⁴² For instance according to Art. 67, an imposed restriction on the freedom of religion must be required by decency and public order; according to Art. 73, an imposed restriction on the right to property must be required by the common good. These requirements of a legal basis set out in a statute, proportionality and a legitimate purpose are supported by the case law of the Danish courts. Of particular interest is the Supreme Court case mentioned above on restrictions on the freedom of assembly, since the Supreme Court when interpreting Art. 79 of the Constitution, borrowing the wording of the case law of the ECtHR but relating them to the Danish Constitution, has stated that freedom of speech (Art. 77), freedom of association (Art. 78) and freedom of assembly (Art. of 79) are necessary and natural preconditions for democracy.⁴³

2.1.3 The English definition of the principle of the rule of law is not entirely clear and neither is the Danish concept of the rule of law. Furthermore, the principle of the rule of law has slightly different meanings in different legal systems.⁴⁴

³⁸ U 1998.800 H.

³⁹ Rytter 2012, p.117.

⁴⁰ Jensen 1994, p. 335.

⁴¹ Rytter 2012, p. 112.

⁴² Ibid., p. 123.

⁴³ See U 1999.1798H.

⁴⁴ See for instance Koch 2008, pp. 45–63. Koch among others compares the notion ‘rule of law’ in the English and German legal systems.

The principle of the rule of law is not mentioned as a legal principle in the Danish Constitution. However, as noted in Sect. 2.1.1, several provisions in the Constitution and the unwritten principle of legality must be said to create the rule of law, although it is not possible to make a clear distinction between which constitutional provisions protect the rule of law and which protect legal certainty. Provisions such as separation of powers (Art. 3), independence of the courts (including that judges shall be governed solely by the law (Art. 64)) and judicial review of administrative decisions (Art. 63) all support the rule of law. The rule of law is furthermore ensured by judicial review of legislation by the courts. This competence of the courts is not written in the Constitution. However, it is considered to be a legal rule at constitutional level. The principle of legality is an unwritten principle which expresses a cornerstone in the protection of the rule of law.

In the contemporary literature on constitutional law, the principle of the rule of law is directly mentioned with regard to the following provisions: Art. 62 of the Constitution according to which the administration of justice must be kept separate from public administration; Art. 63 on judicial review of administrative decisions; Art. 64 regarding the independence of the courts from the Government; Art. 55 regarding the Ombudsman's control of public administration; constitutional provisions on human rights from which duties for the authorities, such as regarding administrative decisions, can be derived; and finally the rule of law is mentioned as regards the unwritten principle of legality.⁴⁵

A search for the ‘principle of the rule of law’ in Danish case law shows that the rule of law is not a frequently used term. The ‘principle of the rule of law’ only appears in 11 judgments, and in some of them the concept appears in reference to the European Charter of Human Rights or EU legislation and EU judgments.⁴⁶

In U 1961.1085Ø the relatives of a man who was executed during the Second World War wanted to read the authorities’ files on the case. Their lawyer argued that it follows from the principle of the rule of law (and legislation) that there must be the greatest possible access to public decisions. In U 2009.426H a defence lawyer argued that in a society built on the rule of law, the evidence in that case could not lead to such a radical measure as detention. In U 2012.2874H the defendant, a ministry, argued that the legislation that prescribed compulsory attendance in a refugee camp did not violate the principle of the rule of law. In VL 2007B-1135-05 the principle of the rule of law was invoked by the plaintiff, a Danish citizen, in the Danish National Tax Tribunal but not in the High Court. However, the High Court judgment provides a summary of the proceedings in the Danish National Tax Tribunal.

⁴⁵ Zahle 2006, pp. 222 and 227, and Zahle 2001, p. 36.

⁴⁶ See U 2013.834H (as regards TEU Art. 6) and U 2013.1451H (as regards TEU Art. 10B). In OE2012-S-3494-11 the lower court’s decision is mentioned, and the court states that the demand for a clear legal basis in criminal law cases must ‘not least be seen in the light of the impact of the ECHR as regards the protection of the fundamental principles of the rule of law’.

In five judgments, the ‘principle of the rule of law’ appears to concern the Danish terrorism provision in the Danish Criminal Act (Art. 114).⁴⁷ According to the travaux préparatoires, this provision must be interpreted in light of the EU framework decision on the fight against terrorism.⁴⁸ The Framework Decision refers to actions aimed as a threat against the democratic society which respects the principle of the rule of law. Thus, the plaintiffs and the defendants in the Danish judgments regarding Art. 114 have referred to the principle of the rule of law several times. As regards the Danish terrorism provision, it is also interesting that the Danish Parliamentary Committee on Judicial Matters has expressed that ‘a legitimate state builds on the principle of democracy and the principle of the rule of law’.⁴⁹

As a sub-conclusion, many applicants (private parties as well as public authorities) have presented arguments based on the principle of the rule of law in the courts.

The courts do not refer directly to this principle very often. In U 2009.1453H, the Supreme Court did so based on the fact that the travaux préparatoires for Art. 114 in the Danish Criminal Act refer to the principle of the rule of law. In TfK 2013.115OE, the lower court referred to the impact of the European Convention on Human Rights on the fundamental principles of the rule of law including that criminal liability must be predictable for the citizens. U 2014.914H and Supreme Court decision of 22 September 2014 (Sag 15/2014, 1. Afdeling) concerning a request for a preliminary ruling from the CJEU (referred to above in relation to the principle of legal certainty) also support the conclusion that the Danish Supreme Court defends the principle of the rule of law in relation to the effect of EU law in national law. At the FIDE Congress 2014, the former President of the Danish Supreme Court, Børge Dahl, referred to U 2014.914H as an example of how dynamic judgments from the CJEU violate the rule of law and the principle of legal certainty. He further stated:

I have to admit that over the years the development of law through the practice of the European Court of Justice have (sic) gone beyond the limitations drawn by the notion of legal foreseeability and certainty under Danish law. Time and again, we are confronted with European judgments finding European harmonisation to have gone further than our legislator and courts had thought. Time and again, we find ourselves bound by EU law through European judgments beyond our understanding and expectations at the time of our commitment. Time and again, I find it rather difficult to foresee the decisions made by my honourable colleagues in Luxembourg. And I know from talks with fellow justices from various countries that this is a matter of growing concern in the supreme courts of the Member States.⁵⁰

⁴⁷ See U 2008.2394H, U 2009.426H, U 2009.1453H, U 2012.256H and U 2014.1540H.

⁴⁸ Council Framework Decision 2002/475/JHA of 13 June 2002 on combating terrorism, [2002] OJ L 164/3.

⁴⁹ See Folketingstidende 2001–2002, 2. saml., L 35, tillæg B, p. 1466f.

⁵⁰ Dahl 2014, pp. 28.

The principle of the rule of law exists in Danish law, but its content is not entirely clear; furthermore the principle of the rule of law is related to the principle of legal certainty. Case law shows that the principle is normally invoked in criminal law cases either as an argument that the evidence is not clear enough or as an argument that the chosen measure is too radical. The principle has also been used as an argument in favour of public access to documents. Furthermore, the principle is referred to when it is clear that a legislative provision is based on arguments relating to the rule of law. Finally and importantly, case law from 2014 shows that the Supreme Court has recently focused on the principles of legal certainty and the rule of law in cases which concern the impact of EU law on contradictory national written law. As was the case with the principle of legal certainty, the principle of the rule of law must probably be viewed as a constitutional principle. Furthermore, it is probably at constitutional level since the Supreme Court in recent case law based its reasoning on this principle in determining that EU law should not prevail over a national legislative Act.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 The Danish report on ‘The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon’ in the FIDE 2012 proceedings expresses no concern as regards the balancing of fundamental rights and economic freedoms in EU law after *Omega*⁵¹ and Schmidberger.⁵²

It has been an ongoing concern whether the ECJ would give sufficient weight to classic fundamental rights (freedoms) whenever those rights collide with EU economic freedoms, since the latter are regarded as fundamental under EU law. This concern would generally seem to be unjustified, at least today, considering the vigour with which the ECJ is (now) upholding classic rights such as those protected by the ECHR, even when this means restricting free movement in the EU.⁵³

The report refers to Omega and Schmidberger and later to the EU Charter:

The now legally binding EU Charter further underscores the need for the ECJ to keep giving due weight to classic freedoms in collision with economic interests, cf. Art. 52(3) EUC on EUC rights having the ‘same meaning and scope’ as parallel Convention rights.⁵⁴

However, in the Scandinavian countries with their strong welfare systems and tradition for ordinary collective agreements (instead of legislation), cases such as ⁵¹ Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-9609.

⁵² Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659.

⁵³ Lauta and Rytter 2012, p. 404.

⁵⁴ Ibid.

*Laval*⁵⁵ have given rise to much debate. The Danish Government and Parliament have interpreted Laval as only requiring transparency in the way access to the Danish labour market is hindered but not as preventing Denmark from upholding its way of fixing minimum wages.⁵⁶ Following Laval, a new provision on the right to take collective action in respect of posted workers was added to the Danish Posted Workers Act.⁵⁷ A case similar in many ways to the Laval case was heard by the Danish Labour Court in 2005; however, the Court did not refer the case to the Court of Justice.⁵⁸ In the Danish context it is interesting that many of the Danish welfare rights are protected either by normal legislation or by ordinary collective agreements as regards labour rights and thus not directly in the text of the Constitution.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

By way of introductory remarks, it has to be noted that Denmark has a so-called justice ‘opt-out’ regarding the police and judicial co-operation in criminal matters that goes back to the Edinburgh Agreement (1992).⁵⁹ The opt-out forms part of the Lisbon Treaty in the sense that it is confirmed in the Protocol on the Position of Denmark, which is linked to the Lisbon Treaty as an annex. As a result of the Danish justice opt-outs, Denmark does not participate in the Council’s adoption of measures proposed under Title V, Part Three of the TFEU, and none of the measures adopted under the above-mentioned provisions are binding on or apply to Denmark.⁶⁰

This means, for example, that any future directives on provisional legal aid for suspects or accused persons deprived of liberty and legal aid in European arrest warrant proceedings⁶¹ or on the strengthening of certain aspects of the presumption of innocence and of the right to be present at trial in criminal proceedings⁶² will not be binding on or apply to Denmark.

⁵⁵ Case C-341/05 Laval [2007] ECR I-11767.

⁵⁶ Neergaard and Nielsen 2010, p. 90.

⁵⁷ See Kristiansen 2013, p. 111. Neergaard and Nielsen 2010, pp. 48.

⁵⁸ See A 2005.839.

⁵⁹ The Edinburgh Agreement granted Denmark four exceptions to the Maastricht Treaty.

⁶⁰ Cf. Arts. 1 and 2 of the Protocol on the position of Denmark. With the Lisbon Treaty, Denmark was given the opportunity to replace its existing justice opt-out with an opt-in scheme (like that of the United Kingdom and Ireland), cf. Art. 8 of the Protocol.

⁶¹ See further Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on provisional legal aid for suspects or accused persons deprived of liberty and legal aid in European arrest warrant proceedings (COM (2013) 824 final).

⁶² See further Proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on the strengthening of certain aspects of the presumption of innocence and of the right to be present at trial in criminal proceedings (COM (2013) 821 final).

Even though the EU acts adopted before the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty under the then-applicable Title VI of the TEU still remain binding on and apply unchanged in Denmark on an intergovernmental basis,⁶³ Denmark does not in principle have the option to participate in the further development of this cooperation, including any future acts superseding or amending applicable acts within the area.⁶⁴

In some cases, where a new directive only regards, for instance, a more stringent criminal law regulation, Denmark is free to align its legislation with the other EU Member States in accordance with the provisions of the directive. If the new directive supersedes a specific framework decision, it is a prerequisite that the amended legislation still meet the obligations of the framework decision.

However, in those cases where a directive builds on the principle of mutual recognition, it is not possible for Denmark to transpose the directive into Danish legislation unilaterally. In these cases, potential Danish participation in the directive requires an intergovernmental agreement – a so-called parallel agreement – between Denmark and the European Community. Whether such an agreement is possible, is not clear, since the Commission is very restrictive.⁶⁵

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 In order to reply to the questions regarding the presumption of innocence, it is necessary to take the principle of mutual recognition as a judicial phenomenon as a starting point and to bear in mind that the principle is regarded as the cornerstone of judicial co-operation within the Union. The principle is based on confidence and trust among Member States that both the substantial criminal law and the administration of justice throughout the Union are built on the same level of protection and the same respect for the rule of law – including the obligation to respect fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles, as also explicitly stated in Art. 1(3) of the Framework Decision.^{66,67}

A European arrest warrant is a judicial decision issued by a Member State with a view to accomplish the arrest and surrender by another Member State of a requested person, for the purposes of conducting a criminal prosecution or executing a ⁶³ Cf. Art. 2 of the Protocol on the position of Denmark.

⁶⁴ See further Baumbach 2013, pp. 300 et seq.

⁶⁵ See for instance the Commission's very restrictive policy in this field COM (2005) 145 def and COM (2005) 146 def where the Commission, among other things, states that a parallel agreement solution 'would have to be of an exceptional nature and apply for a transitional period only'.

⁶⁶ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁶⁷ See further Vestergaard and Tranberg 2012, pp. 309 et seq. and Vestergaard and Adamo 2008, pp. 147 et seq.

custodial sentence or detention order. Regarding the presumption of innocence, only the first purpose is of interest.

The principle of presumption of innocence neither follows from the Danish Constitution nor from the Danish Administration of Justice Act. The principle is, however, considered a common legal principle as it is acknowledged in Art. 48 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and Art. 6(2) in the European Convention on Human Rights.

In this regard – and as a principle inherent in the principle of the presumption of innocence – the Danish legal system recognises the principle of in dubio pro reo as a common legal principle. Likewise, the principle that the burden of proof rests with the prosecution is determined by implication by Art. 96 of the Danish Administration of Justice Act. The Danish legal system also recognises, in Art. 752 of the Danish Administration of Justice Act, the privilege against self-incrimination as recognised by the European Court of Human Rights as a standard inherent in Art. 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The Danish Ministry of Justice is the competent executing judicial authority in Denmark. If the Ministry of Justice decides to extradite the person in question, the person has the right to demand that the police bring the case to court in order to have the court determine the legality of the decision.

2.3.1.2 Neither the Ministry of Justice nor the Danish Courts are seen to review cases brought before them in the light of the principle of the presumption of innocence. On the contrary, it is underlined that the competent judicial authorities are distinctly not supposed to review the evidence or to thereby themselves rule on the assumed perpetrator's guilt. That is for the issuing Member State's judicial authority to do. This was explicitly ascertained in a Danish Western High Court decision of 13 September 2005.

In this case the Lithuanian authorities had issued a European arrest warrant to have a Danish citizen extradited for the purposes of conducting a criminal prosecution against him concerning five criminal offences. The case did not concern offences enumerated in the positive list of the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant and thereby not the positive list in the Danish Act on Extradition of Offenders.⁶⁸ Because of this, the principle of double criminality had to be applied. Three of the offences stated in the arrest warrant were not considered to be offences in Denmark, and extradition was therefore not possible with regard to these offences. Regarding the two offences that could form the basis of an extradition of the requested person since they were also criminal offences in Denmark, the Western High Court underlined that that Danish judicial authorities, including the court itself, were not called upon to review the evidence.

On the other hand, the Danish judicial authorities in this field are extremely particular in their rulings regarding the conditions for extradition. This is for instance evident in the aforementioned decision of the Western High Court regarding the double criminality requirement (the case did not regard offences from the positive list). This was also seen in the Supreme Court of Denmark's decision of 17 December 2012 where the Ministry of Justice, the municipal court and the Eastern High Court's decisions were repealed and the case remitted to the Ministry of Justice, since there was not enough information provided to establish whether the prohibition of ne bis in idem represented an obstacle for extradition. These rulings did not concern consideration of evidence or therefore the question of guilt, but did, however, concern legal questions closely linked to the question of guilt.

⁶⁸ The Act implements the positive list of the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant in its exact wording. See further below Sect. 2.3.2 on nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege.

The overall assessment with regard to the principle of the presumption of innocence is that since adherence to the principle is primarily an issue in the main hearing of the case, it is not for the preliminary judicial authorities to rule on the evidence – especially not since the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant is built on the principle of mutual trust. In other words, the Danish judicial authorities seem to have the appropriate trust, and since no cases have been launched by any member of the public that might dare to raise the question of trust, the non-observance of the principle of the presumption of innocence at the arrest warrant stage has not given rise to substantial considerations in legal theory or elsewhere.

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 The principle of legality does not follow from the Danish Constitution, but the principle is codified in Art. 1 of the Danish Criminal Code backed by a common legal principle regarding the prohibition of retroactivity in criminal law to the disadvantage of the accused, as set out in Art. 49 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union and Art. 7 of the European Convention on Human Rights.⁶⁹

As can be seen from the CJEU judgment (Case C-303/05), the actual definition of the offences set out in Art. 2(2) of the Framework Decision and the penalties applicable are those which follow from the law of the issuing Member State, which, as stated above, must respect fundamental rights and legal principles, among them the principle of legality of criminal offences and penalties (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege).⁷⁰

The departure from the rule of double criminality in cases covered by the positive list gave rise to some principled objections on the political level when the Framework Decision was to be implemented in Danish law. In the preparatory work to the Danish Act on Extradition of Offenders that implemented the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant (Art. 2(2) of the Framework Decision), the departure was justified as follows:

⁶⁹ See further Baumbach 2011, pp. 125 et seq.

⁷⁰ Case C-303/05 Advocaten voor de Wereld [2007] ECR I-03633, paras. 52–53.

A number of the offences included in the positive list are covered by EU instruments and require Member States to criminalise further enumerated offences. Furthermore, the European Council, in a statement in relation to the Framework Decision indicated that the Council has agreed in accordance with TEU Art. 31e, to continue to work on the approximation of the definitions of the offences covered by Art. 2(2) of the Framework Decision, in order to seek to achieve the same legal understanding among the Member States. Moreover, the Council statement contains qualifying remarks which more specifically defines what is meant by, inter alia, sabotage, extortion, racism and xenophobia.

Since the offences covered by the positive list, as a starting point, would be punishable in all Member States, the importance of the Framework Decision on this point is in particular that the requesting Member State shall not carry out a thorough check of whether the offence is also punishable in the executing State.⁷¹

The departure from the rule of double criminality has not subsequently given rise to any theoretical concerns. Presumably, this is to some extent due to the fact that the Danish Act on Extradition of Offenders, in accordance with the optional rule in Art. 4(7) letter a of the Framework Decision, has a special legal provision (Art. 10 f (1)) that determines as a mandatory rule that extradition cannot take place if the relevant act wholly or partly was committed in Denmark and the act is not an offence according to Danish law. The same – but only as an optional rule – is true if the act was not committed in the issuing Member State, and a similar act committed outside Denmark would not be included under Danish jurisdiction (c.f. Art. 10 f(2)). In other words, an arrest warrant can be refused if the issuing Member State exercises so-called extraterritorial jurisdiction in cases where there is no similar Danish extraterritorial jurisdiction. The latter rule is in accordance with the optional rule in Art. 4(7) letter b.

It should be noted that the very fact that the alleged act is in accordance with the Framework Decision's Art. 8 letters d and e (and Art. 18 a(1) in the Danish Act on Extradition of Offenders) must be expressed in the arrest warrant so that it will be possible for the Danish executive judicial authorities to check whether the alleged act corresponds to one of the listed crimes – not in accordance with Danish law, but in accordance with a more abstract definition of the relevant crime. There does not appear to have been any case in Denmark where the issuing Member State's described act has not been considered to be one of the 32 crimes on the positive list.

With regard to cases which are not covered by the positive list, execution of an arrest warrant for the purpose of conducting a criminal prosecution requires that the act for which the European arrest warrant has been issued constitutes an offence under Danish law (Art. 10 a(2) in the Danish Act on Extradition of Offenders). In these cases the executing judicial authority in Denmark investigates rather thoroughly the condition of double criminality. Thus, the issuing Member State's description in the arrest warrant of the facts of the case are in these cases compared to the relevant criminal offences in Danish law to make sure that the elements of the crime (actus reus) in the issuing Member State correspond with the elements of the crime in Danish law.⁷² On the other hand, it is not required that the legal classification of the act be the same in both Member States. It is sufficient that the charge concerns an act which would have been considered an offence if committed in Denmark. This state of the law was explicitly stated in the preparatory work to the Danish Act on Extradition of Offenders,⁷³ and the Danish case law does not seem to be inconsistent with this.⁷⁴

⁷¹ Cf. Forslag til lov om ændring af lov om udlevering af lovovertrædere og lov om udlevering af lovovertrædere til Finland, Island, Norge og Sverige (L 433/2003), Sect. 4.1.2.1 (Amendment of the Act on Extradition of Offenders and the Act on the Extradition of Offenders to Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden (Implementation of the EU Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant, etc.) Translation by the author.

It is to be noticed that the rules on extradition must be considered as procedural rules with the implication that they in general are held to apply to all proceedings pending at the time when they enter into force and with retroactive effect (contrary to substantive criminal rules which are to be interpreted as not applying to situations existing before their entry into force). This appears from the Danish Act on Extradition of Offenders, the Danish case law (U 2004.2229 H) and the CJEU judgment.⁷⁵ This state of the law has not been criticised in Danish legal doctrine, since extradition cannot be put on the same footing as criminal liability with retroactive effect. This results from the fact that extradition either relates to extradition for the purpose of conducting a criminal prosecution (where possible criminal liability will be determined) or relates to extradition for the purpose of execution of a prison sentence handed down in a judgment (where criminal liability has already been determined).

The overall assessment in the field of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege is that the legal protection inherent in the principle is still fully granted the same level of protection as prior to the entry into force of the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant – even though the full protection will not be implemented before the main hearing in the issuing Member State.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 With regard to in absentia judgments, no constitutional issues have been raised in Denmark due to the fact that the Danish Constitution does not regulate the defendant's right to participate in oral proceedings or the right of the person in question to mount his or her own defence. These rights are regulated in the Danish Administration of Justice Act. Here the main rule is that the defendant has a right

⁷² See i.e. the Western High Court's decision of 13 September 2005 (U 2006.7 V).

⁷³ C.f. Forslag til lov om ændring af lov om udlevering af lovovertredere og lov om udlevering af lovovertredere til Finland, Island, Norge og Sverige (L 433/2003), Sect. 4.1.2.1. (Amendment of the Act on Extradition of Offenders and the Act on the Extradition of Offenders to Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden (Implementation of the EU Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant, etc.)).

⁷⁴ See e.g. the Eastern High Court's decision of 25 April 2013 (U 2013.2240 Ø).

⁷⁵ See C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:10, paras. 31–32.

(and a duty) to be present at all stages of the trial and he or she has a right to have access to the case file, either personally or through a defence lawyer. These rights can be limited in special circumstances. If the person is present at the proceedings, the defendant always has the right to the last word. The Danish Administration of Justice Act also contains rules on the conditions for lodging an appeal and the conditions for a re-trial in the event of a judgment in absentia. The main rule is that the convicted person has full access to lodge an appeal or to petition for a re-trial if he or she was not aware of the scheduled trial in due time or there are other excusable circumstances.

When the Danish Act on Extradition of Offenders was amended in order to implement Council Framework Decision 2009/299/JHA of 26 February 2009 amending Framework Decisions 2002/584/JHA, 2005/214/JHA, 2006/783/JHA, 2008/909/JHA and 2008/947/JHA, thereby enhancing the procedural rights of persons and fostering the application of the principle of mutual recognition to decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned at the trial,⁷⁶ in the Danish preparatory works of the amendment bill the issue of whether the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) rules on in absentia judgments were in breach of any fundamental rights was not called into question. Regarding the compatibility of the EAW rules on in absentia judgments with Art. 6 ECHR, the preparatory works only state:

Under Art. 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights case law defendants in criminal cases generally have the right to be present at trial.

In the conduct of a criminal trial without the presence of the accused, in order to be compatible with Art. 6 of the Convention, the accused must be summoned to the hearings in the manner prescribed in national law, unless the accused can be assumed to have waived his right to be present, and the conduct of the criminal proceedings has sufficient procedural safeguards. According to the Court's case law it is a condition that the authorities have made reasonable efforts to make the accused aware that there are initiated criminal proceedings against the person concerned.⁷⁷

In Danish jurisprudence the rules on in absentia judgments have not given rise to any fundamental considerations. The same is true for the legal theory.

The overall assessment in the field of in absentia judgments is that fundamental rights are not compromised, and that the national courts do not have to revisit the standard of protection in the case of in absentia judgments in the context of the EAW Framework Decision.⁷⁸

⁷⁶ [2009] OJ L 81/24.

⁷⁷ C.f. Forslag til lov om ændring af lov om fuldbyrdelse af visse strafferetlige afgørelser i Den Europæiske Union og lov om udlevering af lovovertredere (L 271/2011), Sect. 3.1.3 (Amendment of the Act on Execution of Decisions in Criminal Matters in the European Union) Translation by the author.

⁷⁸ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1–2.3.4.2 According to Art. 18 b(3), taken in conjunction with Art. 14 of the Danish Act on Extradition of Offenders, the person whose extradition is sought has a right to a defence lawyer. This right exists from the very moment the Danish executing judicial authority (the Ministry of Justice) receives a European arrest warrant unless the executing judicial authority already on the basis of the arrest warrant refuses to extradite the person in question. The cost and expenses relating to the assignment of the defence lawyer and other expenses are to be defrayed by the state unless the court under extraordinary circumstances decides otherwise.

If the executing judicial authority, after an examination of the case, decides to extradite the person concerned, the police (who have conducted the examination on behalf of the executing judicial authority) are, at the person's request, obliged to bring the case to court. The court is then called upon to rule on the legality of the decision. The case is then tried by the municipal court, and the person concerned can lodge an appeal to the high court if the municipal court upholds the decision to extradite. In exceptional circumstances the case can be referred to the Supreme Court. The actual extradition cannot be executed until the final ruling has been passed.

Because of the above-mentioned rules and the practical circumstances in the event of an extradition in Denmark, there does not seem to be any need to recommend the introduction of a publicly funded state or non-governmental body to provide assistance to residents who are involved in trials abroad. This is true even though an assigned defence lawyer is released from his or her duties when the final decision on extradition has been passed, since the Framework Decision is built on the principle of mutual trust and thereby on confidence and trust among Member States regarding the same level of protection and the same respect for the rule of law, including the obligation to respect fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles – such as the right to a defence lawyer.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 The overall assessment is that the legal protection inherent in the principle of effective judicial protection and the rule of law are still fully granted the same level of protection as prior to the entry into force of the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant – even though the full protection takes place in two locations, namely both in the issuing Member State and in the executing Member State.

2.3.5.2 There has not been a true debate about the suitability of transposing mutual recognition from internal market matters to criminal law and civil and commercial disputes. This is probably because the instruments built on the principle of mutual recognition were adopted on an intergovernmental basis and not on a supranational basis.⁷⁹ Because EU citizens move freely across the borders inside the EU and because criminals also exercise their right to free movement, the transposing of mutual recognition seems to be a rational consequence of cooperation in the field of the internal market.

2.3.5.3 No concerns have been expressed in Denmark about a change in the role of the courts as an implication of the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant. This may be due to the fact that the role of Danish courts has not changed in principle in the proper sense of the word, and to the fact that a decision on extradition, on the requested person's demand, can be subjected to judicial review of the legality of the decision to extradite as outlined above.

2.3.5.4 On the other hand, everything is not just fine and there is significant room for improvement.

As mentioned in the questionnaire, there has been a call for the introduction of a proportionality test prior to an extradition request and prior to extradition based on an arrest warrant to avoid the extradition of citizens for a wide range of so-called 'trivial offences'. This has also been called for in Denmark.⁸⁰ Regardless of mutual recognition and trust, extradition to another country in preparation for a trial or for the purpose of executing a prison sentence handed down in a judgment is nevertheless an extremely serious matter. Such a severe measure calls for a high degree of justification. This requirement is not satisfied if the crime committed only amounts to what is classified as a minor criminal offence.

Moreover, even the European Commission has called for a proportionality test – including in jurisdictions where prosecution is mandatory. The Commission has in this regard stated that the application of the European arrest warrant has been undermined by the systematic issue of arrest warrants for the surrender of persons sought in respect of often petty offences even though there is a general agreement among the Member States that a proportionality check is necessary to prevent European arrest warrants from being issued for offences which – although they formally fall within the scope of the Framework Decision – are not serious enough to justify the measures and cooperation which the execution of an European arrest warrant requires. Against this background the Commission recommends that the issuing Member State,⁸¹ before issuing a European arrest warrant, take not only the seriousness of the offence but also the length of the expected sentence and the principle of least burdensome means, etc., into consideration. The Commission has ⁷⁹ Criminal law cooperation as such has been vivaciously debated in Denmark and has caused, among other things, the Danish opt-out. See further Baumbach 2013, pp. 300 et seq.

⁸⁰ See e.g. Elholm 2011, pp. 28 et seq.

⁸¹ Including those jurisdictions where prosecution is mandatory.

stated outright that there is a disproportionate effect on the liberty and freedom of requested persons when European arrest warrants are issued concerning cases for which (pre-trial) detention would otherwise be deemed inappropriate.⁸²

The European Commission has urged Member States to take positive steps to ensure that practitioners use the handbook on the EAW adopted by the Council of the European Union as amended following the recommendations in the final report on the fourth round of evaluation. The handbook includes a separate chapter on the principle of proportionality.⁸³ It is underlined in the handbook that notwithstanding the fact that an issuing Member State is not obliged to conduct a proportionality check and the legislation of the Member States plays a key role in that respect, the competent authorities should, before deciding to issue a warrant, consider proportionality by assessing the aspects stressed above.

In this author's view a proportionality test ought to be mandatory and legally binding and ought to thereby also take precedence over any mandatory prosecution rule in the issuing Member State. In this connection it is important to bear in mind that the instrument in principle is designed to further the prosecution of more serious or more damaging crimes which may substantially justify its use or for the purposes of enforcing convictions. The European arrest warrant was adopted in the wake of the terror attacks (9/11) in the USA and must be interpreted and applied in that light. In other words, the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant is a tool in the fight against genuine crime, not just a tool for expediency.

Another relevant issue in the context of the Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant is – in this author's view – the sometimes missing link between the offence and the country to which the individual is extradited. There seems to be no reason not to require such a link. The instrument should therefore be limited to cases where the offence is committed in, or in other legally relevant ways related to, the issuing Member State. This seems to be of particular importance in relation to cases covered by some of the offences listed in the positive list, for instance racism and xenophobia, which are defined differently in the individual Member States. Such a limitation would also be most consistent with the freedom of expression as defined in Art. 11 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights and in Art. 10 ECHR.

A recommendation to reinstate a judicial review in the context of extradition to ensure that the offence is sufficiently serious and that there is a sufficient link between the offence and the issuing Member State to which the individual is extradited would seem to be a suitable instrument towards a more balanced regulation of the field.

⁸² See further Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on the implementation since 2007 of the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States, COM(2011) 175 final, pp. 7 et seq.

⁸³ Chapter 3, cf. European handbook on how to issue a European arrest warrant, Council 17195/10, COPEN 275, pp. 14 et seq.

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

Due to Denmark's justice opt-out, Denmark does not have further constitutional issues in relation to European Union criminal law.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The implementation of the Data Retention Directive⁸⁴ did not raise constitutional issues.⁸⁵

Article 72 of the Constitution states:

The home is inviolable. House searches, the seizure and examination of letters and other documents and breach of the confidentiality of the post, telegraph and telephone can only take place when authorised by a Court order where there is no authority in an Act for a specific exemption.

Article 72 provides procedural protection but not substantive protection of the inviolability of the home. Interference by the authorities with an individual's communication is considered legitimate in so far as it is founded on a legal basis. This follows from the unwritten principle of legality. A court order is not necessary where an Act of Parliament dispenses this requirement. The requirement of a court order set out in Art. 72 is dispensed with in 200 cases in Danish legislation.⁸⁶ The principle of proportionality is only interpreted together with constitutional provisions which provide substantial rights protection and hence not together with Art. 72 which only provides procedural protection.⁸⁷

The legal basis for data retention is Art. 786 of the Administration of Justice Act. Data retention is therefore in accordance with the formal requirements of the Danish Constitution.

There have been no cases before the Supreme Court on the Data Retention Directive. Following the annulment of the EU Data Retention Directive by the CJEU, the Danish Ministry of Justice considered the impact of the judgment on the Danish legislation on data retention. In a memorandum dated 2 June 2014⁸⁸ the ⁸⁴ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁸⁵ However, the Directive has given rise to debate regarding its compliance with Art. 8 of the ECHR. See Rytter 2010, p. 195.

⁸⁶ See Rytter 2013, p. 227.

⁸⁷ Ibid., p. 114.

⁸⁸ See Notat om betydningen af EU-Domstolens dom af 8. april 2014 i de forenede sager C-293/12 og C-594/12 (om logningsdirektivet) for de danske logningsregler, 2 June 2014. (Memo on the importance

Ministry concluded that the Danish legislation does not violate Arts. 7 and 8 of the Charter.⁸⁹ According to the Ministry, the Danish legislation contains clear and precise rules for when the authorities can be given access to logged information and for which period such information must be stored. However, it is questionable whether the specific provisions on logging sessions can be viewed as suitable for achieving their purpose. Based on this concern, the Minister of Justice decided to annul these specific provisions.⁹⁰

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 According to Art. 22, Acts must be made public. This is done by publishing them in a special journal Lovtidende (journal of laws) which is now also available on the Internet. The purpose of Art. 22 is to provide citizens with protection against secret legislation.⁹¹ Normally, Acts do not take effect for citizens before they are published. If possible, an Act must be interpreted in such a way that even though the Act expresses the state of the law from the time it comes into force, it is not executed for instance through imposing arrest or the use of force on individuals until it is made public. However, there is no general principle prohibiting the retroactivity of Acts in Danish constitutional law. This means that if retroactivity is clearly intended by the legislator, this is not unconstitutional and must be upheld by the courts even though it is disturbing. This rarely happens in reality and the case law in this field is rather limited. The leading judgment is from 1956 (U 1958.955Ø).⁹² It should also be mentioned that the debate and the U 1958.955Ø case concerned the question whether an Act can be executed in the night/early morning if the Lovtidende is not delivered by post until some hours later. Now that the Lovtidende is on the Internet, this problem seems to be at least to some extent resolved.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality of the CJEU judgment of April 8, 2014 in Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 (on the Data Retention Directive) for the Danish rules on logging, 2 June 2014).

2.6.1 These issues have not been addressed in Danish case law.

⁸⁹ This view has been criticised. See Mchangama 2014. According to Mchangama, the Danish legislation violates the Charter and the ECHR.

⁹⁰ See BEK nr. 660 of 19/06/2014 which replaces BEK nr. 988 of 28/09/2006.

⁹¹ See Zahle 1990, p. 398.

⁹² See Zahle 2001, pp. 307–311.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 Denmark is not a member of the eurozone. However, Denmark has ratified the Treaty on Stability, Co-ordination and Governance (TSCG) and takes part in the Treaty as described in Art. 14. Since Denmark is not part of the eurozone and has not suffered from the financial crisis as severely as many other countries, there has not been much debate on the TSCG. The Danish debate mainly focused on whether Denmark could ratify the Treaty through the normal procedure in Art. 19 which only requires consent from a majority of the Members of Parliament or whether the Art. 20 procedure was necessary. If ratification were to lead to a transfer of sovereignty, five-sixths of the Members of Parliament would have to be in favour of ratifying the Treaty or a referendum would have to be held under Art. 20. The Danish Ministry of Justice examined the TSCG with a special view to part III and IV and found that ratification did not require the Art. 20 procedure, since no sovereignty was transferred. Some of the Articles in the Treaty, such as Art. 7, only impact Member States whose currency is the euro and therefore do not concern Denmark. Furthermore, the Ministry of Justice does not consider that the Treaty raises other problems in relation to the Danish Constitution.⁹³

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 (a)–(c) An interesting feature of the Danish system of references of preliminary questions to the CJEU is that when a party asks for a preliminary reference, the courts will seek advice from the Government's judicial committee through the state attorney before requesting a preliminary ruling. This committee, which is also the adviser to the Government on the implementation of EU law, rarely recommends a request for a preliminary ruling.⁹⁴ However, the Committee is primarily, though not exclusively, involved in cases in which the Danish state is involved. In civil cases with two private parties, the Committee is not always involved, but when it has been, it has more often recommended a reference.⁹⁵ In a survey, 69% of the Danish judges consulted answered that the most important reason for not referring a case to the CJEU was the advice given to them by the Danish Government's attorney.⁹⁶

⁹³ See Notat om visse forfatningsretlige spørsmål i forbindelse med Danmarks ratifikation af traktaten om stabilitet, samordning og styring i Den Økonomiske og Monetære Union (den såkaldte finanspakt). (Memo on certain constitutional issues in connection with Denmark's ratification of the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union (the so-called European Fiscal Compact)), 22 February 2013.

⁹⁴ See Pagh 2008, pp. 475–511.

⁹⁵ See Rytter and Wind 2011, p. 470, n. 88.

It has not been possible to find data on the number of cases in which the applicants have requested a preliminary ruling with regard to the validity of an EU measure since 2001.

Since 2006, Denmark has requested a preliminary ruling in 57 cases, of which 11 cases are still pending and 46 cases are closed. None of these cases has regarded the validity of an EU measure.

2.8.2 Denmark does not have a Constitutional Court and has no prima facie review in the courts. Danish courts can only perform ultra vires review and only if the plaintiff has a sufficient legal interest in having the case tried before the courts. For further information on the system of review in Denmark, see Sect. 2.8.3.

To my knowledge the standard of review has not been researched in the Danish context. I do not have any statistical data on the success rate in Danish courts which could be compared to the data in the EU Courts provided by the questionnaire. However, traditionally, Danish courts do not find violations based entirely on legal principles. Normally a violation will build on a legal basis in written legislation or the Constitution (perhaps supported by a legal principle), which has been violated. Danish courts are rather positivistic in their approach. This also means that they normally do not engage in very dynamic interpretations of, for instance, rights.⁹⁷ At the FIDE congress 2014, the President of the Danish Supreme Court stated:

Danish courts serve the law, we are not put on earth to attain more power, and we are not eagerly seeking opportunities to overrule legislation by stretching principles for their own sake. Excessive innovation and adventurism by judges is not something you will find in Denmark. Danish judges view that creative judicial activism may endanger the rule of law.⁹⁸

Compared to the Danish legal tradition, both the CJEU and the ECtHR must be considered very dynamic in their interpretations.

Obviously, the recent development in the Danish Supreme Court which follows from U 2014.914H, the recent request for a preliminary ruling⁹⁹ and Børge Dahl's statements at the FIDE conference 2014 (see e.g. the long quote in Sect. 2.1.3) are interesting since they reflect (1) the importance of general legal principles and (2) a critique of the CJEU for not upholding the principles of the rule of law, legal foreseeability and legal certainty in its judgments. One way of interpreting this is that the standard of judicial review in the national courts is not sufficient because of the dynamic interpretations by the CJEU.

⁹⁶ See Rytter and Wind 2011, p. 470.

⁹⁷ On Danish judicial self-restraint and the new European context with dynamic interpretations from the CJEU and the ECtHR, see Rytter and Wind 2011, p. 470.

⁹⁸ See Dahl 2014, p. 27.

⁹⁹ See Supreme Court decision of 22 September 2014 (Sag 15/2014, 1. Afdeling) and C-441/14.

2.8.3 Danish courts in general have quite a deferential approach to review of the constitutionality/legality of legislation, regulatory acts of the executive branch and administrative action. The Danish concept of democracy builds on a strong Parliament/legislator and reluctant courts, which are very careful to not act in a ‘political’ manner. Politicians are viewed as having democratic legitimacy through elections as compared to judges. As mentioned, Danish courts have a positivistic approach and do not normally engage in dynamic interpretations.

Danish courts have the competence to review the constitutionality of legislation. However, this important competence cannot be found in the text of the Constitution, even though this competence was legally and politically accepted in 1953, the last time the Constitution was amended. Danish courts will normally only rule that an Act is unconstitutional if a clear violation of the Constitution can be established. The Danish Supreme Court has only once found that an Act violated the Constitution. This was in the so-called Tvind-case, U 1999.841H. The Supreme Court stated that the legislator had violated the separation of powers between the legislator and the courts in Art. 3 of the Danish Constitution.

2.8.4 Denmark has no a priori review by the courts. The Ministry of Justice considers whether new legislation is coherent with the Constitution, existing legislation, EU law and international treaties which Denmark has signed, including the ECHR.

In the Danish Maastricht judgment, U 1980.800H, the Supreme Court stated that the Constitution, including human rights protection, has supremacy over EU Law. The competence to legislate in a way that violates the human rights protection in the Constitution cannot be transferred according to Art. 20, since Danish authorities do not have such competence. Furthermore, according to the Supreme Court, Danish courts have the right and the duty to step in if it can be established with sufficient certainty that the EU by an act or a judgment has gone beyond the competences which Denmark has transferred to the EU according to Art. 20 of the Danish Constitution. This was confirmed in the Danish Lisbon Judgment.¹⁰⁰

In the Lisbon judgment the Supreme Court found that there was no basis for concluding that Art. 20 of the Danish Constitution had been violated. However, the Court stated:

However, a case involving an act or a judicial decision adopted or delivered pursuant to the relevant Treaty provisions and having a specific and real impact on citizens etc., would provide a better basis for hearing the dispute.¹⁰¹

And further:

If EU acts are adopted or if the Court of Justice delivers judgments with reference to the European Convention on Human Rights, based on an interpretation of the Treaties that contravenes this constitutional assessment, it will be possible to submit this to a judicial review as stated in the Maastricht judgment (paragraph 9.6).

¹⁰⁰ Supreme Court decision of 20 February 2013, Case No. 199/2012, p. 16, U 2013.1451H.

¹⁰¹ Ibid.

Thus, the Supreme Court can be expected to review EU acts and judgments more actively in concrete cases in the future. However, this will require that the plaintiffs have legal standing in the form of a legal interest in having the case tried before the courts.

There is no Danish equivalent to the *Solange II*¹⁰² or *Bosphorus*¹⁰³ judgments that would assume that the standard of protection of rights in the EU is equivalent to that provided by the ECtHR or the national standard, unless the applicant proves a significant fall of standards.

2.8.5 Not relevant in the Danish context.

2.8.6 In the Danish context, the equal treatment of individuals falling within the scope of EU law and those falling outside the scope of EU law has primarily been discussed in relation to EU citizens from other EU countries who receive social benefits in Denmark and protection against ‘social tourism’.¹⁰⁴ Furthermore, attention has been paid to cases from the CJEU on citizenship and third country nationals, for instance relating to the national competence to grant and revoke citizenship, and the competence of the Member States to exercise reverse discrimination.¹⁰⁵

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 In the winter/spring of 2015 discussions took place in the Danish Parliament regarding parliamentary control of the implementation of EU directives. Parliament was concerned since the executive implements EU directives by administrative acts in nine out of ten cases.¹⁰⁶ According to the chairman of the European Policy Committee, this means that parliamentary control is cut off.¹⁰⁷ The Minister of Justice on the other hand emphasised that Parliament is almost always involved in the negotiations of proposals on new EU legislation though the European Policy

¹⁰² 19 BVerfGE 73, 339 [1986] (Solange II).

¹⁰³ Bosphorus Hava Yolları Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Şirketi v. Ireland [GC], no. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

¹⁰⁴ See for instance Jacqueson 2010, pp. 152–166, on the right of EU citizens to receive social welfare benefits. From the press see for instance: Pedersen, K. (2009, May 25). Arbejdsløse EU-borgere får flere penge end danskere (Unemployed EU citizens receive more money than Danes). Information. See also Røndbjerg-Christensen, H. (2014, March 11). Dansk dagpenge-slagsmål adskiller sig fra børnecheck-sagen (Struggle over Danish unemployment benefits differs from the child allowance case). Berlingske.

¹⁰⁵ See for instance Krunk and Schulyok 2014, pp. 107–152.

¹⁰⁶ See Winther, B. (2015, April 17). Folketinget slår alarm: Vi kobles af EU-lovgivning (The Danish Parliament raises the alarm: We are disconnected from EU legislation). Berlingske. <http://www.politiko.dk/perspektiv/folketinget-slaar-alarm-vi-kobles-af-eu-lovgivning>.

¹⁰⁷ Ibid.

Committee. The Government writes memos to the Parliament on all proposals for new directives and proposals for important regulations, and presents these to the European Policy Committee.¹⁰⁸ On 7 May 2015 the Danish Parliament adopted a parliamentary resolution stating that in the future Parliament shall always be informed if a bill or an administrative act goes further in implementing a directive than requested by the EU. Furthermore, the Government is in general requested to inform Parliament when implementing EU directives and regulations.¹⁰⁹

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 It seems that values such as democracy, separation of powers, independent courts and basic human rights, for instance the political freedoms, right to privacy, etc., are common values. Many of these values are already part of the common values of the EU. The Danish Constitution does not expressly mention any constitutional principles. Furthermore, the human rights charter in the Constitution is not very detailed and stems from 1953. At that time it was not possible to foresee phenomena such as massive data retention. Hence, rights of a more modern character are not touched upon. Since the courts are not especially dynamic, such rights do not follow from case law either.

The courts are normally also rather reluctant to refer to constitutional or legal principles. However, as pointed out, in recent developments the Supreme Court has emphasised the importance of general legal principles such as the rule of law, legal certainty and foreseeability as a reaction to dynamic case law from the CJEU.

The question of national constitutional identity is related to question 2.10.1. This concept and its content will probably develop in the future. At present, Danish courts have not contributed much to defining the Danish constitutional identity as compared to the German Constitutional Court's role in defining the German constitutional identity.¹¹⁰ Perhaps a few very general points can be found in the Danish Maastricht and Lisbon judgments, such as the constitutional precondition of a democratic form of government and the requirement that Denmark must remain an independent state; however, constitutional identity has not expressly been mentioned.¹¹¹

¹⁰⁸ See the answer of the Minister of Justice to question No. 7 of 21 April 2015 from the European Policy Committee, annex to B52.

¹⁰⁹ See Resolution by Parliament on information of the Parliament regarding implementation of EU directives, regulations and administrative regulations of 7 May 2015, and Report on information of the Parliament regarding implementation of EU directives, regulations and administrative regulations by the European Policy Committee of 24 April 2015.

¹¹⁰ As regards Danish national constitutional identity, see Krunk 2014a.

¹¹¹ See ibid. and Krunk 2014b, pp. 542–570.

2.10.2 Since the question is related to identifying constitutional national identity, this is also a question of how to identify national constitutional identity in the Member States. Obviously, the Constitutions and case law from the national constitutional court and/or supreme court play a role in this, and attaching relevant information on national constitutional traditions to references for a preliminary ruling, as suggested, could be a good instrument. Another place to look might be international treaties, for instance on human rights, which all EU Member States have entered into. A third suggestion could be to study how the national parliaments have used the Early Warning System, since this might reflect some common values and would also include parliaments and not just courts in defining national values and constitutional identity. Fourthly, one might search for national constitutional identity in the Member States' exceptions from the EU treaties.¹¹² National exceptions might indicate areas where no common European ground has been found, thus indirectly contributing to defining the values that are common.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 There has been no debate on these particular issues. Interestingly, Jens Elo Rytter presumes that no conflict between constitutional human rights and EU fundamental rights can arise, since the EU protection of fundamental rights, according to Art. 53, does not prevent a higher national constitutional standard.¹¹³ As pointed out, the last revision of the Danish Constitution took place in 1953. The human rights charter is of a classic character, not very extensive and some would say not of a modern standard. Hence, the ECHR plays an important role in human rights protection.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 Some debate took place around the time of the adoption of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision.¹¹⁴ More public debate has followed since it is now possible to see the impact of the European Arrest Warrant Framework

¹¹² See Krunk 2014b, pp. 542–570.

¹¹³ See Rytter 2013, p. 48.

¹¹⁴ See e.g. Wilhjelm, P. (2002, May 23) Den Europæiske arrestordre (The European arrest warrant). Politiken. <http://politiken.dk/debat/kroniken/ECE33513/den-europaeiske-arrestordre>.

Decision. The critique is inter alia based on the principle of legal certainty and existing legal principles relating to the extradition of criminals.¹¹⁵

As regards the EU Data Retention Directive, some debate took place at the time of the national implementation and included critique related to the principle of proportionality.¹¹⁶ Since the judgment of the CJEU, more public debate has followed.

2.12.2 As mentioned in Sect. 2.8.2, Denmark does not have a Constitutional Court and no a priori review in the courts. Furthermore, Danish courts can only perform ultra vires review if the plaintiff has a sufficient legal interest in having the case tried before the courts.

The question of suspension has both a democratic dimension and a legal dimension. As regards the democratic dimension, the question is about allowing room for public debate at the national level. Public debate is of course a cornerstone of democracy and should be supported and encouraged not only by national politicians but also by the EU. Hence, sufficient time should be given for this. However, there must also obviously be a time limit for such public debate, as otherwise it would be very difficult to legislate in an international organisation consisting of 28 Member States.

It also has a legal dimension since the core of this question is the legal relationship between EU law and national law. As is well known, according to EU Law, EU law is superior to national law, including the national constitutions. However, according to many national constitutional systems, the Constitution is superior to EU law. This has been expressed by a number of national courts, including the German Constitutional Court and the Danish Supreme Court. If one follows EU law viewed from a purely legal angle, implementation cannot be delayed because a case is pending in a constitutional court, since EU law has supremacy over the national constitutions. The principle of supremacy and the principle of direct effect are important EU principles built on efficiency and equality arguments. However, under national constitutional law suspension would make more sense, since many national constitutional systems do not accept the principle of supremacy.

2.12.3 As mentioned, this question on suspending the application of an EU measure touches upon the premise of the supremacy of EU law. Obviously, viewed from the angle of many constitutional systems, this would make sense since EU law cannot violate the national constitution. One might also put forward that if, according to a number of constitutional courts, an EU measure violates national general legal principles and rights, then this would be a good reason for the EU to reconsider the measure regardless of the principle of supremacy, since EU cooperation builds on democratic values, human rights, etc.

¹¹⁵ See e.g. Mchangama J. (2011) Den Europæiske arrestordre er en trussel med retssikkerheden (The European arrest warrant is a threat to legal certainty). CEPOS, 2 March 2011.

¹¹⁶ See e.g. Gjerdning, S. and Andersen, P. (2012, April 28). Minister kan ikke svare på, hvad internet-loggen bruges til (Minister cannot answer what internet logging is used for). Information. <http://www.information.dk/299538>. This refers to critique raised in 2007.

However, not all Member States have constitutional courts and therefore only some Member States would be able to reject an EU measure based on judgments from the constitutional court. This might create an imbalance between the Member States.

A measure such as the one proposed could in reality create a veto-right, and only for some Member States. This should be taken into consideration even though the idea of promoting general legal principles and human rights is attractive.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 As pointed out, the Danish Supreme Court is worried about the standard of protection of general legal principles such as the rule of law, legal certainty, foreseeability and legal expectations. The Former President of the Danish Supreme Court has stated that this concern is shared by judges in other Member States.¹¹⁷ Obviously, such a concern within the national courts in the Member States should be taken seriously both at the national level and at the EU level. These principles are also EU principles, and although they might have a slightly different content in EU law, there seems to be no doubt that the principles express legal values that are also shared by the EU legal system.

2.13.2–2.13.4 An extensive overview of all EU measures and the CJEU's interpretation of them would be required to answer this question. The Danish Supreme Court has expressed a growing concern and it is important to note that the Supreme Court only receives cases in which a plaintiff has legal standing in the form of a legal interest in the case. Furthermore, not all cases reach the Supreme Court due to procedural rules or because the cases are not appealed. Thus, the judges only see 'random samples', which might be just the tip of the iceberg. The Danish Supreme Court has heard a number of cases where a national judgment which followed the CJEU's interpretation of an EU measure or an unwritten principle developed by the CJEU would require the Supreme Court to rule contra legem as regards national legislation. This would be in contradiction with fundamental legal principles such as the rule of law, legal certainty and legal foreseeability. This obviously shows that the CJEU's dynamic interpretation style in certain cases creates a state of the law which was not foreseeable for the Member States, private parties, national judges, etc. According to EU law, the duty to interpret national legislation in conformity with EU law does not include a duty to interpret contra legem. If the CJEU were to uphold this in the mentioned case, C-441/14, referred to the CJEU for a preliminary ruling from the Danish Supreme Court, one might put forward that the private party in the concrete case would not suffer any loss. However, the practice of the Danish Supreme Court still reveals that the interpretations of the CJEU are not always predictable and that this unpredictability in certain cases can be so extensive that a contra legem situation is reached. Case C-441/14¹¹⁸ relates to the unwritten principle of the prohibition of age discrimination as recognised by the CJEU.

¹¹⁷ See quotation above in Sect. 2.1.3, n. 50.

The Danish cases regard the CJEU's interpretations of EU measures which can appear years after the adoption of the measures by the political institutions. Furthermore, the Danish cases regard the CJEU's development of unwritten principles with the same legal status as the EU treaties. Several possible solutions could be mentioned such as a greater awareness within the CJEU of the importance of general legal principles and a strengthened legal value attached to travaux préparatoires when interpreting EU measures. Allowing for dissenting opinions would support a nuanced debate within the CJEU and strengthen legal arguments, since it would create more focus on 'differences'. It would also support public debate. A strengthened dialogue between the CJEU and the national courts and a more proactive role by the courts would seem to advance a solution, since this would highlight problems. However, solutions might also be sought by the political institutions. The EU legislator can seek to be clearer when formulating new EU measures. The EU's political institutions could engage in a debate following concrete CJEU judgments which give EU measures an interpretation far from that which was originally intended. National governments and parliaments can be better in expressing concern as regards legal principles and human rights in the legislative process. Creating a new independent judicial body which could ex ante or ex post review new EU measures in relation to constitutional principles and rights could be an effective solution. Importantly, if all Member States were represented in a judicial body, a good balance between constitutional traditions would be reached. The only concern is that such a judicial body might perhaps become a 'political' player with the power to 'veto' EU measures.

As regards the CJEU's responsiveness to national concerns, it will be very interesting to see how the CJEU responses to the Danish preliminary ruling request noted above, which refers to a number of general legal principles.

As regards the Danish context, it seems that the fact that important legal principles are not directly emphasised in the text of the Constitution and that the human rights catalogue is rather old might be a problem in relation to a strengthened focus on the constitutional identity, principles and rights of the Member States. This is to some extent strengthened by the fact that Denmark does not have a constitutional court. Furthermore, the national courts' tendency to apply general principles without referring directly to them or indicating whether they are at constitutional level deserves mention. One might state that if Denmark wants to be heard at the EU level as regards our constitutional values, principles and rights, we need to be clearer on what they are and we need to communicate them in a clearer way to the ¹¹⁸ Case C-441/14 DI [2016] ECLI:EU:C:2016:278.

EU. The Supreme Court has just done so in its preliminary ruling request, which is a good starting point. Other Member States are much better at formulating and communicating their constitutional values and identity to the EU and the other Member States. If Denmark wants to be part of a constitutional dialogue with the CJEU, the other EU institutions and the other Member States, we need to focus much more on our own constitutional values and identity. Whether this is sufficiently possible within the context of the present Constitution from 1953 is questionable. A public and political debate focusing on constitutional principles, values, etc., and a new Constitution based on such debate and expressing the Danish constitutional identity in a clearer way would probably strengthen the Danish ‘voice’ in the multi-level debate, as would the establishment of a Danish Constitutional Court.

3 Constitutional Issue in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 As mentioned in Sect. 1.3, Arts. 19 and 20 of the Danish Constitution regulate the transfer of powers to international organisations and the ratification of treaties. Articles 20 and 19, subsection 1 are quoted in Sect. 1.3.1. Article 19, subsections 2 and 3 read as follows:¹¹⁹

Art. 19

Subsection 2: Except for purposes of defence against an armed attack upon the Realm or Danish forces the King shall not use military force against any foreign state without the consent of the Folketing. Any measure which the King may take in pursuance of this provision shall forthwith be submitted to the Folketing. If the Folketing is not in session it shall be convened immediately.

Subsection 3: The Folketing shall appoint from among its members a Foreign Affairs Committee, which the government shall consult before making any decision of major importance to foreign policy. Rules applying to the Foreign Affairs Committee shall be laid down by statute.

Article 20 on transfer of sovereignty refers to the following very broad objective sought by an international organisation: ‘international authorities set up by mutual agreement with other states for the promotion of international rules of law and cooperation’.

No specific international organisations are mentioned in the Constitution.

3.1.2–3.1.4 The Constitution has not been amended since 1953. Article 19 was introduced already in the first Constitution of 1849 although with a slightly different content (then Art. 23). It was amended in 1866, 1915 and 1953. Parliamentary involvement was strengthened between 1849 and 1953. As mentioned in Part 1 of this report, Art. 20 was introduced in 1953.

¹¹⁹ Only the first subsection of Art. 19 is quoted in Sect. 1.3.1.

In a Ph.D. thesis from 2003 it is shown how the Foreign Affairs Committee has tried to copy the procedures of the European Policy Committee including the mandate procedure.¹²⁰ This has been done through reports (like the European Policy Committee) and at the meetings by counting whether a majority is against the Government's position on certain foreign policy issues. The Committee has tried to force the Government to make it clear when the Government (1) informs the committee and (2) when it seeks its advice.¹²¹

In legal commentary the traditional standpoint has been that Parliament cannot legally bind the Government by legislation and/or parliamentary decisions in the field of foreign affairs because of the foreign affairs prerogative. However, the late Professor of Constitutional Law at the University of Copenhagen, Henrik Zahle, disagreed. According to him this is possible.¹²²

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 Article 19, quoted above, regulates the application of treaties and their position in domestic law. Denmark has a dualistic legal system. As mentioned, this can be interpreted on the basis of Art. 19 and case law.¹²³ Considerable debate took place 15–20 years ago in the legal literature on whether Denmark had moved from dualism to so-called ‘practical monism’. However, recent case law from the Supreme Court confirms that Denmark has a dualistic system.¹²⁴ Even though recent case law has established that non-incorporated treaties are not directly applicable within the domestic legal order, these treaties still constitute valuable sources for interpretation, which should be in accordance with the relevant ratified treaties.¹²⁵

Three important rules modify the dualistic approach to national law and international, ratified treaties: (1) Danish legal norms should be interpreted in accordance with international obligations if possible; (2) when applying national legal norms, they should be applied with the assumption that the legislator has not intended to breach international treaty obligations and (3) administrative authorities

¹²⁰ See Krunk 2003. See also Krunk 2007, pp. 335–348.

¹²¹ See Report from the Foreign Policy Committee, 13 March 2000.

¹²² See Zahle 2006, pp. 388–391. See also Krunk 2003.

¹²³ See for instance Rytter 2010, p. 189, and U 2006.700H, U 2010.1035 and U 2010.1547H.

¹²⁴ See U 2006.700H, U 2010.1035 and U 2010.1547H.

¹²⁵ See Zahle 2007, pp. 362–364. Zahle further states that if an international treaty is in direct conflict with a national legal norm and the conflict cannot be solved by applying the above mentioned rules and the legislator intended the breach with an international obligation, then the national norm must be respected by the national authorities. See ibid., p. 374.

shall conduct their cases in a manner such that the breach of international treaty obligations is avoided. While Danish courts will go far to try to interpret Danish law in coherence with international obligations, there are limits to this and, as mentioned, the Danish courts have in recent years made it clear that the Danish legal system is dualistic. If international obligations are in clear conflict with Danish legislation or the Constitution (and this was not intended by the legislator), national law will be given precedence.

In an interesting case, U 2013.3328H, a person complained about the treatment by the authorities of his citizenship application. In Denmark citizenship is accorded by a bill adopted by the legislator listing the names of the persons concerned. The Supreme Court stated that it could not review whether the plaintiff should have been included in the bill on citizenship or whether he should have been granted Danish citizenship. This is due to the prerogative of the Government to propose bills under Art. 21, and the competence of Members of Parliament to propose bills. However, the Supreme Court could review whether Denmark had violated an international obligation in this field and whether the plaintiff was entitled to compensation on this basis.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1–3.3.2 Democratic control over foreign policy is discussed in Sects. 3.1.2–3.1.4.

It follows from Art. 19 that Parliament must consent to international obligations which increase or reduce Danish territory, the fulfilment of which requires the concurrence of Parliament or which are otherwise of major importance. Consent must also be given if the Government wants to denounce any international treaty entered into with the consent of the Folketing, the Danish Parliament. The Foreign Affairs Committee must be consulted before making any decision of major importance for foreign policy. Since the debates in this committee are normally confidential, the committee is a good forum for the involvement of Parliament in foreign affairs. Parliament also has normal standing committees on Foreign Policy and Defence Policy. As regards the EU Common Foreign and Security Policy, both the Foreign Affairs Committee and the European Policy Committee are involved. The above-mentioned committees also follow international cooperation after ratification.

Because of the changed landscape with more globalisation and international cooperation, power has been transferred from the legislator to the Government. Areas which were formerly entirely regulated by national legislation are now debated in international fora by representatives from the national governments. In this light it seems necessary to rethink the foreign affairs prerogative and to compensate the national parliaments for lost competence in the national constitutions.

According to Art. 42, part 6, bills introduced for the purpose of discharging existing treaty obligations cannot be decided by a referendum. If a majority of Parliament so decides, an Act passed under Art. 19 can be submitted to a referendum. However, Parliament must first pass an Act to the effect that the resolution must be submitted to a referendum.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 No further points have arisen.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

Not relevant.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

No further points have arisen.

References

- Andersen P. (1954) Dansk Statsforfatningsret (Danish constitutional law). Gyldendal, Oslo.
- Baumbach T. (2011) The Notion of Criminal Penalty and the Lex Mitior Principle in the Scoppola v. Italy Case. Nordic Journal of International Law 80:125 et seq.
- Baumbach T. (2013) Danish criminal law and the EU. EuCLR 3:300 et seq.
- Berlin K. (1939) Den Danske forfatningsret (Danish constitutional law). Nyt Nordisk Forlag Arnold Busck, Copenhagen.
- Dahl B. (2014) Keynote address. In: Neergaard U., Jacquesson C. (eds.) (2014) Proceedings: Speeches from the XXVI FIDE Congress, Copenhagen, 28–31 May 2014, <http://www.fide2014.eu>, pp. 26–30.
- Dansk Center for Menneskerettigheder og Advokatsamfundet (The Danish Institute for Human Rights and The Danish Bar and Law Society) (2012) Legal guide. <http://www.advokatsamfundet.dk/Service/Nyheder/2012/retssikkerhedsguide.aspx>.
- Elholm T. (2011) Vi, Den Polske Stat, forlanger skinketyven udleveret (We, the Polish state, demand the ham thief be extradited). Advokaten 90(4):28 et seq.
- Henrichsen C. (1997) Retssikkerhed og moderne forvaltning (Legal certainty and modern administration). DJØF Publishing, Copenhagen.
- Jacqueson C. (2010) Unionsborgerens ret til sociale ydelser efter EU-retten – Hvilk en vej blæser vinden? (EU citizens' right to social benefits according to EU law – Which way is the wind blowing?). EU-Ret & Menneskeret 3:152–166.
- Jensen M.H. (1994) Proportionalitetsprincippet (The principle of proportionality). Ugeskrift for Retsvæsen B:235–244.

- Jensen M.H., Jensen J.A. (1991) Afgrænsning af begrebet 'beføjelser, der tilkommer rigets myndigheder' i grundlovens § 20 (Demarcation of the concept 'powers vested in the authorities' in Article 20 of the Constitution). Ugeskrift for Retsvaesen:281–288.
- Koch H. (2008) A Legal Mission: The Emergence of a European 'Rationalized' Natural Law. In: Petersen H. (ed.) Paradoxes of European Legal Integration. Ashgate Publishing, Farnham, pp. 45–63.
- Kristiansen J. (2013) Aftalemodellen og dens europæiske udfordringer (The bargaining model and its European challenges). DJØF Publishing, Copenhagen.
- Krunke H. (2003) Den Udenrigspolitiske Kompetence (Foreign policy competence). DJØF Publishing, Copenhagen.
- Krunke H. (2005) From Maastricht to Edinburg: The Danish Solution. EuConst 1(3):339–356.
- Krunke H. (2007) Developments of National Parliaments' Involvement in Ordinary Foreign Policy and European Policy – Denmark. EPL 13(2):335–348.
- Krunke H. (2008–2009) Memorandum on Denmark, in the House of Lords, European Union Committee, 17th Report of Session 2008–09, on Codecision and national parliamentary scrutiny.
- Krunke H. (2010) Pensionsreform. De retlige grænser og muligheder. Berettigede forventninger. Generationsfordeling. Demokrati (Pension Reform. The legal limits and possibilities. Legitimate expectations. Generation distribution. Democracy). DJØF Publishing, Copenhagen.
- Krunke H. (2013) Engineering Constitutional Change: A Comparative Perspective on Europe, Canada and the USA. Routledge, Abingdon, pp. 73–92.
- Krunke H. (2014a) Constitutional identity – seen through a Danish lens. Retfaerd 37(4):24–40.
- Krunke H. (2014b) The Danish Lisbon Judgment – Danish Supreme Court, Case 199/2012, Judgment of 20 February 2013. EuConst 10(3):542–570.
- Larsen E. (1940) Tvungen Ejendomsafståelse (Forced disposal of property). Nyt Nordisk Forlag Arnold Busck, Copenhagen.
- Lauta K.C., Rytter J.E. (2012) Denmark. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 389–416.
- Mchangama J. (2014) Revision af logningsreglerne (Revision of the regulations on logging). Justitia, 4 September 2014.
- Mørup S. (2005) Berettigede forventninger I forvaltningsretten (Legitimate expectations in administrative law). DJØF Publishing, Copenhagen.
- Neergaard U., Nielsen R. (2010) Blurring Boundaries: From the Danish Welfare State to the European Social Model. Available on SSRN http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1618758.
- Pagh P. (2008) Juridisk Specialudvalg og præjudicielle forelæggelser for EF-domstolen (Legal Special Committee and the preliminary ruling of the ECJ). In: Olsen B.E., Sørensen K.E. (eds.) Europaiseringen af dansk ret (The Europeanisation of Danish law). DJØF Publishing, Copenhagen.
- Piris J.C. (2010) The Lisbon Treaty: A legal and Political Analysis. Cambridge Studies in European Law and Policy. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Rasmussen H. (2008) Denmark's Waning Constitutionalism and Article 20 of the Constitution on Transfer of Sovereignty. In Albi A., Ziller J. (eds.) The European Constitution and the National Constitutions: Ratification and Beyond. Kluwer, Alphen aan den Rijn.
- Ross A. (1966) Dansk statsforfatningsret II (Danish national law No. 2). Nyt Nordisk Forlag Arnold Busck, Copenhagen.
- Rytter J.E. (2010) Dansk-europæisk menneskerettighedsbeskyttelse (Danish-European human rights protection). Juristen 6/7:195 et seq.
- Rytter J.E. (2012) Individets grundlæggende rettigheder (The fundamental rights of the individual). Karnov Group, Copenhagen.
- Rytter J.E. (2013) Individets grundlæggende rettigheder (The fundamental rights of the individual). Karnov Group, Copenhagen.

- Rytter J.E., Wind M. (2011) In need of juristocracy? The silence of Denmark in the development of European legal norms. ICON 9 (2):470 et seq.
- Schulyok F. (2014) In: Giegerich T., Gstain O.J., Zeitzmann S. (eds.) The EU between ‘an Ever Closer Union’ and Inalienable Policy Domains of Member States. Nomos Verlagsgesellschaft mbH & Co. KG, Baden-Baden, pp. 107–152.
- Vestergaard J., Adamo S. (2009) National Report: Denmark. In: Vernimment-Van Tiggelen G., Surano L., Weyembergh A. (eds.) The Future of Mutual Recognition in Criminal Matters in the European Union. Editions de l’Université de Bruxelles, Brussels, pp. 147 et seq.
- Vestergaard J., Tranberg C.B. (2012) Denmark. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 289–317.
- Zahle H. (1990) Anmeldelse. Loven i tale, skrift og elektronik (Review. The law in speech, writing and electronics). Juristen 8:398 et seq.
- Zahle H. (2001) Dansk Forfatningsret, bind 1 (Danish constitutional law, volume 1). Christian Ejlers Forlag, Copenhagen.
- Zahle H. (2006) Dansk Forfatningsret (Danish constitutional law). Christian Ejlers Forlag, Copenhagen.
- Zahle H. (2007) Dansk Forfatningsret (studieudgaven) (Danish constitutional law). Christian Ejlers forlag/DJØF Publishing, Copenhagen.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter’s Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter’s Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Sweden and European Influences: The Changing Balance Between Democratic and Judicial Power

Joakim Nergelius

Abstract The Swedish Constitution is composed of four constitutional acts, some of which date back more than two hundred years. The central document is the Instrument of Government of 1974. The report observes that the fundamental rights chapter had rarely been applied by the Swedish courts until recent years. Traditionally, the national protection of basic rights is described as weak, as there is neither a constitutional court nor a strong tradition of judicial review by the ordinary courts. Judicial restraint is deemed necessary so as not to undermine the Swedish popular democracy. Thus, in general, EU and international law have enhanced rights protection and judicial review. Areas where constitutional concerns have arisen include the following: (a) freedom of speech enjoys a strong protection in the Constitution and this prompted delays regarding the implementation of the Data Retention Directive, which led to a consequent EU fine; (2) the ECJ ruling in Laval clashed with the right for trade unions to initiate collective action; (3) concerns have been expressed by civil society about limitation of the widespread access to documents where their secrecy may be requested by an international organisation. The European Arrest Warrant has not raised rights concerns in Sweden, although the report finds the ECJ's approach in Melloni to be misguided. The Constitution contains extensive amendments regarding EU and international co-operation, including a fundamental rights based limitation clause that had its origin in the German Constitutional Court's Solange decisions.

Keywords The Constitution of Sweden/Instrument of Government
Amendment of the Constitution in relation to EU and international co-operation
Solange clause • The Swedish Supreme Court • Strengthening of judicial review

Joakim Nergelius is Professor of Constitutional Law, University of Örebro. e-mail: joakim.nergelius@oru.se.

All websites accessed and text submitted 20 January 2015, with some updates and revisions inserted in November 2018.

J. Nergelius (✉)
University of Örebro, Örebro, Sweden
e-mail: joakim.nergelius@oru.se through EU and ECHR law • Deference of courts • Laval and impact on collective action, posted workers and freedom of expression • European Arrest Warrant and extraditions • Data Retention Directive, freedom of expression, public protests and EU fine for delay in implementation • Fundamental rights • Melloni, Article 53 EU Charter and the question of a higher standard of protection • Referendums on EU accession and adoption of the euro

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 Without any doubt whatsoever, Sweden falls into the second category of constitutions noted in the Questionnaire. If we take Joseph Raz's distinction between 'thick' and 'thin' constitutions, where the latter are 'simply the law that establishes and regulates the main organs of government, their constitution and powers', while the former have to meet a number of requirements, such as long duration, 'canonical formulation' and entrenchment as a point of departure,¹ few countries fit better into the 'thick' category than Sweden, with its long, peaceful tradition. Similarly, Besselink makes a distinction between historical and revolutionary constitutions, where the former, like in the UK, Netherlands or Sweden, have developed gradually over a long period, which tends to make them less binding or normative and just as political as legal in their nature. As for the latter, they have been enacted radically, under more dramatic circumstances, in a way that has been formative for the state in question.² It is thus also true that Sweden's constitutional culture has never been influenced to a notable extent by any constitutional traditions in other countries or regions. In fact, the visible change in the attitude of the highest Swedish courts in relation to judicial review during the last few years, under the influence of EU law as will be explained below, is probably the clearest example of this kind of 'constitutional influence'.

1.1.2 The Swedish Constitution is composed of four constitutional acts: the Instrument of Government (Regeringsformen) of 1974; the Freedom of the Press Act (Tryckfrihetsförordningen) of 1949 (but with a history dating back to 1766); the Freedom of Speech Act (Yttrandefrihetsgrundlagen) of 1991, regulating media other than the printed media; and the Act of Succession of 1809, regulating the right to the throne. On 1 January 2011, the main Swedish constitutional act, the Instrument of Government (IG), was subject to some important changes. This was not its first main reform; for example when Sweden joined the European Union on 1 January 1995, some important changes were made, notably in the field of human rights protection. From a structural point of view, however, this new reform of 2011 is probably more interesting, since it mixed the traditional popular sovereignty upon which the Constitution is based with some new elements of judicial review and increased the separation of powers, both in a horizontal and vertical manner.

¹ See Raz 1998, pp. 152–193.

² See Besselink 2007 and Nergelius 2009, p. 34.

Since 1974, there has been a chapter on fundamental rights (Chap. 2 IG) in the Swedish Constitution. It is quite similar to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and must as such be described as extensive; however, until very recent years, it has very rarely been applied by Swedish courts. Thus, the centre of gravity is now gradually moving from a total focus on popular sovereignty to a combination of the traditional ideal pertaining to fundamental rights protection as well as the separation of powers.³

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 The constitutional regulation covering EU membership as well as other kinds of international agreements is found in Chap. 10, Art. 6 of the Instrument of Government, the main constitutional act. A few words could be said about the historical background for this regulation, which today reads as follows:

Within the framework of European Union cooperation, the Riksdag [Parliament] may transfer decision-making authority which does not affect the basic principles by which Sweden is governed. Such transfer presupposes that protection for rights and freedoms in the field of cooperation to which the transfer relates corresponds to that afforded under this Instrument of Government and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

The Riksdag may approve a transfer of authority, provided that at least three fourths of those voting and more than half the members of the Riksdag vote in favour of the decision. The Riksdag's decision may also be taken in accordance with the procedure prescribed for the enactment of fundamental law. Such a transfer cannot be decided until the Riksdag has approved the agreement under Article 3.⁴

Roughly speaking, this Article was introduced when Sweden joined the European Union in 1995, while some other important articles in Chap. 10 that are dealt with below date back to the enactment of the new Constitution in 1974 or even earlier.⁵ Already in 1964, the possibility to transfer decision-making powers to an international organisation aimed at peaceful co-operation was established, although this could only take place to a limited extent. Although these old provisions could of course not be used to facilitate EU membership, this constitutional reform was ³ See Nergelius 2014, where this recent change is the point of departure.

⁴ Quoted from the official publication 'The Constitution of Sweden – The Fundamental Law and the Riksdag Act, Sveriges Riksdag – The Swedish Parliament', Stockholm 2012.

⁵ A useful comment on the historical background of this Article, and its history before 1995, is provided by Algotsson 2000, p. 273. See also Holmberg and Stjernquist 2003, pp. 198 et seq. and Bernitz 2002b, p. 28.

thus actually enacted as early as fifty years ago, with the future relation to the European Community in mind (given that Sweden had applied for association with the Community already in 1961). These rules were then transferred to the new Constitution in 1974, with the additional provision that competences could also be transferred to an international court.⁶

However, it may be said that Chap. 10, Arts. 7–10 permit transfers of legislative powers, budgetary powers including the use of the assets of the state and treaty-making power, all to a limited extent, to international organisations other than the EU, while the possibility to transfer rights of decision-making to the EU itself is, and has been ever since 1995, much wider and more general. From a material point of view, such a transfer is thus limited only by the standard of the protection of human rights within the EU.

From what has been said above, it follows that when Sweden was going to join the EU, the question was whether the three formerly last sections of Chap. 10, Art. 5 (now Arts. 7–10) would be sufficient or not. In other words, was a constitutional reform required in order to enable Sweden to join the European Union?

The first committee that attempted to deal with this question, the so-called Constitutional committee for joining the (then) EC,⁷ answered in the affirmative but proposed a new rule in Chap. 1, Art. 10, according to which the supremacy of any kind of EU law in relation to any Swedish law, including the Constitution, should be clearly stated or declared. However, criticism of this proposal was very heavy in the spring of 1993, mainly due to political reasons. It was seen as a sign of Swedish resign or capitulation before Europe and was identified with an unlimited handing over of power to Brussels.⁸ Consequently, the Government quickly proposed three other alternatives, one of which was similar to the one finally chosen.⁹ It should be noted that the solution chosen was very much influenced by certain jurisprudence of the German Constitutional Court, the Bundesverfassungsgericht.

The background to this is that according to Chap. 8, Art. 14 IG, constitutional amendments must be presented in Parliament nine months before a general election and then approved, by a simple majority of the members of Parliament, in two subsequent and identical decisions before and after the election. This rule applies to all four Swedish constitutional acts, i.e. not only to the Instrument of Government but also the Freedom of the Press Act, the Freedom of Speech Act and the Act of Succession noted in Sect. 1.1.2. Such an election was going to take place in September 1994 and thus, in February 1994, it was also decided that a referendum on EU membership should be held in November of that same year. Consequently, the proposal for constitutional reform had to be presented to the Parliament in December

⁶ Some minor changes were also introduced in 1976 and 1985. See Algotsson 2000, p. 274.

⁷ Grundlagsutredningen inför EG SOU (Statens offentliga utredningar, Official Bills and Proposals) 1993:14.

⁸ For a further analysis of this debate, see Algotsson 2000, p. 273. See also Bernitz 2002b, pp. 109 et seq., and Melin and Schäder 1999, pp. 168 et seq.

⁹ These were all presented in the report Ds 1993:36, Våra grundlagar och EG – förslag till alternativ (Our constitutions and the EC – different options).

1993 at the latest, in order to facilitate EU membership, given that the content of the then Sects. 2–4 of IG 10:5¹⁰ was not sufficient for this. Furthermore, from the point of view of the Government, this proposal had to have a different content or at least a different form than the first, unpopular proposal, which had been seen as a kind of gift to the already very strong ‘No’ side in the forthcoming referendum.

Compared with the earlier text, the main changes in the new proposal were that the former requirement that transfer of competences could only occur to a limited extent was abolished and, most importantly, that the previous mention of transfers, in general, to an ‘international organisation for peaceful cooperation’, was replaced by a specific mention of transfer of decision-making powers to the three European Communities (which in 2002 became the EU). However, this transfer could only take place under the condition (or, as it read, ‘as long as’, ‘så länge’ (cf. Solange)) that the protection of fundamental rights within the EU was as far-reaching as that envisaged by Chap. 2 IG (dealing with basic human rights) and the ECHR.¹¹

Here, the influence of the case law of the German Constitutional Court seems clear. It seems evident that the Governmental committee analysing the constitutional conditions for future EU membership, faced with severe time pressures since it was necessary, due to Swedish constitutional requirements, to present a proposal for constitutional amendment no later than in the middle of December 1993, suddenly stumbled upon the Maastricht judgment of the German Constitutional Court delivered on 12 October 1993,¹² which somehow seemed to indicate a solution to the Swedish dilemma, since it provided conditions for further transfer of decision-making powers and for future development within the EU. Subsequently, the committee also discovered the two Solange judgments from 1974 and 1986, the language of which thus found its way into the Swedish Constitution.¹³ In other words, the position of the German Constitutional Court was suddenly also the position chosen by the Swedish constitutional legislator.

The formulation based on the Solange doctrine (‘så länge’, ‘as long as’) was subsequently changed in 2002, giving way, as seen below in Sect. 1.3.3, to the rather vague notion ‘the principles of the form of government’.¹⁴ Nevertheless, the basic content of this former first section of IG 10:5, now Chap. 10, Art. 6, remains the same. So what does this Article mean in reality?

First and foremost, Chap. 10, Art. 6 IG is a rule to be used when new treaties are agreed. It has been used in relation to the ratification of the treaties of Amsterdam, Nice and Lisbon. Thus, it made it possible for Sweden to join the EU once the ¹⁰ I.e. the former Sects. 1–3.

¹¹ This then means that these two catalogues of basic human rights should be read together, in order to analyse whether the protection within EU law corresponds to their added value of protection of basic human rights. However, the two catalogues are mutually overlapping, albeit with some differences. In reality, if the question were ever to become a real problem, the assessment of the applicable human rights standard could turn out to be quite tricky.

¹² Brunner, BVerfGE 89, 155.

¹³ BVerfGE 37, 271 (Solange I) and 73, 339 (Solange II), respectively.

¹⁴ A proposal based on governmental bill SOU 2001:19.

referendum in November 1994 had resulted in a positive ‘Yes’ vote, but it also made it possible for Sweden to ratify new treaty changes, in a rather uncomplicated manner, since the only material requirement for this was that the protection of basic human rights within the EU continue to be reasonably high (which, as we know, has not been a problem thus far).¹⁵

The reasons for choosing this particular solution given in the bill introducing this reform were that it would mean that in the future, Sweden would not be bound to accept the legal situation that would exist at the time of joining the EU and that otherwise, the legal acts of the Union could not be questioned in Swedish domestic law by using national rules on the protection of basic rights. According to this line of reasoning, which bears clear traces of arguments used not only by the German Constitutional Court in its Maastricht judgment of 1993 but also by the Danish Supreme Court in a similar judgment in 1998,¹⁶ legal acts from the EU that fall outside the area where a transfer of sovereignty has taken place (i.e. outside the areas where the Union is competent to act, cf. Arts. 2–4 TFEU) are ultra vires and thus not applicable within the domestic legal system or by the national courts, who may simply set them aside. This may, in fact, be too simplified in reality; the main problem with this line of reasoning is, of course, that according to the settled jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice (CJEU), only the CJEU has the competence to decide whether a particular EU act is in fact invalid (because it is ultra vires or due to other reasons).¹⁷ Here, national courts and authorities in quite a few Member States seem quite simply not to agree with the CJEU. However, should such a situation occur before a Swedish court, where the court might actually be uncertain as to the validity of an EU rule, it would quite simply have to ask for a preliminary ruling from the CJEU according to Art. 267 TFEU.¹⁸

A few words should also be said about the formal requirements for a transfer of decision-making powers to the EU. Such a transfer by a single decision of the Riksdag requires a majority of 75% of the voting members; the alternative is that transfer takes place in the same way as an amendment of the Constitution, i.e. through two identical decisions, one before and one after a general election (cf. Chap. 8, Arts. 14–15).¹⁹ It may be noted that while Swedish public opinion was for a long time regrettably hostile towards EU membership (as shown most clearly in the controversial referendum on the euro in September 2003), parties that are in favour of membership have had a solid majority within the Parliament, having held ¹⁵ Instead, a number of new rules on fundamental rights have been included in the Treaty on European Union, starting with the Treaty of Amsterdam in 1999. Furthermore, the Charter of Fundamental rights was drafted in 2000 and is now becoming more important in the jurisprudence of the CJEU.

¹⁶ U 1998:800 H.

¹⁷ See for example the well-known Case C-314/85 Foto-Frost [1987] ECR 04199. Cf. on the position of Swedish courts Nergelius 1998a, pp. 156 et seq. and 170.

¹⁸ Cf. Bernitz 2002b, p. 116.

¹⁹ As follows from Sects. 3–4 of this Art., this could actually also lead to a referendum on the issue, should one-third of the Members of Parliament so wish. So far, however, this possibility to hold a referendum on a constitutional amendment has never been used.

more than 80% of its 349 seats at all times between 1994 and 2018 (and even before). This also means that the transfers of decision-making powers that have been made so far, in 1994, 1998 (Amsterdam) and 2001 (Nice), have all been taken through one single decision, with the necessary majority.²⁰

From a theoretical point of view, this type of regulation makes it possible for Sweden to adhere to new treaties or approve treaty changes without a referendum and without having to change the Constitution, which is a practical advantage. Also, the process for ratification as such is uncomplicated, not least compared with the requirements in many other Member States.

The reference to the level of protection of basic rights within EU law is interesting, since this is something which has never before been so clearly identified as an important aspect of the Swedish Constitution. Traditionally, the national protection of basic rights is also rather weak in Sweden, where there is no constitutional court and not even a strong tradition of judicial review by the ordinary courts, as discussed below. Once again, the influence of the German constitutional jurisprudence, ‘discovered’ by the constitutional legislators at a particular, crucial moment in 1993 may be stressed. Furthermore, since the protection of basic rights within the EU has grown ever stronger since 1994, as mentioned above, it seems clear that Sweden may continue to transfer decision-making powers to the EU.

The new declaratory rule in Chap. 1, Art. 10, which was enacted in 2010, states that Sweden is a member of the European Union and also that Sweden participates within the UN, the Council of Europe and other forms of international co-operation (for the full text see Sect. 3.1.1).

Some further EU provisions on the participation of the Parliament and on the elections of the European Parliament will be addressed in Sect. 1.4.

1.2.2 An important fact to be observed is the relative ease with which the Swedish Constitution(s) may be changed. According to Chap. 8, Art. 14, the constitutional acts or fundamental laws are enacted, changed or amended by means of two parliamentary decisions of identical wording (see also Art. 17). The second decision, however, may not be taken until the elections for the Riksdag have been held and the newly-elected Parliament has been convened. At least nine months shall elapse between the time when the matter is first submitted to the Chamber of the Riksdag and the date of the election, unless the Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution (Konstitutionsutskottet) grants an exception from this provision by means of a decision supported by five-sixths of its members.²¹ It must be noted, however, that ²⁰ A question to be asked in this respect is whether there may be any material differences between what may be transferred to the EU using one or the other of the two procedures. Personally, I believe that neither the wording of Chap. 10, Art. 6 IG nor the practical experience during twenty years of membership points towards any such difference, but the issue has been raised in the doctrine (e.g. by Holmberg and Stjernquist 2003, pp. 199 et seq.).

²¹ In Sect. 2 of the same Article it is also stated that the Riksdag may not adopt a proposal for a constitutional amendment which conflicts with another amendment proposal which has already been adopted earlier, unless it rejects the proposal which it first adopted together with the vote on the new proposal.

a qualified majority of the 349 Members of Parliament (MP) is not required on either of these occasions; instead, a majority of the MPs present and voting is sufficient on each occasion, which is surprising from a comparative perspective. Nevertheless, constitutional amendments are normally made in accordance between all main political parties.

A certain degree of protection for parliamentary minorities is provided by Chap. 8, Art. 16, which stipulates that a referendum shall be held on a proposal concerning a constitutional amendment which has been voted by the Riksdag for the first time, on a motion to this effect by at least one-tenth of the MPs, provided that at least one-third of the MPs concur in approving the motion.²² The referendum will then be held simultaneously with the election of the new Parliament. The proposal is deemed to have failed if it is rejected by more than half of all votes validly cast. If it is successful, it proceeds to the Riksdag for final consideration.

Still, from an international perspective it seems clear that the Swedish constitutional acts are unusually easy to change or amend, in particular if one takes into account the highly technical nature of the Freedom of the Press Act and Freedom of Speech Act, which both contain extensive sections of criminal, procedural and civil law. This fact has favoured frequent and regular constitutional amendments (in total more than 200) since 1974. In fact, the parliamentary election of September 2006 was the first since 1974 in which no constitutional amendment was proposed. It should also be noted that the possibility to request a referendum on a proposed constitutional amendment, the result of which would be legally binding on Parliament, has so far never been used.

These rules are best understood if one bears in mind their political purpose, which is to facilitate consensus on constitutional changes among the main political parties, notably the Social Democrats and the right-wing parties. In fact, politically disputed or contested constitutional amendments have so far been extremely unusual, which has somewhat mitigated the practical impact of the generous rules on the adoption of constitutional amendments.

1.2.3 In order to explain the reasons why Sweden joined the European Union in 1995, some historical background is necessary. The effects of the economic crisis in the early 1990s were important. Suddenly, Sweden was no longer a model for the rest of the world, but rather a symbol of a societal model that no longer worked and was in need of profound change. The initial response to the crisis by the Swedish population, in the aftermath of the events of 1989, was to be strongly in favour of joining the European Union. At that point, membership of the EU was perceived as a first necessary step towards renewed economic prosperity. Gradually, however, from 1992 until early 1994, this opinion changed and instead the Union came to be seen as a threat to the Swedish welfare state.

²² Such a motion must be put forward within fifteen days from the date on which the Riksdag first adopts the amendment proposal.

Finally, however, Sweden voted in favour of joining the EU in November 1994 (by 52.3%), after Austria and Finland had both voted in favour.²³ Economic arguments affected the outcome significantly, but if one compares the Swedish EU debate with, for instance, the situation in Denmark, it may be noted that the idea of the EU as a political instrument was not at all neglected or rejected in Sweden. On the contrary, in 1994 the EU was described by the Social Democrat Government that had just returned to power as a political means to balance the power of global capitalism.

1.2.4 The new Chap. 1, Art. 10 which states that Sweden is now a member of the EU, may be worth noting here once more.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 As follows from Chap. 10, Art. 6 and Chap. 8, Arts. 14–15, the transfer of powers to the EU is quite clearly regulated by the Constitution, while the supremacy and direct effect of EU law that follows from EU membership is not as such regulated or even mentioned in the Constitution (or in any other law for that matter). Instead, this has been left to the courts to regulate and here it is clear that both of these two crucial concepts have now really been acknowledged by the Swedish courts, and thus in Swedish law, as explained below.

1.3.2 It is absolutely clear that the Swedish Constitution is currently going through a transitional phase, moving away from a traditional, total focus on popular sovereignty to a situation characterised by a separation or division of powers between many different actors (or by ‘constitutional pluralism’).

Swedish courts have acknowledged the supremacy of EU law in some important cases. However, since legal support for the supremacy principle cannot be found in Chap. 10, Art. 6 of the national Constitution, it must instead be derived from the general principles of EU law, which is also what the Supreme Administrative Court did in the important landmark case Lassagård in 1997.²⁴

The Lassagård case is of fundamental importance as to the extension of the scope of judicial review in Sweden and its interaction with EU law. It clearly shows that EU law prevails over domestic law. Secondly, it shows that EU law has developed the scope of judicial review in Sweden. Application of the general principle of effective legal protection by the Supreme Administrative Court has led to the invalidation of the national regulation limiting such review, and to the adoption of a new provision ensuring the general competence of the administrative courts to review administrative decisions.

²³ For a comparison with these two countries, and their respective reasons for joining the EU, see Nergelius 2002.

²⁴ The so-called Lassagård case, Regeringsrättens årsbok (RÅ) 1997 ref. 65. This case is commented in detail by Nergelius 1998b. See also Andersson 1996. The reinforcement of the tendency towards stronger judicial review from the (supreme) courts was recently illustrated in case NJA (Nytt Juridiskt Arkiv – the Supreme Court’s publication of decisions) 2015 p. 298.

Going further, it must be remarked that within Swedish law, EU law offers better protection for basic human rights than the ECHR. This conclusion is based on the fact that Swedish rules were set aside in the Lassagård case because they were contrary to Arts. 6 and 13 ECHR as part of EU law, as well as to the general principles of EU law, not because of the application of the ECHR itself or ‘in its own right’.²⁵

In this regard, it is also interesting to note that the Supreme Administrative Court in Lassagård did not refer to the special rule on judicial review in IG Chap. 11, Art. 14. This constitutional provision reflects the traditional Swedish stance on limited judicial review (in 1997 more so than today, as explained below). Thus, the Lassagård case also confirmed that any limitations regarding the power of the court to set aside legislation as unconstitutional do not apply with regard to EU law.

1.3.3 As stated above, the level of protection of human rights within EU law sets the limit here, but since the protection of basic rights within the EU has grown stronger since 1994, as mentioned above, it seems clear that Sweden may continue to transfer decision-making powers to the EU. Another possible limit consists of the rather vague notion of the so-called ‘principles of the form of government’. This vague expression was introduced into the constitutional text, Chap. 10, Art. 6, in 2002 and must be understood as referring to the important principles for the Swedish Constitution mentioned in Chap. 1 IG (such as monarchy, local and municipal autonomy and impartiality within the public administration), perhaps in combination with the uniquely Swedish tradition concerning access to documents and protection for ‘whistle-blowers’ and other media sources, as follows from the two constitutional acts, the Freedom of the Press Act and the Freedom of Speech Act that were noted in Sect. 1.1. Proposals for a referendum on the decisions to transfer sovereignty and decision-making powers to the EU were tabled in relation to the ratification of the EU Constitution in 2005 and the Lisbon Treaty in 2009, but only from the left-wing parties which did not have the number of votes necessary to make this happen.

1.3.4 When Sweden was in the process of joining the EU, the main legal question was whether the former Chap. 10, Art. 5 (now Art. 6) would be sufficient to enable membership. In other words, was a constitutional reform required in order to enable Sweden to join the European Union?

In 1993 the first committee that attempted to deal with this question, the so-called Constitutional committee for joining the EC, answered in the affirmative and proposed adding a new rule to Chap. 1, Art. 10, according to which the supremacy of any kind of EC law in relation to any Swedish law, including the Constitution, should be clearly stated or declared.²⁶ However, criticism against this proposal was very heavy in the spring of 1993, mainly due to political reasons; it was seen as a sign of Swedish capitulation before Europe and an unlimited handing over of power to Brussels.²⁷ Consequently, the Government quickly proposed three other alternatives, one of which was similar to the one finally chosen (the current Chap. 10, Art. 6).²⁸

²⁵ See Nergelius 1998b.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The European Parliament is not mentioned in the Swedish Constitution (except in IG, Chap. 8, Art. 2 Sect. 1 p. 6, which makes a short reference to the organisation of elections to the European Parliament). However, a by-law regulation of the Swedish Parliament concerning its functions in respect of European affairs can be found in Chapters 7, 9 and 10 of the Riksdag Act (Riksagsordningen). In fact, it has been changed recently, as will be explained below.

Furthermore, according to Chap. 10, Art. 10 IG the Government shall keep the Parliament continuously informed and confer with bodies appointed by the Riksdag with regard to developments within the framework of EU co-operation.²⁹ In practice, this consultation and information is done through regular information provided by ministers to a specific parliamentary committee, the so-called EU-nämnden. More detailed regulations on how this information shall take place are found in Chap. 10 of the Riksdag Act.

The parliamentary EU Committee is not a regular committee like the other parliamentary committees, which are regulated in Chap. 7 of the Riksdag Act. Still, it is mentioned in Chap. 7, Art. 14 of the Riksdag Act, which, according to the rules on amendment of that Act in Chap. 8, Art. 16 IG, means that it cannot be abolished by a simple legislative majority. The Committee's composition reflects and is based on the outcome of the general elections.

Some important changes in the Riksdag Act entered into force on 1 December 2009 (i.e. on the same day as the Lisbon Treaty) concerning specific procedures related to supervision of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality. Based on a report from the Constitutional Committee,³⁰ a document-based or sector-specific model of scrutiny of the principle of subsidiarity, according to which the nature of the matter that will be reviewed determines which of the parliamentary committees ²⁶ Grundlagsutredningen inför EG, supra n. 7.

²⁷ For a further analysis of this debate, see Algotsson 2000, p. 273 et seq. as well as Bernitz 2002b, p. 109 et seq. and Melin and Schäder 1999, pp. 168 et seq. (who were both members of this legislative committee).

²⁸ These three were all presented in the report Ds 1993:36, supra n. 9.

²⁹ More detailed rules concerning the obligation to inform and consult are laid down in the Riksdag Act.

³⁰ KU (Konstitutionsutskottet – the Constitutional Committee) 2009/10:2.

(of the total of twenty) will be responsible for exercising the new test introduced by the Lisbon Treaty, was introduced. The parliamentary committee may, within two weeks, ask the Government to give its opinion on whether the legislative proposal in question violates the principle of subsidiarity. If the majority of the committee should then find that the principle of subsidiarity has been violated, this will also probably become the official Swedish position. The committee will make a statement or report to the Swedish Parliament, suggesting that it declare the position of the committee to be the official position of the Parliament, and that the Parliament should subsequently send this reasoned and justified position to the presidents of the European Commission, Council and European Parliament. Furthermore, should the contested act nevertheless enter into force, the Parliament may, in line with the Protocol on the application of the principles of subsidiarity and proportionality, urge the Government to initiate proceedings before the Court of Justice.³¹

Nevertheless, the various committees dealing with other political issues are far more established and have greater decision-making power, notably in legislative and budgetary issues, while the EU committee has until now been seen only as a forum for discussion and information.

Normally, formal hearings of the ministers take place before the meetings of the Council of Ministers, according to the rules in Chapters 9 and 10 of the Riksdag Act. The requirement is that at least five members of the EU Committee must request a hearing. Although this is relatively informal and unregulated, the ministers are supposed to represent an official, Swedish line that enjoys the support of a significant majority of the MPs.

Concerning the new rules on amendment of the Treaties (Arts. 48–49 TEU), the Parliament shall, according to a new rule in Chap. 9, Art. 20 of the Riksdag Act, approve or reject any such new initiative, having first heard the responsible committee on its views.

It may be noted that the obligation for the Government to inform the Parliament has expanded and includes all documents originating from the EU (Riksdag Act Chap. 9, Art. 22).

In this respect, it may also be worthy of mention that issues related to TTIP, the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership, not least concerning future parliamentary supervision in external trade matters, were greatly discussed in the campaign for the elections to the EU Parliament in May 2014.³²

1.4.2 Only two referendums have been held in Sweden. The first was held in November 1994, in which 52.3% voted for membership and 46.7% were against. The second was the legally extremely doubtful referendum on European Monetary Union (EMU) membership in September 2003, in which 56.7% voted against. While the first referendum was held for an obvious reason, the background of the second referendum might perhaps warrant further explanation.

³¹ See KU 2009/10:2 p. 8.

³² See e.g. a survey of all the party leaders in the daily Svenska Dagbladet, 19 May 2014.

The reason for this peculiar Swedish deviation from its obligations as an EU member simply has to do with domestic politics. After the referendum on EU membership in 1994, only two official No-side parties, the Environmentalists and (former) Communists, together with the small Farmers Party, which had been in favour of EU membership as such but were opposed to the idea of a common currency, demanded a referendum on this matter. Thus, a huge parliamentary majority was against holding a referendum. However, upon returning to Swedish domestic politics in the fall of 1997 and after having acted as a UN peace broker in Bosnia for two years, the right-wing opposition leader and former Prime Minister (at the time of writing Foreign Minister) Carl Bildt, in a surprising move during a parliamentary debate in the build-up to the 1998 parliamentary election, called for a referendum to be held on this special topic. Since he had at that time already consulted the Liberals and the Christian Democrats, only the governing Social Democrats (who held 45% of the seats in Parliament) at that time did not formally support the idea of a referendum, which meant that this idea suddenly became a political reality or even necessity. It may also be added that the Social Democrats never formally opposed the idea, which was logical given the internal division within the party over this issue. Thus, no political party or force, including the media, ever really opposed the idea of organising a referendum on EMU, at least not on legal grounds. The very simple legal fact that EU membership and the result of the referendum in 1994 did not formally or legally allow for this second referendum was never really invoked in the Swedish debate, which is quite surprising.³³

From a legal point of view, it is clear that Sweden has already since 1997, when the original decision was made not to participate in the third step of EMU, violated its obligations as an EU member. Sweden thus became the first country to meet the so-called convergence criteria but not to participate in the EMU, without any legally binding exception that enables it to remain outside (unlike in the case of Denmark and the UK). However, the introduction of Art. 139 TFEU, with the enactment of the Lisbon Treaty, has probably made Sweden's situation easier from a strictly legal point of view, since Sweden may now be treated as a Member State 'with an exception', like Denmark or the UK – even though no such exception has ever really existed.

As it turned out, 57% of the voters voted against the euro on 14 September 2003, only three days after the assassination of Foreign Minister Anna Lindh towards the end of the campaign. It may be asked if the result might have been different, had the Government spent more time and energy arguing in favour of the common EU currency already in 1999 or 2000.

The legally rather unclear situation to which the referendum led is all the more regrettable since all the other constitutional preparations for full membership in the EMU were conducted or implemented already in 1998–1999, in accordance with the provisions of IG Chap. 8, Arts. 14–15.³⁴ Generally, these consisted of amendments to Chap. 9 Arts. 12 and 13, regulating the financial power of the Realm. According to these rules, the Riksbank (central bank of the Realm), which works under the Riksdag and is formally independent from the Government, is responsible for monetary policy. No public authority may determine how the Riksbank decides in matters of monetary policy. The eleven members of the governing council of the Riksbank are all appointed by the Riksdag, which also considers whether the members of the Governing Council or the Executive Board of the Bank shall be granted discharge of responsibility. A member of the Executive Board may be removed from office only if he no longer fulfils the requirements laid down for performing his duties or if he has been found guilty of gross negligence. All of these rules, aimed at ensuring the independence of the Riksbank, meet the criteria laid down in the TFEU for enabling Member States to join the EMU.

³³ For the only real exception from this, see Bernitz 2002a, Chap. 3 and Bernitz 2002b, Chap. 9 (which were written and published before the EMU referendum). See also Nergelius 2008.

Thus in fact, all possible practical measures in Swedish public life during the last twenty years, be they economic, legal or constitutional, have been directed towards facilitating full Swedish membership in the EMU and adopting the euro as the national currency. The only thing that has been lacking is a clear will on the part of the main political parties.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 Since the Swedish Constitution has never been amended to a considerable extent in relation to the EU, the question on the reason for amendments is difficult to answer. As mentioned above, however, the influence of the German Constitutional Court is clearly visible. Apart from this, domestic Swedish political considerations have had much to do with subsequent developments, both in the elaboration of Chap. 10, Art. 6 IG and in the events leading to the euro referendum.

1.5.2 For the factors that influenced the EU amendments, refer to Sects. 1.2.1–1.2.2. On the question of whether the Constitution may become obsolete in this respect, this is not the case in Sweden, since the constitutional solution chosen is very flexible, as described above, and will allow for the further transfer of sovereignty and decision-making power to the EU for a long time yet, when the EU treaties are changed further.

1.5.3 In my assessment, it is hard to give a general answer to the question on the role of national constitutions in the context of transnational governance, since conditions undoubtedly differ between different countries. Generally speaking, my view is that governments and politicians throughout the world ought to devote more time and energy to defending and explaining the need for globalisation and the need for the institutional reforms that it may cause, instead of defending old-fashioned national sovereignty or simply acting as if this were still the basic condition for political action. Yet to transform this general view into specific constitutional recommendations is difficult. Nevertheless, specific shortcomings in individual countries may of course be identified.

³⁴ It may also be noted, in this respect, that Sweden actually conducted a severe economic policy, characterised by austerity, in 1994–1996, in order to meet the convergence criteria necessary for EMU membership, which makes the subsequent development even less logical and harder to understand.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Chapter 2 of the Instrument of Government is rather long (25 Arts.) and contains provisions on most of the human rights enumerated in various catalogues of this kind, e.g. the well-known conventions of the United Nations and the Council of Europe. What is striking, however, is the emphasis put on the techniques and possibilities for limiting the scope of the rights by ordinary legislation.

The European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms has in fact been a part of Swedish law since 1 January 1995. No law or other provision contrary to Sweden's obligations under the Convention may be promulgated (IG Chap. 2, Art. 19). The exact meaning of this is, however, unclear, as opinions differ as to what the status of such a law should be, if it were promulgated nevertheless. Even the preparatory documents are silent on this issue. Given the sceptical attitude of most of the political parties in Sweden towards judicial review, it was impossible to write into the Constitution that the ECHR would prevail over a conflicting Swedish law, since this would have enabled Swedish courts to set aside Swedish laws in a potentially high number of cases. Still, it seems to be difficult to avoid the conclusion that Swedish courts indeed would have to do precisely that when serious conflicts between the two legal systems arise.

The applicable and binding rules on human rights in Sweden are to be found in Chap. 2 IG, in the Freedom of the Press Act of 1949 and the Freedom of Speech Act from 1991, as far as freedom of speech in books and the media is concerned and finally, since 1995, in the ECHR. Chapter 2 IG guarantees the freedom of expression, freedom of information, freedom of assembly and manifestation, freedom of association and freedom of worship to all citizens. As far as the freedom of expression is concerned, reference is made to the Freedom of the Press Act and the Freedom of Expression Act, which regulate freedom of expression in the media. Some forms of free speech, such as art exhibitions and theatre performances, are exclusively protected by Chap. 2 IG. The same applies to political meetings, subject to the condition that they are not broadcast; in the latter case, the Freedom of Expression Act is applicable.

Chapter 2 protects the ‘negative’ dimension of the above-mentioned freedoms. All citizens are thus protected against coercion by the public authorities to disseminate or not to disseminate their political, religious or cultural views, to participate in or abstain from a meeting or manifestation or to join or quit a political, religious or cultural association.

As concerns procedural rights, it has to be noted that retroactive legislation is prohibited both in penal and tax law (IG 2:10), and that courts may not be established for specific cases. More complicated is the provision that every citizen shall be entitled to a hearing before a court if he is deprived of his liberty after having committed a crime or because he is suspected of such an act (or for other reasons). Here, the definition of deprivation of liberty has caused some difficulties in relation to administrative sanctions like the obligation imposed on foreigners to reside in and not leave certain municipalities (which, however, have now been abolished).

Some further rights are protected by the constitutional text but in weaker terms, such as the right to exercise a trade and to practice a profession or the rights of the Sami population. This is also true for the protection of property, which was reinforced in 1995 but is still rather easy to restrict (although compensation must always be promptly paid).

We may also note the weak or unclear legal position that the ECHR has in Swedish law, where, according to IG Chap. 2, Art. 19, no act of law or other provision may be adopted which contravenes Sweden’s obligations under the Convention. The ECHR as such was incorporated through an ordinary law (1994:1219). Still, this does not say anything about what would actually happen should a Swedish law nevertheless be contrary to this provision (an issue that is not dealt with in a satisfactory way by the travaux préparatoires either).³⁵ In other words, the supremacy of the ECHR in relation to Swedish national law is nowhere expressly recognised.

2.1.2 Chapter 2, Arts. 12–13 as well as Arts. 20–24 IG are in one way or another concerned with limitations of the rights guaranteed in Chap. 2. Articles 20–24, which will be focused on here in greater detail, are somewhat complex. The relation between these articles is that Art. 20 mentions articles that may be limited by law, while Arts. 21–22 lay down general conditions for restrictions of the rights that may in fact be restricted. Articles 23–24 then regulate more closely the conditions for the restriction of the different forms of free speech and freedom of information, assembly and manifestation as well as of association referred to in Art. 1.

Article 20 begins by mentioning that these rights, together with those guaranteed in Arts. 6 and 8 as well as the right of public attendance at a court trial, may in fact be restricted by an Act of Parliament. Such restrictions may, however, be imposed only to achieve purposes that are acceptable in a democratic society, and must never be disproportionate with regard to such purposes. Furthermore, they may not be extended so far as to constitute a threat to the free formation of opinion, and must never be imposed solely on the grounds of political, religious, cultural or other opinions. A parliamentary minority which comprises at least one-sixth of the MPs voting on the issue has the right to postpone the final adoption of a law restricting the exercise of basic rights (Art. 22). Whether a bill is in fact of this restrictive kind will be decided by the Constitutional Committee (Konstitutionsutskottet). As for the other freedoms guaranteed in Chap. 2 (Arts. 14–18), they may be restricted by law in accordance with the conditions in the provision defining the right. The constitutionality of such legislation, e.g. in relation to property, may of course be reviewed by the courts.

³⁵ For criticism against this fact, see Bernitz 2002a.

The rights related to free speech may be restricted for the purposes defined in Arts. 23 and 24, e.g. public safety, the integrity of the individual and national security. Some of these purposes, such as national supply of vital goods and services, may seem a bit odd as a justification for the restriction of freedom of speech, as may the circulation of traffic as a justification for restricting freedom of assembly. It may also be observed that the freedom of expression may always be restricted ‘where particularly important grounds so warrant’, a limitation formulated in very broad terms.

Generally speaking, the scope of the individual rights guaranteed in Chap. 2 IG is quite comprehensive, but the emphasis on the conditions and the forms in which they may be restricted reflects the general tendency towards parliamentary rule discussed above. Apart from the five-sixths majority required for the rejection of a request for the postponement of the adoption of a law restricting certain basic rights (in particular rights related to freedom of speech and personal liberty), qualified majorities are not needed in order to restrict or limit a fundamental right.

2.1.3 Judicial review The Swedish legal system is based, like most other legal systems in the world, on the idea of a hierarchy of norms. However, in the Swedish Constitution, this may only indirectly be deduced from the provision on judicial review in Chap. 11, Art. 14 IG, according to which courts or other public bodies may set aside provisions that are in conflict with rules of fundamental law ‘or other superior statutes’.

This provision would be meaningless without an existing hierarchy of norms. Nevertheless, the concept has in fact never been developed in greater detail in Swedish constitutional law; it may even be said that the concept of the Constitution as higher law or lex superior was not clearly understood when the Instrument of Government was adopted in 1974. At that time, a perspective highly influenced by the principle of popular sovereignty prevailed, according to which the Constitution is above all descriptive, containing the procedures which have to be followed in the exercise of governmental powers, e.g. in the enactment of laws or the appointment of the Prime Minister. The opposite and internationally widely accepted view of modern constitutionalism, according to which the Constitution is the higher law against which all other laws have to be measured, has received greater attention only quite recently, in the last ten years.

Once again, the main trait or characteristic feature of the Swedish Constitution, identified here as IG, is its emphasis on popular sovereignty. According to the very first sentence in Chap. 1, Art. 1 IG, ‘[a]ll public power in Sweden proceeds from the people'. This is a declaratory statement directed against the concept of separation of powers, since courts are never elected by the people, but also a general attitude that has also influenced other parts of the Swedish constitutional system for a long time.

Historically speaking, it may be noted that judicial review of legislation did not become a part of the constitutional text until 1979, when Chap. 11, Art. 14 IG was enacted. The existence of judicial review as such has, however, been discussed in the legal doctrine at least since the 1880s. It was generally acknowledged by the doctrine in the 1930s and finally accepted as fact by the Supreme Court in a case in 1964.³⁶

It was not, however, until 1979, in the second reform wave of the new Constitution of 1974, that judicial review was finally written into the new constitutional text. This was, however, limited by the reservations that followed from the requirement of manifest error, and also by some influential political statements in some of the travaux préparatoires, notably from the Constitutional Committee, on the restraint on the part of the courts that was necessary so that this new possibility for the courts would not gradually undermine the Swedish popular democracy.³⁷

In the text, that was not changed between 1979 and 2010, Chap. 11, Art. 14 stated that if a court or other public body found that a provision conflicted with a rule of fundamental law or other superior statute, or that a procedure laid down in law had been disregarded in any important respect when the provision was made, the provision could not be applied. However, if it had been approved by the Parliament or the Government, it should be waived only if the error was manifest (the so-called uppenbarhetskrav). Thus, judicial review pertained both to the courts and other public authorities, a fact that has in reality probably diminished the importance of judicial review.

Since 1 January, 2011, Chap. 11, Art. 14 has the following wording:

If a court finds that a provision conflicts with a rule of fundamental law or other superior statute, the provision shall not be applied. The same applies if a procedure laid down in law has been disregarded in any important respect when the provision was made.

In the case of review of an act of law under paragraph one, particular attention must be paid to the fact that the Riksdag is the foremost representative of the people and that fundamental law takes precedence over other law.³⁸

The second section of this Article in particular may be subject to analysis. It may of course be seen as an attempt to reconcile the old popular sovereignty with the somewhat new elements of separation of powers and judicial authority. However, it has also been suggested that it above all underlines the supremacy of the Constitution, since it is the Parliament that enacts or changes the Constitution (see Chap. 8, Arts. 14–17).³⁹

³⁶ NJA 1964, p. 471, concerning opening hours in shops (although that law was actually considered to be constitutional). For a thorough historical account, see Nergelius 2010, pp. 198 et seq.

³⁷ See in particular KU 1978/79:39, p. 13.

³⁸ An identical rule on judicial review of the public authorities now exists in Chap. 12, Art. 10 IG.

One thing that is clear from the wording of Chap. 11, Art. 14, however, is that the review exercised may be either formal or material in nature. What is not quite clear from the Article is whether the courts have an obligation to exercise judicial review whenever they find such a situation in a case before them or whether they may do so only when the argument is being raised by the parties in a case.⁴⁰ Surprisingly enough, this issue has still not been resolved.

What is clear, however, is that there seems to exist no autonomous right to an abstract judicial review, independent of a specific case or dispute. This was established already in a case in 1987,⁴¹ and the European Court of Justice in the so-called Unibet case recently confirmed that EU law does not impose any specific conditions on the Member States in terms of allowing specific forms of judicial review, as long as effective remedies do indeed exist before independent courts of law.⁴²

From jurisprudence, although not from the text itself, it also becomes clear, logically enough, that judicial review is not of a law or some other rule in itself, but rather of the practical use or application of the rule by a public authority in a specific case.⁴³

Access to justice The rights pertaining to access to justice are found in Chap. 2: Art. 9 guarantees the right to have any deprivation of liberty on account of (suspicions of) a criminal act or for other reasons examined before a court of law without undue delay, and Art. 11 prohibits the establishment of courts for specific cases and guarantees public proceedings within a reasonable time. Additionally, Chap. 11, Art. 5 IG provides that legal disputes between individuals may never be settled by authorities other than courts of law, except in accordance with the law (such as arbitration bodies).

The rule of law On the specific points raised in the Questionnaire in point 2.1.3, the rules in Sweden are as follows:

- The rule that only published laws can be valid is self-evident and has never been questioned or even discussed.
- Legal certainty and non-retroactivity: as mentioned above, these follow partly from Chap. 2, Art. 11. The principles of nulla crimen sine lege or nulla poena

³⁹ See Karlson 2009, pp. 269–274.

⁴⁰ See Nergelius 2010, p. 210 for further discussion.

⁴¹ NJA 1987, p. 198.

⁴² Case C-432/05 Unibet [2007] ECR I-02271.

⁴³ For some very clear examples of this, see the two so-called Kurd cases, NJA 1989, p. 131 and 1990, p. 636. Also NJA 1986, p. 489 may be observed here.

sine lege are guaranteed in penal law in Chap. 2, Art. 10 Sect. 1 and in tax law (with many exceptions), in Sect. 2 of that same Article.⁴⁴

- The rule that the imposition of obligations, administrative charges or penalties and criminal punishments is only permissible on the basis of a parliamentary statute, and that sanctions cannot be applied retroactively and cannot be inferred from objectives by virtue of teleological reasoning or by analogy: in addition to Chap. 2, Art. 10 IG, this also follows from Chap. 8, Art. 2 Sect. 1 p. 2, as well as Chap. 8, Art. 3, Sect. 1 p. 1 e contrario. Both of these rules stipulate that a law is necessary to regulate these matters.⁴⁵

The rule of law as such is mentioned in one single Article in the Swedish Constitution, namely in Chap. 8, Art. 22 concerning the important Law Council, which will be subsequently explained in more detail. In order to understand the historically rather limited impact of judicial review in Swedish law, it is not enough to be aware of the heavy emphasis on popular sovereignty in Swedish political and constitutional thinking. The important work of the Law Council,⁴⁶ which since 1909 has exercised a form of judicial preview of law proposals, must also be taken into account in this respect.⁴⁷ According to Chap. 8, Art. 20 IG, the Law Council, which consists of justices or former justices of the two supreme courts, shall pronounce opinions on draft legislation. The opinion of the Council is obtained by the Government or sometimes by a committee of the Riksdag. In order to better understand how the Council works, Art. 21 shall be quoted in extenso, in its official version from 2010:

An opinion of the Council is obtained by the Government or, in accordance with what is stated in the Riksdag Act, by a Parliamentary Committee.

Such an opinion shall be obtained before the Parliament enacts

A fundamental law relating to the freedom of the press or the corresponding freedom of expression on sound radio, television and certain like transmissions and certain like transmissions and technical recordings; an act of law restricting the right of access to official documents;

an act of law under Chapter 2, Art. 14–16, Art. 20 or Art. 25; an act of law concerning automated treatment of personally identified or classified information; an act of law relating to local taxation or a law which otherwise imposes duties on the municipalities;

an act of law under Art. 2 Section 1 p. 1 or 2⁴⁸ or an act of law under Chapter 11 or 12, or an act of law amending or abrogating any law under points 1–6 above.

⁴⁴ Although this right is thus very limited, the Supreme Court nevertheless upheld it and set aside a contradictory law in the case NJA 2000, p. 132.

⁴⁵ See here also the case NJA 2005, p. 33, which illustrates this.

⁴⁶ In the official English translation this is called the Council on Legislation.

⁴⁷ Thus, the creation of the Law Council stands in a close relation to the simultaneous establishment of the Supreme Administrative Court, with both reforms aimed at distributing the many tasks that the Supreme Court had under the old Constitution of 1809 to new bodies.

⁴⁸ I.e. of Chap. 8.

The foregoing does however not apply, if obtaining the opinion of the Council on Legislation would delay the handling of legislation in such a way that serious detriment would result. If the Government submits a proposal to the Riksdag for the making of an act of law in any matter referred to in sentence one, and there has been no prior consultation of the Council on Legislation, the Government shall at the same time inform the Riksdag of the reason for the omission. Failure to obtain the opinion of the Council on Legislation on a draft law never constitutes an obstacle to the application of the law.

Chapter 8 Art. 22 further provides as follows:

The Council's scrutiny shall relate to:

1. the manner in which the draft law relates to the fundamental laws and the legal system in general;
2. the manner in which the different provisions of the draft law relate to one another;
3. the manner in which the draft law relates to the requirements of the rule of law.⁴⁹

Whilst there is some uncertainty about the exact scope of this scrutiny, it is important to note two main limitations to the power of the Council. The first is that failure to obtain an opinion from the Law Council will never constitute an obstacle to the application of the law. This fact could lead to the conclusion that the Council lacks importance, but that is hardly correct. In Swedish doctrine, the meaning of the criteria established in Sect. 3 of the provision has been vividly discussed.⁵⁰ In short, there seems to be a general agreement that not only the text of a draft law but also its travaux préparatoires must be taken into account. Since 1995, the assessment by the Law Council must also include an analysis on the compatibility of the draft law with EU law and the ECHR.

The Law Council today feels more free to criticise proposals also from the point of view of the rule of law (rättssäkerhet), which may have something to do with, generally speaking, a lower quality of legislation today compared to 20 years ago, when the pressure to produce laws quickly was much less severe.

The second limitation is that the Government and the Parliament are free to ignore the warnings of the Law Council. This is formally possible, since the opinions of the Law Council are never formally binding. The issue of what constitutional status may be given or attributed to the opinions of the Council is still somewhat unclear. They are of course much more important than ordinary comments on legislation from NGOs or public authorities, since the Council is a body of legal expertise, which represents no party interests and comments on draft laws, i.e. finished legislative products which the Government intends to submit to the Parliament, and not merely on the work of a legislative committee or some similar group.

⁴⁹ This is the only Article of the Constitution that mentions the rule of law. Sections 4–5 are omitted.

⁵⁰ See Nergelius 2010, p. 185 et seq. with further references.

In general, the Law Council does definitely not lack influence or the ability to affect the final versions of the laws adopted by the Parliament.⁵¹ Still, given the clear statements and formulations in Chap. 8, Art. 21 IG, it would be impossible to claim that the opinion of the Law Council should have a higher status than a contradictory opinion of the Parliament, which enacts a law despite the Council's objections. But in such a case, which is far from unusual, the fact that the opinions of the Law Council have not been observed by the legislator may be one reason why it might be easier for a court to set aside a law in a subsequent case of judicial review.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 The balancing of fundamental rights with economic free movements rights has not given rise to any major problems. The most contested case so far has been the Laval case, which was referred to the CJEU from the Swedish labour court (Arbetsdomstolen), which in a subsequent ruling found that the Builders Trade Union had to pay Laval compensation of circa 55,000 EUR.⁵² Both this judgment and the ruling of the CJEU in late 2007⁵³ were very unpopular with the strong Swedish trade unions. However, one constitutional issue which in my view has been neglected in the discussion of this case is that the conflict was not between free movement and the crucial freedom of association as such, but 'only' between free movement and the right for trade unions to initiate collective action, including, in this case, blockades. In the Swedish Constitution, the freedom of association enjoys very strong protection and is difficult to limit or encroach upon (IG Chap. 2, Art. 1 Sect. 1 p. 5 and Art. 20, Sect. 1 p. 2), while the right to initiate collective action is merely mentioned in the Constitution and applies only to the extent that this follows from law or a collective agreement (Chap. 2, Art. 14). This matter is not discussed in the judgment of the CJEU and may have been of no practical importance in this case, but illustrates that this is not a likely area for conflicts between EU law and the Swedish Constitution.

There have been other areas where free movement rules have conflicted with social values rather than constitutional rules, such as the Franzén case.⁵⁴

⁵¹ Cf. Nergelius 2010, pp. 194 et seq. for a recent analysis.

⁵² AD 2009:89.

⁵³ Case C-341/05 Laval [2007] ECR I-11767.

⁵⁴ Case C-189/95 Franzén [1997] ECR I-05909. Case C-405/98 Gourmet [2001] ECR I-01795 may also be mentioned, in which a periodical called Gourmet which specialised in food and wine had published some outspoken commercial advertising for wines, which the Consumers Ombudsman wanted to put an end to (by invoking not least FPA Chap. 1, Art. 9 p. 1). The Stockholm City Court asked for a preliminary ruling from the CJEU, which found the Swedish prohibition against this kind of advertisement far-reaching and problematic. Both the City Court

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

On the relevant constitutional provisions regarding nulla poena, non-retroactivity and access to courts, see Sect. 2.1. However, the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) has not raised constitutional issues in Sweden.

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 The courts try to assert the criteria for extraditions according to the Arrest Warrant and the Swedish law (2003:1156) that implemented the EAW into Swedish law. So far, however, the question of presumption of innocence has not given rise to any debate in relation to these matters.

2.3.1.2 The point of departure is that Swedish courts will grant extradition requests, provided that there is no reason to doubt the quality or impartiality of the legal system in the requesting Member State. The main criteria for these decisions were laid down by the Supreme Court in 2007, in a case in which it was established that an international convention (the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child) could not be invoked in order to prevent an extradition.⁵⁵

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 The principles of nullum crimen and nulla poena sine lege are very clearly protected in Chap. 2, Art. 10 IG.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 In absentia judgments (tredskodomar) are allowed in Swedish law, but only in the case of petty crimes. Given the standard in Swedish law, the judgment in *Melloni*⁵⁶ was very surprising, since it is indicative of a very poor and simply unacceptable human rights standard.⁵⁷ This is quite easily understood when looking at the case.

and the special Market Court (Marknadsdomstolen) then found it impossible to maintain the prohibition (MDA 2003:5).

⁵⁵ NJA 2007, p. 168. This case is commented upon critically by Herlin-Karnell 2007.

⁵⁶ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

⁵⁷ See Nergelius 2013b, p. 815 et seq.

Compared to the Åkerberg Fransson case⁵⁸ decided on the same day, the judgment in Melloni raises some fundamental issues that are likely to cause more confusion in the field of EU constitutional law, for many reasons and perhaps for a long time, not least concerning fundamental rights. One of the reasons for the somewhat – in my view – odd outcome of the case and one of the main difficulties for the CJEU seems to have been the interpretation of the EAW Framework Decision,⁵⁹ which in its original 2002 version prescribed that all Member States were to execute extraditions from other Member States according to the principle of mutual recognition. At the same time, however, Art. 5 of the text contained certain guarantees, with the clarification that if someone is requested for extradition where the person has been sentenced in his absence, there should be a possibility to have the sentence and judgment reviewed. Yet in the new Framework Decision of 2009,⁶⁰ it is stated that these guarantees do not apply if the person requested for extradition has been represented by a lawyer and if he knew about the procedure against him and the fact that he might be sentenced in his absence.

Despite the fact that there may be reasons for these harsh rules – such as interest in making the Arrest Warrant work smoothly and, in Italy, the combatting of organised crime – the situation here was complicated, even more so since the CJEU actually neglected to inform the readers of its judgment on the knowledge of such facts that Mr. Melloni might have had during the lengthy procedures.

Unfortunately, the judgment as such is quite short. The CJEU referred to the principle of mutual recognition and stated that extradition must take place in a case such as this, at least if the convicted person was aware of the trial against him and had had the possibility to be represented by a lawyer (or was aware of the fact that a judgment against him might be given in his absence). The CJEU further claimed that the right to be present at a trial may be limited, thus arriving, in a not very convincing or persuasive line of reasoning, at the conclusion that the Framework Decision (in particular Art. 4a(1)) does not violate Arts. 47–48 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights. While this argumentation is not convincing and may definitely be criticised, another aspect of the case, in my view, is more worrying.

As is well known, Art. 53 of the Charter states that none of its rules may limit or infringe upon the fundamental rights that are acknowledged by EU law, international law, international conventions to which the Member States are parties or the constitutions of the Member States. The possibility for national courts to maintain a higher standard for individuals in this respect than provided by the EAW (as interpreted by the CJEU) was, however, simply dismissed by the CJEU, since this would ‘undermine the principle of the primacy of EU law inasmuch as it would allow a Member State to disapply the legal rules which are fully in compliance with the Charter where they infringe the fundamental rights guaranteed by that state’s constitution’. But is that not exactly what national courts ought to do, if they take Art. 53 of the Charter seriously?

⁵⁸ Case C-617/10 Åkerberg Fransson [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:105.

⁵⁹ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁶⁰ Council Framework Decision 2009/299/JHA of 26 February 2009 amending Framework Decisions 2002/584/JHA, 2005/214/JHA, 2006/783/JHA, 2008/909/JHA and 2008/947/JHA, thereby enhancing the procedural rights of persons and fostering the application of the principle of mutual recognition to decisions rendered in the absence of the person concerned at the trial, [2009] OJ L 81/24.

This particular line of reasoning of the CJEU is well-known from cases such as *Costa v. Enel*⁶¹ and *Simmenthal*⁶². It basically means that any kind of EU law, primary as well as secondary, is superior to any kind of national law of the Member States, including the national constitution. The latter part of this constitutional jurisprudence is not accepted by very many Member States or their highest courts.

However, in this case the CJEU first, before upholding its jurisprudence on this last point, managed to find that the secondary EU law in question (EAW) was compatible with the applicable primary EU law – the Charter, which itself states that it is inferior in relation to any farther-reaching protection of human rights that may be found in a national constitution. Thus, the CJEU has managed a double operation, both steps of which are most doubtful, in order to ‘save the life’ of the EAW, which has obviously been seen as very crucial. But while saving this patient, has not the ‘life’ or at least the legal status of the arguably considerably more important Charter been sacrificed instead, given that its Art. 53 has so evidently been applied and interpreted e contrario, in reality losing its significance? At least that is what follows from a close reading of the judgment.

Concerning the general implications for human rights within EU law, the CJEU stated that the possibility for a national court to refuse extradition is a case such as this would spread doubt on ‘the uniformity of the standard of protection of fundamental rights as defined in that framework decision’, which would, consequently, undermine the principle of mutual recognition and ultimately the confidence between the legal systems of the Member States. But if this line of reasoning is to be followed, prison sentences for as long as ten years rendered in the absence of the accused are generally to be accepted in the EU of today, which is highly surprising. This, or anything similar, would never be accepted or possible in Swedish law.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 Travel expenses are normally not needed, since they fall on the requesting state. For translation costs and legal aid the answer is also no, but here the result may depend on the circumstances of the specific case. According to the EAW and other conventions, the defendant has the right to have all documents in the case translated into his or her language. If Sweden were to hand over e.g. a Polish citizen to Poland, translation would not be a problem for obvious reasons, but in other cases, translation is the responsibility of the requesting state. Basically, this is also the case for legal aid, where various conventions guarantee legal representation in the requesting state. The Swedish law on legal aid (2000:562) may be applied in certain situations where no other possibilities or means for such aid exist.

⁶¹ Case C-6/64 Costa v. E.N.E.L. [1964] ECR 01141.

⁶² Case C-106/77 Simmenthal [1978] ECR 00629.

There is no need for a special body to assist extradited persons. As far as I can see and according to the spokesperson of the Swedish Prosecutors International Chamber, this is not urgently needed.

2.3.4.2 According to the spokesperson of the Swedish Prosecutors International Chamber, there are no statistics available with regard to subsequent acquittals and, what is more important, based on the routines that are being followed, it would not be possible to obtain any. When an extradition occurs, the Swedish prosecutor's office sends copies of the decision to the colleagues in the requesting state, but there is no corresponding obligation for that bureau to report back on the result – and thus this simply does not happen. Generally speaking, more documents are handed over – in both directions – in cases concerning extradition for someone who is to stand trial in the requesting state than for someone who is being extradited in order to serve a sentence that has already been decided.

On examples of individual cases, see below under Sect. 2.3.5.4.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 No, no such conclusion with regard to effective judicial protection may be made. Generally speaking, this has not been a big problem in Sweden. The courts have applied the rules loyally, which has not caused much discussion.

2.3.5.2 No debate has taken place on the suitability of transposing mutual recognition to criminal law. My own view is that there might perhaps be a future need for such debate, should the position of the CJEU in Melloni prevail. The discussion is interesting, but maybe slightly premature.

2.3.5.3 There has been a certain amount of debate, ever since the late 1990s, on this alleged new role for the courts⁶³ as bodies facilitating European legal and judicial cooperation. It is a matter that is often debated e.g. in annual meetings between the Ministry of Justice and academics.⁶⁴ However, issues such as the increased power of courts and the ‘judicialisation of politics’ have led to much more discussion, both in the legal doctrine and the public debate.

2.3.5.4 There have been no calls for a specific procedure of judicial review. However, it may be noted that as a result of the probably best known case, concerning a young man Calle Jonsson, there was a public outburst when he was extradited to Greece in late 2004. He was accused of stabbing a Greek person with a knife at a bar in Rhodos in 2001 and then arrested in Greece from August 2001 to February 2002. Having returned to Sweden, he did not wish to go back to Greece for the trial but was forced to do so after a lengthy procedure, during which public opinion and the media were clearly on his side, thus displaying a clear lack of faith in the impartiality and competence of the Greek authorities. He was acquitted in the trial in April 2005, but the Supreme Court of Greece decided thereafter in November 2006 that the trial had been invalid due to procedural irregularities and should be restarted. So far, however, this has not happened and Mr. Jonsson does not seem to be obliged to return to Greece.

⁶³ See e.g. Lindblom 1997, p. 316 et seq.

⁶⁴ See e.g. Svensk Juristtidning 2004, p. 205 et seq.

I would probably not support the reinstatement of some form of judicial review, since the need for this does not seem to be urgent. However, this assumption is based on the fact that there is a mutual trust between the courts and legal authorities of all of the EU Member States.

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

A few examples may be given, of which the matters related to the Åkerberg Fransson case are the most important. The Supreme Court in two rulings in June and July 2013, on the grounds of the ne bis in idem principle, made a U-turn as regards the approach to imposing a tax surcharge on a person and prosecuting the same person for a tax offence in different legal proceedings. In the first ruling, a unanimous plenary ruling in June 2013,⁶⁵ the Supreme Court found that the long-established Swedish double sanction system (tax surcharge and criminal sentence), in which two different legal procedures were applied where a person had provided false information in a tax return, was not compatible with the ne bis in idem principle. It is clear that this important change in the Swedish legal position was brought about by the decision of the Court of Justice in the Åkerberg Fransson case in 2013.⁶⁶ Later, in a follow-up ruling in July 2013,⁶⁷ the Supreme Court established that as a consequence of the change in the law, a person has the right to a new trial if the person has paid a tax surcharge and has in addition been sentenced in a criminal proceeding for a tax offence. The Supreme Court set the cut-off point for the right to use this extraordinary legal remedy at 10 February 2009, when the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) issued its seminal judgment in the Zolotukhin case.⁶⁸ Zolotukhin clarified that the ne bis in idem principle in the ECHR

⁶⁵ NJA 2013, p. 502.

⁶⁶ Case C-617/10 Åkerberg Fransson, supra n. 58.

⁶⁷ NJA 2013, p. 746.

⁶⁸ Sergey Zolotukhin v. Russia [GC], no. 14939/03, ECHR 2009.

prohibits a new prosecution or trial for an offence when it arises from identical or substantially the same facts as the first offence already prosecuted or tried.

In the months following these two rulings, a substantial number of persons were released from prison sentences for tax offences, and many ongoing tax offence prosecutions were terminated.

The issue of whether it is legally possible under the ECHR to apply separate legal proceedings for tax surcharges and tax offences based on the same information in a tax return had been debated in Sweden for a long time. In 2002, the ECtHR found that the Swedish system of tax surcharges was criminal in nature.⁶⁹ However, these decisions did not make the legislator change the Swedish legislation, and neither did the courts change their practice. Obviously, the legislator wanted the taxation system to be enforced by sharp sanctions, as Sweden is a country with high taxes.

However, the sharpened definition of what constitutes ne bis in idem in the Zolotukhin judgment in 2009 made the problem urgent. The Supreme Court ruled on the matter in two new decisions in 2010–2011. In the 2010 decision, which focused on the ECHR law, the majority of the justices took the view the Zolotukhin judgment did not give ‘clear support’ to the need to change Swedish practice.⁷⁰ This might be seen as an attempt to prevent an expansion of judicial review of legislation by Swedish courts, given that the previous requirement for ‘manifest error’ in IG Chap. 11, Art. 14 was going to be abolished on 1 January 2011.

In the 2011 case,⁷¹ the defendant invoked the ne bis in idem principle in Art. 50 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights. The case partly concerned tax surcharges for undeclared VAT. A Supreme Court majority, three Supreme Court justices, concluded that the Swedish legal provisions on tax offences and tax surcharges lay outside the scope of the Charter, and that no preliminary ruling was thus required. Two dissenting justices took a different view and concluded that the legal position was not clear regarding the possible applicability of the Charter, and that a preliminary ruling should thus be requested. The Supreme Court therefore voted on whether a preliminary ruling should be requested from the CJEU. As is well known, according to Art. 267 TFEU, the highest instance is obliged to request a preliminary ruling if a case pertains to EU law, unless the legal position is clear (acte clair). Obviously, the Supreme Court did not observe this obligation. In its Åkerberg Fransson judgment the CJEU reminded the Supreme Court of the duty to observe Art. 267 TFEU as interpreted in the CILFIT case.⁷²

In Sweden, decisions from the Supreme Court are not formally binding on lower courts. Still, they are almost always followed. However, in this case, some judges in ⁶⁹ Janosevic v. Sweden, no. 34619/97, ECHR 2002-VII and Västberga Taxi Aktiebolag and Vulic v. Sweden, no. 36985/97, 23 July 2002.

⁷⁰ NJA 2010, p. 168.

⁷¹ NJA 2011, p. 444.

⁷² Case 283/81 Cilfit and Others [1982] ECR 03415, para. 47 in the Åkerberg Fransson judgment, n. 58.

lower courts found the position taken by the Supreme Court clearly wrong and refused to follow it. This much-observed ‘revolt’ among Swedish judges forms an important part of the background to the Åkerberg Fransson case, in which a district court judge in a small town, Haparanda, in the very north of the country, decided to question the established Swedish system by asking the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling.⁷³

Another example that led to considerable discussion concerned EU Directive 2012/363 on the protection of the financial interests of the European Union.⁷⁴ The Parliament decided on 17 October 2012, in line with the Committee, to issue a motivated opinion to the EU, stating that Directive 2012/363 violates the principle of subsidiarity.⁷⁵

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The EU Directive (2006/24)⁷⁶ on electronic data retention has been controversial in Swedish law for a long time. Sweden did not implement it in due time (i.e. by 15 September 2007), which led to infringement proceedings against Sweden before the CJEU, which found in 2010 that Sweden had violated EU law.⁷⁷ Finally, the Directive was implemented through a law adopted by the Parliament in March 2012, but before that, the opposition parties had used a rule in the IG (Chap. 2, Art. 22) according to which laws that limit fundamental rights may be postponed one year, as explained above. Since Advocate General Cruz Villalon delivered a critical opinion on the Directive in December 2013, a renewed debate on the Directive and its effects on personal integrity emerged. The judgment in these two cases delivered on 8 April 2014 was thus eagerly awaited, and the fact that the CJEU declared the directive incompatible with the fundamental rights that form a part of EU law means that the legal status of the Directive and the implementing law within Swedish law is today uncertain. The Minister of Justice has stated that the law remains in force, while the surveillance authority, Post-och telestyrelsen (PTS), has made comments pointing in the other direction. A subsequent legal survey has concluded that the Swedish law foresaw the new judgment and is thus applicable. However, the judgment in December 2016 in Tele 2 counters this.⁷⁸

⁷³ See in particular Zetterquist 2012, p. 353 et seq.

⁷⁴ See JuU 2012/13:8. (Justitieutskottet – the Committee of Justice).

⁷⁵ Rskr 2012/13:8.

⁷⁶ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁷⁷ Case C-185/09 Commission v. Sweden [2010] ECR I-00014.

⁷⁸ See respectively, Ds 2014:23, Datalagring, EU-rätten och svensk rätt (EU Law and Swedish Law) and Case C-2013/15 Tele 2 [2016] ECLI:EU:C:2016:970.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 No issues regarding unpublished legislation have arisen. Here I would go as far as to say that the whole concept of secret legislation, of any kind whatsoever, is totally unknown in Sweden, the ‘promised land’ of transparency, and would certainly never be accepted here.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 In Sweden, EU law has primarily enhanced the protection of general principles. There are some well-known cases, notably from the late 1990s, when the Supreme Administrative Court very soon after EU accession acknowledged principles such as proportionality and legitimate expectations. Another very important case dealt with by the Supreme Administrative Court in 1999 concerned the closure of a privately owned nuclear reactor, Barsebäck 1.⁷⁹ Here, criticism was raised against the court for deciding such a crucial and complicated issue, which involved many aspects of both EU law and national constitutional law, without asking for a preliminary ruling from the CJEU. The main tendency is however clear, namely that Swedish courts have now definitely accepted the supremacy of EU law in relation to national law.⁸⁰

An important illustration is the so-called Klippan case of the Supreme Administrative Court.⁸¹ The case concerned an undertaking (Klippan) that produced paper in 1965–1975 at a lake in the south of Sweden. In 1975, the property was transferred to another company (Modo AB). In 1989, environmental legislation was modified, permitting the authorities to hold an undertaking liable to pay damages even after the transfer of a property. The environmental protection agency wanted Klippan to pay a sum of approximately six million SEK to clean the water of the polluted lake. Although the 1989 legislation entered into force after the transfer of the property from Klippan to Modo, the government considered that Klippan was liable under the 1989 legislation to pay for the environmental sanitation work. Finally, the governmental decision was quashed by the Supreme Administrative Court, which emphasised that there are only limited possibilities to modify or revoke an administrative decision creating rights due to the entry into force of new legislation. It remarked that in certain circumstances the retroactive application of legislation is constitutionally prohibited (IG 2:10). Moreover, it referred to EU law and its general principles that generally do not take into consideration situations preceding the entry into force of the legislation, invoking the proportionality principle and the principle of legal certainty (or security) and the protection of legitimate expectations. This EU exception contrasts with previous national jurisprudence (RÅ 1988 ref 132) that, arguably, allowed free-floating exceptions.

⁷⁹ Regeringsrättens Årsbok (RÅ) 1999, ref. 76.

⁸⁰ Cfr. Bernitz 2002b, p. 127 in fine print.

⁸¹ RÅ 1996 ref. 57.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 General legal aspects of the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) have been discussed, but not in relation to the rather technical aspects mentioned in Sects. (a)–(c) of the question.⁸² This may be explained by the fact that Sweden is not an EMU member and is not bound by the ESM Treaty.

Various aspects of the Fiscal Compact have been discussed. Concerning the Fiscal Compact, the general assumption is that the changes in the budgetary process and in Chap. 9 IG made in the late 1990s in order to battle the financial crisis and prepare Sweden for EMU membership as described above, are sufficient to meet the demands set out in the Compact.

2.7.2 Once again, the issue has been discussed from some legal points of view but not from this perspective as such, which may have to do with the fact that Sweden has not intended to join the Banking Union from the start.

2.7.3 Sweden has not been subject to a bailout or austerity programme.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Here I must make a disclaimer, since the Swedish Court Administration (Domstolsverket) could not provide me with exact data on judicial review, as they no longer provide this type of service, which has caused practical problems in terms of obtaining precise figures. Additionally, the CJEU (where I have been in touch with the Registry (Greffé), information and research and documentation offices) has been unwilling to hand out any other material than what can be found in the Court's ⁸² See among other material the governmental bill for the fiscal pact Ds 2012:30 Fördraget om stabilitet, samordning och styrning inom ekonomiska och monetära unionen (Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union) and Nergelius 2013a, pp. 61–83.

Annual Reports. However, since 1995, Swedish courts have asked for preliminary rulings in some 120 cases, of which 76 were submitted between 1995–2008, and the remaining 31 since 1 January 2009. At the end of 2004, when Sweden had been a member for 10 years, the total number was 50 cases. In other words, the frequency is increasing, which may be the result of criticism from the EU Commission to the Swedish government in 2004.⁸³ Unfortunately, at the time of writing, I can thus not answer questions (b) and (c).

2.8.2 Until 2013, the standard of review was not perceived as a problem from a Swedish point of view. On the contrary, the standard and intensity of the review exercised by the CJEU must be seen as having positive consequences, given the traditional judicial self-restraint of the Swedish courts. A concrete example of how the CJEU has inspired a bolder attitude among Swedish judges is a case from 2013, when the Akerberg Fransson judgment was followed by a plenary judgment of the Supreme Court upholding the ne bis in idem principle and setting the Swedish law on tax surcharges aside.⁸⁴

⁸³ The criticism that may then be raised against Swedish courts in this respect has a lot to do with the way in which they have used the instrument of preliminary ruling, in accordance with Art. 267 TFEU. The above-mentioned Barsebäck case is one of the best known cases where criticism has been expressed towards a Swedish court for excessive restraint from this point of view. With this debate in mind, it was interesting to note that the EU Commission, in an opinion in 2004, addressed some critical questions to the Swedish Government concerning the attitude of Swedish courts towards their obligations under Art. 267 and concerning the Swedish legislation on this point (2003/2161, C (2004) 3899). The background to the reaction is somewhat peculiar. In Case C-99/00 Lyckeskog [2002] ECR I-04839, the Court of Appeal in Gothenburg, in a minor criminal case, posed the question of whether it could be considered as a court of last instance in the meaning of former Art. 234 (now 267) Sect. 3 (which means that it would in that case be under an obligation to refer any question concerning the interpretation of EU law to the CJEU). Secondly, should that have been held to be the case, the Swedish court wanted to know whether it would have been able to ignore some of the very strict criteria (the so-called acte clair doctrine) of the CILFIT case. The CJEU answered the first procedural question in the negative and then did not bother to answer the second one. However, when posing the questions to the CJEU, the Swedish court adequately described the Swedish procedural system and pointed to the fact that the Supreme Court and the Supreme Administrative Court only review cases from the respective Appellate Courts under a system of admissibility (prövningstillstånd), based on the possibility of a given case to be a future precedent. Furthermore, when deciding not to grant admissibility, the two highest courts were not under any obligation to justify or motivate (or argue in favour of) such decisions. The European Commission, which had intervened in the Lyckeskog case, reacted against these requirements and declared that the Swedish procedural rules, in particular the possibility for the two highest courts to dismiss an appeal for admissibility in cases which may contain complicated EC law matters without having to justify their decisions, made it impossible for the European Commission to fulfil its task as the guardian and ‘watchdog’ of the Treaties and EC law in general. It thus required the Swedish government to change the legislation in this field. This was also done through the law (2006:502) with certain rules on preliminary rulings from the CJEU, which states that the two supreme courts may never refuse admissibility when a preliminary ruling has been requested by the applicant without a justified statement and reasons.

⁸⁴ NJA 2013, pp. 502 and 746.

However, the surprising outcome of the Melloni case and the poor human rights standard that it reveals – that may even undermine the Charter of Fundamental Rights – may lead to another conclusion for the future, and the future jurisprudence of the CJEU in human rights matters needs to be closely followed and analysed. Cases such as *Kadi II*⁸⁵ and the Data Retention Directive judgment⁸⁶ indicate that the CJEU maintains a sharp awareness of human rights matters and that Melloni was perhaps (hopefully) just an unfortunate deviation.⁸⁷

2.8.3 On the domestic approach to judicial review, the situation has changed in recent years, but in quite another way. Generally speaking, Swedish courts are by tradition very cautious, as described above, but recent constitutional changes and developments in European law, by the European courts, have brought about some profound and important changes in the last few years. The cases on ne bis in idem have been mentioned above, as has the important work of the Law Council. A statistical analysis of the case law of Swedish courts in the years 2000–2010 made by Karin Åhman reveals that cases relating to the ECHR were most frequent within the case law of the administrative courts of appeal and the general courts of appeal. In 19 of 47 cases the Supreme Court applied the ECHR in such a way that it had a concrete impact on the interpretation of Swedish law. In some cases, however, the ECHR was directly applicable; this was especially the case regarding Art. 13 of the ECHR. The majority of the cases, however, concerned criminal and procedural issues. The Supreme Administrative Court dealt with the ECHR in 25 of 153 cases. In only in 8 of these 25 cases did the Supreme Administrative Court recognise the ECHR in such a way that it came to influence the interpretation of Swedish law. Most frequent was the application of Art. 6 ECHR.⁸⁸ The study also revealed an increased willingness among the courts to apply European law, including European case law, more directly.

Generally speaking, the courts seem more loyal towards the case law of the CJEU than of the ECtHR. However, this loyalty towards the CJEU has not always brought the courts to actually set aside Swedish law by referring to such case law. It should be noted that regarding Arts. 6 and 13 of the ECHR, the courts have tended to increase their adherence to the case law of the ECtHR.

Concerning the Swedish Constitution, Swedish courts have set national laws aside for being unconstitutional three or four times since 1996 (depending on what is counted as setting a law aside or giving it a new interpretation, an issue that will not be dealt with here).⁸⁹ A very important case concerning the IG was decided by ⁸⁵ Kadi II, Joined cases C-584/10 P, 593/10 P and 595/10 P Commission and Others v. Kadi [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:518.

⁸⁶ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

⁸⁷ See also Case C-131/12 Google Spain and Google [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:317.

⁸⁸ See Åhman 2011.

⁸⁹ One such case is the so-called Manga case of 2012 (NJA 2012 p. 400), which concerned possession of some 40 Japanese art drawings of naked, prepubescent youngsters. In this case, the the Supreme Court in April 2014,⁹⁰ when a person who had been wrongly deprived of his Swedish citizenship was awarded compensation in the amount of 100,000 SEK due to the fact that the tax authority had violated Chap. 2, Art. 7 IG. Similar cases concerning violations of the ECHR have been heard since 2005,⁹¹ but these have generally been seen as recognition of the legal importance of Chap. 2 IG.

2.8.4 Regarding the review of measures implementing EU law, the jurisprudence is perhaps not entirely consistent or coherent. Normally, Swedish courts apply EU law loyally, including implemented directives, without advanced or sophisticated lines of reasoning concerning compatibility with the ECHR or the Swedish Constitution, but there are a few exceptions from the Supreme Courts. One such example is NJA 2001 (p. 409), concerning Directive 95/46 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data⁹² (transposed into Swedish law by the so-called Personuppgiftslagen, PuL, 1998:204). In this case, the Supreme Court clearly favoured and gave priority to the Freedom of the Press Act in a situation of conflict (referring also to Arts. 8 and 10 ECHR).

2.8.5 In the doctrine, some proposals have been made – not least in relation to treaty changes – to introduce a stricter review of the constitutionality of EU legislation, in line with that exercised by the German Constitutional Court.⁹³ However, this debate has not been very vivid or influential. My own personal view is that there may be a need for such stricter review in some situations and that the Law Council may have a role to play, using its powers under Chap. 8, Arts. 20–22 IG (see above Sect. 2.1.3).

2.8.6 Equal treatment of those falling within the scope of EU and national law was one of the key aspects of the Lassagård case of 1997 (RÅ 1997 ref. 65), mentioned above in Sect. 1.3.2. In that case the plaintiff applied to a regional administrative authority (Länsstyrelsen) for an agricultural subsidy in May 1995. The Lassagård case is of fundamental importance as to the extension of the scope of judicial review owner was a professional translator who also worked with cartoons, but since 1998, any possession of such material has been illegal and the FPA does not apply in relation to such material (Chap. 1, Art. 10). Nevertheless, the Supreme Court used the rules on freedom of speech and freedom of information in the IG, including the rules determining when these freedoms may be limited (Chap. 2 Arts. 21 and 23) to decide that his possession of the material was justified, while stressing the difference between drawn art of this kind, depicting kids that are not recognisable and – with one exception – not even realistically portrayed and, on the other hand, photos or paintings based on living models. While the owner was sentenced to a fine by two lower courts, he was acquitted in the end by the Supreme Court.

⁹⁰ T 5516-12, Judgment 23 April 2014.

⁹¹ Starting with NJA 2005, p. 462. See also NJA 2012, p. 211 (I-II).

⁹² Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 October 1995 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data [1995] OJ L 281/31.

⁹³ See e.g. Bergström 2008.

in Sweden and its interaction with EU law. First, it follows clearly from the case that EU law prevails over domestic law. Secondly, it shows that EU law has extended the scope of judicial review in the Swedish legal order. The application of the general principle of effective protection by the Supreme Administrative Court resulted in the invalidation of the national regulation that limited review and the incorporation of a new provision ensuring the general competence of the administrative courts to review administrative decisions.

The importance of the case is shown not least when recalling that in a similar case, Stallknecht, which concerned the situation before 1995, both the Supreme Court and the Supreme Administrative Court refused to review an administrative decision against which no appeal existed (although the claim for economic compensation in question was in fact more justified than in Lassagård).⁹⁴

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 The implementation of EU law that affects individual rights by governmental regulations is not as such an issue in Sweden. However, the prohibition to introduce indictable offences by a governmental instrument also applies, as follows from Chap. 8, Art. 2, Sect. 1, p. 2 and Art. 3 Sect. 2. This is also illustrated by the 2005 Supreme Court case mentioned above in Sect. 2.1.3 under ‘the rule of law’.⁹⁵

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 Generally speaking, it is difficult to elevate important constitutional traditions from one Member State by giving them the status of ‘common constitutional traditions’. However, there is at least one example where the CJEU has allowed a national constitutional tradition to prevail over the free movement of services, namely the Omega Spielhallen case, where a local German prohibition against so-called laserdomes was upheld, since they were seen as violating human dignity.⁹⁶

In Sweden, the content of common constitutional traditions has mainly been discussed in relation to specific Swedish rules on access to documents, transparency and protection of whistle-blowers, freedoms that are wider pursuant to the Freedom of the Press Act than under EU law. The issue of the relationship between these ⁹⁴ See NJA 1994, p. 657 and RÅ 1995, ref. 58, respectively.

⁹⁵ Case NJA 2005, p. 33; see the text accompanying supra n. 45.

⁹⁶ Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609.

Swedish constitutional freedoms and EU law is still unresolved.⁹⁷ Subsequent developments within EU law, such as the stricter rules on access to documents and open administration⁹⁸ and, not least, the recognition of the constitutional identity of the Member States now mentioned, since 2009, in Art. 4(2) TEU, may have reduced these tensions slightly. However, to show the underlying difficulties, in 2012, the Constitutional Committee of the Parliament, while exercising its so-called review of subsidiarity in accordance with Art. 69 TFEU, protested against the use of a regulation as the legal act for the introduction of new rules on the use of personal data, since the use of a directive for these same rules would have given the Member States greater legal space for action, including a necessary consideration of the national legal context.⁹⁹ It may also be mentioned that in November 2013, the Swedish Parliament did, controversially and at least officially, without a specific request from the EU, approve new limitations of the general and widespread access to documents whenever their secrecy may be due to international co-operation or requested by an international organisation (including the EU).¹⁰⁰ Many journalists and press organisations have reacted critically against these changes.

2.10.2 There is definitely a greater need to highlight national constitutional case law in preliminary references. One example of a Swedish case where this would definitely have been most useful is the Laval case mentioned above.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 As mentioned above, the Melloni case may simply be described as wrong in this respect, at least from the Swedish point of view, since it meant that the Spanish Constitutional Court was not allowed to invoke the Spanish Constitution (Art. 24) although it contained a higher level of human rights protection than guaranteed by the Charter of Fundamental Rights. This is contrary to the very wording of Art. 53 of the Charter and thus not acceptable. This issue has so far not been discussed much in Sweden.¹⁰¹ As noted above, we may hope that the CJEU will not maintain this low human rights standard, thus infringing human rights guaranteed in national constitutions. However, should this be the case, a very lively discussion is likely to start throughout Europe.

⁹⁷ See e.g. KU 1993/94:21, in particular p. 25 et seq., as well as Prop (Government Bill) 1993/94:114.

⁹⁸ See Art. 41 of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights.

⁹⁹ See KU 2011/12:25.

¹⁰⁰ See KU 2013/14:6, Sekretess i det internationella samarbetet (Privacy in international cooperation), as well as rskr 2013/14:59, leading to the law 2013:972 containing amendments to the Secrecy Law.

¹⁰¹ See Nergelius 2013b.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 A certain amount of debate on the EAW Framework Decision took place in Parliament in 2003, and it may in particular be noted that the then Prime Minister, Fredrik Reinfeldt, who was then an MP and Chairman of the Law Committee of the Parliament, led the opposition in an attempt to stop or at least stall the Swedish implementation of the EAW.¹⁰² Resistance to the Data Retention Directive was even stronger, as described above in Sect. 2.4.

2.12.2 There may indeed be a need for more ‘space’, so to speak, for the Member States on these issues. At the same time, at the rather late implementation stage, Member States are expected to act loyally (cf. Art. 4(3) TEU), rather than to bring up issues of constitutionality or similar questions. The Swedish resistance against or reluctance towards the Data Retention Directive is thus a clear exception from what might be expected, and such behaviour must be reserved for situations where real human rights violations or otherwise unconstitutional legal acts are adopted by the EU.

2.12.3 The recommendation to suspend the application of an EU measure if important constitutional issues have been identified by a number of courts is an interesting idea and, if it could be enacted during the next treaty revision – whenever that happens – it might actually be a useful tool for dealing with these kinds of situations in the future.

The defence of unconstitutionality in infringement proceedings merits support, not least because it may make the CJEU reconsider, in future cases, its rigid view on the relationship between EU law and national constitutions, as shown most recently in Melloni.

2.13 Experts’ Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 As noted above, with the exception of the Melloni judgment, the answer is no (i.e. there has been no general fall of standards).

2.13.2 Having answered no to the first question, I would only stress the risk of future different standards in the jurisprudences of the CJEU and the ECtHR. So far, the CJEU has applied the ECHR loyally, with a view to the interpretations of the ECtHR. However, the same rights in the Charter will never be applied by the ECtHR, which means that the CJEU might develop its own jurisprudence, setting its own standards, for some rights that are protected also in the ECHR. In the future, this could be a real problem. It is difficult to say whether the accession of the EU to the ECHR will prevent this (potential) problem.

¹⁰² See JuU 2003/04:8.

2.13.3 With regard to the quotes in the Questionnaire, I think that the criticism towards the cryptic style of many judgments of the CJEU is highly justified. This concerns both the formalistic language and French-inspired style of writing as well as the lack of dissenting opinions. Generally speaking, judgments from the US Supreme Court, the House of Lords, the Bundesverfassungsgericht or even the ECtHR are simply much more interesting to read.

There are no clear examples of constitutional questions from Swedish courts to the CJEU, although issues related to access to documents, commercial advertising, the position of courts when asking for preliminary rulings related to the CILFIT criteria or the absence of abstract judicial review may be said to have constitutional implications. In all of these cases,¹⁰³ the response from the CJEU has been adequate from the Swedish point of view. The judgment in the Lyckeskog case may be criticised for not being very informative concerning the scope of the CILFIT criteria, but that was remedied a year later by Köbler.¹⁰⁴

Future ‘actions’ on the part of the CJEU which merit support include a stricter standard of judicial review of EU measures and allowing dissenting opinions; I support these two suggestions whole-heartedly. If it would be realistic to display the arguments in a case on the website, this sounds like a good idea, but some problems related to the integrity of CJEU procedure are foreseeable.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 Regarding specific international organisations, as mentioned in Sect. 1.2.1, since 2010, Chap. 1, Art. 10 IG mentions that Sweden participates in various forms of international cooperation, within the UN and the Council of Europe as well as ‘in other contexts’. The Article provides as follows: ‘Sweden is a member of the European Union. Sweden also participates in international cooperation within the framework of the United Nations and the Council of Europe, and in other contexts.’

The answer to the question on transfer of powers is more complicated. Here it may be said that Chap. 10, Art. 7 permits transfers of legislative powers, budgetary powers including the use of the assets of the state and treaty-making power, all to a limited extent, to international organisations other than the EU. The Article has the following wording:

¹⁰³ See Case C-101/01 Lindquist [2003] ECR I-12971; Case C-405/98 Gourmet [2001] ECR I-01795; Case C-99/00 Lyckeskog [2002] ECR I-04839 and Case C-432/05 Unibet [2007] ECR I-02271.

¹⁰⁴ Case C-224/01 Köbler [2003] ECR I-10239.

Decision-making authority which is directly based on the present Instrument of Government and which relates to the laying down of provisions, the use of assets of the State, tasks connected with judicial or administrative functions, or the conclusion or denunciation of an international agreement or obligation may, in cases other than those under Art. 6, be transferred, to a limited extent, to an international organisation for peaceful cooperation of which Sweden is a member, or is about to become a member, or to an international court of law.

Decision-making authority relating to matters concerning the enactment, amendment or abrogation of fundamental law, the Riksdag Act or a law on elections for the Riksdag, or relating to the restriction of any of the rights and freedoms referred to in Chapter 2 may not be transferred under paragraph one.

A Riksdag decision in the matter of such transfer is taken in accordance with the procedure laid down in Art. 6, paragraph two.

Of importance here is also Chap. 10, Art. 8:

Any judicial or administrative function not directly based on this Instrument of Government may be transferred, in cases other than those under Article 6, to another state, international organisation, or foreign or international institution or community by means of a decision of the Riksdag. The Riksdag may authorise the Government or other public authority in law to approve such transfer of functions in particular cases.

Where the function concerned involves the exercise of public authority, the Riksdag's decision in the matter of such transfer or authorisation is taken in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 6, paragraph two.

Furthermore, Chap. 10, Art. 9 states that

If it has been laid down in law that an international agreement shall have validity as Swedish law, the Riksdag may prescribe, by means of a decision taken in accordance with the procedure laid down in paragraph two, that also any future amendment of the agreement binding upon the Realm shall apply within the Realm. Such a decision shall relate only to a future amendment of limited extent.

Thus, the rules for concluding various types of treaties and agreements are now reasonably clear and updated.

3.1.2 Generally speaking, Chap. 10, Art. 6 was introduced when Sweden joined the European Union in 1995, while the other three articles mentioned date back to the enactment of the new Constitution in 1974 or even earlier.¹⁰⁵ Already in 1964, the possibility to transfer decision-making powers to an international organisation aimed at peaceful co-operation was established, although this could only take place to a limited extent. Although these old provisions could not be used in order to facilitate EU membership, this constitutional reform was actually enacted as early as fifty years ago, with the future relation to the EC in mind (Sweden had applied for association with the EC already in 1961). These rules were then transferred to the new Constitution in 1974, with the only addition that transfer of competences could also take place to an international court.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰⁵ A useful comment on the historical background of these articles and their history 'before 1995' was made by Algotsson 2000, p. 273 et seq.

3.1.3 The only case of importance in this regard is a judgment from 1996 concerning the current IG Chap. 10, Art. 8. It concerned the transfer of certain administrative functions on the border between Sweden and Finland to Finnish authorities and a transnational body, which had not been decided in a formally correct manner.¹⁰⁷ A somewhat ironic twist in the case was that on 23 April 2014, some fishermen in the very north of Sweden were awarded financial compensation, after lengthy proceedings, since their right to property according to Chap. 2, Art. 15 IG had been violated by these errors.¹⁰⁸

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 Treaties entered into by Sweden do not form part of the Swedish Constitution and are in fact not even part of Swedish law at all until they have been incorporated or transposed into Swedish national law. In other words, Sweden traditionally adheres to a dualistic view on the relationship between national and international law.

This may be illustrated by the fate of the ECHR. Sweden ratified the ECHR already in 1951 (although the jurisdiction of ECtHR was not acknowledged until 1966), but it was not incorporated into Swedish national law until 1995, when Sweden joined the EU. Thus, for forty-five years, the ECHR was not a part of Swedish law and, strictly speaking, could not be invoked in proceedings before Swedish courts. Still, it was used by the Supreme Courts as a means of interpretation, in particular in the late 1980s and early 1990s, when Sweden had been condemned by the ECtHR for violations in a number of cases (mainly concerning Art. 6). Thus, the ECHR was important in Swedish law before being incorporated, but this is a clear exception.

3.2.2 As mentioned above, Sweden together with the other Nordic countries still has a dualistic view on the relationship between national and international law. This is not likely to change as such, although this may of course be regarded as regrettable in today's globalised world.

¹⁰⁶ Some minor changes were also introduced in 1976 and 1985; see Algotsson 2000, p. 274.

¹⁰⁷ NJA 1996, p. 370.

¹⁰⁸ NJA 2014, p. 332.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 Agreements with other states or multilateral international agreements are concluded by the Government, as mentioned above. This is logical given that the Government ‘governs the Realm’ according to Chap. 1, Art. 6 IG. Concerning parliamentary involvement, which has increased in recent years, see above Sect. 3.1.1.

Chapter 10, Art. 3, according to which, since 2003, the Government may not conclude any binding international agreement without the approval of Parliament, if the agreement presupposes the amendment or abrogation of an act of law or the enactment of a new act of law, or if it otherwise concerns a matter which is for the Riksdag to determine, was enacted after the approval of the Nice Treaty. It also applies to new EU treaties. Thus, new EU treaties must, according to IG Chap. 10 Art. 3 Sect. 2, and Chap. 10, Art. 6, be approved twice: first, the Parliament must approve the agreement as such, with a three-fourths majority or by two decisions with an election in the interim, and then a new, separate decision must be made, with the same formal requirements, concerning the transfer of power to the EU that the new or amended treaty will entail.

As stated above, the future TTIP agreement has recently been much discussed from this point of view.

3.3.2 Except for the EMU referendum in 2003, there have been no referendums in Sweden on treaties.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 This is basically an issue that concerns the ECHR, since other international conventions are very rarely (if ever) applied, given the dualist tradition. Further, as seen above, Swedish courts tend to use the ECHR ever more frequently, a development of which I personally approve.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 Concerns about the impact of globalisation on the social state is much less the case than foreign observers of Sweden in general expect. Concerning social rights as such, mentioned in Chap. 1, Art. 2, public power shall be exercised with respect for the equal worth of all and the liberty and dignity of the private person. In Sect. 2 of the same Art., the Constitution commits the public authorities to the realisation of social, economic and cultural rights, as well as environmental and other rights, although these rights are in fact not legally protected as such by the Constitution or by the Swedish legal order, which may be slightly surprising for foreign scholars and commentators. Instead, Chap. 1, Art. 2 IG is a simple statement on the aims and purposes of governmental activities and public institutions in general, including the duty of public authorities to combat discrimination.¹⁰⁹

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

The most controversial rendition case concerned two Egyptians residing in Sweden, who were abducted to Egypt from a Swedish airport in December 2001. The operation was carried out by CIA agents who were assisted by Swedish police. The fact that the Swedish Government was aware of the action led to a rather big scandal when it was revealed two years later. The Government then chose to claim that the late Foreign Minister, Anna Lindh, had been responsible, but this has never really been proved or clarified.

Concerning inclusion in terrorist blacklists and the freezing of bank accounts, the case Al-Barakaat, which until late 2008 was closely connected with the Kadi case, is definitely important.

The Kadi and Al-Barakaat judgment of the CJEU from 2008 is well known. It may be noted that Al-Barakaat, an organisation helping Somali refugees in Sweden that had some economic ties with an alleged terrorist-linked bank in Somalia, preferred not to bring the case to a Swedish court to ask for a preliminary ruling from the CJEU, which may have been a procedural mistake since it slowed the proceedings.

In this case, the CJEU set aside the judgments of the EU General Court and found that the fundamental rights of the applicants – their right to be heard and to a legal remedy as well as the right to property – had been violated.¹¹⁰ A subsequent judgment from the CJEU in 2013 confirmed the ruling.¹¹¹ This high standard of human rights protection must be welcomed, as opposed to the alarmingly low standard in the Melloni judgment of the same year, as discussed above.

Al-Barakaat, who enjoyed the informal support of the Swedish government during the proceedings, was finally removed from the UN sanctions list in autumn 2008.

¹⁰⁹ In the literature on social rights, see Lind 2009.

¹¹⁰ Joined cases C-402/05 P and C-415/05 P Kadi and Al Barakaat International Foundation v. Council and Commission [2008] ECR I-06351.

¹¹¹ Kadi II, supra n. 85.

References

- Åhman K. (2011) Normprövning – Domstols kontroll av svensk lags förenlighet med Regeringsformen och Europarätten 2000–2010 (Norm review – Judicial review of the compatibility of Swedish law with the Constitution and EU law 2000–2010). Norstedts Law, Stockholm.
- Algotsson K. (2000) Sveriges författning efter EU-anslutningen (Sweden's Constitution after EU accession). SNS förlag, Stockholm.
- Andersson T. (1996) Effective Protection of Community Rights in Sweden – Judicial Review of Administrative Decisions applying the Common Agricultural Policy. In: Cameron I., Simoni A. (eds.) Dealing with Integration – Perspectives from Seminars on European Law 1995–96. Iustus, Uppsala, pp. 141–184.
- Bergström C. (2008) Femton år senare: Lissabonfördraget och den svenska grundlagens reglering av EU (Fifteen years later: The Lisbon Treaty and the Swedish Constitution's Regulation of the EU). Europarättslig tidskrift (10th Anniversary Edition) 35:49 et seq.
- Bernitz U. (2002a) European law in Sweden: its implementation and role in market and consumer law. Juridiska institutionen, Stockholm 2002.
- Bernitz U. (2002b) Sverige och Europarätten (Sweden and EU law). Nordstedts Juridik AB, Stockholm. (original version of Bernitz 2002a).
- Bessink L. (2007) The Dutch Constitution, the European Constitution and the Referendum in the Netherlands. In: Albi A., Ziller J. (eds.) The European Constitution and National Constitutions: Ratification and Beyond. Kluwer Law International, Alphen aan den Rhijn, pp. 113–123.
- Herlin-Karnell E. (2007) The Swedish Supreme Court and the European Arrest Warrant. Europarättslig Tidskrift pp. 883–893.
- Holmberg E., Stjernquist N. (eds.) (2003) Vår författning (Our Constitution), 13th edn. Norstedts Juridik, Stockholm.
- Karlson, N. (2009) Lagrådets roll – idag och imorgon (The role of the council – today and tomorrow). Svensk Juristtidning pp. 269–274.
- Lind A.-S. (2009) Sociala rättigheter i förändring – En konstitutionellrättslig studie (Social rights in transition – a constitutional law study). Juridiska institutionen, Uppsala 2009.
- Lindblom P.-H. (1997) Integrera mera? (Integrate more?) Svensk Juristtidning pp. 316 et seq.
- Melin M., Schäder G. (1999) EU:s constitution (The Constitution of the EU), 4th edn. Norstedts Juridik, Stockholm.
- Nergelius J. (1998a) Amsterdamfördraget och EU:s institutionella maktbalans (The Amsterdam Treaty and the EU's institutional balance of power). Norstedts Juridik, Stockholm.
- Nergelius J. (1998b) The Impact of EC Law in Swedish National Law – A Cultural Revolution. In: Cameron I., Simoni A. (eds.) Dealing with Integration – Perspectives from Seminars on European Law 1995–96. Iustus, Uppsala, pp. 165–182.
- Nergelius J. (2002) Reasons Why a Small Country Would Want to Become a Member of the European Union (Taking the Nordic Countries as Examples). Institut Suisse de Droit Comparé 45:265–276.
- Nergelius J. (2008) En olaglig folkomröstning – Sverige och euron (An illegal referendum – Sweden and the euro). Santérus, Stockholm.
- Nergelius J. (2009) The Constitutional Dilemma of the European Union. Europa Law Publishing, Groningen.
- Nergelius J. (2010) Svensk statsrätt (Swedish constitutional law), 2nd edn. Studentlitteratur, Lund.
- Nergelius J. (2013a) Europakten – flexible integration som grund för euron och EU:s framtid (The Euro Pact – flexible integration due to the euro and the EU's future). In: Bakardjieva Engelbrekt A., Oxelheim L., Persson T. (eds.) Ett konkurrenskraftigt EU till rätt pris (A competitive EU at the right price). Santérus Förlag, Stockholm 2013, pp. 61–83.
- Nergelius J. (2013b) Comment on Melloni. Europarättslig tidskrift, pp. 815–819.
- Nergelius J. (2014) Svensk statsrätt (Swedish constitutional law), 3rd edn. Studentlitteratur, Lund.

- Raz J. (1998) On the Authority and Interpretation of Constitutions: Some Preliminaries. In: Alexander L. (ed.) Constitutionalism – Philosophical Foundations. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, pp. 152–193.
- Zetterquist O. (2012) Strasbourg, Luxembourg – we have a problem – Reflektioner om ett litet HD-uppror (Reflections on a minor Supreme Court Rebellion). In: Derlén M., Lindholm J. (eds.) Festskrift till Pär Hallström (Festschrift in Honour of Pär Hallström). Iustus förlag, Uppsala, pp. 353 et seq.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Finland: European Integration and International Human Rights Treaties as Sources of Domestic Constitutional Change and Dynamism

Tuomas Ojanen and Janne Salminen

Abstract The Constitution Act of 1919 was replaced in 2000 by a new Constitution, which was amended in 2012. While the institution of exceptive enactments, which enables the adoption of laws that are in conflict with the Constitution, had earlier assumed a key role in constitutional adjustment for EU integration, the 2012 amendments expressed a constitutional commitment to EU membership and provided for the transfer of powers to the EU. As a result, exceptive enactments are no longer needed for such transfer. Instead of a constitutional court, a key role in constitutional review is played by the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament through ex ante review of legislative proposals or other matters pending before Parliament, including proposals for EU legislation, for their compatibility with the Constitution and Finland's international human rights obligations. From the late 1980s onwards, the constitutional tendency has increasingly been towards rights-based judicial review. Aside from the ECHR and other human rights treaties, EU membership has greatly contributed to both judicial empowerment and enhanced rights protection. Areas where EU law has presented constitutional challenges include: (a) the European Arrest Warrant, with regard to which Finland introduced constitutional and legislative safeguards for the sake of fundamental rights; (b) the Laval and Viking Line stream of case law; and (c) concerns around preserving 'the quality of law' when implementing EU law. In result of the ex ante constitutional review of the draft ESM Treaty, a change in the Tuomas Ojanen is Professor of Constitutional Law, University of Helsinki. e-mail: tuomas.ojanen@helsinki.fi.

Janne Salminen is Professor of Public Law, University of Turku. e-mail: janne.salminen@utu.fi.
All websites accessed 26 October 2015. Text submitted 29 May 2015.

T. Ojanen (✉)
University of Helsinki, Helsinki, Finland
e-mail: tuomas.ojanen@helsinki.fi

J. Salminen
University of Turku, Turku, Finland
e-mail: janne.salminen@utu.fi draft treaty stemming from constitutional concerns about increased financial liabilities without parliamentary control was proposed and achieved.

Keywords The Constitution of Finland of 2000 · The 2012 amendment of the Constitution in relation to EU and international co-operation · Ex ante constitutional review by the Constitutional Committee of Parliament · Fundamental rights and the rule of law · Rise of rights-based judicial review · Constitutional and legislative safeguards with regard to the European Arrest Warrant and extraditions Data Retention Directive · Laval, Viking Line, posted workers and collective action Quality of law · Parliamentary reservation of law when implementing EU and international measures · ESM Treaty and maximum financial liabilities Article 53 EU Charter and the question of a higher standard of protection

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Introduction: Some Characteristics of the Finnish Constitutional System and Culture

1.1.1–1.1.2 The Constitution, as a legal and political instrument, has traditionally been highly esteemed in Finland. The origins of great respect for constitutional enactments can be traced as far back as the legal-positivist resistance by the Finnish legal and political elite to the campaigns of ‘Russification’ between 1899 and 1905. Over a century, from 1809 to 1917, Finland was an autonomous Grand Duchy within the Russian Empire and thus had its own legal system, including constitutional enactments inherited from the era of Swedish rule (before 1809). During the years of ‘Russification’, however, Finns fought against arbitrary Russian interferences in Finland’s domestic legal and political affairs by advancing a constitutional challenge, essentially founded on a simple, yet firm claim that all authorities, including those of the Russian Empire, had to strictly observe Finland’s constitutional enactments and Finnish law in general in the exercise of their powers. As this constitutional challenge also proved very successful, a strong tradition of legalism, including respect for the rule of law, began to characterise Finnish constitutionalism from those years onwards.¹

The current Constitution of Finland (Act No. 731/1999)² entered into force on 1 March 2000, and replaced the earlier Constitution Act of 1919 and three other enactments enjoying constitutional status.³ The Constitution of Finland is a modern and unified constitutional document with a concise and uniform style. Aside from including some new elements and codifying certain practices and doctrines, the Constitution of Finland incorporates a number of principles, structures and solutions that were already established in earlier constitutional documents. As with earlier constitutional enactments, the Constitution can be understood as enjoying strong legitimacy across the whole sweep of the Finnish political system and society, as Parliament adopted the Constitution almost unanimously, with a final vote of 175 for and only 2 against.

¹ See in more detail Ojanen 2007, pp. 146–148. See about the Finnish understanding of the Constitution and the legacy of autonomy under the Russian Empire, also Mutanen 2015, pp. 272–276 with references.

² All translations are from the unofficial translation of the Constitution of Finland, including amendments up to 1112/2011, in English available at: <https://www.finlex.fi/fi/laki/kaannokset/1999/en19990731.pdf>.

For the practical and theoretical purposes of this paper, the following two peculiarities of the Finnish constitutional system are particularly worthy of elaboration. The first constitutional idiosyncrasy is the structural framework of the Finnish model of constitutional review. It still primarily assumes the nature of (abstract) ex ante review by the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament of legislative proposals and other matters brought for its consideration for their relation to the Constitution and international human rights treaties.^{4,5} By contrast, Finland has always lacked a distinct constitutional court. Moreover, there was a rigid prohibition of judicial review of Acts of Parliament for their compatibility with the Constitution until the entry into force of the current Constitution of Finland in 2000. Although Sect. 106⁶ of the Constitution now empowers courts to give primacy to the Constitution if the application of an Act of Parliament would be in ‘manifest conflict’ with the Constitution, Sect. 106 amounts to a form of weak judicial review that combines the abstract ex ante constitutional review of legislation by the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament with the concrete ex post judicial review by the courts. In this model, the ex ante constitutional review by the Constitutional Law Committee is still supposed to remain the primary form of review, whereas judicial review under Sect. 106 is designed to plug loopholes left in the abstract ex ante review of the constitutionality of government bills, inasmuch as unforeseen constitutional problems might arise in applying the law by the courts in particular cases.

The main difference in comparison with constitutional courts is, of course, that in the Finnish model the power of review is held by a primarily political organ

³ Accordingly, there were four constitutional enactments enjoying constitutional status: the Constitution Act of Finland, the Parliament Act and two Acts on ministerial liability. All Acts were passed during the first years of independence (the Acts of 94/1919; 7/1928; 274/1922; and 273/1922).

⁴ Section 74 of the Constitution, entitled ‘Supervision of constitutionality’, provides as follows: ‘The Constitutional Law Committee shall issue statements on the constitutionality of legislative proposals and other matters brought for its consideration, as well as on their relation to international human rights treaties.’

⁵ For the Finnish system of constitutional review, see Lavapuro et al. 2011, pp. 505–531.

⁶ Section 106 of the 2000 Constitution, entitled ‘The Primacy of the Constitution’, provides as follows: ‘If in a matter being tried by a court, the application of an Act of Parliament would be in manifest conflict with the Constitution, the court of law shall give primacy to the provision in the Constitution.’ For the background of Sect. 106, see Ojanen 2009a.

composed of Members of Parliament and acting as an integral part in the political process of legislative action. A cautionary note for those readers who believe that the political organisation of constitutional review automatically results in a non-legalistic and morally deep deliberation of rights issues. Despite its political organisation, the practice of the Finnish Constitutional Law Committee is characterised by formalistic argumentation and a search for interpretations that can be directly linked to the text of the Constitution or its preparatory works as well as to its own precedents. Moreover, before issuing its Opinions or Reports, the Committee regularly hears experts in constitutional law, notably university professors, whose opinions have significant impact on the Committee's interpretive framework. While not formally legally binding, the statements by the Committee on the harmony or discrepancy of a bill with the Constitution are generally treated as authoritative. It is quite usual for the Committee to find a bill to be unconstitutional in one or more respects and, accordingly, require amendments to be made to the bill during its parliamentary consideration.

Given that the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament assumes a role similar to the usual role of a constitutional court in centralised forms of constitutional review, the practice of the Committee will be of great significance for the purposes of this report.

The second traditional distinction, even quirk, of the Finnish constitutional system is the institution of exceptive enactments.⁷ The origins of this institution can be traced as far back as the era of the Grand Duchy of Finland in the Russian Empire between 1809 and 1917. In essence, this institution makes it possible to adopt laws that in substance conflict with the Constitution without amending the text thereof, subject to the proviso, however, that such exceptive enactments be approved in accordance with the procedure for constitutional enactments. Traditionally, constitutional lawyers speak about making a 'hole' in the Constitution by an exceptive enactment and filling it with the relevant norms of the exceptive enactment.

While the importance of the institution of exceptive enactments has gradually decreased since the late 1980s and the Constitution of Finland now also imposes limits to derogations from the Constitution by means of exceptive enactments, the institution of exceptive enactments has assumed a significant role in the context of EU membership, as will be discussed in more detail below in Sect. 1.2.1.

The third most significant characteristic of the contemporary constitutional system, including constitutional culture, relates to the domestic system of the protection of fundamental and human rights. Up until the late 1980s, fundamental and human rights, as well as their judicial safeguards, assumed a marginal role on the Finnish scene of constitutionalism. As the Finnish Constitution subscribed to the French Revolutionary conception of the law as a supreme expression of the people's will as well as to ideas about democracy as majority rule,⁸ the outcome was a rigid prohibition of judicial review and a marginal role for individual rights, although the Finnish Constitution has included a distinct catalogue of constitutional rights ever since the entry into force of the Constitution Act of 1919.

⁷ A brief historical review of this institution in English is provided in Scheinin 2002, pp. 55 and 56.

Since the late 1980s, however, tendencies of Europeanisation, rights-based judicial review and the rise of international organisations and global institutions with their regulatory networks have entailed that fundamental rights and human rights treaties binding on Finland have started to play a greater role in the courts and the Finnish scene of constitutionalism in general.⁹ In particular, Finland's accession to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) in 1989 and the incorporation of its provisions into the domestic legal order in 1990 represents one of the most important turns in Finnish constitutional history.¹⁰ Human rights treaties binding on Finland, with the ECHR at their apex, provided the main inspiration and stimulus for a comprehensive reform of the domestic system for the protection of constitutional rights, which entered into force on 1 August 1995. As a result of the reform, the current fundamental rights catalogue in the 1999 Constitution of Finland (Chap. 2 of the Constitution) is very comprehensive, setting out a range of economic, social, cultural and 'third-generation' rights alongside more traditional civil and political rights.¹¹ Moreover, these transformations of the Finnish constitutional system and culture regarding fundamental and human rights have been accompanied by a tendency towards stronger judicial safeguards for rights protection, although the growing role of the judiciary also owes to such tendencies of modern law as an overflow of legislation and open-ended framework legislation that pass important decision-making power to the level of concrete cases. In addition, EU membership has greatly contributed to a shift of competence to the judiciary.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution of Finland in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 European Union related amendments On the threshold of EU membership, the Constitution assumed a very minimalist approach to integration and internationalisation in general. The Constitution was very introverted and domestic-oriented.¹² The Constitution lacked a constitutional provision permitting limitations of sovereignty or the transfer of powers to international organisations, not to speak of the EU in particular.

⁸ See Nergelius 2006.

⁹ Lavapuro et al. 2011.

¹⁰ See also Viljanen 1996.

¹¹ See also Salminen 2014, pp. 41–63, and Ojanen 2013, pp. 93–113.

¹² Ojanen 2013, p. 110.

Due to the availability of the institution of exception enacts, no amendment of the Constitution was found necessary to enable Finland to join the EU despite the fact that the Accession Treaty was deemed to be in conflict with the Constitution, with the major reason simply being the incompatibility of the Accession Treaty with the sovereignty of Finland.¹³ Accordingly, the Treaty of Accession was incorporated into Finnish law through an exception enactment (Act No. 1540 of 1994), approved by a two-thirds majority in Parliament.

However, some changes in the Constitution Act of 1919 were found necessary; the relevant amendments concerned the domestic distribution of powers between the Government and the President, and the role of Parliament in EU affairs.¹⁴ The accession of Finland to the European Economic Area (EEA) in 1994 and to the EU in 1995 had already increased pressure to reconsider the domestic distribution of powers between Parliament, the Government and the President. Although the powers of the President had already been reduced in domestic affairs, the President still enjoyed strong powers in the sphere of foreign affairs in the early 1990s. Thus, one of the most important issues to be decided in Finland prior to embarking on the process of European integration was whether European affairs – first EEA affairs and later EU affairs – should be considered as domestic or foreign policy matters. In the latter case, they would have fallen within the competence of the President by virtue of Sect. 33 of the Constitution Act of 1919, with the outcome that the constitutional pendulum would have lurched back again towards a strong presidency, thereby watering down constitutional amendments since the early 1980s that nudged the Finnish constitutional system towards parliamentarism. In particular, this outcome would have meant a severe blow to the participation of Parliament in EU affairs.

However, the competences were arranged according to the same ratio used in domestic legislative affairs, instead of the typical competence arrangements for foreign policy. Accordingly, the Constitution was amended so that the main responsibility for the national preparation of EEA affairs and later EU affairs was given to the Government, whose members are individually and collectively accountable to Parliament. This was important because the line of development had since the mid-1980s begun to move towards parliamentarism from the previous strong powers of the President, and EU membership and these arrangements gave support to this tendency. EU membership resulted in a horizontal relocation of authority between Parliament, the Government and the President, and contributed to an enhancement of the parliamentary features of the Finnish constitutional-political system. In addition, specific constitutional provisions were enacted for the purpose of ensuring the participation of Parliament in considering EU affairs, which would, ¹³ See Opinion 14/1994 of the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament.

¹⁴ See also Ojanen 2004, pp. 536–538 and 551–554. See generally Salminen 2015, discussing the changes as transformations of the integration norms of the Finnish Constitution. See also Mutanen 2015, discussing the changes in the concept of sovereignty in Finland from a comparative perspective. Mutanen 2015 provides a detailed account of the amendment process, drafting history and relevant literature in English.

according to the Constitution, otherwise fall within the competence of Parliament. In the same wave, Parliament was also given strong rights for receiving information in EU affairs.¹⁵

In the Finnish context the experiences of this system – the allocation of powers and the strong participation and information rights of Parliament – were considered to be so valuable that the same provisions were adopted in the Constitution of 2000.

Section 96

The Parliament considers those proposals for acts, agreements and other measures which are to be decided in the European Union and which otherwise, according to the Constitution, would fall within the competence of the Parliament.

The Government shall, for the determination of the position of the Parliament, communicate a proposal referred to in paragraph (1) to the Parliament by a communication of the Government, without delay, after receiving notice of the proposal. The proposal is considered in the Grand Committee and ordinarily in one or more of the other Committees that issue statements to the Grand Committee. However, the Foreign Affairs Committee considers a proposal pertaining to foreign and security policy. Where necessary, the Grand Committee or the Foreign Affairs Committee may issue to the Government a statement on the proposal. In addition, the Speaker's Council may decide that the matter be taken up for debate in plenary session, during which, however, no decision is made by the Parliament.

The Government shall provide the appropriate Committees with information on the consideration of the matter in the European Union. The Grand Committee or the Foreign Affairs Committee shall also be informed of the position of the Government on the matter.

Section 97

The Foreign Affairs Committee of the Parliament shall receive from the Government, upon request and when otherwise necessary, reports of matters pertaining to foreign and security policy. Correspondingly, the Grand Committee of the Parliament shall receive reports on the preparation of other matters in the European Union. The Speaker's Council may decide on a report being taken up for debate in plenary session, during which, however, no decision is made by the Parliament.

The Prime Minister shall provide the Parliament or a Committee with information on matters to be dealt with in a European Council beforehand and without delay after a meeting of the Council. The same applies when amendments are being prepared to the treaties establishing the European Union.

The appropriate Committee of the Parliament may issue a statement to the Government on the basis of the reports or information referred to above.

Powers are distributed between the Government and the President such that Government clearly has the general competence for EU affairs. According to Sect. 93(2)

[t]he Government is responsible for the national preparation of the decisions to be made in the European Union, and decides on the concomitant Finnish measures, unless the decision requires the approval of the Parliament. The Parliament participates in the national preparation of decisions to be made in the European Union, as provided in this Constitution.

¹⁵ See also Ojanen 2004, pp. 554–557, and Viljanen 2003.

Further, the Constitution of Finland of 2000, which of course was enacted when Finland was an EU member and as such was designed to function as a constitution of a Member State,¹⁶ tried to codify the new doctrinal transitions which had occurred in the understanding of Finnish sovereignty by including a so-called internationalisation principle (Sect. 1(3)) according to which Finland participates in international co-operation for the protection of peace and human rights and for the development of society.

According to the travaux préparatoires, this provision functions to offer a new dimension for the construction of sovereignty so that those international obligations which are deemed to be ‘conventional’ in modern international co-operation and which only affect sovereignty in a ‘minor way’ will no longer be deemed to conflict with the sovereignty of Finland. Moreover, the sovereignty doctrine is based on the idea of the specificity of the EU, with greater tolerance of the limitations on sovereignty stemming from EU membership than those derived from other international obligations. In particular, the part of the section referring to the ‘development of society’ was meant to denote EU membership.

Nevertheless, membership in the EU was not very visible in the Constitution. Yet one can also not claim that membership was not explicitly reflected in the wording of the Constitution because the provisions on division of powers between state organs included sections on the EU. From the very start of Finland’s EU membership, there has been debate over the question to what extent, if any, EU membership should be recognised in the text of the Constitution. Even the entry into force of the Constitution of Finland in 2000 failed to answer this question in a satisfactory way, as it did not contain any explicit references to the EU. The most problematic issue was, however, that the Constitution lacked a solid way of transferring the powers of the state. Upon incorporating the Constitutional Treaty and Lisbon Treaty into Finnish law it became obvious that the transfers could no longer be based on exceptive enactments. Moreover, the fact that EU membership was not clearly stated as part of the fundamental organisation of Finland was considered problematic.¹⁷

Thus, when the Constitution and its functioning were evaluated and amended after having been in force for ten years, these issues were revisited in a new light. After the amendments of 2012, the Constitution now reflects the constitutional orientation towards international cooperation for societal development through the EU and expresses commitment to EU membership. In a way, the infancy of EU membership is now over and the Constitution has grown up to be able to face the EU. This new approach can also be observed in new provisions explicitly providing that a significant transfer of state powers to the EU or an international organisation requires a decision made by at least two-thirds of the votes cast in Parliament. This also means that transfers of ‘insignificant’ powers can be decided by simple majority. Whereas EU membership was brought into force internally by the use of the institution of excessive enactments allowing for the adoption of legislation conflicting with the Constitution and thus placing membership principally outside the Constitution as a conflicting phenomenon, the current Constitution expresses a constitutional commitment towards the Union and provides a specific provision for the transfer of powers to the Union. Now, only a significant transfer of powers to the EU requires a qualified majority, and the application of the institution of excessive enactments is no longer needed for such transfer. The domestic debate over the competence of the President to represent Finland in the European Council also needed some clarification. The finishing touch was added after the Lisbon Treaty had already entered into force with a new provision explicitly providing that the Prime Minister represents Finland in the European Council. In addition, an amendment was made in the domestic catalogue of fundamental rights due to EU membership by adding the right to vote in elections to the European Parliament to the participatory rights of the citizen.

¹⁶ See Salminen 2014.

¹⁷ Salminen 2010a, pp. 509–527.

After these changes, Sect. 1(3) of the Constitution provides as follows:

Finland participates in international co-operation for the protection of peace and human rights and for the development of society. Finland is a Member State of the European Union (emphasis added, 1112/2011, entry into force 1.3.2012).

Currently, Sect. 94 on the acceptance of international obligations and their denunciation and Sect. 95 on the entry into force of international obligations include the possibility for the transfer of the powers according to the constitutional system and provide a decision making procedure for this purpose:

Section 94

The acceptance of the Parliament is required for such treaties and other international obligations that contain provisions of a legislative nature, are otherwise significant, or otherwise require approval by the Parliament under this Constitution. The acceptance of the Parliament is required also for the denunciation of such obligations.

A decision concerning the acceptance of an international obligation or the denunciation of it is made by a majority of the votes cast. However, if the proposal concerns the Constitution or an alteration of the national borders, or such transfer of authority to the European Union, an international organisation or an international body that is of significance with regard to Finland's sovereignty, the decision shall be made by at least two thirds of the votes cast. (1112/2011, entry into force 1.3.2012)

An international obligation shall not endanger the democratic foundations of the Constitution.

Section 95

The provisions of treaties and other international obligations, in so far as they are of a legislative nature, are brought into force by an Act. Otherwise, international obligations are brought into force by a Decree. (1112/2011, entry into force 1.3.2012)

A Government bill for the bringing into force of an international obligation is considered in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure pertaining to an Act. However, if the proposal concerns the Constitution or a change to the national territory, or such transfer of authority to the European Union, an international organisation or an international body that is of significance with regard to Finland's sovereignty, the Parliament shall adopt it, without leaving it in abeyance, by a decision supported by at least two thirds of the votes cast. (1112/2011, entry into force 1.3.2012)

An Act may state that for the bringing into force of an international obligation its entry into force is provided by a Decree. General provisions on the publication of treaties and other international obligations are laid down by an Act.

Reflecting the multilevel setting and the status of the citizens as citizens of the Union as well, Sect. 14(2) on participatory rights now states:

Every Finnish citizen and every other citizen of the European Union resident in Finland, having attained eighteen years of age, has the right to vote in the European Parliamentary elections, as provided by an Act.

Considering the changes in the Constitution which had resulted from membership in the EU but which did not mention this context in the text, Sect. 9(3) on the freedom of movement was amended in 2007 after it had previously been altered through an exceptive enactment when the European Arrest Warrant was brought into force in Finland (see Sect. 2.3).¹⁸

Furthermore, EU law also shaped the reform of the domestic system for the protection of fundamental rights in the mid-1990s. At the time, a relatively widespread concern was that EU membership might somehow dilute the domestic standard of rights protection.¹⁹ (See the more detailed discussion in Sect. 2.1.1).

1.2.2 The procedure of constitutional amendment The procedure for constitutional enactments has remained unchanged since the entry into force of the Constitution Act of 1919. Currently, Sect. 73 of the Constitution provides as follows:

A proposal on the enactment, amendment or repeal of the Constitution or on the enactment of a limited derogation of the Constitution shall in the second reading be left in abeyance, by a majority of the votes cast, until the first parliamentary session following parliamentary elections. The proposal shall then, once the Committee has issued its report, be adopted without material alterations in one reading in a plenary session by a decision supported by at least two thirds of the votes cast. However, the proposal may be declared urgent by a decision that has been supported by at least five sixths of the votes cast. In this event, the proposal is not left in abeyance and it can be adopted by a decision supported by at least two thirds of the votes cast.

Thus, the normal constitutional amendment procedure requires leaving the bill in abeyance after an election. This may only be avoided in a case of urgency and if the decision on urgency is supported by at least five-sixths of the votes cast. In normal cases, which are also most frequent in practice, an amendment can be assessed by the electorate due to its being held in abeyance until after the next elections.

However, in this context one has to consider the most peculiar thing in the Finnish legal system, the institution of exceptive enactments. As explained above, ¹⁸ See discussion in Ojanen 2006, pp. 89–100, and from the point of view of amending the Constitution, Salminen 2010b, pp. 161–177, and Viljanen 2009, pp. 57–88.

¹⁹ See for example discussion in Ojanen 2004, pp. 541–544.

the institution has its roots in the era when Finland was a Grand Duchy in the Russian Empire. While the Finns, in the legal positivist spirit, urged the Russians to abide by Finland's constitutional enactments that originated in the period of Swedish rule, there was an acute need for modern legislation, and the institution of exceptive enactments was invented to circumvent deadlocks in situations where there was no wish to amend the Constitution formally. Basically, an exceptive enactment enables the adoption of legislation that in substance conflicts with the Constitution without amending the text thereof, subject to the proviso that such legislation be approved in accordance with the procedure for constitutional enactments. A 'hole' in the Constitution is made by an exceptive enactment and filled with the relevant norms of the exceptive enactment. In recent decades, the institution of exceptive enactments has often been used for the purpose of bringing international treaties that conflict with the Constitution into force. Exceptive enactments relating to international treaties can also be enacted through a less arduous procedure than other exceptive enactments, as a two-thirds majority of the votes cast in Parliament suffices for bringing into force international obligations that conflict with the Constitution. By contrast, exceptive enactments in purely domestic matters are enacted through a procedure for constitutional enactments that requires that the bill be left in abeyance until after an election, provided that the bill is not declared urgent by a decision made by at least five-sixths of the votes cast. In addition, the bill must be adopted by a decision supported by at least two-thirds of the votes cast (Sect. 73 of the current Constitution).²⁰

1.2.3 The background to EU amendments As an example of the exceptive amendments, the 1994 Treaty of Accession of Finland to the EU was deemed to be in conflict with the Constitution, mainly because of incompatibility between Finland's sovereignty and the transfer of powers to the EU. However, instead of amending the Constitution, the Treaty of Accession was incorporated into Finnish law through an exceptive enactment approved by a two-thirds majority in Parliament. The same procedure was applied to incorporate the Treaty of Amsterdam, the Constitutional Treaty and the Lisbon Treaty into Finnish law. As the Nice Treaty was not considered to be in conflict with the Constitution, its incorporation was approved by simple majority.

When the Constitution of 2000 was enacted, there was not enough political will to express EU membership in the text of the Constitution in a clearer manner at that stage. This minimalistic approach was probably also a result of Finland not having been a Member State for a longer period. Additionally, in the context of incorporating the treaties into the Finnish legal system, the institution of exceptive enactments was considered a useful procedure. However, the first steps in the waning of this particular institution were taken already at this stage. Limitations to the usage of exceptive enactments were enacted and developed in legal research in particular.²¹ Contrary to the previous situation, in discussions surrounding the recent ²⁰ See generally Ojanen 2013, pp. 104–106, and Suksi 2011, pp. 101–105.

²¹ See especially Viljanen 1999.

amendment, emphasis was put on the correctness of the Constitution. It was underlined that the Constitution should in principle give a clear and accurate picture of the constitutional reality. If a great amount of public power that is relevant to Finland and in Finland, both with regard to state organs and individuals, is exercised in the context of the EU, this should be reflected in the text of the Constitution as well. There was a need to be more transparent and open on this question. The Constitution might otherwise risk losing its relevance as lex fundamentalis.²²

The reform of 2012 included several EU motivated issues. Most importantly, a new procedure for transfers of power was introduced. This was from the beginning built on the dynamic idea of transferring powers and also explicitly mentioning the EU in this provision, because the majority of transferred powers relate to membership in the Union. As usual in Finland, when amending the Constitution, the changes were explained as being mostly a codification of the state practice and interpretations that already existed. Thus, the amendments were motivated mainly by a desire to make EU membership visible in the text of the Constitution. The idea not the change the fundamentals of the membership was underlined. Nevertheless, the new procedure for the transfer of powers to the EU in principle signified a very important change in the very elementary features of membership.²³ Additionally, the explicit mention of Union membership among the fundamentals of the Finnish Constitution in its first Chapter clearly shows commitment towards Union membership and binds the Finnish Constitution with European integration.

The recent reforms were greatly supported by legal scholars, and the advice of scholars was followed.²⁴

1.2.4 Although there are some inconsistencies in the Constitution now that EU affairs have been placed among international affairs in the system of the Constitution, there are currently no calls for amending the Constitution because of any issue relating to membership in the EU.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The new provisions of the Constitution of Finland explicitly provide that a significant transfer of state powers to the EU or an international organisation requires a two-thirds majority of votes cast in Parliament (Sect. 94(2) and Sect. 95 (2)). This also means that transfers of ‘insignificant’ powers can be decided by simple majority. Whereas Union membership was brought into force internally by the use of the institution of exceptive enactments that allows for the adoption of ²² See Salminen 2010b, pp. 161–177.

²³ See Salminen 2015.

²⁴ See for example the articles Salminen 2010a, b and Salminen 2009, pp. 269–283 and compare with the amendments. The result seems to follow the suggested lines of the revision.

legislation that conflicts with the Constitution and thus places membership principally outside the Constitution as a conflicting phenomenon, the current Constitution expresses a constitutional commitment towards the Union and provides a specific provision for the transfer of powers to the Union. Now, the Constitution recognises transfers of powers and, additionally, only a significant transfer of powers to the EU requires a qualified majority; the application of the institution of exceptive enactments is no longer needed for such transfer. As such, the idea of the provision is clearly based on a transfer, not on a limitation of state powers. The amendment shows a dynamic – instead of static – understanding of the integration norm of the Finnish Constitution. In the interpretation of a possible transfer, one has to also take into consideration that Finland is already a member of the EU, which is part of the fundamental organisation of Finland according to the Constitution as well (Sect. 1(3)).²⁵

Neither the incorporation Act of the Accession Treaty nor the Constitution contain any provisions on the domestic effects and status of EU law within the Finnish legal system. Nevertheless, the travaux préparatoires reflect the idea of their status and effects according to the view of the EU. The standard understanding is that EU law enjoys legal effects and status as prescribed by EU law and interpreted by the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU). Nevertheless, this opinion is not straightforward, and opinions vary when it comes to possible collisions in the constitutional sphere.²⁶ Thus, the issue is much more nuanced. The situation has now also been modified by the recent amendments, and it is evident that they show a clearer constitutional commitment towards EU membership and various obligations stemming from it. In the national implementation of EU legislation, the constitutional requirement that the domestic standard of protection of constitutional and human rights not be compromised has on some occasions limited the implementation of EU law. However, in some cases, the practice has been more adaptive and flexible.²⁷ It has been noted that the Finnish system, which gives Parliament and its Constitutional Law Committee the opportunity to take part in the preparation of national positions on proposals for EU secondary legislation, allows them to express opinions to guide the Government and avoid possible conflicts prior to the adoption of a final EU legislative act.

1.3.2 For Finland, it is certainly fair to say ‘that an older interpretation of absolute sovereignty has been replaced by a modern, revised approach’ (cf. the Questionnaire) during EU membership. The concept has gone through a remarkable change. Whereas every international obligation prior to EU membership was considered to be in grave conflict with the Constitution – like EU membership itself as it was considered to affect Finnish sovereignty – today, the understanding of the concept has developed to mean that being a member in this kind of arrangement is a use of sovereignty. Thus, the construction of the constitutional concept of ²⁵ Salminen 2015.

²⁶ See discussion in Heinonen 2012.

²⁷ See especially Ojanen 2009c, pp. 129–174, Ojanen 2003 and Ojanen 2004, p. 542.

sovereignty is very different, to say the least. The sovereignty of Finland is qualified by the international obligations binding on Finland. Among them, membership in the EU has special status.²⁸

1.3.3 With the entry into force of the Constitution of 2000, formulations which had first appeared in legal research and in the practice of the Constitutional Law Committee found their way into the Constitution and its travaux préparatoires. In the travaux, the EU was accorded special status, which was soon also recognised in the practice of the Constitutional Law Committee, and thus there is far greater tolerance for limitations on sovereignty stemming from membership in the EU than those arising from international obligations. The openness towards the EU has been further modified by the latest amendments of 2012, which clearly underline the commitment towards European integration.²⁹ There are, however, some counter-tendencies in the constitutional practice. The recent events and legal implications of the crisis of the monetary and economic union have once again raised some concerns about sovereignty. In this context, the Finnish position that unanimous decision-making protects Finnish sovereignty and especially the budgetary powers of Parliament can be understood as a sign that changes in attitudes towards integration are not yet consistent.³⁰

Prior to the Constitution of 2000, the constitutional acts did not include any explicit limits to the use of exceptive enactments. The Constitution of 2000 introduced limitations to the use of exceptive enactments and to acceptance of international obligations. According to Sect. 73 of the Constitution, a derogation made by an exceptive enactment to the Constitution has to be limited in nature. Additionally, another possible limitation was introduced, since according to Sect. 94(3), an international obligation shall not endanger the democratic foundations of the Constitution. Both of these requirements were interpreted in the context of the Constitutional Treaty and the Lisbon Treaty.³¹ Because of the recent changes, the transfers of powers no longer have the status of exceptive enactments, and the limitations enacted for the use of exceptive enactments are no longer applicable. Nevertheless, the requirement of Sect. 94(3) of the Constitution is still applicable as it concerns international obligations as such. The issue of democratic foundations has not really been developed in the constitutional practice of the Constitutional Law Committee: this is because there have not, obviously, been any situations in which there has been a need for this. However, when the Constitutional Treaty was ²⁸ For an extensive recent analysis of the change in the concept of sovereignty in Finnish constitutional law and doctrine see Mutanen 2015 who concludes that Finland has moved from a ‘sovereignist to a non-sovereignist Constitution’ (p. 359); the sovereignty provisions, read together with the amendments, have acquired a new meaning and have led to a more integration-friendly understanding in the Finnish legal discourse. See especially Ojanen 2004 and Salminen 2004.

²⁹ Salminen 2015.

³⁰ See discussion in Leino and Salminen 2013.

³¹ Opinions 13/2008 (on the Treaty of Lisbon) and 36/2006 (on the Constitutional Treaty) of the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament (hereinafter Constitutional Law Committee).

incorporated into Finnish Law, this Section was referred to upon consideration of whether the Union, based on the Constitutional Treaty, would endanger the democratic foundations of the Constitution.³² In so doing, special emphasis was put on the reforms which were put in effect later by the Lisbon Treaty.

No particular field of state powers nor any fields of legislation are excluded from a possible transfer of powers. However, any transfer of powers based on an international obligation shall, according to Sect. 94(3), not endanger the democratic foundations of the Constitution. This could be considered as a limit to or at least as a condition for such a transfer.

1.3.4 The Finnish Supreme Courts – both the Supreme Court and the Supreme Administrative Court – apply EU law, and accept both direct effect and primacy per se. However, not many cases have been reported in which the courts have set aside Finnish legislation or a conflict has been identified where EU law was of relevance. In particular, there are no reports concerning cases where EU law has allegedly been in conflict with the very fundamental questions of Finnish fundamental rights. In addition, it seems that the Finnish courts are not very active in making references to the CJEU either. These features might have many explanations. However, the primary explanation is not that there is resistance to EU law as such. There might be a tendency to resolve any possible prima facie conflict by interpretation via an EU-friendly interpretation, for which at least the Finnish Constitution now provides many possible legal arguments. The fact that the courts have never made a reference to the CJEU concerning the validity of EU secondary law might, however, be based in the Finnish constitutional culture, for which the possibility to question the validity of a legislative act on the basis of a constitutional argument is a relatively new phenomenon.

Noteworthy in the Finnish context is, of course, that the Constitutional Law Committee has stated that the domestic implementation of directives and other EU instruments cannot weaken the domestic standard of rights protection.³³ Typically, this has not proved to be a problem at all. Since EU measures that regulate the rights and obligations of individuals or are otherwise of a legislative nature within the meaning of the Finnish Constitution must be implemented by Acts of Parliament in accordance with the same procedure as for domestic legislative enactments, the Constitutional Law Committee may also review the constitutionality of domestic implementing enactments of EU measures. The implementation of EU measures should conform to the requirements originating in the domestic system for the protection of constitutional and human rights. This is, of course, a bold statement, and implementation seems to be rather flexible; there are many ways to adapt and conform with the requirements of European law. The obvious tendency seems to be towards a fusion of the various regimes and their requirements. As EU proposals for legislation may be reviewed by the Constitutional Law Committee, potential problems can be addressed before the relevant national legislation is passed.

³² Opinion 36/2006 (on the Constitutional Treaty) of the Constitutional Law Committee.

³³ E.g. Opinion 25/2001 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 Already for membership in the European Economic Area, the constitutional acts were amended so as to provide for the strong participation and information rights of Parliament.

Regarding the procedural requirements, Sect. 96(2) of the Constitution (for the text of the relevant provisions see Sect. 1.2.1) specifies the ways in which the Government must communicate the proposals for EU acts, agreements and other measures without delay in order to determine Parliament's position. In matters that fall within Parliament's competence, its position in practice equals the Finnish position, even if Parliament usually leaves the details to the Government's discretion and limits itself to steering the main political lines. Union proposals are considered by the Parliament's Grand Committee and usually also in one or more of the sub-committees. The Government is obliged to keep the relevant committees updated with information on the negotiations and to keep the Grand Committee informed of its position. Section 97 includes provisions on Parliament's right to receive information on international affairs. It requires the Government to keep the Grand Committee informed through reports on the preparation of EU matters other than those falling under Sect. 96, either upon request or when otherwise necessary. This concerns, for example, the preliminary stages of a decision making process or matters in which the Council does not formally act. Under Sect. 97(2), the Prime Minister is required to provide information on matters on the European Council agenda, both before and after its meetings, and on envisaged amendments to the Treaties. On the basis of the information provided, the committees, including the Constitutional Law Committee, may issue statements to the Government.

There is a widely shared view that the system functions well. Of further relevance here is that the traditional interpretation of Sects. 96 and 97, which have generally been understood to extend beyond matters that formally belong to Union competence to questions that can be considered 'comparable' to Union matters, both as regards their substance and their effects.³⁴ The Constitutional Law Committee has interpreted many measures as matters belonging to Sect. 96 or 97, whether formally taken within the Union framework or not. It has thereby allocated the primary competence in these matters to the Government under Sect. 93(2), equally placing it under a strict obligation to report to Parliament on all matters falling under the competence of the latter.

1.4.2 Finnish constitutional history records only two referendums, of which one was held on the very matter of the accession of Finland to the Union.³⁵ The Finnish Constitution provides for the possibility of a consultative referendum, on which a decision shall be made by an Act of Parliament. Today there is the additional possibility of a citizens' initiative pursuant to Sect. 56 of the Constitution.

³⁴ Viljanen 2003, and Ojanen 2004.

³⁵ The other was the advisory referendum organised in the 1930s post legem on the Prohibition Act that limited the production, sale and consumption of alcoholic beverages.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.3 The recent EU related amendments of the Finnish Constitution were mostly motivated by the desire to improve the openness and transparency of the Constitution. As an argument, the completeness of the Constitution was used in the meaning that the Constitution should give an accurate picture of the constitutionally relevant issues in Finland.³⁶ When the Constitutional Treaty and Lisbon Treaty were incorporated into Finnish law, the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament in particular raised this issue. However, amendment was not constitutionally required. The Committee only advised that there would be reason to consider amending the Constitution both regarding the special provision concerning the transfer of powers and regarding the need to expressly mention the EU.³⁷

In the preparation of the EU related amendments, the most important rationale was the need to take the Constitution seriously and to reflect the shift of power to the supranational level.³⁸ It was motivated by the need for transparency and the requirement of the completeness of the Constitution. Many comparisons were made between various solutions within various Member States, but no clear common denominator was found. There was also some discussion in the Finnish legal literature on this issue.³⁹

When evaluating the current state of the Finnish Constitution and its EU related amendments adopted during Finland's EU membership, there seems to be good reason to consider that the relationship between the EU and Finland and Finland as an integrated state have matured. EU membership and the further constitutionalisation of the EU have not rendered the national constitution useless. The Finnish discourse has found it important to strike a balance between national constitutional law and European constitutional law. The amendments contribute to this balance. While they interconnect the orders, they also clearly open the orders to mutual influence. Opening and constitutionalising EU membership on the national constitutional level does not weaken the Constitution for Finland. On the contrary, it has opened new perspectives and possibilities for reciprocal stabilisation.

³⁶ Salminen 2010a, b.

³⁷ Opinions 13/2008 (on the Treaty of Lisbon) and 36/2006 (on the Constitutional Treaty) of the Constitutional Law Committee.

³⁸ Thus, the guidelines in Claes 2005 and Albi 2005 were followed, as suggested by Salminen 2010a, b.

³⁹ See also Mutanen 2015, pp. 310–323.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 A comprehensive reform of the domestic system for the protection of constitutional rights and human rights entered into force on 1 August 1995. International human rights treaties binding on Finland, with the ECHR at their apex, featured as the main source of inspiration and stimulus for this reform. As a result of the reform, the current fundamental rights catalogue in Chap. 2 of the Constitution of Finland is broad and comprehensive. It sets out a range of economic, social and cultural rights, in addition to traditional civil and political rights. Moreover, there are specific provisions on such rights as everyone's responsibility for the environment and environmental rights (Sect. 20), the right to a fair trial before an independent and impartial court or tribunal within a reasonable time (Sect. 21(1)) and on the right to good administration (Sect. 21(2)). As a rule, fundamental rights are granted to everyone, with an exception being made only with regard to freedom of movement (Sect. 9) and certain electoral rights (Sect. 14).⁴⁰

The domestic standard of protection of fundamental rights is intended to ascend to a high level. The established constitutional doctrine is that international human rights obligations binding on Finland feature as a minimum standard of protection.⁴¹ However, the de facto implementation of this doctrinal premise leaves a lot to be desired in light of critical observations on the situation of human rights in Finland by international treaty bodies. For instance, since the entry into force of the ECHR in 1990, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) has found a violation by Finland in well over 100 judgments.⁴²

Just before Finland joined the EU in 1995, there was concern that EU membership might somehow dilute the domestic standard of fundamental rights protection, particularly in the areas of social rights and good administration. In light of this concern, some provisions of the 1995 Constitutional Rights Reform were deliberately designed to feature as 'constitutional self-defence' against such problematic tendencies that might in the long run arise from EU membership. A reference can be made to a provision on the right of access to information (Sect. 12(2)) and a relatively far-reaching clause in Sect. 19 on the right to social security, guaranteeing social rights to everyone. Some social rights, either by means of the relevant ⁴⁰ See e.g. Scheinin 1996, pp. 257–280. On economic, social and cultural rights under the Finnish Constitution, see Scheinin 2001. A thorough Finnish Constitutional Rights Commentary is provided by Hallberg et al. 2011.

⁴¹ See the preparatory works of the reform of the domestic system for the protection of constitutional rights, such as Government Bill 309/1993 and Report 25 of 1994 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁴² The major problem area has related to Art. 6 of the ECHR, but there are relatively many judgments by the ECtHR finding a violation by Finland of Arts. 8 and 10 of the ECHR.

constitutional provision itself, or by means of Acts of Parliament, have also been guaranteed as subjective rights directly enforceable through the courts.⁴³ Similarly, Sect. 21(2), which guarantees various attributes of the right to good administration, may also be understood as imposing constitutional constraints on the potentially harmful effects of European integration. As will be discussed in more detail below, the domestic standard of protection of constitutional and human rights has occasionally de facto compromised the maximal implementation of certain EU legal measures.

While the current catalogue of constitutional rights is comprehensive insofar as the substantive rights provisions are concerned, the Constitution of Finland is largely, if not exclusively, silent on several important doctrines and principles pertaining to the domestic protection of constitutional and human rights. Hence, one must delve into the practice of the leading authority on constitutional interpretation in Finland, the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament, and the travaux préparatoires of the reform of Constitutional Rights Catalogue in order to get a grip on them. For the present purposes, the following doctrines and principles pertaining to constitutional rights are worthy of elaboration:

- (i) Direct applicability and interpretive effect of constitutional rights. According to the travaux préparatoires of the Reform of Constitutional Rights Catalogue, one of the major aims of the reform was to increase the direct application of constitutional rights by domestic courts and authorities. This aim has also materialised in subsequent domestic court practice, in which courts have not only invoked several provisions on civil and political rights but have also treated several dimensions of social rights as ‘justiciable’. However, the direct applicability of constitutional rights is watered down by what can be called a minimalist approach to constitutional rights and human rights: Finnish courts far too often tend to be satisfied with the minimum standard of protection under the ECHR, as indicated by the existing case law of the ECtHR. This practice already contradicts such a fundamental principle regarding the relationship between constitutional rights and international human rights as is the premise that domestic courts should provide rights protection beyond the threshold where the ECtHR would find a violation of the ECHR.⁴⁴

Moreover, it is firmly established doctrine that courts and authorities should resort to a ‘constitutional rights-oriented’ approach to the interpretation of domestic statutes, in order to avoid conflicts between constitutional rights and domestic legislation, as well as to promote the effective observance of these rights. In everyday court practice the interpretive effect of ⁴³ Finnish courts have treated several dimensions of social rights as ‘justiciable’. See e.g. the following judgments of the Supreme Administrative Court: KHO 2000:36, KHO 2001:35 and KHO 2001:50.

⁴⁴ For minimalist approaches by Finnish courts and authorities regarding constitutional and human rights, see in detail Lavapuro et al., pp. 523 and 524.

constitutional rights is clearly the primary method of giving judicial effect to constitutional rights. As it has been impossible to keep the interpretation of constitutional rights provisions intact and untouched by the influence of international human rights norms, the outcome has also been a human rights-oriented approach to the interpretation of Finnish law, including the Constitution.⁴⁵

- (ii) The semi-constitutional status, direct applicability and interpretive effect of international human rights treaties. The third notable characteristic of the domestic system for the protection of constitutional rights is the convergence of the effects of constitutional rights and international human rights treaties. Aside from providing a major source of inspiration for the concrete formulations of the various material provisions on constitutional rights and the methods of giving legal protection to constitutional rights, human rights treaties binding on Finland assume a semi-constitutional status in the Finnish legal order. This feature originates in several constitutional provisions that make explicit reference both to domestic constitutional rights and to international human rights.⁴⁶

However, aside from producing interpretive effect, the predominant method of implementation of human rights treaties, the method of incorporation through an Act of Parliament, warrants the direct application of human rights by domestic courts and authorities.⁴⁷ As human rights treaties have invariably been incorporated through Acts of Parliament, human rights treaties enjoy firm formal status as Acts of Parliament within the Finnish legal order so that they are in force in Finnish law according to their content in international law, as seen in the light of the case law of their international treaty bodies (and also in in their authentic languages which are decisive in the case of questions of interpretation originating in translation errors or ambiguities).⁴⁸

- (iii) The position of general principles of law in the Constitution. The Constitution of Finland is largely, if not exclusively, silent on such general

⁴⁵ This was established in Opinion 2/1990 of the Constitutional Law Committee. The principle of a human-rights-friendly interpretation was reiterated in the context of the 1995 constitutional rights reform.

⁴⁶ See Scheinin 1996, p. 276.

⁴⁷ See Scheinin 1996, p. 259. Also the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament noted in its Opinion 2/1990 that the method of incorporation entails the direct applicability of human rights treaties by domestic courts and authorities.

⁴⁸ See e.g. Opinion 2/1990 of the Constitutional Law Committee on the direct applicability of the ECHR due to the method of incorporation. For example, the Supreme Court of Finland has explicitly stated that the ECHR and the ICCPR are ‘part of the law of the land’ due to the method of incorporation by an Act of Parliament. See e.g. the decision of the Supreme Court, KKO 1993:19.

principles of law as legal certainty and legitimate expectations. However, both international human rights treaties and EU law have promoted a general awareness among the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament and Finnish courts and authorities of the significance of these principles in the context of cases pertaining to constitutional and human rights and issues of constitutional law in general. Hence, the practice of both the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament and the domestic courts indicates that the principles of legal certainty and legitimate expectations have a firm place in domestic constitutional reasoning, e.g. in the context of cases pertaining to the right to property (Sect. 15) or to the freedom to engage in commercial activity (Sect. 18).⁴⁹

While the general principles of law are generally recognised at the level of constitutional doctrine, the principle of non-retroactivity features as an exception to the rule, to the extent that Sect. 8 of the Constitution explicitly recognises the prohibition of non-retroactivity in criminal cases (see Sect. 2.3.2).⁵⁰ However, the other dimensions of the principle of non-retroactivity have gained a firm foothold in constitutional practice through the Constitutional Law Committee and courts.⁵¹

2.1.2 The criteria for limiting constitutional rights The Constitution of Finland lacks a provision stipulating the conditions under which restrictions can be imposed on constitutional rights. However, it is firmly established constitutional doctrine that all interferences with constitutional rights must be reviewed by the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament or the domestic courts in accordance with the following seven distinct, yet interrelated conditions:

- (i) Limitations must be provided by an Act of Parliament.
- (ii) Legislative provisions on limitations must be sufficiently clear and precise.
- (iii) The essence of a constitutional right cannot be subject to limitations.
- (iv) Limitations must have a legitimate aim that corresponds to the objectives of general interest or the need to protect the fundamental rights of others.
- (v) Limitations must conform to the principle of proportionality, including be necessary for genuinely reaching the legitimate aim.
- (vi) Limitations must be in conformity with human rights obligations binding on Finland.

⁴⁹ See e.g. Opinions 33/2002, 45/2002, 21/2004, 25/2005, 42/2006 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁵⁰ Section 8 of the Constitution, entitled ‘The principle of legality in criminal cases’, provides as follows: ‘No one shall be found guilty of a criminal offence or be sentenced to a punishment on the basis of a deed, which has not been determined punishable by an Act at the time of its commission. The penalty imposed for an offence shall not be more severe than that provided by an Act at the time of commission of the offence.’ (Emphasis added).

⁵¹ See e.g. Opinions 33/1998, 34/1998, 37/1998, 63/2002 and 42/2006 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

- (vii) There must exist adequate legal safeguards (judicial review, the right to appeal, the right to be heard, etc.) regarding interferences with constitutional rights.⁵²

Each condition listed above has an autonomous function to fulfil. As these conditions are cumulative, one failure suffices to result in a conclusion that an interference amounts to a violation of the Constitution. Given all these characteristics, the permissible limitations test under the Constitution of Finland is one of those concrete arrangements that generates both substantive and doctrinal coherence between the ECHR and other human rights treaties, notably the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), as well as the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights. Yet, as international human rights treaties feature as a minimum standard of rights protection, the permissible limitations test under the Constitution of Finland is, at least potentially, more rigorous than e.g. the standard three-partite test under the ECHR. However, it also warrants emphasis that if the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament is of the view that a legislative proposal pending before Parliament fails under the permissible limitations test, it does not declare the legislative proposal invalid or null and void. Instead, the Committee usually proposes modifications to the bill so as to achieve compliance with constitutional and human rights.

2.1.3 The position of the rule of law Up until the entry into force of the Constitution of Finland on 1 March 2000, the principle of the rule of law remained unmentioned in the text of the Constitution. Nevertheless, some important dimensions of the rule of law, such as access to courts (Sect. 21(1)) and the requirement of limitations on constitutional rights ‘being provided by the law’ were recognised either within the text of the Constitution or in constitutional doctrine or practice.

Nowadays, however, the Constitution of Finland explicitly recognises the rule of law, as Sect. 2(3) provides as follows:

The exercise of public powers shall be based on an Act. In all public activity, the law shall be strictly observed.

The systematic location of this provision in Chap. 1 of the Constitution, entitled ‘Fundamental provisions’, also reveals that the rule of law is one of the most fundamental principles of the Constitution, alongside sovereignty, the inviolability of human dignity and the freedom and rights of the individual, justice, democracy, parliamentarism and the separation of powers.

Moreover, such elementary dimensions or attributes of the rule of law as the principle of legality – particularly the requirement that the rights and obligations of individuals be provided by an Act of Parliament – or access to courts are relatively frequently invoked by individuals before domestic courts. Administrative courts in particular have treated the rule of law as justiciable in reviewing the legality of administrative decisions or other measures; several Opinions of the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament in the context of ex ante review of legislative proposals include explicit references to the rule of law principle.⁵³

⁵² See Report 25/1994 of the Constitutional Law Committee, pp. 4–5. For a comprehensive examination of the permissible limitations test under the Constitution, see Viljanen 2001.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 As already noted in Sect. 2.1.1, on the verge of Finnish EU membership in the mid-1990s, there was concern that European integration might dilute the domestic protection of fundamental rights. One of the major reasons for this anxiety was the thinking that such economic market freedoms as the free movement of goods and workers or the freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services in particular constituted the ‘core’ of the EU legal order, whereas the protection of fundamental rights featured only as a dimension of EU law, with the result that economic freedoms tended to have an edge over fundamental rights in cases involving balancing between economic freedoms and fundamental rights.

While these domestic concerns have not been totally groundless, they have nonetheless proved to be exaggerated. The years of EU membership since 1995 have not prompted any widespread or serious concern about the EU excessively prioritising economic liberties over fundamental and human rights. Although the tendency in recent years has been towards the weakening of the welfare state and the lowering of the standard of protection of social rights, it is submitted here that EU law or EU membership in general has not been a major impetus for this tendency.

However, some individual judgments by the CJEU in cases such as Laval and *Viking*⁵⁴ in particular have generated some domestic debate over the appropriate balance between economic freedoms and fundamental rights. However, instead of any straightforward and unanimous view that the balance has tilted too far in the direction of economic freedoms at the expense of fundamental rights, the domestic views regarding these two cases have been relatively polarised, especially among the Finnish economic and political elite. While some have hailed these decisions from a free market perspective, others have criticised them, particularly from a labour law perspective for their interference with the fundamental premises of collective labour law and the industrial relations of states.⁵⁵

In addition, the so-called euro crisis has prompted constitutional concern regarding the effects of the crisis on the appropriate protection of fundamental social rights.⁵⁶

⁵³ See Opinions 21/2009, 67/2010 and 33/2012 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁵⁴ Case C-438-/05 Viking [2007] ECR I-10779; Case C-341/05 Laval [2007] ECR I-11767.

⁵⁵ See e.g. Ojanen 2011, pp. 127–131.

⁵⁶ See Tuori and Tuori 2014.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1–2.3.3 The presumption of innocence, nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, fair trial and in absentia judgments

In Finland, the Constitutional Law Committee reviewed both the proposal for the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant⁵⁷ (EAW)⁵⁸ and its domestic implementing enactment⁵⁹ for compatibility with the Constitution and international human rights obligations binding on Finland. However, the constitutional observations by the Committee revolved around other issues pertaining to the EAW, such as the extradition of Finnish citizens, the rule of double criminality, the extradition of minors, the protection of family life and certain other issues relating to fundamental and human rights. In particular, the extradition of Finnish citizens and the issue of dual criminality warranted constitutional attention by the Committee, simply because Finland at the time in the early 2000s still adhered to the principle of double criminality and the prohibition on extraditing Finnish nationals.⁶⁰

By contrast, the Constitutional Law Committee remained totally silent on the issue of the presumption of innocence within the context of the European Arrest Warrant. Neither have concerns with regard to the presumption of innocence arisen in domestic court proceedings.⁶¹ In fact, any concern over the appropriate observance of the right to a fair trial, including the presumption of innocence, has only been voiced by some individual judicial actors, such as the President of the Supreme Court of Finland, Justice Pauliine Koskelo, in some of her public remarks.

While the abolition of double criminality was one of the issues that warranted the attention of the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament, it should be emphasised that the Committee eventually did not find this issue to be a reason for constitutional concern. Instead, the Committee took the view that the domestic implementing act for the European Arrest Warrant limited the scope of application of the European Arrest Warrant without verification of the double criminality of the ⁵⁷ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁵⁸ Opinion of 42/2001 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁵⁹ Opinion of 18/2003 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁶⁰ Up until 1 October 2007, Sect. 9(3) of the Constitution of Finland provided as follows: ‘Finnish citizens shall not be prevented from entering Finland or deported or extradited or transferred from Finland to another country against their will.’ However, the Constitutional Law Committee (see Opinion 13/2003) regarded the EAW as prompting the need for a constitutional amendment of this constitutional provision on the extradition of Finnish citizens, so as to comply appropriately with Finland’s international obligations and, specifically, obligations under EU law. The amendment entered into force on 1 October 2007 with the result that the extradition of Finnish citizens is no longer absolutely forbidden by the Constitution of Finland.

⁶¹ For constitutional concerns regarding the European Arrest Warrant in Finland, see Ojanen 2009b, pp. 143–156.

acts constituting such offences as could be regarded as sufficiently ‘serious crimes’. In addition, the Committee noted that the offences giving rise to surrender without verification of double criminality were also largely, if not exclusively, serious crimes under domestic law. Finally, the Committee emphasised that the domestic implementing act included grounds for mandatory non-execution that appropriately limited the application of the European Arrest Warrant to what was constitutionally acceptable.

In this context, it warrants emphasis that the bill for the domestic implementing Act of the EAW (the Act on Extradition on the Basis of an Offence between Finland and Other Member States of the European Union, Act No 1286 of 2003, the so-called EU Extradition Act) included additional grounds for mandatory non-execution of an EAW on which the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision is silent. As the Constitutional Law Committee also proposed a number of additional specifications to the domestic implementation act for the EAW in order to ensure the appropriate observance of constitutional and human rights,⁶² the outcome was that the maximal implementation of the EAW Framework Decision made way for the active observance of constitutional and human rights in Finland.⁶³ Furthermore, the Committee of Legal Affairs of Parliament emphasised the need for fundamental and human rights-friendly interpretation and application of the European Arrest Warrant and its domestic implementing act, particularly insofar as such grounds for mandatory refusal under Sect. 5 of the Act on Extradition on the Basis of an Offence between Finland and Other Member States of the European Union (Act No 1286 of 2003) are concerned.⁶⁴ In particular, the necessity of rights-friendly application was emphasised in relation to Sect. 5(6) of the domestic implementing act, essentially requiring, inter alia, that extradition be refused if there is cause to assume that the person requested would be subjected to a violation of his or her human rights or constitutionality protected due process, freedom of speech or freedom of association. In this context, the Legal Affairs Committee explicitly emphasised the interconnections between Sect. 5(6), and such constitutional rights as the right to a fair trial under Sect. 21 of the Constitution. By contrast, however, no domestic constitutional discussion can be found on the issue of in absentia judgments.⁶⁵

Overall, the domestic implementation of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision is one of those cases in which Finland has compromised the ⁶² See also Opinion 48/2002 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁶³ For the details of the ‘Finnish constitutional challenge’ in the context of the domestic implementation of the EAW Framework Decision, see Ojanen 2009c.

⁶⁴ Report 7/2003 of the Legal Affairs Committee of Parliament.

⁶⁵ The rule under Sect. 28 the Act on Extradition on the Basis of an Offence Between Finland and Other Member States of the European Union (Act No. 1286 of 2003) is clearly the presence of the individual at the proceedings, or at least he or she shall be reserved an opportunity to be heard on the contents of the request. However, Sect. 28(3) provides that if the requested person is absent from the consideration of the matter without a lawful excuse, the question may be examined and decided despite his or her absence. (Emphasis added).

most effective domestic implementation of EU legislation for the sake of fundamental and human rights. Although there may thus be tension or even a conflict between the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision and its domestic implementing act, it deserves notice that Finland was also praised by the UN Human Rights Committee for its practice of trying to appropriately integrate fundamental and human rights into various legislative instruments aimed at countering terrorism in 2004 as follows:

The Committee is pleased to observe the State party's concern to integrate human rights into action to combat terrorism, in part by maintaining an outright ban on extradition, refoulement or expulsion to a country where the individual concerned might be exposed to the death penalty and violations of articles 6 and 7 of the Covenant. (Concluding observations of the Human Rights Committee: Finland. 02/12/2004).⁶⁶

The application of the European Arrest Warrant has already generated relatively voluminous case law by the domestic courts. Up until now, there has been no evidence of any judicial resistance on the part of domestic courts or authorities to apply and enforce the European Arrest Warrant. The Finnish courts have also embraced the effect of the EAW on the interpretation of Finnish law. Overall, the approach of Finnish judicial authorities to the application of the European Arrest Warrant assumes a pragmatic case-by-case approach. Each case is dealt with individually, without expressing any bold and sweeping judicial observations on the European Arrest Warrant and its relationship with Finnish law, including the domestic system for the protection of fundamental and human rights. One looks in vain for any kind of bold and sweeping observations on the 'constitutional aspects' of the EAW.

Indeed, what is still lacking is a 'hard case' inviting a Finnish court to really ponder the application of the European Arrest Framework Decision and its domestic implementing enactment in light of such constitutional and human rights as the nulla poena sine lege rule or fair trial – or the compatibility of the domestic implementing act with the European Arrest Framework Decision for that matter.⁶⁷ Given how the need to adequately safeguard these rights shaped and directed the enactment of the domestic implementing legislation for the EAW, and even to the extent that it is justified to speak about 'the Finnish constitutional challenge to the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision', extremely complicated questions concerning the status and effects of constitutional and human rights in the application of the European Arrest Warrant may sooner or later emerge. This is especially so because the highest constitutional authority of the country, the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament, has also generally emphasised that ⁶⁶ Concluding observations of the Human Rights Committee: Finland. 02/12/2004. CCPR/CO/ 82/FIN. (Concluding Observations/Comments), para. 4.

⁶⁷ On 25 February 2010, a reference for a preliminary ruling from the Supreme Court of Finland was lodged before the CJEU in Case C-105/10 PPU Gataev and Gataeva [2010] ECLI:EU:C:2010:176. The reference included a number of questions directly or indirectly aimed at finding out whether the domestic implementing enactment was in harmony with the Council Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant. However, the reference was subsequently withdrawn due to the cancellation of the arrest warrant.

the domestic implementation of EU legislation is not permitted to weaken the domestic standard of protection of constitutional and human rights.⁶⁸

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 In Finland, there has been only little discussion about the practical challenges regarding a trial abroad. However, when reviewing the proposal for the domestic implementing act for the Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant, the Legal Affairs Committee of Parliament briefly emphasised the importance of ensuring that in each and every case appropriate legal aid and assistance is provided to the extradited individual. Hence, the Committee emphasised that Finnish authorities should occasionally take advantage of the possibilities under the Legal Aid Act (Act No 257 of 2002) even if the starting point is that the Member State requesting the extradition of the individual is primarily responsible for providing legal aid and assistance.⁶⁹

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.2–2.3.5.4 Beyond what was already noted about the domestic constitutional discussion surrounding the European Arrest Warrant, the principle of mutual recognition has not been a matter of constitutional concern in Finland.

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

There has been constitutional concern in Finland that the domestic implementation of EU criminal law may erode such fundamental constituents of the principle of legality as those originating in ‘the quality of law’. After all, the principle of legality is not just confined to prohibiting the retrospective application of criminal law. In addition, this principle embodies the fundamental principle that an offence must be clearly defined in law. This condition is essentially satisfied where the wording of the relevant provision indicates what acts and omissions will give rise to the individual’s criminal liability. However, it warrants emphasis that this constitutional concern over the erosion of the ‘quality of law’ standard has not related to the domestic implementation of EU criminal law. Instead, there has been a general constitutional concern that the domestic transposition of EU law has diluted the ‘quality of law’, particularly insofar as the law constitutes an interference with fundamental rights. In such situations, the permissible limitations test under the Finnish constitution requires that legislative provisions on limitations must be sufficiently clear and precise.

Against this background, the Constitutional Law Committee has emphasised that the domestic implementation of EU measures is not permitted to weaken the quality of law standard.⁷⁰ In addition, it has on several occasions emphasised the importance of taking the quality of law standard into account when implementing EU criminal law at the level of domestic legislation. In particular, the Committee has a very negative attitude to criminalisation 'in blanco', so that the implementing act only mechanically states that the provisions of the EU measure in question 'are in force' domestically.⁷¹

⁶⁸ Opinion 23/2001 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁶⁹ Report 7/2003 of the Legal Affairs Committee.

⁷⁰ See e.g. Opinion 9/2004 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

From this premise, the Committee has emphasised that the appropriate method of implementing EU criminal law is transformation, i.e. enacting domestic criminal law in harmony with the EU measure in question.

By contrast, the Committee has been very critical towards using the method of incorporation so that the incorporating act simply states that the provisions of a certain EU measure 'are in force' domestically.⁷² Similarly, the Committee has been reserved regarding reference as a method of implementing EU criminal law. This method involves clauses in domestic legislation stipulating that a certain EU measure must be taken into account in the application of the domestic legislation in question. It deserves emphasis that these constitutional reservations by the Constitutional Law Committee regarding the use of methods of incorporation and reference also apply regarding the implementation of EU law in general, although they have become emphasised in the context of EU criminal law.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 In Finland, the implementation of the EU Data Retention Directive⁷³ in 2008 was not seen as posing a major constitutional problem. While the Constitutional Law Committee regarded the domestic implementing enactment as constituting an interference with the right to private life and the protection of personal data under Sect. 10 of the Constitution and, accordingly, considered whether such interference was justified under the permissible limitations test of the Finnish Constitution, the Committee ended up taking the view that the domestic implementing enactment passed the permissible limitations test.⁷⁴ Hence, the Committee regarded the Act as being in harmony with the Constitution. The primary reason for this outcome was simply that the directive 'only' regulated the obligations of the service providers to retain such communications data as location data and traffic data. By contrast, the directive did not regulate access to such data by the competent authorities of the ⁷¹ See e.g. Opinions 9/2007, 53/2006, 40/2002, 31/2002, 6/2002, 45/2001 and 5/1998 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁷² The Committee adopted this view already during the very first years of EU membership. See e.g. Opinion 20/1997 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁷³ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁷⁴ See Opinion 3/2008 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

Member States for law enforcement purposes. Moreover, the Directive explicitly provided that no data revealing the content of the communication may be retained. In Finland, these characteristics of the Directive combined to make the outcome that the directive left enough leeway for the domestic legislator to take requirements stemming from constitutional rights and human rights appropriately into account in the implementation of the directive. Put differently, it can be said that Finland took advantage of the margin of discretion left by the directive in a constitutional rights-friendly way, by specifying the conditions for access to data and the length of retention in domestic law much more narrowly than in the directive. Finally, it is to be emphasised that the scope of mandatory data retention was limited only to such data that the providers of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks were nonetheless generating or processing for their own commercial purposes.

Originally, the data retention directive was implemented by means of an amendment (Act No. 343 of 2008) of the Act on the Protection of Privacy in Electronic Communications (Act No. 516/2004) that was intended to ensure confidentiality and protection of privacy in electronic communications. This Act implemented Directive 2002/58/EC of 12 July 2002 of the European Parliament and of the Council concerning the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector.⁷⁵

Just recently, Finnish legislation in the area of electronic communications was subject to a very comprehensive reform, as the New Information Society Code (Act No. 917/2014) entered into force on 1 January 2015. This Code compiles all domestic legislative provisions on electronic communications, including the provisions on data retention. The Code also updates domestic legislation in areas such as e-privacy, consumer protection, communications networks and data security, and collects the formerly fragmentary legislative regime under one umbrella.

Originally, the proposal for the Information Code actually included more extensive provisions on mandatory data retention than were previously required by the Act on the Protection of Privacy in Electronic Communications; the new Code would have enabled retention of data collected in the context of browsing websites, for example.

However, when the bill concerning the New Information Society Code was pending before Parliament in spring 2014, the CJEU gave its judgment in the Digital Rights Ireland case.⁷⁶ The judgment significantly affected the parliamentary deliberations on the bill.

In April 2014, the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament gave its Opinion on the proposed legislation in light of the Constitution of Finland and the CJEU's ruling.⁷⁷ In its Opinion, the Committee⁷⁸ discussed the judgment by the CJEU in the Digital Rights Ireland case at length when reviewing the Government Bill (No. 221/2013) for the Information Society Code to the extent that the bill included provisions on data retention. Although the Constitutional Law Committee did not take the view that the judgment of the CJEU would prevent the adoption of new domestic legislation on mandatory data retention, the Committee nonetheless required some significant specifications to the proposal so as to achieve compliance with the Finnish Constitution and the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, as seen in the light of the CJEU's judgment. The following points are worthy of elaboration for the present purposes:

⁷⁵ [2002] OJ L 201/37.

⁷⁶ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

1. The Constitutional Law Committee took the view that the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, as interpreted by the CJEU in Digital Rights Ireland, still applies in this area despite the invalidity of the Data Retention Directive. Hence, the Finnish legislator was bound to take the Charter into account alongside the Constitution even though the Data Retention Directive was invalid ex tunc. The Committee apparently took the applicability of the Charter for granted since its opinion does not include any specific reasoning as to why the Charter still applies despite the invalidity of the Data Retention Directive ex tunc.
2. The Committee required the removal of all explicit references in the proposed legislation to the Data Retention Directive. It also demanded some other modifications to the bill, so as to comply with the requirements stemming from the right to privacy and the protection of personal data under Sect. 10 of the Finnish Constitution and the EU Charter, essentially requiring that data be retained only when strictly necessary for investigation, detection and prosecution in relation to a serious crime.
3. The Committee noted that its own well-established doctrine regarding the constitutional protection of 'metadata' (information about parties and about messages being sent and delivered between them) should be revised. Earlier, the constitutional doctrine had been that the processing of metadata was invariably seen as falling within such 'peripheral areas' of privacy and data protection where relatively wide-ranging limitations were permissible because the legislator was understood to enjoy a wide margin of discretion. Conversely, the intensity of constitutional review by the Committee of legislative provisions involving the processing of metadata had been 'low'. Now, however, the Committee took the view that the distinction between the content of electronic communications and such metadata as location data and traffic data could no longer be treated as a determining factor for the assessment of the level of fundamental rights intrusions. As a combination of various forms of metadata can reveal a lot of confidential and sensitive personal information, constitutional attention should also be given to the assessment of the details of a particular situation, i.e. what types of metadata are at issue and what is their combined effect upon the right to privacy and data protection.

⁷⁷ Opinion 18/2014 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁷⁸ The Constitutional Law Committee submitted its Opinion to the Transport and Communications Committee of Parliament which also discussed at length the provisions on data retention, including the judgment by the CJEU. Also, the Administration Committee (Opinion of 9/2014) gave its Opinion on the bill, including observations on data retention.

4. The Committee concluded that the proposed legislation did not include the flaws that jointly triggered the invalidity of the Data Retention Directive in the CJEU's judgment.
5. The Information Society Code with its provisions on mandatory data retention entered into force on 1 January 2015. According to the revised Sect. 157 of the Information Society Code, telecommunications companies, which are to be specified by a decision of the Ministry of the Interior (sisäministeriö), must retain location and traffic data as follows: (1) 12 months for data from a mobile network-based telephone or SMS-service; (2) 6 months for data from an internet-based telephone service, and (3) 9 months for data from an internet connection service. The retained data may only be used in the investigation and prosecution of the serious crimes stipulated in Chap. 10 Sect. 6(2) of the Coercive Measures Act (Pakkokeinolaki, Act No. 806/2011).

Hence, the period of retention is limited to 12 months at the most, and only data necessary for the purpose of preventing or investigating relatively serious crimes can be retained. Finnish law also seeks to make at least some distinctions between the categories of data on the basis of their possible usefulness for the purposes of the prevention, detection or prosecution of serious crimes.

Also, authorisation by a court is invariably necessary for each request for access to retained data, i.e. access is always dependent on a prior review carried out by a court, as required by the CJEU. Furthermore, unlike in the Directive, Finnish law includes relatively strict conditions on access to and exchange of retained data, including by specifying the national authorities that may be granted access to data to be retained. Finally, Finnish law provides for safeguards relating to the security and protection of data retained by private providers of electronic communications.

In conclusion, Finnish law seems to meet at least several of the requirements set out by the CJEU for mandatory data retention quite well although there is certainly room for arguing that the scope of application of retention should still be more limited in order to curtail the legislative framework on mandatory data retention to what is 'strictly necessary' as the CJEU required in its judgment.

Finally, it deserves emphasis that the judgment by the CJEU exemplifies how the case law of the EU Court of Justice can make a positive contribution to the evolution of domestic constitutional law in the area of fundamental rights protection. Indeed, the impact of EU membership on the domestic system for the protection of fundamental and human rights has often been positive, rather than harmful, in the context of several constitutional rights in Finland. Examples of the positive effects of EU membership abound, but the most noteworthy are perhaps those positive effects of EU membership that pertain to the constitutional protection of non-discrimination and equality.

2.5 Unpublished Or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 In Finland, the constitutionality of unpublished or secret measures has not been raised as an issue. However, it may be added that generally the Constitution prohibits the existence of any ‘secret’ or ‘unpublished’ legislation. To begin with, Sect. 79 of the Constitution, entitled ‘Publication and entry into force of Acts’, explicitly requires that the Government shall ‘without delay’ publish an Act in the Statutes of Finland after signature by the President of the Republic (Sect. 2). Moreover, subsection 4 of the same provision unequivocally requires that all Acts ‘are enacted and published in Finnish and Swedish’ that enjoy the status of ‘national languages of Finland’ in accordance with Sect. 17(1), of the Constitution.⁷⁹ Hence, it can be said that the validity of the law does not only depend on its publication per se but on its enactment and publication in both Finnish and Swedish. Finally, it also follows from the rule of law principle and the permissible limitations test for interferences with constitutional rights that each and every piece of legislation must be accessible and published, especially insofar as that legislation includes provisions on the exercise of public powers or the rights and obligations of individuals or other private parties.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 In Finland, EU law has not directly affected the standard of protection of constitutional rights in the area of property rights. However, it can be noted on a general level that, as with the ECHR, EU law has contributed to a general inclination towards a model of constitutional reasoning in which general principles, inductive reasoning, precedents and case law make up the methods and body of both human rights law and rights constitutionalism. Namely, the traditional Finnish approach was characterised by a very formal, rule-focused reasoning that basically reflected the idea that the legislature has the competence to define the actual content of constitutional rights and that judicial powers must be exercised in this pre-legislated and judicially self-restrained framework. However, both international human rights law and EU law have emerged as one of the major reasons underpinning the transformation in the Finnish constitutional and human rights culture in which reasoning based on such principles as legal certainty, non-retroactivity and proportionality have assumed greater significance in constitutional reasoning.⁸⁰

⁷⁹ Aside from providing explicitly that Finnish and Swedish are the national languages of Finland, Sect. 17(2), guarantees the right of everyone to use his or her own language, either Finnish or Swedish, before courts of law and other authorities, and to receive official documents in that language. Moreover, the public authorities are obliged to provide ‘for the cultural and societal needs of the Finnish-speaking and Swedish-speaking populations of the country on an equal basis’.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 The constitutionality of euro crisis measures, among them the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty), has been discussed widely in Finland, both during the negotiation of the various crisis measures – be they international treaties or EU secondary law measures – as well as during the time of approving the measures at national level.⁸¹ Ultimately, Parliament has approved all the new agreements and brought them into force nationally, and has given the Government a mandate to approve the Union measures. The Constitutional Law Committee has taken a rather active role in evaluating these measures.⁸²

Already during negotiations, the draft ESM Treaty was addressed by Parliament under Sect. 96 specifically due to its effects on state finances. In the process of approving the Treaty, it was not considered to result in such a transfer of competence that would have to be considered significant (Sects. 94(2) and 95(2), of the Constitution). The Treaty was accepted in Parliament and brought into force nationally in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure pertaining to an Act of Parliament.

The drafts of the ESM Treaty were scrutinised ex ante by Parliament and its Constitutional Law Committee before the treaty was submitted to the Parliament for final approval. The Constitutional Law Committee had established that the treaty impinged upon the legislative and budgetary powers of Parliament and thus approval by the latter was required. In some matters the Committee considered unanimous decision making in the stability mechanisms to be a precondition for compatibility with Finnish sovereignty and the Constitution. In particular, the emergency decision making procedure and the scope of decision making by qualified majority in the ESM Board of Governors provoked constitutionality issues. In the ex ante review, it seemed that the financial liabilities of Finland could also be increased by a qualified majority decision of the Board of Governors above the maximum limit defined in the Treaty, even if Finland opposed such a decision. This possibility was considered to affect national sovereignty and the budgetary competence of the Finnish Parliament, and led to demands to specify the agreement in this respect.⁸³ The Finnish constitutional demands were understood during the ⁸⁰ For these effects of European integration on the Finnish legal culture, see e.g. Ojanen 2009a.

⁸¹ See for example Leino and Salminen 2013, and Tuori and Tuori 2014.

⁸² See the numerous Opinions of the Committee listed in Leino and Salminen 2013.

⁸³ Opinions 25/2011, 22/2011, 1/2011 and 13/2012 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

negotiations on the European level, and the unanimity requirement was introduced into the Treaty.

According to the previously adopted interpretation, when considering the Treaty, the Constitutional Law Committee assessed the amount of Finnish capital investment in the European Stability Mechanism (ESM) and the related risks against the so-called Constitution-based obligations of the state.⁸⁴ It required that all the financial liabilities and investments in the various parallel mechanisms be calculated in order to get a clearer picture of the liabilities. In order to establish the applicable procedure for the approval and bringing into force of the Treaty, the Committee considered the total amount of public debt and the risks of the investment. In the ESM, the Finnish part of the paid-in capital (1.4 billion EUR) and on demand callable capital (11 billion EUR) was found to be extensive when compared for example with the annual state budget. The annual state budget is approximately 54 billion EUR (2015). The paid capital is under 1% of the annual GDP, and the maximum is about 5% of the GDP.

Of major importance for the evaluation of the state's current liabilities and whether these might possibly compromise the ability of the state to take responsibility for its constitutional duties was the interpretation that Parliament has the possibility to genuinely control and influence the Finnish member of the ESM Board of Governors, where for example decisions on the capital payments are made unanimously. Through these interpretations of its participation and information rights, Parliament is now involved in the functioning of the mechanisms. Parliament has based the requirement concerning its participation in national decision making on Sects. 96 and 97 of the Constitution. The Finnish Parliament has considered that, for example, decisions relating to the granting of loans are as to their nature and their financial implications considered to be so significant that they require the provision of relevant information by the Government prior to decision making within the ESM in order to safeguard the prerogatives of the Parliament. It has even required that these constitutional requirements for the participation of Parliament through the national representative be reflected in the decision making rules, arrangements and practices within the ESM.⁸⁵

2.7.2 When the elements of the Banking Union were discussed for the first time in the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament in the ex ante review of the proposals, the Committee took a rather dubious, perhaps even a somewhat suspicious position towards the competence of the Union, and some elements in the international treaty (Agreement on the transfer and mutualisation of contributions to the Single Resolution Fund) that were planned in this context were evaluated as to whether they possibly contained constitutionally problematic features.⁸⁶ When it then later reviewed the national implementing legislation and the same legislation

⁸⁴ See Opinions 13/2012 and concerning the European Financial Security Facility and the Framework Agreement Opinion 5/2011 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁸⁵ Opinion 13/2012 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁸⁶ Opinion 28/2013 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

package contained the approval of an international agreement between the Member States and its incorporation into national law, no such problems were raised. While the legislation was carefully evaluated, it was not, however, deemed to cause problems which would have affected the relevant procedure. The international agreement was approved as it was not considered to result in a transfer of competence that would need to be considered significant (Sects. 94(2) and 95(2) of the Constitution), and it was accepted in Parliament and brought into force nationally in accordance with the ordinary legislative procedure pertaining to an Act of Parliament.⁸⁷

2.7.3 Not applicable. Finland has not been subject to a bailout or austerity programme.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Up until now, Finnish courts have yet to request a preliminary ruling by the CJEU on the validity of an EU measure. The peculiarity of the lack of preliminary ruling requests to the CJEU on the validity of EU measures is emphasised by the fact that the number of cases involving the application of constitutional rights and human rights by the courts has proliferated significantly since the mid-1990s. Furthermore, there have been a number of the specific form of constitutional challenge to the implementation of EU legislation at the legislative phase, as was already noted in the context of the domestic implementation of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision.

It may be added in this context that the total number of references by Finnish courts for a preliminary ruling to the CJEU has remained low. As of the end of 2014, Finnish courts had made 91 references.⁸⁸ Given that Finland joined the EU in 1995, the total number of references is so low that it may evince some sort of judicial ‘resistance’ to or ‘shunning’ of EU law by the Finnish courts.⁸⁹ However, Finnish courts have embraced such fundamental qualities of EU law as direct effect, indirect effect and primacy well, although the cases in which Finnish courts have given primacy to EU law over conflicting national law have remained relatively few in number. Instead, EU law predominantly enters Finnish courts in the form of questions concerning the effect of EU law on the interpretation of Finnish law (the indirect effect of EU law). This approach appears to be of particular importance in cases involving prima facie tension between EU law and national law. In such cases, Finnish courts try to interpret, to the extent possible, national law in harmony with EU law so as to avoid any open conflict. The traditional constitutional doctrine emphasising the subordination of the judiciary to the legislature probably explains the judicial predisposition towards indirect effect, as it involves a similar method as that traditionally endorsed by Finnish courts in situations involving the granting of judicial effect to constitutional and human rights.

⁸⁷ Opinion 25/2014 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁸⁸ It is also significant to note that the Supreme Administrative Court of Finland alone has made 45 references for a preliminary ruling by the CJEU.

⁸⁹ For the application of EU law in Finnish courts, see in more detail Ojanen 2009a, pp. 198–201.

Finally, it is to be noted that the primary authority of constitutional interpretation and review in Finland – the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament – is not considered a court or tribunal that is entitled to make a request for a preliminary ruling by the CJEU. This significantly hampers ex ante review by the Committee of proposals for EU measures or their domestic implementing enactments for their compatibility with the Constitution and human rights treaties, including the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, because such a review often requires a sufficient knowledge of the meaning of EU law. The inability of the Committee to make preliminary ruling references also means that the Committee cannot engage in the same kind of constitutional dialogue with the CJEU as the constitutional courts of other Member States of the EU increasingly tend to have.

2.8.2–2.8.4 It is now submitted that the standard of judicial review by the EU courts cannot, at least in general terms, be considered lower than that applied by Finnish courts. Quite the contrary perhaps: it is to be emphasised that the traditional Finnish position towards judicially protected rights was remarkably ‘distrustful’, and ‘reserved’ until the late 1980s. Although Finland has had a written constitution with a constitutional rights catalogue since 1919 and its human rights treaty ratification record can be considered excellent, constitutional and human rights and the judiciary have assumed a rather marginal significance on the Finnish scene of constitutionalism. Instead, the country’s constitutional system has revolved around such premises as the law as a supreme expression of the people’s will, as well as around ideas about democracy as majority rule.⁹⁰ The fundamental principle of legislative supremacy was intensified by the statutory legal system, as well as by a positivist conception of law.⁹¹ Finally, there was a rigid doctrine prohibiting judicial review of legislation for its compatibility with the Constitution.⁹²

Given these constitutional traditions, there was a lack of any genuine judicial review based on constitutional or human rights in Finland before the 1990s. Instead, the traditional approach was a general inclination towards the idea that the legislature has the competence to define the actual content of rights, and that judicial powers must be exercised in this pre-legislated and judicially self-restrained

⁹⁰ See Nergelius 2006.

⁹¹ A difference can be detected between the Nordic countries in that while Scandinavian realism remains the mainstream philosophy in the other Nordic countries, Finland maintains a more traditional Kantian-Kelsenian normativist perspective of legal positivism. As a historical background to this, reference can be made to the successful legal positivist resistance by the Finnish legal and political elite to campaigns of Russification in the late 19th and early 20th century when Finland was still an autonomous Grand-Duchy within the Russian Empire (until 1917). See also Scheinin 2008.

⁹² See especially Lavapuro et al. 2011.

framework. Indeed, there was hardly any room in the Finnish traditional thinking for a ‘strict’ standard of judicial review.

It now goes almost without saying that EU membership, together with international human rights treaties with the ECHR at their apex, have propelled the strong tendency towards rights-based constitutionalism since the late 1980s, with the outcome that the overall constitutional setting today is characterised by the peculiar combination of ex ante review by the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament and a less traditional but now important ex post review by the courts.⁹³ While there may be some differences between the standard of review by the EU courts and domestic constitutional actors at the level of individual cases, it is submitted here that it is simply impossible to maintain that in general the domestic standard is higher than that applied by the EU courts – or vice versa.

As noted already above, the judgment of the CJEU in the Digital Rights Ireland case warranted the adoption of a new approach by the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament, as the Committee acknowledged that a rigid distinction between ‘content’ and ‘metadata’ (information about the parties and about the messages being sent and delivered between them) can no longer be treated as a decisive and determining factor for the assessment of fundamental rights intrusions due to surveillance (see Sect. 2.4).

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 In Finland, the Constitution unequivocally requires that legal provisions on the exercise of public power, as well as on the rights and obligations of individuals or other private parties, must be laid down by an Act of Parliament. This premise is indicated by a number of constitutional provisions, such as Sect. 80 and Sect. 95 of the Constitution.⁹⁴ It follows that all directives and other EU measures that regulate the rights or duties of individuals and other private parties or that otherwise are of a ‘legislative nature’ must be implemented through an Act of Parliament.

Yet tension can be noted as regards the methods of implementation of EU legislation where the method of incorporation through an Act of Parliament in blanco has been used, instead of the method of transformation which is clearly the most appropriate for the purpose of taking the requirements stemming from constitutional rights and the Constitution in general into account appropriately, as this method entails enacting domestic legislation in harmony with the EU measure in question. The method of incorporation on the other hand simply entails a statement in an Act of Parliament that a certain EU measure is in force domestically. Hence, it invites problems insofar as ‘the quality of law’ is concerned (see also the discussion in Sect. 2.3.6). The same can be said about the third major method of implementation of EU measures – reference, i.e. special clauses in domestic legislative provisions which stipulate that a specified EU measure is to be taken into account in the application of the Act in question. The Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament has on several occasions emphasised that the method of transformation should be preferred in the domestic implementation of EU legislation, especially in cases in which EU legislation affects individual rights or imposes obligations on individuals, or entails interferences with fundamental and human rights.

⁹³ Ojanen 2009a.

⁹⁴ Section 80(1) provides that ‘[t]he principles governing the rights and obligations of individuals and the other matters that under this Constitution are of a legislative nature shall be governed by Acts of Parliament’. Section 95(1), in turn, provides that ‘[t]he provisions of treaties and other international obligations, in so far as they are of a legislative nature, are brought into force by an Act of Parliament.’ Several constitutional provisions on constitutional rights also require that more detailed provisions on those rights be laid down by an Act of Parliament.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1–2.10.2 While there has been some scholarly discussion about the possible significance of the Finnish constitutional traditions, including constitutional identity, within the European context, this topic has yet to figure at the level of domestic constitutional practice, as neither the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament nor the Finnish courts have thus far articulated ‘Finnish constitutional traditions’ in their practice.⁹⁵

However, it should be emphasised that the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament could very well take advantage of arguments originating in domestic constitutional traditions, including domestic constitutional identity, when expressing its views on the constitutionality of proposals for EU measures under Sect. 96 of the Constitution. Similarly, Finnish courts could refer to the long-standing constitutional traditions or idiosyncratic elements of the ‘Finnish constitutional identity’ when requesting a preliminary ruling from the CJEU on the interpretation of EU law or the validity of EU legislation. This has simply yet to be done.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 As already noted, one of the concerns in Finland on the threshold of Finland’s accession to the EU was that EU membership might erode the national standard of protection of fundamental rights. Hence, some solutions of the 1995 Fundamental Rights Reform can be seen as attempts to protect certain constitutional rights against opposite tendencies that EU membership might entail in the long run.⁹⁶ In 2001, the Constitutional Law Committee also went so far as to say that the domestic implementation of EU law was not permitted to weaken the domestic standard of rights protection⁹⁷ – a claim with readily obvious potential for conflict with the primacy of EU law over all conflicting domestic law, especially in light of the judgment by the CJEU in the Melloni case⁹⁸.

⁹⁵ See Salminen 2014.

⁹⁶ See e.g. Ojanen 2007, p. 157.

To date, the Constitutional Law Committee has already issued a myriad of Opinions on either proposals for EU measures or domestic implementing enactments of regulations, directives and other EU instruments in light of the Constitution and human rights obligations binding on Finland. It is possible to identify the following major trends and patterns in the welter of details in these Opinions.

The first major observation to be made is that despite Finnish fears to the contrary, EU membership has not posed any significant threat to domestic fundamental rights. In a clear majority of situations, it has been possible to implement EU law without having to fall short of the appropriate observance of fundamental and human rights. In other words, the constitutional premise that the implementation of EU measures may not weaken the protection of fundamental rights has so far very seldom resulted in the following optimisation dilemma: an effort by the national legislature or some other state organ to ensure the observance of fundamental rights undermines the effective implementation and enforcement of EU law – or vice versa. Indeed, it deserves to be emphasised that EU membership has actually contributed to the protection of fundamental and human rights in Finland in the area of several rights. Perhaps most noteworthy are the positive effects of EU law on the principles of equality and non-discrimination, as well as fundamental environmental rights.

The second major observation is that even if there has occasionally been a prima facie tension between domestic fundamental rights and EU law, the practice of the Constitutional Law Committee suggests an attempt to blunt the edge of any open conflict between domestic fundamental rights and EU law in a variety of ways. To start with, the Committee has avoided the reality of any open conflict by interpreting EU measures in a manner designed to meet the requirements stemming from domestic fundamental rights.⁹⁹ The imprecise and open-ended wording of EU measures has often eased this task. Moreover, the Committee has increasingly taken advantage of the premise that EU law itself generally ensures an effective protection of fundamental rights and, moreover, demands that all areas of the EU legal order must be interpreted in a manner sensitive to EU fundamental rights.¹⁰⁰ Yet another reason for the lack of tension between domestic fundamental rights and EU law has been that the EU measures in question have often assumed the character of minimum standard measures, i.e. they have only established the lowest common denominator in their field of application. Consequently, it has not been contrary to ⁹⁷ Opinion 25/2001 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

⁹⁸ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] EU:C:2013:107.

⁹⁹ Opinion 5/2001 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

¹⁰⁰ See e.g. Opinion 5/2001 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

EU law to grant more extensive protection to domestic fundamental rights under national law.¹⁰¹ Finally, EU acts have most often been directives or framework decisions, which usually allow a broader or stricter margin of discretion for the Member States in their implementation.

Thirdly, it can be noted that there are a few situations involving the implementation of EU law in which the observance of fundamental and human rights has compromised the ‘maximal’ implementation of EU law. Aside from the implementation of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision discussed above, reference can be made to the domestic implementation of the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on combating terrorism.¹⁰² However, these situations have clearly been very rare exceptions to the rule which is simply that EU membership has not brought about any significant erosion of the domestic protection of fundamental and human rights.

Finally, it should be noted that the whole domestic thinking about ‘stricter constitutional standards’ has proved to be more self-sufficient and self-satisfied Finnish thinking than something reflecting the reality of Finnish legal practice. In Finland, the meaning of rights and, accordingly, the standard of protection is still very much dependent on majoritarian notions of democracy, formal notions of legal certainty and other similar factors that combine to cause what can be called a ‘minimalist approach’ to constitutional and human rights. Although the ECHR and other human rights treaties should feature ‘only’ as a minimum standard of rights protection, both the Constitutional Law Committee and the Finnish courts are far too often satisfied with the standard of protection under the ECHR, as indicated by the existing case law of the ECtHR. Hence, the problem is not only ‘a race to the bottom’, i.e. to the lowest common denominator of rights protection, but also the disregard of other human rights treaties beyond the ECHR.¹⁰³

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 In principle, the Finnish system of abstract ex ante constitutional review by the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament provides a good framework for democratic – or, perhaps more to the point, parliamentary – debate on constitutional rights and values in the context of European integration. Up until now, however, the most significant democratic debates on constitutional rights and values or fundamental constitutional principles in general have not taken place within the context of the implementation of the EAW Framework Decision or the EU Data Retention Directive, although there has been some discussion and debate in Parliament and elsewhere in Finnish civil society on these two topics. Instead, the most noteworthy democratic debates have related to the constitutionality of various measures, programmes and other instruments pertaining to the so-called euro crisis. As was already noted above in Sect. 2.7, Finland and particularly its Constitutional Law Committee were actually the forerunners in calling attention to various constitutional questions pertaining to the ESM Treaty and other instruments, and already at the time when these instruments were still at their draft stages.

¹⁰¹ See e.g. Opinions 1/2001 and 11/2001 of the Constitutional Law Committee.

¹⁰² Council Framework Decision 2002/475/JHA of 13 June 2002 on combating terrorism, [2002] OJ L 164/3.

¹⁰³ For a minimalist approach to constitutional and human rights, see especially Lavapuro et al. 2011, especially pp. 518–529.

2.12.2–2.12.3 The authors of this report are of the view that if a certain EU measure has raised serious constitutional questions in a number of constitutional courts or with similar domestic constitutional actors, this might very well warrant the interim suspension of the application of such measure until its validity has been resolved. Similarly, it is at least thinkable that the unconstitutionality of a certain EU measure might feature as a defensive argument in infringement proceedings against a Member State, although the admissibility of this argument would eventually be up to the CJEU to decide in light of the EU legal order as a whole, including the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 The Experts cannot share the concern about an overall reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights and the rule of law in the context of EU law. A reference is made here to what has been observed about the effects of EU membership on the domestic system for the protection of constitutional rights and human rights throughout Part 2 of the report. However, this is not to deny that there have been some situations in which EU law has fallen below the domestic standard of protection. Moreover, the implementation of EU law has sometimes compromised the ‘quality of law’ which is one important dimension of the rule of law principle and fundamental and human rights protection.

Overall, therefore, the reduction of the domestic standard of rights protection and the rule of law principle by EU membership can be described as ‘low’ and ‘limited’.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 The Constitution of Finland does not include any specific rules on international organisations beyond the EU and the general internationalisation clause,

'Finland participates in international co-operation for the protection of peace and human rights and for the development of society' (Sect. 1(3)), as was already noted in Part 1 of this report.

3.1.2 For the background of the above-mentioned internationalisation clause, see Sects. 1.2.1 and 1.5.3.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 As a matter of domestic constitutional law, the hierarchical status of the domestic incorporating Act of an international treaty determines the form and rank of the treaty provisions in the domestic legal order. As international treaties are brought into force domestically either through an Act of Parliament in blanco or through a similar government decree, it follows that the formal status of an international treaty assumes either the hierarchical rank of an Act of Parliament or a government decree. Moreover, the Constitutional Law Committee of Parliament has emphasised that the method of incorporation warrants the direct application of international treaties by the domestic courts and authorities.¹⁰⁴

Insofar as the issue of ratification and implementation of treaties under international law, including the founding treaties of the EU, are concerned, in the Constitution of Finland, the relationship between Finnish law and international law has traditionally been understood as representing the dualist approach. Therefore, no international treaty can be part of Finnish law solely by virtue of its acceptance by Parliament. A distinct domestic legal enactment is also required for the purpose of making any particular international treaty part of the Finnish legal order. The 'dualist approach' is clearly indicated by Sects. 94 and 95 of the Constitution, which distinguish between 'Acceptance of international obligations and their denouncement' (Sect. 94) and 'Bringing into force of international obligations' (Sect. 95). However, as the predominant method of implementing international treaties in Finland is incorporation either through an Act of Parliament in blanco or through a similar government decree, the Finnish constitutional position towards international treaties represents dualism formally, but monism in practice.

It also deserves emphasis that international human rights treaties are a special case among international treaties in the domestic constitutional setting,¹⁰⁵ as they assume what might be called semi-constitutional status. This feature is the outcome of the following four factors: (i) several constitutional provisions explicitly refer to both domestic constitutional rights and international human rights; (ii) the method of incorporation warrants their direct applicability by domestic courts and authorities; (iii) courts and authorities are obliged to interpret all domestic law, including constitutional provisions on constitutional rights in a ‘human rights-oriented’ way; and (iv) the status of international human rights treaties as a minimum standard of domestic rights protection.

¹⁰⁴ See e.g. Opinion 2/1990 of the Constitutional Law Committee on the direct applicability of the ECHR due to the method of incorporation.

¹⁰⁵ See Scheinin 1996, pp. 259–260.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 In the Finnish system, Parliament is involved in the negotiation, acceptance and incorporation of treaties according to the same sets of rules as already explained in Part 1. As to the acceptance and incorporation of treaties, Sect. 94 and Sect. 95 of the Constitution apply. Although the Government has a major role in international affairs alongside the President, depending on the content of the treaty, Parliament has competence to accept and incorporate treaties. In the negotiation phase, Sect. 97 is relevant from the point of view of Parliament and democratic control. It should be noted, however, that Sect. 96 provides Parliament better means for controlling the Government’s actions. Thus, in many cases it is important to discuss whether the international treaty in question, despite having the form of an international treaty, is de facto an EU affair. In practice, the division between Sects. 96 and 97 has become indistinct.

The European Stability Mechanism provides an excellent example of this. This applies to scrutiny beyond its ratification as well. Through the interpretations of participation and information rights, Parliament is involved in the functioning of the mechanism.

3.3.2 Only EU accession has been subject to a referendum. Sometimes, in political discussions, NATO accession is mentioned as one possible case for a referendum. Typically, the legitimacy of this kind of decision is mentioned as the rationale for a referendum. As already mentioned above, the Constitution allows for such referendums, but they are not constitutionally required.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 See Sects. 2.1 and 2.8.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 The Constitution of Finland includes several rights which are a basis for the social welfare dimension of the Constitution, and international human rights treaties also have a role in this aspect.

Nevertheless, the privatisation of public services for example has been rather quick and most certainly affects the welfare dimension of the Constitution. Delegation of public powers has occurred at all levels of the administration, especially at the local level. Section 124 of the Constitution of Finland provides the specific constitutional context for the limitations on privatisation. According to Sect. 124,

[a] public administrative task may be delegated to others than public authorities only by an Act or by virtue of an Act, if this is necessary for the appropriate performance of the task and if basic rights and liberties, legal remedies and other requirements of good governance are not endangered. However, a task involving significant exercise of public powers can only be delegated to public authorities.

In Finland, global governance has not been a major or direct cause of the possible weakening of the welfare state or the erosion of the social elements of the society, rather this has been caused by domestic politics which are of course highly dependent on European and international tendencies.

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 In Finland, there has been some domestic discussion and debate about the possible negative impact of the investment protection regime under the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP), which is currently being negotiated between the European Union and the United States. In essence, the worry has been that the planned investment protection regime could transfer powers from the EU, domestic legislators and other public authorities to an arbitration body with the outcome that this could inhibit Finland from adopting stricter legislative measures in such areas as environmental and consumer protection, social policy and employment. Also, the democratic legitimacy of the planned investment protection regime has come into question.¹⁰⁶

¹⁰⁶ See also Opinion 1/2014 of the Foreign Affairs Committee and Opinion 1/2014 of the Grand Committee where attention is called to the need to secure that the planned investment protection regime would not prevent Finland from adopting new legislation in the areas of consumer protection, environmental protection and employment. The distinguished Finnish legal scholar Professor Martti Koskenniemi has also cautioned in several interviews and public speeches that the free trade pact could allow companies investing in Finland to launch legal action due to restrictions laid out in Finnish legislation. See e.g. (2013, December 15). Professor: Finland's legislative power may be in jeopardy. Helsinki Times. <http://www.helsinkitimes.fi/finland/finland-news/domestic/8717-professor-finland-s-legislative-power-may-be-in>.

References

- Albi A. (2005) EU Enlargement and the Constitutions of Central and Eastern Europe. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Claes M. (2005) Constitutionalizing Europe at its Source: The ‘European Clauses’ in the National Constitutions: Evolution and Typology. Yearbook of European Law, pp. 81–125.
- Hallberg P., Karapuu, H., Ojanen, T., Scheinin, M., Tuori, K., Viljanen, V.-P. (eds.) (2011) Perusoikeudet (Fundamental Rights). Werner Söderström Lakitieto Oy, Helsinki.
- Heinonen T. (2012) Konstitutionaalinen konflikti Suomessa (Constitutional conflict in Finland). In: Heinonen T., Lavapuro J. (eds.) Oikeuskulttuurin eurooppalaistuminen. (The Europeanization of Legal Culture). Suomalainen Lakimiesyhdistys, Helsinki, pp. 201–239.
- Lavapuro, J., Ojanen T., Scheinin M. (2011) Rights-Based Constitutionalism in Finland and the Development of Pluralist Constitutional Review. ICON 9:505–531.
- Leino P., Salminen J. (2013) The Euro Crisis and Its Constitutional Consequences for Finland: Is There Room for National Politics in EU Decision-Making? EuConst 9:451–479.
- Mutanen A. (2015) Towards a Pluralistic Constitutional Understanding of State Sovereignty in the European Union? The Concept, Regulation and Constitutional Practice of Sovereignty in Finland and Certain Other EU Member States. University of Helsinki, Helsinki.
- Nergelius J. (2006) The Nordic States and Continental Europe: A Two-Fold Story. In: Nergelius J. (ed.) Nordic and Other European Constitutional Traditions. Martinus Nijhoff, The Hague, pp. 3–4.
- Ojanen T. (2003) Euroopan unioni ja kotimainen perusoikeusjärjestelmä (The European Union and the domestic system for the protection of fundamental rights). Lakimies 101(7–8):1150 et seq.
- Ojanen T. (2004) The Impact of EU Membership in Finnish Constitutional Law. EPL 10:531–564.
- Ojanen T. (2006) The European Arrest Warrant in Finland. Taking Fundamental and Human Rights Seriously. In: Guild E. (ed.) Constitutional challenges to the European Arrest Warrant. Wolf Legal Publishers, Nijmegen, pp. 89–100.
- Ojanen, T. (2007) The Europeanization of Finnish Law. In: Luif P. (ed.) Österreich, Schweden, Finnland. Zehn Jahre Mitgliedschaft in der Europäischen Union. Böhlau Vienna, pp. 145–178.
- Ojanen T. (2009a) From Constitutional Periphery toward the Center – Transformations of Judicial Review in Finland. Nordisk Tidsskrift for Menneskerettigheter (Nordic Journal of Human Rights) 27:194–207.
- Ojanen T. (2009b) The European Arrest Warrant in the Midnight Sun. The Implementation and Application of the EAW in Finland. In: Guild E., Marin L. (eds.) Still Not Resolved? Constitutional Issues of the European Arrest Warrant. Wolf Legal Publishers, Nijmegen, pp. 143–156.
- Ojanen T. (2009c) Perus- ja ihmisoikeudet EU-säädösten toimeenpanolakien säättämisessä (Fundamental and human rights in the domestic implementation of EU measures). In: Kanninen H., Koskinen H., Rosas A., Sakslin M., Tuori K. (eds.) Puhuri käy: muuttuva suomalainen ja eurooppalainen valtiosääntöemme (Blowing in the wind: the changing Finnish and European constitution). Edita Publishing, Helsinki, pp. 129–174.
- Ojanen T. (2011) EU-oikeuden perusteita (The Foundations of EU-law). Edita Publishing, Helsinki.
- Ojanen T. (2013) Constitutional amendment in Finland. In: Contiades X. (ed.) Engineering Constitutional Change, A Comparative Perspective on Europe, Canada and the USA. Routledge, Abingdon, pp. 93–113.
- Salminen J. (2004) Täysivaltaisuuden rajotuksesta täysivaltaisuuden käyttöön – Havaintoja valtiosääntöisen täysivaltaisuuskäsitksen muutoksesta (From restriction to use of sovereignty: Observations on the change of the sovereignty concept). Lakimies 102(7–8):1318–1339.
- Salminen J. (2009) Toimivallan siirto Euroopan unionille (Transfer of Powers to the European Union). In Juhlajulkaisu Mikael Hidén 1939–7/12–2009. Suomalainen Lakimiesyhdistys, Helsinki, pp. 269–283.

- Salminen J. (2010a) Manifestations of the European Union Membership in the Constitution of Finland in the European Context. Europarättslig tidskrift 13(3):509–527.
- Salminen J. (2010b) Revideringen av grundlagen – beredningen av nödvändiga ändringar i Finlands grundlag (Amending the Constitution – Preparing the Necessary Amendments of the Constitution of Finland). Förvaltningsrättslig tidskrift 73(2):161–177.
- Salminen J. (2014) Den konstitutionella identiteten, förändringen och Finland (Constitutional identity, change and Finland). Retfaerd 37(3):41–63.
- Salminen J. (2015) Yhä läheisempään liittoon? Tutkielmia valtiosäännön integraationormin sisällöstä ja vaikutuksista (Towards an ever closer union? The contents and effects of the constitutional integration clause). Turun yliopisto, Turku.
- Scheinin M. (1996) Finland. In: Scheinin M. (ed.) International Human Rights Norms in the Nordic and Baltic Countries. Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Leiden, pp. 257–280.
- Scheinin M. (2001) Protection of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in Finland – A Rights-Based Variant of the Welfare State? In: Scheinin M. (ed.) Constitutionalism and the Welfare State. Nordic Perspectives. Nordic Council of Ministers, Copenhagen, pp. 245–285.
- Scheinin M. (2002) Constitutional Law and Human Rights. In: Pöyhönen J. (ed.) An Introduction to Finnish Law. Kauppankäari, Helsinki, pp. 31–57.
- Scheinin M. (2008) Constitutionalism and Approaches to Rights in the Nordic Countries. In: Nergelius J. (ed.) Constitutionalism: New Challenges – European Law from a Nordic Perspective. Martinus Nijhoff, Leiden, pp. 135–153.
- Suksi M. (2011) Finland. In: Oliver D., Fusaro C. (eds.) How Constitutions Change: A Comparative Study. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 87–114.
- Tuori K., Tuori K. (2014) The Eurozone Crisis: A Constitutional Analysis. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Viljanen V.-P. (1996) Perusoikeusuudistus ja kansainvälistet ihmisoikeussopimukset (The reform of fundamental rights and international human rights treaties). Lakimies 94(5–6): 792–806.
- Viljanen V.-P. (1999) Poikkeuslakien välttämisen periaate (The avoidance of excessive enactments principle). Lakimies 97(6–7):961–962.
- Viljanen, V.-P. (2001) Perusoikeuksien rajoitusedellytykset (Restriction of Basic Rights). Werner Söderström Lakitieto Oy, Helsinki.
- Viljanen V.-P. (2003) Eurooppalaisuminen valtoielinten välissä suhteissa (The Europeanisation of the domestic separation of powers). Lakimies 101(7–8): 1169–1183.
- Viljanen V.-P. (2009) Perustuslain muuttamisesta ja muuttamatta jättämisestä (To amend a Constitution – or not to amend). In: Kanninen H., Koskinen H., Rosas A., Sakslin M., Tuori K. (eds.) Puhuri käy: muuttuva suomalainen ja eurooppalainen valtiosääntöemme (Blowing in the wind: the changing Finnish and European constitution). Edita Publishing, Helsinki, pp. 57–88.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Part III

The Post-Totalitarian or Post-Authoritarian Constitutions of the 'Old' Member States: An Extensive Bill of Rights, Rule of Law Safeguards and Constitutional Review by a Constitutional Court

European Constitutionalism and the German Basic Law

Dieter Grimm, Mattias Wendel and Tobias Reinbacher

Abstract The German Basic Law of 1949, intended to be the counter-authoritarian answer to the atrocities committed during the National Socialist regime, enshrines a distinctive and widely followed model of constitutionalism, entrenching institutions and procedures for the protection of fundamental rights. The Constitution begins with provisions on human dignity and inalienable human rights. It determines the unamendable substantive core of the constitutional order. A pre-eminent role is held by the German Federal Constitutional Court (FCC), and its judgments are taken into account early in the process of drafting legislation. The report outlines the extensive amendments that have been made to the Constitution to allow for EU and inter-

Dieter Grimm is Professor of Public Law, Humboldt University Berlin, and Visiting Professor of Law and Peter and Patricia Gruber Fellow in Global Justice, Yale Law School; former Justice, Federal Constitutional Court of Germany; former Rector of the Wissenschaftskolleg zu Berlin (Institute for Advanced Study). e-mail: grimm@wiko-berlin.de.

Mattias Wendel is Professor of Public Law, International Law, EU Law and Comparative Law, Bielefeld University. e-mail: mattias.wendel@uni-bielefeld.de.

Tobias Reinbacher is Professor of Criminal Law and Criminal Procedure, Julius-Maximilians University of Würzburg. e-mail: tobias.reinbacher@jura.uni-wuerzburg.de.

Dieter Grimm wrote Part Two and Part Three, with the exception of Sect. 2.3, which was written by Tobias Reinbacher. Mattias Wendel wrote Part One. All authors are solely responsible for the parts they have written.

The report was finalised by the end of 2015. All websites accessed 12 January 2016.

D. Grimm (✉)

Humboldt University Berlin, Berlin, Germany

e-mail: grimm@wiko-berlin.de

D. Grimm

Wissenschaftskolleg zu Berlin (Institute for Advanced Study), Berlin, Germany

M. Wendel

Bielefeld University, Bielefeld, Germany

e-mail: mattias.wendel@uni-bielefeld.de

T. Reinbacher

Julius-Maximilians University of Würzburg, Würzburg, Germany

e-mail: tobias.reinbacher@jura.uni-wuerzburg.de national co-operation. Both the Constitution and the Constitutional Court adhere to a Europe-friendly approach, albeit with limits. The FCC has delivered a considerable number of widely discussed constitutional judgments with regard to a broad range of EU measures, from the early Solange cases regarding fundamental rights to the more recent Data Retention, ESM Treaty and OMT cases, which are all summarised in the report. The extensive constitutional debates regarding the European Arrest Warrant system are also outlined. In the FCC case law on the euro crisis, a key theme is that financial liabilities ought to remain calculable, in order to preserve a link between the people and democratic representation through Parliament. More broadly, the report observes the way in which the constitutionalisation through EU Treaties of wide-ranging areas of regulation which are normally not found in constitutions has reduced democracy (the ‘over-constitutionalisation’ thesis developed by Dieter Grimm); a case is made for a revised approach. Regarding contested aspects of transnational law, there has been a constant concern regarding its effects on the social state.

Keywords The Constitution/Basic Law of Germany • Amendment of the Constitution in relation to EU and international co-operation • Euro-friendly interpretation and constitutional limits • German Federal Constitutional Court
Inalienable human rights • Constitutional review statistics • Solange Data Retention Directive • European Arrest Warrant, extraditions, nulla poena sine lege, Judicial review and ordre public • ESM Treaty • OMT and calculability of financial liabilities • Democracy and parliamentary control over the budget
Human dignity and a change of balancing in Omega • Constitutionalisation of EU and international law • Changing language of constitutionalism at the transnational level • Identity review • Unamendable core of the constitutional order

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The German Basic Law of 1949 (Grundgesetz, hereinafter also GG) is a legally fully binding constitutional text at the top of the domestic hierarchy of norms, containing constitutional principles and rules that are generally enforceable in the courts. Its historical conditionality is twofold.¹ First and foremost the Basic

¹ Cf. Dreier 2007, para. 6.

Law was adopted after the fall of the National Socialist regime. It was intended to be the counter-authoritarian answer to the atrocities committed between 1933 and 1945. Secondly, the Basic Law stands in the tradition of the democratic Weimar Constitution, albeit differing significantly in several aspects in order to avoid the constitutional vulnerability and political instability of the latter. The denomination as ‘Basic Law’ symbolises the provisional character initially attributed to it, leaving open the possibility of a new constitutional order for an eventually unified Germany. However, in 1990 German reunification was put into effect at constitutional level without the adoption of a new constitution.

Despite its originally provisional character, the Basic Law can be described as one of the most important success stories of German post-war history. Not only has the Basic Law provided a normative framework for the effective protection of individual rights and stable political institutions, but there is also a high degree of identification among the citizens with its basic values, institutions and procedures – a civic approach referred to as ‘constitutional patriotism’ (Verfassungspatriotismus) by Sternberger and Habermas.² In contrast to constitutional systems in Europe such as in the UK, the Netherlands and the Nordic countries, the German constitutional system is particularly characterised by the eminent role of the German Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht hereinafter BVerfG), a powerful, but certainly not unquestioned,³ institution. The BVerfG is a court designed to adjudicate individual complaints on fundamental rights violations as well as disputes on inter-institutional and competence issues. It decides regularly on key questions of political life and holds a high reputation among the German population. Furthermore, the constitutional culture in Germany is characterised by a strong constitutional scholarship traced back, to this day, to the Weimar Republic.⁴

1.1.2 The substantial key elements and the rationale of the Basic Law lie in the protection of fundamental rights as well as the safeguarding of the core principles enshrined in Art. 20 of the Basic Law, namely the principles of democracy, federalism, separation of powers, the social state and the rule of law (Rechtsstaatsprinzip). While the latter can linguistically be translated by the term ‘the rule of law’, it should conceptually not be confounded with ‘the rule of law’ in the sense of the common law system (for the Rechtsstaatsprinzip, see in more detail Sect. 2.1.3). The BVerfG has played a central role in enforcing and spelling out these constitutional principles in legal practice. Regarding the fundamental rights in the Basic Law, the BVerfG does not only construe them in the sense of effective individual rights protecting the individual against public authority, but also interprets them as key principles shaping the legal order of Germany as a whole.

² Sternberger 1990, pp. 17–31; Habermas 1992, p. 642 et seq. For an analysis of the concept, see Müller 2010.

³ See Jestaedt et al. 2011.

⁴ For a ‘genealogy’ and the peculiarities of the German scholarship of constitutional law, see Schultze-Fielitz 2013.

Furthermore, the BVerfG has played a major role as a guardian of the inter-institutional balance of powers and (political) minority rights.

1.2 The EU in German Constitutional Law

1.2.1 Germany is a founding member of the European Communities. Its determination to ‘promote world peace as an equal partner in a united Europe’ has been highlighted in the preamble of the Basic Law ever since its entry into force in 1949:

Preamble [since 1949]⁵

... Inspired by the determination to promote world peace as an equal partner in a united Europe, the German people, in the exercise of their constituent power, have adopted this Basic Law. ...

However, Germany’s membership in the EU (and the former European Communities) was not specifically addressed in the operative part of the German Basic Law until 1992. In the previous decades Germany’s membership in the EU was constitutionally based on Art. 24, a clause authorising the ‘transfer of sovereign powers’ (Übertragung von Hoheitsrechten) to international institutions by means of an ordinary statute of Parliament. Despite referring to international institutions in general, Art. 24 had in fact been drafted in 1948/49 with a view to a (future) process of European cooperation.⁶ In a comparative perspective, the clause was even described in 1948 by one of its drafters as a ‘very nice answer’⁷ to the preamble of the French constitution of 1946 (Fourth Republic), which enabled ‘limitations’ to national sovereignty in its paragraph 15.⁸ Although still in force as such, since 1992, Art. 24 no longer applies to EU affairs. The Article reads as follows:

Article 24 [Transfer of sovereign powers to international organisations i.a. – since 1949]

(1) The Federation may by a law transfer sovereign powers to international organisations.

...

Constitutional provisions specifically addressing Germany’s membership in the EU (EU-related constitutional law)⁹ were introduced for the first time in December 1992 with regard to the Treaty of Maastricht. Major subsequent revisions took place in the course of the second reform of Germany’s federalist system in 2006 and with

⁵ Translation by Tomuschat, Currie and Kommers, available at the Website of the German Bundestag, <https://www.bundestag.de/blob/284870/ce0d03414872b427e57fccb703634dcd/basic-law-data.pdf>.

⁶ For the historical development, see Sommermann 2008, para. 5 et seq.

⁷ Eberhard 1948, p. 70.

⁸ The conception and practical importance of these clauses differ significantly, however.

⁹ For the terminology, see Mayer and Wendel 2014, para. 1 et seq.

regard to the Treaty of Lisbon in 2009. Furthermore, the sovereign debt crisis led to several amendments of the financial provisions in 2009 (see Sect. 1.2.3).

The key provision addressing Germany's membership in the EU today is the so-called integration clause (Integrationsklausel), laid down in Art. 23 of the German Basic Law. This provision was introduced in December 1992 with regard to the Treaty of Maastricht, was subsequently amended in 2006 with regard to the participation of the federal states (Länder) in EU affairs and extended in 2009 with a view to the subsidiarity control by national parliaments. It reads as follows:

Article 23 [European Union – introduced in 1992, para. (6) amended in 2006, para. (1a) introduced in 2009]

(1) With a view to establishing a united Europe, the Federal Republic of Germany shall participate in the development of the European Union that is committed to democratic, social and federal principles, to the rule of law, and to the principle of subsidiarity, and that guarantees a level of protection of basic rights essentially comparable to that afforded by this Basic Law. To this end the Federation may transfer sovereign powers by a law with the consent of the Bundesrat. The establishment of the European Union, as well as changes in its treaty foundations and comparable regulations that amend or supplement this Basic Law, or make such amendments or supplements possible, shall be subject to paragraphs (2) and (3) of Article 79.

(1a) The Bundestag and the Bundesrat shall have the right to bring an action before the Court of Justice of the European Union to challenge a legislative act of the European Union for infringing the principle of subsidiarity. The Bundestag is obliged to initiate such an action at the request of one fourth of its Members. By a statute requiring the consent of the Bundesrat, exceptions from the first clause of paragraph (2) of Article 42, and the first clause of paragraph (2) of Article 52, may be authorised for the exercise of the rights granted to the Bundestag and the Bundesrat under the contractual foundations of the European Union.

(2) The Bundestag and, through the Bundesrat, the Länder shall participate in matters concerning the European Union. The Federal Government shall keep the Bundestag and the Bundesrat informed, comprehensively and at the earliest possible time.

(3) Before participating in legislative acts of the European Union, the Federal Government shall provide the Bundestag with an opportunity to state its position. The Federal Government shall take the position of the Bundestag into account during the negotiations. Details shall be regulated by a law.

(4) The Bundesrat shall participate in the decision-making process of the Federation insofar as it would have been competent to do so in a comparable domestic matter, or insofar as the subject falls within the domestic competence of the Länder.

(5) Insofar as, in an area within the exclusive competence of the Federation, interests of the Länder are affected, and in other matters, insofar as the Federation has legislative power, the Federal Government shall take the position of the Bundesrat into account. To the extent that the legislative powers of the Länder, the structure of Land authorities, or Land administrative procedures are primarily affected, the position of the Bundesrat shall be given the greatest possible respect in determining the Federation's position consistent with the responsibility of the Federation for the nation as a whole. In matters that may result in increased expenditures or reduced revenues for the Federation, the consent of the Federal Government shall be required.

(6) When legislative powers exclusive to the Länder concerning matters of school education, culture or broadcasting are primarily affected, the exercise of the rights belonging to the Federal Republic of Germany as a member state of the European Union shall be delegated by the Federation to a representative of the Länder designated by the Bundesrat. These rights shall be exercised with the participation of, and in coordination with, the Federal Government; their exercise shall be consistent with the responsibility of the Federation for the nation as a whole.

(7) Details regarding paragraphs (4) to (6) of this Article shall be regulated by a law requiring the consent of the Bundesrat.

Alongside the integration clause and the preamble, there are several stipulations addressing specific issues relating to Germany's membership in the EU. The most important¹⁰ are:

Article 16 [extradition i.a. – para. (2) cl. 2 introduced in 2000]

...

(2) No German may be extradited to a foreign country. The law may provide otherwise for extraditions to a member state of the European Union or to an international court, provided that the rule of law is observed.

Article 28 [participation of EU citizens in local elections i.a. – para. (1) cl. 3 introduced in 1992]

(1) ... In county and municipal elections, persons who possess citizenship in any member state of the European Community are also eligible to vote and to be elected in accord with European Community law. ...

Article 45 [parliamentary EU-Committee – introduced in 1992, cl. 3 added in 2009]

The Bundestag shall appoint a Committee on the Affairs of the European Union. It may authorise the committee to exercise the rights of the Bundestag under Art. 23 vis-à-vis the Federal Government. It may also empower it to exercise the rights granted to the Bundestag under the contractual foundations of the European Union.

Article 88 [Federal Bank & European Central Bank – cl. 2 introduced in 1992]

The Federation shall establish a note-issuing and currency bank as the Federal Bank. Within the framework of the European Union, its responsibilities and powers may be transferred to the European Central Bank, which is independent and committed to the overriding goal of assuring price stability.

Article 109 [golden rule i.a. – introduced/amended in 2009]

...

(2) The Federation and the Länder shall perform jointly the obligations of the Federal Republic of Germany resulting from legal acts of the European Community for the maintenance of budgetary discipline pursuant to Article 104 of the Treaty Establishing the European Community and shall, within this framework, give due regard to the requirements of overall economic equilibrium.

¹⁰ Further references to the EU or the former European Communities can be found in Art. 104a(6), Art. 106(1) No. 7, Art. 108(1), Art. 109(5) (financial and budgetary matters) and Art. 87d(1) (air transport administration).

(3) The budgets of the Federation and the Länder shall in principle be balanced without revenue from credits. The Federation and Länder may introduce rules intended to take into account, symmetrically in times of upswing and downswing, the effects of market developments that deviate from normal conditions, as well as exceptions for natural disasters or unusual emergency situations beyond governmental control and substantially harmful to the state's financial capacity. For such exceptional regimes, a corresponding amortisation plan must be adopted. Details for the budget of the Federation shall be governed by Article 115 with the proviso that the first clause shall be deemed to be satisfied if revenue from credits does not exceed 0.35 percent in relation to the nominal gross domestic product. The Länder themselves shall regulate details for the budgets within the framework of their constitutional powers, the proviso being that the first clause shall only be deemed to be satisfied if no revenue from credits is admitted.

...

(5) Sanctions imposed by the European Community on the basis of the provisions of Article 104 of the Treaty Establishing the European Community in the interest of maintaining budgetary discipline, shall be borne by the Federation and the Länder at a ratio of 65 to 35 percent. In solidarity, the Länder as a whole shall bear 35 percent of the charges incumbent on the Länder according to the number of their inhabitants; 65 percent of the charges incumbent on the Länder shall be borne by the Länder according to their degree of causation. Details shall be regulated by a federal law which shall require the consent of the Bundesrat.

Alongside these stipulations expressly referring to EU affairs, several general articles play a key role for the constitutional foundations of Germany's membership in the EU. These provisions address key constitutional principles and have been part of the German Basic Law since 1949:

Article 1 [Human dignity, human rights – since 1949]

(1) Human dignity shall be inviolable. To respect and protect it shall be the duty of all state authority.

(2) The German people therefore acknowledge inviolable and inalienable human rights as the basis of every community, of peace and of justice in the world.

...

Article 20 [Basic constitutional principles – since 1949]

(1) The Federal Republic of Germany is a democratic and social federal state.

(2) All state authority is derived from the people. It shall be exercised by the people through elections and other votes and through specific legislative, executive and judicial bodies.

(3) The legislature shall be bound by the constitutional order, the executive and the judiciary by law and justice.

...

Article 38 [elections, right to vote – since 1949]

(1) Members of the German Bundestag shall be elected in general, direct, free, equal and secret elections. They shall be representatives of the whole people, not bound by orders or instructions, and responsible only to their conscience.

...

Article 79 [constitutional revision, ‘eternity clause’ – since 1949]

(1) This Basic Law may be amended only by a law expressly amending or supplementing its text. ...

(2) Any such law shall be carried by two thirds of the Members of the Bundestag and two thirds of the votes of the Bundesrat.

(3) Amendments to this Basic Law affecting the division of the Federation into Länder, their participation on principle in the legislative process, or the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 shall be inadmissible.

Article 146 [Duration of the Basic Law – amended in 1990 in the context of Germany’s reunification]

This Basic Law, which since the achievement of the unity and freedom of Germany applies to the entire German people, shall cease to apply on the day on which a constitution freely adopted by the German people takes effect.

Beyond the stipulations of positive constitutional law, the EU related jurisprudence of the German BVerfG has played an eminent role for the constitutional foundations of Germany’s participation in the ongoing process of European integration, but also for the development of the jurisprudence in other EU Member States. The following figure among the most prominent leading cases: Solange I (1974),¹¹ Eurocontrol I (1981),¹² Solange II (1986),¹³ Treaty of Maastricht (1993),¹⁴ Banana Market (2000),¹⁵ European Arrest Warrant I (2005),¹⁶ Treaty of Lisbon (2009),¹⁷ Honeywell (2010),¹⁸ Data Retention (2010),¹⁹ Greece and EFSF (2011),²⁰ Investment Allowance Act (2011),²¹ Five Percent Threshold EU Elections (2011),²² ESM & Fiscal Compact – summary review (2012),²³ OMT (2014)²⁴ and ¹¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvL 52/71, Solange I, order of 29 May 1974, BVerfGE 37, 271.

¹² BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1107/77 et al., Eurocontrol I, order of 23 June 1981, BVerfGE 58, 1.

¹³ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 197/83, Solange II, order of 22 Oct. 1986, BVerfGE 73, 339.

¹⁴ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2134, 2159/92, Treaty of Maastricht, judgment of 12 Oct. 1993, BVerfGE 89, 155.

¹⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvL 1/97, Banana Market, order of 7 June 2000, BVerfGE 102, 147.

¹⁶ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2236/04, European Arrest Warrant I, judgment of 18 July 2005, BVerfGE 113, 273.

¹⁷ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267.

¹⁸ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2661/06, Honeywell, order of 6 July 2010, BVerfGE 126, 286.

¹⁹ BVerfG, case 1 BvR 256/08 et al., Data Retention, judgment of 2 Mar. 2010, BVerfGE 125, 260.

²⁰ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 987/10 et al., Greece & EFSF, judgment of 7 Sept. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 124.

²¹ BVerfG, case 1 BvL 3/08, Investment Allowance Act, order of 4 Oct. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 186.

²² BVerfG, case 2 BvC 4/10, Five Percent Threshold EU Elections, judgment of 9 Nov. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 300.

²³ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1390/12 et al., ESM & TSCG – summary review, judgment of 12 Sept. 2012, BVerfGE 132, 195.

²⁴ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2728/13 et al., OMT, order of 14 Jan. 2014, BVerfGE 134, 366.

European Arrest Warrant II (2015).²⁵ While the gist of these decisions will be treated below in the context of the respective questions, one should, as a start, distinguish between two lines of case law.

The first line of jurisprudence relates to the scenario of treaty reform. In this scenario the parliamentary Act approving the ratification of a European reform treaty (e.g. Treaty of Maastricht or Lisbon) or an international treaty substantially supplementing EU law (e.g. the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism Treaty (ESM Treaty) or the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union (TSCG) has been challenged before the BVerfG before the ratification process has been completed. Unlike constitutions such as the French or the Czech, the German Basic Law does not provide for a specific procedure for preventive treaty review, i.e. a procedure specifically allowing the review of the constitutionality of a draft treaty before its ratification. In contrast, the BVerfG's case law relating to treaty reforms is predominantly²⁶ based on constitutional complaints lodged by individuals who have claimed that the parliamentary approval of ratification would violate the essential content of their right to vote guaranteed by Art. 38(1) of the Basic Law (for the standard of review see Sect. 1.3.3 in more detail).

The second line of jurisprudence concerns direct or indirect challenges to the primacy of application of EU (secondary) law. In this respect the BVerfG has formulated judicial reservations in the field of fundamental rights review, ultra vires review and identity review (see in detail Sect. 1.3.4).

1.2.2 The constitutional amendment procedure is enshrined in Art. 79 of the Basic Law. According to Art. 79(1), a constitutional revision requires a law expressly amending or supplementing the text of the Basic Law. Furthermore, under Art. 79(2) any such law necessitates a two-thirds majority of the Members of the Bundestag and a two-thirds majority of the votes of the Bundesrat, i.e. the representation of the federal states. Finally, Art. 79(3) – the so-called ‘eternity clause’ – establishes substantial limits to constitutional amendments by protecting the key principles of the German Basic Law (constitutional identity), such as the principle of democracy, the protection of fundamental rights and the federalist structure of Germany against any constitutional revision (see Sect. 1.3.3). All explicit revisions of the German Basic Law, including those relating to EU affairs and introducing and subsequently amending Art. 23, have been put into effect according to this procedure. However, one of the particular characteristics of Germany’s EU-related constitutional law that was introduced in 1992 is that Art. 23 (1) cl. 3 acknowledges that Germany’s participation in the EU can have the effect of an implicit revision of the Constitution, particularly by means of transfers of sovereign powers to the EU (for more details see Sect. 1.3.1).

²⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, order of 15 Dec. 2015.

²⁶ In some cases accompanied by intra-institutional proceedings.

1.2.3 The background of and reasons for the (explicit) constitutional revisions relating to the EU are the following. The most important amendment in the EU context has been the constitutional revision of 1992, which introduced the EU specific integration clause (Art. 23).²⁷ The reform primarily aimed at capturing the constitutional dimension of the European integration process, which had become apparent with the Treaty of Maastricht. A key goal was to reflect the constitutional impact of Germany's membership in the EU, but also to constitutionally frame its objectives, conditions and limits as well as the participation of the Bundestag and the federal states in EU matters. A major change effected by the constitutional reform of 1992 was that henceforth transfers of sovereignty with constitutional relevance required a double two-thirds majority both in the Bundestag and the Bundesrat. While some aspects, such as the precise conditions under which this requirement of a qualified majority applies, were disputed during the reform process and still are today (for details see Sect. 1.3.1), the constitutional reform as a whole was supported by an overwhelming political majority. Alongside the integration clause, the 1992 revision addresses several specific questions, such as the participation of EU citizens in local elections (Art. 28(1) cl. 3) and the creation of the European Central Bank (Art. 88 cl. 2). Furthermore, the mandatory creation of a parliamentary EU committee was constitutionally entrenched (Art. 45). In a comparative perspective it is interesting to see that there was a major EU-related constitutional reform going on in France at the same time, which introduced Art. 88–1 et seq. of the French Constitution.²⁸ However, the German integration clause differs in many ways from its French counterpart and was not conceptually influenced by the latter.²⁹

The second reform of the German federalist system in 2006 amended Art. 23(6) in order to strengthen the participation of the federal states in EU matters in the fields of their exclusive competencies under German constitutional law.³⁰

The constitutional revision of 2009 relating to the Treaty of Lisbon had the goal of implementing the new powers of the national parliaments under the subsidiarity protocol. As in France where a similar reform package was put in place, the German constitutional legislator designed the parliamentary right to introduce an action before the Court of Justice as a parliamentary minority right (Art. 23 (1a)). Furthermore, the Lisbon judgment of the BVerfG led to a significant change in the accompanying legislation, particularly the enactment of the so-called 'Responsibility for Integration Act', ensuring the prerogatives of the Bundestag (for more details see Sect. 1.4).

Finally, in the course of the financial crisis, several provisions relating to fiscal issues were introduced or amended in 2009. The so-called 'golden rule' in Art.

²⁷ 38th amendment of 21 Dec. 1992. For more details, see König 2000 and Schmalenbach 1996.

²⁸ See on that Ziller 2003, pp. 261 et seq.

²⁹ For more details Mayer 2004, pp. 927 et seq.

³⁰ For more details Pernice 2007, para. 118a et seq.; Classen 2007, pp. 103 et seq.; Hoffmann 2007, pp. 225 et seq.

109 was introduced three years ahead of the conclusion of the Fiscal Compact. With regard to the ESM Treaty, the act approving its ratification as well as the accompanying legislation, the so-called ESM Financing Act, were enacted in 2012 and provide for a detailed and differentiated framework regarding prior parliamentary approval.³¹

1.2.4 Currently there are no provisions that would be highlighted as in urgent need of amendment in view of EU membership at the political level. Furthermore there are no precise EU-related reform projects that would be underway or that would have failed, such as, for instance, the reform package presented by the Spanish State Council in 2006. What has been discussed vividly since the BVerfG's Lisbon judgment, however, are the circumstances under which a new constitution might be required for future steps of European integration (see in more detail Sect. 1.4.2).

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The integration clause allowing for transfers of sovereign powers laid down in Art. 23 of the Basic Law is the key provision regarding the constitutional foundations of Germany's participation in the EU's multi-level constitutionalism.³² It can be summarised as follows.³³

Article 23(1) cl. 1 stipulates a positive obligation for Germany's state institutions to 'participate in the development of the European Union' with the constitutional objective of 'establishing a united Europe' (Staatszielbestimmung).³⁴ The clause also aims at ensuring the EU's commitment to certain key principles, namely to 'democratic, social and federal principles, to the rule of law, and to the principle of subsidiarity' and to the protection of fundamental rights at a level 'essentially comparable to that guaranteed by this Basic Law'. Hence, the integration clause goes on the 'offensive' by demanding certain structural principles which the EU should respect (Struktursicherungsklausel). However, as part of German constitutional law, the clause does not bind EU institutions, but only addresses German state organs when participating in the creation and development of the EU.

Article 23(1) cl. 2 contains the core of the integration clause, i.e. a constitutional authorisation to transfer sovereign powers, i.e. competencies, to the EU (Integrationsermächtigung). Two key functions must be distinguished: First, the clause has a constitutive function, allowing Germany to participate in an EU-wide process of constituting an autonomous public authority at the EU level by ³¹ See Act on Financial Participation in the European Stability Mechanism, 13 Sept. 2012, Sects. 4–6 and Act on the Treaty Establishing the ESM, 13 Sept. 2012, Art. 2.

³² Pernice 1999, pp. 706 et seq. and Pernice 2009, p. 349 with further references.

³³ In detail Pernice 2006; Classen 2010; Streinz 2014.

³⁴ Cf. Sommermann 1997, pp. 381 et seq.

transferring, or better, conferring competencies on the EU (regarding the question as to how to conceptualise the act of ‘transferring’ sovereign powers see Sect. 1.3.2). Secondly, Art. 23(1) cl. 2 has a self-limiting function ensuring the permeability of the German constitutional order, i.e. the capacity to limit its own claim of normative exclusivity in order to enable legal rules or principles which emanate from a formally separated legal order to integrate.³⁵

Article 23(1) cls. 2 and 3 provide for a dynamic integration clause,³⁶ i.e. an integration clause that allows substantial (and implicit) changes of the Basic Law in the course of Germany’s participation in the European Union without necessitating a textual amendment. According to Art. 23(1) cl. 3 the domestic approval of changes of the EU’s founding treaties and comparable regulations which ‘amend or supplement this Basic Law, or make such amendments or supplements possible’ requires a qualified majority of two-thirds of the Members of the Bundestag and two-thirds of the votes of the Bundesrat (Art. 79(2)). Referring to the constitutional revision procedure and demanding an elevated degree of democratic legitimisation, Art. 23(1) cl. 3 thus mirrors the constitutional implications that are being attributed to the transfer of sovereign powers from the perspective of German constitutional law. The consequence is that every parliamentary approval of the ratification of a reform treaty conferring new powers on the EU, like the treaties of Maastricht or Lisbon, is treated like a constitutional amendment – however, without the need to amend the text. There is an unresolved dispute between the Federal Government and the federal states as to whether every ‘transfer of sovereign powers’ in the sense of Art. 23(1) entails an implicit revision of the Constitution and thus requires a qualified majority (position of the federal states) or if the constitutional impact of the reform project has to be assessed on a case-by-case basis (position of the Federal Government).³⁷ Given that a two-thirds majority has always been attained in practice, there has been, until today, no occasion for the BVerfG to decide on the matter. The same applies to the question whether the domestic approval of the ratification of international treaties supplementing EU law and not conferring competencies on the latter, such as the ESM Treaty or the Fiscal Compact, falls within the scope of application of Art. 23(1) cl. 3 and thus requires a qualified majority.³⁸

Furthermore, any domestic statute approving the ratification of a reform instrument implicitly amending the Constitution is subject to the substantial limits established by the eternity clause in Art. 79(3).³⁹ The reference to the ‘eternity clause’ in Art. 23(1) cl. 3 thus highlights the defensive dimension of the Basic Law against (hypothetical) violations of Germany’s constitutional identity by the ³⁵ For the concept see Wendel 2011a, pp. 5 et seq.

³⁶ Ibid., pp. 145 et seq. for the different categories.

³⁷ Ibid., pp. 241 et seq. for more details and references.

³⁸ See on that Lorz and Sauer 2012, pp. 685 et seq.

³⁹ These limits were already highlighted before the entry into force of Art. 23 by the BVerfG, case 2 BvL 52/71, Solange I, order of 29 May 1974, BVerfGE 37, 271, 279 et seq., paras. 43 et seq.

European integration process. According to the BVerfG, Germany's participation in the EU ends where the limits established by the eternity clause begin.

1.3.2 The debate on how to construe the transfer of sovereign powers is old. In Germany it dates back to the 1950s when the conceptual implications of Art. 24 were intensively discussed in the context of Germany's rearmament. Today it is widely acknowledged that both Arts. 23 and 24 of the Basic Law are an expression of the principle of open statehood (offene Staatlichkeit).⁴⁰ There is also a widespread consensus amongst scholars and in the jurisprudence that the act of 'transferring' sovereign powers must not be confounded with cession (in rem) – a conception that would end up construing public authority at the EU level as a mosaic of national, cumulatively limited sovereign powers. Already back in its Solange I decision the BVerfG stated that the concept of transfer of sovereign powers must not be taken literally, and essentially means an 'opening' of the national legal order.⁴¹

Regarding the principle of sovereignty, one should note that the term 'sovereignty' is not used in the German Basic Law. With the notable exception of the judgments on the European Arrest Warrant I and the Lisbon Treaty – the latter highlighting the principle of 'sovereign statehood' (souveräne Staatlichkeit) – the concept of sovereignty does not figure in the BVerfG's EU-related case law, including the decisions of recent times. Instead, the constitutional key principle for the BVerfG's case law on treaty change is the principle of democracy, as is also and particularly true for the Lisbon judgment (see Sect. 1.3.3).

According to the BVerfG, the Basic Law 'abandons a self-serving and self-glorifying concept of sovereign statehood and returns to a view of the state authority of the individual state which regards sovereignty as "freedom that is organised by international law and committed to it"'.⁴² While almost every scholar in Germany would subscribe to the latter, there is, however, an ongoing and highly intense debate on the concrete legal consequences of Germany's open statehood and the question of how to construe the normative foundation of the applicability of EU law in Germany. This debate was particularly intense on the occasion of the Lisbon judgment,⁴³ but also with regard to the more recent decisions in the context of the financial crisis.⁴⁴ The Lisbon judgment refined the idea of conceptualising the principle of conferral through the lens of national constitutional law. According to ⁴⁰ The term goes back to Vogel 1964, pp. 6 et seq.

⁴¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvL 52/71, Solange I, order of 29 May 1974, BVerfGE 37, 271, 279, para. 43, within the boundaries of Germany's constitutional identity.

⁴² BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 346, para. 223.

⁴³ For mainly critical assessments of the Lisbon judgment, see Schönberger 2009; Halberstam and Möllers 2009; Mayer 2011; Jestaedt 2009; Thym 2009; Tomuschat 2009; Everling 2010; Schwarze 2010. For more affirmative appraisals, cf. Schorkopf 2009; Grimm 2009; Gärditz and Hillgruber 2009.

⁴⁴ See the two special issues of GLJ on the ESM & TSCG and on the OMT-reference. For a critical appraisal of the latter, cf. also Wendel 2014, pp. 263 et seq.

the BVerfG, the principle of conferred powers is not only a principle of EU law, but the ‘expression of the foundation of Union authority in the constitutional law of the Member States’ which remain the ‘Masters of the Treaties’.⁴⁵ Accordingly, the ‘foundation and the limit of the applicability of European Union law in the Federal Republic of Germany is the order to apply the law’ (Rechtsanwendungsbefehl) contained in the parliamentary statute approving ratification – an order ‘which can only be given within the limits of the current constitutional order’.⁴⁶ Despite its own claim of constitutional autonomy, EU law is thus reduced to a mere derivative of national sovereign powers, an interpretation running counter to the idea that the ‘transfer of powers’ is not a transfere, but a conferre instead.⁴⁷ In other words, according to the BVerfG’s conception, the parliamentary statutes of approval for the treaties constitute a bridge connecting national law with EU law – a bridge at the end of which stands a guardian: the BVerfG⁴⁸ (see further Sect. 1.3.4).

1.3.3 Substantial limits to Germany’s participation in the EU follow, according to the BVerfG, from Art. 79(3) which protects the constitutional identity of the Basic Law against constitutional revision. While in the context of European integration the term ‘national constitutional limits’ can simply refer to the requirement to amend the Constitution before ratification (which is the approach of the EU-related jurisprudence of the French Conseil constitutionnel), the constitutional limits derived from Art. 79(3) are red lines framing the inalienable substantive core of the German constitutional order. This means that within the normative framework of the Basic Law these limits – drafted in order to prevent a backslide into dictatorship – must not be overstepped even by the constitutional legislator. According to the BVerfG, these limits could only be (factually) overcome by superseding the Basic Law, i.e. by establishing a new constitutional order – a highly controversial claim (see Sect. 1.4.2).

Regarding the question of justiciability, the BVerfG declares individual constitutional complaints admissible (but regularly unfounded) if the complainants plausibly demonstrate that by transferring competences or authorising financial commitments, the Bundestag would lose its continuous and decisive say in fields which the BVerfG considers to be essential for shaping political development in Germany. This standard of review is intrinsically linked with the very essence of the principle of democracy as protected by the eternity clause. That the Court enables virtually every German citizen who has the right to vote to initiate a de facto objective review of constitutionality regarding domestic acts approving the ratification of EU reform measures, has raised numerous and profound critiques ever since this approach was established for the first time in the Maastricht judgment.⁴⁹

⁴⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 350, paras. 234–235.

⁴⁶ Ibid., para. 343.

⁴⁷ For this reading, see already Kaufmann 1953.

⁴⁸ Kirchhof 1991.

⁴⁹ Tomuschat 1993; König 1994, pp. 27 et seq.

However, the Court explicitly confirmed this path in its Lisbon and Greece and EFSF judgments, stating that if the Bundestag were to give up key elements of political self-determination and thus permanently deprive the citizens of their democratic influence, their claim to democracy would lapse.⁵⁰ The Court held that

[t]he defensive dimension of [the right to vote] therefore takes effect in configurations in which the danger clearly exists that the competences of the present or future Bundestag will be eroded in a manner that legally or de facto makes parliamentary representation of the popular will, directed to the realisation of the political will of the citizens, impossible.⁵¹

This line of jurisprudence is thus intrinsically linked to protection of the principle of democracy and the assumption that substantive and justiciable limits to European integration can be derived from the eternity clause.

Regarding the substance of the constitutional limits to Germany's participation in the process of European integration, the BVerfG has identified five key areas within which the future conferral of competencies to the EU could bear a high risk of violating the constitutional identity of Germany and the principle of democracy in particular:

Particularly sensitive for the ability of a constitutional state to democratically shape itself are, since time immemorial [seit jeher] decisions on substantive and formal criminal law (1), on the disposition of the monopoly on the use of force by the police within the state and by the military towards the exterior (2), fundamental fiscal decisions on public revenue and public expenditure, the latter being particularly motivated, inter alia, by social policy considerations (3), decisions on the shaping of living conditions in a social state (4) and decisions of particular cultural importance, for example on family law, the school and education system and on dealing with religious communities (5).⁵²

This catalogue was spelt out in more detail in the subsequent paragraphs of the Lisbon judgment⁵³ – an approach vividly criticised in literature⁵⁴ and openly opposed by the Czech constitutional court.⁵⁵ To the great surprise of many, the BVerfG stated that Germany could not participate in a (so far only hypothetical) European federal state within the framework of the Basic Law, but would have to adopt a new constitution in this case. No other national court in the EU has spelt out an eternity clause in the context of European integration in such a detailed, albeit apodictic manner as the BVerfG has in relation to Art. 79(3).⁵⁶ This approach does ⁵⁰ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 987/10 et al., Greece & EFSF, judgment of 7 Sept. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 124, 169, para. 101.

⁵¹ Ibid., paras. 101–102.

⁵² BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 359, para. 252.

⁵³ Ibid., paras. 253–260.

⁵⁴ Cf. Schönberger 2009, pp. 1208–1209.

⁵⁵ Czech Constitutional Court, case Pl ÚS 29/09 Treaty of Lisbon II, judgment of 3 Nov. 2009, para. 137 et seq.

⁵⁶ In detail Wendel 2011a, pp. 331 et seq.

not only raise fundamental objections as to its procedural dimension (de facto actio popularis), but also – and even more severely – as to its substantial foundation: It relies on an apodictic and theoretically highly questionable claim of necessary state functions, is ultimately bound to the (pre-)existence of statehood, remains widely blind to forms of genuine democratic legitimization in multilevel settings and goes along with an unprecedented deconstruction of the European Parliament.⁵⁷

In its judgment on the bilateral aids for Greece and the EFSF, the BVerfG developed its jurisprudence further in the field of budgetary commitments. It held that the essence of the principle of democracy as part of the constitutional identity would be violated if the Bundestag relinquished its ‘parliamentary budget responsibility’ by giving up the capability to decide on the budget on its own terms.⁵⁸ According to the Court,

[n]o permanent mechanisms may be created under international treaties which are tantamount to accepting liability for decisions by free will of other states, above all if they entail consequences which are hard to calculate.⁵⁹

The Court also reiterated this approach in its much noted decision of 12 September 2012 by which, on the basis of a summary review, it allowed the ratification of the amendment of Art. 136 TFEU, the ESM Treaty and the Fiscal Compact at a relatively early stage and far ahead of the decision on the principal proceedings.⁶⁰ In substantive terms, the decision of 12 September 2012 was characterised in particular by a remarkably strong manifestation of judicial restraint.⁶¹

1.3.4 Unlike several other constitutions, such as those of Portugal or Croatia, the German Basic Law does not provide a clause that openly addresses the question of the primacy or direct effect of EU law. In turn, there is also no stipulation that would expressly postulate the supremacy of the Constitution vis-à-vis EU law.⁶² However, there is a rich and widely discussed case law on these matters. In legal and judicial practice the primacy of EU law is, on the one hand, generally accepted as a part of the acquis and as a consequence of the Basic Law’s ‘openness towards European law’ (Europarechtsfreundlichkeit).⁶³ On the other hand, the BVerfG has ⁵⁷ Halberstam and Möllers 2009, pp. 1249–1250; Schönberger 2009, pp. 1208–1209; Nettesheim 2010, pp. 110 et seq.

⁵⁸ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 987/10 et al., Greece & EFSF, judgment of 7 Sept. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 124, 177 et seq., para. 120 et seq.

⁵⁹ Ibid., para. 128.

⁶⁰ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1390/12 et al., ESM & TSCG – summary review, judgment of 12 Sept. 2012, BVerfGE 132, 195.

⁶¹ In detail Wendel 2013, pp. 41 et seq.

⁶² Article 31 ('Federal law shall take precedence over Land law') only addresses the relationship between federal and sub-federal law within Germany.

⁶³ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 347, 353 et seq. and 401, paras. 225, 240 et seq., and 340. For possible meanings of the concept, see Voßkuhle 2010; Mayer 2010, pp. 256 et seq.

repeatedly challenged the position of the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) regarding its claim of the unconditional primacy of EU law by formulating judicial reservations for exceptional circumstances in three fields.

The first judicial reservation relates to fundamental rights protection at EU level and has been developed in the so-called Solange jurisprudence.⁶⁴ According to Solange II, the BVerfG ‘will no longer exercise its jurisdiction to decide on the applicability of secondary [law] ... and it will no longer review [EU law]’ by the standard of national fundamental rights as long as the EU and the Court of Justice in particular ‘generally ensure effective protection of fundamental rights’ at a degree ‘which is to be regarded as substantially similar to the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Constitution, and in so far as they generally safeguard the essential content of fundamental rights’.⁶⁵ As a consequence, constitutional complaints by individuals and submissions by German ordinary and specialised courts are ‘inadmissible from the outset if their grounds do not state that the evolution of European law, including the rulings of the Court of Justice ..., has resulted in a decline below the required standard of fundamental rights after the “Solange II” decision’.⁶⁶ Such actions could only be declared admissible if the complainants or the referring court demonstrated ‘in detail that the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Basic Law is not generally assured’ at EU level.⁶⁷ However, to the extent that EU law does not strictly determine national law and leaves a margin of discretion to the national legislator or administrative branch, the BVerfG will carry out a fundamental rights review.⁶⁸ In this respect the BVerfG places special emphasis on the responsibility of German ordinary and specialised courts, given that it requires them under certain conditions to refer preliminary questions to the CJEU in order to decide whether or not EU law leaves a margin of discretion.⁶⁹

The second judicial reservation relates to the concept of ultra vires review, i.e. the exercise of the BVerfG’s self-proclaimed right to decide as a court of last instance whether an EU institution has transgressed its competences under the Treaties.⁷⁰ This approach is entirely a product of judicial law-making and was foreshadowed in the Court’s case law as early as 1971,⁷¹ followed by increasingly ⁶⁴ The German word solange means ‘as long as’.

⁶⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 197/83, Solange II, order of 22 Oct. 1986, BVerfGE 73, 339, 387, para. 132; BVerfG, case 2 BvL 1/97, Banana Market, order of 7 June 2000, BVerfGE 102, 147, 164, para. 62.

⁶⁶ BVerfG, case 2 BvL 1/97, Banana Market, order of 7 June 2000, BVerfGE 102, 147, 164, para. 62.

⁶⁷ Ibid.

⁶⁸ See for example BVerfG, case 1 BvR 256/08 et al., Data Retention, judgment of 2 Mar. 2010, BVerfGE 125, 260, 308, paras. 185–187.

⁶⁹ BVerfG, case 1 BvL 3/08, Investment Allowance Act, order of 4 Oct. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 186.

⁷⁰ For an in-depth analysis, see Mayer 2000, pp. 87 et seq.

⁷¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 255/69, Lütticke, order of 9 June 1971, BVerfGE 31, 145, 174, para. 97 et seq.

articulate indications in 1981⁷² and 1987⁷³. The first open claim of jurisdiction to review whether acts of EU law exceed the competencies attributed to the EU was made in the Maastricht judgment (1993).⁷⁴ The practical modalities as well as the conceptual foundation of this judicial reservation were further substantiated in the Lisbon judgment (2009),⁷⁵ the Honeywell decision (2010)⁷⁶ and the OMT reference (2014).⁷⁷ Ultra vires review essentially aims to ensure that the exercise of public authority at EU level does not exceed the so-called integration programme which has been consented to, in Germany, by an Act of Parliament. However, the substantial scope of a statute of approval can only be determined in relation to its point of reference, EU primary law. This is why ultra vires review cannot be conceptually limited to (directly or indirectly) scrutinising the compatibility of EU law with national constitutional law, but necessarily extends to examining whether EU secondary law is in conformity with EU primary law. This twofold review standard, with its roots deep in national constitutional law but with branches stretching out into EU law, presents a fundamental conceptual problem,⁷⁸ given that the BVerfG is adjudicating in an area for which it has no competence either in a legal or in a technical sense.

In its Honeywell decision the Court emphasised the necessity to coordinate ultra vires review ‘with the task which the Treaties confer on the Court of Justice, namely to interpret and apply the Treaties, and in doing so to safeguard the unity and coherence of Union law’.⁷⁹ In this light, the BVerfG specified the procedural and substantial conditions for ultra vires review. In terms of procedure the BVerfG made it unambiguously clear that the Court of Justice must be given an ‘opportunity to interpret the Treaties, as well as to rule on the validity and interpretation of the legal acts in question’ before the BVerfG decides on the inapplicability of an act of EU law in Germany.⁸⁰ This requirement has been met by the OMT reference. In terms of substance, Honeywell introduced a double test: ultra vires review can only be carried out by the BVerfG if the act of EU law in question is first ‘manifestly in violation of competences’ and secondly structurally significant, i.e. ‘highly significant in the structure of competences between the Member States and the Union ⁷² BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1107/77 et al., Eurocontrol I, order of 23 June 1981, BVerfGE 58, 1, 30, para. 92.

⁷³ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 687/85, Kloppenburg, order of 8 April 1987, BVerfGE 75, 223, 235 et seq., paras. 43 et seq.

⁷⁴ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2134, 2159/92, Treaty of Maastricht, judgment of 12 Oct. 1993, BVerfGE 89, 155, 188, para. 106.

⁷⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 353 and 400 et seq., paras. 240 and 339 et seq.

⁷⁶ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2661/06, Honeywell, order of 6 July 2010, BVerfGE 126, 286.

⁷⁷ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2728/13 et al., OMT, order of 14 Jan. 2014, BVerfGE 134, 366.

⁷⁸ Cf. Mayer and Wendel 2014, p. 117.

⁷⁹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2661/06, Honeywell, order of 6 July 2010, BVerfGE 126, 286, 302, para. 56.

⁸⁰ Ibid., para. 60.

with regard to the principle of conferral and to the binding nature of the statute under the rule of law'.⁸¹ In this context the BVerfG did not only express respect for the Union's own, idiosyncratic legal methodology, but also granted the CJEU a 'right to tolerance of error'.⁸²

Most recently the Honeywell conditions have been put to the test in the BVerfG's OMT reference. This decision is based on an ultra vires review and constitutes the first preliminary reference in the history of the BVerfG.⁸³ Even though the BVerfG suggests that the OMT decision is in line with its Honeywell judgment,⁸⁴ a closer look reveals several important deviations. The first consists in the explicit extension of ultra vires review to compliance with legal prohibitions under EU primary law – a move which is certainly not spectacular, given that a legal prohibition can always be reconstructed as a negative competence norm. The danger that this might lead to a path at the end of which stands a general EU legality review by the BVerfG could be averted if the Honeywell double test were applied strictly. In the aftermath of the OMT reference it is questionable, however, if this is the case. Although the BVerfG formally holds on to the double test in general and the condition of a manifest violation of competencies in particular, the application of the latter illustrates that substantially there is not much left of it.⁸⁵ Furthermore, with its OMT reference the Second Senate acknowledged for the first time a so-called 'principal ultra vires objection' based on the right to vote,⁸⁶ the admissibility of which depends neither on a link with a principal claim that a substantial fundamental right has been violated (as was the case in Honeywell) nor on a claim that the essence of the right to vote as protected by the eternity clause has been violated by an ultra vires act.⁸⁷

The third judicial reservation relates to the concept of identity review. Although remaining rather obscure as a concept,⁸⁸ the notion of national constitutional identity does not only figure in Art. 4(2) TEU, but is also used by several national supreme jurisdictions.⁸⁹ In Germany the notion of constitutional identity is bound to Art. 79(3) (see above Sect. 1.3.3). On this basis the BVerfG claims to be competent to review whether an act of EU law infringes Germany's constitutional identity and is thus inapplicable in Germany. The Court has held that otherwise ⁸¹ Ibid., para. 61.

⁸² Ibid., para. 66.

⁸³ By referring preliminary questions the BVerfG essentially wants to have its own legal interpretation confirmed, according to which the OMT programme, first, is not covered by the mandate of the ECB and, secondly, violates Art. 123 TFEU.

⁸⁴ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2728/13 et al., OMT, order of 14 Jan. 2014, BVerfGE 134, 366, 382 et seq., paras. 24–26.

⁸⁵ In more detail Wendel 2014, pp. 271 et seq.

⁸⁶ Schneider 2014, p. 222.

⁸⁷ Critically Dissenting Opinions of Judge Gerhardt, para. 6 and Judge Lübbe-Wolff, para. 17 et seq.

⁸⁸ See von Bogdandy 2003, p. 164.

⁸⁹ For a comparative overview, see Wendel 2011b, pp. 131 et seq.

the fundamental political and constitutional structures of sovereign Member States, which are recognised by Article 4(2) first sentence TEU, cannot be safeguarded in any other way. In this respect, the guarantee of national constitutional identity under constitutional and under Union law go hand in hand in the European legal area. The identity review makes it possible to examine whether due to the action of European institutions, the principles ... declared inviolable in Article 79(3) of the Basic Law, have been violated. This ensures that the primacy of application of Union law only applies by virtue and in the context of the constitutional empowerment that continues in effect.⁹⁰

In OMT, however, the BVerfG highlighted the conceptual differences between the protection of national (constitutional) identity at national and at EU level and tried to draw a clear conceptual distinction between the notion of constitutional identity under Art. 79(3) and the notion of national constitutional identity under Art. 4(2) TEU: while the protection of identity under EU law would be relative and could be subjected to, for instance, a proportionality review, the very essence of the principles protected under Art. 79(3) of the Basic Law must not be weighed against other principles (Abwägungsfestigkeit).⁹¹ In other words, the BVerfG deemed the protection of national identity provided by the Court of Justice inadequate in terms of national constitutional law.

The first time that the Court actually carried out an identity control with regard to a domestic act implementing mandatory provisions of EU law was in its European Arrest Warrant II decision regarding the extradition of an American citizen who had been convicted in absentia in Italy (for more details cf. the last paragraphs of Sects. 2.3.1, 2.3.3 and 2.3.5).⁹² The decision is ambiguous. On the one hand, the BVerfG claimed jurisdiction on the basis of an identity review and clearly marked the inalienable limits following from human dignity as protected by Art. 1(1) GG. On the other hand, the BVerfG interpreted both the EAW and the domestic statute in the light of EU fundamental rights and came to the conclusion that there was no need to deviate from the principle of primacy, because the interpretation allegedly demanded by EU law would be in line with the substantial requirements under Art. 1(1) GG. Relying on the acte clair doctrine, the Court did not refer a preliminary question to the Court of Justice, thus refusing to enter into a dialogue with Luxemburg on the right interpretation of EU law.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The participation of the German Bundestag in the process of conferring competencies to the EU as well as the decision-making process at EU level is one of ⁹⁰ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 353, para. 240 (emphasis added).

⁹¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2728/13 et al., OMT, order of 14 Jan. 2014, BVerfGE 134, 366, 386, para. 29.

⁹² BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, order of 15 Dec. 2015.

the cornerstones of Germany's EU-related constitutional law. As demonstrated above (Sect. 1.3.1) Art. 23(1) of the Basic Law requires that the Bundestag approve every conferral of sovereign powers to the EU – normally by a two-thirds majority of its Members.

Furthermore, safeguarding parliamentary rights is one of the leitmotivs of the BVerfG's EU-related case law. In this jurisprudence, safeguarding parliamentary rights first and foremost means safeguarding the parliamentary representation of the popular will. According to the BVerfG, the competences of the Bundestag must not be constrained or exercised in a manner rendering (current and future) parliamentary representation at national level virtually impossible, i.e. leading to a situation in which no substantial issues would be left for the elected representatives of the people to decide on (see above Sect. 1.3.3). As a consequence, certain decision-making rights may either not be conferred on the EU or it must be ensured that the Bundestag keeps a decisive influence, if necessary by a parliamentary mandate binding the acting representatives of the German Government. In this respect, the Court coined the enigmatic, albeit catchy term of parliamentary 'responsibility for integration'.⁹³

Parliamentary responsibility demands first and foremost parliamentary participation. As a consequence the BVerfG demands prior parliamentary approval for certain types of decisions at the EU level that are considered as endangering the principle of conferral by allegedly expanding the EU's competences gradually (the so-called 'dynamic treaty provisions').⁹⁴ The BVerfG takes the view that the necessary degree of democratic legitimacy of EU public authority can – at the moment – only be derived from the national sphere. The autonomous democratic mechanisms and institutions on the EU-level have, so the argument goes, a complementary character at best, but not a constitutive one. With regard to the euro crisis the BVerfG has paid specific regard to the budgetary responsibility of Parliament. Already in its Lisbon judgment the BVerfG highlighted budgetary autonomy as a key to the 'ability of a constitutional state to democratically shape itself'.⁹⁵ In its Greece & EFSF judgment, the Court consequently held that the right to vote would be violated if the Bundestag relinquished its budgetary responsibility by giving up the capability to decide on the budget on its own terms by authorising

⁹³ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 351, 356 et seq. paras. 236, 245–247.

⁹⁴ Ibid. The BVerfG distinguishes five categories of so-called 'dynamic treaty provisions': first, the simplified treaty revision procedure under Art. 48(6) TEU and several specific provisions; secondly the 'passerelle' clauses under Art. 48(7) TEU and several specific stipulations; thirdly, the flexibility clause under Art. 352 TFEU; fourthly, the so-called 'emergency brakes' under Arts. 48(2), 82(3) and 83(3) TFEU; fifthly and finally specific stipulations according to which the Council – after obtaining the consent of the European Parliament – can adopt unanimously decisions in 'sensitive' fields such as criminal law (Art. 83(3) sub-para. 3 TFEU). It is important to note that only the first and the second category concern the simplified (and insofar 'dynamic') amendment of EU treaty law. The other categories relate essentially to the legislative process at EU level.

⁹⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 359 et seq., paras. 252, 256.

financial commitments.⁹⁶ Regarding the decision-making processes within the ESM, the Court considered the relevant provisions on the involvement of the Bundestag – specified in the Act of assent to the ESM Treaty as well as in the so-called ESM Financing Act – to comply with this requirement to a large extent.⁹⁷ Read together, both statutes provide for a detailed and differentiated framework regarding prior parliamentary approval. Above all, they ensure that the key activities of the German ESM representatives are determined and controlled by the Bundestag and thus provided with sufficient democratic legitimization.⁹⁸ In order to prevent any possibility of circumventing parliamentary participation, the Court has deemed it necessary to demand an interpretative safeguard under public international law, aiming at the exclusion of any interpretation of the ESM Treaty allowing payment obligations that exceed the defined maximum sum without the consent of the Bundestag.⁹⁹

Furthermore, parliamentary responsibility calls for parliamentary information: no control without prior information. According to the BVerfG, the (national) constitutional principle of democracy requires access to information in a way that allows the Bundestag to assess the essential foundations and consequences of its decisions and thus exercise its parliamentary responsibility.¹⁰⁰ Like several national constitutions, the German Basic Law contains a provision on the parliamentary right to information in EU affairs: according to Art. 23(2) cl. 2 – a norm concretised by an ordinary Act of Parliament – the Bundestag has a right to be comprehensively informed by the Government at the earliest possible time on ‘matters concerning the European Union’. In a decision of 19 June 2012, the BVerfG decided that the Federal Government had infringed this right to information with regard to certain key documents relating to the negotiations on the ESM and on the so-called Euro Plus Pact.¹⁰¹ The Court interpreted the term ‘matters concerning the European Union’ in a broad manner, thus extending the scope of application of Art. 23(2) to ‘international treaties that complement European Union law or otherwise show particular proximity’ to it¹⁰² and thus qualified the establishment of the ESM as a matter falling within the scope of application of Art. 23(2).¹⁰³ The Court also established an obligation for the German Government to provide information in a particularly comprehensive and detailed way, given that the ESM concerns the ⁹⁶ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 987/10 et al., Greece & EFSF, judgment of 7 Sept. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 124, 177, para. 121.

⁹⁷ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1390/12 et al., ESM & TSCG – summary review, judgment of 12 Sept. 2012, BVerfGE 132, 195, 269 et seq., paras. 280–299 [EN translation, version 2014].

⁹⁸ Ibid., para. 287.

⁹⁹ Ibid., para. 253.

¹⁰⁰ Ibid., para. 215.

¹⁰¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 4/11, ESM & Euro Plus Pact, judgment of 19 June 2012, BVerfGE 131, 152.

¹⁰² Ibid., para. 100.

¹⁰³ Ibid., para. 135.

overall budgetary responsibility of the Bundestag.¹⁰⁴ In 2012 the BVerfG, for the very first time, put the essence of the parliamentary right to information explicitly under the protection of Art. 79(3). The ‘core of the right of Parliament to be informed’ is, according to the Court, ‘entrenched’ in the eternity clause.¹⁰⁵ It is on this basis that the Court demanded, in its ESM & TSCG case, for the second interpretative safeguard under public international law, ensuring that the provisions in the ESM Treaty on the inviolability of documents and on professional secrecy do not restrain the comprehensive information of the Bundestag.¹⁰⁶

Another implication relates to the aspect of intra-parliamentary allocation of tasks, i.e. the question of the extent to which responsibilities may be exercised by parliamentary special committees and to what extent their exercise must be reserved to the plenary session. In a judgment of 28 February 2012, the Court established the basic rule that the Bundestag’s right to decide on the budget and its overall budgetary responsibility generally have to be ‘exercised through deliberation and decision-making in the plenary sitting’.¹⁰⁷ Arguing that the constitutional rights of Members of Parliament are violated if they are excluded from substantial decisions affecting the German Bundestag’s budgetary responsibility, the BVerfG essentially scrapped a statute according to which the Bundestag’s competences to decide on certain measures within the framework of the European Financial Stability Facility (EFSF) were, in cases of particular urgency and confidentiality, to be exercised by a special parliamentary committee (Sondergremium) composed of nine members.¹⁰⁸ The Court accepted the conferral of responsibilities to the special committee only in strictly limited cases.¹⁰⁹

1.4.2 The voting mode of referendum (popular vote) is not foreseen by the Basic Law – neither in domestic nor in EU affairs. However, if a new constitution were to be adopted by the German people, this would most likely presume a referendum. In its Lisbon judgment the BVerfG suggested that the limits to further European integration following from Art. 79(3) could be overcome by the adoption of a new constitution in the sense of Art. 146 – a stipulation which was amended in 1990 with the aim of paving the way for a new constitution after reunification, but which has never been applied in this context, because of the will of the overwhelming political majority to keep the Basic Law in force.¹¹⁰

¹⁰⁴ Ibid., para. 145.

¹⁰⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1390/12 et al., ESM & TSCG – summary review, judgment of 12 Sept. 2012, BVerfGE 132, 195, 241 et seq., para. 215 [EN translation, version 2014].

¹⁰⁶ Ibid., para. 259.

¹⁰⁷ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 8/11, Special Parliamentary Committee, judgment of 28 Jan. 2012, BVerfGE 130, 318, 347, para. 113 (emphasis added).

¹⁰⁸ Ibid., paras. 133–153.

¹⁰⁹ Ibid., para. 150.

¹¹⁰ Until 1990 the Basic Law contained a provision (the former Art. 23) allowing the accession of East Germany to the Federal Republic of Germany and the applicability of the German Basic Law

According to the BVerfG, Art. 146 would have to apply particularly if Germany wanted to participate in a future European federal state. For the BVerfG this aspect is even justiciable: a complainant could rely on the right to vote (Art. 38(1)) in order to challenge an alleged loss of ‘sovereign statehood’ because the only power with the right to repeal the Basic Law and with it the German federal state, would be the constituent power of the people. In its Lisbon judgment, the BVerfG held that the ‘pre-constitutional right’ to give oneself a constitution was declaratively mirrored in Art. 146.¹¹¹ While Art. 146 thus reflects an outer-systemic right of participation to create a new system, Art. 38(1) ensures an inner-systemic right of participation within the existing system. The logical fracture is that according to the BVerfG, the electorate shall be entitled, by relying on its inner-systemic right to vote, to become the guardian of the outer-systemic constituent power reflected in Art. 146.¹¹² While courts like the French Conseil constitutionnel or the Czech Constitutional Court stay within the existing constitutional order by referring to the constitutional revisionary power, i.e. the constitutional legislator, if constitutional limits have been reached, the BVerfG virtually transcends the constitutional order by which it is itself constituted when it refers to a pre-constitutional (revolutionary?) ‘right’ to give oneself a constitution.¹¹³ The Court thus leaves the Germans with quite an astonishing choice. They may either remain part of the so-called association of sovereign and ‘fully democratically’ (volldemokratisch) organised states the peoples of which remain the sole subjects of democratic legitimisation, or they may participate in the creation of a European federal state, which would require the supersession of one of Germany’s most vaunted post-war-inventions, the Basic Law.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 As to the background, reasons and comparative context of the (explicit) constitutional revisions relating to the EU, see above at Sect. 1.2.3. Compared to other countries the input of comparative law in the process of drafting the integration clause was rather weak. This is also due to the fact that Germany was one of the first countries to enact EU-related constitutional provisions. An exception to the wide absence of comparative influence regarding the drafting of integration clauses are the stipulations regulating the parliamentary subsidiarity control. To construe the latter as a parliamentary minority right, is an idea developed simultaneously – and with cross-border influence – in France and Germany.

in East Germany after accession. This was the clause on which the reunification was based under domestic constitutional law.

¹¹¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 331 et seq. and 348, paras. 179–180 and 228.

¹¹² Cf. Halberstam and Möllers 2009, p. 1256.

¹¹³ See the critique of Jestaedt 2009, pp. 511–513.

1.5.2 Not applicable.

1.5.3 In the author's view the EU-related, national constitutional case law plays an eminent role within the framework of Europe's multilevel-constitutionalism.¹¹⁴ It not only regulates key questions such as the procedures for conferrals of competencies, the participation of the people, national parliaments or federal entities in the process of European integration, but also opens up the national legal sphere. It makes national constitutional law permeable and responsive. Given the specifics of EU law as an autonomous legal order claiming direct effect and primacy in application in the Member States, building on their institutional and administrative systems, creating a European citizenship with genuine individual rights and thus complementing the national constitutional sphere in many ways, one should recommend, from a comparative perspective, the insertion of EU-specific constitutional provisions addressing these issues.

Given the substantial impact of the European legal order on national constitutional law, the 'EU capability' is of highest importance for the constitutional order of a modern EU Member State. Comparative law can help to identify the need or appropriateness of reform in this field. In this light, a modern integration clause should particularly abandon misleading concepts such as the 'transfer' of sovereign powers which conceptually reduces the autonomous public authority at EU level to a mere derivative of national sovereign powers (which is why the term 'confer' or 'entrust' seem to be more appropriate, see Sect. 1.3.2). Furthermore, a modern integration clause should highlight the complementary and mutually stabilising dimension of the different constitutional levels.¹¹⁵ A reformed Integrationsermächtigung could, for example, begin as follows: Germany can, conjointly with other European states, confer tasks and competencies to the European Union, by founding and developing a common basic order that henceforth constitutes, together with this Basic Law and with respect for its core principles, the legal basis for the exercise of public authority in Germany.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 After the total neglect of human rights during the rule of the National Socialist Party in Germany, the protection of fundamental rights became a primary concern for the authors of the Basic Law. The Bill of Rights was moved from the end of the constitution, the place that it occupied in the Weimar Constitution, to the beginning.

¹¹⁴ Pernice 1999, pp. 706 et seq.; Pernice 2009, pp. 349 et seq. with further references.

¹¹⁵ For suggestions how to advance the EU related national constitutional law, see Wendel 2011a, pp. 206 et seq., 270 et seq. and 409 et seq.

If this was merely of symbolic value, the decision to place a guarantee of human dignity at the top of the Bill of Rights had considerable legal relevance.

Dignity is understood as the foundation for the fundamental rights that follow. It is framed in particularly strong language. Dignity is declared to be 'unantastbar', a term used only with regard to dignity and meaning 'untouchable' or 'sacrosanct'.¹¹⁶ This qualification endows dignity with an absolute character, as has been stated in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court from the very beginning.¹¹⁷ Differently from the rights that follow, it may not be limited and is not subject to balancing. No infringement of dignity is justifiable. If a conflict between dignity and other human rights arises, dignity always trumps. Moreover, according to the text of Art. 1, the state is obliged not only to respect but also to protect dignity. To respect dignity means that the state itself has to avoid all actions that would violate Art. 1; protecting dignity means that the state has to prevent others from endangering dignity.

Article 1 is followed by a catalogue of 18 fundamental rights, most of which are classical liberties. Unlike in the Weimar Constitution, almost no social or economic rights are adopted in the Basic Law. A few more rights considered as equivalent in rank and protection to the guarantees in the Bill of Rights are dispersed over other parts of the Basic Law (e.g. the right to vote, Art. 38, the right to be heard in court, Art. 103, several guarantees in connection with imprisonment, detention etc., Art. 104).

The authors of the Basic Law also made an effort to strengthen the legal force of fundamental rights. In previous German constitutions their impact had been rather minor. Still, during the Weimar Republic, fundamental rights were considered as not binding on the legislature. Social and economic rights were not regarded as legal norms at all, but rather as political programmes. In the Basic Law, all human rights are declared directly applicable and binding on all state powers including the legislature (Art. 1(3)). Limitations of fundamental rights require a law. However, such a law may not touch upon the very essence of a right (Art. 19(2)). All courts are constitutionally obliged to respect and enforce fundamental rights. Article 19(4) guarantees access to the courts to everyone who feels that his rights (not only fundamental rights) have been violated by a public authority. Nevertheless, the incompatibility of a parliamentary law with the Bill of Rights may only be ascertained by the Constitutional Court. If lower courts are of the opinion that a law which they have to apply in a case is incompatible with the Basic Law, they have to stay the procedure and refer this question to the Constitutional Court (Art. 100).

In addition to the norm control procedures (Arts. 93 and 100), the Basic Law provides for an individual complaint that any person can raise if the person alleges that a public authority, including the judiciary, has violated one or more of his fundamental rights (Art. 93 (1) No. 4 a). Out of the nearly 7,000 cases that arrive at the Constitutional Court per year, more than 95% are individual complaints. A number of important decisions that have developed and enforced fundamental rights have been rendered upon individual complaints. The review procedures are further highlighted in Sect. 2.8.3.

¹¹⁶ The usual translation of 'unantastbar', i.e. 'inviolable', does not reflect the enhanced protection that dignity enjoys, because the term 'inviolable' ('unverletzlich') appears frequently in connection with fundamental rights.

¹¹⁷ Most recently confirmed in BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2500/09, inadmissibility of evidence obtained from illegal surveillance of private property (Verwertungsverbot Wohnraumüberwachung), order of 7 Dec. 2011, BVerfGE 130, 1, 22.

The contribution of the jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court to the relevance of fundamental rights for political behaviour and the everyday life of citizens can hardly be overestimated.¹¹⁸ Foreign observers declare it to be exceptional and exemplary for many other jurisdictions.¹¹⁹ Polls show that the BVerfG routinely has the highest confidence rate of all public institutions.

Alongside the Bill of Rights that covers the first nineteen articles of the Basic Law, a number of general principles of law are formulated in Art. 20 and also in Art. 28, which requires homogeneity between the Basic Law and the various constitutions of the German Länder. These principles are: republicanism, democracy, the rule of law, social state and federalism. According to Art. 79(3), they are unamendable. Most of them, with the exception of republicanism and the social state principle, are concretised in the subsequent sections of the Constitution. A number of additional guarantees have been derived from these principles by the jurisprudence of the BVerfG. This is particularly true for the rule of law principle, which has become the roof under which a number of specific legal protections have been developed, such as the non-retroactivity of laws (which is explicitly guaranteed only with regard to criminal law statutes, Art. 130(2)) and the protection of legitimate expectations.

2.1.2 Most fundamental rights are accompanied by a limitation clause. Some of these clauses are unspecified ('by law or pursuant to law'), some contain further qualifications, such as rules as to the purpose, conditions and means of limitation. Some do not have a special limitation clause at all, which, according to the BVerfG, does not mean that they are exempt from limitations, but that only limitations having a basis in other norms of the Constitution, especially in other fundamental rights, are permitted.¹²⁰ This is a consequence of the methodological premise of the BVerfG that the Constitution has to be interpreted as a unity. In addition to the limitation clauses added to certain fundamental rights, there is a general provision requiring that laws which limit a fundamental right have to be general (Art. 19(1)) and that the very essence of the right is protected against any limitation (Art. 19(2)).

The jurisprudence of the BVerfG has added some further guarantees to these rules, the most important being the principle of proportionality which originated in the jurisprudence of the BVerfG and has meanwhile been adopted by many jurisdictions all over the world.¹²¹ According to this principle, a law that limits a ¹¹⁸ For a summary, see Grimm 2015b, pp. 9–29.

¹¹⁹ See Robertson 2010, pp. 40 et seq.

¹²⁰ BVerfG, case 1 BvR 435/68, Mephisto, order of 24 Feb. 1971, BVerfGE 30, 173, 193.

¹²¹ See map in Barak 2012, p. 182.

fundamental right has to have a legitimate purpose (1), it must be suitable (2) and necessary (3) to achieve its purpose and strike a proper balance between the competing legal goods (4), i.e. the fundamental right that has been limited by the law under scrutiny on the one hand and the legal good that the law wants to protect (often itself a fundamental right) on the other hand. The proportionality principle also applies to legal acts, be they court decisions, administrative acts or other legally relevant behaviour of state agents. Over time, the burden of fundamental rights protection has come to rest almost entirely on the safeguards provided by the principle of proportionality. Violations of the specific limitation clauses are rare, and the guarantee of the essence of a right in Art. 19(2) is seldom relevant because the proportionality principle intervenes at an earlier stage.

2.1.3 The rule of law (Rechtsstaat) is explicitly guaranteed in Art. 28. Important elements of the principle are enumerated in Art. 20, yet without mentioning the term 'Rechtsstaat'. The basic element of the rule of law is that the state has to rule not only by law but also according to the law. This means that the state is not only the creator of the law that binds the citizens, but it also submits itself, including its highest organs, to the law (the so-called 'Vorrang des Gesetzes'). This in turn enables the citizens to foresee state actions and to plan their behaviour accordingly. As a consequence, legal certainty (Rechtssicherheit) is regarded as a value in itself, which means that the rule of law may enter into conflict with the demands of justice (e.g. if a perpetrator cannot be punished because evidence was obtained unlawfully). Legal certainty as an element of the rule of law requires that laws are formulated in a way that the addressee can recognise what behaviour is required or forbidden. This of course implies that laws are not only promulgated but also published. An unpublished legal rule does not take legal force.

By the same vein, retroactive laws are prohibited under the rule of law. This is explicitly guaranteed in the Basic Law with regard to criminal law (Art. 103(2)). It has been extended by way of interpretation to other laws as well, as a consequence of the rule of law. However, a distinction is made between so-called genuine and non-genuine retroactivity (echte und unechte Rückwirkung). Genuine retroactivity means that a law is applied to a situation or behaviour that existed or had happened before the law was enacted. Non-genuine retroactivity means a change in an existing legal situation for the future. Different criteria apply to the two forms of retroactivity. Genuine retroactivity requires a particularly strong justification. For non-genuine retroactivity good reasons are sufficient. The principle of proportionality has to be observed. The borderline between the two forms is not particularly clear, and the attempts of the BVerfG to define the two categories have varied over time.

In cases of lawful retroactivity, the rule of law principle requires that the legitimate expectations of the addressees of the law are honoured (Vertrauensschutz). If the citizens could have legitimately trusted in the continuation of a law or situation created by law, the legislature may be obliged to compensate for loss that addressees of the law suffer due to changes in the law or, more often, to provide temporary arrangements that would allow the addressees to adjust to the new situation. In such cases, the statute that disproportionately burdens citizens is not annulled, rather the legislature is obliged to amend it in due time.

However, the rule of law would be incomplete if it only required that the state rule according to law. The state would then be free to decide where it is bound by law and where it can act according to will. The ‘Vorrang des Gesetzes’ is therefore accompanied by the ‘Vorbehalt des Gesetzes’, which defines the areas where state action requires a basis in law (the term ‘law’ covers laws enacted by Parliament and decrees (Verordnungen) enacted by the Government upon an explicit delegation by Parliament). A law is explicitly required for limitations of fundamental rights (Art. 19). However, the BVerfG has extended this requirement beyond the limits of fundamental rights infringements. In areas covered by fundamental rights, all important decisions have to be taken by Parliament itself and cannot be left to the Government in the form of a decree (the so-called ‘Parlamentsvorbehalt’). The ‘Parlamentsvorbehalt’ thus further restricts the constitutional requirements for a delegation of legislative powers in Art. 80 GG.

Finally, the rule of law means that independent courts have the power to control whether the state complies with the laws that bind its activity. This is guaranteed in Art. 19(4), as is the independence of the courts in Art. 97.

The rule of law principle, which was originally objective law (mandatory for the state, but not necessarily entitling individuals), has been transformed into subjective rights of the individual, such that elements which have not explicitly been guaranteed in the form of a subjective right (such as the right to be heard in court, Art. 103) can be invoked before the courts. They also play an important role in the individual complaints to the BVerfG. Individual complaints can only be based on alleged violations of fundamental rights. Yet once this hurdle has been overcome, the BVerfG also takes violations of objective principles into account. This is because infringements of fundamental rights are only justified if they are based on a law which is itself constitutional. This opens the door for criteria that are themselves not subjective rights. As a consequence, the rule of law plays an important role in the jurisprudence of the BVerfG, not only in cases brought by organs of the state or the Länder, but also in individual complaints.¹²²

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 The answer to this question requires some remarks on balancing fundamental rights, especially personal and economic rights, on the national level.

The BVerfG has often declared that no hierarchy exists among the fundamental rights of the Basic Law. The only exception is dignity, which is subject to neither limitation nor to balancing. However, one can find language in the jurisprudence that relativises this assumption. In the first abortion decision, the Court admitted that different ranks in the order of values (Wertordnung) of the Basic Law exist. The Court continued: ‘Human life represents a supreme value (Höchstwert) within the constitutional order; it is the vital basis of human dignity and the precondition of all other fundamental rights’.¹²³ Other decisions suggest a ranking in certain constellations, particularly in conflicts between freedom of speech (Art. 5) and personal honour and privacy (Art. 2 sect. I). In the Lüth case the BVerfG stated that freedom of speech is ‘one of the most distinguished (vornehm) human rights of all. For a free democratic political order it is absolutely foundational … In a certain sense it is the basis of every freedom there is’.¹²⁴

¹²² For an English summary of the rule of law and relevant case law of the German Constitutional Court, see Currie 1994, pp. 162 et seq. and pp. 116–134.

In general, the BVerfG grants stronger protection to personal and communicative rights than to economic rights. This matters in the process of balancing. In step 3, the Court examines whether there are other means that would equally fulfil the purpose of the law but affect fundamental rights less severely. The Court grants the legislature wide discretion with regard to the choice of means in the case of economic regulation. The more personal rights are limited, the more discretion shrinks. Since it is often uncertain what effect a law will have and thus only prognostic considerations are available, the legislature is under a constitutional duty to undertake a serious investigation. However, the Court will not replace the legislature’s prediction with its own. It may be, however, that a risk appears so great that the legislature is constitutionally barred from taking it. This is especially true for experimental laws if it would be extremely difficult or almost impossible to revise the experiment, should it produce considerable negative effects for fundamental rights.¹²⁵

While the second and third steps of the proportionality test concern a means-ends relationship between the purpose of the law and the ways to achieve it in which the fundamental right that is limited plays no role, the limited right is re-introduced in step 4.¹²⁶ Here a cost-benefit analysis is conducted between the cost to the fundamental right by the statutory limitation and the benefit for the legal good in the interest of which the fundamental right is limited. Since in most cases the legal good is itself a fundamental right, the weight that the Court gives to the competing rights matters.

However, the balancing is not undertaken in the abstract. The question is not which right is more and which is less important. The question is rather one of the ¹²³ BVerfG, case 1 BvF 1/74 et al., Abortion I, judgment of 25 Feb. 1975, BVerfGE 39, 1, 42.

¹²⁴ BVerfG, case 1 BvR 400/51, Lüth, judgment of 15 Jan. 1958, BVerfGE 7, 198, 208.

¹²⁵ See, e.g., BVerfG, case 1 BvL 89/87, Broadcasting, judgment of 16 June 1981, BVerfGE 57, 295, 322 et seq.

¹²⁶ This difference is often overlooked. See Grimm 2007.

importance of the aspect of the fundamental right that is affected by the limitation and the intensity of the intrusion on the one hand, versus the importance of the aspect of the competing right that profits from the limitation and the importance of the profit on the other hand. This is a case-by-case assessment for which it is helpful that the Court distinguishes between what can be called the core and the periphery of the right. When it comes to restrictions of personality rights, a threefold differentiation can often be observed, namely between a social, a private and an intimate sphere. Similarly, an internal differentiation of economic rights is made. For example, regarding freedom of property (Art. 14), the Court distinguishes between a personal and a mere functional aspect of property. Whenever property serves as a material basis for the free development of personality, it receives the strong protection that personal rights enjoy. Where property in its function as a basis or an object of economic transactions is concerned, its weight is lower.¹²⁷ The same is true for freedom of profession (Art. 12). The individual choice of a profession is more strongly protected than the exercise of a profession.¹²⁸ In the field of regulation of the economy, in the interest of social justice, workers' protection, consumer protection, protection of the environment and the like, the laws that limit economic rights are usually upheld.

It is widely accepted that in the EU, the four economic freedoms prevailed over personal rights for a long time. The CJEU's mission to establish the Common Market gave these rights their particular strength. Even if social benefits were extended beyond the scope defined by the national laws, this was done not in the personal interest of the beneficiaries, but in the interest of free movement. The question is whether this will change after the adoption of the European Charter of Fundamental Rights (Charter). The decision of the CJEU most frequently quoted in this respect is Omega,¹²⁹ in which the Court agreed that the national guarantee of human dignity in the German Basic Law could justify an exception from the free movement of goods. Yet the CJEU reached this result after balancing human dignity against the free movement of goods, which means that in principle, another outcome could also have been possible, whereas in German constitutional law dignity is guaranteed absolutely so that in a conflict between dignity and any other fundamental right, dignity always trumps. The balancing is further discussed in Sect. 2.8.2.

A special problem is the relation between the European Charter and the national bills of rights. When do national fundamental rights apply and when do European fundamental rights? This will be discussed in Sect. 2.11.1.

¹²⁷ See, e.g., BVerfG, case 1 BvR 532/77 et al., Co-determination, judgment of 1 Mar. 1979, BVerfGE 50, 290, 340.

¹²⁸ See, e.g., BVerfG, case 1 BvR 596/56, Pharmacy, judgment of 11 June 1958, BVerfGE 7, 377. BVerfGE 7, 377 (1958).

¹²⁹ Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

Implementation of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) in Germany: the IRG

The EAW Framework Decision¹³⁰ was implemented into German law as a part of the Act on International Cooperation in Criminal Matters (Gesetz über die Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, hereinafter IRG). The respective provisions can be found in Part VIII regarding the ‘Extradition and Transit to Member States of the European Union’ in Sects. 78–83i IRG. This particular part was introduced into the Act in 2006 after the European Arrest Warrant I decision of the BVerfG of 2005,¹³¹ which struck down the former version enacted in 2004. In 2013 Germany issued a total of 1,932 EAWs, and a total of 12,091 alerts were introduced by other Member States based on the EAW.¹³²

The most relevant provisions regarding the EAW in the IRG for this report are:

Section 78 IRG [Precedence of Part VIII]¹³³

- (1) Unless this Part contains specific regulations, the other provisions of this Act shall apply to the extradition and transit to Member States of the European Union.
- (2) This Part shall take precedence before the international agreements mentioned in s. 1(3) insofar as it contains exhaustive regulations.

Section 79 IRG [Duty to Grant Assistance; Preliminary Decision]

- (1) Admissible requests for extradition or transit by a Member State may only be denied as far as provided in this Part. The decision refusing assistance must contain reasons.
- (2) Prior to the decision of the Oberlandesgericht on admissibility the authority in charge of granting assistance shall decide whether it intends to raise objections under s. 83 b. The decision not to raise objections must contain reasons. It is subject to review by the Oberlandesgericht in the procedure under s. 29; the parties shall be heard. When being notified under s. 41(4) the person sought shall be warned that in the case of simplified extradition a judicial review under the 3rd sentence above is not available.
- (3) If facts arising after a decision under subsection (2) 1st sentence above which are capable of giving rise to obstacles to admissibility do not lead to a refusal, the decision not to raise objections shall be subject to review in the procedure under s. 33.

Section 80 IRG [Extradition of German Citizens]

- (1) The extradition of a German citizen for the purpose of prosecution shall not be admissible unless ¹³⁰ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

¹³¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2236/04, European Arrest Warrant I, judgment of 18 July 2005, BVerfGE 113, 273.

¹³² Council of the European Union, 8414/414 REV 4, LIMITE.

¹³³ Translation of the IRG by Michael Bohlander and Wolfgang Schomburg. Translation of Sect. 83 (1) No. 3, (2), (3) and (4) by Tobias Reinbacher.

1. measures are in place to ensure that the requesting Member State after a final conviction to a sentence of imprisonment or other sanction will offer to return the person sought, if he so wishes, to Germany for the purpose of enforcement and

2. the offence has a substantial link to the requesting Member State.

A substantial link to the requesting Member State typically exists if the conduct underlying the offence occurred wholly or in its essential parts on its territory and the result occurred there at least to an essential degree, or if it relates to a serious offence with a typically transborder quality which was committed at least in part on its territory.

(2) If the conditions of subsection (1) 1st sentence No. 2 above are not fulfilled, the extradition of a German citizen for the purpose of prosecution shall be inadmissible unless

1. the conditions of subsection (1) 1st sentence No. 1 above are fulfilled and the offence
2. has no substantial link to German territory and

3. would under German law also be an unlawful act fulfilling the actus reus and mens rea elements of an offence under German law or would mutatis mutandis be such an offence under German law, and if upon an individual balancing of the competing interests the interest of the person sought in his non-extradition does not outweigh the other interests.

A substantial link to the domestic territory typically exists if the conduct underlying the offence occurred wholly or in its essential parts on German territory and the result occurred there at least to an essential degree. When balancing the interests, special regard shall be had to the nature of the offence, the practical requirements and possibilities of an effective prosecution, the interests of the person sought as protected under civil liberties, taking into account the goals related to the creation of a European Judicial Space and weighing them against each other. If because of the offence on which the extradition request is based a decision by the prosecution service or by a court exists ordering the discontinuance or nonlieu of a criminal investigation, this decision and the reasons for it must be taken into account. This shall also apply if a court has listed a case for trial or has issued a summary judgment in written proceedings.

(3) The extradition of a German citizen for the purpose of enforcement shall be inadmissible unless the person sought after being notified of his rights gives his consent and this is noted in a judicial record. S. 41(3) and (4) shall apply mutatis mutandis.

(4) If the request for enforcement of a final sentence of imprisonment or other custodial sanction was preceded by an extradition because of the offence on which the sentence is based under subsections (1) or (2) above or if the request is based on the non-consent of the person sought under subsection (3) above, s. 49(1) No. 3 shall not apply. If in the case of such a request and for the purposes of conversion under s. 54 there is no maximum penalty for the offence under German law because s. 49(1) No. 3 does not apply, the maximum penalty shall be two years' imprisonment.

Section 81 IRG [Extradition for the Purpose of Prosecution and Enforcement]

S. 3 shall apply under the proviso that

1. extradition for the purpose of prosecution shall not be admissible unless under the law of the requesting Member State the offence is punishable by imprisonment or another sanction with a maximum term of no less than twelve months,

2. extradition for the purpose of enforcement shall not be admissible unless under the law of the requesting Member State a custodial sanction of no less than four months is to be enforced,

3. extradition in tax, customs and currency matters shall also be admissible if the German law does not recognise similar taxes or does not contain similar tax, customs or currency laws as the law of the requesting Member State,

4. double criminality shall not need to be established if the offence on which the request is based is under the law of the requesting State punishable by a custodial sanction with a maximum term of no less than three years and is listed in one of the categories of offences listed in article 2 (2) of the Council Framework Decision 2002/584/JHA

Section 82 IRG [Non-Applicability of Provisions]

Ss. 5, 6 (1), 7 and, insofar as a European arrest warrant is concerned, s. 11 shall not apply.

Section 83 IRG [Additional Conditions of Admissibility]

Extradition shall not be admissible

(1) 1. if the person sought has already been finally tried in another Member State for the offence on which the request is based and that in the case of a conviction the sentence has been enforced, is currently being enforced or can no longer be enforced under the law of the convicting State,

2. if the person sought was at the time of the offence not criminally liable under s. 19 of the Strafgesetzbuch or

3. if in the case of a request for the purpose of enforcement of a sentence the convicted did not appear in person at the trial which resulted in the decision or

4. if the offence upon which the request is based is under the law of the requesting Member State punishable by life imprisonment or another custodial sanction for life or if the person sought was sentenced to such a penalty and there is no review of the penalty or sanction either upon request or proprio motu after a period of no longer than 20 years.

(2) Subsection 1 No. 3 notwithstanding extradition shall be admissible if

1. the convicted person

a) in due time

aa) either was summoned to the trial which resulted in the decision in person or

bb) by other means actually received official information of the scheduled date and place of the trial in such a manner that it was unequivocally established that he or she was aware of the scheduled trial and

b) was informed that a decision may be handed down in absentia,

2. the convicted person, in a case where defence counsel had been appointed, frustrated the service of a summons through flight in the knowledge of the proceedings, or

3. the convicted person being aware of the scheduled trial, had given a mandate to a legal counsellor to defend him or her at the trial, and was indeed defended by that counsellor at the trial.

(3) Subsection 1 No. 3 notwithstanding extradition shall be admissible if the convicted person

1. expressly stated that he or she does not contest the decision or

2. did not request a retrial or an appeal within the applicable time frame.

The convicted person must be expressly informed about the right to a retrial, or an appeal, in which the person has the right to participate and which allows the merits of the case, including fresh evidence, to be re-examined, and which may lead to the original decision being reversed.

(4) Subsection 1 No. 3 notwithstanding extradition shall also be admissible if the convicted person will be personally served with the decision without delay after the surrender and will be informed of his or her right to a retrial or an appeal mentioned in Subsect. 3 sentence 2 and the of the applicable time frame.

Section 83a IRG [Extradition Documents]

...

Section 83b IRG [Obstacles to Granting an Application]

(1) Extradition may be refused

- a) if criminal proceedings are pending against the person sought in Germany for the same offence as the one on which the request is based,
- b) if criminal proceedings against the person sought for the same offence as the one on which the request is based, have either not been instituted or if initiated have been closed,
- c) if a request for extradition by a third State shall be given precedence,
- d) unless on the basis of the duty to surrender under the Council Framework Decision ... on the basis of an assurance by the requesting State or based on other reasons it can be expected that the requesting State would honour a similar German request.

(2) Extradition of a foreign citizen normally living on German territory may further be refused

- a) if in the case of an extradition for the purpose of prosecution the extradition of a German citizen would be inadmissible under s. 80(1) and (2),
- b) if in the case of an extradition for the purpose of enforcement, after being judicially warned, the person sought does not consent on the record of the court and his interest in an enforcement in Germany prevails; s. 41(3) and (4) shall apply mutatis mutandis.

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1–2.3.1.2 The presumption of innocence as a particular manifestation of the principle of the rule of law laid out in Art. 20(3)¹³⁴ of the GG was expounded by Judge Broß in his dissenting opinion in the BVerfG's European Arrest Warrant I decision on the first version of the implementation of the EAW Framework Decision in the IRG.

Article 20 GG [Basic constitutional principles]

...

(3) The legislature shall be bound by the constitutional order, the executive and the judiciary by law and justice.

He claimed that the presumption of innocence protected the person charged with a crime ‘from all disadvantages that are equivalent to a verdict of guilt or a sentence but have not been preceded by proceedings intended to ascertain the person’s guilt that have been conducted under the rule of law in compliance with the code of procedure'.¹³⁵ Only proper main proceedings enable the judge to determine the guilt of the accused and only a final judgment in line with criminal procedural law could rebut the presumption of innocence. In his view, the EAW violates this principle since it treats the person charged with a crime in one of the Member States as if found guilty for the purpose of the extradition even though proper proceedings have not taken place. Interestingly, the appellant did not rely on this constitutional principle and the majority of the Federal Constitutional Court did not consider it in its decision either. Its main concerns were of a different nature.¹³⁶ The Court did not criticise the Framework Decision itself. It only dealt with the question whether the constitutional rights of the Basic Law were respected with regard to the discretion EU law had left to the German Bundestag.¹³⁷

¹³⁴ Also cf. above at Sect. 1.2.1.

First, it held that the basic right of German nationals in Art. 16(2) GG¹³⁸ not to be extradited to a foreign country – unless the law provides otherwise for extraditions to Member States of the EU or to an international court and the rule of law is observed – was violated, since the former version of the IRG did not include the possibility to deny extradition in cases where the respective person was charged with a crime that did not have a substantial link to German territory, i.e. the conduct or its result occurred in Germany. In such cases German nationals were protected from extradition by Art. 16(2) GG and the rule of law.¹³⁹ In other words, the Bundestag should have used the discretion left by the Framework Decision to comply with the German Constitution. It should be kept in mind that Judge Broß also criticised the violation of the presumption of innocence from the perspective of the Constitution's protection of citizenship, since the majority of the Court was not willing to extend it to offences with a significant connecting factor to a foreign country. But if taken seriously, the presumption of innocence as a general principle rooted in the rule of law must apply to all persons, not just German nationals.

Secondly, the IRG did and still does provide for a two-layered system¹⁴⁰ in which the proceedings are divided between the court reviewing the admissibility and political authorities finally granting the extradition. Since the government ¹³⁵ Judge Broß, Dissenting Opinion to the Judgment of the BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2236/04, European Arrest Warrant I, judgment of 18 July 2005, BVerfGE 113, 273, 323; concurring Ranft 2005 at para. 365.

¹³⁶ Other constitutional questions were addressed as well, such as the ‘integration clause’ of Art. 23 GG and the constitutional principles of Art. 20 GG; for a summary of the decision, see von Heintschel-Heinegg 2014, p. 666; Satzger 2012, § 8 para. 30; Sinn and Wörner 2007, p. 204.

¹³⁷ Cf. above at Sect. 1.3.4.

¹³⁸ The text of Art. 16(2) GG can be found above at Sect. 1.2.1.

¹³⁹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2236/04, European Arrest Warrant I, judgment of 18 July 2005, BVerfGE 113, 273, 304 et seq.

¹⁴⁰ This is in itself a violation of the EAW Framework Decision! Cf. von Bubnoff 2005, p. 63; Burchard 2013, § 14 para. 12; Hackner 2012, § 79 IRG para. 1; von Heintschel-Heinegg 2014, p. 670; Reinbacher 2014, p. 544.

authorities were afforded a margin of discretion, in the Court's view, Art. 19(4) GG required that the decision be subject to a judicial review as well.¹⁴¹

Article 19 GG [Restriction of Basic Rights – Legal Remedies]¹⁴²

(4) Should any person's rights be violated by public authority, he may have recourse to the courts. If no other jurisdiction has been established, recourse shall be to the ordinary courts. The second sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 10 shall not be affected by this paragraph.

Both aspects have now been accounted for in the new version of the IRG: Sect. 80 IRG distinguishes between offences with a substantial link to German territory and those with a substantial link to the requesting Member State, and Sect. 79(2) IRG provides for judicial review of the decision of the authority in charge as to whether it intends to raise objections under Sect. 83b IRG (Obstacles to Granting an Application).

Albeit the presumption of innocence did not play a major role in the European Arrest Warrant I decision, the question whether German courts may review the facts and determine whether there is probable cause that the person sought has actually committed the crime he or she is charged with, is nevertheless debated among German scholars and courts. Section 10(2) IRG provides for a review of whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person sought has committed the crime if it is justified by 'special circumstances'.

Section 10 IRG [Extradition Documents]

...

(2) If special circumstances justify a review as to whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person sought has committed the offence with which he is charged, extradition shall be not granted unless a description of the facts showing probable cause for the commission of the offence has been submitted.

It is unclear, however, whether this provision is applicable to EAWs. Before the Framework Decision, this question was debated with regard to the European Convention on Extradition of 1957 as well. Since subject to Sect. 1(3) IRG international treaties take precedence over the regulations of the IRG, Sect. 10(2) IRG seemed not to apply as far as it followed from the respective treaty that there should be no review of the grounds for suspicion.¹⁴³ Although the European Convention on Extradition generally did not provide for such a review, the Federal Court of Justice (Bundesgerichtshof, hereinafter BGH) held that a limited application of Sect. 10(2) IRG was possible in cases where there was evidence to believe that the requesting Member State acted abusively or where it was to be feared that the ¹⁴¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2236/04, European Arrest Warrant I, judgment of 18 July 2005, BVerfGE 113, 273, 309 et seq.

¹⁴² Translation of the GG by Christian Tomuschat and David P. Currie.

¹⁴³ Vogel 2014, § 10 IRG para. 69.

extradited individual was exposed to a violation of fundamental rights and a review of the facts and grounds for suspicion could shed light on these apprehensions.¹⁴⁴

Some courts¹⁴⁵ and commentators¹⁴⁶ argue that Sect. 10(2) IRG applies to EAWs as well, since subject to Sect. 78(1) IRG, other provisions of the Act shall apply to extraditions to Member States of the EU ‘unless this Part contains specific regulations’ – which in this regard it does not. What is more, Sect. 82 IRG specifically states that some provisions of the IRG do not apply to EAWs, but these do not include Sect. 10(2) IRG. The BVerfG demanded that the documents must be sufficient (Sect. 83a IRG) in order to determine the reasonable grounds for the suspicion but also considered Sect. 10(2) IRG as regards EAWs.¹⁴⁷ The Higher Regional Court (Oberlandesgericht, hereinafter OLG) Köln limited the application of Sect. 10(2) IRG to cases where the criteria the BGH had introduced regarding the European Convention on Extradition (abuse or violation of fundamental rights) are fulfilled.¹⁴⁸ It remains to be seen whether the application of Sect. 10(2) IRG is in line with the Framework Decision,¹⁴⁹ which is based on mutual trust and does not include a review of the facts on which the suspicion is based. Additionally, Sect. 10 (2) IRG requires ‘special circumstances’ for such a test. The OLG Karlsruhe, for instance, accepted an alibi for the time of the offence confirmed by several witnesses as a ground for review.¹⁵⁰

Other German courts and commentators refuse to apply Sect. 10(2) IRG in matters regarding EAWs.¹⁵¹ With the exception of Sect. 83a(1) No. 5 IRG, subject to which extradition shall not be admissible unless a description of the circumstances in which the offence was committed, including the time and place of its commission and the mode of participation by the person sought has been transmitted, Sects. 78–83i IRG do not include a review as to whether there are reasonable grounds for the suspicion. Therefore, some commentators interpret Sect. 83a IRG as a ‘lex specialis’ precluding the review of the reasonable grounds subject to Sect. 10(2) IRG.¹⁵² Moreover, the IRG must be interpreted in the light of the Framework Decision, which according to this view does not include a revision

¹⁴⁴ BGH, in: Neue Juristische Wochenschrift (NJW) 1984, p. 2048.

¹⁴⁵ OLG Karlsruhe, in: Strafverteidiger (StV) 2007, p. 650; Higher Regional Court Berlin (Kammergericht, hereinafter KG), in: Strafverteidiger Forum (StraFo) 2010, p. 191.

¹⁴⁶ Von Bubnoff 2005, p. 22; Hackner 2012, § 78 IRG para. 14; Lagodny 2014, § 22 para. 50.

¹⁴⁷ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2115/09, Auslieferungshaftbefehl, order of 9 July 2009, StraFo 2009, p. 460.

¹⁴⁸ OLG Köln, case 6 AusIA 84/11, order of 6 October 2011; concurring Burchard 2013, § 14 para. 51.

¹⁴⁹ Critical Böse 2014, § 83a IRG para. 1.

¹⁵⁰ OLG Karlsruhe, in: StV 2007, p. 650.

¹⁵¹ OLG Stuttgart, in: StV 2004, p. 547; concurring Ahlbrecht and Lagodny 2003, p. 333; Böse 2013, § 83a IRG para. 12; critical Ranft 2005, p. 365.

¹⁵² Böse 2013, § 83a IRG para. 13.

of the facts.¹⁵³ In ‘extreme and exceptional cases’, however, they would allow such a review due to a violation of Sect. 73 IRG (‘ordre public’).¹⁵⁴

Section 73 IRG [Limitations on Assistance (Ordre Public)]

Legal assistance and transmission of data without request shall not be granted if this would conflict with basic principles of the German legal system.

Requests under Parts VIII, IX and X shall not be granted if compliance would violate the principles in Article 6 of the Treaty on [the] European Union.

These thoughts lead us to an even more debated issue: The question whether German courts can refuse to issue an EAW on the grounds that the criminal prosecution or detention in the other Member State (and therefore the extradition of the suspect) would violate basic rights of the German or the European ‘ordre public’.¹⁵⁵ Sect. 73 cl. 1 IRG deals with the German ‘ordre public’. Could an EAW therefore be denied on the grounds of a violation of the rights laid out in the Basic Law? Some German courts apply Sect. 73 cl. 1 IRG and deny extradition in extreme cases due to a violation of the German ‘ordre public’.¹⁵⁶

However, this view is not in line with the prevailing view¹⁵⁷ and the motives of the Bundestag. When enacting Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG, which deals with the European ‘ordre public’, it stated that the German ‘ordre public’ was not applicable to EAWs, since the Framework Decision did not include such a ground for refusal. Instead, cl. 2 was meant to implement Art. 1(3) of the Framework Decision as a special law for EAWs,¹⁵⁸ which is expressed in the phrase ‘Requests under Parts VIII, IX and X’. Therefore, cl. 2 is the exclusive provision for EAWs.¹⁵⁹ This reflects the primacy of EU law,¹⁶⁰ particularly in the light of the CJEU decision in Melloni.¹⁶¹ However, this could still mean that EAWs can be denied subject to Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG if there is a ¹⁵³ Ibid.

¹⁵⁴ Ibid.

¹⁵⁵ Cf. Gaede 2013, p. 1279; Reinbacher 2014, pp. 542–544.

¹⁵⁶ OLG Celle, in: BeckRS 2008, No. 10354 (life imprisonment for possession of small amount of soft drugs violates principle of proportionality); OLG Hamm, in: StV 2011, p. 173 (extradition violates protection of marriage and family).

¹⁵⁷ Vogel 2014, § 73 para. 139. Also cf. Ambos and Poschadel 2015, § 73 para. 65; cl. 1 regards international cooperation but is only applicable if there are no directly applicable provisions of an international treaty which take precedence subject to Sect. 1(3) IRG; cl. 2 regards cooperation within the EU.

¹⁵⁸ Bundestag Printed Paper (Bundestagsdrucksache, hereinafter BT-Drs.) 15/1718, pp. 11, 14.

¹⁵⁹ Burchard 2013, § 14 para. 47; Vogel 2014, § 73 IRG paras. 10, 139. Vogel 2014, § 73 para. 136 rightly points out that Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG therefore should have been placed in Part VIII of the IRG among the provisions dealing with extradition in the EU instead.

¹⁶⁰ Cf. Ambos and Poschadel 2015, § 73 para. 65: German basic rights not applicable due to primacy of EU law; Böse 2014, Vor § 78 para. 26: German basic rights have been replaced by the European ordre public unless the Framework Decision leaves a margin of discretion.

¹⁶¹ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107, para. 59: ‘Rules of national law, even of a constitutional order, cannot be allowed to undermine the effectiveness of EU law on the territory of that State.’

violation of the principles of Art. 6 TEU, so that for instance Art. 6(2) of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) could be invoked with regard to the presumption of innocence in accordance with Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG.

However, since the CJEU decisions *Melloni*¹⁶² and *Radu*¹⁶³ it has become unclear whether Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG is in line with EU law.¹⁶⁴ Some interpretations of these judgments go so far as to assume that the CJEU would only accept a refusal of an EAW on the grounds laid out in Arts. 3–5 of the Framework Decision.¹⁶⁵ Others point out that the Court did not specifically say that a violation of the principles of Art. 6 TEU did not count as a ground for refusal, and that on the contrary, Art. 1(3) of the Framework Decision demands that the European ‘ordre public’ itself be respected.¹⁶⁶ It should also be noted that European law, including the Framework Decision, must be interpreted in the light of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU,¹⁶⁷ which the Member States must respect pursuant to Art. 51 of the Charter ‘when they are implementing Union law’. What is more, all EU Member States are bound by the ECHR, so that individuals can ultimately apply to the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) pursuant to Art 34 ECHR in the case of a violation of the Convention by the extraditing state.

Most German commentators argue in favour of Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG.¹⁶⁸ They claim that even though German law is to be interpreted in the light of EU law and even if the CJEU actually interprets the Framework Decision differently, there must not be an interpretation of the German provision contra legem, i.e. against the wording of Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG.¹⁶⁹ Furthermore, if the core of the European ‘ordre public’ were not respected, some commentators hold that the German Federal Constitutional Court could then evoke the emergency jurisdiction it has reserved for an identity review in exceptional circumstances,¹⁷⁰ since fundamental rights would no longer be protected. Some German courts also apply Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG and consider a violation of Art. 6 TEU as a reason for denial to execute an EAW.¹⁷¹

¹⁶² Case C-399/11 Melloni, n. 161.

¹⁶³ Case C-396/11 Radu [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013: 39.

¹⁶⁴ Ambos and Poschadel 2015, § 73 paras. 70–76; Burchard 2013, § 14 para. 49; Heger and Wolter 2015, Art. 1 RbEuHb para. 644; Reinbacher 2014, pp. 543–544; Vogel 2014, § 73 IRG paras. 137–138.

¹⁶⁵ Brodowski 2013, p. 56, pointing out that a conflict between the CJEU and BVerfG might arise.

¹⁶⁶ Burchard 2013, § 14 para. 49; also cf. Inhofer 2015, § 79 IRG para. 1.

¹⁶⁷ Ambos and Poschadel 2015, § 73 IRG para. 73.

¹⁶⁸ Ambos and Poschadel 2015, § 73 IRG paras. 70–76; Böse 2014, Vor § 78 para. 25; Inhofer 2015, § 79 para. 1, referring to Case C-105/03 Pupino [2005] ECR I-05285, para. 47: ‘... the principle of conforming interpretation cannot serve as the basis for an interpretation of national law contra legem’.

¹⁶⁹ OLG München, in: StV 2013, p. 710; Burchard 2013, § 14 para. 47.

¹⁷⁰ Gaede 2013, p. 1280; also cf. Brodowski 2013, p. 56; on the judicial reservations in exceptional circumstances, cf. supra at Sect. 1.3.4.

¹⁷¹ Recent decisions: OLG Karlsruhe, in: BeckRS 2014, No. 11797; OLG München, in: StV 2013, p. 710; OLG Stuttgart, in: NJW 2010, p. 1617.

Very recently the BVerfG actually decided on the matter of human rights and the EAW.¹⁷² When assessing an EAW and the extradition of an American citizen from Germany to Italy, the Court relied upon the inviolability of human dignity arising from Art. 1(1) GG, and invoked its identity review to claim jurisdiction over the case.¹⁷³ The accused had been convicted *in absentia*¹⁷⁴ in Italy and claimed that he had not had any knowledge of the proceedings and would not be granted a proper (re-)trial including a hearing of evidence in Italy, even though Sect. 83 No. 3 IRG of 2006 demanded ‘a trial de novo in which the charges against him will be reviewed in their entirety and where he will be given the right to be present at the trial’. The OLG Düsseldorf, however, relied on the information from the Italian Prosecutor’s Office that the accused would be granted a restoration to the (missed) deadline for an appeal, and therefore held that a proper review of the case including a new hearing of evidence could not be ruled out. The BVerfG decided that the OLG had failed its obligation to investigate the matter further as to whether there would in fact be a proper hearing of evidence in the new trial. The Court explained that German courts always have to respect Art. 1(1) GG when issuing EAWs.¹⁷⁵ The BVerfG stated, however, that the limitations on extradition imposed by EU law requirements were identical to the limitations arising from Art. 1(1) GG.¹⁷⁶ As regards the IRG, the Court declared that regardless of the actual meaning of Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG (which it left open), this provision did not prevent German courts from respecting Art. 1(1) GG when they interpret Sects. 78–83i IRG.¹⁷⁷

2.3.2 Nullum Crimen, Nulla Poena Sine Lege

2.3.2.1 In the European Arrest Warrant I decision of 2005 the BVerfG also turned to Art. 103(2) GG.¹⁷⁸

Article 103 GG [Fair Trial]

- (1) In the courts every person shall be entitled to a hearing in accordance with law.
- (2) An act may be punished only if it was defined by a law as a criminal offence before the act was committed.

¹⁷² BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, order of 15 December 2015. This decision was delivered long after this report was finalised and could therefore only be considered briefly.

¹⁷³ Cf. Sect. 1.3.4.

¹⁷⁴ For in absentia judgments and the EAW, cf. Sect. 2.3.3.

¹⁷⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, order of 15 December 2015, para. 83.

¹⁷⁶ Ibid., para. 84.

¹⁷⁷ Ibid., para. 108.

¹⁷⁸ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2236/04, European Arrest Warrant I, judgment of 18 July 2005, BVerfGE 113, 273, 308.

(3) No person may be punished for the same act more than once under the general criminal laws.

Subject to this provision an act may only be punished if it was defined by law as a criminal offence before the act was committed. The Court again considered this principle from the perspective of Art. 16(2) GG, which permits the extradition of German nationals only if ‘the rule of law is observed’. The Court reported correctly that the principle of nulla poena sine lege as enshrined in Art. 103(2) GG only applies to substantive criminal law and not to procedural law – to which the laws on extradition in Germany belong.¹⁷⁹ The Court argued, however, that if a German citizen were answerable for acts that did not have a significant connecting link to a foreign country and were not punishable crimes in Germany when they were committed, ‘this could be tantamount to a retroactive amendment of substantive law’.

Again, it must be pointed out that the Court was merely concerned about acts committed primarily in Germany. This is indeed a convincing perspective,¹⁸⁰ for if a person commits an act in a foreign country, which constitutes a punishable crime under the law of that country, the problem of nulla poena does not arise, since the respective criminal laws existed at the time of the act in the state where it was committed. The situation is much more problematic, however, if foreign laws apply even when the person physically acts in a country (e.g. his or her own) where the act is not a punishable offence. There are certain conditions under which criminal laws can extend to foreign countries, e.g. either because both the act and the result are considered as a ‘place of the offence’ – as provided for in Sect. 9(1) of the German Criminal Code (Strafgesetzbuch, hereinafter StGB) – and these two places differ, or because other principles, such as the active or passive personality principle, apply.¹⁸¹

Consequently, a situation can arise where a person’s behaviour is perfectly in line with the laws of the country where he or she physically acts (and resides), whereas it may at the same time constitute an offence in a different country. This is for instance quite common when crimes are committed on the internet where laws of multiple jurisdictions can apply. German scholars have repeatedly given the example of Sect. 130(3) StGB, which makes it a punishable act to publicly deny or downplay any act committed under the rule of National Socialism in Germany – a particularity of German criminal law.¹⁸² In theory, such an act could be prosecuted in Germany if it were committed online, even if the person charged with the offence physically acted in a different country that does not criminalise such behaviour.¹⁸³

¹⁷⁹ Ibid.

¹⁸⁰ Reinbacher 2014, p. 536.

¹⁸¹ Cf. Deiters 2003, p. 360; Reinbacher 2014, p. 610.

¹⁸² Cf. Deiters 2003, p. 360; Reinbacher 2014, pp. 610, 616–618; Schünemann 2003, p. 188.

¹⁸³ This was actually the case in the BGH’s famous Toeben decision; BGH, case 1 StR 184/00, judgment of 12 December 2000, in: NJW 2001, p. 624.

With the EAW in force, the extradition of nationals of other EU states to Germany with regards to this particular crime becomes a possibility.

While some German scholars argue that the most punitive laws will thereby become applicable in the entire EU¹⁸⁴ and claim that the democratic principle – and the (constitutional) laws that prevent a country from extraditing its own nationals – imply that no one shall be punished for an offence in the enactment of which he did not participate by way of the democratic process, the problem actually predominantly arises when an act is committed in the person's own country. When acting abroad there are good reasons why foreign laws should apply because everyone has to respect the (criminal) laws of the country the person is in, regardless of the fact that the person could not vote for the parliament that enacted them. Therefore, the questions whether and when national criminal laws apply become crucial. This could lead to a broad discussion of a matter which is still far from being solved if there were enough space to elaborate on it – in short: whether and when there are reasonable grounds for a state to apply its criminal laws in relation to an act.¹⁸⁵

With regards to the EAW, however, the BVerfG has excluded the admissibility of extraditions in cases that are not significantly connected to the country that seeks the extradition, and Sect. 80 IRG now implements this requirement. Subject to Sect. 80(1) cl. 1 No. 2 IRG, Germany does not extradite German citizens unless the offence has a substantial link to the requesting Member State, and cl. 2 elaborates that such a substantial link exists if the conduct underlying the offence occurred wholly or in its essential parts on its territory and the result occurred there at least to an essential degree, or if it relates to a serious offence with a typical cross-border quality which was committed at least in part on its territory. If these conditions are not fulfilled, Sect. 80(2) IRG requires that the act be an offence under German law as well. On the other hand, the catalogue of offences that do not need to be an offence under German law if there is a necessary link to another Member State has been fiercely criticised in the light of the principles of clarity and certainty,¹⁸⁶ particularly because the wording has been deemed to be much too broad.¹⁸⁷

However, the crucial point with regards to the nulla poena principle is that the Member State that seeks the extradition must have established sufficient criminal laws before the act was committed.¹⁸⁸ As regards the European 'ordre public' (Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG), the requirements are not as strict as in Art. 103(2) GG, since common law is a sufficient source as well, so that an Act of the respective parliament is not necessary.¹⁸⁹

¹⁸⁴ Schünemann 2003, p. 188; Schünemann 2007, p. 532.

¹⁸⁵ German law treats the question of the applicability of German criminal law as a part of substantive criminal law in Sects. 3–9 StGB, whereas in other legal systems it is a question of criminal procedural law.

¹⁸⁶ Schünemann 2003, p. 188; cf. von Bubnoff 2005, p. 10; Satzger 2012, § 8 para. 26.

¹⁸⁷ Schünemann 2003, p. 188: 'a catalogue of key words'; also cf. Satzger 2012, § 8 para. 26: 'offences only outlined roughly'.

¹⁸⁸ Conrad 2013, p. 192; Heger 2007, p. 224.

¹⁸⁹ Vogel 2014, § 73 IRG para. 60.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 It should first be noted that German criminal procedural law in general bans in absentia judgments, cf. Sect. 230(1) of the German Code of Criminal Procedure (Strafprozessordnung, hereinafter StPO),¹⁹⁰ so that the respective problem does not arise for EAWs issued in Germany.

Section 230 StPO [Failure of the Defendant to Appear]¹⁹¹

(1) No main hearing shall be held against a defendant who fails to appear.

...

The rules relating to EAWs issued by other Member States that permit in absentia judgments are provided for in Sect. 83(1) No. 3 IRG. Subject to this provision, extradition from Germany shall not be admissible if, in the case of a request for the purpose of enforcement of a sentence, the convicted did not appear in person at the trial which resulted in the decision. This provision implemented not only the original Framework Decision but also the view of the BVerfG, which ruled that in absentia judgments violate basic principles of German constitutional law and of international law, e.g. the principle of fair trial subject to Art. 103(1) GG (right to a hearing in the courts) and Art. 6(3) ECHR, or human dignity subject to Art. 1(1) GG,¹⁹² unless certain criteria are met.¹⁹³ The Court held, however, that an extradition was admissible if the accused had fled from trial in the ‘knowledge of the proceedings’ and defence counsel had been appointed and able to defend the accused in line with the rule of law.¹⁹⁴ Accordingly, subject to the former Sect. 83 No. 3 IRG of 2006 extradition was not admissible if in the case of a request for the purpose of enforcement the sentence on which the request is based was issued in absentia and the person sought had not been personally summoned to or otherwise been informed about the date of the hearing which led to the judgment in absentia unless the person sought, in a case where defence counsel had been appointed, frustrated the service of a summons through flight in the knowledge of the proceedings against him, or if after his transfer he is granted a trial de novo in which the charges against him will be reviewed in their entirety and where he will be given the right to be present at the trial.

¹⁹⁰ There are a few exceptions to this general rule provided for in Sect. 231 et seq., 408a and the new 329(2) StPO, which are beyond the scope of this report.

¹⁹¹ Translated by Brian Duffett and Monika Ebinger.

¹⁹² The text of Art. 1 GG can be found above in Sect. 1.2.1.

¹⁹³ Cf. BVerfG, case 2 BvR 283/05, order of 4 July 2005, in: Neue Zeitschrift für Strafrecht (NStZ) 2006, para. 102; also cf. BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, order of 15 December 2015.

¹⁹⁴ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1255/86, order of 17 November 1986, in: NJW 1987, p. 830; BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1704/90, order of 24 January 1991, in: NJW 1991, p. 1411; BVerfG, case 2 BvR 26/04, order of 3 March 2004, in: Neue Zeitschrift für Strafrecht Rechtsprechungsreport (NStZ-RR) 2004, p. 308.

Section 83 IRG was amended in 2015 in order to implement Art. 4a of the Framework decision. Its new wording is almost identical to the wording of the respective EU legislation.

The new Sect. 83(2) No. 2 IRG still allows extraditions in cases where the accused frustrated the service of a summons through flight ‘in the knowledge of the proceedings’ if defence counsel had been appointed. This was also the case under the version of 2006, whereas under the former provision of 2004 extradition was not admissible even in cases of flight, unless the accused had been personally ‘summoned to’ or otherwise been ‘informed about the date of the hearing’, so that knowledge of the proceedings as such was not sufficient.¹⁹⁵ In other words: the extradition of a fugitive from justice was not admissible if he or she did not have knowledge of the actual date of the hearing.¹⁹⁶ During the legislative procedure after the European Arrest Warrant I decision, the Bundesrat was critical of the fact that extradition to Member States of the EU was thereby more difficult than to other states, since the BVerfG had allowed extradition in cases of flight if the accused had knowledge of the proceedings as such.¹⁹⁷ The amendment followed the Bundesrat’s objections.

The 2006 version of Sect. 83 IRG was enacted before Art. 4a of the Framework Decision came into force. Yet still, according to the most convincing view, it had to be read together with Art. 4a of the Framework Decision which thereby complemented the German provision.¹⁹⁸ Some problems stemming from the different wording have now been solved. For instance, the former Sect. 83 No. 3 IRG of 2006 allowed extradition after an in absentia judgment if the accused had ‘otherwise been informed’ of the date of the hearing, whereas Art. 4a of the Framework Decision demands that the accused has ‘actually received official information’ and has been informed that a decision may be handed down if he or she does not appear for the trial. While some courts and commentators would simply rely on the wording of the former Sect. 83 No. 3 IRG and accept any kind of knowledge of the date of the hearing,¹⁹⁹ the OLG Oldenburg held that these requirements must be read into the German provision.²⁰⁰ The new Sect. 83(2) No. 1 (a) (bb) now demands ‘official information’.

Before the EAW was introduced, the BVerfG and the BGH held that the right to appear before a court was an integral part of the fair trial principle, Art. 103(1) GG, and of the right to human dignity, Art. 1(1) GG, and did therefore not allow the extradition if this right was violated.²⁰¹ It has been the constant view of the BVerfG

¹⁹⁵ OLG Karlsruhe, in: StV 2004, p. 548; Hackner 2005, p. 313.

¹⁹⁶ OLG Karlsruhe, in: StV 2004, p. 548.

¹⁹⁷ BT-Drs. 16/1024, p. 23.

¹⁹⁸ OLG Oldenburg, in: BeckRS 2013, 16497.

¹⁹⁹ OLG Karlsruhe, in: StV 2004, p. 548; Hackner 2012, § 83 IRG para. 6.

²⁰⁰ OLG Oldenburg, in: BeckRS 2013, No. 16497.

²⁰¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1704/90, order of 24 January 1991, in: NJW 1991, p. 1411; BGH, in: NJW 2002, p. 228.

that the unalterable parts of the Basic Law have to be respected in cases of extradition, which it has particularly claimed in cases of in absentia judgments.²⁰² As explained above, the ‘ordre public’ is provided for in Sect. 73 IRG. But since Sect. 83 IRG is a special provision that specifically deals with in absentia judgments so that subject to the wording of Sect. 78 IRG other provisions do not apply, some German courts have ruled that extraditions in cases of in absentia judgments are only to be assessed subject to Sect. 83 IRG when dealing with EAWs, i.e. Sect. 73 IRG is not applicable.²⁰³ Some commentators agree and interpret Sect. 83 IRG as a ‘lex specialis’ compared to Sect. 73 IRG.²⁰⁴ However, since in absentia judgments may be unconstitutional not only from the perspective of the Basic Law but may also violate basic principles of international²⁰⁵ and European law, such as Art. 6(3) ECHR,²⁰⁶ other commentators would still rely on the principles of Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG as a residual provision, arguing that the European ‘ordre public’ was meant to be the basic standard for all EAW procedures,²⁰⁷ or would at least interpret Sect. 83 IRG in the light of the European ‘ordre public'.²⁰⁸ This would mean, for instance, that proceedings in absentia must comply with the rule of law.²⁰⁹ When introducing the Bill for the 2015 version of Sect. 83 IRG the German Government explained that Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG contains a general provision to respect the European ‘ordre public’, so that, for instance, it was not necessary to include the proviso in Sect. 83 IRG that the convicted person be informed of the trial in a language he or she understands, since the right to an interpreter is a minimum right subject to Art. 6(3)(e) ECHR.²¹⁰

Again, the BVerfG’s recent European Arrest Warrant II decision shed some light on the Court’s view on the matter – even though it regarded the 2006 version of Sect. 83 IRG. As explained above in Sect. 2.3.1, the Court stated that German courts must always respect Art. 1(1) GG (and interpret the IRG accordingly).²¹¹ In cases of in absentia judgments the courts must therefore, for instance, investigate whether there will be a proper trial in the requesting state, including the hearing of evidence – if there are substantial reasons to doubt it.

²⁰² BVerfG, case 2 BvR 315/83, order of 9 March 1983, in: NJW 1983, 1726; case 2 BvR 1704/90, order of 24 January 1991, in: NJW 1991, p. 1411.

²⁰³ OLG Stuttgart, in: NStZ-RR 2008, p. 176.

²⁰⁴ Ambos and Poschadel 2015, § 73 para. 91.

²⁰⁵ Cf. BVerfG, case 2 BvR 26/04, order of 3 March 2004, NStZ-RR 2004, 308, 309, arguing that the core of the respective right is also a basic standard of international law, which is incorporated into German law subject to Art. 25 GG.

²⁰⁶ Cf. ECtHR, Colozza v. Italy, 12 February 1985, Series A no. 89.

²⁰⁷ Vogel 2014, § 73 IRG para. 140.

²⁰⁸ Böse 2013, § 83 IRG para. 15.

²⁰⁹ Ibid.

²¹⁰ BT-Drs. 18/3562, pp. 80 et seq.

²¹¹ Ibid., para. 110.

2.3.4 Fair Trial and Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 Many German scholars argue that if an issuing Member State does not comply with the rule of law during the proceedings, extradition can then be denied subject to Sect. 73 IRG, as explained above at Sect. 2.3.1. As regards extradition proceedings in Germany, the basic defence rights under the IRG apply. The person sought may at any time have the assistance of counsel (Sect. 40 IRG), he or she has the right to remain silent and must be informed of these rights (Sect. 21(2) IRG). Under certain circumstances counsel will be assigned to the person sought subject to Sect. 40(2) IRG: ‘1.) if due to the factual or legal complexity of the case assistance appears appropriate, in proceedings according to paragraph 2 of Part VIII, especially in cases of doubt whether the conditions of Sects. 80 and 81 no. 4 have been fulfilled; 2.) if it is apparent that the person sought cannot himself adequately protect his rights; or 3) if the person sought is under 18 years of age’. Additionally, subject to Sect. 77 IRG, the rules of criminal procedure of the StPO apply as well.

On the other hand, as was explained above, German courts usually do not review the grounds for the suspicion or the lawfulness of the foreign decision, unless Sects. 10(2), 73 cl. 2 IRG apply in ‘special circumstances’, and therefore defence in the requesting state becomes necessary.²¹² Some commentators argue that in order to comply with the rule of law, German authorities need to permit an undisturbed and unlimited communication between the accused and his or her defence counsel abroad.²¹³ It is not easy, however, to find counsel in a foreign country if for instance the person sought is not a national of the requesting state and is located in Germany. The German Association of Criminal Defenders maintains contacts with similar associations in foreign countries,²¹⁴ and big law firms may have branches abroad. Yet generally the accused must take these measures into his or her own hands. Some scholars have therefore demanded the establishment of an organisation on the EU level funded by the EU called ‘Eurodefensor’ as a pendant to Eurojust, meant to provide assistance for criminal defenders in cases with a trans-border dimension.²¹⁵

Among the many questions regarding the practical challenges of extradition procedures, two further aspects shall briefly be dealt with: the costs of the proceedings and compensation for wrongful imprisonment. With regard to the costs of the proceedings, subject to Sect. 77 IRG, the respective provisions of the StPO apply, mainly Sects. 467, 467a StPO. In practice, this means in particular that the German state will bear the necessary costs of a chosen defence counsel if the person sought does not consent to the extradition, requests a court decision subject to Sect. 29 IRG and the court then decides in his or her favour.²¹⁶

²¹² Vogel and Burchard 2014, § 77 IRG para. 43.

²¹³ Ibid.

²¹⁴ <http://deutsche-strafverteidiger.de/kontakt/auslandskontakt.html>.

²¹⁵ Schünemann 2004, p. 14; also cf. Reinbacher 2014, p. 622.

²¹⁶ Vogel and Burchard 2014, § 77 IRG para. 66.

Compensation for wrongful imprisonment in Germany is granted subject to the provisions of the Compensation for Prosecution Act (Gesetz über die Entschädigung für Strafverfolgungsmaßnahmen, hereinafter StrEG), which generally only applies to imprisonment in Germany. Furthermore, Sect. 77 IRG does not refer to the StrEG, thereby excluding its applicability to measures regarding extradition, so that even in the case of wrongful extradition detention in Germany, compensation will not be paid if arrest and detention were stipulated by a foreign country and German authorities were not responsible for the wrongful accusation and imprisonment.²¹⁷ This means that the affected person has a claim for compensation against the German state solely for the wrongful actions of German authorities. However, subject to Sect. 2(3) StrEG, compensation will also be granted for extradition detention or measures of search and seizure abroad if stipulated by German authorities. Apart from this, compensation for wrongful imprisonment in other Member States will not be granted.²¹⁸

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1–2.3.5.2 The transfer of the principle of mutual recognition to the field of criminal law, which also underlies the concept of the EAW, has been the object of a controversial discussion in Germany. Some scholars point out that the principle was in itself a ‘neutral concept’²¹⁹ since it meant integration instead of cooperation and also provided positive effects for the accused, such as the principle of ne bis in idem by recognising foreign court decisions. Other commentators, however, harshly criticise the concept.²²⁰ They claim that whereas in the Single European Market the principle of mutual recognition meant an expansion of freedom, in the field of criminal law it meant a limitation of freedom. Some scholars state that the mechanism of mutual recognition could ‘cause fundamental defensive rights to go astray’.²²¹ The recognition of evidence as a ‘marketable good’ in particular is deemed to be the cause for a reduction of defensive rights,²²² since it led to a ‘rag rug’ of laws undermining the balance of the respective procedural laws. What is more, some commentators claim that market liberalisation and laws on the free movement of goods, etc., usually contain exceptions in order to respect

²¹⁷ BGH, in: NJW 1984, p. 1310; OLG Hamm, in: BeckRS 2009, No. 08021; OLG Köln, in: NStZ-RR 2006, p. 151; Vogel and Burchard 2014, § 77 IRG para. 63.

²¹⁸ OLG Düsseldorf, in: NStZ 1988, p. 371.

²¹⁹ Böse 2014, Vor § 78 para. 19; Gleß 2004, p. 356; Vogler 1989, p. 254.

²²⁰ Braum 2009, p. 419; Hecker 2015, § 12 para. 63; Satzger 2012, § 8 para. 24; Schünemann 2003, p. 187.

²²¹ Satzger 2012, § 8 para. 24.

²²² Gleß 2004, p. 365; Hecker 2015, § 12 para. 64.

considerations of the ‘ordre public’ of the Member States, whereas in the field of criminal law such reservations are missing.²²³

Here again we reach the crucial question, which has already been dealt with in Sect. 2.3.1 and Sect. 2.3.3: do national courts simply have to execute the decisions of other Member States or can they review the decisions as to whether there is a violation of the national or the European ‘ordre public’? As a short reminder, the Bundestag stated that only the European ‘ordre public’ as provided for in Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG was to be taken into account when executing EAWs. Even though some would argue that it has even become unclear whether Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG is in line with European law since the CJEU’s decisions in Melloni and Radu seem to indicate otherwise, German courts still rely both on cl. 1 and cl. 2 when dealing with EAWs. As regards cl. 1, German courts have, for instance, denied an extradition due to bad conditions of detention in the requesting Member State which violated fundamental rights,²²⁴ due to a violation of the principle of proportionality (of the sentence) as an integral part of the rule of law²²⁵ and because an extradition would mean a violation of Art. 6 GG, according to which ‘[m]arriage and the family shall enjoy the special protection of the state’.²²⁶

While these decisions are criticised since they rely on Sect. 73 cl. 1 IRG and the Basic Law, other decisions reach similar conclusions by relying on cl. 2. In this regard courts have examined whether the conditions of detention²²⁷ or the repeal of parole *in absentia*²²⁸ complied with the fundamental rights protected by the ECHR, or whether the sentence was unbearably harsh.²²⁹ This is the most interesting point, since the courts must find a way to reconcile the concept of mutual recognition with the fundamental rights of the accused, which has been the underlying question of this entire report.

On the one hand the concept of mutual recognition would be dead if every national court generally had the right to question and review the decisions of the courts of other Member States. Indeed it cannot be denied that a more intense form of cooperation is necessary when borders vanish and citizens can move freely between states. As the EU has become more integrated, it seems to be only natural that the field of criminal law cannot be spared as a ‘reservation of national law’.²³⁰ Furthermore, it was a clear decision of the EU ‘legislator’ to establish mutual recognition in the field of criminal law and to introduce the EAW as a significant step. This EU policy must not be undermined by the courts of the Member States.

²²³ Satzger 2012, § 8 para. 24.

²²⁴ OLG Bremen, in: BeckRS 2014, No. 10396; OLG Hamm, in: NStZ-RR 2014, p. 228.

²²⁵ OLG Celle, in: BeckRS 2008, No. 0354.

²²⁶ OLG Hamm, in: StV 2011, p. 173.

²²⁷ OLG Karlsruhe, in: BeckRS 2014, No. 11797; OLG München, in: BeckRS 2015, No. 18224.

²²⁸ OLG München, in: StV 2013, p. 710; Sect. 83 No. 3 IRG was not applicable since the original conviction had not been an in absentia judgment.

²²⁹ OLG Stuttgart, in: NJW 2010, p. 1617.

²³⁰ Satzger 2012, § 7 para. 2.

Therefore, it must generally be accepted that the review of foreign decisions is not what the EU institutions had in mind, since this could invalidate the entire concept of mutual recognition.

On the other hand, one must not be blind towards the fact that there are still huge differences both in the law and in the conditions of detention in the Member States. Clearly, one could argue that it would be preferable to assimilate the substantive and procedural criminal laws of the Member States before mutual recognition can be enforced. In comparison, mutual recognition of criminal court decisions is a common thing in the Federal Republic of Germany, and Bavarian courts certainly recognise the decisions and arrest warrants of Hessian courts. But both German states have the same Penal and Procedure Code, since criminal law is almost entirely federalised in Germany. The situation is still very different within the EU. However, one should also keep in mind that the European 'ordre public' is a common base for all Member States. The logic of mutual recognition implies that because all criminal law systems within the EU are based on the fundament of the ECHR, mutual trust becomes possible. In other words: simply because all Member States have to respect the European 'ordre public' they can trust one another without any review of their respective decisions.²³¹ Therefore, mutual recognition is built on a presumption of compliance with fundamental rights. Yet still, unfortunately this does not mean that these rights are actually respected in all cases. In this regard Sect. 73 cl. 2 IRG reveals the scepticism of the Bundestag towards the concept of mutual recognition.²³²

The German courts therefore seek to find a way that is 'friendly' towards Europe but also protects fundamental rights: in general judgments of other Member States must be accepted and enforced, so that there is no review of the grounds for suspicion or of the lawfulness of the proceedings or the sentence, but in cases of evident violations of fundamental rights in the requesting Member State, the courts apply Sect. 10(2) IRG or deny extraditions subject to Sect. 73 IRG, so that they for instance need not expose extradited citizens knowingly to very bad conditions in other Member States. In other words: the presumption of compliance can be rebutted in special circumstances.

Allowing the extraditing state such a test of compliance with the European 'ordre public' means shifting from the protection of human rights in the requesting state to a 'preventive protection' in the extraditing state. If one bears in mind both the fact that the requesting state is actually responsible for the violation of fundamental rights and that the concept of mutual recognition generally does not allow a review in the extraditing state, such preventive protection must be limited to exceptional cases. It has rightly been pointed out that the debate therefore needs to focus on finding criteria as to when such a situation actually arises.²³³ The prerequisites in the field of EAWs have yet to be clarified. Even though the ECtHR and ²³¹ Vogel 2014, § 73 IRG para. 133.

²³² Ibid., para. 134.

²³³ Burchard 2013, § 14 para. 51.

the CJEU might develop a different approach and perspective as regards the ‘preventive protection’ of human rights, it is interesting to highlight that both courts require ‘substantial grounds’ to believe that the person will be exposed to violations of human rights.²³⁴ Another crucial matter that then naturally needs to be resolved is the question of the onus of proof of such a violation.²³⁵

The BVerfG’s recent European Arrest Warrant II decision again contains some interesting aspects in this regard. The Court pointed out that Member States must not assist one another in violations of human rights.²³⁶ Therefore, German courts must look into the treatment that awaits the extradited person in the requesting state. The Court specifically mentioned in absentia judgments.²³⁷ This means that in the Court’s view the concept of mutual trust is only valid as long as it is not rebutted in the individual case.²³⁸ This, however, requires an exceptional case.²³⁹ Applying its view in matters of international cooperation, the Court stated that a binding international agreement that the requesting state will respect human rights is enough to dispel such doubts.²⁴⁰ Furthermore, the accused must give sufficient and concrete evidence of the violations (of human dignity) in the individual case. It does not suffice for the accused to point out that the requesting state violated human rights in ²³⁴ Opinion of A.G. Sharpston in Case C-396/11 Radu [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:648, para. 77; cf. ECtHR, Soering v. the United Kingdom, 7 July 1989, Series A no. 161 regarding an extradition from the UK to the USA, and CJEU, Joined cases C-411/10 and C-493/10 N.S. and Others [2011] ECR I-13905 regarding the Common European Asylum System but demanding ‘systemic flaws’; also cf. Art. 3(2) of the Regulation (EU) No 604/2013 of the European Parliament and of the Council [2003], OJ L 180/31 (Dublin III): ‘... substantial grounds for believing that there are systemic flaws in the asylum procedure and in the reception conditions’; emphasis added by Tobias Reinbacher.

²³⁵ Cf. the Opinion of A.G. Sharpston in Case C-396/11 Radu, n. 232, paras. 78–85, suggesting an approach differing from the one followed by the ECtHR: The requested person ‘must persuade the decision-maker that his objections to the transfer are substantially well founded’.

²³⁶ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, order of 15 December 2015, para. 62.

²³⁷ Ibid., para. 69.

²³⁸ Ibid., para. 68.

²³⁹ Ibid., para. 68.

²⁴⁰ Ibid., para. 70. It might be interesting to note that the OLG Karlsruhe for instance relied on the reports of the Committee for the Prevention of Torture of the Council of Europe in order to determine the conditions of arrest and detention in the country seeking extradition and that – since these reports stated that the conditions of the prisons in this country differed with regards to human rights protection – it then allowed the extradition only under the terms that the competent authority expressly agreed in an internationally binding way to detain the extradited person in a facility in line with the ECHR; OLG Karlsruhe, in: BeckRS 2014, No. 11797.

the past.²⁴¹ Concrete evidence is only dispensable if there is ‘a constant practice of gross and well-known violations of human rights in the respective state on many occasions’.²⁴²

2.3.6 Constitutional Rights Regarding Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law

The principle of mutual recognition has been and still is one of the most controversial issues, passionately criticised by many German authors. But of course, other matters are debated as well with regard to EU criminal law and the constitutional rights in the Basic Law. The general relationship of national constitutional rights and EU law and the respective decisions of the BVerfG have been dealt with above in Sect. 1.2.1. It should, however, be pointed out that in the view of many commentators, criminal law is a specific field that particularly affects fundamental rights and therefore demands ‘a different treatment’, i.e. special protection against ‘encroachments’ from the EU. This has different implications. For instance, the ‘democratic question’, to which the BVerfG turned in the light of the right to vote set out in Art. 38 GG,²⁴³ was also debated with regards to criminal law as an essential part of the principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege in Art. 103(2) GG. Some authors argue that the EU not only lacks the competence to enact criminal laws but also the demos to do so in a proper, democratic way. The basic rights of the accused give cause for earnest concerns as well when it comes to EU law and the ‘Europeanisation’ of national substantive or procedural criminal law. This has led to the rather sceptical attitude of many German scholars towards an EU criminal law. Various proposals have been published, of which a prominent one is the ‘Alternativentwurf’ by Schünemann et al. More recently, the European Criminal Policy Initiative published two manifestos, the first dealing with substantive criminal law and the second with criminal procedural law,²⁴⁴ that highlight the need for a consistent European criminal policy, including the proper protection of the rights of the accused. The multi-level system of human rights protection in the German Basic Law, the ECHR and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU, and the relationship of the respective courts enforcing these rights is another matter which has given cause for critical statements, as it is feared that the standard of the constitutional rights protection of the German Basic Law which the BVerfG has established might be diminished. Space constraints do not allow a further consideration of these or other aspects of EU criminal law.

²⁴¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, order of 15 December 2015, para. 71.

²⁴² Ibid., para. 71.

²⁴³ Cf. Sect. 1.3.3.

²⁴⁴ <http://www.crimpol.eu/>.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 In Germany, the implementation of the Data Retention Directive²⁴⁵ raised deep concerns in the general public and led to severe conflicts among political parties. In order to explain the agitation, it may be helpful to recall the salience that data protection has had in Germany since the 1980s. When in 1983 the Bundestag unanimously passed a census law that included a number of questions relating to the private circumstances of the inhabitants, a broad protest movement emerged. Demonstrations were organised nationwide. Militant groups called for a boycott of the census and gave instructions how to do this. Behind the concerns was the fear that the census might open the door to a revival of authoritarianism in Germany. In December 1983, the BVerfG declared the census law unconstitutional.²⁴⁶ The judgment was based on Art. 2(1), the right to free development of personality. The BVerfG found that free development of personality would be seriously endangered if the state had the power to collect and use personal data without the individual knowing what the state knows about him.

To be sure, data protection had been recognised before the Census judgment as part of the protection of privacy, also derived from Art. 2(1) in connection with Art. 1(1) by way of interpretation. However, the Court found the existing protection insufficient in view of the new technique of electronic data processing, which allowed for the storage, use, synchronisation, transmittal and combination of large amounts of data within seconds. It thus became possible to produce a complete profile of a person. The distinction between harmless data that deserved no protection and sensitive data that had to be protected thereby lost its justification. The Court therefore dissociated data protection from privacy and derived an independent right to informational self-determination from Art. 2(1) in connection with Art. 1(1). Germany thus became a pioneer in data protection. The judgment had enormous consequences in many fields of the law. Dozens of laws had to be amended in order to bring them in line with the requirements of Art. 2(1).

The judgment gained particular importance when, following the seminal changes of 1989/90 and especially after 9/11, a number of laws against organised criminality and terrorism were passed. Between 1999 and 2014, the BVerfG reviewed eleven anti-terrorism laws or laws that had been amended in connection with the so-called fight against terrorism.²⁴⁷ Ten of these laws created or enlarged the surveillance power of public prosecution, police, secret and other services or obligated private telecommunication enterprises to store and transmit personal data. Eight of these ten laws were declared unconstitutional, one was declared constitutional if interpreted and applied in conformity with the Basic Law, and one was found unobjectionable. Most of the laws violated Art. 2(1) (informational self-determination) in connection with Art. 1(1) (dignity); some violated the more specific guarantees of Art. 10(1) (secrecy of postal and telecommunication services) and Art. 13 (inviolability of the home), and some also violated Art. 19(4) (access to courts).²⁴⁸ In ²⁴⁷ The cases are BVerfG, case 1 BvR 2226/94 et al., Telecommunications Surveillance, judgment of 14 July 1999, BVerfGE 100, 313, concerning a law that enlarged the surveillance powers of the Bundesnachrichtendienst; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 2378/98 et al., Eavesdropping (Großer Lauschangriff), judgment of 3 Mar. 2004, BVerfGE 109, 279, concerning an amendment to Art. 13, which was found compatible with Art. 79 (3), and an amendment to the statute of criminal procedure which allowed the acoustic surveillance of phones in order to fight organised criminality; BVerfG, case 2 BvR 581/01, Global Positioning System, judgment of 12 Apr. 2005, BVerfGE 112, 304, concerning a law against organised criminality that allowed the public prosecution to perform surveillance by means of GPS; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 518/02, Dragnet Investigation II, order of 4 Apr. 2006, BVerfGE 115, 320 concerning a North Rhine-Westphalian law that allowed profiling; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 1550/03, Account Master Data, order of 12 June 2007, BVerfGE 118, 168., concerning a law that allowed automatic search of banking accounts; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 370/07 et al., Online Searches, judgment of 10 Oct 2007, BVerfGE 120, 274, concerning a North Rhine-Westphalian law that allowed online search (in this case the Court developed the right to integrity and confidentiality of communication systems); BVerfG, case 1 BvR 256/08 et al., Data Retention, judgment of 2 Mar. 2010, BVerfGE 125, 260, concerning the implementation of Directive 2006/24/EC on Data Retention; BVerfG, case 2 BvR 236/08 et al., Law on the Revision of Telecommunications Monitoring (TKÜ-Neuregelung), order of 12 Oct. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 208, concerning a law that allowed the search and taping of telecommunications; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 1299/05, Assignment of Dynamic IP Addresses, order of 24 Jan. 2012, BVerfGE 130, 151, concerning a law that created a duty of private enterprises to retain certain telecommunication data; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 1215/07 Law on the Establishment of an Anti-Terrorism Databank, judgment of 24 Apr. 2013, BVerfGE 133, 273, concerning a law that established an anti-terrorism databank. See in addition BVerfG, case 1 BvR 966/09 and 1140/09, Federal Office of Criminal Investigation (Bundeskriminalamt), judgment of 20 April 2016.

²⁴⁵ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

²⁴⁶ BVerfG, case 1 BvR 209/83 et al., Census, judgment of 15 Dec. 1983, BVerfGE 65, 1.

²⁴⁸ The relevant articles read:

‘Art. 1(1) Human dignity shall be inviolable. To respect and protect it shall be the duty of all state authority.

Art. 2(1) Every person shall have the right to free development of his personality insofar as he does not violate the rights of others or offend against the constitutional order or the moral law.’

Art. 10(1) The privacy of correspondence, posts and telecommunications shall be inviolable.

(2) Restrictions may be ordered only pursuant to a law. If the restriction serves to protect the free democratic basic order or the existence or security of the Federation or of a Land, the law may provide that the person affected shall not be informed of the restriction and the recourse to the courts shall be replaced by a review of the case by agencies and auxiliary agencies appointed by the legislature.

Art. 13(1) The home is inviolable.

(2) Searches may be authorised only by a judge or, when time is of the essence, by other authorities designated by the laws, and may be carried out only in the manner therein prescribed.

almost all cases the Court found that the laws, in limiting these rights, had not stricken a proper balance between the fundamental rights of the individuals and the legitimate security interest of the state (proportionality in the narrower sense). In the judgment on online search, the BVerfG, once again in reaction to scientific and technological change, found it necessary to further develop the right to informational self-determination and derived from Art. 2(1) in connection with Art. 1(1) a constitutional guarantee of integrity and confidentiality of electronic communication systems.²⁴⁹

It does not therefore come as a surprise that many citizens challenged the law that was passed in order to implement EU Directive 2006/24. The BVerfG saw no need to refer the question whether the directive was valid under European law to the CJEU. The Court declared that, on the one hand, the Directive was extremely far-reaching, but found, on the other hand, that a number of particularly sensitive questions, such as the conditions of use, transfer and protection of the data retained, was left to the Member States and gave the national legislature ample discretion. In the Court's view, the Directive could be implemented in a constitutional way,

(3) If particular facts justify the suspicion that any person has committed an especially serious crime specifically defined by a law, technical means of acoustical surveillance of any home in which the suspect is supposedly staying may be employed pursuant to judicial order for the purpose of prosecuting the offence, provided that alternative methods of investigating the matter would be disproportionately difficult or unproductive. The authorisation shall be for a limited time. The order shall be issued by panel composed of three judges. When time is of essence, it may also be issued by a single judge.

(4) To avert acute dangers to public safety, especially dangers to life or to the public, technical means of surveillance of the home may be employed only pursuant to judicial order. When time is of the essence, such measures may also be ordered by other authorities designated by a law; a judicial decision shall subsequently be obtained without delay.

(5) If technical means are contemplated solely for the protection of persons officially deployed in a home, the measure may be ordered by an authority designated by a law. The information thereby obtained may be otherwise used only for purposes of criminal prosecution or to avert danger and only if the legality of the measure has been previously determined by a judge: when time is of the essence, a judicial decision shall subsequently be obtained without delay.

(6) The Federal Government shall report to the Bundestag annually as to the employment of technical means pursuant to paragraph (3) and, within the jurisdiction of the Federation, pursuant to paragraph (4) and, insofar as judicial approval is required, pursuant to paragraph (5) of this Article. A panel elected by the Bundestag shall exercise parliamentary oversight on the basis of this report. A comparable parliamentary oversight shall be afforded by the Länder.

(7) Interferences and restrictions shall otherwise only be permissible to avert a danger to the public or to the life of an individual, or, pursuant to a law, to confront an acute danger to public safety and order, in particular to relieve a housing shortage, to combat the danger of an epidemic, or to protect young persons at risk.

Article 19(4) Should any person's rights be violated by public authority, he may have recourse to the courts. If no other jurisdiction has been established, recourse shall be to the ordinary courts. The second sentence of paragraph (2) of Art. 10 shall not be affected by this paragraph.'

²⁴⁹ BVerfG, case 1 BvR 370/07 et al., Online Searches, judgment of 10 Oct 2007, BVerfGE 120, 274.

regardless of the primacy of EU law.²⁵⁰ Thus, the BVerfG could confine itself to a review of the German implementation of the Directive, which it found to be in violation of Art. 10(1) (secrecy of telecommunications) because it did not strike a proper balance between the legitimate security interest of the state and the individual freedom guaranteed in Art. 10(1).

In spite of the annulment of the Directive by the CJEU,²⁵¹ a new law on data retention is being prepared. A compromise between the Minister of the Interior, who found such a law indispensable and the Minister of Justice, who found it unnecessary and constitutionally dubious, was recently reached.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 There is not the slightest doubt that laws have to be published in order to take legal force.

The Basic Law distinguishes between the passing of a law (Zustandekommen), Art. 78, and the certification (Ausfertigung), promulgation (Verkündung) and entry into force (Inkrafttreten), Art. 82, of a law. Here the promulgation is of interest. Promulgation means the publication of the text of the law. Publication takes place at the very moment when the law gazette is distributed.²⁵² Only upon promulgation is the legislative process completed.²⁵³ Promulgation is not a mere addition to the legislative process, but ‘an integral part of the act of law-making’.²⁵⁴ Should a text claim to be law without having been promulgated, the BVerfG would not declare it unconstitutional, but a legal nullity. Promulgation is regarded as a requirement of the rule of law. It has the function of enabling the public to take notice of law.²⁵⁵ A distinction between an invalid law and a law that is inapplicable to individuals as made in the Heinrich case of the CJEU is not recognised in German constitutional law.

²⁵⁰ BVerfG, case 1 BvR 256/08 et al., Data Retention, judgment of 2 Mar. 2010, BVerfGE 125, 260.

²⁵¹ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

²⁵² BVerfG, case 2 BvR 457/78, Legal Assistance Treaty, order of 22 Mar. 1983, BVerfGE 63, 343, 353; BVerfG, case 2 BvL 2/83, Income Tax Law, order of 14 May 1986, BVerfGE 72, 200, 241.

²⁵³ BVerfG, case 1 BvL 19/75 et al., Contergan, judgment of 8 July 1976, BVerfGE 42, 263, 283.

²⁵⁴ BVerfG, case 2 BvL 38/56, Tax Reform of Rheinland-Palatinate, order of 19 March 1958, BVerfGE 7, 330, 337.

²⁵⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvL 25/81, Federal Building Act (Verfassungsmäßigkeit des Bundesbaugesetzes § 12 S. 3), judgment of 22 Nov. 1983, BVerfGE 65, 283, 291.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 The German Bill of Rights has once been amended because of a judgment of the CJEU. The Court found that Art. 12a(4) sentence 2, according to which women were barred from rendering services in the army involving the use of arms, was incompatible with EU law.²⁵⁶ The amendment transformed the total prohibition into a prohibition of a duty to render armed services. But as far as I can see there are no cases in which the BVerfG has lowered the standard of fundamental rights protection in order to make its jurisprudence compatible with CJEU standards.²⁵⁷ It seems, however, that conflicts between the European and the German standard are becoming more likely. The well-known Solange II formula is still valid; this and further explanations are provided in Sect. 2.8.4.

As later judgments have confirmed, there has been no Solange III in which the BVerfG would have given up the power to deny European law or acts of application of European law applicability in Germany if they fall short of the German standard.²⁵⁸

The area where conflicts might arise is growing. In particular, the CJEU and the BVerfG differ in their interpretation of Arts. 51 to 53 of the European Charter. This will be discussed in more detail under Sect. 2.11.1.

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 The Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) was challenged in the BVerfG by several individual complaints (of which one was signed by 11,717 complainants). The targets of the complaints were the German ratification law concerning the amendment of Art. 136 TFEU; the German law regarding the establishment of the ESM; the German law regulating the financial contribution of Germany to the ESM; and the German law on stability, coordination and control within the Economic and Monetary Union. The complaints were combined with an application for a preliminary injunction, which would prohibit the Federal President from promulgating the laws before the BVerfG rendered its decision on the subject matter. The complaints were based on Art. 38(1) (right to vote) in combination with Art. 20(1) (democracy) and Art. 79(3) (eternity clause). Some complaints relied additionally on Art. 3(1) (equal treatment), Art. 14(1) (freedom of property) and Art. 20(4) (right to resistance). Furthermore, the parliamentary group 'Die LINKE' brought an 'Organstreit' action,²⁵⁹ claiming (in addition to the challenges of the said laws) that their status as Members of Parliament, guaranteed in Art. 38(1)(2), had been violated.

²⁵⁶ Case C-285/98 Kreil [2000] ECR I-00069.

²⁵⁷ The Banana market case does not contradict this statement. It is true that the Frankfurt Administrative Court – which referred the case to the BVerfG was of the opinion that the European regulation violated – among others – Art. 14 GG (freedom of property) and Art. 12 GG (freedom of occupation). However, the BVerfG decided the case on purely formal grounds: the administrative court had failed to demonstrate that the fundamental rights protection within the EU had fallen below the standard that is indispensable according to German constitutional law (cf. BVerfG, case 2 BvL 1/97, Banana Market, order of 7 June 2000, BVerfGE 102, 147).

²⁵⁸ See in particular BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 353 et seq.

The BVerfG rendered two judgments, one on 12 September 2012, regarding the application for a preliminary injunction,²⁶⁰ and one on 18 March 18 2014²⁶¹ on the main issue.

The BVerfG proceeds on an application for a preliminary injunction only if the main proceedings are admissible (zulässig) and not evidently unfounded. If these legal requirements are met, the application is decided on factual grounds, the question being which potential harm to fundamental rights or other constitutionally protected goods would be greater: the harm if the injunction were granted but it was later determined in the main proceedings that the law at stake was constitutional, or the harm if the injunction were refused and later the law was found unconstitutional. Since this decision requires predictions, the assessment of the Government is usually given strong weight.

The decision in the injunction proceedings basically follows this pattern. The BVerfG declared the individual complaints admissible insofar as they were based on Art. 38(1) in combination with Art. 20(1) and Art. 79(3). The Organstreit proceedings were found admissible with the exception of one of the claims. However, the judgment is unusual insofar as the question whether the main proceedings have a chance of success is treated in great length (almost 50 pages in the official publication) although the Court calls it a summary review. This was, of course, due to the immense urgency of the issue. The Court reached the conclusion that most of the claims had no chance of success. Insofar as they might have a chance of success, the Court made the ratification and promulgation of the laws connected with the ESM dependent on a binding clarification in international law that the financial obligations of the Federal Republic would not exceed the limit set in Annex II of the Treaty, that no additional obligation could be requested without the consent of Germany and furthermore that the provisions of the Treaty would not prevent the full information of the Bundestag. Given this result of the summary review, an assessment of the consequences of either granting or refusing the injunction was no longer necessary.

²⁵⁹ The 'Organstreit' is regulated in Art. 93 (1) GG: 'The Federal Constitutional Court shall rule 1. on the interpretation of this Basic Law in the event of disputes concerning the extent of the rights and duties of a supreme federal body or of other parties vested with rights of their own by this Basic Law or by the rules of procedure of a supreme federal body'.

²⁶⁰ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1390/12 et al., ESM & TSCG – summary review, judgment of 12 Sept. 2012, BVerfGE 132, 195.

²⁶¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1390/12 et al., ESM & TSCG, final decision, judgment of 18 Mar. 2014, BVerfGE 135, 317.

The opinion referred to the previous judgments of the BVerfG in European matters. As early as 1993, the Court had ruled in its Maastricht decision that individual complaints against amendments of the Treaties of Rome may be based on an alleged violation of the right to vote in Art. 38(1).²⁶² According to the opinion, the right to vote not only guarantees participation in elections, but also that the elected body, the Parliament, has sufficient power to translate the popular will into political measures. A transfer of powers to the EU that would deprive the Bundestag of substantive legislative powers would violate the right to vote. The measures to cope with the financial crisis gave the Court an opportunity to concretise this ruling with regard to the budgetary powers of the Bundestag.²⁶³

The Court regarded the budget as a central element of democratic will formation. It is fundamental for the self-government of the people. The budget is the place where conceptual political decisions find expression. Hence, Art. 38(1) prevents the Bundestag from giving up its responsibility for the budget (Haushaltsverantwortung) in a way that it or a future Parliament would no longer be able to exercise budgetary power in a responsible way. However, membership in a supranational organisation is not per se at odds with this responsibility. Even if treaty obligations are very high, they do not violate the Bundestag's budgetary power, provided that the Bundestag remains the place where any decision regarding a transfer of resources to a supranational entity like the EU is taken. Similarly, the duty to follow a certain budgetary or fiscal policy does not necessarily violate the principle of democracy if it is self-imposed. The decision of the Bundestag must be free from external determination. Budgetary responsibility may not be transferred to other actors by way of giving these actors discretion as to what is required from the Federal Republic. Blanket empowerments of international organisations are prohibited. The financial burden for the Federal Republic has to be calculable.

The Court had earlier found the rescue measures for Greece in stark tension with these principles.²⁶⁴ It nevertheless reached the result that they were acceptable because the financial engagement was limited (at that time to 123 billion EUR plus a possible 20% surplus that would raise the guarantee to 147.6 billion EUR); because every single measure required the consent of the Bundestag and the conditionality of resource grants remained under its control; finally because the rescue programme was limited in time.

The tension increased immensely, however, with the establishment of the ESM. This was no longer a temporary but rather a permanent institution, and the amount of money to be put at the disposal of the ESM rose to around 190 billion EUR (the annual budget of the Federal Republic without the budgets of the Länder is around 300 billion EUR). Although in the view of the BVerfG the new Art. 136(3) TFEU leads to a fundamental change with regard to the Economic and Monetary Union insofar as the autonomy of the national budget is severely restricted, it does not amount to a loss of that autonomy, since it does not include a transfer of competences to the EU. In sum, the Court found that the basic principles of the Monetary Union were still preserved, to wit the prohibition of a financing of a Member State's budget by the ECB and the prohibition of a bail out. Some dangers that the ESM created for national sovereignty could be dealt with by a binding interpretation of the treaty. The suspension of the voting rights of Member States in default was not imminent if the ability of the Bundestag to provide the necessary sum was guaranteed. Ultimately, the Court overcame its concerns by mentioning that it had constantly strengthened the position of the Bundestag within the German political system.

²⁶² BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2134, 2159/92, Treaty of Maastricht, judgment of 12 Oct. 1993, BVerfGE 89, 155, 171 et seq.

²⁶³ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1390/12 et al., ESM & TSCG – summary review, judgment of 12 Sept. 2012, BVerfGE 132, 195.

²⁶⁴ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 987/10 et al., Aid to Greece & EFSF, final decision, judgment of 7 Sep. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 124, 180.

After this decision in the injunction proceedings, it could not come as a surprise that the Court approved the constitutionality of the ESM Treaty in the main judgment.²⁶⁵ The complainants had meanwhile extended their challenges to a number of subsequent German and European legal acts, among them the so-called Sixpack and the TARGET2-system. Before the final judgment was rendered, the CJEU had decided that the amendment of Art. 136 TFEU was compatible with Art. 48 TEU as well as with Art. 125 TFEU.²⁶⁶ The ESM Member States had issued a declaration in 2012 that satisfied the conditions of the preliminary judgment of the BVerfG. This opinion is shorter than that of 2012 (35 pages). The criteria applied are the same. The individual complaints and the claim by 'Die LINKE' were dismissed.

2.7.2 Even before the final decision in the ESM case, the BVerfG had to deal with the Outright Monetary Transactions (OMT), announced but not yet implemented by the European Central Bank (ECB). The complainants in the OMT case were largely identical to those in the ESM proceedings. Their complaints as well as the 'Organstreit' procedure brought by 'Die LINKE' were directed against the decision of the ECB of 6 September 2012, and furthermore against the failure of the Federal Republic to take action against the decision of the ECB. The 'Organstreit' aimed at obliging the German Bundestag to undertake steps toward an abrogation of the ECB's decision and towards a ban of the measures announced in that decision. Because the OMT programme had not actually been implemented, the Bundestag and the federal Government argued that the case was inadmissible. With a 6:2 decision, the BVerfG stayed the procedure and referred a number of questions concerning the compatibility of the ECB decision with Union law to the CJEU.²⁶⁷ It was the first referral for a preliminary ruling by the BVerfG ever. The BVerfG had serious doubts as to whether the decision of the ECB was within the limits of the bank's power and stated these doubts in a 62 page opinion. The Court affirmed its position that it is prepared to deny European legal acts applicability in Germany if they are ultra vires or interfere with the identity of the Basic Law.

²⁶⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1390/12 et al., ESM & TSCG, final decision, judgment of 18 Mar. 2014, BVerfGE 135, 317.

²⁶⁶ Case C-370/12 Pringle [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:756.

²⁶⁷ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2728/13 et al., OMT, order of 14 Jan. 2014, BVerfGE 134, 366.

Meanwhile, the CJEU has responded, saying that provided that some provisos are observed, the decision of the ECB does not violate Union law.²⁶⁸ The BVerfG is now proceeding with the case. The oral argument took place in February 2016.

Altogether there are now eight judgments from Karlsruhe concerning measures taken in order to cope with the financial crises:

- BVerfGE 125, 385 (2010) – Aid to Greece, injunction
- BVerfGE 129, 124 (2011) – Aid to Greece & EFSF, final decision
- BVerfGE 130, 318 (2012) – EFSF – Special Parliamentary Committee
- BVerfGE 131, 152 (2012) – ESM & Euro Plus Pact – Information of the Bundestag
- BVerfGE 132, 195 (2012) – ESM & TSCG – summary review
- BVerfGE 132, 287 (2012) – Ratification of amendment to Art.136 TFEU, injunction
- BVerfGE 134, 366 (2014) – OMT, referral to the CJEU
- BVerfGE 135, 317 (2014) – ESM & TSCG, final decision.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 (a) There is no information available on the number of applicants that have requested a preliminary ruling with regard to the validity of an EU measure in German courts.

(b) From 2006 to 2014, German courts sent 672 preliminary ruling requests to the CJEU, the highest number (97) in 2013, the lowest (59) in 2007 and 2009. No information is available as to the European measures contested.

(c) There are no figures available with regard to preliminary ruling references from German courts that have led to a partial or full annulment of the relevant EU measure.

2.8.2 In general, the CJEU submits national law to a rather strict standard of proportionality, whereas it applies a lenient standard to Union law. Consequently, the standard of judicial review of the European Court vis-à-vis Union law is lower than the standard of national constitutional courts or supreme courts vis-à-vis national law. In addition, there are differences regarding the fundamental rights or principles involved. The CJEU protects the four economic freedoms and their concretisation more strictly than the Member States' courts usually protect economic rights. As a general rule, one can say that in Germany, economic rights like freedom of property and freedom of profession (which include most of the four economic freedoms) are the weakest rights unless they touch upon the preconditions of the free development of personality. This follows already from the unique formulation of Art. 14 (freedom of property). According to Sect. 1, not only the limits but also the content of the right may be determined by law. Section 2 reads: 'Property entails obligations. Its use shall also serve the public good.' Regarding Art. 12 (freedom of profession), it follows from the difference between the individual choice of a profession, which is protected strongly, and the exercise of a profession, which is subject to broad regulation.²⁶⁹

²⁶⁸ Case C-62/14 Gauweiler and Others [2015] ECLI:EU:C:2015:400.

2.8.3 The BVerfG clearly takes a rigorous approach when reviewing legislation as well as regulations and administrative acts. So do the administrative courts vis-à-vis administrative acts. Perhaps the most important effect of the Court's jurisprudence and popular support is that the requirements of the Basic Law are taken into account relatively early and in a relatively neutral way in the process of legislation. In particular, if draft laws originate in the executive (which is true for the vast majority of drafts), the Constitution and the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court are constantly present. Each draft is submitted to a constitutionality check by the Ministry of Justice and/or the Ministry of the Interior. Also the constitutionality of international agreements is reviewed early in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in order to avoid a defeat in the BVerfG when it comes to ratification in the German Parliament.

There are three proceedings in which a legal norm can be reviewed as to its constitutionality: abstract norm control (initiated by the Federal Government, the Governments of the Länder and a certain portion of the Members of Parliament; for a long time this was one-third of the Members of Parliament, but as of recently, one-fourth); concrete norm control (referral by ordinary courts for a preliminary ruling) and individual complaints. The possibility for individuals to directly challenge a law is restricted; usually it is an incidental review, enabled by the requirement that a fundamental right may only be limited on the basis of a valid law. Around 96.5% of all proceedings are constitutional complaints, of which some 2 % are successful. The next most frequent proceeding is concrete norm control, representing about 35 cases per annum, whereas cases of abstract norm control are very rare (an average of 2.5 per annum).

The total number of laws that have been declared unconstitutional is: 484 federal laws, 213 state (Länder) laws. In the last five years, the figures are 39 federal laws and 35 state laws, which is an average of six federal laws and seven state laws per year.

²⁶⁹ See, e.g., BVerfG, case 1 BvR 532/77 et al., Co-determination, judgment of 1 March 1979, BVerfGE 50, 290.

Among the norms that have been declared unconstitutional, a few have failed because the legislative procedure did not meet the requirements of the Basic Law (e.g. the rights of the Bundesrat were disregarded). A little higher is the amount of laws that have failed because Parliament lacked the competence for the subject matter. The majority have failed because they violated fundamental rights. The vast majority of these laws have not met the requirements of the principle of proportionality. The majority among these failed at the last stage of the proportionality test (proportionality in the narrower sense, balancing).

In order to assess the impact of judicial review fully, it should be borne in mind that the BVerfG not only confirms or annuls existing laws, but also obliges the legislature to legislate if protection (or better protection) of a fundamental right is required by the Constitution. This requirement need not be explicitly provided for in the text. The BVerfG recognises an obligation of the state to protect fundamental rights from menaces emanating not from the state itself, but from private or social actors (the so-called duty to protect, Schutzpflicht).

2.8.4 The BVerfG not only claims the power to review national laws that implement Union law, it also exercises this power. The most recent examples are the decisions on the European Arrest Warrant and on the data retention law.²⁷⁰ In both cases, the Court refrained from reviewing the European framework decision and the European directive respectively, but declared the German laws that implemented them unconstitutional because – within the German Parliament's area of discretion – the Bundestag did not provide sufficient protection of fundamental rights guaranteed in the Basic Law. However, there seems to be a different opinion regarding the delimitation of the discretion that a directive or framework decision leaves. The CJEU tends to define it more narrowly than the BVerfG.

However, the BVerfG declares referrals of national laws that implement Union law inadmissible if the ordinary court has not sufficiently clarified whether the national laws only implement Union law or act within the area of discretion.²⁷¹ Still, in the Data Retention case the Court found an individual complaint against a national law that implemented mandatory Union law to be admissible. The complainant had argued that the EU lacked legislative power to regulate the subject matter and in addition violated EU Charter rights. In the Pringle case, the CJEU had previously rejected a claim by Ireland that the EU lacked legislative competence in this subject matter.²⁷² It had, however, left open the question of compatibility with Charter rights. The BVerfG considered the individual complaint admissible, although it was based on Union law, because the complainants pursued the aim of obtaining a referral by the BVerfG to the CJEU in the expectation that the CJEU

²⁷⁰ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2236/04, European Arrest Warrant I, judgment of 18 July 2005, BVerfGE 113, 273; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 256/08 et al., Data Retention, judgment of 2 Mar. 2010, BVerfGE 125, 260; BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, order of 15 December 2015.

²⁷¹ BVerfG, case 1 BvL 3/08, Investment Allowance Act, order of 4 Oct. 2011, BVerfGE 129, 186.

²⁷² Case C-370/12 Pringle, n. 266.

would annul the Directive on Charter grounds and so pave the way for the BVerfG to review the German law.²⁷³ The BVerfG found, however, that a preliminary ruling by the CJEU was not necessary since the European directive left sufficient room for national legislation and that the challenged norms were not determined by Union law.²⁷⁴

Solange II is not relevant in this context. It applies to Union law and its compatibility with the Basic Law. To this extent Solange II is still valid law:

As long as the European Communities, in particular European Court case law, generally ensure effective protection of fundamental rights against the sovereign powers of the Communities, which is to be regarded as substantially similar to the protection of fundamental rights required unconditionally by the Constitution, and insofar as they generally safeguard the essential content of fundamental rights, the BVerfG will no longer exercise its jurisdiction to decide on the applicability of secondary Community legislation cited as the legal basis for any acts of German courts or authorities within the sovereign jurisdiction of the Federal Republic of Germany, and it will no longer review such legislation by the standard of fundamental rights contained in the Basic Law.²⁷⁵

The BVerfG rejects individual complaints against Union law and referrals of Union law to Karlsruhe unless they specify that the European standard of fundamental rights protection is no longer equivalent to the German standard.

Some authors understand the judgment of the BVerfG in European Arrest Warrant II as a Solange III. In this decision the BVerfG reiterated its jurisprudence that there are insurmountable limits to the applicability of EU law in Germany, which follow from the identity of the German Constitution as laid down in Art. 79(3). Among them is the guarantee of human dignity. As a consequence, the BVerfG considers an individual complaint to be admissible if it claims a violation of Art. 1(1) of the Basic Law. In such a case the Court will review the act that is challenged ‘irrespectively of its jurisprudence as to the inadmissibility of individual complaints and referrals which claim a violation of fundamental rights in the Basic Law by secondary Union law’.²⁷⁶ Here the Court guarantees indispensable fundamental rights protection, unrestricted in the specific case, by way of identity control.²⁷⁷ However, the Court avoided a conflict with EU law by finding no significant difference between the requirements of Art. 1(1) of the Basic Law and EU law in the case at hand.

2.8.5 In its Solange II judgment, the BVerfG admitted that compared with the standard of fundamental rights under the Basic Law it may be that the guarantees for the protection of such rights established thus far by the decisions of the European Court, since they have naturally been developed case by case, still contain gaps

²⁷³ BVerfG, case 1 BvR 256/08 et al., Data Retention, judgment of 2 Mar. 2010, BVerfGE 125, 260, 306 et seq.

²⁷⁴ Ibid., pp. 308 et seq.

²⁷⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 197/83, Solange II, order of 22 Oct. 1986, BVerfGE 73, 339, LS 2.

²⁷⁶ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, judgment of 15 December 2015, para. 34.

²⁷⁷ Ibid., para. 49.

.... What is decisive, nevertheless, is the attitude of principle which the Court maintains at this stage towards the Community's obligations in respect of fundamental rights.²⁷⁸

This statement is followed by the well-known formula that the European Court's case law has generally to ensure effective protection of fundamental rights, which is substantially similar to the protection of fundamental rights in the Basic Law and in so far as they generally safeguard the essential content of the fundamental rights. This shows that certain differences and gaps are accepted as inevitable consequences of the independence of the two courts in the different contexts – state here, international community there – in which they operate.

2.8.6 The issue of equal treatment of individuals falling within the scope of EU law and domestic law has not arisen.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 Space does not allow for consideration of further issues.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 A book titled ‘An Inquiry into the Existence of Global Values: Through the Lens of Comparative Constitutional Law’ was recently published.²⁷⁹ The editors developed a list of candidates for common values and asked the national rapporteurs from sixteen states (including this author as rapporteur for Germany) to report on the recognition and prioritisation of these values in their various countries. As it turned out, there is a significant amount of congruence throughout the constitutional and political systems.

This is even more true for Europe. The European Convention on Human Rights has been adopted by 47 states, the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union by 28 states. If one compares the bills of rights of the various states, one finds similar rights. In states with thin or rudimentary bills of rights, the gaps are filled by referring to the European rights. On first view, a comparison between the EU Charter and the German Basic Law shows that the Charter contains about twice as many fundamental rights as the German Basic Law. But a closer look reveals that a number of rights that appear separately in the Charter are united in one article in the Basic Law (Art. 5, e.g., contains five rights: freedom of expression, freedom of information, freedom of the media, freedom of art and freedom of science).

²⁷⁸ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 197/83, Solange II, order of 22 Oct. 1986, BVerfGE 73, 339, 383. Quotation in Sect. 2.6.1.

²⁷⁹ Davis et al. 2015.

A number of rights that are specified in the Charter are derived from enumerated rights by way of interpretation in the Member States. It is not easy to find a right in the Charter that is not recognised in Germany. What does not exist in the German Constitution is an individual right to good administration (Art. 41 EU Charter) and a number of the provisions in title IV of the Charter.

The congruence decreases, however, when it comes to the rules on limitation of fundamental rights and even more so to interpretation and enforcement. Only if these elements are taken into account does a realistic picture as to what is common and what is not develop. And here even the differences within Europe are not small, as can be seen from the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. A good example is the ubiquitous conflict between freedom of expression/freedom of the media and privacy/personal honour. When it comes to striking a balance between these commonly accepted values, the results differ from country to country. Still, it is not in vain to ask where common values are constitutionally recognised in order to have a starting point for the discourse. The fact that, unlike other continents, Europe has developed mechanisms to guarantee a minimum standard in all countries and, to a certain extent, to harmonise different standards prepares the ground for approximation.

2.10.2 Article 4(2) TEU obliges the European Union to respect the national identities of the Member States inherent in their fundamental political and constitutional structures. This includes the various traditions and standards of fundamental rights protection. Charter rights that result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States shall be interpreted in harmony with those traditions (Art. 52(4) Charter). Already before the adoption of the Charter, the CJEU derived unwritten fundamental rights from the ECHR and the ‘common national traditions’ of the Member States. The latter was often lip service. There are cases where a common standard was alleged without evidence and was even asserted when in fact it was lacking.²⁸⁰ The Charter which has been adopted by all Member States makes this superfluous. Now it seems more important to stress the legitimate remaining differences and to oblige the EU to respect them in the spirit of Art. 4(2) TEU and Art. 52(4) Charter. The point of departure could be the exceptions from requirements of Union law that the Treaties allow on grounds of public policy, public security, public health, etc. These public interests of the Member States find their highest expression in the national bills of rights.

It would be recommendable for the national courts, when referring questions to the CJEU, to make it clear where longstanding traditions or deep convictions form a barrier for abolishing national institutions or harmonising the law of the EU. The BVerfG was frequently criticised when, in the judgments on the Maastricht and Lisbon treaties, it explained the identity of the German Constitutional order. Yet this is precisely the information that the CJEU needs if it wants to take Art. 4(2) TEU seriously.

²⁸⁰ A good example is Case C-144/04 Mangold [2005] ECR I-09981.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 There is an extensive discussion about the exact meaning of Art. 53 of the Charter.²⁸¹ Article 53 adopts Art. 53 of the European Convention. Both pursue the same goal: European fundamental rights protection shall not lessen the standard of fundamental rights protection granted by the national constitutions. However, the two rules differ in one important aspect. In the EU, the safeguard against an interpretation of Charter rights, which restricts or negatively affects the fundamental rights of the national constitutions, is valid ‘in their respective fields of application’. The interpretation of Charter rights may not lower the national standard of fundamental rights protection in the areas where they apply. Where they do not apply, the prohibition is not valid. There, Charter rights may fall short of the national standard.

This diversion reflects the difference in function and application of the ECHR and the EU Charter. The European Convention applies comprehensively. All acts of national public authority have to comply with the Convention. Yet the Convention confines itself to setting a minimum standard that has to be respected by all 47 member states. Beyond this minimum standard, it leaves the plurality of national standards unaffected. The Convention rights become relevant only where a national bill of rights or its application falls short of the European minimum standard. For member states with a high standard of fundamental rights protection, this will not often be the case.

To the contrary, the European Charter does not content itself with setting a minimum standard. It contains a fully developed catalogue of fundamental rights, even larger in number than the catalogues of many Member States. Wherever Charter rights apply they shall get full credit. Yet they do not apply comprehensively to all legal acts of national public authority. This is a consequence of the fact that the EU is a federal entity and, as in every federal entity, the demarcation of competences is of pivotal importance.

The demarcation is drawn by Art. 51 EU Charter. According to this provision, the Charter applies without exception to all institutions of the EU, whereas it applies to the Member States ‘only when they are implementing Union law’. Consequently, in dealing with the European Convention, the question is whether the national standard of protection falls short of the European standard. In dealing with the European Charter this question is likewise important, but the delimitation of applicability of the Charter shifts the accent from the standard of protection to the field of application. The question where Charter rights apply and where the fundamental rights guaranteed in the national constitutions apply does not play a role under the European Convention.

The difference has an impact on the role of the two European courts. The European Court of Human Rights is an international court. It can only declare that a legal act of a member state violates the Convention, but it cannot annul or reverse the act at stake. It is not an appellate court. The member states are under an obligation to eliminate the violation, but whether and how they do so depends on their domestic law. Likewise, the ECtHR has no mandate to harmonise fundamental rights protection in Europe. The CJEU, on the contrary, may harmonise fundamental rights protection in the areas where the Charter applies. It is not an appellate court either, but national law that, in its view, contravenes European law automatically loses its applicability.

²⁸¹ For some recent examples, see Britz 2015; Franzius 2015a, b; Masing 2015; Thym 2015; see also Nusser 2011.

Hence, the decisive question for the EU is what are the areas in which the Charter applies and what are the areas in which the national bills of rights apply. This is controversial. The controversy goes back to differences in the relevant legal texts. Article 51 of the Charter states that Charter rights apply to the Member States ‘only when implementing Union law’. Yet, according to the explanation to Art. 51, Charter rights apply to the Member States ‘in the field of application of Union law’. This formula is reminiscent of the jurisprudence that the CJEU developed before the Charter entered into force. It now gives the CJEU an opportunity to continue its pre-Charter line of jurisprudence, regardless of the stricter wording of Art. 51.

This is not just a variation in language, it is also a variation in meaning. Although the Charter clearly wanted to restrict the application of Charter rights to the benefit of national rights, the explanation suggests that the difference in text does not matter. To what extent it matters can be seen in the ERT case.²⁸² Greece had established a monopoly in public television. The prohibition of private television enterprises was based on a Greek law. Enforcing this law was not implementing Union law, but it was done in the field of application of Union law because the question whether Greece was permitted to restrict the free movement of services is a question of Union law.

The ERT example has been chosen to show that the outcome depends on which text is used as a basis for decision. A closer look shows, however, that a strict interpretation of Art. 51 would not be helpful. There are cases of implementation of national law where good reasons not to apply the national bill of rights but the Charter exist nevertheless. These are cases where the law at stake is a national law, but a national law that is determined by Union law. Under a substantive, as opposed to formal, perspective the national authorities and courts implement Union law and there is a legitimate interest in guaranteeing a uniform application of this law in all Member States, which excludes the application of domestic fundamental rights. This is widely accepted also by the national courts.

On the other hand, it is not sufficient for the application of Charter rights that the national law at stake is somehow related to Union law, as for instance the Åkerberg Fransson case suggests.²⁸³ Given the degree of entanglement between European and national law, it would be all too easy to find such a connection wherever the CJEU wants. Should Åkerberg Fransson set the standard for the interpretation of ²⁸² Case C-260/89 ERT [1991] ECR I-02925.

²⁸³ Case C-617/10 Åkerberg Fransson [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:105.

Art. 51, this provision would lose all its contours and render the restriction contained in it virtually obsolete, and with it Art. 53, which depends on the demarcation in Art. 51 for its effect.

This is the position of the BVerfG. According to its jurisprudence, a Member State ‘implements Union law’ when it applies national law only insofar as the national law is ‘determined’ by Union law.²⁸⁴ A mere relation with Union law (unionsrechtliche Beziehe) or an indirect impact (mittelbare Auswirkungen) is insufficient to supersede national fundamental rights. The BVerfG finds that this understanding is supported by Art. 51(2) of the Charter. The Court insists that this ruling does not contradict the judgment of the CJEU in the Åkerberg Fransson case. The cooperative relationship between the two courts prohibits an interpretation (Lesart) of that decision according to which it would be a clear ultra vires act or would endanger the identity of the German constitutional order. ‘Consequently, the decision may not be understood or applied in a way that, in order to bind the member states by the Charter rights, any connection between a [national] rule and the abstract field of application of Union law or a pure factual impact on Union law would suffice.’²⁸⁵

This shows that a principle is necessary in order to distinguish between the implementation of national law where Charter rights must be observed and the implementation of national law where the national bills of rights apply. This criterion can only be the interest in a uniform application of Union law or Union-induced law in order to make it independent from the various national bills of rights and their interpretation by national constitutional or supreme courts. Hence, the decisive question is whether the uniform application of national implementation of law is indispensable as a guarantee for the Europe-wide effectiveness of the Union law that is implemented.

As a consequence, national fundamental rights apply wherever Union law leaves a field of discretion to the national lawmaker. The European lawmaker itself has indicated that uniformity is not regarded as necessary to this degree. This is usually the case with directives. They are binding with regard to the goal of the law, but they leave it to the national legislatures to determine the ways and means to reach the ends. The discretion of the Member States can be wider or narrower, but it cannot be totally absent, because this would mean that the EU has abused the legal instrument of a directive.

If this criterion is employed, decisions like ERT and Åkerberg Fransson deserve criticism. ERT shows that a more subtle distinction is necessary than that used by ²⁸⁴ BVerfG, case 1 BvF 1/05, Greenhouse Gas Emissions Allowance, judgment of 13 Mar. 2007, BVerfGE 118, 79, 95; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 256/08, Data Retention (Vorratsdatenspeicherung), order of 11 Mar. 2008, BVerfGE 121, 1, 15; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 256/08 et al., Data Retention, Extension of the Application, order of 19 July 2011, BVerfGE 129, 78, 90 et seq.; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 1215/07, Anti-Terrorism Databank, judgment of 24 Apr. 2013, BVerfGE 133, 277, 313.

²⁸⁵ BVerfG, case 1 BvR 1215/07, Anti-Terrorism Databank, judgment of 24 Apr. 2013, BVerfGE 133, 277, 313 et seq.

the CJEU. On the one hand, the European legislature has not harmonised media law. Yet it prohibits monopolies, however with exceptions. If a Member State claims an exception, it applies and interprets Union law. It may be that the conditions for an exception were not given. To decide this is a matter of Union law. But within the boundaries of the exception the national legislature enjoys freedom to decide, and this means that here not Charter rights but national fundamental rights apply.

The connection between Union law and national law that the CJEU saw in Åkerberg Fransson was that the Member States owe a certain portion of income tax to the EU and are therefore obliged to efficiently levy this tax. But the question whether the efficiency principle requires one or two sanctions in cases of tax evasion is not determined by Union law and is therefore open to national legislation, with the consequence that not the European Charter but the national bill of rights applies.

This case shows at the same time the danger that accompanies the jurisprudence of the CJEU. It undermines Art. 51(2) of the Charter that prohibits an extension of Union law beyond the competences conferred by the Member States and the creation of new competences. If, for example, the Charter right of data protection is at stake, this opens the doors to a lot of national competences that have not been conferred to the EU because data protection is not a limited area of the law but applies to all activities of the state. It is an all-encompassing law. If any relationship between Union law and national law were sufficient for the application of Charter rights, this would mean access to and uniformity of many legislative competencies that have not been conferred.

There are, however, some recent judgments of the CJEU that suggest the existence of an area where the Charter and the national bills of rights apply simultaneously. In the Melloni case the Court ruled: ‘Article 53 of the Charter confirms that where an EU legal act calls for national implementing measures, national authorities and courts remain free to apply national standards of protection of fundamental rights, provided that the level of protection provided for by the Charter, as interpreted by the Court, and the primacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law are not thereby compromised.’²⁸⁶

Does this mean that areas exist where Charter rights and national constitutional rights overlap? In a strict sense this seems impossible, because in cases where the standard of fundamental rights protection differs, the question of which standard applies is inevitable. In order to avoid this, the Court has formulated a condition for the application of the national standard, namely that the primacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law are not thereby compromised. Wherever this danger appears, national fundamental rights have to give way. The overlap is thus reduced to cases where European and national rights offer the same standard of protection. In this respect it does indeed not matter which rights are applied. Where this is not the case, the Charter is clearly hierarchically superior, regardless of the standard of protection.

²⁸⁶ Case C-399/11 Melloni, n. 161, para. 60.

Article 53 of the Charter has therefore a different meaning compared to Art. 53 of the European Convention. The reason for the difference lies in the fact that the Convention guarantees only a minimum standard, while the member states are free to guarantee better protection above this minimum. The Charter, on the other hand, establishes full protection in the areas in which it applies. This leaves no room for an interpretation according to which full protection would apply only to EU institutions while the Member States have to maintain but a minimum standard. The European and the national standards do not apply simultaneously, in parallel or cumulatively, rather either one or the other applies.

Thus, unlike the Convention, the Charter leaves no room for the question of which standard is higher. Article 53 does not privilege the higher standard. It only protects the national standard against diminution by EU law in areas where the national standard applies. As has been seen, this question can be very difficult to decide, in particular if a determination by EU law and discretion for national regulation are combined in one directive or framework decision. Here a particularly careful analysis is necessary, but it is an analysis of EU law. It has to be undertaken by the national authorities; however, since the area of national discretion is determined by EU law, the CJEU has the last word.

Particular difficulties arise in constellations where different fundamental rights have to be balanced against one another. Under the Convention it is difficult to comply with Art. 53 because greater protection of one right automatically means less protection for the other right. The conclusion should be that particular respect has to be paid to the result adopted by the nation states. The margin of appreciation applies here. The ECtHR should find a violation of the Convention only if the balance determined by the national court seems grossly distorted. But also the CJEU should be careful, in particular if the result would be a prioritisation of a whole group of fundamental rights over another.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 I do not remember whether the adoption of the EAW Framework Decision or its implementation by Germany was preceded by an intensive public debate. The European Data Retention Directive and its implementation by Germany were the subject of a heated debate that even divided the German Government. While the Minister of the Interior insisted on implementation, the Ministry of Justice (first under a minister from the liberal FDP, then under Social Democratic ministers) refused to submit a draft because it assumed that the directive had no basis in the European treaties and implementation would be incompatible with the Basic Law.

2.12.2 The enforcement action against Germany, in particular the amount of the fine, was used as an argument for implementation by the Ministry of the Interior, but rejected by the Ministry of Justice.

Regarding the question of sufficient space for democratic deliberation and judicial review in the Member States, it has to be noted that the duty to implement a European directive in due time should not depend on constitutional concerns in the Member States. It would be all too easy for the Member States to raise such concerns in order to escape sanctions by the EU. If the concerns have their grounds in European law, be they questions of competence or of fundamental rights, the Member States have the possibility to bring an action of annulment in the CJEU.

2.12.3 I would favour the idea that an action for annulment of a directive would suspend an enforcement mechanism such as a fine, until the CJEU has decided the matter.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 The question requires a differentiated answer. The standard of protection of the four fundamental freedoms, which are all economic freedoms, freedoms of the market participants, is very high in the EU. The same is true for some other rights such as gender equality and other anti-discrimination rules. But this high level of protection has a drawback for further, non-economic fundamental rights. In a conflict between the four economic freedoms and non-economic rights, the economic rights tend to prevail in the CJEU. The conflict arises in particular when a Member State claims an exception from the free movement principle and bases this claim on national fundamental rights. The likelihood that the Member States will lose before the CJEU is higher than the likelihood that they will win. The economic freedoms have thus become what in the US would be called 'preferred freedoms' (the example being freedom of speech in the First Amendment).

2.13.2 No state that joins a supranational entity like the EU or the Council of Europe can expect to uphold its standard of fundamental rights protection completely. This would mean that one national standard would be made dominant over all other member states. There will always be gains and losses. As far as the ECHR is concerned, which confines itself to a minimum standard that all countries in spite of their various traditions are obliged to respect, the loss will be small for countries with a highly developed standard of fundamental rights protection. This is true for Germany. Not many German decisions have been found to be in violation of the Convention. Several cases in which this has happened have concerned the balancing of conflicting fundamental rights, which the ECtHR should abstain from reviewing in the light of Art. 53, unless the balance is grossly distorted (see Sect. 2.11.1). A typical conflict that occurs in almost all member states is the already mentioned conflict between freedom of expression/freedom of the press and personality rights/privacy. There are many ways to solve this conflict in the member states of the Council of Europe, with one jurisdiction tending more to the communicative rights, others more to personal rights. It is not the business of the ECtHR to require a uniform attitude.

This is different in an entity like the EU that develops a genuine catalogue of fundamental rights and a genuine standard of protection, but limits them to transnational relations, leaving purely national relations to the national bills of rights and the jurisprudence of the national courts. However, since not only legal acts of the Union organs are submitted to the European Charter but in an increasing number of cases also acts of the Member States, the national constitution can no longer maintain its claim to comprehensive application on the territory of the state. Again, it would be unreasonable to expect that a national standard would survive this process unaffected.

Also in the EU it is a question of gains and losses. However, for Germany with a high standard and human dignity as the highest right of an absolute character that can neither be trumped by another right nor submitted to balancing, the danger is particularly high. This is why the losses weigh heavier for Germany than for a number of other countries. Still, the degree of loss depends on whether there are changes in detail or in principle. The CJEU's practice in giving the four economic freedoms priority over other constitutionally protected interests has a principal dimension. There are a few decisions that go in another direction, but they have not yet indicated a fundamental change. Thus, it is true that the CJEU took the special importance that Germany attributes to dignity into account in Omega and found that it could support an exception to free movement. However, it did so after balancing the economic freedoms against dignity, which means that in a different situation, balancing may lead to another result.²⁸⁷ In European Arrest Warrant II the BVerfG insisted that the absolute character of dignity is part of the identity of the Basic Law and is thus not negotiable.²⁸⁸

The most important impediment to a more balanced approach by the CJEU is its self-image as the superior guardian of the process of integration, whereas the Member States are seen as potential opponents to integration. At the same time, this impediment is the most difficult one to change. It cannot be changed by legal rules but only by a re-orientation of the role that the Court attributes to itself, for which little indication can be seen.

As a matter of fact, the national courts are the only effective counterweights against the CJEU.²⁸⁹ It is therefore understandable that some of them reserve the right to adjudicate on ultra vires matters vis-à-vis a European Court that contributes to the creeping loss of competences of the Member States and pays rather little attention to the identities of the national constitutions, as Art. 4 TEU requires.

²⁸⁷ See Sect. 2.2.1 above.

²⁸⁸ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2735/14, European Arrest Warrant II, judgment of 15 December 2015.

²⁸⁹ See Grimm 2012.

One source of the CJEU's dominant role is little noticed: it is the constitutionalisation of the Treaties, yet a constitutionalisation of a body of law that is to a large extent not constitutional in nature, but would be ordinary law in the Member States. Because of this, the EU is over-constitutionalised, to the effect that the jurisprudence of the Court is immunised against corrections by the legislator. It would be an important step towards a better balance between the political branches of the EU and the CJEU to downgrade all provisions of the Treaties that are not of a constitutional nature.²⁹⁰

2.13.3 The style of judgments practiced by the CJEU is a good example for the importance of path dependency. The Court started its work in the mode of the French courts, which is particularly cryptic. French courts tell the result of the legal examination and mention the provisions from which the result flows, but do not tell the reader how it flows from them, let alone what alternatives existed and why they were regarded as being inferior to the interpretation chosen by the court. This has changed in the jurisprudence of the CJEU over time, but it is not a change towards the more discursive style of, for example, the German Constitutional Court or even more so of an American or English court. The CJEU answers the questions referred to it by the national courts, but it rarely enters into a discussion of the concerns that motivated the national courts to ask for a preliminary ruling.

The most recent example is the answer of the CJEU to the BVerfG's questions about the compatibility of the OMT with the Treaties.²⁹¹ The BVerfG presented its understanding of the treaty in a very thorough and well thought-out way. The CJEU's answer does not reveal an in-depth examination of the considerations of the BVerfG. The question here is not whose argument is right or wrong, but how to deal with the concerns of national courts. Many referrals from national courts are an invitation to enter into the much invoked dialogue among the courts. Yet a dialogue presupposes a non-hierarchical relationship. This is not the CJEU's understanding of its role. Again, this is difficult to change because it is the result of a certain self-image that can only be changed from within, not from outside.

2.13.4 The role of national constitutions has to be seen in context with the EU's special form of legitimization. What has now become the EU received its democratic legitimacy in the beginning exclusively from the Member States and their democratically organised political processes. The Member States were the 'Masters of the Treaties' and, in the Council, the sole legislator of the EU. But they soon lost control over the interpretation and application of the Treaties. Through the 'constitutionalisation' of the Treaties, the European institutions charged with treaty implementation had made themselves independent from the will of the Member States (see also 2.13.2 and 1.5.3). From that moment on, two paths toward integration existed, a formal one by an explicit transfer of national powers to the EU and an informal one by extensive treaty interpretation based on the judicially invented direct effect, supremacy and 'effet utile'. The first path is political. It can only be tread by the Member States unanimously in accordance with their constitutions and national democratic processes. The second path is non-political and can be tread by the Commission and the CJEU irrespective of the national constitutions. It bypasses the democratic process in the Member States and also the European Parliament.

²⁹⁰ See Grimm 2015a, 2016a. In English, see Grimm 2017.

²⁹¹ Case C-62/14 Gauweiler and Others, n. 268.

When the then twelve Member States concluded the Single European Act that allowed for majority decisions in the Council, the exclusive legitimation by the democratic processes in the Member States was no longer sufficient because it could now happen that a Member State was submitted to (secondary) European law that it had not agreed to in its domestic democratic process. This legitimacy gap was closed by the involvement of the – meanwhile directly elected – European Parliament into the making of secondary European law. From that moment on, the EU has been based on a dualist instead of a monistic legitimacy. This additional and autonomous legitimation works, however, only for the enactment of secondary law. It is unable to lend democratic legitimacy to the results of the second path towards integration. The constitutionalisation of the Treaties deprived the democratically legitimised and accountable organs both in the EU and the Member States from influencing the integration through treaty adjudication.

However, this becomes a problem only because of the special character of the Treaties. Concluded as treaties under international law, not as a constitution, the European Treaties are not confined to rules of a constitutional nature, but are full of what would be ordinary law in the Member States. Thus, the functioning of the single market is more or less determined by the interpretation and application of the Treaties (especially the four economic freedoms) by the European executive and judiciary. Here lies an often overlooked source of the European legitimacy problem. Important steps towards integration that left deep marks on the law of the Member States, their constitutions and the range of their political processes have been taken in a non-political mode and by stealth. They are neither subject to political participation nor are they amenable to political correction or re-direction. To the same extent, the source of democratic legitimacy that the EU receives from the constitutional processes in the Member States has been blocked.

However, the hetero-legitimisation by the Member States is still much stronger than the auto-legitimisation of the EU by the election of the European Parliament. The European Parliament and the European political parties operating within it are not embedded in a Europe-wide societal process of opinion formation and interest articulation that would keep the EU organs in touch with the citizenry. Since the legitimacy of the EU thus depends largely on the flow of legitimisation from the Member States, it should have a strong self-interest in a vibrant national democracy. The attempt to solve the European legitimacy problem by extending the powers of the European Parliament or even by converting the EU into a parliamentary system according to the national pattern would provoke just the opposite. As one cannot turn the EU into a parliamentary democracy without downgrading the Council to a second house of the Parliament, one would sever the EU from the legitimisation that flows from the Member States without having sufficient resources for a European self-legitimation.

Rather, an effective means of increasing the legitimacy of the EU would consist in reducing the Treaties to those provisions that are of a constitutional nature and downgrading all provisions which would be ordinary law in the Member States to the rank of secondary law. As a consequence, the jurisprudence of the CJEU would be subject to a re-direction by way of legislation if the Member States were to find it not to be in line with their understanding of the Treaties or were to think that it produces detrimental effects. As long as this has not happened – and it is rather unlikely that it will happen – the national constitutions and their agents, the national constitutional courts, are the only counterweights to the democracy drain in the Member States and the ensuing repercussions on the legitimacy of the European Union – and also the only guardians of the democratic potential for Europe that lies in the national constitutions. They act in the interest of European democracy when they claim the power to protect the identity of the national constitutions. Article 4 (2) TEU justifies this claim.²⁹²

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 Understandably, after the catastrophe caused by an excessive nationalism, the German Basic Law from the very beginning in 1949 was open to an internationalisation of public power. Already the preamble spoke of an integrated Europe as a contribution to peace in the world. Article 24 permitted the transfer of public powers to international organisations. It also permitted Germany to join systems of collective security and to transfer public powers in order to guarantee a peaceful and sustainable order, European as well as global. International arbitration was welcomed.²⁹³

²⁹² For a more detailed argumentation, see Grimm (2016b). See also Grimm 2012, especially p. 92 (Die Bedeutung nationaler Verfassungen in einem vereinten Europa) and p. 128 (Zur Rolle der nationalen Verfassungsgerichte in der europäischen Demokratie).

²⁹³ Art. 24 reads:

‘(1) The Federation may by a law transfer sovereign powers to international organisations.
 (1a) Insofar as the Länder are competent to exercise state powers and to perform state functions, they may, with the consent of the Federal Government, transfer sovereign powers to transfrontier institutions in neighbouring regions.
 (2) With a view to maintain peace, the Federation may enter into a system of mutual collective security; in doing so it shall consent to such limitations upon its sovereign powers as will bring about and secure a lasting peace in Europe and among the nations of the world.
 (3) For the settlement of disputes between states, the Federation shall accede to agreements providing for general, comprehensive and compulsory international arbitration.’

Article 25 transformed the general principles of public international law into domestic law and gave them a rank above ordinary law.²⁹⁴ At the same time Art. 25 stated that these principles established direct rights and obligations for the residents. Article 26 declared attempts to wage aggressive wars unconstitutional and required that they be criminalised. The export of weapons was made dependent on a permission from the Federal Government.

3.1.2 When the Maastricht treaty transformed the European Community into the European Union and declared that this treaty ‘marks a new stage in the process of creating an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe’, Art. 24, up to then the constitutional basis for Germany’s participation in European integration, seemed no longer sufficient to legitimise the unprecedented process of creating a political entity that by far exceeded traditional international organisations. The need for a special rule concerning European integration was felt. Thus, the new Art. 23 was adopted in 1992; it is outlined in Sect. 1.2.

3.1.3 After the 1992 amendment, the first sentence of Sect. 6 was reformulated in 2006 in connection with a reform of the federal system; Sect. 1 a was added in 2008 to adjust the Basic Law to the Lisbon Treaty (see text under 1.2.1). No significant proposals for further reform have been made. It has been up to the BVerfG to concretise and develop the provisions in the light of new developments.

3.1.4 The new world order that emerged after World War II brought the identity between public power and state power to an end. In the interest of preserving peace and increasing their problem solving capacity, the states transferred parts of their authority to international organisations that exercise it more or less independently from the states, but with legal effect within them. However, the states neither disappeared nor were they marginalised. They remain the main actors also in the new international order. They convey legitimacy on the public power exercised by international organisations whose own legitimacy resources are small.

While a legalisation of the power exercised beyond the state is possible and rapidly growing, its democratisation seems much more difficult. The more global international organisations are, the less democratic they will be. The same is true for a constitutionalisation of international organisations and international law in general. Where the term ‘constitutionalisation’ is used in this context, it reflects a rather thin concept of constitutionalism, a mere legalisation rather far away from the achievement of constitutionalism as it developed over time in the nation states.

Although state constitutions can no longer fulfil their promise to regulate the public authority exercised on the territory of the state in a comprehensive way, they still have to play an important role. They regulate the national political process, determine the transfer of state powers to the international level and define the conditions under which acts of international organisations and international law

²⁹⁴ Art. 25 reads: ‘The general rules of international law shall be an integral part of federal law. They shall take precedence over the laws and directly create rights and duties for the inhabitants of the federal territory.’

may take effect within the state. Since the internationally exercised public power depends on authorisation, acceptance and implementation by the states, international organisations should have a self-interest in the good functioning of national constitutionalism instead of eroding it.²⁹⁵

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 The provisions of the Basic Law concerning international treaties are rudimentary. Article 59(1) gives the Federal President the power to conclude international treaties. Article 59(2) prescribes that international treaties regulating the political relations of the Federal Republic or concerning legislative competences need the consent of the Bundestag in the form of a law. This law (Zustimmungsgesetz) is confined to consent and does not contain legal provisions. The object of the consent follows from the treaty.

In practice, international treaties are negotiated by the Federal Government, ratified by the Federal President and made binding by a decision of the Bundestag. It is contested whether parliamentary consent transforms the treaty provisions into domestic law or only gives the order that they be applied internally. There are no provisions as to the rank of international treaties in the domestic legal order. It is therefore up to the legislature to determine the rank. It is beyond doubt that the BVerfG can review the parliamentary consent to a treaty as to its compatibility with the Basic Law. Applications for review are admissible before the treaty becomes valid under international law.

3.2.2 Regarding the relevance of monism/dualism, this has been a controversy for a long time. However, the controversy has lost importance. Today, the majority of authors accept a theory of moderate dualism. According to this theory, each body of law exists of its own right, but both are in many ways interwoven. On the one hand, international law (including European law) takes effect within the state only insofar as the state transforms it into domestic law or orders its application within the state. On the other hand, more and more international law claims direct effect in the states. To the same extent, international organisations and international courts take the lead. With regard to the EU, it is assumed that the states are the 'Masters of the Treaties' only at the moment of conclusion, but no longer when treaty provisions are implemented and enforced. A change of the CJEU's practice in interpreting and implementing treaty provisions would require an amendment to the Treaties. Since this is extremely difficult to achieve, the CJEU is immunised against being re-directed by legislation. This is a consequence of the constitutionalisation of the Treaties (see Sect. 2.13.4).

²⁹⁵ For more details, see Grimm 2010 and 2015a, b.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 In general, parliaments are the losers in the internationalisation of the law. They do not participate in negotiation on the international level. Negotiation is a matter for the executive. In some countries the executive has but a limited mandate and needs the approval of Parliament if it wants to go beyond this limit. But many countries find that this threatens to fetter the national Government, so that it cannot be fully effective in negotiations where a do ut des is unavoidable. Parliaments are, of course, free to reject a treaty that the Government has negotiated, but in a parliamentary system this would mean that the parties supporting the Government would disapprove of their own leadership, and consequently parliamentary refusal is rare. Rather, the importance of Parliament's involvement lies in its anticipatory effect. Governments will hesitate to risk disapproval and therefore take the position of Parliament into account when negotiating on the international level.

In Germany, the BVerfG has constantly strengthened the role of the Bundestag in foreign affairs. Thus, the deployment of the German army outside of NATO was made dependent on a parliamentary vote.²⁹⁶ In matters European, the BVerfG assumes a parliamentary responsibility for the extent and direction of integration as well as for the organisational and procedural arrangement on the European level (Integrationsverantwortung), which it cannot delegate to the executive.²⁹⁷ Usually this leads to intensive parliamentary debates. Since the Bundestag can exercise its responsibility only if it has full information of the subject matter and sufficient time to study it and form an opinion, the Government is under a constitutional duty to provide the information early and comprehensively.²⁹⁸ However, it turns out that in practice the capacity of Parliament to cope with the flood of information is limited. The jurisprudence thus tries to erect a bulwark against a trend that is more or less unstoppable.

3.3.2 The Basic Law provides for referendums only in connection with a redefinition of the borders of the Länder. With regard to referendums regarding European integration, including the requirement by the BVerfG that a new constitution would have to be adopted by referendum to participate in a European state, see Sect. 1.4.2.

²⁹⁶ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 3/92 et al., Out-of-Area Operations, judgment of 12 July 1994, BVerfGE 90, 286.

²⁹⁷ BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 356 et seq.

²⁹⁸ Concretized in BVerfG, case 2 BvE 4/11, Obligation to Provide Information, judgment of 18 June 2012, BVerfGE 131, 152.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 International treaties and measures under international law (acts exercising powers transferred by treaties) should be distinguished.

In Germany, international treaties are subject to judicial review via the law that expresses the consent of Parliament (Zustimmungsgesetz). At this stage the national Constitution functions as a filter for the obligations that Germany takes on by concluding a treaty.²⁹⁹ Treaties that confer competences to international organisations change, by this very fact, the Constitution without explicitly amending the text. This is why a supermajority is required for such treaties. Thus, the constitutional constraints become relevant already in the process of negotiation, because the Government has to face a review by the BVerfG. The BVerfG has full power to review the compatibility of a treaty with the Basic Law and, unlike in the review of domestic laws which can only be reviewed after having been adopted and after having taken legal force, treaties can be reviewed before they become valid law.

Once powers have been transferred to international organisations, their exercise by these organisations no longer follows the national constitution. But this does not mean that the national constitution is completely irrelevant. The fact that a treaty itself is compatible with the national constitution does not automatically guarantee that acts or measures taken under the treaty are compatible with the constitution. Two constellations are possible: the international organisation acts ultra vires or it acts within the limits of transferred powers, but the concrete act or measure is incompatible with some essential features of the national constitution.

The BVerfG has reacted to both possibilities. It reserves the power of an ultra vires control, regardless of whether the international organisation has developed an internal control mechanism such as the CJEU.³⁰⁰ It is not controversial that the CJEU has the power to review Union acts as to their compatibility with the Treaty. But the CJEU denies national constitutional courts the right to do the same. However, both view it from a different angle. While the international court asks whether the international organisation has received a competence, the national constitutional court asks whether the Member State has transferred that power. Since the object of judicial scrutiny is the same for both courts, namely the text of the treaty, this is a source of conflict. The BVerfG has tried to narrow this source by a self-limitation of its review power. It will declare Union acts inapplicable in Germany only if they obviously violate the Treaties and they in addition produce a power shift from the Member States to the Union. Further, it will use its power only after having referred the question of a treaty violation to the CJEU.³⁰¹

²⁹⁹ See Grimm 2012, pp. 92–127.

³⁰⁰ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2134, 2159/92, Treaty of Maastricht, judgment of 12 Oct. 1993, BVerfGE 89, 155, 171 et seq.; confirmed in BVerfG, case 2 BvE 2/08 et al., Treaty of Lisbon, judgment of 30 June 2009, BVerfGE 123, 267, 352 et seq.

The other alternative, international acts that are not ultra vires but adversely affect the very essence of the national Constitution, is the object of the Solange jurisprudence. In Solange I the BVerfG declared that fundamental rights protection is part of the core values of the Basic Law. As long as no equivalent protection exists on the international level, the BVerfG will review international acts as to their compatibility with domestic fundamental rights.³⁰² This jurisprudence is still valid. In Solange II the Court did not give up its power but only declared that it would no longer exercise it, as long as a sufficient protection of fundamental rights exists on the European level. This has been confirmed by the Lisbon judgment and extended from fundamental rights to other essential elements of the national constitution. The judgment European Arrest Warrant II specified that international (including European) law which contradicts the identity of the Basic Law as guaranteed by Art. 79(3) is not applicable in Germany under any condition.

A slightly different attitude has been developed vis-à-vis judgments of the ECtHR. This court may review national acts as to their compatibility with the European Convention and declare them in violation of the Convention. But its judgments lack direct effect within the member states. The state is under an obligation to remedy the violation. This is usually the task of the national court whose decision violated the Convention. The decisions of the national courts are subject to judicial review by the BVerfG. The leading case is Görgülü.³⁰³ The BVerfG ruled that national courts have to take decisions of the ECtHR into account but are not unconditionally obliged to follow them. Since Germany adopted the Convention in the rank of ordinary law, no judgment of the ECtHR is internally binding that is incompatible with the Basic Law. But the BVerfG at the same time requires an attempt to reconcile the interpretation of the Basic Law with the interpretation of the Convention. Good examples are the Caroline cases.³⁰⁴ Regarding ordinary law, the national courts, according to the BVerfG, are under an obligation to examine whether the European jurisprudence can be integrated into the national law. The detailed account on the internal effect of public international law and the review power of the BVerfG can now be found in a case on the Tax Treaty between Germany and Turkey.³⁰⁵ ³⁰¹ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 2661/06, Honeywell, order of 6 July 2010, BVerfGE 126, 286.

³⁰² BVerfG, case 2 BvL 52/71, Solange I, order of 29 May 1974, BVerfGE 37, 271.

³⁰³ BVerfG, case 2 BvR 1481/04, Görgülü, order of 14 Oct. 2004, BVerfGE 111, 307.

³⁰⁴ BVerfG, case 1 BvR 653/96, Caroline von Monaco II, judgment of 15 Dec. 1999, BVerfGE 101, 361; ECtHR Von Hannover v. Germany, no. 59320/00, ECHR 2004-VI; BVerfG, case 1 BvR 1602/07 et al., Caroline von Monaco III, order of 26 Feb. 2008, BVerfGE 120, 180.

³⁰⁵ BVerfG, case 2 BvL 1/12, Tax Treaty, judgment of 15 December 2015.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 With regard to the social state, there is indeed constant concern in Germany, a state with a rather high degree of social security, which was an important element for the legitimacy of the political system. It is seen as a problem that economic policy and social policy are decoupled in Europe, at the expense of social interests. On the global level, it is seen as a problem that global economic discourses and human rights discourses have developed independently of each other.

References

- Ahlbrecht H., Lagodny O. (2003) Einheitliche Strafverfahrensgarantien in Europa? Strafverteidiger Forum 10:329–335.
- Ambos K., König S., Rackow P. (eds.) (2015) Rechtshilferecht in Strafsachen. Nomos, Baden-Baden.
- Ambos K., Poschadel A. M., § 73 IRG – Grenzen der Rechtshilfe. In: Ambos K., König S., Rackow P. (eds.) (2015), pp. 82–95.
- Barak A. (2012) Proportionality. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Böse M. (ed.) (2013) Enzyklopädie Europarecht, Band 9: Europäisches Strafrecht. Nomos, Baden-Baden.
- Böse M. (2014) Vor § 78; § 83 IRG. In: Grützner H., Pötz P. G., Kreß C. (eds.) Internationaler Rechtshilfeverkehr in Strafsachen, 3rd edn. C.F. Müller, Heidelberg.
- Braum S. (2009) Europäisches Strafrecht im Fokus konfligierender Verfassungsmodelle. Zeitschrift für Internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik (ZIS) 8:418–426.
- Britz G. (2015) Grundrechtsschutz durch das Bundesverfassungsgericht und den Europäischen Gerichtshof. Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift (EuGRZ) 42:275–281.
- Brodowski D. (2013) Europäischer ordre public als Ablehnungsgrund für die Vollstreckung Europäischer Haftbefehle? Höchstrichterliche Rechtsprechung in Strafsachen (HRRS) 2:54–56.
- Burchard C. (2013) Auslieferung (Europäischer Haftbefehl). In: Böse M. (ed.) (2013) Enzyklopädie Europarecht, Band 9: Europäisches Strafrecht. Nomos, Baden-Baden, pp. 537–572.
- Classen C.D. (2007) Verbesserung der Europatauglichkeit. In: Starck C. (ed.) Föderalismusreform. C. H. Beck, Munich, pp. 103 et seq.
- Classen C.D. (2010), Artikel 23. In: v. Mangoldt H., Klein F., Starck C. (eds.), Kommentar zum Grundgesetz, volume 2, 6th edn. C.H. Beck, Munich.
- Conrad P. (2013) Der Grundsatz der beiderseitigen Strafbarkeit im Rechtshilfe- und Strafanwendungsrecht. Kovac, Hamburg.
- Currie D.P. (1994) The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany. The University of Chicago Press, Chicago.
- Davis D., Richter R., Saunders C. (eds.) (2015) An Inquiry into the Existence of Global Values: Through the Lens of Comparative Constitutional Law. Hart, Oxford.
- Deiters M. (2003) Gegenseitige Anerkennung von Strafgesetzen in Europa. Zeitschrift für Rechtspolitik (ZRP) 10:359–362.
- Dreier H. (2007) Grundlagen und Grundzüge staatlichen Verfassungsrechts: Deutschland. In: von Bogdandy A., Cruz Villalón P., Huber P. (eds.) Ius Publicum Europaeum, volume I. C.F. Müller, Heidelberg, pp. 3–85.
- Eberhard F. (1948) Redebeitrag in Parlamentarischer Rat, Verhandlungen des Hauptausschusses.

- Everling U. (2010) Europas Zukunft unter der Kontrolle der nationalen Verfassungsgerichte. Europarecht 45:91–107.
- Franzius C. (2015a) Strategien der Grundrechtsoptimierung in Europa. Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift (EuGRZ) 42:139–153.
- Franzius C. (2015b) Grundrechtsschutz in Europa. ZaöRV Heidelberg Journal of International Law (HJIL) 75:383–412.
- Gaede K. (2013) Minimalistischer EU-Grundrechtsschutz bei der Kooperation im Strafverfahren. Neue Juristische Wochenschrift (NJW) 18:1279–1282.
- Gärditz K., Hillgruber C. (2009) Volksouveränität und Demokratie ernst genommen – Zum Lissabon-Urteil des BVerfG. Juristenzeitung (JZ) 64:872 et seq.
- Gleß S. (2004) Zum Prinzip der gegenseitigen Anerkennung. Zeitschrift für die gesamte Strafrechtswissenschaft (ZStW) 116:353–367.
- Grimm D. (2007) Proportionality in Canadian and German Constitutional Jurisprudence. U. Toronto L.J. 57:383–397.
- Grimm D. (2009) Defending Sovereign Statehood against Transforming the European Union into a State. EuConst 5:353–373.
- Grimm D. (2010) The Achievement of Constitutionalism and its Prospects in a Changed World. In: Dobner P. and Loughlin M. (eds.) The Twilight of Constitutionalism. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 3–22.
- Grimm D. (2012) Die Zukunft der Verfassung II. Suhrkamp, Berlin.
- Grimm D. (2015a) The Democratic Costs of Constitutionalization – The European Case. ELJ 21:460–473.
- Grimm D. (2015b) The Role of Fundamental Rights after 65 Years of Constitutional Jurisprudence in Germany. ICON 13:9–29.
- Grimm D. (2015c) Sovereignty. Columbia University Press, New York.
- Grimm D. (2016a) Europa ja – aber welches? Zur Verfassung der europäischen Demokratie. Beck, Munich.
- Grimm D. (2016b) Constitutionalism: Past, Present, and Future. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Grimm D. (2017) The Constitution of European Democracy. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Habermas J. (1992) Faktizität und Geltung. Suhrkamp, Frankfurt. (reprint 1998).
- Hackner T. (2005) Der Europäische Haftbefehl in der Praxis der Staatsanwaltschaften und Gerichte. Neue Zeitschrift für Strafrecht (NSfZ) 6:311–315.
- Hackner T. (2012) § 78 IRG – Vorrang des Achten Teils; § 79 IRG – Grundsätzliche Pflicht zur Bewilligung; § 83 IRG – Ergänzende Zulässigkeitsvoraussetzungen. In: Schomburg W., Lagodny O., Gleß S., Hackner T. (eds.) (2012) Internationale Rechtshilfe in Strafsachen, 5th edn. C.H. Beck, Munich, pp. 462–474; 482–486.
- Halberstam D., Möllers C. (2009) The German Constitutional Court says 'Ja zu Deutschland!' German Law Journal (GLJ) 10:1241–1258.
- Hecker B. (2015) Europäisches Strafrecht. 5th edn. Springer, Berlin.
- Heger M. (2007) Der europäische Haftbefehl: Zur Umsetzung europäischer Vorgaben in Deutschland. Zeitschrift für Internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik (ZIS) 5:221–225.
- Heger M., Wolter K. (2015) Rahmenbeschluss über den Europäischen Haftbefehl und dessen Umsetzung im IRG. In: Ambos K., König S., Rackow P. (eds.) (2015), pp. 324–374.
- Hoffmann R. (2007) Europafähigkeit der Bundesrepublik. In: Holtschneider R., Schön W. (eds.), Die Reform des Bundesstaates. Nomos, Baden-Baden, pp. 225 et seq.
- Inhofer D. (2015) § 79 IRG – Grundsätzliche Pflicht zur Bewilligung; § 83 IRG – Ergänzende Zulässigkeitsvoraussetzungen. In: Graf J.P. (ed.) (2015) Beck'scher Online Kommentar Strafprozeßordnung, 23rd edn. C.H. Beck, Munich.
- Jestaedt M. (2009) Warum in die Ferne schweifen, wenn der Maßstab liegt so nah? Verfassungshandwerkliche Anfragen an das Lissabon-Urteil des BVerfG. Der Staat 48:497–516.
- Jestaedt M., Lepsius O., Möllers C., Schönberger C. (2011) Das entgrenzte Gericht – Eine kritische Bilanz nach sechzig Jahren Bundesverfassungsgericht. Suhrkamp, Berlin.

- Kaufmann E. (1953) Rechtsgutachten zum Vertrage über die Gründung der Europäischen Verteidigungsgemeinschaft und zum Deutschlandvertrage. In: Institut für Staatslehre und Politik Mainz (ed.) Der Kampf um den Wehrbeitrag, volume II. Isar-Verlag, Munich, pp. 42 et seq.
- Kirchhof P. (1991) Deutsches Verfassungsrecht und Europäisches Gemeinschaftsrecht. In: Kirchhof P., Ehlermann C.-D. (eds.) Deutsches Verfassungsrecht und Europäisches Gemeinschaftsrecht. Europarecht Beiheft 1/1991, Baden-Baden, pp. 11 et seq.
- König D. (1994) Das Urteil des Bundesverfassungsgerichts zum Vertrag von Maastricht – ein Stolperstein auf dem Weg in die europäische Integration? Zeitschrift für ausländisches öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht 54:17–49.
- König D. (2000) Die Übertragung von Hoheitsrechten im Rahmen des europäischen Integrationsprozesses – Anwendungsbereich und Schranken des Art. 23 des Grundgesetzes. Duncker & Humblot, Berlin.
- Lagodny O. (2014) § 22 – Transnationales Strafverfahren. In: Widmaier G., Müller E., Schlothauer R. (eds.) Münchener Anwaltshandbuch Strafverteidigung, 2nd edn. C.H. Beck, Munich, pp. 826–845.
- Lorz R., Sauer H. (2012) Verfassungsändernde Mehrheiten für die Stabilisierung des Euro? Europarecht 47:682–695.
- Masing J. (2015) Einheit und Vielfalt des Europäischen Grundrechtsschutzes. JZ 70:477–487.
- Mayer F. (2000) Kompetenzüberschreitung und Letztentscheidung. C.H. Beck, Munich.
- Mayer F. (2004) Europarecht als französisches Verfassungsrecht. Europarecht 39:925–936.
- Mayer F. (2010) Europarechtsfreundlichkeit und Europarechtsskepsis in der Rechtsprechung des Bundesverfassungsgerichts. In: Giegerich T. (ed.) Der ‘offene Verfassungsstaat’ des Grundgesetzes nach 60 Jahren. Duncker & Humblot, Berlin, pp. 237–271.
- Mayer F. (2011) Rashomon in Karlsruhe: A reflection on democracy and identity in the European Union. ICON 9:757–785.
- Mayer F., Wendel M. (2014) Die verfassungsrechtlichen Grundlagen des Europarechts. In: Hatje A., Müller-Graff P.-C. (eds.) Enzyklopädie Europarecht, volume 1. Nomos, Baden-Baden, § 4.
- Müller J.W. (2010) Verfassungspatriotismus. Suhrkamp, Berlin.
- Nettesheim M. (2010) Die Karlsruher Verkündigung – Das BVerfG in staatsrechtlicher Endzeitstimmung. Europarecht Beiheft 2010 1:101–122.
- Nusser J. (2011) Die Bindung der Mitgliedstaaten an die Unionsgrundrechte. Mohr Siebeck, Tübingen.
- Pernice I. (1999) Multilevel Constitutionalism and the Treaty of Amsterdam: European Constitution-Making Revisited? CML Rev. 36:703–750.
- Pernice I. (2006) Artikel 23. In: Dreier H. (ed.) Grundgesetz Kommentar, volume 2, 2nd edn. Mohr Siebeck, Tübingen.
- Pernice I. (2007) Artikel 23. In: Dreier H. (ed.) Grundgesetz Kommentar, volume 2. 2nd edn. Supplementum 2007, Mohr Siebeck, Tübingen.
- Pernice I. (2009) The Treaty of Lisbon: Multilevel Constitutionalism in Action. Columbia Journal of European Law 15:349 et seq.
- Ranft O. (2005) Die Verfassungswidrigkeit des (deutschen) Europäischen Haftbefehlsgesetzes. Zeitschrift für Wirtschafts- und Steuerstrafrecht 10:361–368.
- Reinbacher T. (2014) Strafrecht im Mehrebenensystem. Nomos, Baden-Baden.
- Robertson D. (2010) The Judge as Political Theorist: Contemporary Constitutional Review. Princeton University Press, Princeton.
- Satzger H. (2012) International and European Criminal Law. C.H. Beck, Munich.
- Schmalenbach K. (1996) Der neue Europaartikel 23 des Grundgesetzes im Lichte der Arbeit der Gemeinsamen Verfassungskommission. Duncker & Humblot, Berlin.
- Schneider K. (2014) Questions and Answers: Karlsruhe’s Referral for a Preliminary Ruling to the Court of Justice of the European Union. German Law Journal (GLJ) 15:217–239.
- Schönberger C. (2009) Lisbon in Karlsruhe: Maastricht’s Epigones At Sea. German Law Journal (GLJ) 10:1201–1218.

- Schorkopf F. (2009) The European Union as an Association of Sovereign States: Karlsruhe's Ruling on the Treaty of Lisbon. German Law Journal (GLJ) 10:1219–1240.
- Schultze-Fielitz H. (2013) Staatsrechtslehre als Mikrokosmos. Mohr Siebeck, Tübingen.
- Schünemann B. (2003) Europäischer Haftbefehl und EU-Verfassungsentwurf auf schiefer Ebene – Die Schranken des Grundgesetzes. Zeitschrift für Rechtspolitik (ZRP) 6:185–189.
- Schünemann B. (ed.) (2004) Alternativentwurf Europäische Strafverfolgung. Carl Heymanns, Köln.
- Schünemann B. (2007) Europäischer Sicherheitsstaat = europäischer Polizeistaat? Zeitschrift für Internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik (ZIS) 14:528–534.
- Schwarze J. (2010) Die verordnete Demokratie. Europarecht 1:108–117.
- Sinn A., Wörner L. (2007) The European Arrest Warrant and Its Implementation In Germany – Its Constitutionality, Laws and Current Developments. Zeitschrift für Internationale Strafrechtsdogmatik (ZIS) 5:204–220.
- Sommermann K.P. (1997) Staatsziele und Staatszielbestimmungen. Mohr Siebeck, Tübingen.
- Sommermann K.P. (2008) Offene Staatlichkeit – Deutschland. In: von Bogdandy A., Cruz Villalón P., Huber P. (eds.) Ius Publicum Europaeum, volume II. C. F. Müller, Heidelberg, pp. 3–35.
- Sternberger D. (1990) Verfassungspatriotismus. Insel Verlag, Frankfurt.
- Strein R. (2014) Artikel 23. In: Sachs M. (ed.) Grundgesetz: Kommentar, 7th edn. C.H. Beck, Munich.
- Thym D. (2009) In the Name of Sovereign Statehood: A Critical Introduction to the Lisbon Judgment of the German Constitutional Court. CML Rev. 46:1795–1822.
- Thym D. (2015) Vereinigt die Grundrechte. Juristenzeitung 70: 53 et seq.
- Tomuschat C. (1993) Die Europäische Union unter der Aufsicht des Bundesverfassungsgerichts. Europäische Grundrechte-Zeitschrift (EuGRZ) 20:489 et seq.
- Tomuschat C. (2009) The Ruling of the German Constitutional Court on the Treaty of Lisbon. German Law Journal (GLJ) 10:1259–1262.
- Vogel J. (2014) § 10 IRG – Auslieferungsunterlagen; § 73 IRG – Grenze der Rechtshilfe. In: Grützner H., Pötz P. G., Kreß C. (eds.) (2014) Internationaler Rechtshilfeverkehr in Strafsachen, 3rd edn. C.F. Müller, Heidelberg.
- Vogel J., Burchard C. (2014) § 77 IRG – Anwendung anderer Verfahrensvorschriften. In: Grützner H., Pötz P. G., Kreß C. (eds.) (2014) Internationaler Rechtshilfeverkehr in Strafsachen, 3rd edn. C.F. Müller, Heidelberg.
- Vogel K. (1964) Die Verfassungsentscheidung des Grundgesetzes für eine internationale Zusammenarbeit. Recht und Staat in Geschichte und Gegenwart 292/293:1 et seq.
- Vogler T. (1989) Auslagenerstattung im Auslieferungsrecht. Neue Zeitschrift für Strafrecht (NSZ) 6:254–255.
- Von Bogdandy A. (2003) Europäische und nationale Identität: Integration durch Verfassungsrecht? Veröffentlichungen der Vereinigung der Deutschen Staatsrechtslehrer (VVDStRL) 62:156 et seq.
- Von Bubnoff E. (2005) Der Europäische Haftbefehl. C.F. Müller, Heidelberg.
- Von Heintschel-Heinegg B. (2014) Europäischer Haftbefehl. In: Sieber U., Satzger H., von Heintschel-Heinegg B. (eds.) Europäisches Strafrecht, 2nd edn. Nomos, Baden-Baden, pp. 661–677.
- Voßkuhle A. (2010) Multilevel cooperation of the European Constitutional Courts: Der Europäische Verfassungsgerichtsverbund. EuConst 6:175–198.
- Wendel M. (2011a) Permeabilität im europäischen Verfassungsrecht. Verfassungsrechtliche Integrationsnormen auf Staats- und Unionsebene im Vergleich. Mohr Siebeck, Tübingen.
- Wendel M. (2011b) Lisbon Before the Courts: Comparative Perspectives. EuConst 7:96–137.

- Wendel M. (2013) Judicial Restraint and the Return to Openness: The Decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court on the ESM and the Fiscal Treaty of 12 September 2012. German Law Journal (GLJ) 14:21–52.
- Wendel M. (2014) Exceeding Judicial Competence in the Name of Democracy. EuConst 10:263–307.
- Ziller J. (2003) Sovereignty in France: Getting Rid of the Mal de Bodin. In: Walker N. (ed.) Sovereignty in Transition, Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 261–277.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Italy: Axiological Continuity Between the Domestic and International Levels of Governance?

Giuseppe Martinico, Barbara Guastaferro and Oreste Pollicino

Abstract The Italian Constitution (1948) belongs to the group of constitutions described as ‘constitutions born from the Resistance’, forged to reject totalitarian experiences. According to the report, the concept of the ‘Stato di diritto’ is similar to Giuseppe Martinico is Associate Professor in Comparative Public Law at the Scuola Superiore Sant’Anna, Pisa. e-mail: martinico@sssup.it.

Barbara Guastaferro is Tenured Assistant Professor of Constitutional Law, University of Naples ‘Federico II’; at the time of writing Research Fellow in Law, Durham Law School. e-mail: barbara.guastaferro@unina.it.

Oreste Pollicino is Full Professor in Comparative Constitutional Law at Bocconi University, Milan. e-mail: oreste.pollicino@unibocconi.it.

Giuseppe Martinico wrote Sects. 1.1.1, 1.2.1–1.2.3, 1.3.1, 1.3.4, 1.5.3, 2.8.4, 2.10.1, 2.10.2, 2.11.1, 2.13.1, 2.13.2, 2.13.3, 2.13.4, 3.1.1–3.1.2, 3.1.3, 3.1.4, 3.2.1, 3.2.2, 3.3.1 and 3.4.1. Barbara Guastaferro wrote Sects. 1.4.2, 2.1.3, 2.2.1, 2.3.1.1, 2.3.1.2, 2.3.2.1, 2.3.3.1, 2.3.4.1, 2.3.4.2, 2.3.5.1, 2.3.5.2, 2.3.5.3, 2.3.5.4, 2.5.1, 2.6.1, 2.8.6, 2.9.1, 2.12.1, 2.12.2 and 2.12.3. Oreste Pollicino wrote Sects. 1.1.2, 1.2.4, 1.4.1, 1.5.1, 1.5.2, 2.1.1, 2.1.2, 2.4.1, 2.4.2, 2.7.1, 2.7.2, 2.7.3, 2.8.1, 2.8.2, 2.8.3, 2.8.5, 3.3.2, 3.5.1, 3.5.2 and 3.6.1. The authors would like to thank Amedeo Barletta, Gaetano De Amicis, Giacomo Delledonne, Cristina Fasone, Massimo Fichera, Filippo Fontanelli, Adriano Maffeo, Ignazio Patrone and Leonardo Pierdominici for their help and comments. Despite the terminology employed in the Lisbon Treaty we shall use ‘ECJ’ instead of ‘CJEU’ to refer to the Court of Justice. The terms ‘Community law’, ‘EC law’ and ‘EU law’ will be treated as interchangeable. Unless otherwise stated, all the decisions of the Italian Constitutional Court have been taken from its official website (www.cortecostituzionale.it).

All websites accessed 20 October 2014. Chapter delivered in October 2014.

G. Martinico (✉)

Scuola Superiore Sant’Anna, Pisa, Italy

e-mail: martinico@sssup.it

B. Guastaferro

University of Naples ‘Federico II’, Naples, Italy

e-mail: barbara.guastaferro@unina.it

B. Guastaferro

Durham Law School, Durham, England

O. Pollicino

Bocconi University, Milan, Italy

e-mail: oreste.pollicino@unibocconi.it the Rechtsstaat, with two key dimensions: (a) constitutional provisions on access to courts and judicial review; and (b) the legality principle, which subordinates administrative acts to parliamentary statutes. Under the latter, the introduction of criminal offences and imposition of obligations and taxation is permissible only on the basis of a parliamentary statute. The need to protect these tenets in the context of implementing the European Arrest Warrant system gave ground to extensive concerns on the part of governmental committees and legal scholars, leading to the introduction of fundamental rights safeguards, which, however, were criticised by the European Commission. Other areas where constitutional values have come under strain include the protection of social rights and the powers of the regions. More broadly, the report explores how to ensure axiological continuity between the principles and values that govern the life of a given polity within its boundaries and those that should characterise the international community. The report also observes that the autonomous language of transnational ‘constitutionalism’ does not readily correspond to what constitutional lawyers mean by the same word. In Italian scholarship, a number of scholars have come to speak about ‘weak’ or ‘post-modern’ constitutionalism, typical of the era of globalisation. Constitutional amendments regarding the EU are limited; further amendments have been considered, including a reference to ‘supreme principles of the Italian legal order and of the inviolable human rights’.

Keywords The Constitution of Italy · Amendment of the Constitution in relation to EU and international co-operation · The Italian Constitutional Court

‘Stato di diritto’/Rechtsstaat · The rule of law, the legality principle, access to courts and judicial protection · European Arrest Warrant and fundamental rights safeguards · Defence rights and nulla poena sine lege · Data Retention Directive · Changing language of constitutionalism at the transnational level

Fundamental rights · General principles of law and the principle of proportionality · Supremacy and controlimiti · Fundamental rights protection in the international fight against terrorism

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The Italian Constitution belongs to the group of constitutions that Mortati has called ‘constitutions born from the Resistance’¹, as they were forged with the clear intent to deny and overcome the whole of the ‘values’ (or anti-values) that had characterised the Fascist (or elsewhere, totalitarian) era. By ‘constitutions born from the Resistance’, Mortati also referred to other documents, for instance, the French

¹ Mortati 1973, p. 222.

(IV Republic) and German constitutions. As Carrozza² has recently noted, today we could include the Portuguese, Spanish and Greek constitutions that were promulgated during the 1970s within this group.

Openness is precisely one of the most evident features that characterises these texts, and it is possible to find the roots of this phenomenon even earlier, looking back at what, in the thirties, Mirkine-Guetzévitch called the ‘internationalization of modern constitutions’.³ In other words, openness seems to belong within the core of the ‘nouvelles tendances du droit constitutionnel’. It is possible to find this element in many constitutions born from the Resistance, which have been the product of a political compromise among very different democratic forces that had, as their only common point, the rejection of the totalitarian experiences, and that are characterised by a strong programmatic character, inspired by the sincere denial of the features of the previous regime and by the need for an entirely different society. Some of these constitutions (including the Italian Constitution) claimed the need for new societal models and were very rich in declarations of principle, reflecting a wish to produce a break with the past. In some cases, these so-called announced revolutions⁴ have remained solely on paper, as one of the most influential members of the Italian Constituent Assembly, Calamandrei, bitterly acknowledged with regard to many provisions of the Italian Constitution a few years after it came into force.⁵ This programmatic character implied the need for a real turning point in the ways of conceiving not only the values and premises of the social life within the national boundaries, but, frequently, they also induced the founding fathers of these constitutions born from the Resistance to hazard the codification of the values that should inspire the life and contribution of their nations to the international arena and community (external openness). Usually, it is said that the Italian Constitution is the result of a political compromise (‘compromesso’) among the three most important forces that acted as the engine of the constituent phase: the liberal, the Christian democratic and the socialist-communist (left-wing) traditions. They gathered together in the National Liberation Committee (CLN), and the ‘glue’ of this compromise was their shared anti-fascism. Indeed, the Italian case is very interesting for the study of constitutional openness that can be understood as a product of the anti-fascism⁶ that had a crucial role in unifying the leading forces of the CLN. Unlike the German case, the Italian constituent experience is less known abroad and, at the same time, it is probably a more genuine case of a constituent phase because of the lesser impact of foreign influences, at least in the writing of the constitution. This does not mean that there was no foreign influence on the Italian constituent process, but scholars have shown that the Italian Constituent Assembly

² Carrozza 2007, p. 180.

³ Mirkine-Guetzévitch 1931, p. 48.

⁴ Calamandrei 1966, p. 421.

⁵ Calamandrei 1965, p. 553.

⁶ Luciani 1991, p. 191. See also Delledonne 2009.

was really free to write a new constitution that was an ‘autogenous product’ of the Assembly.⁷

The Italian Constitution came into force on 1 January 1948. All of the main members of the Constituent Assembly, although so different in their cultural and political backgrounds, were united around the memory of the past.

As we will see, all of the constitutional provisions that govern the foreign relations of the Italian Republic result from this idea, starting with Art. 11, which is devoted to the pacifist principle.

1.1.2 The Constitution is composed of 139 articles, with its main parts organised as follows: the first 12 articles are devoted to Fundamental Principles. Thereafter, Part I concerns the ‘Rights and Duties of Citizens’, while Part II is devoted to the ‘Organisation of Republic’ (Arts. 55–139). Part I (Arts. 13–54) contains the following subsections: ‘Civil Relations’; ‘Ethical and Social Rights and Duties’; ‘Economic Rights and Duties’, and ‘Political Rights and Duties’. Part II is divided into six ‘Titles’: the Houses and the Legislative Process; the President of the Republic; the Government; the ‘Judicial Branch’, covering both the ‘Organization of the Judiciary’ and the ‘Rules on Jurisdiction’; and ‘Regions, Provinces, Municipalities’ (amended in 2001). Part II also contains a section entitled ‘Constitutional Guarantees’, which concerns the structure, composition and functioning of the Constitutional Court (Arts. 134–137) and includes the relevant provisions concerning ‘Amendments to the Constitution and Constitutional Laws’ (Arts. 138–139). According to the case law of the Italian Constitutional Court (ItCC) the formula ‘Republican form’ included in Art. 139 (devoted, as we will see, to the impossibility to amend the ‘Republican form’) corresponds to the supreme principles included in the very first articles of the Italian Constitution.⁸ The logic is the following: any change concerning these principles would result in a revolution in the technical sense of the word. These fundamental principles thus represent the ‘centre of gravity’ of our Constitution.

1.2 The Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 At first and for a long time, the ItCC used Art. 11 in order to cover the necessary limitations of sovereignty required by the European integration process (see Sect. 3.1.1 for the full wording of the article). This was the case until 2001 when the first important amendment concerning European integration was introduced with codification of the duty to exercise legislative power in compliance with Community law. Other amendments were introduced in 2012 to constitutionalise the so-called ‘golden rule’. For details see Sect. 1.2.3.

⁷ Bruno 1980, p. 59.

⁸ ItCC, Decision No. 1146/1988.

1.2.2 The constitutional amendment procedure is governed by Art. 138 of the Italian Constitution:

Laws amending the Constitution and other constitutional laws shall be adopted by each House after two successive debates at intervals of not less than three months, and shall be approved by an absolute majority of the members of each House in the second voting. Said laws are submitted to a popular referendum when, within three months of their publication, such request is made by one-fifth of the members of a House or five hundred thousand voters or five Regional Councils. The law submitted to referendum shall not be promulgated if not approved by a majority of valid votes. A referendum shall not be held if the law has been approved in the second voting by each of the Houses by a majority of two-thirds of the members.⁹

No other options are available and thus this was the procedure followed to change, inter alia, Art. 117. It is interesting to note that more recently, according to the reform proposed by the Renzi Government, it has been suggested that Art. 117(1) should be terminologically amended by replacing ‘Community law’ with ‘EU law’, following the terminology adopted after the coming into force of the Lisbon Treaty.

1.2.3 The new Art. 117(1) currently reads, ‘[I]legislative powers shall be vested in the State and the Regions in compliance with the Constitution and with the constraints deriving from Community and international obligations’. A more recent amendment was introduced to change the text of Art. 81 of the Constitution to introduce an express mention of the ‘balanced budget’ principle through Constitutional Law No. 1/2012. Articles 97, 117 and, above all, the first paragraph of Art. 119¹⁰ were also amended.

Looking at the judicial parameter, we will see that Art. 117(1) has provoked interesting innovations in the ItCC’s case law. Soon after the reform, the interpretation of this norm created a division among scholars.¹¹ According to some, Art. 117(1) simply codified the pre-existing situation: it granted a sort of a posteriori assent to European primacy¹² as had been developed by the Court of the Justice (ECJ) and accepted across the European Union. Other scholars, on the other hand, emphasised

⁹ The translations of the Italian Constitution reported in this chapter, with some limited exceptions, have been taken from the following sites: https://www.senato.it/documenti/repository/istituzione_costituzione_inglese.pdf and <http://www.servat.unibe.ch/icl/it00000.html>

¹⁰ Article 81 Italian Constitution: ‘General government entities, in accordance with European Union law, shall ensure the balance of their budgets and the sustainability of the public debt’. The Italian Constitution goes on to limit the scope of action of Regions and Local Authorities in the field of matters of regional and local finance, by introducing new constraints on the local authorities. Art. 119 Italian Constitution: ‘Municipalities, provinces, metropolitan cities and regions shall have revenue and expenditure autonomy, subject to the obligation to balance their budgets, and shall contribute to ensuring compliance with the economic and financial constraints imposed under European Union law. ...’. For a general discussion of these reforms, see Groppi, 2012.

¹¹ For an overview, see Chieppa 2007.

¹² Pinelli 2001, p. 194.

the importance of the constitutional status given to primacy of EU law, and asserted that Art. 117 paved the way for acceptance of the Italian monist thesis.¹³

1.2.4 It is interesting to note that there have been other attempts to revise the Constitution: for instance we can recall three ad hoc parliamentary committees (in 1983–1985 the so-called ‘Bozzi Bicameral Committee’; 1992–1994 the so-called ‘De Mita-Jotti Bicameral Committee’; and 1997–1998 the so-called ‘D’Alema Bicameral Committee’) that worked with no immediate outcome.¹⁴ The D’Alema Committee (named after former Prime Minister Massimo D’Alema, who chaired the committee in 1997–1998) had a certain impact on the reforms adopted in 1999 and 2001 (especially with regard to the reform of Italian regionalism). The D’Alema Committee prepared a text which proposed the inclusion of Title VI, entirely devoted to participation of the Italian Republic in the European Union and composed of three articles (Arts. 114–116) in the Constitution. In particular, the proposed Art. 114 would have codified respect of the ‘supreme principles of the Italian legal order and of the inviolable human rights’ as a condition for participation in the ‘European unification’ (sic!) process, in order to promote and encourage ‘an order based on the principles of democracy and subsidiarity’. The same provision stated that the limitations of sovereignty should be covered by a law passed by an absolute majority of the members of each House, and then added:

The law is subject to a popular referendum when, within three months of its publication, such request is made by one third of the members of a House or eight hundred thousand electors or five regional councils. The law submitted to referendum shall not be promulgated if not approved by a majority of valid votes.

The proposed Art. 115 regulated the involvement of the Parliamentary Houses in EU affairs and the duty of the Government to inform them. Article 116 was devoted to participation of the regions in the EU integration process.¹⁵ The wording of Art. 114 as proposed by the D’Alema Committee was recently used in some proposed amendments to Art. 11 that aimed at introducing a specific reference to the EU and the possibility of a referendum, should there be any further limitations of sovereignty, and at codifying the duty to respect the fundamental principles and inviolable rights recognised by the Italian legal order.¹⁶ Italian scholars have emphasised the insufficiency of Art. 11 to regulate the EU integration process and have advocated for a possible reform of its wording.¹⁷

¹³ Paterniti 2004, p. 2101; Pajno 2003, p. 814.

¹⁴ Fusaro 2005.

¹⁵ See the Italian version at: <http://www.camera.it/parlam/bicam/rifcost/dossier/aindice.htm>.

¹⁶ See Fasone 2010.

¹⁷ Cassese 1975, p. 583. For this debate, see Fasone 2010.

As we will see, the conservative approach to our constitutional text, the complicated procedure for constitutional amendments and the fact that Art. 11 is included in the very first part of the Constitution are the main reasons for the failure of these attempts (so far at least).

The recent package of measures proposed by the Renzi Government has focused, among other things, on the necessity to constitutionalise the role of the parliamentary chambers in EU affairs.¹⁸

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 The ItCC originally established that Art. 11 of the Italian Constitution was the basis for accepting Community law as supranational law with primacy and direct effect. This acceptance, however, did not come about immediately. On the contrary, it was the result of a long series of judgments. One of the reasons for this can be attributed to the absence of an explicit European clause in the Italian Constitution. In fact, Art. 11 was originally conceived to deal with Italian membership in organisations like the United Nations rather than to justify the consequence of supranationalism (a phenomenon that was unknown at the time the Italian Constitution came into force). This changed in 2001 with the constitutional reform of Title V of the Italian Constitution, with the introduction of Art. 117(1). Because of the dualist tradition, to which we will come back, international treaties acquire the same force as the domestic statutes adopted for their entry into force in the domestic legal system. This explains why, since the beginning, EU law has been considered as a primary source in the Italian legal system.

1.3.2–1.3.4 If we take a look at the history of the ItCC's case law regarding EU law, it is possible to notice a progressive departure from the pure dualist view first adopted by the Court. Over the years, this purity has been overcome and the ItCC, when referring to the domestic order and to the EC order, began to talk about two 'autonomous and separated, although coordinated'¹⁹ legal systems. At the same time, the ECJ, in often adopting a benign and tolerant attitude, has demonstrated that it appreciates the efforts made by the national courts. Some scholars have labelled this partial convergence with the term (limited) flexibilization of supremacies.²⁰ Despite this rapprochement, the expansion of the European Communities' competences has often given rise to some degree of tension between ¹⁸ See proposal A.S. 1429-A, Art. 55 It. Const ('functions of the Chambers'). See also proposal regarding Art. 70 Italian Constitution, which makes the law establishing forms and deadlines for the compliance with the obligations stemming from EU membership a constitutionally necessary law.

¹⁹ ItCC, Decision No. 170/1984, Granital [1984] CMLR 756.

²⁰ Ferreres Comella 2005, pp. 80–89.

the domestic judiciary and the EC courts, each time that the allocation of competence on borderline issues has been at stake. First of all, the ECJ has progressively obtained the trust of ordinary national judges, who also play a fundamental role in the constitutional review proceedings at domestic level. Such influence has resulted in the deterioration of the relationship between ordinary judges and the ItCC: when ordinary judges want to obtain an explanation regarding the relationship between EC law and the national constitution, they do not refer to the ItCC, but rather to the ECJ. This is a consequence of the self-exiled status of the ItCC, which has normally preferred not to address questions concerning the relationship between legal orders. Suffice it here to recall that for instance in 2002, the ItCC decided only ten cases (of a total of 500) that were related to the EC legal order.²¹ In case No. 14/1964²² the ItCC interpreted the relationship between national and EC acts in light of the chronological criterion lex posterior derogat priori (since the enabling domestic act ratifying the Treaties was an ordinary legislative act); later on, in case No. 183/1973²³ the ItCC changed its position and claimed that the constitutional basis for EC law primacy can be found in Art. 11 of the Italian Constitution. As we know, this provision was originally conceived to justify Italy's membership in the United Nations, rather than in the EU. EU membership, in fact, imposes limitations of sovereignty for goals that clearly go beyond 'peace and justice between nations'. Thus the ItCC was forced to 'manipulate' the original meaning of Art. 11 in order to allow for these limitations.²⁴ The ItCC had kept the task of monitoring respect for primacy of EC law (as a control of indirect violation of Art. 11 occurring when national provisions are found to be in conflict with EC law), but the consistency of EC law with the Italian Constitution could not be reviewed by the ItCC, given that it can rule on the validity of Italian norms only. Confirmation of the progressive flexibilization of the Court's original position can be found in the words used in Granital,²⁵ in which the Court found it necessary to 'clarify further the way in which the relationship between the two legal systems works'²⁶ and recognised that 'conclusions reached in previous decisions must therefore be rewritten'.²⁷

An important specific feature of the approach of the ItCC to EU law is the counter-limits doctrine, devised by the ItCC in 1973, soon after the well-known *Internationale Handelsgesellschaft*²⁸ case before the ECJ. In that judgment, the ECJ pointed out the primacy of EU law over national law, including national constitutional principles. In this respect the Italian position – along with that of Germany

²¹ Cartabia and Celotto 2002, p. 4477.

²² ItCC, Decision No. 14/1964.

²³ ItCC, Decision No. 183/1973, Frontini, [1974] 2 CMLR 372.

²⁴ Since 2001, an explicit reference to the European Community legal order is contained in Art. 117, as noted above.

²⁵ ItCC, Decision No. 170/1984, Granital, n. 19. On this issue, see Cartabia 1995.

²⁶ ItCC, Decision No. 170/1984, Granital, n. 19.

²⁷ Ibid.

²⁸ Case 11/70 Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 1125.

– is relevant for a complete understanding of the reasons for the ‘resistance’. Constitutional courts have claimed to maintain their own role (the role of the guardians of the national constitutional identity) without exceptions. They have denied the acceptance of dangerous monist visions in order to preserve the constitutional identity of their legal orders. On the contrary, they have raised some ultimate barriers against the penetration of EU law in order to define the fundamental principles of the legal orders of which they are the guardians. Hypothetically, if an EU provision were to conflict with the fundamental principles of the national legal order, the constitutional court could strike down the national statute executing the EC Treaty, thus causing a ‘rupture’ between the national and supranational legal orders. Constitutional courts in fact normally have jurisdiction over national legislation (including the legal source of execution of treaties) but not over EC provisions: the latter are beyond their jurisdiction because, as they argue, they belong to another legal order. If one proceeds from this approach, one can understand why the constitutional courts have traditionally refused the possibility to strike down EU law provisions, since the acceptance of this option would imply adhesion to the monist theory of the ECJ. It is by a legal fiction that it is possible to defend the hard core of constitutional legal orders by preserving the formal autonomy of the national and supranational orders and the jurisdiction of the ECJ. The identification of these barriers to European integration represents the essence of the counter-limits doctrine (‘dottrina dei controlimiti’), devised by the ItCC in the Frontini judgment²⁹ (but see also the Granital judgment³⁰). The consequence of a possible declaration of invalidity could spell Italy’s withdrawal from the EU. According to Cartabia, in these two cases the counter-limits test was conceived of as a way to carry out an exceptional control of respect of the conditions for constitutionality of the Italian accession to the EU.³¹ Following this reconstruction, the counter-limits originally worked as conditions for evaluating the legitimacy of the limitations of sovereignty accepted by the Italian accession to the European venture. Later on (with the Fragd judgment³²), the nature of the counter-limits doctrine changed and was transformed from an exceptional control into a ‘simple’ control of the compatibility of EU law with the Constitution which could not threaten Italy’s membership of the EU. Because of the ‘transformation’ of this doctrine, the counter-limits have worked as a limitation to European primacy: that is why, according to the same scholarship, starting from the Fragd judgment, the ItCC has implicitly admitted that a possible conflict with the Constitution would not cause the invalidity of the statute adopted for execution of the EC Treaty, but just the non-applicability of the EC rule.³³

²⁹ ItCC, Decision No. 183/1973, Frontini, n. 23.

³⁰ ItCC, Decision No. 170/1984, Granital, n. 19.

³¹ Cartabia 1995, p. 110.

³² ItCC, Decision No. 232/1989. In English: Fragd, [1990] 27 CML Rev. 93.

³³ See Cartabia and Weiler 2000, pp. 171–172.

Concerning the possibility to overcome such limitations of sovereignty by referendum, it is necessary to recall what the ItCC pointed out in Frontini decision:

The doubt that the limitations of sovereignty consequent upon the signature of the Rome Treaty and the entry of Italy into the EEC could require the use of the procedure of constitutional amendment for approval of the ratification and implementation Bill has its exact equivalent in the analogous doubt already expressed in 1951 on the occasion of the approval of the Treaty instituting the European Coal and Steel Community: a doubt correctly resolved by the Italian Parliament deciding that the ratification and implementation of that Treaty could be made by means of an ordinary statute. In truth, as this Court has already stated in COSTA v. ENEL, Article 11 means that, when its pre-conditions are met, it is possible to sign treaties which involve limitation of sovereignty and to agree to make them executory by an ordinary statute. The provision would finish emptied of its specific normative content if it were held that for every limitation of sovereignty covered by Article 11 recourse had to be had to a constitutional statute. It is clear that it has not only a substantive but also a procedural value, in the sense that it permits such limitations of sovereignty, on the conditions and for the ends therein set out, releasing Parliament from the necessity of making use of its power of constitutional amendment.³⁴

Nevertheless, more recently, with particular regard to the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe, Marta Cartabia has advocated the necessity to ‘cover’ the reform of the EU Treaties by means of a constitutional law.³⁵ Finally, according to the case law of the ItCC, the formula ‘Republican form’ used in Art. 139 of the Italian Constitution corresponds to the supreme principles included in the first part of the Italian Constitution. This means that in case of correspondence between the content of the counter-limits doctrine and that of the Republican form, no referendum may be used to surpass these limits.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 Specific measures for the involvement of the Parliament (and regional assemblies) in EU affairs have been codified in law No. 11/2005 (the so-called ‘Legge Buttiglione’), devoted to participation of Italy in EU decision-making with regard to the involvement of the State and regions in the preparatory phase of the EU decision-making process. This statute has been replaced by law No. 234-2012, which provides for measures concerning, among other things, the direct involvement of the national Parliament in the subsidiarity check of EU draft legislation and the obligation of information of the Government vis-à-vis the Parliament.³⁶ Further mechanisms have been implemented in the new Rules of Procedure of the Chambers. As written elsewhere in this report, in the package of measures proposed by the Renzi Government there is also a specific provision (Art. 55) aimed at constitutionalising the role of the national chambers in EU affairs.

³⁴ ItCC, Decision No. 182/73. See also Fasone 2010.

³⁵ Cartabia 2004.

³⁶ Committee of Regions, 2013.

1.4.2 The ratification of EU Treaties does not require a referendum. The only EU-related referendum in Italy was held in 1989, but it was ‘consultative’, as it asked whether the Italian population was in favour of the transformation of the European Communities into a European Union with a Government accountable to the European Parliament, and with a European Parliament entitled to draft a Constitution for Europe. The outcome was highly positive, with 88.03% of the population in favour and only 11.97% of the population against. Nevertheless, the referendum was conceived to have symbolic value rather than any legal implication, also since in the Italian legal order referendums are only allowed either to abrogate parliamentary laws (as per Art. 75 of the Constitution) or to confirm a parliamentary constitutional law aimed at revising the Constitution (as per Art. 138 of the Constitution). In this respect, a specific constitutional law was adopted (Law No. 2 of 3 April 1989) in order to have such a ‘consultative referendum’ on the future of the European Union.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.2 As noted above, the EU–amendments have been limited in their content and have codified some of the content of the ItCC’s case law. This can be explained in light of our ‘conservative’ approach to the constitutional text due to two technical reasons: the complicated procedure of Art. 138 and what Calamandrei calls the ‘far sighted’³⁷ nature of many constitutional provisions. In other words, our Constitution is rich in programmatic provisions containing generic guidelines that have guaranteed the ‘adaptability’ of our constitutional text. The detailed provisions dealing with the new challenges of the EU integration process have been introduced by means of primary legislation.

1.5.3 At the time of its adoption, the Italian Constitution was considered a long and detailed constitution. The updating of the constitutional pact has been guaranteed by the interpretative function carried out by the relevant constitutional actors, but also by a sort of cascade system of norms designed by the constitution. In other words, in Italy, many of the issues that have been called ‘constitutional’ in this questionnaire have been treated, over the years, by means of primary sources that have developed the guidelines included in the Constitution (either statutes of Parliament or the internal Rules of Procedure of the Chambers). This choice has a price, of course. First of all, if the legislator is negligent many provisions may never be implemented and that is why it would be better to constitutionalise some of these matters. As stated above, it is interesting to note that the last version of the package of measures proposed by the Renzi Government contains several welcomed proposals to this effect.

³⁷ Calamandrei 1955a.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 As noted above, fundamental rights are codified in Part I of the Constitution and divided into three sub-groups of provisions which more or less correspond to civil, political and social rights. In terms of the position of principles, some principles are codified in our Constitution (e.g. the principle of equality) or can be traced back to some constitutional provisions (the proportionality test is frequently associated with reasonableness³⁸ in the case law of our Constitutional Court and employed in cases concerning discrimination). There are also some general principles that cannot be considered as ‘constitutional’, such as the principle of separation of powers.³⁹ Some of these provisions remain just on paper or have very limited justiciability. Social rights are a classic example of this.

2.1.2 Some constitutional provisions provide for the possibility of limiting fundamental rights ‘in exceptional circumstances and under such conditions of necessity and urgency as shall conclusively be defined by the law’. Such restrictions are contained, for instance, in Art. 13 (personal liberty), Art. 14 (inviolability of dwelling), Art. 15 (freedom of correspondence) and Art. 16 (freedom of movement).

2.1.3 Although the core concepts of the rule of law belong to the Italian constitutional order, the Italian Constitution does not explicitly mention a constitutional category equivalent or similar to the rule of law. Nevertheless, at least two conceptualisations of the same principle can be inferred from the text of the Constitution and have been developed by scholarly literature, which usually refers to the concept of rule of law by the term ‘Stato di diritto’ (similar to Rechtsstaat; État de droit). On the one hand, there is the subjective facet of the rule of law, related to access to courts and to the right of defence, enshrined in Title I of the first part of the Constitution, which is dedicated to civil rights. Article 24 states:

All persons are entitled to take judicial action to protect their individual rights and legitimate interests. The right of defence is inviolable at every stage and level of the proceedings. The indigent are assured, by appropriate measures, the means for legal action and defence in all levels of jurisdiction. The law determines the conditions and the means for the redress of judicial errors.

The right to judicial review is also constitutionally entrenched by Art. 25, according to which ‘[n]o one may be withheld from the jurisdiction previously ascertained by law', thus ensuring that the tribunal established by law is independent and impartial. On the other hand, the second conceptualisation of the rule of law is related to the so-called 'principio di legalità' (legality principle), which in the hierarchy of norms subordinates administrative acts to parliamentary statutes (legge), as the latter are an expression of the volonté générale according to the Rousseauian tradition. In light of this legality principle, the imposition of personal obligations, administrative charges and taxation are only permissible on the basis of a parliamentary statute (see Art. 23). When applied to criminal law, the principle of legality is connected to the principle of non-retroactivity and entails the principle that no one may be punished except by virtue of a law that is in force before an offence is committed (nulla poena sine lege).⁴⁰ Also another core element of the rule of law, i.e. the rule that only published laws can be valid, is covered by the concept of Stato di diritto.

³⁸ Scaccia 2007.

³⁹ Modugno 1966; De Marco 1996; Pizzorusso 1981.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 It is almost impossible to have a univocal answer for the Italian context. Even if at first glance we might state that the balancing of fundamental rights with economic free movement rights has not raised significant constitutional issues, it is worth noting that many scholars have complained about lower standards for social rights at the EU level, when compared with the standard set out by many constitutions (including the Italian Constitution) which protect social-democratic values and the rights of workers.⁴¹ The fear that the balancing of the Court of Justice may affect national judges has been raised in the scholarly literature.⁴² The main criticism related to rulings such as Viking,⁴³ *Laval*⁴⁴ and *Rüffert*⁴⁵ is that the right to strike is not considered as a human right, thus lowering the standard of protection of Art. 40 of the Italian Constitution, which qualifies it as a fundamental constitutional right.⁴⁶ Indeed, in the ECJ case law, the right to strike can be balanced against internal market fundamental freedoms on equal footing (in the sense that it is considered a legitimate interest that must be protected but its possible infringement of an internal market fundamental freedom must be proportionate).

⁴⁰ For a general overview on the two concepts, see Bin 2004 and Sorrentino 2007.

⁴¹ Gambino 2014, p. 35.

⁴² Giubboni 2009; Caruso 2009.

⁴³ Case C-438/05 The International Transport Workers' Federation and The Finnish Seamen's Union [2007] ECR I-10779.

⁴⁴ Case C-341/05 Laval un Partneri [2007] ECR I-11767.

⁴⁵ Case C-346/06 Rüffert [2008] ECR I-01989.

⁴⁶ Gambino 2014, p. 39.

Moreover, it can also be pointed out that the focus of the ECJ is on the formal facet of the principle of equality (protecting non-discrimination), while the Italian constitutional tradition strongly protects ‘substantive’ rather than merely ‘formal’ equality. In this interpretation, there is a positive obligation upon the State to remove all obstacles to equality by providing economic assistance to people who are poor or discriminated against in order to provide them equal treatment. While it is possible to say that the Italian Constitutional Court has not expressly adjusted its balancing to match the ECJ’s approach, in the field of so-called reverse discrimination, its case law on the principle of equality has been affected by the jurisprudence of the Luxembourg Court.⁴⁷ In order to deal with cases of reverse discrimination the Italian Constitutional Court has progressively extended its scrutiny in light of Art. 3 (principle of equality).⁴⁸ More recently, the issue of reverse discrimination has created ‘problems of coordination’ between the national and supranational levels. In a decision of the ECJ that was recently strongly criticised by Peers,⁴⁹ a woman brought a claim for state compensation based on Directive 2012/29/EU ‘establishing minimum standards on the rights, support and protection of victims of crime’,⁵⁰ after having obtained the conviction of her attacker for sexual assault. Since the offender did not have the money to pay the compensation ordered by the national court, the victim tried to obtain compensation from the Italian state, but the ECJ ruled that the Directive in question was not applicable to purely domestic cases.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 The presumption of innocence is a fundamental principle in the Italian constitutional order. It is implicit in Art. 13 which is devoted to personal liberty. Article 13 first states that ‘personal liberty is inviolable and that no form of ⁴⁷ Case C-35-36/82 Morson and Jhanjan [1982] ECR 03723; Case C-229/83 Leclerc [1985] ECR 00305; Case 355/85 Cognet [1986] ECR 03231; Case C-90/86 Zoni, [1988] ECR 04285; Case C-33/88 Allué I [1989] ECR 01591; Joined cases C-259/91, C-331/91 and C-332/91 Allué II [1993] ECR I-04309.

⁴⁸ ItCC, Decisions No. 249/1995, No. 61/1996 and No. 443/1997. On reverse discrimination in the case law of both the ECJ and the ItCC, see Spitaleri 2011 and Dani 2011.

⁴⁹ Case C-122/13 C [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:59. See the comment by Peers 2014.

⁵⁰ Directive 2012/29/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council of 25 October 2012 establishing minimum standards on the rights, support and protection of victims of crime, and replacing Council Framework Decision 2001/220/JHA, [2012] OJ L 315/58.

detention, inspection nor any other restriction on personal freedom is permitted, except by a reasoned warrant issued by a judicial authority, and only in the cases and the manner provided for by law'. Article 13 then continues:

In exceptional cases of necessity and urgency, strictly defined by the law, law-enforcement authorities may adopt temporary measures that must be communicated to the judicial authorities within forty-eight hours. Should the judicial authorities not confirm such measures within the next forty-eight hours, they are revoked and become invalid.

In order to respect the presumption of innocence, Art. 13(5) specifies: 'The law establishes the maximum period of preventive detention'. In order to protect the presumption of innocence at the same level as in our constitutional order, Italy has introduced an additional ground of refusal when implementing the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision⁵¹ (EAW Framework Decision). Indeed, according to Art. 18(e) of Law No. 69/2005 implementing the EAW Framework Decision, surrender of the individual shall be refused if the legal system of the Member State issuing the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) does not stipulate maximum limits to the duration of preventive detention. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court has construed this article in a way that has sometimes undermined the level of protection of the presumption of innocence in our constitutional system, in order to provide for a consistent interpretation of domestic law with EU law. The Supreme Court has often been satisfied with the procedural rules of other Member States (even when these have enshrined lower standards of protection) which for example envisage a system of subsequent intermediate periods, which may be extended under jurisdictional scrutiny. In other words, the Supreme Court has adopted a substantive rather than a formalistic approach to the interpretation of the notion of 'maximum limits' contemplated in Italian law, so as to allow for the extradition of accused persons to countries which have a 'similar' or 'equivalent' level of protection of the individual, but not necessarily the same.⁵² It is interesting to note that this position of the Supreme Court (which in the specific case allowed the surrender of an individual upon a request made by Germany) marks a shift in the case law of the same Court. It is worth noting that the Supreme Court had previously refused to surrender a citizen to Belgium because of the absence of maximum limits to the duration of precautionary detention like those in the Italian legal order.⁵³

⁵¹ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

⁵² Corte di Cassazione, Sezioni Unite, Ramoci Villaznim Decision No. 4614 of 30 January 2007. Also the Decision No. 17810 of 24 April 2007 (Sezione sesta penale, caso Zanotti) has been criticised for surrendering the individual to Poland, although in that country there were no maximum limits for preventive detention as envisaged by the Italian legal order.

⁵³ Corte di Cassazione, Sez. VI, Cusini, Decision No. 16542 of 8 May 2006. On the changing orientation of the Supreme Court of Cassation, see Cavallini 2007.

2.3.1.2 The procedure for surrender of the individual is enshrined in Law No. 69 of 2005 implementing the Framework Decision (from Art. 5 to Art. 27).⁵⁴ The Corte d'Appello of the district where the citizen resides is the competent authority for execution of the EAW. While it must be acknowledged that the Italian courts usually execute and very rarely refuse EAW requests, Law No. 69 of 2005 envisages appropriate guarantees for the accused, which include, for example, the possibility to appeal to the Supreme Court of Cassation for a second trial in case of disagreement with the outcome of the first trial before the Court of Appeal.⁵⁵ Moreover, the accused individual has the right to have both a public defender and an interpreter, and to be judged at a public hearing.⁵⁶

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 The principle nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege is enshrined in Art. 25 of the Italian Constitution, according to which '[n]o one may be punished except on the basis of a law in force prior to the time when the offence was committed'. In this respect, criminal legislation must satisfy the conditions of precision, clarity and predictability, allowing each person to know whether an act constitutes an offence. In this respect, the abolition of double criminality for 32 categories of crimes as provided by the EAW framework decision might be in breach of the principle of legality in criminal matters. While the issue has never reached the Constitutional Court, it has raised a significant debate in scholarly literature.⁵⁷

On the one hand, some scholars have noted that the principle nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege is deeply jeopardised by the EAW requirement according to which the State of execution shall provide its assistance in punishing an act which may not be qualified as a crime in the domestic legal order: the focus here is on the breach of the principle according to which only parliamentary statutory law may restrict personal freedom.⁵⁸ On the other hand, there is a second line of criticism which builds on the assumption that the dual criminality rule not only protects the principle of legality but also the principle of sovereignty.⁵⁹ In this respect, abolition of the double ⁵⁴ The text of the Law is available at <http://www.camera.it/parlam/leggi/050691.htm>.

⁵⁵ More generally, it is the Constitution itself, in Art. 111, which states that 'Appeals to the Court of Cassation in cases of violations of the law are always allowed against sentences and against measures affecting personal freedom pronounced by ordinary and special courts. This rule can only be waived in cases of sentences by military tribunals in time of war'.

⁵⁶ An accurate overview of the procedure is available on the website of the Italian National Association of Judges: <http://www.associazionemagistrati.it/doc/1518/il-mandato-di-arresto-europeo.htm>.

⁵⁷ For a general overview, see Calvano 2007.

⁵⁸ Cf. Bartone 2003; Caianello and Vassalli 2002; Gualtieri 2004; Manacorda 2004 and 2007 amongst others.

⁵⁹ Pisa 1973.

criminality rule may also configure a sort of ‘superiority’ of the criminal law of the country issuing the EAW upon the country executing it.⁶⁰

In fact, the problematic aspect of the EAW Framework Decision lies in legal certainty. Indeed, the Framework Decision enumerates the types of crimes for which the rule of double criminality is abolished, but it does not specify the behaviours connected to those crimes, leaving definition of the constitutive elements of the crime to the Member States. Under the same label of corruption, organised crime or drug trafficking, Member States’ law may define very different behaviours. In this respect, individuals who are in a foreign country that has a legal and juridical culture different from that of their home country may experience a ‘journey into the unknown’.⁶¹

For some of the categories of offences listed in Art. 2 of the Framework Decision it is not possible to identify corresponding or common models of incrimination. Some acts may be criminalised in some national legal systems but not in others. This significantly jeopardises the principle of legality in its pivotal function: that of guiding the behaviour of individuals in the light of certain and predictable rules.⁶² In order to avoid this vulnus to the constitutionally protected principle of legality, some proposals were put forward to revisit the Italian criminal law framework in order to create a perfect correspondence between the list provided for in Art. 2 of the Framework Decision and Italian material criminal law, to ensure legal certainty without infringing the principle of mutual recognition in the criminal sphere.⁶³

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 The principle of fair trial is enshrined in Art. 111 of the Italian Constitution, which is composed of a first part related to due process more broadly, and a second part specifically dedicated to criminal trials. According to Art. 111:

Jurisdiction is implemented through due process regulated by law. All court trials are conducted with adversary proceedings and the parties are entitled to equal conditions before an impartial judge in third party position. The law provides for the reasonable duration of trials. In criminal law trials, the law provides that the alleged offender shall be promptly informed confidentially of the nature and reasons for the charges that are brought and shall have adequate time and conditions to prepare a defence. The defendant shall have the right to cross-examine or to have cross-examined before a judge the persons making accusations and to summon and examine persons for the defence in the same conditions as the prosecution, as well as the right to produce all other evidence in favour of the defence.

⁶⁰ Barazzetta 2004; Picotti 2005; Selvaggi and Villoni 2002.

⁶¹ Mitsilegas 2006.

⁶² On the difficulties for individuals to be aware of the definition and scope of crimes in foreign countries, see Del Tufo 2005 and Di Martino 2006, pp. 133–135.

⁶³ Iuzzolino 2002; Barazzetta 2004.

While Art. 111 of the Constitution, as amended in 1999, seems to provide sufficient protection of the principle according to which the defendant shall be duly informed of the process and shall participate therein, the Strasbourg Court has on several occasions condemned Italy for in absentia judgments that do not comply with the procedural guarantees provided for in Art. 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).⁶⁴ The Italian criminal code has very recently been revised by Law No. 67 of 28 April 2014, in order to conform to the ECHR standards that allow prosecution of an alleged offender only where there is certainty of the knowledge of the process and where there is unequivocal evidence of the willingness of the alleged offender to waive the right to participate into the process. The reform significantly changes Italian traditional criminal law which looked at in absentia judgments as a right of the defendant, rather than as a possible infringement upon his/her rights.⁶⁵ In this respect, judges will have to collect more evidence about the effective willingness to be absent on the part of the defendant before condemning him/her with an in absentia judgment.

In addition, the Italian Constitutional Court has annulled a provision of the Italian criminal code related to in absentia judgments in that it violated Art. 6 of the ECHR which enshrines the right of the accused to participate in his or her trial and to be informed promptly.⁶⁶ More specifically, the annulled provision was Art. 175 (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which did not allow the release of the accused person within the time limit for appealing against an in absentia judgment, where a similar appeal had previously been proposed by the public defender's office. This judgment is very important in that it marks a shift in the position of the Constitutional Court, which had earlier held that trials against individuals who had ignored allegations against them and had not been properly informed did not violate Art. 111 of the Italian Constitution, and that the ECHR did not grant guarantees greater than those provided for in this Article.⁶⁷ Moreover, it must be stressed that in this judgment, the Constitutional Court, in balancing constitutional values, attributed greater importance to the right of the defendant than to the principle of due process and of the reasonable duration of the process. By way of contrast, the Supreme Court of Cassation stated in a similar case that the reopening of the process with the possibility for the 'uninformed' alleged offender to make an appeal could jeopardise the smoothness and reasonable length of the process protected by Art. 111 of the Constitution.⁶⁸

⁶⁴ ECtHR, Colozza v. Italy, 12 February 1985, Series A no. 89; Somogyi v. Italy, no. 67972/01, ECHR 2004-IV; Sejdic v. Italy [GC], no. 56581/00, ECHR 2006-II.

⁶⁵ Quattrocolo 2014.

⁶⁶ ItCC, Decision No. 317/2009.

⁶⁷ ItCC, Order No. 89/2008 and Decision No. 117/2007.

⁶⁸ Cassazione penale, Sezioni Unite, Judgment No. 6026 of 31 January 2008.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 The Italian Constitution, in Art. 111, states that in all criminal trials ‘the defendant is entitled to the assistance of an interpreter in the case that he or she does not speak or understand the language in which the court proceedings are conducted’. Nevertheless, in the opinion of many defence lawyers, extradited citizens or residents are unfortunately not provided with quality translation and legal aid or travel expenses. Introduction of a publicly funded state or non-governmental body to provide such assistance would be highly recommended. Some proposals have been made by defence attorneys in order to guarantee appropriate protection of the constitutional rights of residents who are involved in trials abroad. The focus of such proposals largely built on the 2012 Justice Report ‘European Arrest Warrant – Ensuring an Effective Defence’ and stressed the necessity of immediate legal assistance both in the issuing and in the executing Member State, and a high level of specialisation on the part of defence attorneys in order to ensure an effective defence. Moreover, the report suggests a proportionality test on the part of the judge, so as to ensure that the infringement of fundamental rights is proportionate in the light of the seriousness of the crime (especially in the light of the discrepancies between Member States’ sanctions, which would at least require a comparative analysis of the relevant national legal frameworks).⁶⁹

2.3.4.2 Unfortunately, there are no statistical data available to indicate how many extradited individuals have subsequently been found innocent. This is because the Ministry of Justice does not collect data on how many individuals are found innocent even in the course of domestic trials.⁷⁰ Nevertheless, information on the website of the Minister of the Economy and Finance indicates that approximately 50,000 people have been victims of injustice. This data is available since Italian law requires the state to provide such persons with monetary compensation, which is counted as an item of expenditure.⁷¹ While we do not have statistics on extradited individuals or on individuals surrendered subsequent to an EAW request who have subsequently been found innocent, two cases have been covered in the media, both of which related to a mistaken identity. A Spanish doctor, José Vincent Pier Ripoll, was extradited from Spain to Italy and was held in jail for 8 months due to a miscarriage of justice by judges who accused him of being an international drug trafficker. He received 85,000 EUR in compensation.⁷² In 2009, an Italian gardener

⁶⁹ Barletta et al. 2013.

⁷⁰ The only statistics available are at: http://www.giustizia.it/giustizia/it/mg_1_14.wp?frame10_item=4&all=true.

⁷¹ The so called R.I.D. (Riparazione per ingiusta detenzione), for which Italy paid 575,698,145 EUR from 1991 to 2013. The data are available at: <http://www.errorigiediziari.com/errori-giudiziari-statistiche-numeri-dati/>.

⁷² <http://www.errorigiediziari.com/?vittime=jose-ripoll-scambiato-per-narco-in-carcere-per-8-mesi-da-innocente>.

was jailed for 50 days pursuant to a European Arrest Warrant from Germany in which he was accused of aggravated theft in Austria and Germany, where the gardener had never lived or even travelled.⁷³ In another case (Arapì) which was also reported in the news, the defendant was convicted of murder in his absence in Italy, although he was not aware of the trial. After surrender to the Italian authorities was ordered by a UK court, the EAW request was dropped and he received compensation in the amount of 18,000 GBP.⁷⁴

2.3.5 The Right of Effective Judicial Protection and the Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law

2.3.5.1 While the application of the principle of mutual recognition in civil and commercial matters has not raised significant constitutional issues in Italy, its application in criminal law has been quite tormented. In the scholarly literature, the transposition of mutual recognition to the criminal sphere was not only considered as an attack on national sovereignty, but also as ‘the first serious threat of disablement of the constitutional guarantees to the right of liberty’.⁷⁵ Following the same line of reasoning, a significant political debate concerned about a possible infringement upon fundamental constitutional rights, accompanied both the adoption and the implementation of the European Arrest Warrant Framework Decision.⁷⁶

While it did not succeed in jeopardising the adoption of the Framework Decision during the 2001 Laeken Summit or in reducing the list of crimes provided for in Art. 2 of the Decision to only six crimes strictly related to terrorism, the Italian Government managed, together with Austria, to delay the adoption of the decision. It also requested a declaration to be recorded at the moment of the decision. In this political declaration (devoid of any legal value) the Government stressed the need to change the Italian criminal system (with respect to the constitutional principles and in particular respect for fundamental rights) to be able to adapt to what is established in the Framework Decision.⁷⁷ The Government also asked for a parere pro veritate from two prominent lawyers, Vincenzo Caianiello and Giuliano Vassalli, both of them former Ministers of Justice and former Chairs of the Italian Constitutional Court. Both of them found that the introduction of the mutual recognition rule in criminal law was incompatible with many of the principles enshrined in the Italian Constitution. Caianiello and Vassalli in particular lamented ⁷³ <http://www.errorijudiziari.com/?vittime=finisce-in-carcere-per-50-giorni-per-uno-scambio-di-identita>.

⁷⁴ <http://www.fairtrials.org/press/italian-shock-decision-to-drop-european-arrest-warrant-against-edmond-arapi/>.

⁷⁵ Pinelli 2012, p. 2399.

⁷⁶ Salazar 2002.

⁷⁷ Barletta 2006.

about: (a) a violation of the principle of the rule of law, in its facet of the ‘principle of legality’, which should ensure that crimes are foreseen in a predictable and specific way, by national statutory laws, enacted by the Parliament, rather than generically listed in the EAW Framework Decision enacted by EU institutions; (b) a violation of the constitutional principle of personal freedom as envisaged by Arts. 13, 104 and 111 of the Constitution. According to the Italian Constitution, any measure restricting personal freedom, such as for example measures for the enactment and enforcement of custody orders, shall be provided by statutory laws, in that those laws are subject to a strict scrutiny of respect for constitutional fundamental rights carried out by the Constitutional Court; (c) a violation of the rules on extradition contemplated in Arts. 10 and 26 of the Italian Constitution, aimed at protecting the fundamental rights of individuals.⁷⁸

These constitutional concerns have all been translated into a law on implementation of the EAW Framework Decision which does not completely comply with EU law, as pointed out by the European Commission several times. Just to give an example, in order to guarantee effective judicial protection to individuals, Law No. 69 of 2005 significantly increases the grounds for refusal to deny the execution of an EAW, compared to those set out in the EAW Framework Decision. It can be argued that constitutional guarantees related to effective judicial protection have not been undermined by the introduction of the mutual recognition rule in criminal law, in the light of the fact that the Italian constitutional order has preserved some flexibility in implementing the Framework Decision.⁷⁹

2.3.5.2 In our view, mutual recognition, when compared with harmonisation, still represents the method that best suits a pluralistic legal order, allowing for respect for the different legal traditions of the Member States in the European legal space. Nevertheless, transposition of mutual recognition from internal market matters to criminal law is problematic. While the case for mutual recognition in criminal matters was largely based on the success of the principle in the area of the internal market,⁸⁰ the so-called ‘single market analogy’,⁸¹ raises the following contested issues. First of all, the freedom of movement of ‘judicial decisions’ may not be compared to the movement of persons, products and services: if mutual recognition requires that practices and standards of other Member States be deemed legitimate in an extra-territorial way,⁸² criminal law has traditionally been considered as a national affair strictly related to national sovereignty. Secondly, while internal ⁷⁸ Caianiello and Vassalli 2002, pp. 462–467; Casetti 2005.

⁷⁹ On the implementation of the EAW Framework Decision in Italy, see Fichera 2011 and Barletta 2011.

⁸⁰ Flore 2009, p. 269.

⁸¹ Lavenex 2007.

⁸² Mitsilegas 2009, p. 118.

market fundamental freedoms considerably expand the sphere of individual rights, the free movement of judicial decisions in criminal matters does not provide an immediate benefit to the individual, but is reflected in a direct benefit for the Member State.⁸³ Indeed, it is the judicial decision of a sovereign Member State which can be executed and recognised in other Member States. By way of contrast, such decisions are often imposed on individuals. Nevertheless, there is an ‘indirect’ benefit upon citizens which comes from more security. In sum, mutual recognition represents a good instrument for guaranteeing efficiency and the security of citizens, only insofar as it does not entail an infringement of fundamental rights related to effective judicial protection. To this end, in order to ensure mutual trust among judicial authorities, the most significant discrepancies between Member States on the core elements of the rule of law should be reduced.

Some authors have given serious consideration to the possibility of combining mutual recognition with minimum approximation of offences and penalties. They usually refer to the debate during the negotiations of the EAW Framework Decision, when the choice between ‘pure’ or ‘absolute’ mutual recognition (including only formal grounds for non-execution and/or relating to only a few serious offences) and ‘relative’ mutual recognition was discussed. It has also been suggested that the list of types of crimes be reduced to a few core offences, for which common criteria for definition and punishment may be found more easily.⁸⁴ In addition, the EU institutions have underestimated the role of mutual trust. The initial assumption that mutual trust would be generated automatically proved wrong. There are also signs of a shift from a ‘mutual trust’ to an ‘effectiveness’ paradigm.⁸⁵

2.3.5.3 In Italy, some criticisms of the possible change in the role of courts (from providing judicial protection against unwarranted measures by the authorities, to having become actors of loyal co-operation, efficiency and trust) were raised with regard to the Supreme Court of Cassation. This Court, indeed, in some judgments, favoured the logics of co-operation and efficiency inherent in the EAW framework at the expense of the more guarantistic procedures contemplated by domestic law.⁸⁶ Guarantism is the political doctrine developed in the nineteenth century, which aimed at protecting constitutional guarantees for individual liberty and collective freedoms against potential arbitrariness by the public authorities. In the 1960s to 1990s, guarantees in the penal process to avoid arbitrariness in political or judicial power, especially in the context of emergency legislation, became a central element of the concept.⁸⁷ Just to give two examples, the Supreme Court stated that an arrest warrant has to be executed when the requesting Member State respects the right to a fair trial, even if the degree of such protection is lower than the level ensured by a

⁸³ Klip 2012, p. 22; Lavenex 2007, pp. 764–765; Mostl 2010, p. 409.

⁸⁴ Fichera 2011, p. 80.

⁸⁵ Herlin-Karnell 2013, pp. 79–91.

⁸⁶ For a survey, see Barletta 2011.

⁸⁷ The key scholars behind this concept are Luigi Ferrajoli and Norberto Bobbio; for a key book, see Ferrajoli 2009.

Italian Constitution in Art. 111.⁸⁸ Moreover, the Supreme Court of Cassation provided a restrictive interpretation of the ‘safeguard clause’ contemplated in Art. 2 of Law No. 69/2005 implementing the EAW Framework Decision, according to which the application of the Framework Decision shall fully respect fundamental rights as provided by international treaties and the Italian Constitution, and according to which the violation of those constitutional guarantees by the Member State issuing the EAW may result in a refusal to surrender the individual. More specifically, when the ‘safeguard clause’ was invoked, the Supreme Court refused to apply it, by retaining that the absence of alternative measures to detention, aimed at the re-socialisation of the detainees, did not amount to a breach of a common constitutional principle of the Member States.⁸⁹

In our opinion, the fact that the Supreme Court limited the field of application of the safeguard clause provided by Art. 2 of Law No. 69/2005 to the domestic constitutional principles that are also mentioned in Art. 6 TEU, cannot be criticised as such. The reasoning behind this case law is not the sacrifice of constitutional guarantees to serve the goals of efficiency in the area of freedom, security and justice. More simply, the Court of Cassation has tried to mitigate the discrepancies between the EAW Framework Decision and the Italian implementing law, while providing an interpretation of Italian law that is consistent with EU law.⁹⁰

2.3.5.4 In Italy, there have been no explicit calls to reintroduce some form of judicial review in the country of residence of the individual affected. In any case, this is inherent in the law implementing the EAW Framework Decision, which is not completely consistent with the Framework Decision, in that it provides greater protection of constitutional rights. Just to give an example, according to the Italian implementing law, the surrender of the accused individual should be subject to the existence of serious evidence of guilt. The EAW Framework Decision does not include this condition. Indeed, it could be regarded as contrary to the decision itself, to the extent that such a determination results in an undue overlap of assessments carried out by an Italian judge with respect to judgments that fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the judicial authority of the Member State issuing the EAW. This is clearly inconsistent with the very essence of the principle of mutual recognition.⁹¹ Shifting to the behaviour of the courts, it can be said that

Italian Courts execute the EAW as far as the requesting State offers adequate judicial remedies to the lack of discussion and cross-examination, such as the possibility to appeal (Corte Cass., Sez. VI, Tavano, n. 7812/2008; Sez. VI, Finotto, n. 7813/2008), to ask for revision of the Judgement (Corte Cass., Sez. VI, Bolun, n. 5909/2007, regarding Hungary, and Sez. VI, Salkanovic, n. 3927/2008, regarding France) or to start a new phase of the proceedings (Corte Cass., Sez. F, D'Onorio, n. 33327/2007, concerning Belgium).⁹²

⁸⁸ See Corte di Cassazione, Sez. VI, Melina, Decision No. 17632/2007 of 3 May 2007.

⁸⁹ Corte di Cassazione, Sez. VI, Hantig, Decision No. 46296/2008 of 10 December 2008.

⁹⁰ See also Corte di Cassazione, SS. UU., Ramoci, Decision No. 4614/2007 of 30 January 2007.

⁹¹ Selvaggi and De Amicis 2005, p. 1814.

⁹² Porchia and Puoti 2013, pp. 441–442.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1–2.4.2 The implementation of the Data Retention Directive⁹³ has not raised constitutional issues in our country, although the decisions coming from the other countries have been addressed to a certain degree in the Italian literature,⁹⁴ and many have welcomed the decision of the ECJ.⁹⁵ The implementation occurred with some delay by Legislative Decree No. 109/2008. However, before the entry into force of this legislative decree, the Privacy Code already contained Art. 132 on Traffic Data Retention for Other Purposes. After the decision of the ECJ, some colleagues⁹⁶ pointed out the necessity to disapply (due to conflict with Art. 7 and 8 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights,) or to declare unconstitutional Art. 132 of Legislative Decree No. 2003/196 (a.k.a. ‘Data Protection Code’)⁹⁷ in light of Art. 117.

It has been noted that until the entry into force of the Law implementing Directive 2006/24, Italy was among the countries with the provision for the longest retention periods for data traffic, on the basis of Art. 6 of Decree Law No. 144/2005 (converted into Law No. 155/2005) on urgent measures to combat international terrorism, which modified the wording of Art. 132 of the Privacy Code. This latter provision requires that providers retain telephone traffic data for 24 months from the date of the communication to detect and suppress criminal offences, and that electronic communications traffic data, except for the contents of communications, is to be retained by the provider for twelve months from the date of the communication for the same purpose. Article 132(1bis) also allows for data retention of unsuccessful calls for thirty days. As for the modalities of transfer, under Art. 132 (3), data may be acquired from the provider by means of a reasoned order issued by a public prosecutor or at the request of defence counsel, the person under investigation, the injured party or any other private party.⁹⁸

This provision was introduced into our legal system before the entry into force of the Directive.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 The duty of public entities to publish documents is an important indicator of the true democratic character of a given legal system. In this respect, unpublished

⁹³ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁹⁴ For example, see Passaglia 2010.

⁹⁵ Including Ferro 2014 and Pastena 2014.

⁹⁶ See Vecchio 2014 amongst others.

⁹⁷ For an overview of this code, see: http://www.garanteprivacy.it/home_en/italian-legislation.

⁹⁸ Porchia and Puoti 2013, p. 447.

legislation cannot be deemed to be valid in Italy since publication is considered to be a constitutive element of parliamentary statutes, which are not considered to exist or to be valid until they are published in the ‘Gazzetta Ufficiale’ of the Italian Republic. Having said that, the Italian legal order recognises the existence of state secrets, which, as defined by law,⁹⁹ include all acts, documents, facts and activities the disclosure of which may undermine the integrity, independence and defence of the State, its relations with other States, or the functioning of State institutions and bodies of constitutional relevance.¹⁰⁰ The Constitutional Court has ruled that the state secrets privilege is not incompatible with the Constitution, insofar as it is designed to protect national security as per Art. 126 of the Constitution.¹⁰¹ The Penal Code provides that disclosure of information classified as a state secret is punishable by imprisonment of at least five years. More recently, the Constitutional Court stated that the selection of acts, documents and information to be classified as a state secret is a highly discretionary political activity that cannot be subject to judicial review.¹⁰²

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 No specific issues with regard to the standard of protection of property rights, legal certainty, legitimate expectations, non-retroactivity or proportionality have arisen in Italy in relation to EU measures, although in the early days the concern about rights protection in the internal market was the main reason behind the creation of the counter-limits doctrine by the ItCC. Some of these issues have been tackled in relation to the European Convention on Human Rights, which has, for example, increased the standard of protection of property rights by providing for appropriate compensation after expropriation (more specifically, the ItCC invalidated a national parliamentary statute for violation of Art. 1 of Protocol 1 ECHR).

However, an indication that the above principles may play a more prominent role and be subject to a stricter standard of protection in Italy in comparison with the EU system of judicial review may be implied from a study by Gari and Tridimas. Their research shows that Italy’s low success in challenging EU measures may be linked to the fact that Italy has based most of its arguments on violations of general principles, with the following general principles of EC law having been invoked by Italy unsuccessfully: proportionality; statement of reasons; non-discrimination and equal treatment; legitimate expectations and legal certainty; and right to a fair ⁹⁹ Law No. 124 of 3 Aug. 2007, and Law No. 133 of 7 August 2012.

¹⁰⁰ For a general overview see Mastroianni and Arena 2011, pp. 121–123.

¹⁰¹ See ItCC, Order No. 49/1977, Decision No. 82/1977 and Decision No. 86/1977.

¹⁰² ItCC, Decision No. 106/2009.

hearing. The authors have noted that Italy's low success rate (with 8.7% of successful cases) stands in contrast to Spain's higher success rate, which they attribute to arguments that are based on more technical grounds.¹⁰³

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1–2.7.3 The constitutionality of the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) has not been questioned in our country, and even the parliamentary debate was very poor. As Pierdominici has pointed out, in both Chambers and in the relevant Parliamentary Committees, the procedure for authorisation by law of the Fiscal Compact was combined with other procedures related to the Treaty amendment in Art. 136(3) TFEU and the ESM Treaty.¹⁰⁴

Some authors have tried to argue that the Fiscal Compact is invalid, but in light of its presumed conflict with the EU Treaties.¹⁰⁵ There has been no constitutional litigation on the validity of these measures and this 'seems to be explained first of all by the way the system of constitutional adjudication is designed'.¹⁰⁶ In other words, because of the absence of something like the Verfassungsbeschwerde or the possibility for parliamentary minorities to bring a case before the ItCC, the Corte Costituzionale has not had the chance to be involved in this issue. As we will see later in Sect. 3.5 concerning the impact on the welfare state dimension, the ItCC has delivered some decisions in this field.

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Between 1952 and 2013, 1,227 references were sent by Italian judges to the ECJ: 2 from the Corte Costituzionale, 119 from the Court of Cassation, 101 from the State Council and 1,005 from other courts or tribunals.¹⁰⁷ According to the study by Tridimas and Gari 'the intra-judicial conversation which takes place via the preliminary ruling procedure pertains in its overwhelming majority to the interpretation of Community law and the compatibility of national action with it rather than the constitutionality of Community action'.¹⁰⁸ As we will see, this ¹⁰³ Tridimas and Gari 2010, pp. 171, 172 et seq. and 152.

¹⁰⁴ Pierdominici 2014.

¹⁰⁵ For instance Guarino 2014.

¹⁰⁶ Fasone 2014.

¹⁰⁷ Court of Justice of the European Union 2015, p. 108.

¹⁰⁸ Tridimas and Gari 2010, p. 139.

conclusion seems confirmed in light of our data. According to the annual report of the ECJ of 2013,¹⁰⁹ between 2006 and 2013 there were 365¹¹⁰ preliminary references from Italian courts. Our search in the ECJ online database identified 306 cases. The overwhelming majority of these preliminary references concerned the interpretation of acts of EU law. In many cases the national judges de facto asked the ECJ to decide on the compatibility of a national norm with an EU law norm to be interpreted. There was also one case, Kamberaj,¹¹¹ where the referring judge tried to obtain an argument to question the established case law of the Constitutional Court (concerning the direct effect of the ECHR, see below for further details) from the ECJ. In only 12 cases did the referring judge question the validity of an EU act, which is consistent with the findings of Tridimas and Gari, according to whom: 'The ECJ issued few preliminary rulings on the validity of Community measures with a minimum of six in 2001 and a maximum of 12 in 2004'.¹¹² In a nutshell, the ECJ had to deal with the presumed invalidity of EU acts in the following cases: *Fastweb*¹¹³ (public sector); *Torresi*¹¹⁴ (freedom to provide services); *SFIR*¹¹⁵ (sugar industry); *Manzi*¹¹⁶ (transport and environment); *Nunziatina*¹¹⁷ (State aid); *Azienda Agricola Disarò Antonio and Others*¹¹⁸ (milk products sector); *Gowan Comércio Internacional e Serviços*¹¹⁹ (agriculture); *Bavaria and Bavaria Italia*¹²⁰ (registration of geographical indications); *Nuova Agricast*¹²¹ (State aid); *Carp*¹²² (construction products); *Confcooperative Friuli Venezia Giulia and Others*¹²³ (agriculture) and, finally, *RAI*¹²⁴ (State aid). In not one of these cases did the ECJ declare the invalidity of the EU law measure.

2.8.2 A univocal answer to whether there is a lower standard of judicial review by the EU courts than in Italy probably does not exist. In other words, the situation created by a different standard of protection depends on the specific case. Italian scholars are of course aware of some deficiencies in the EU legal system. It is likely ¹⁰⁹ Court of Justice of the European Union 2015, p. 106.

¹¹⁰ References by year: 34 (2006); 43 (2007); 39 (2008); 29 (2009); 49 (2010); 44 (2011); 65 (2012); 62 (2013).

¹¹¹ Case C-571/10 Kamberaj [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:233.

¹¹² Tridimas and Gari 2010, p. 140.

¹¹³ Case C-19/13 Fastweb [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2194.

¹¹⁴ Case C-58/13 Torresi [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2088.

¹¹⁵ Case C-187/12 SFIR e a. [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:737.

¹¹⁶ Case C-537/11 Manzi e Compagnia Naviera Orchestra [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:19.

¹¹⁷ Case C-138/09 Todaro Nunziatina & C. [2010] ECR I-04561.

¹¹⁸ Case C-34/08 Azienda Agricola Disarò Antonio and Others [2009] ECR I-04023.

¹¹⁹ Case C-77/09 Gowan Comércio Internacional e Serviços [2010] ECR I-13533.

¹²⁰ Case C-343/07 Bavaria and Bavaria Italia [2009] ECR I-05491.

¹²¹ Case C-390/06 Nuova Agricast [2008] ECR I-02577.

¹²² Case C-80/06 Carp [2007] ECR I-04473.

¹²³ Case C-23/07 Confcooperative Friuli Venezia Giulia and Others [2008] ECR I-04277.

¹²⁴ Case C-305/07 RAI [2008] ECR I-00055.

that the future accession of the EU to the ECHR will contribute towards solving these, and some weaknesses related to the original, purely economic nature of the EU integration process will be challenged (for instance the problematic issue of the application of insufficient review when dealing with the Commission's determinations in competition proceedings).¹²⁵ Scholars have also pointed to the important factor of 'incoherence' in the case law of the ECJ due to an oscillating use of proportionality, depending on whether the measure under review was taken by an EU institution or by a Member State. In the first scenario, the ECJ rarely declares the illegality of the measures, and generally acts as a third party arbiter at best. In contrast, with regard to the Member States, the Court adopts a stricter stance, and often derives additional duties from the interests of integration, declaring a violation of the duty of loyal co-operation set by the Treaties.¹²⁶ However, cases like those treated in the Kadi saga¹²⁷ should be taken into account before condemning the EU legal system in toto from this point of view.

2.8.3 The ItCC has a limited jurisdiction, since it may adjudicate cases concerning the constitutional legitimacy of laws and enactments having the force of law issued by the State and Regions. This excludes other administrative or regulatory acts. The only acts of the Government that may be subject to the jurisdiction of the Court are its decree laws and legislative decrees (governed respectively by Arts. 77 and 76 of the Italian Constitution). The former are acts issued in case of necessity and urgency and adopted under its own responsibility by the Government. They are provided with the force of law. The latter are the product of the exercise of the delegation of the legislative function on the basis of some principles and criteria established in an enabling act of the Parliament. Article 77 of the Italian Constitution provides that decree laws lose effect from the beginning if they are not transposed into law by Parliament within sixty days of publication. In 1996 the ItCC declared decree laws that reiterated the contents of other decree laws that had not been converted into law by Parliament to be unconstitutional.¹²⁸ After a long period in which the Constitutional Court seemed to not scrutinise the prerequisite of necessity and urgency of decree laws, the ItCC has more recently begun to declare decree laws unconstitutional for a manifest lack of necessity and urgency.¹²⁹

As for regulations (which are from a formal point of view administrative acts), the consistency between these measures and the law is guaranteed by the administrative judges who are empowered to annul them in these cases. In theory, the ¹²⁵ Bernatt 2014.

¹²⁶ Harbo 2010, p. 172, 'Proportionality in the narrow sense – stricto sensu – is, according to the claim, applied whenever the court finds it suitable in order to promote the desired outcome. Accordingly, the proportionality analysis conducted by the court is not objective in the sense that it is value-neutral. On the contrary, the analysis is informed by a very strong substantial bias, namely that of promoting European integration'. In Italian, see Galetta 2005.

¹²⁷ Avbelj, Fontanelli and Martinico 2014.

¹²⁸ ItCC, Decision No. 360/1996.

¹²⁹ ItCC, Decision No. 171/2007.

notion of ‘violation of law’ in this case also covers cases of violation of the Constitution, but if the regulation in question has been adopted on the basis of a law, the administrative judge will probably prefer to refer a question of constitutionality to the ItCC.

No statistical data on constitutional and judicial review by Italian courts was available at the time of writing (August 2014).

2.8.4 We discussed the issue of the extent to which the Constitutional Court and Supreme Court review measures that implement EU legislation when dealing with questions 1.3.2 and 1.3.3. After Internationale Handelsgesellschaft, the ItCC was the first court to react to the doctrine of absolute primacy by raising the walls of the counter-limits and threatening to exercise an indirect review of EU legislation. As we know, the counter-limits doctrine in Italy was primarily prompted by fundamental rights protection.

2.8.5 We do not think that an unequivocal answer to the question of potential gaps in judicial review exists. It depends on the specific field and on the structure of the balancing in the specific case. Of course, because of the origin of its legal order (law of the common market), the ECJ still sometimes establishes a lower standard, but in other cases the standard employed by the Luxembourg Court might appear higher. This is inherent in the logic of a system in which each level contributes to improving the protection of the multilevel fundamental rights in the other, and is part of the normal dialectic between the levels. On accession of the EU to the ECHR, see Sects. 2.13.1–2.13.2.

2.8.6 In Italy, there is an important judgment of the Constitutional Court that tackles the issue of equal treatment of individuals falling within the scope of EU law and those falling within the scope of the domestic protection of constitutional rights. Notoriously, Law No. 69/2005 implementing the EAW Framework Decision has significantly expanded the grounds of refusal that an Italian Court of Appeal can invoke to deny the execution of a European Arrest Warrant, and it has also rendered mandatory a ground that is deemed to be optional in the EAW Framework Decision. Article 18 of Law No. 65/2009 lists the grounds of refusal and states in letter r) that the surrender of Italian citizens sentenced to custody, or security measures involving deprivation of liberty can be refused but must be subordinated to the execution of the detention order or of the sentence in Italy. The Italian Constitutional Court, with its judgment No. 227 of 2010, found this provision discriminatory in that it did not apply to non-Italian citizens. The limitation provided by Art. 18 was indeed declared incompatible with the equality principle enshrined in Art. 3 of the Italian Constitution, with Arts. 11 and 117 of the Italian Constitution and with the principle of non-discrimination codified in Art. 18 TFEU. Indeed, with regard to the EU principle of non-discrimination, the Court underscored that using the criterion of nationality to determine the applicability of this ground of refusal was disproportionate and, ultimately, contrary to the ratio of Art. 4(6) of the EAW Framework Decision.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 There are no other significant issues that have arisen in Italy with regard to constitutional rights or the rule of law, apart from those arising from the questionnaire.

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 Undoubtedly the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU represents a good starting point for identifying the rights that form part of the common constitutional traditions. However, we must consider that, according to certain literature, general principles (as inspired by common constitutional traditions) have a scope of application or a content which might be broader than that of the Charter. A good example of this inexact correspondence is represented by the principle of good administration as pointed out by Hofmann and Mihaescu.¹³⁰

This imperfect correspondence between common constitutional traditions and the Charter would also explain why the ECJ might still refer to them in the future, even when fundamental rights are codified by the Charter. In other words, reference to general principles would be a way to use general principles as a Trojan horse to enlarge the scope of EU law by circumventing Art. 51 of the Charter. A confirmation of this reading might be found in the approach followed by the ECJ in some cases where it has adopted the general principles as a starting point for its reasoning, and has recalled only subsequently that the given principle is also codified by the Charter. In this way, it might appear to recognise a mere codificatory value of the Charter.¹³¹ The written nature of the Charter will of course open the door to a sort of integrative function for the unwritten common constitutional traditions, especially in the future.

2.10.2 The natural instrument for rendering the common constitutional traditions more relevant would be the preliminary ruling mechanism; this would be particularly true if the constitutional courts that have so far refused to send a preliminary reference to the ECJ were to change their practice. However, Member States might have an important role in this field even if they rely on other procedural instruments, for instance if they try to justify apparent violations of EU law in light of the national identity argument. Although ‘national’¹³² (or, according to another terminology ‘constitutional’,¹³³) identity and common constitutional traditions are two different concepts, the former might serve as a source of inspiration for the latter.

¹³⁰ Hofmann and Mihaescu 2013.

¹³¹ On this debate, see Safjan 2012.

¹³² Guastaferro 2012.

¹³³ Saiz Arnaiz and Alcoberro Llivina 2013.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 There have been no issues in terms of the standard of protection comparable to *Melloni*¹³⁴ in our country (except for EAW issues as set out in previous sections). More problematic is the answer with regard to the ECHR. Our Constitutional Court has sometimes departed from the interpretation given to a particular right of the ECHR by the Strasbourg Court. When doing so, the ItCC has taken into account the case law of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in order to find a solution to the case, but then has decided not to follow the conclusion reached by the ECtHR, and has justified this decision either in light of the particular national context or in light of the different structure and type of balancing. In other words, like other courts have done elsewhere,¹³⁵ the ItCC has distinguished the type of balancing struck by an international court from the balancing by the Constitutional Court. For instance in Maggio,¹³⁶ the ECtHR considered a retroactive legislative act of ‘authentic interpretation’ to be in breach of Art. 6 of the ECHR. In confirming the constitutionality of the same act, the ItCC recalled:

In contrast to the European Court, this Court carries out a systemic and not an isolated assessment of the values affected by the provisions reviewed from time to time, and is therefore required to carry out that balancing operation, which falls to this Court alone.¹³⁷

In Decision No. 223/2014, the Court added that in the field of fundamental rights, the respect of international obligations can never cause a decrease of protection in comparison with the protection guaranteed by domestic law ... on the other hand, Art. 53 of the ECHR expressly states that the interpretation of the provisions of the Convention may not limit or impair human rights and fundamental freedoms which may be ensured under the laws of any High Contracting Party (or under any other agreement to which it is a party): confirming, thus, that the guarantee scheme of the Convention aims to strengthen the protection offered at national level, and never impose limitations, as would claim the a quo judge.¹³⁸

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights

2.12.1 While the adoption of the EU Data Retention Directive did not raise significant political debate, the adoption of the EAW Framework Decision was quite ¹³⁴ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107.

¹³⁵ UKSC, R v. Horncastle and Others [2009] UKSC 14, para. 11.

¹³⁶ Maggio and Others v. Italy, nos. 46286/09, 52851/08, 53727/08, 54486/08 and 56001/08, 31 May 2011.

¹³⁷ ItCC, Decision No. 264/2012.

¹³⁸ ItCC, Decision No. 223/2014.

problematic (see the reconstruction of the political and legal debate surrounding the implementing law No. 65 of 2009 in Sect. 2.3.5.1).

2.12.2–2.12.3 In our view, the accommodation of important constitutional issues should occur at the political level both in an ex ante phase (trying to strengthen the influence of national parliaments upon their respective Governments voting in the Council) and in an ex post phase (namely during the parliamentary debates on the adoption of domestic laws transposing EU directives). While we would not recommend suspension of the application of EU law or a review of EU measures where important constitutional issues have been identified by a number of constitutional courts, we think that within the framework of an infringement proceeding constitutional arguments should be put forward in a Member State's defence and should be taken seriously both by the European Commission and by the European Court of Justice.¹³⁹

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1–2.13.2 We do not have a clear answer as to concerns about an overall reduction in the standard of protection of constitutional rights and the rule of law in the context of EU law, and this depends on the oscillating case law of the ECJ and on the different reactions of the national constitutional courts. The ECJ has alternated between very 'sensitive' (those for instance based on Art. 4(2) TEU)¹⁴⁰ and 'muscular' decisions (the majority now, we would say). With regard to the second group, the Melloni decision has been seen as a return to an 'absolute conception of primacy'.¹⁴¹ This decision is in line with other recent rulings of the ECJ in which the Luxembourg Court has not shown great deference towards the national constitutional courts. We are referring for instance to the *Filipiak*¹⁴² and *Winner Wetten*¹⁴³ cases. This does not seem to be coherent with another recent trend which sees constitutional courts more and more open to Art. 267 TFEU and with another series of decisions which can be traced back to a sort of margin of appreciation doctrine of the ECJ.¹⁴⁴ However, if Melloni represents the bad side of the coin, more recently

¹³⁹ A call for a possible ordinary use of the identity clause, recommending the use of Art. 4(2) TEU (requiring the EU to respect national identities) both in Member States' defences in the context of infringement proceedings and in national Parliaments' reasoned opinions in the framework of the early warning system, can already be found in Guastaferro 2012 and 2014.

¹⁴⁰ See Guastaferro 2012 for relevant case law.

¹⁴¹ As recently suggested by Von Bogdandy and Schill 2011.

¹⁴² Case C-314/08 Filipiak [2009] ECR I-11049.

¹⁴³ Case C-409/06 Winner Wetten [2010] ECR I-08015.

¹⁴⁴ Sabel and Gerstenberg 2010.

the ECJ has decided cases like Google,¹⁴⁵ *Kadi II*¹⁴⁶ and Digital Rights Ireland,¹⁴⁷ whereby it acted as a constitutional court that was very keen to protect fundamental rights. This combination of factors impedes us from giving a precise answer to the question, but we do think that only a more co-operative relationship between the ECJ and the national constitutional courts could improve the burning issue of the multilevel protection of fundamental rights. Perhaps the accession of the EU to the ECHR (but this is more difficult now after the delivery of Opinion 2/13¹⁴⁸ of the ECJ) will improve the situation at EU level, although it is difficult to foresee the effective impact that such accession will have, not only in terms of the relationship between the Strasbourg and Luxemburg Courts, but also in terms of the ‘usability’ of the ECHR by national judges where the direct effect of the provisions of the Convention is recognised. In this sense, Kamberaj seems to confirm our doubts.¹⁴⁹

2.13.3–2.13.4 An example which is partially related to bringing national constitutional concerns to the ECJ is the Berlusconi case.¹⁵⁰ A recent comment on this case concerns the use of comparative arguments by the ECJ. Comparative law and a general openness towards the arguments coming from the national courts could improve the situation of fundamental rights in this field, although in Berlusconi the ECJ did not make any explicit reference to the national legal materials which were taken into account.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 There are two fundamental provisions in the Italian Constitution regarding the relationship between international and domestic law. Article 10 provides that ‘[t]he Italian legal system conforms to the generally recognised principles of international law’. Article 11 provides that Italy rejects war as an instrument of aggression against the freedom of other peoples and as a means for the settlement of international disputes. Italy agrees, on conditions of equality with other States, to the limitations of sovereignty that may be necessary to a world order ensuring peace and justice among the Nations. Italy promotes and encourages international organisations furthering such ends.

¹⁴⁵ Case C-131/12 Google Spain and Google [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:317.

¹⁴⁶ Joined cases C-584/10 P, C-593/10 P and C-595/10 P Commission and Others v. Kadi [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:518.

¹⁴⁷ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

¹⁴⁸ Opinion 2/13 pursuant to Article 218(11) TFEU [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2454.

¹⁴⁹ Case C-571/10 Kamberaj, n. 111. See Bianco and Martinico 2014.

¹⁵⁰ Case C-387/02 Berlusconi [2005] ECR I-03565.

These two articles provide the first important distinction existing in this field in Italy, the distinction between the general rules of international law and international treaties. As for the former, Art. 10 provides for an automatic procedure of adoption, in the sense that such norms are directly incorporated into the Italian system. In this field considerations similar to those made with regard to EU law are applicable. While Art. 11 does not contain any specific reference to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or the United Nations (although the members of the Constituent Assembly wrote Art. 11 with the possibility of joining the UN in mind), we could say that it includes some guidelines to be followed in case of limitations of sovereignty. Nevertheless, Art. 11 has been used to cover all of the relevant international memberships of the Italian Republic. Since this approach has worked so far, we do not think that it is necessary to introduce specific references to any specific international organisations in Art. 11. The intervention of the national legislature is not required for all treaties, since Art. 80 provides for the necessity of legislation enabling the ratification only with reference to some particular treaties.¹⁵¹ The procedure for ratification is also governed by Art. 87, which empowers the President of the Republic to ratify international treaties.¹⁵² When the intervention of Parliament is required, it intervenes with a normal legislative statute. According to the majority of scholars, this confers a primary force in the national hierarchy of law to norms derived from international treaties.

3.1.2 Apart from the reforms already addressed when dealing with EU law (Art. 117 of the Constitution), there have been no other constitutional reforms concerning the ‘external dimension’ of the Constitution.

3.1.3 Reforms relating to international law and global governance have not been at the heart of the constitutional reform agenda. This could be partly explained by the elasticity of Art. 11 and by the fact that these issues have been covered by primary norms (this is the case e.g. as regards international development co-operation policies).

3.1.4 So far, Art. 11 has proven to be broad enough to guarantee the participation of the Italian Republic in the international context. Moreover, all of the recent attempts at amending the Italian Constitution have renounced dealing with the first part of the text. There has been a kind of silent agreement about the necessity to avoid reforms concerning the very first part of the Constitution (which codifies, so

¹⁵¹ Article 80 of the Constitution: ‘Parliament shall authorise by law the ratification of such international treaties as have a political nature, require arbitration or a legal settlement, entail change of borders, spending or new legislation.’

¹⁵² Article 87 of the Constitution:

‘The President shall: ...

- ratify international treaties which have, where required, been authorised by Parliament.

Article 72 Italian Constitution, provides that: ‘The ordinary procedure for consideration and direct approval by the House is always followed in the case of ... ratification of international treaties ...’

to say, the axiological part of the Constitution). As written in Sect. 3.1.3, we do not think it is necessary to amend Art. 11.

The Italian Constitution is based on an evident parallelism between the values inspiring the domestic activity of the Italian Republic and those inspiring the external dimension. This is because of the axiological (desired) continuity that exists between the domestic and international levels, and because of the efforts made to construct a better society, even at the international level. This double orientation (internal and external) of the constitutional project was crystal clear to the members of the Italian Constituent Assembly. There are, for instance, at least three reasons for the codification of the pacifist principle in the Italian Constitution. The first is connected to political realism: Italy could not be considered a military power, so the constitutionalisation of an imperialistic foreign policy was not an option.¹⁵³ The second reason was, in a manner of speaking, ethical, and finds expression in the words used, among others, by Don Luigi Sturzo, who defined war as ‘immoral, illegitimate and prohibited’.¹⁵⁴ But the main reason was the intent ‘to transfer, to the international level, those principles of freedom, equality and substantive respect for the human person’ that were to be affirmed and implemented in the domestic order.¹⁵⁵

In light of the above point on parallelism of values, one new challenge for constitutional lawyers, which has been explored in greater detail elsewhere,¹⁵⁶ may be how to continue the existence of an axiological continuity between the principles and values that govern the life of a given polity within its boundaries and those that should characterise the international community, while retaining constitutional values in efforts to construct a better society, even at the international level. In Italian scholarship, a number of scholars also speak about the ‘weak’ or ‘post-modern’ constitutionalism typical of the era of globalisation as something dispersed and disconnected from popular initiative rather than being entirely lost.¹⁵⁷

While no immediate solutions are available, elsewhere¹⁵⁸ we have also noted that the idea of constitutionalism propounded by leading pluralists such as Krisch¹⁵⁹ does not readily correspond to what constitutional lawyers mean by the same word. In international law, ‘constitutionalism may be conceived as an autonomous concept of international law rather than a concept derived by analogy from the domestic conception of constitutionalism’.¹⁶⁰ The problem is that some scholars in this field have too heavily emphasised only the connection between ¹⁵³ See Nenni 1946, p. 104.

¹⁵⁴ Sturzo 1954, p. 144.

¹⁵⁵ Cassese 1980, p. 519.

¹⁵⁶ Martinico 2014.

¹⁵⁷ Carrozza 2007, p. 172.

¹⁵⁸ Martinico 2014.

¹⁵⁹ Krisch 2010.

¹⁶⁰ Deplano 2013, p. 68.

hierarchy and constitutionalism. This may be explained by taking into account the origin of the debate at the international level, where constitutionalism has been seen as an antidote to the issue of international fragmentation.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 Italy is usually seen as a country characterised by a strong dualist tradition, according to which the international and national legal systems are conceived of as autonomous.

As for international treaties, it is necessary for there to be a national act transforming the international act into national law. Another important feature of the Italian legal order is the fact that, unlike in other countries like Portugal and Spain, no specific status is accorded to treaties devoted to human rights. However, as we will show below, dualism has partly been eroded by the importance acquired by some human rights treaties (above all the European Convention on Human Rights) in the national case law of the ItCC. If one looks at the Italian Constitution, one can perceive a sort of tension between the constitutional openness of the Italian Constitution (see above) and the choice in favour of the dualist paradigm. However, the ItCC has only recently relied on external sources (primarily the ECHR and EU law) to review the constitutionality of domestic norms. In terms of protection of fundamental rights, the ECHR has been by far the international agreement with the most evident impact on our national system, which has also created tensions and disagreements between the Corte Costituzionale and the ECtHR. If this openness (understood as friendliness towards the international community) gives us the idea of the axiological continuity between the domestic and the external dimension, the choice made in favour of dualism seems to emphasise, on the contrary, the discontinuity and impermeability between the internal and the external spheres. Further developments (especially concerning the application of EU law and of the ECHR) have radically questioned the validity of the traditional dualist category. With regard to EU law, the position of the ItCC is emblematic of a broader trend. With regard to the ECHR, it is necessary to briefly recall its case law to appreciate the departure from the original dualism. As regards the ECHR, the original position of the Consulta reflected a dualist conception of the relationship between the ECHR and domestic law. Since the entry of the ECHR into the Italian legal order was enacted by an ordinary law (Law No. 848/1955), for a long time and with some exceptions,¹⁶¹ the ItCC considered the ECHR as a source with primary force and the consequent application of the lex posterior derogat legi priori rule in case of conflict between the law regarding the ECHR and another Italian norm. This was the case until the 1990s when the Corte Costituzionale started to change its approach and began to make a distinction between the content and the form of the laws giving effect to international treaties.¹⁶² In other words, since from a material point of view the content of the ECHR aims at protecting rights codified in the Italian Constitution, it seemed necessary to readjust the previous case law. Another turning point was the reform of 2001 to adopt a new version of Art. 117(1) of the Constitution. Indeed, also on the basis of this new provision, as the literature has already stressed,¹⁶³ the Italian ‘common’ judges started to disapply domestic norms that conflicted with the ECHR.¹⁶⁴ Thus, they extended a mechanism accepted as a consequence of the Simmenthal judgment,¹⁶⁵ and aimed at solving the conflicts occurring between national norms and EU law provisions provided with direct effect. This practice induced the ItCC to give two key judgments in 2007.¹⁶⁶

¹⁶¹ See, for instance, ItCC, Decision No. 10/1993, where the Consulta described the ECHR as an ‘atypical source of law’.

Without going into details,¹⁶⁷ the main content of these two decisions can be summarised as follows:

- (a) The ECHR has a supra-legislative value (i.e. its normative ranking is halfway between statutes and constitutional norms);
- (b) In some cases, the ECHR can serve as an ‘interposed parameter’ for reviewing the constitutionality of primary laws, since the conflict between them and the ECHR can result in an indirect violation of the Constitution (Art. 117);
- (c) This (b) does not imply that the ECHR has a constitutional value; on the contrary, the ECHR itself has to respect the Constitution;
- (d) The ECHR cannot be treated domestically in the same way as EU law, as we will see below;
- (e) The constitutional preferential treatment accorded to the ECHR implies the necessity to interpret national law in light of ECHR provisions.

More recently, the ItCC has confirmed the preferential treatment to be acknowledged to the case law of the ECtHR.¹⁶⁸ Another indicator of the importance of the case law of the ECtHR in the national legal system is the recent Decision No. 113/2011 of the Constitutional Court.¹⁶⁹ In this judgment the Consulta declared Art. 630 c. 1 (a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure to be unconstitutional to the extent that it did not allow the re-opening or review of a case decided for good (and thus with a ruling covered by res iudicata), which was subsequently found to be in breach of the Convention.

¹⁶² ItCC, Decision No. 388/1999.

¹⁶³ Biondi Dal Monte and Fontanelli 2008.

¹⁶⁴ See Ibid., p. 891.

¹⁶⁵ Case 106/77 Simmenthal [1978] ECR 00629.

¹⁶⁶ ItCC, Decisions No. 348 and No. 349/2007.

¹⁶⁷ For a detailed analysis of these decisions, see Biondi Dal Monte and Fontanelli 2008, and Pollicino 2008.

¹⁶⁸ See ItCC Decisions No. 311/2009, No. 317/2009 and No. 80/2011 amongst others. However, disagreement has not been missing. See for instance ItCC, Decision No. 49/2015.

¹⁶⁹ ItCC, Decision No. 113/2011.

Nevertheless, although EU law and the ECHR have partly questioned the assumptions of the dualist approach, dualism is still formally the premise of the reasoning of the ItCC in many cases. Even the counter-limits doctrine is based on a dualist fiction. In other words, the fact that, in the case of violation of the counter-limits, the ItCC would exercise its jurisdiction over the national acts giving effect to the EU treaties in our legal order, is an evident legacy of the dualist approach.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 Apart from what has been written in the section addressing EU law, as recalled above, the intervention of the national legislature is not required for all treaties, since Art. 80 provides for the necessity of legislation enabling ratification only with reference to particular treaties. As we saw above, the procedure for ratification is also governed by Art. 87, which empowers the President of the Republic to ratify international treaties. With regard to international organisations that differ from the EU, the monitoring functions performed by the national chambers have been included in their rules of procedure according to the cascade system of norms recalled above. An example is given by the provisions concerning the examination and possibly the adoption of resolutions on resolutions and recommendations adopted by international assemblies in which the national delegations of the Chamber of Deputies (Art. 125 r .C) or the Senate (Art. 143 r. S.) participate (for instance the NATO, Council of Europe and OSCE assemblies). Another important provision concerns the examination of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights and of their national follow-up. In 2004, the Chamber set up a Permanent Observatory of judgments of the ECtHR. There is also a duty of the Government to transmit the annual report on the execution of the decisions of the ECtHR against Italy to both Houses.¹⁷⁰

3.3.2 Article 75 of the Constitution prohibits referendums on laws ‘authorizing the ratification of international treaties’. Apart from what we have already recalled with regard to EU law, the only way to have a referendum on a treaty would be to cover the authorisation of the ratification with a constitutional statute which would permit a referendum according to Art. 138. We already recalled what the ItCC said in Frontini, but one could argue that the opinion expressed in that judgment should be limited to EU law due to its particular nature and impact on Italian constitutional law.

¹⁷⁰ For more info: <http://leg16.camera.it/494?categoria=084>;
<http://www.senato.it/static/bgt/listadocumenti/17/1/1323/0/index.html?static=true>.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1. According to Italian scholars, the general rules of international law (which correspond to customary international law) belong to the constitutional level.¹⁷¹ According to some scholars, the international customary law that existed before the entry into force of the Italian Constitution could prevail over the constitutional provisions (because of the application of the chronological criterion), but this does not apply with regard to the principles belonging to the untouchable core recalled in Art. 139 of the Constitution,¹⁷² as the ItCC has seemed to confirm in its recent case law.¹⁷³

Apart from what we have already written about EU law, another interesting case is the ECHR in light of the decisions of 2007 that have already been mentioned. In those decisions, the ItCC specified that the ECHR is considered to be a particular form of public international law. From this, the Court inferred that the ‘constitutional tolerance’ shown by the Italian legal order towards the ECHR is weaker than that shown towards EU law. While ‘counter-limits’ represent, in the ItCC’s case law, a selected version of the domestic constitutional principles (this implies the possibility to decide constitutional conflicts in favour of EU law provisions in some cases), in the case of the ECHR, the Italian Court seems to be less generous. It apparently asks the ECHR to respect the entire Constitution as such:

The need for a constitutionality test on the Convention norm excludes the possibility of having a limited set of fundamental rights that could serve as a counter-limit; indeed, every norm of the Constitution shall be respected by the international norm challenged.¹⁷⁴

In Judgment No. 230 of 2012, the ItCC emphasised the specific features of the domestic legal order vis-à-vis those characterising the system of the Convention,¹⁷⁵ and thus pointed to the possibility of episodic divergences.

According to the ItCC, an important distinction still exists between EU law and the ECHR, and this difference provided the basis of its reasoning:

This is because, according to the constitutional judges, the ECHR legal system has distinct structural and functional legal features as compared to the European legal order. According to the Italian Constitutional Court, the ECHR is a multilateral international public law Treaty which does not entail and cannot entail any limitation on sovereignty in the terms provided by Article 11 of the Constitution.¹⁷⁶

¹⁷¹ De Vergottini 2004, p. 32.

¹⁷² For an overview of the debate, see Cassese 1975, p. 502. According to Quadri, the automatic procedure shall be applied to the international treaties but this remains a minority view. This theory was based on the fact that one of the general rules of international law is the principle pacta sunt servanda. Quadri 1989, p. 64.

¹⁷³ ItCC, Decision No. 238/2014.

¹⁷⁴ Biondi Dal Monte and Fontanelli 2008, p. 915.

¹⁷⁵ Ruggeri 2012.

¹⁷⁶ Pollicino 2008, pp. 374–375.

This explains the different treatment reserved for the ECHR both in terms of disapplication and in terms of the necessity to be consistent with the whole Constitution rather than with the counter-limits alone.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 Italy has never been in the position to declare a bailout and no issue has arisen with regard to IMF or World Bank conditionality. So far the most important factors to impact the constitutional welfare dimension have been the EU anti-crisis measures.

With regard to the anti-crisis measures taken at EU level, in Italy, constitutional lawyers¹⁷⁷ have been more interested in the impact of the anti-crisis measures on the sustainability of the welfare system, on the protection of social rights and on the effect of such measures on the relationship between the centre and the periphery.

In order to understand the case law of the ItCC, it is necessary to make a premise. As Fasone has explained, [t]he Italian Constitutional Court has not had the opportunity to judge directly on the constitutionality of EU and international Euro-crisis law. Nor was the constitutional review of the international Euro-crisis law measures really feasible.¹⁷⁸ ... The only way these agreements can become relevant within the Italian system of constitutional adjudication would be if the Constitutional Court is willing to recognize them the rank of interposed norm between ordinary legislation and the Constitution – Art. 117.1 Const.¹⁷⁹

It must also be recalled that the constitutional balanced budget rule was not in full effect until 1 January 2014, and thus could not form a standard for constitutional review of legislation.¹⁸⁰

The only relevant interventions of the ItCC in this field have regarded (primarily at least) the development of the Italian regional state. The Italian government introduced several cuts, and some of these measures have also impacted on the regional structures.

This discipline has been questioned before the ItCC, which, in Decision No. 151/2012¹⁸¹ rejected the very centralising interpretation that the state had given of the measures in Decree Law No. 78/2010. These are just a few examples that show the risk of centralisation in the Italian system induced by the EU anti-crisis measures.¹⁸² As Pierdominici has noted, '[i]f one can be tempted to read this last case as the symbol of a strong judicial opposition of the Constitutional Court against ¹⁷⁷ Gambino and Nocito 2012.

¹⁷⁸ See however ItCC, Decision No. 88/2013.

¹⁷⁹ Fasone 2014.

¹⁸⁰ Ibid.

¹⁸¹ ItCC, Decision No. 151/2012.

¹⁸² See also Falcon 2012, p. 11.

national legislative reforms prompted by the financial crisis, a comprehensive reading tells us, in fact, the opposite'.¹⁸³

There are some interesting decisions concerning the protection of social rights. In Decision No. 248/2011 the ItCC deemed the right of medical assistance to be financially conditional, since its protection depends on the available resources. Another important decision is Decision No. 10/2010 concerning the so-called 'social card', a bonus accorded to guarantee the primary needs of the most disadvantaged members of the population. The ItCC upheld the constitutionality of the decree law and recognised that the intervention of the state was necessary to protect the value of human dignity in a uniform manner in light of Arts. 3, 38 and 117(2) of the Constitution, due to the extraordinary, exceptional and urgent situation following the international economic and financial crisis that in 2008 and 2009 also hit our country. In other words, as Fasone has pointed out, '[i]n a time of scarce resources even social rights must be preferably protected at State level [so] as to set [a] common standard and to decide at the centre how to use those resources'.¹⁸⁴

In Decision No. 80/2010, the Constitutional Court declared unconstitutional a provision of the State Financial Act of 2008 impeding public schools from contracting teachers for physically impaired students due to budgetary reasons. In another decision (No. 264/2012) about the calculation of pensions of cross-border workers, the ItCC acknowledged the possibility to limit social rights. According to the Court,

[t]he effects of the said provision are felt within the context of a pension system which seeks to strike a balance between the available resources and benefits paid, in accordance also with the requirement laid down by Art. 81(4) of the Constitution' (old version), 'and the need to ensure that the overall system is rational', thus preventing changes to financial payments to the detriment of some contributors and to the benefit of others. In doing so it guarantees respect for the principles of equality and solidarity which, due to their foundational status, occupy a privileged position within the balancing operation against other constitutional values.¹⁸⁵

Another important decision regards the so-called 'golden pensions'. In this case, the Court dealt with some decree laws aimed at collecting resources from the pensions or the incomes of the most advantaged segments of the population. The Court declared unconstitutional Decree Law No. 78/2010 concerning blockage of the salary adjustment mechanism for magistrates. On that occasion, the 'Court considered the reduction of the allowance as a form of taxation and declared them in contrast with the Constitution for the violation of the principle of equality (Art. 3) and of Art. 53, about the progressive nature of the tax system'.¹⁸⁶

¹⁸³ Pierdominici 2014.

¹⁸⁴ Fasone 2014.

¹⁸⁵ ItCC, Decision No. 264/2012, para. 5.3.

¹⁸⁶ ItCC, Decision No. 223/2012, and reported by Fasone 2014.

In Decision No. 310/2013, which departed from its previous decision,¹⁸⁷ the ItCC dealt with Decree Law No. 78/2010, in a case concerning blockage of the salary adjustment mechanism for non-contracted workers in the public sector. The Court concluded that this blockage was a reasonable sacrifice, necessary in a phase of economic crisis. Fasone has found it interesting that the challenge of unconstitutionality was rejected by using ad adiuvandum (although not as the main ground for the decision), the new Art. 81 of the Constitution as amended in 2012 and Council Directive 2011/85/EU on requirements for budgetary frameworks of the Member States.¹⁸⁸

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 Italian scholars have questioned the compatibility between some anti-terrorist provisions and our standards of protection of fundamental rights, especially when looking at issues connected with the principle of fair trial. For instance, as Porchia and Puoti have pointed out:

Italian scholars consider the issue of the legal proof of the terrorist purposes of an association, as a fundamental challenge for the interpreter in the struggle against terrorism, while ensuring the protection of fundamental rights of the defendants. The proof that a certain activity is pursued for terrorist purposes and not for other reasons (like belligerent actions, violent actions for criminal purposes etc.) is very difficult to achieve in a way that can be used as an admissible evidence in court.¹⁸⁹

An interesting case concerning the burning issue of extraordinary renditions is the famous Abu Omar case which also led the ItCC to give an important decision¹⁹⁰ on state secrets, in which it acknowledged that the Italian ‘Prime Minister’ has a broad discretionary power to invoke the state secrets privilege in cases where Governmental agents are involved in extraordinary renditions. The ItCC also stated in that case ‘that any review of the substantive merits of that classification [of the relevant information] was a matter for Parliament and not the courts’.¹⁹¹ The referring court thus ordered the release of five members of the Italian Military Intelligence Agency involved in the kidnapping of Mr. Abu Omar. The ItCC came back to the issue of state secrets in 2014, and confirmed the essence of the decision given in 2009.¹⁹² These decisions are part of a judicial trend which has been ¹⁸⁷ Fasone 2014.

¹⁸⁸ Fasone 2014.

¹⁸⁹ Porchia and Puoti 2013, p. 427.

¹⁹⁰ ItCC, Decision No. 106/2009.

¹⁹¹ From the website of the ItCC: http://www.cortecostituzionale.it/documenti/download/doc/recent_judgments/S2009106_Amirante_Quaranta_en.pdf.

¹⁹² ItCC, Decision No. 24/2014.

described as ‘dangerous’,¹⁹³ since it ‘keeps the balance between security and protection of constitutional fundamental rights, leaning in favour of the needs of the former, invoking the State secret in order to hide criminal conducts of Governmental agents’.¹⁹⁴

References

- Avbelj M., Fontanelli F., Martinico G. (eds.) (2014) Kadi on Trial: A multifaceted analysis of the Kadi judgment. Routledge, Abingdon.
- Barazzetta A. (2004) I principi di specialità e doppia incriminazione: loro rivisitazione nel mandato d’arresto europeo (The principles of specialty and dual criminality: their readjustment in the framework of the European arrest warrant). In Pedrazzi M. (ed.) Mandato d’arresto europeo e garanzie della persona (The European Arrest Warrant and guarantees for the individual). Giuffrè, Milan, pp. 91 et seq.
- Barletta A. (2006) La decisione quadro sul mandato d’arresto europeo: il dibattito, l’impatto e le prospettive dell’adeguamento (The Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant: the debate, the impact and perspectives of implementation). Rivista AIC (Journal of the Italian Association of Constitutional Lawyers). <http://archivio.rivistaaic.it/materiali/convegni/sirmione021003/barletta.html>.
- Barletta A. (2011) La legalità penale tra diritto dell’Unione europea e Costituzione (The legality principle between European Union criminal law and Italian constitutional law). Jovene, Naples.
- Barletta A., Pisani M.M., Testore M. (2013) Sostegno all’effettività dei diritti della difesa per rafforzare la legittimità del processo penale in Europa (Support the effectiveness of the rights of defence to strengthen the legitimacy of the criminal process in Europe). UCPI contribution to the Conference ‘Assises de la Justice: Shaping Justice Policies in Europe for the Years to Come’ organised by the European Commission, Brussels, 21–22 November 2011. http://ec.europa.eu/justice/events/assises-justice-2013/index_en.htm.
- Bartone N. (2003) Mandato di arresto europeo e tipicità nazionale del reato. Analisi strutturale comparata dei reati di frode/truffa nelle sovvenzioni, criminalità informatica, furto, racket/estorsione, riciclaggio, corruzione, associazione per delinquere in Italia, Francia, Germania, Spagna (The European arrest warrant and the typicity of national crime. A comparative structural analysis of the crimes of fraud in subsidies, computer crime, theft, racketeering, money laundering, corruption and criminal association in Italy, France, Germany and Spain). Giuffrè, Milan.
- Bennatt M. (2014) The Compatibility of Deferential Standard of Judicial Review in the EU Competition Proceedings with Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Paper presented at the 9th ASCOLA Conference on Procedural Fairness in Competition Proceedings, University of Warsaw, Warsaw, 26–28 June 2014. Draft paper cited with the author’s permission. http://www.ascola-conference-2014.wz.uw.edu.pl/conference_papers/Maciej_Bennatt_EU_Courts.pdf.
- Bianco G., Martinico G. (2014) Dialogue or Disobedience? On the domestic effects of the ECHR in light of the Kamberaj decision. EPL 20:435–450.
- Bin R. (2004) Lo stato di diritto (The rule of law). Il Mulino, Bologna.
- Biondi Dal Monte F., Fontanelli F. (2008) The Decisions No. 348 and 349/2007 of the Italian Constitutional Court: The Efficacy of the European Convention in the Italian Legal System. German Law Journal 9:889–932.

¹⁹³ Porchia and Puoti 2013, p. 427.

¹⁹⁴ Ibid.

- Bruno F. (1980) I giuristi alla Costituente: l'opera di Costantino Mortati (Lawyers at the Constituent Assembly: the work of Costantino Mortati). In: De Siervo U. (ed.) Scelte della Costituente e cultura giuridica. II: Protagonisti e momenti del dibattito costituzionale (Choices of the Constituent Assembly and legal culture. II: Protagonists and moments of the constitutional debate). Il Mulino, Bologna, pp. 59–178.
- Caianiello V., Vassalli G. (2002) Parere sulla proposta di decisione-quadro sul mandato d'arresto europeo (Opinion on the proposal for a Framework Decision on the European arrest warrant). Cassazione Penale, pp. 462 et seq.
- Calamandrei P. (1965) La Costituzione e le leggi per attuarla (The Constitution and its implementing laws). In: Calamandrei P. (ed.) Opere giuridiche, III (Legal works III). Morano, Naples, pp. 553 et seq.
- Calamandrei P. (1966) Cenni introduttivi sulla Costituente e i suoi lavori (Introductory remarks on the Constituent Assembly and its work). In: Calamandrei P. (ed.) Scritti e discorsi politici (Writings and political speeches), vol. II. La Nuova Italia, Florence, pp. 421 et seq.
- Calvano R. (2007) Legalità costituzionale e mandato d'arresto europeo (Constitutional legality and the European arrest warrant). Jovene, Naples.
- Carrozza P. (2007) Constitutionalism's Post-modern Opening. In: Loughlin M., Walker N. (eds.) The Paradox of Constitutionalism: Constituent Power and Constitutional Form. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 169–188.
- Cartabia M. (1995) Princìpi inviolabili e integrazione europea (Inviolable principles and European integration). Giuffrè, Milan.
- Cartabia M. (2004) La ratifica del trattato costituzionale europeo e la volontà costituente degli Stati membri (The Ratification of the Constitutional Treaty and the constituent will of the Member States). Forum di Quaderni Costituzionali. <http://www.forumcostituzionale.it/>.
- Cartabia M., Celotto A. (2002) La giustizia costituzionale in Italia dopo la Carta di Nizza (Constitutional justice in Italy after the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU). Giurisprudenza Costituzionale 47(6):4477–4507.
- Cartabia M., Weiler J.H.H. (2000) L'Italia in Europa (Italy within the European Union). Il Mulino, Bologna.
- Caruso B. (2009) Diritti sociali e libertà economiche sono compatibili nello spazio europeo? (Are social rights and economic freedoms compatible in the European space?). In Andreoni A., Veneziani B. (eds.) Libertà economiche e diritti sociali nell'Unione Europea dopo le sentenze Laval, Viking, Rüffert e Lussemburgo (Economic freedoms and social rights in the EU after Laval, Viking, Rüffert and Luxembourg). Eddiesse, Rome, pp. 101–120.
- Casetti L. (2005) Profili costituzionali (Constitutional aspects). Diritto penale e processo 7:812 et seq.
- Cassese A. (1975) Commento art.10 della Costituzione (Art. 10 of the Constitution. A commentary). In: Branca G. (ed.) Commentario della Costituzione, Vol. I. Principi fondamentali, Artt.1–12 (Commentary of the Constitution. Vol. I. Fundamental principles, Arts. 1–12). Zanichelli, Bologna, pp. 485 et seq.
- Cassese A. (1980) Politica estera e relazioni internazionali nel disegno emerso alla Assemblea Costituente (Foreign Policy and international relations in the mind of the Constituent Assembly). In: De Siervo U. (ed.) Scelte della Costituente e cultura giuridica. II: Protagonisti e momenti del dibattito costituzionale (Choices of the Constituent Assembly. Protagonists and moments of the constitutional debate). Il Mulino, Bologna, pp. 505–549.
- Cavallini F. (2007) Mandato d'arresto europeo: le sezioni unite cambiano orientamento sui limiti della carcerazione preventiva (European Arrest Warrant. The Supreme Court of Cassation changes the orientation on the maximum period of preventive detention). Diritto penale. <http://www.diritto.it/docs/23651-mandato-d-arresto-europeo-le-sezioni-unite-cambiano-l-orientamento-sui-limiti-massimi-della-carcerazione-preventiva>.
- Chiappa R. (2007) Nuove prospettive per il controllo di compatibilità comunitaria da parte della Corte costituzionale (New Perspectives for the control of compatibility with EU law in the case law of the Constitutional Court). Il Diritto dell'Unione Europea 3:175– 204.
- Court of Justice of the European Union (2015) Annual Report 2014, Luxembourg 2015. http://curia.europa.eu/jcms/upload/docs/application/pdf/2015-03/en_ra14.pdf.

- Dani M. (2011) Assembling the fractured European consumer. In: LSE 'Europe in Question' Discussion Paper Series, LEQS Paper No. 29/2011. <http://www.lse.ac.uk/europeanInstitute/LEQS/LEQSPaper29.pdf>.
- Del Tufo M.V. (2005) La doppia punibilità (Dual criminality). In: Pansini G., Scalfati A. (eds.) Il mandato d'arresto europeo (The European Arrest Warrant). Jovene, Naples, pp. 111 et seq.
- Delledonne G. (2009) La Resistenza in Assemblea costituente e nel testo costituzionale italiano del 1948 (Resistance in the Constituent Assembly and in the text of the 1948 Italian Constitution), Historia Constitucional 10:217–241.
- De Marco E. (1996) Valore attuale del principio della divisione dei poteri (Current meaning of the division of powers). Riv. amm. della Rep. it. 147:1247–1269.
- Deplano R. (2013) Fragmentation and Constitutionalisation of International Law: A Theoretical Inquiry. European Journal of Legal Studies 6:67–89.
- De Vergottini G. (2004) Diritto costituzionale (Constitutional law). Cedam, Padua.
- Di Martino A. (2006) La frontiera e il diritto penale. Natura e contesto delle norme di 'diritto penale transnazionale' (The border and criminal law: the nature and context of 'transnational criminal law'). Giappichelli, Turin.
- Falcon G. (2012) Editoriale: La crisi e l'ordinamento costituzionale (Editorial: Crisis and Constitutional Order), Le Regioni XL 1–2:9–20.
- Fasone C. (2010) Quale è la fonte più idonea a recepire le novità del Trattato di Lisbona sui parlamenti nazionali? (How to implement the novelties of the Lisbon Treaty concerning national parliaments?) Osservatorio sulle Fonti. <http://www.osservatorirosullefonti.it>.
- Fasone C. (2014) The reaction of Constitutional Courts towards the Euro-crisis law. The protection of social rights in Italy, Portugal and Spain. Paper presented at the IACL Conference, Oslo, 12 June 2014. <http://www.jus.uio.no/english/research/news-and-events/events/conferences/2014/wccl-cmdc/wccl/papers/ws4/w4-fasone.pdf>.
- Ferrajoli L. (2009) Diritto e ragione. Teoria del garantismo penale (Reason and law. The theory of criminal garantism). Laterza, Rome-Bari.
- Ferreres Comella V. (2005) La Constitución española ante la cláusula de primacía del Derecho de la Unión europea. Un comentario a la Declaración 1/2004 del Tribunal Constitucional 1/2004 (The Spanish Constitution and the primacy clause in EU law). In: Lopez Castillo A., Saiz Arnaiz A., Ferreres Comella V. (eds.), Constitución española y Constitución europea (The Spanish Constitution and the European Constitution). Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales, Madrid, pp. 80–89.
- Ferro G.A. (2014) Riflessioni sul cammino "costituzionale" della Corte di giustizia dell'Unione europea (Reflections on the constitutional path of the Court of Justice of the EU), AmbienteDiritto. <http://www.ambitediritto.it/home/dottrina/riflessioni-sul-cammino-%E2%80%9Ccostituzionale%E2%80%9D-della-corte-di-giustizia-dell%E2%80%99unione-europea>.
- Fichera M. (2011) The Implementation of the European Arrest Warrant in the European Union: law, policy and practice. Intersentia, Cambridge.
- Flore D. (2009) Droit pénal européen. Les enjeux d'une justice pénale européenne. Larcier, Brussels.
- Fusaro C. (2005) The Constitutional Reform: a Summary. The main changes that might be introduced into the Italian system by the constitutional reform voted by the Chamber of deputies: a summary. http://www.carlofusaro.it/in_english/constitutional_reform.html.
- Galetta D. (2005) Il principio di proporzionalità comunitario e il suo effetto di spill over negli ordinamenti nazionali (Proportionality in EU law and its spillover effect on national systems). Nuove Autonomie, pp. 541–555.
- Gambino S. (2014) Livello di protezione dei diritti fondamentali (fra diritto dell'Unione, convenzioni internazionali, Costituzione degli Stati membri) e dialogo fra le Corti. Effetti politici nel costituzionalismo interno ed europeo (Level of protection of fundamental rights (Between EU law, international conventions, constitutions of the Member States) and judicial dialogue. The political effect of domestic and European constitutionalism). Federalismi No. 13. <http://www.federalismi.it>.

- Gambino S., Nocito W. (2012) Crisi dello Stato, governo dell'economia e diritti fondamentali: note costituzionali alla luce della crisi finanziaria in atto (State crisis, economic governance and fundamental rights in the light of the ongoing financial crisis). <http://www.astrid-online>.
- Giubboni S. (2009) Dopo Viking, Laval e Rüffert. In cerca di un nuovo equilibrio fra i diritti sociali e mercato (After Viking, Laval and Rüffert. In search of a new equilibrium between social rights and the market). In Andreoni A., Veneziani B. (eds.) Libertà economiche e diritti sociali nell'Unione Europea dopo le sentenze Laval, Viking, Rüffert e Lussemburgo (Economic freedoms and social rights in the EU after Laval, Viking, Rüffert and Luxembourg). Eddiesse, Rome, pp. 121–132.
- Groppi T. (2012) Editorial: The Impact of the Financial Crisis on the Italian Written Constitution. Italian Journal of Public Law 4:1–14.
- Gualtieri P. (2004) Mandato d'arresto europeo: davvero superato (e superabile) il principio di doppia incriminazione? (European arrest warrant: has it really outdone (and overcome) the principle of double criminality?) Diritto Penale e Processo, pp. 115–121.
- Guarino G. (2014) Cittadini europei e crisi dell'Euro (European citizens and the euro crisis). Editoriale Scientifica, Naples.
- Guastaferro B. (2012) Beyond the Exceptionalism of Constitutional Conflicts: The Ordinary Functions of the Identity Clause. Yearbook of European Law 31:263–318.
- Guastaferro B. (2014) Coupling National Identity with Subsidiarity Concerns in National Parliaments Reasoned Opinions. MJ 2:320–340.
- Harbo T.I. (2010) The Function of the Proportionality Principle in EU Law. ELJ 16:158–185.
- Herlin-Karnell E. (2013) From Mutual Trust to the Full Effectiveness of EU Law: 10 Years of the European Arrest Warrant. E.L.Rev. 38:79–91.
- Hofmann H.C.H., Mihaescu C. (2013) The Relation between the Charter's Fundamental Rights and the Unwritten General Principles of EU Law: Good Administration as the Test Case. EuConst 9:73–101.
- Iuzzolino G. (2002) Mandato d'arresto e garanzie costituzionali (Arrest warrants and constitutional guarantees). Il Giusto Processo 4:173 et seq.
- Klip A. (2012) European criminal law. An integrative approach. Intersentia, Cambridge-Antwerp-Portland.
- Krisch N. (2010) Beyond Constitutionalism. The Pluralist Structure of Postnational Law. Oxford University Press, Oxford.
- Lavenex S. (2007) Mutual recognition and the monopoly of force: limits of the single market analogy. Journal of European Public Policy 14:762–779.
- Luciani M. (1991) Antifascismo e nascita della costituzione (Antifascism and the origin of the Constitution) Politica del diritto 2:183 et seq.
- Manacorda S. (2004) Il mandato di arresto europeo nella prospettiva sostanzialpenalistica: implicazioni teoriche e ricadute politico-criminali (The European arrest warrant in the substantive criminal law perspective: theoretical and political implications). Rivista italiana di diritto e procedura penale, pp. 789–845.
- Manacorda S. (2007) La deroga alla doppia punibilità nel mandato di arresto europeo e il principio di legalità (Note a margine di Corte di Giustizia, Advocaten voor de Wereld, 3 maggio 2007) (The exception to double criminality in the European arrest warrant and the principle of legality (A case note on Court of Justice, Advocaten voor de Wereld, 3 May 2007)). Cassazione Penale, pp. 318–335.
- Martinico G. (2014) Constitutionalism, Resistance and Openness: Comparative Law Reflections on Constitutionalism in Global Governance. STALS (Sant'Anna Legal Studies) Research Paper, 5/2015, <http://www.stals.sssup.it/files/martinicoSTALS.pdf>.
- Mastroianni R., Arena A. (2011) Media Law in Italy. Kluwer Law International, Alphen Aan den Rijn, New York.
- Mirkine-Guetzévitch B. (1931) Les Nouvelles tendances du droit constitutionnel. Giard, Paris.
- Mitsilegas V. (2006) The constitutional implications of mutual recognition in criminal matters in the EU. CML Rev 43:1277–1311.
- Mitsilegas V. (2009) EU Criminal Law. Hart Publishing, Oxford.

- Modugno F. (1966) Poteri (divisione dei) (Powers. Division of). Novissimo Digesto italiano, XIII:472 et seq.
- Mortati C. (1973) Lezioni sulle forme di governo (Lessons on the form of government). Cedam, Padua.
- Mostl M. (2010) Preconditions and limits of mutual recognition. CML Rev 47:405–436.
- Nenni P. (1946) Una battaglia vinta (A battle won). Avanti, Rome.
- Olivetti M. (2004) Foreign influences on the Italian Constitutional System. Paper submitted to the 6th World Congress of the International Association of Constitutional Law, Santiago, Chile, 12–16 January 2004. <http://www.giurisprudenza.unifg.it>.
- Pajno A. (2003) Il rispetto dei vincoli derivanti dall'ordinamento comunitario come limite alla potestà legislativa nel nuovo Titolo V della Costituzione (Compliance with EU law obligations as a limit to the legislative power in Title V of the Constitution). Le Istituzioni del federalismo 5:814 et seq.
- Passaglia P. (2010) Diritto di accesso ad Internet e giustizia costituzionale. Una (preliminare) indagine comparata (Right to internet access and constitutional justice. A (preliminary) comparative study). <http://www.giurcost.org/studi/passaglia.htm>.
- Pastena R. (2014) Internet e privacy: una relazione complicata (A margine della sentenza della Corte di Giustizia del 13 maggio 2014) (The Internet and privacy: A complicated relationship. Comment on the decision of the CJEU dated 13 May 2014)), Rivista AIC (Journal of the Italian Association of Constitutional Lawyers) 2:1–13.
- Paterniti F. (2004) La riforma dell'art. 117, 1° co. della Costituzione e le nuove prospettive dei rapporti tra ordinamento giuridico nazionale e Unione Europea (The reform of Art. 117, p. 1, of the Constitution and new prospects of the horizons in the relationship between national and EU law). Giurisprudenza Costituzionale 3:2101 et seq.
- Peers S. (2014) Reverse discrimination against rape victims: a disappointing ruling of the CJEU. EU Law Analysis. <http://eulawanalysis.blogspot.it/2014/03/compensation-for-crime-victims.html>.
- Picotti L. (2005) Il mandato d'arresto europeo tra principio di legalità e doppia incriminazione (The European arrest warrant between the principle of legality and double criminality). In Bargis M. and Selvaggi E. (eds.) Mandato d'arresto europeo. Dall'estradizione alle procedure di consegna (European Arrest Warrant. From extradition to surrender procedures). Giappichelli, Turin, pp. 46–65.
- Pierdominici L. (2014) Constitutional Change through Euro Crisis Law. Report on Italy. <http://eurocrisislaw.eui.eu/italy/>.
- Pinelli C. (2001) I limiti generali alla potestà legislativa statale e regionale e i rapporti con l'ordinamento comunitario (The general limits of the regional and state legislative power and the relationship with EU law). Il Foro italiano V:194 et seq.
- Pinelli C. (2012) La tutela multilivello dei diritti fondamentali nella prospettiva della giurisprudenza italiana. Una ricostruzione (The multilevel protection of fundamental rights in the Italian case law. An overview). In: AA VV (eds.) Scritti in Onore di Alessandro Pace (Writings in Honour of Alessandro Pace), III. Editoriale Scientifica, Napoli, pp. 2377 et seq.
- Pisa P. (1973) Previsione bilaterale del fatto nell'estradizione (Bilateral provision of the act in extradition policy). Giuffrè, Milan.
- Pizzorusso A. (1981) Organizzazione dei pubblici poteri (Organization of public power). Encyclopedia del diritto XXXI (Encyclopedia of Law XXXI). Giuffrè, Milan, pp. 83 et seq.
- Pollicino O. (2008) The Italian Constitutional Court at the Crossroads between Constitutional Parochialism and Co-operative Constitutionalism. Judgments Nos. 348 and 349 of 22 and 24 October 2007. EuConst 4:363–382.
- Porchia O., Puoti P. (2013) Italy. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 423–460.
- Quadri R. (1989) Diritto internazionale pubblico (Public international law). Priulla, Palermo.
- Quattrocolo S. (2014) Il contumace cede la scena processuale all'assente, mentre l'irreperibile l'abbandona (The contumacious surrenders the procedural stage to the absent). Diritto Penale Contemporaneo 2:97–107.

- Ruggeri A. (2012) Penelope alla Consulta: tesse e sfila la tela dei suoi rapporti con la Corte EDU, con significativi richiami ai tratti identificativi della struttura dell'ordine interno e distintivi rispetto alla struttura dell'ordine convenzionale ('a prima lettura' di Corte cost. n. 230 del 2012) (Penelope at the Italian Constitutional Court: she weaves and pulls the canvas of its relations with the Court of Human Rights, with special attention given to the main features of the domestic legal structure and its peculiarity when compared with the ECHR legal system. A First Reading of decision No. 230 of 2012 of the Italian Constitutional Court). <http://www.dirittocomparati.it/2012/10/penelope-all consulta-tesse-e-sfila-la-tela-dei-suoi-rapporti-con-la-corte-edu-con-significativi-ri.html>.
- Sabel F., Gerstenberg O. (2010) Constitutionalising an Overlapping Consensus: The ECJ and the Emergence of a Coordinate Constitutional Order. ELJ 16(5):511–550.
- Safjan M. (2012) Areas of Application of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union: Fields of Conflict? EUI Working Paper LAW 2012/22. <http://cadmus.eui.eu/bitstream/handle/1814/23294/LAW-2012-22.pdf>.
- Saiz Arnaiz A., Alcoberro Llivina C. (eds.) (2013) National constitutional identity and European integration. Intersentia, Cambridge.
- Salazar L. (2002) Il mandato d' arresto europeo: un primo passo verso il mutuo riconoscimento delle decisioni penali (The European arrest warrant: a first step towards mutual recognition in criminal matters). Diritto penale e processo pp. 1041 et seq.
- Scaccia G. (2007) Gli strumenti della ragionevolezza nel giudizio (The tools of reasonableness before courts). Giappichelli, Turin.
- Selvaggi E., De Amicis G. (2005) La legge sul mandato europeo d'arresto tra inadeguatezze attuative e incertezze applicative (The law on the European arrest warrant in between inadequacies and uncertain application). Cassazione Penale VI:1813 et seq.
- Selvaggi E., Villoni O., (2002) Questioni reali e non sul mandato d'arresto europeo (Reality and myth of the European Arrest Warrant) Cassazione Penale:449 et seq.
- Sorrentino F. (2007) Lezioni sul principio di legalità. (Lessons on the principle of legality). Giappichelli, Turin.
- Spitaleri F. (2011) Le discriminazioni alla rovescia nel diritto dell'Unione europea e nell'ordinamento interno (Reverse discrimination in EU law and domestic law). http://asgi.it/wp-content/uploads/public/materiali_seminario_sassomarconi_sett_2011_spitaleri.pdf.
- Sturzo L. (1954) La guerra, l'Italia e l'intervistato (The War, Italy and the interviewee). In: Sturzo L. (ed.) Politica di questi anni (Politics of these years). Zanichelli, Bologna, pp. 144–146.
- Tridimas T., Gari G. (2010) Winners and losers in Luxembourg: A statistical analysis of judicial review before the European Court of Justice and the Court of First Instance (2001–2005). E.L. Rev. 35:131–173.
- Vecchio F. (2014) L'ingloriosa fine della direttiva Data retention, la ritrovata vocazione costituzionale della Corte di giustizia e il destino dell'art. 132 del Codice della privacy (The inglorious end of the Data Retention Directive and the rediscovered constitutional vocation of the Court of Justice and the destiny of Art. 132 of the so called Privacy Code). <http://www.dirittocomparati.it/2014/06/ingloriosa-fine-della-direttiva-data-retention-la-ritrovata-vocazione-costituzionale-della-corte-di.html#sthash.IMJXMXWP.dpuf>.
- Von Bogdandy A., Schill S. (2011) Overcoming absolute primacy: Respect for national identity under the Lisbon Treaty. CML Rev. 48:1417–1453.

Further Reading

- Calamandrei P. (1955a) Introduzione (Introduction). In: Garrone A.G., Calamandrei P. (eds.) Questa nostra Costituzione (Our Constitution). Giuffrè, Milan, pp. 1 et seq.
- Calamandrei P. (1955b) Discorso sulla Costituzione (Speech on the Constitution). Speech given at the Salone degli Affreschi della Società Umanitaria (English translation), Milano, 26 January 1955. http://www.calamandrei-vc.it/web/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=233&Itemid=124.

- Carlotto I. (2010) I giudici comuni e gli obblighi internazionali dopo le sentenze n. 348 e n. 349 del 2007 della Corte costituzionale: un'analisi sul seguito giurisprudenziale (Italian judges and international obligations after decisions nos. 348 and 349/2007 of the Italian Constitutional Court: a case law based analysis). http://archivio.rivistaaic.it/dottrina/giustizia_costituzionale/ilaria%20carlotto%20sent.348_349_2007.pdf.
- Carlotto I. (2013) I giudici italiani e il divieto di applicazione diretta della convenzione europea dei diritti dell'uomo dopo il Trattato di Lisbona (Italian judges and the prohibition on the direct application of the ECHR after the Lisbon Treaty). In: Cappuccio L., Lamarque E. (eds.), Dove va il sistema italiano accentratato di controllo di costituzionalità? (Where is the Italian centralised system of control of constitutionality going?). Editoriale Scientifica, Naples, pp. 177–240.
- Cheli E. (1973) Il problema storico della Costituente (The historical problem of the Constituent Assembly). Politica del diritto, pp. 485–530.
- Costanzo P., Mezzetti L., Ruggeri A. (2006) Lineamenti di diritto costituzionale dell'Unione europea (European constitutional law). Giappichelli, Turin.
- Croce B. (1944) Per una nuova Italia. Scritti e discorsi (1943–44) (For a new Italy. Writings and speeches (1943–44)). Ricciardi, Naples.
- Fontanelli F., Martinico G. (2010) Between Procedural Impermeability and Constitutional Openness: The Italian Constitutional Court and Preliminary References to the European Court of Justice. ELJ 16(3):345–364.
- Martinico G. (2012) Multiple loyalties and dual preliminary: The pains of being a judge in a multilevel legal order. ICON 10:871–896.
- Pizzorusso A. (1990) Italian and American Models of the Judiciary and of Judicial Review of Legislation: A Comparison of Recent Tendencies. Am.J.Comp.L 38:373–386.
- Pollicino O. (2014) From partial to full dialogue with Luxembourg: The last cooperative step of the Italian Constitutional Court. EuConst 10:143–153.
- Volterra S. (1980) La Costituzione italiana e i modelli anglosassoni con particolare riguardo agli Stati Uniti (The Italian Constitution and Anglo-Saxon models with particular reference to the United States). In: De Siervo U. (ed.) Scelte della Costituente e cultura giuridica. II: Protagonisti e momenti del dibattito costituzionale (Choices of the Constituent Assembly. II. Protagonists and moments of the constitutional debate). Il Mulino, Bologna, pp. 117–292.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Spain: The Challenges for the Constitutional Order Under European and Global Governance

Joan Solanes Mullor and Aida Torres Pérez

Abstract Although the constitutional text has remained nearly untouched – only twice has the Spanish Constitution been amended since its enactment in 1978 – global and European governance have deeply transformed the constitutional order. The impact of the process of European integration upon the Constitution is an open and evolving phenomenon, encompassing the challenge to constitutional supremacy, the incorporation of new sources of law, an imbalance between the legislative and executive powers, the enhanced role of the judiciary, the multilevel protection of fundamental rights and the transformation of regionalism as a model for organising the territorial power. First, this report will analyse the constitutional amendments regarding EU membership and the constitutional limits to European integration. Indeed, the only two constitutional amendments were both prompted by the EU. Secondly, the impact of EU integration upon the protection of constitutional rights will be critically examined, with special emphasis on the economic crisis. The obligations deriving from the EU might undermine the protection of constitutional rights, as the introduction of the European Arrest Warrant, the Data Retention Directive and the austerity measures adopted in the context of the economic crisis have shown. Thirdly and more generally, global governance has had constitutional implications, for instance regarding the strengthening of the executive power vis-à-vis the legislative, pressures on the welfare state, the fight against terrorism, the curtailing of powers of the Autonomous Communities and the response to immigration. In this context, it is necessary to recast the relationship

Joan Solanes Mullor is Lecturer of Constitutional Law at Pompeu Fabra University, Barcelona.
e-mail: joan.solanes@upf.edu.

Aida Torres Pérez is Professor of Constitutional Law at Pompeu Fabra University, Barcelona. e-mail: aida.torres@upf.edu.

All websites accessed 1 July 2015. Text submitted 12 August 2015.

J. Solanes Mullor (✉) · A. Torres Pérez
Pompeu Fabra University, Barcelona, Spain
e-mail: joan.solanes@upf.edu

A. Torres Pérez
e-mail: aida.torres@upf.edu between the Global-European spheres and the national constitutional order to ensure respect for the principles of the rule of law, the separation of powers and the protection of fundamental rights.

Keywords The Constitution of Spain · Constitutional amendments regarding European integration · The Spanish Constitutional Court · Constitutional review statistics · Fundamental rights · The rule of law as defined in Art. 9 of the Constitution · The principles of legal certainty and legitimate expectations · European Arrest Warrant · Data Retention Directive · Privatisation of public services · European Commission and IMF austerity and restructuring programmes, social rights and trade union rights · Curtailing of the powers of autonomous regions

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The Spanish Constitution of 1978 was drafted in the transitional period to democracy in the aftermath of Franco's dictatorship. General Francisco Franco died on 20 November 1975, putting an end to a long dictatorship established after the Civil War in 1939.¹ The Constitution was the outcome of a consensus among the main political parties represented in Parliament after the 1977 June elections.

The drafters were conscious of the need to reach a broad agreement about the basic structural principles of the newly established political order. The main goal was to design a stable democratic system and to ensure the protection of individuals' fundamental rights. The need to reach a consensus about highly controversial issues, such as the model of political decentralisation, on occasion led to ambiguous constitutional provisions in need of further interpretation and political negotiations. The Spanish Constitution was very much influenced by the German and Italian constitutions, regarding for instance the centralised model for the judicial review of legislation. Eventually, the Constitution was ratified in a referendum on 6 December 1978.

1.1.2 On the whole, the key elements of the rationale of the Constitution include (a) a system of representative democracy, separation of powers and the rule of law, (b) protection of constitutional rights and liberties and (c) the territorial decentralisation of political power in Spain. The model of territorial organisation was particularly contested and eventually a sort of quasi-federal state was established, i.e., the Estado de las autonomías. The allocation of powers between the central state and the autonomous communities has been a permanent source of conflict, and today this model is under pressure by the secessionist movement in Catalonia.

¹ See generally Ferreres Comella 2013a, pp. 1–24.

The Constitution managed to provide a framework for democratic political contestation and the protection of individual rights. Moreover, Art. 10(2), which indicates that constitutional rights need to be interpreted according to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other human rights treaties ratified by Spain, opened up the Constitution to international human rights law.

For a long time, the amendment of the Constitution was regarded as a ‘taboo’ since the priority was to secure the stability of the democratic system.² The fear was that any attempts to modify the Constitution would put the achievements of the democratic regime at risk, and the shadow of the dictatorship still loomed large. Nonetheless, after almost forty years since its enactment, there are more and more voices calling for an overall constitutional amendment regarding issues such as the territorial decentralisation of power, the Senate and the Crown.

1.2 Constitutional Amendments in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 The Spanish Constitution has been amended only twice since its enactment in 1978. Both amendments were prompted by the process of European integration. Whereas these amendments were specific in their scope and nature, a more profound amendment of the Constitution in light of the constitutional transformations ensuing from EU membership has not yet taken place.³ Indeed, only the amended Art. 135 explicitly refers to the EU in the whole constitutional text (see Sect. 1.2.3).

1.2.2 In terms of the process for constitutional amendment, the Spanish Constitution is rigid. There are two amendment procedures: the general procedure (Art. 167) requires a qualified majority of three-fifths of both parliamentary chambers (Congress and Senate), and a referendum is not compulsory. Nonetheless, a referendum shall be convoked if at least one-tenth of the representatives in Congress or in the Senate request it.

The Constitution provides for a more demanding procedure (Art. 168) in order to amend certain parts: the Preliminary Title – which includes provisions on the main principles of the constitutional order – basic fundamental rights, the Crown, and for the total revision of the Constitution. According to Art. 168, a qualified majority of two-thirds is required to support the initiative, a general election has to take place and, after the election, the support of a two-thirds majority of both chambers for the final text must be secured. Ratification by referendum is compulsory. In practice, the required qualified majorities generally involve the agreement of the two main political parties represented in Parliament (Partido Popular, PP and Partido Socialista, PSOE).

1.2.3 The first constitutional amendment took place in 1992 and was deemed to be necessary in order to ratify the Maastricht Treaty. The Maastricht Treaty represented a turning point from an economic to a political union and introduced EU citizenship. EU citizens were granted the right to vote and stand as candidates in local elections in their place of residence.

² Ferreres Comella 2000, p. 32.

³ See Cruz Villalón 2006a, pp. 23–25.

According to Art. 13(2) of the Spanish Constitution prior to 1992, foreigners could be granted the right to vote in local elections (sufragio activo), but were deprived of any right to stand as candidates (sufragio pasivo). After the Maastricht Treaty was signed and before its ratification, the Government asked the Constitutional Court (CC) about the compatibility of the Maastricht Treaty with the Constitution. The Constitution provides a special procedure for the constitutional review of international treaties prior to ratification.⁴ If a treaty is found to be in breach of the Constitution, the treaty may only be ratified after a constitutional amendment. In this case, in Declaration No. 1/1992 of 1 July, the CC held that the Maastricht Treaty was incompatible with the Constitution with regard to the right of foreigners to stand as candidates in local elections.

Eventually, the amendment of Art. 13(2) was enacted on 27 August 1992. Actually, only two words ('y pasivo') were added to enable foreigners to stand as candidates in local elections.⁵ No specific reference to EU citizens was included. The amendment took place through the general procedure (Art. 167) and without holding a referendum.

The second constitutional amendment was enacted in September 2011 in the context of the European crisis to incorporate the 'balanced budget' rule and limitations to the public debt and deficit in Art. 135 of the Constitution.⁶

⁴ For a more detailed explanation about this procedure, see Sect. 3.1.

⁵ After the amendment, Art. 13(2) of the Constitution reads as follows:

'Only Spaniards shall have the rights recognized in section 23, except in cases which may be established by treaty or by law concerning the right to vote and the right to be elected in municipal elections, and subject to the principle of reciprocity'. The English translation used in this report is available at: http://www.congreso.es/portal/page/portal/Congreso/Congreso/Hist_Normas/Norm_const_espa_texto_ingles_0.pdf.

⁶ After the amendment, Art. 135 of the Constitution reads as follows:

‘1. All public administrations will conform to the principle of budgetary stability.

2. The State and the Self-governing Communities may not incur a structural deficit that exceeds the limits established by the European Union for their member states.

An Organic Act shall determine the maximum structural deficit the state and the Self-governing Communities may have, in relation to its gross domestic product. Local authorities must submit a balanced budget.

3. The State and the Self-governing Communities must be authorized by Act in order to issue Public Debt bonds or to contract loans.

Loans to meet payment on the interest and capital of the State's Public Debt shall always be deemed to be included in budget expenditure and their payment shall have absolute priority. These appropriations may not be subject to amendment or modification as long as they conform to the terms of issue.

The volume of public debt of all the public administrations in relation to the State' gross domestic product may not exceed the benchmark laid down by the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union.

4. The limits of the structural deficit and public debt volume may be exceeded only in case of natural disasters, economic recession or extraordinary emergency situations that are beyond the control of the State and significantly impair either the financial situation or the economic or social

The constitutional amendment was prompted by the so-called Euro-Plus-Pact, a package of measures adopted by the European Council in March 2011 to respond to the crisis and preserve financial stability,⁷ and, more particularly, by the French-German summit held on 16 August 2011.⁸ Several months after the constitutional amendment, the Treaty on Stability, Coordination and Governance in the Economic and Monetary Union (TSCG), signed on 2 March 2012, incorporated the so-called ‘golden rule’, i.e., the requirement that ‘the budget position of the general government must be balanced or in surplus’ (Art. 3(1)(a)). Moreover, according to Art. 3(2), there is an obligation to give effect to the financial provisions of Art. 3(1) in national law ‘through provisions of binding force and permanent character, preferably constitutional, or otherwise guaranteed to be fully respected and adhered to throughout the national budgetary processes’.

The accelerated process through which Art. 135 of the Constitution was amended may well be contested in terms of democratic deliberation. Indeed, several scholars pointed out that the process had been carried out too quickly and without any public debate.⁹ Article 135 of the Constitution was amended in a record time of thirteen days¹⁰ by the end of the summer. Apparently, the President of the Government at the time, José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, and the leader of the main opposition party, Mariano Rajoy, agreed on the constitutional amendment during a phone conversation.¹¹

The amendment took place by means of the general procedure and without a referendum. The proposal for the constitutional amendment, submitted jointly by the PSOE and PP parliamentary groups, followed an urgent and special procedure sustainability of the State, as appreciated by an absolute majority of the members of the Congress of Deputies.

5. An Organic Act shall develop the principles referred to in this article, as well as participation in the respective procedures of the organs of institutional coordination between government fiscal policy and financial support. In any case, the Organic Act shall address:

- a The distribution of the limits of deficit and debt among the different public administrations, the exceptional circumstances to overcome them and the manner and time in which to correct the deviations on each other.
- b. The methodology and procedure for calculating the structural deficit.
- c. The responsibility of each public administration in case of breach of budgetary stability objectives.

6. The Self-governing Communities, in accordance with their respective laws and within the limits referred to in this article, shall take the appropriate procedures for effective implementation of the principle of stability in their rules and budgetary decisions.’

⁷ European Council Conclusions, 20 April 2011, http://www.consilium.europa.eu/uedocs/cms_data/docs/pressdata/en/ec/120296.pdf.

⁸ Ridaura Martínez 2012, p. 238.

⁹ See, among others, Blanco Baldés 2011, pp. 12–15; Jimena Quesada 2012, pp. 350–353; Ridaura Martínez 2012, pp. 249–259; García-Escudero 2012, p. 165.

¹⁰ This was the time from submission of the proposition to amend the Constitution on 26 August 2011 to approval by the Senate on 8 September 2011.

¹¹ Ferreres Comella 2013b, p. 233.

according to which the proposed amendment was only discussed and voted by the full chamber of the Congress and Senate (without being discussed in the respective parliamentary commissions), and the timelines were reduced. Consequently, the role of minority groups and the parliamentary debate were curtailed.¹²

Twenty-nine deputies and seven senators asked for a referendum, but they did not reach the minimum of one-tenth of all members as required by Art. 167 – which would have meant at least thirty-five deputies or twenty-seven senators.¹³

Hence, the constitutional amendment was not the outcome of an open and broad process of deliberation involving the people, but rather was enacted under pressure from other European governments and the markets.¹⁴ The main goal was to signal Spain's commitment to the balanced budget rule and to the implementation of the ensuing austerity measures in accordance with the limits placed on public debt and deficit. The constitutional amendment was not an occasion for public debate, but the result of an agreement behind closed doors by the leaders of the two main political parties. Paradoxically, in November 2014, the current leader of the PSOE, Pedro Sánchez, announced that he was willing to amend Art. 135 again to ensure the protection of social rights and in particular public education, healthcare and pensions.¹⁵

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1–1.3.2 Article 93 of the Constitution enables the transfer of powers ‘derived from the Constitution’ to international organisations. According to this Article, ‘[a]uthorization may be granted by an organic act for concluding treaties by which powers derived from the Constitution shall be transferred to an international organization or institution’. Despite the fact that the EU is not expressly mentioned, this provision was drafted with the future accession of Spain to the EU in mind.

Following this provision, the ratification of an international treaty that transfers sovereign powers to an international organisation needs to be approved by an organic law. This means that the transfer needs to be approved by an absolute majority of Congress. Hence, this clause merely sets the procedure in order to authorise the transfer of sovereign powers, but it does not include any substantive ¹² See García-Escudero 2012, p. 179. Indeed, two deputies of the parliamentary group ERC-IU-ICV submitted an individual complaint before the CC, but the complaint was found inadmissible.

¹³ García-Escudero 2012, p. 172.

¹⁴ Ferreres Comella 2013b, p. 233.

¹⁵ Europa press 24 November 2014.

limits or requirements regarding the values, principles or objectives that should be respected by international organisations of which Spain is a member.

1.3.3 Nonetheless, the CC has interpreted this provision to contain implicit substantive limits to integration: the respect for state sovereignty, basic constitutional structures, and the system of values and fundamental principles enshrined in the Constitution, in particular fundamental rights.¹⁶ In this decision, the CC established its counter-limits doctrine, following the lead of the German and the Italian Constitutional Courts.¹⁷ The limits to integration were formulated rather broadly, since the Court did not spell out what ‘basic constitutional structures’ were considered to be or how to understand ‘respect for state sovereignty’ at a time in which this concept is constantly being revised and reshaped.

1.3.4 The foregoing decision was delivered in the context of the ratification of the Treaty Establishing a Constitution for Europe (TECE) in 2004, when the Spanish Government consulted the CC about the compatibility between the Constitution and the principle of primacy of EU law, expressly stated in the so-called European Constitution.¹⁸ The CC resolved the potential conflict by crafting a distinction between the primacy of EU law and the supremacy of the Constitution. The CC found that the primacy of EU law did not impinge upon the supremacy of the Constitution, since the former referred to the applicability of domestic legislation clashing with EU law, whereas the latter referred to the validity of domestic legislation in light of the Constitution.¹⁹ Following previous case law, the CC stated that the primacy of EU law was grounded on Art. 93, which allowed the transfer of powers to an international organisation. In turn, the CC declared for the first time that Art. 93 contained substantive limits to integration. Eventually, the CC concluded that the TECE was compatible with the Spanish Constitution and that no constitutional amendment was required. In the end, the process of ratification failed after the negative referendums in France and the Netherlands in 2005.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The level of democratic control, in particular parliamentary oversight, over the ratification of EU treaties and the subsequent treaty amendments is rather low. As ¹⁶ Declaration CC No. 1/2004, of 13 December, para. 2.

¹⁷ Prior to 2004, scholars had criticised the formalist understanding of Art. 93 of the Constitution adopted by the CC, see Pérez Tremps 1994, pp. 36–37. After 2004 and the development of the counter-limits doctrine under Art. 93, scholars understood that the CC had given some teeth to this provision, see Saiz Arnaiz 2005, pp. 56–70.

¹⁸ Article I-6 TECE.

¹⁹ Previously, the Council of State (Consejo de Estado) – the supreme consultative body of the Government – had concluded that a conflict existed and the Constitution should have been amended to give priority to EU law. Council of State Report of 21 October 2004.

mentioned above, the ratification of EU treaties needs to be authorised through an organic law, which requires an absolute majority in Congress. The requirement of an absolute majority indicates the need to reach a broader consensus than is necessary to pass ordinary legislation. Still, this majority is lower than the majority for constitutional amendment (three-fifths pursuant to Art. 167 or two-thirds pursuant to Art. 168). In practice, the need to achieve an absolute majority has not prompted a more profound debate regarding the ratification of EU treaties.

Besides the ratification process, the Constitution does not attribute a specific role to Parliament in the European policymaking process or in monitoring the Government when acting at the European level. It is not constitutionally mandatory for the Government to consult or inform Parliament when dealing with EU affairs. The Council of State (Consejo de Estado) – the supreme consultative body of the Government – has advocated for a constitutional reform that would enhance the role of Parliament in European affairs.²⁰

1.4.2 Moreover, a referendum is not compulsory and the ratification of EU treaties does not usually spur public debate. The Constitution provides for a consultative referendum in Art. 92. The President of the Government may decide to convoca a referendum of a non-binding nature regarding ‘political decisions of special importance’ with the authorisation of Congress. Indeed, the Government decided to call for a referendum regarding the TECE given the relevance of the constitutional treaty as a crucial moment in the European integration process.²¹ In practice, the debate in other Member States and the potential failure of the Constitutional Treaty pushed the Spanish Government to hold a referendum – without much doubt regarding a positive outcome – in order to bolster the legitimacy of the European Constitution.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.2 The only two constitutional amendments that have been made were prompted by the EU for the reasons elaborated in Sect. 1.2.3. The first amendment was due to the decision of the Constitutional Court that declared an incompatibility between the Constitution and the Maastricht Treaty regarding the right of EU citizens to stand as candidates in local elections. The second amendment took place in the context of the economic and financial crisis mainly with the goal of enhancing the trust of the markets and European institutions and leaders regarding the limits to the public debt and deficit in Spain. Thus, the constitutional amendments regarding the EU have been rather limited in their scope, and the EU is only explicitly mentioned in Art. 135.

²⁰ Council of State Report of 16 February 2006 on the amendment of the Spanish Constitution, pp. 108–113.

²¹ See Sect. 3.3.

1.5.3 As a consequence of EU integration and the transfer of sovereign powers to the EU, national constitutions no longer regulate the exercise of public power within the state comprehensively. The scope and understanding of several constitutional clauses have been transformed, even though the wording remains the same.²² EU integration has had a major impact on the constitutional legal order.²³ For instance, domestic judges have acquired the power to set aside legislation that clashes with EU law, whereas under the Constitution they are not allowed to review legislation and must make a reference to the Constitutional Court. The system of sources of law now incorporates EU law, which has primacy and direct effect. The powers of the executive have been expanded vis-à-vis the legislative power, since the Government participates in law-making at the EU level as part of the Council and has an important role in the implementation and execution of EU law. Finally, in the field of fundamental rights, the Charter applies alongside the constitutional bill of rights when national authorities implement EU law.

Given the relevance of the process of integration from a constitutional perspective, several authors have argued that the Constitution should incorporate a specific ‘European integration clause’.²⁴ The current Art. 93 simply regulates the process for the ratification of international treaties, and it does not even explicitly mention the EU. A newly framed ‘integration clause’ might well include a procedural and a substantive prong. Procedurally, it would be advisable to reinforce the democratic legitimacy of the transfer of powers to the EU and the ensuing constitutional transformations by requiring a broader parliamentary majority and the holding of a referendum if a certain percentage of representatives ask for it. From a substantive standpoint, this clause might include the constitutional limits to integration and the basic principles of interaction with the EU.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 Title I of the Spanish Constitution, entitled ‘Fundamental Rights and Duties’, enshrines the Spanish bill of rights.²⁵ Title I is rather comprehensive since it

²² Walter 2001, pp. 193–196; von Bogdandy 2001, pp. 212–213.

²³ For an analysis of the impact of integration upon the content of the Constitution, see Pérez Tremps 2004, pp. 112–120; Bustos Gisbert 2009, pp. 401–428.

²⁴ Solazabal Echavarria 2005, pp. 44–46; Albertí Rovira 2006, pp. 457–482; Alonso García 2006, pp. 557–561; Cruz Villalón 2006b, pp. 70–74; Escobar Hernández 2006, pp. 483–489; López Castillo 2006, pp. 501–532; Mangas Martín 2006, pp. 533–556. See also the Council of State Report of 16 February 2006, on the amendment of the Spanish Constitution, pp. 40–108 (with a proposal to amend the Constitution and to add a ‘European integration clause’).

²⁵ For this section, see Ferreres Comella 2013a, pp. 235–251.

includes civil, political and social rights. The level of protection granted to those rights, however, varies. From the perspective of the robustness of constitutional protection, one can identify three groups of rights: (i) rights included in Chap. II, Sect. 1; (ii) rights included in Chap. II, Sect. 2; and (iii) principles on social and economic policy included in Chap. III.

All rights and freedoms in Chap. II are deemed to be directly binding on all public authorities and thus they are directly enforceable by courts; additionally, the regulation of these rights is reserved to Parliament (reserva de ley; Art. 53(1)).

Among the rights listed in Chap. II, those included in Sect. 1, such as the right to life, physical integrity, free speech, privacy and association, the right to vote and fair trial, among others, are granted a heightened protection. In the case of an alleged violation of these rights, after exhausting the available judicial remedies before the ordinary courts, individuals may submit an individual complaint to the Constitutional Court (recurso de amparo; Art. 53(2)). Also, these rights need to be regulated by an organic law, which requires an absolute majority in Congress (Art. 81). Furthermore, they can only be amended following the extraordinary procedure set out in Art. 168 of the Constitution.

Finally, Chap. III includes the so-called principles on social and economic policy, such as the right to healthcare and the right to housing. These rights are not directly enforceable by courts and following Art. 53(3) ‘they may only be invoked before the ordinary courts in accordance with the legal provisions implementing them’. The same provision lays down that ‘[r]ecognition, respect and protection of the principles recognised in Chapter 3 shall guide legislation, judicial practice and actions by the public authorities’. They are thus interpreted as mandates to public authorities and must be taken into account upon the interpretation of other norms.

2.1.2 Even though there is no general constitutional provision stipulating the conditions under which restrictions on rights can be imposed, the Constitutional Court has addressed the issue in its case law. Although some rights, such as the right to be free from torture, might be regarded as absolute, rights can generally be restricted in order to protect other rights or general interests. Any restriction needs to be provided by law and justified under the proportionality principle. The principle of proportionality includes three steps according to which it is necessary to ask: ‘first, whether the restriction is useful to achieve a legitimate goal; second, whether the restriction is necessary, in that no more moderate measure could be chosen to sufficiently satisfy that goal; third, whether the costs that the restriction entails are offset by the benefits that are to be achieved’.²⁶

Besides the possibility of restricting rights, the Constitution allows the Government to suspend certain rights in specific circumstances (Art. 55). First, in the course of an investigation of ‘armed bands or terrorist groups’ three rights may be suspended under certain conditions: the right of the arrested person to be brought before a judge no later than 72 hours after arrest; the right to privacy regarding one's home and the secrecy of communications. Secondly, when the Government declares a state of emergency or siege, a list of rights may be suspended, which is very exceptional and in practice has never happened.

²⁶ Ibid. p. 246.

In general, according to Art. 10(2) of the Constitution, constitutional rights need to be interpreted according to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international human rights treaties ratified by Spain. This provision has been commonly used with regard to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and the corresponding European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) case law.²⁷

2.1.3 The principle of the rule of law is encapsulated in Art. 1(1) of the Constitution,²⁸ and further specified in Art. 9. In short, the principle requires that all public authorities abide by the law. Broadly, the principle requires respect of the separation of powers and the protection of individual rights. Indeed, Art. 9(1) confirms the binding nature of the Constitution upon public authorities and citizens, which was paramount after the dictatorship. As opposed to the constitutional tradition over the nineteenth century, the Constitution was no longer conceived as a political document of a programmatic nature, but rather as a binding norm at the top of the legal order.

More specifically, Art. 9(3)²⁹ lays down a set of techniques for the realisation of the rule of law principle. First, the hierarchical principle orders the norms in the legal system according to which superior norms prevail over inferior norms (lex superior derogat legi inferiori). Basically, the Constitution is at the top, followed by parliamentary legislation and finally governmental regulations. Respect for the hierarchical principle is a condition of validity of any legal provision.

Secondly, Art. 9(3) includes the principle of legal certainty and the principle of publicity. As such, a norm may only enter into force after publication. The main instrument for these purposes is an official bulletin called Boletín Oficial del Estado. Individuals cannot be bound by norms that are secret. Moreover, according to the principle of legal certainty, individuals need to be able to foresee what the applicable norms are and how they are going to be interpreted. The principle of legal certainty is key in the civil law tradition (see also Sect. 2.5).

Thirdly, the Constitution bans the retroactivity of norms that establish sanctions or restrict individual rights. Thus, the legislator may enact retroactive norms except in these circumstances. This ban on retroactivity is especially relevant in criminal law and is linked to the principle of nulla poena sine lege. Finally, public authorities must exercise their power according to the principle of responsibility and non-arbitrariness.

²⁷ Saiz Arnaiz 1999, pp. 156–169; Torres Pérez 2011, pp. 160–164.

²⁸ See Ferreres Comella 2013a, pp. 26–29.

²⁹ Article 9(3) reads as follows: ‘The Constitution guarantees the principle of legality, the hierarchy of legal provisions, the publicity of legal statutes, the non-retroactivity of punitive provisions that are not favourable to or restrictive of individual rights, the certainty that the rule of law shall prevail, the accountability of public authorities, and the prohibition of arbitrary action of public authorities.’

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 In the last decade, the Spanish legislator has worked to enhance the economic freedoms recognised in EU law. This has generated tensions with the subnational territorial entities and some groups – such as professional associations – which have rooted their opposition in the constitutional text.

The context, however, is clearly imbalanced in favour of the economic freedoms of EU law against other constitutional principles. The transposition of the Services Directive³⁰ has altered the competences scheme of all levels of the public administration. The competences of subnational territorial entities, inter alia, to establish authorisations for private services and to regulate the protection of the environment regarding hazardous private activities, have been curtailed. The Law 20/2013 of 9 December on the Guarantee of the Internal Market has accelerated this trend and has implemented the freedom of services far beyond the requests of the Services Directive – to all kinds of ‘economic activity’, in the words of this legislation.³¹ These initiatives have altered significantly the constitutional distribution of competences and the principles of political and administrative autonomy of Autonomous Communities and Municipalities.

Another example of these tensions is the debate surrounding the Draft Legislation on Professional Associations.³² The Draft, based on the freedom of services at the EU level and aimed at bolstering the free movement of services and persons, sought to dismantle several Professional Associations and to reduce their capacity to regulate and intervene in the spheres of activity of their members. The Professional Associations claimed that Art. 36 of the Constitution provided a special recognition of such associations and that the restrictions of the Draft were thus unconstitutional. Finally, the pressure led the Spanish Government to announce the withdrawal of the Draft.³³

³⁰ Directive 2006/123/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 December on services in the internal market, [2006] OJ L 376/36.

³¹ Several constitutional complaints against Law 20/2013 have been lodged before the CC by the Autonomous Communities of Andalusia, Canarias and Catalonia.

³² The Government issued a first Draft Legislation on 20 December 2013 and a second proposal on 11 November 2014.

³³ Cinco Días 15 April 2015.

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

The Framework Decision on the European Arrest Warrant³⁴ (Framework Decision) was first implemented in Spain by Law 3/2003 of 24 March on the European Arrest Warrant. This law was later replaced by Law 23/2014 of 20 November on Mutual Recognition of Criminal Decisions in the European Union. Law 23/2014 includes a new general clause, according to which this law will be applied with respect for the fundamental rights, freedoms and principles enshrined in the Spanish Constitution, Art. 6 of the TEU, the Charter and the ECHR (Art. 3).

The relevant provisions in the Constitution are as follows:

Article 17

1. Every person has a right to freedom and security. No one may be deprived of his or her freedom except in accordance with the provisions of this article and in the cases and in the manner provided by the law.
2. Preventive arrest may last no longer than the time strictly necessary in order to carry out the investigations aimed at establishing the events; in any case the person arrested must be set free or handed over to the judicial authorities within a maximum period of seventy-two hours.
3. Every person arrested must be informed immediately, and in a way understandable to him or her, of his or her rights and of the grounds for his or her arrest, and may not be compelled to make a statement. The arrested person shall be guaranteed the assistance of a lawyer during police and judicial proceedings, under the terms to be laid down by the law.
4. An habeas corpus procedure shall be provided for by law in order to ensure the immediate handing over to the judicial authorities of any person arrested illegally. Likewise, the maximum period of provisional imprisonment shall be determined by law.

Article 24

1. All persons have the right to obtain effective protection from the judges and courts in the exercise of their rights and legitimate interests, and in no case may there be a lack of defense.
2. Likewise, all have the right to the ordinary judge predetermined by law; to defense and assistance by a lawyer; to be informed of the charges brought against them; to a public trial without undue delays and with full guarantees; to the use of evidence appropriate to their defence; not to make self-incriminating statements; not to plead themselves guilty; and to be presumed innocent.

...

³⁴ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

Article 25

1. No one may be convicted or sentenced for actions or omissions which when committed did not constitute a criminal offence, misdemeanour or administrative offence under the law then in force.

...

3. The Civil Administration may not impose penalties which directly or indirectly imply deprivation of freedom.

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 In Spain, the competent authority to issue a European arrest warrant (EAW) is any judge or court hearing a criminal case. Law 23/2014 has set some specific conditions for the issue of an EAW, in addition to the general requirements established in the Framework Decision. The conditions are as follows: first, the case needs to meet the requirements laid down in the Law on Criminal Procedure to hold a person in preventive imprisonment, or the requirements of Organic Law 5/2000 of 12 January on the Criminal Responsibility of Minors, to decide on detention as an interim measure; secondly, a judicial authority may only issue an EAW to enforce a sentence of imprisonment if the substitution or suspension of imprisonment is not possible; and finally, the judicial authority may issue an EAW only if the prosecutor or the private accusation consider it necessary (Art. 39). These additional requirements contribute to specifying the proportionality principle as it is applied at the moment of issuing an EAW and to a better protection of the presumption of innocence.

According to Law 23/2014, the competent court to execute an EAW is the Juez Central de Instrucción de la Audiencia Nacional. Thus, execution is centralised in a single court for the whole national territory.

2.3.1.2 The European Commission Report on the implementation of the EAW offers data on the number of EAWs that have been issued and executed by each Member State.³⁵ According to the latest report, between 2005 and 2009, on average, Spain issued 533.8 EAWs per year and executed 73.4 EAWs per year.

The Centre for European Policy Studies Special Report offers valuable quantitative information in this regard. In the period between 2005 and 2011,³⁶ Spain issued 3,766 warrants, which means that Spain issued the fifth largest number of EAWs of all the Member States. Only 563 resulted in effective surrender, which represents a success rate of 14%. The entry into force of Law 23/2014, which as mentioned sets additional conditions for the issue of an EAW, might contribute to reducing the number of EAWs issued.

³⁵ Report from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council of 11 April 2011 on the implementation since 2007 of the Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States [COM(2011) 175 final]: http://ec.europa.eu/justice/criminal/files/eaw_implementation_report_2011_en.pdf.

³⁶ See Carrera et al. 2013, p. 6.

In turn, Spain received 8,702 requests for surrender (third largest number of EAWs received among the Member States), and 5,279 people were surrendered (in absolute terms, Spain is the state that has surrendered the largest number of people).³⁷ There is no provision for compensation due to surrender for people who are later acquitted.

The cases in which the execution of an EAW might give rise to the violation of fundamental rights might go unreported. NGOs and the media have denounced abuses in several countries. For instance, in Spain a documentary was launched about the case of Óscar Sánchez, who was accused of drug-trafficking and surrendered to Italy.³⁸ He spent 20 months in prison until it was discovered that he had been wrongly identified and he was eventually released. Cases such as this show that the right to the presumption of innocence might also be impinged upon as a consequence of the automaticity of the execution of EAWs.

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

No significant issues have arisen in Spain.

2.3.3 The Right to a Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 As it is widely known, the execution of the EAW for in absentia judgments has been a source of constitutional conflict in Spain. According to settled constitutional case law, the extradition of a person who has been convicted in absentia without making the surrender conditional on the opportunity to apply for a retrial violates the right to a fair trial (Art. 24(2) of the Constitution).³⁹

This interpretation of the right to a fair trial clashed with the 2002 Framework Decision on the EAW, and even more clearly after its amendment in 2009. According to the Framework Decision, if the person had information about the trial or had been represented by an appointed lawyer, surrender may not be refused or subjected to conditions.

³⁷ See also the quantitative information provided by the Council of Europe, Note from the General Secretariat to the Working Party on Cooperation in Criminal Matters (Experts on the European Arrest Warrant): Replies to questionnaire on quantitative information on the practical operation of the European arrest warrant – Year 2013. 8414/2/14 REV 2 LIMITE COPEN 103 EJN 43 EUROJUST 70, Brussels, 31 July 2014: <http://www.statewatch.org/news/2014/aug/eu-council-eaw-stats-2013-8414-rev2-14.pdf>.

³⁸ See: <http://blogs.ccma.cat/senseficcio.php?itemid=53778>.

³⁹ Judgment CC No. 91/2000, of 30 March, paras. 12–13 (this interpretation was contested within the Court, see the dissenting opinions).

In 2009, the CC was confronted with a case in which an English national, resident in Spain, had been sentenced in Romania to four years of imprisonment in his absence, although he had been represented by a lawyer of his choice. In its judgment, the CC held that the surrender of a person who has been condemned in absentia without making the surrender conditional on the possibility to obtain a retrial violates Art. 24(2) of the Constitution. Unfortunately for the applicant, he had already been surrendered by the time the CC decided the case.⁴⁰

Two years later, in a similar case involving an Italian national who had been condemned in absentia to ten years of imprisonment for the crime of bankruptcy fraud in Italy, the CC decided to make a preliminary reference to the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) for the first time ever. This is the well-known Melloni case. The reference included three questions about the interpretation and validity of the relevant provision of the EAW Framework Decision and the interpretation of Art. 53 of the Charter.⁴¹

In a nutshell, the CJEU upheld the validity of the Framework Decision in light of Arts. 47 and 48 of the Charter.⁴² It did not even consider the CC's suggestion to interpret the Charter as providing a more extensive protection than the ECHR. The CJEU was satisfied with stating that the level of protection in the EU was compatible with the ECHR.⁴³ However, while states are allowed to provide for better protection than the ECHR, the CJEU rejected the possibility for the CC to grant a higher level of protection than the Charter in this case.⁴⁴

Eventually, the CC overturned previous case law and revised the interpretation of Art. 24(2) of the Constitution regarding in absentia judgments with the consequence that the standard of constitutional protection was lowered.⁴⁵

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial

Within the domain of the right to a fair trial, the CC has held that, when a person has already consented to the execution of an EAW, the addition of new grounds for surrender without a previous audience amounts to a violation of the right to a fair ⁴⁰ Judgment CC No. 99/2009, of 28 September. See Izquierdo Sans 2010, pp. 218–225; Cedeño Hernán 2010, pp. 1–15; Fontanelli 2010, p. 372; Torres Pérez 2010, pp. 441–472.

⁴¹ About the preliminary reference, see among others, Arroyo Jiménez 2011, pp. 1–25; Revenga Sánchez 2012, pp. 139–150; González Pascual 2012, pp. 161–178; Pérez Manzano 2012, pp. 311–345; Torres Muro 2013, pp. 343–370.

⁴² Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107. For comments on the CJEU preliminary ruling see, among others, De Boer 2013, pp. 1083–1104; Martín Rodríguez 2013, pp. 1–13; Skouris 2013, pp. 229–243; García Sánchez 2013, pp. 1137–1156; Groussot and Olsson 2013, pp. 7–35; Brkan 2013, pp. 139–145.

⁴³ For a critical appraisal of the CJEU reasoning regarding this issue, see Torres Pérez 2014, pp. 314–315; Diez-Hochleitner 2013, pp. 21.

⁴⁴ For the interpretation of Art. 53 of the Charter, see Sect. 2.11.

⁴⁵ Judgment CC No. 26/2014, of 13 February.

trial.⁴⁶ Also, the CC has held that the lack of a right to appeal the decision to execute an EAW does not violate the right to a fair trial, since this is not a decision about the merits of the case.⁴⁷

For the statistics and individual cases reported, see Sect. 2.3.1.2.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition

Regarding the tension between mutual recognition and constitutional rights see Sect. 2.3.3 about trials in absentia.

2.3.6 Other Aspects of EU Criminal Law – The Principle of Ne Bis in Idem

According to the Framework Decision, the principle of ne bis in idem can, depending on the circumstances, be a ground for either compulsory (Art. 3(2)) or optional (Art. 4(2), (3) and (5)) non-execution of an EAW.

In a case before the CC, the applicant argued that the EAW issued by France to enforce a sentence of 20 years of imprisonment regarded the same acts for which a petition of extradition had been rejected in 1989. At that time, the extradition had been rejected on the basis of the principle of reciprocity, since the person accused was a Spanish national. The CC held that decisions in extradition procedures do not have the effect of res iudicata and may, in certain circumstances, be replaced by others. In that case, the reason to refuse the execution had to do with the existing legal framework, which had been modified following the Framework Decision on the EAW. In addition, the reason to request the surrender was not the same, since extradition had first been sought to prosecute the person and the subsequent EAW was issued in order to enforce the sentence.⁴⁸

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The Constitution recognises the right to private and family life (Art. 18(1)), and provides as follows:

Article 18

1. The right to honour, to personal and family privacy and to the own image is guaranteed.

⁴⁶ Judgment CC No. 181/2011, of 21 November.

⁴⁷ Judgment CC No. 177/2006, of 5 June.

⁴⁸ Ibid.

2. The home is inviolable. No entry or search may be made without the consent of the householder or a legal warrant, except in cases of flagrante delicto.
3. Secrecy of communications is guaranteed, particularly regarding postal, telegraphic and telephonic communications, except in the event of a court order.
4. The law shall restrict the use of data processing in order to guarantee the honour and personal and family privacy of citizens and the full exercise of their rights.

Under this broad wording, the Constitution protects individuals from interferences by public authorities in the spheres of personal and family life. In addition, the Constitution enshrines two other more specific rights that are relevant in the overall constitutional debate about the EU Data Retention Directive.⁴⁹

First, the Constitution guarantees the secrecy of communications, with the exception of searches and seizures previously authorised by a court order (Art. 18 (3)). In well-established case law, the CC has held that this right protects the act of communication itself, without a necessary link to private life.⁵⁰ In other words, this right offers a formal protection of the communication process regardless of its content. Secondly, the Constitution contains a clear mandate for the legislator to limit the use of data processing in order to protect the private and family life of individuals (Art. 18(4)). Although it is formulated as a mandate, the CC has interpreted this provision as a truly individual fundamental right similar to the other rights recognised in Chap. II, Sect. 1.

These constitutional provisions have conditioned the implementation of the EU Data Retention Directive in the period 2006–2014, but only in relation to the safeguards on the access to data. The rule of blanket data retention has not been disputed. In this regard, the legislator has considered that the constitutional protection of personal data is fulfilled with the obligation to obtain a court order in the context of a criminal investigation of a serious crime.⁵¹ The legislator understands, in line with the spirit of the Directive, that the data to be retained do not reveal the content of the communications and, therefore, these are only circumstantial data. Nonetheless, and due to the specific formal protection of all types of communications guaranteed by Art. 18(3) of the Constitution, a court order is compulsory in the event of access to data by public authorities. Three exceptions to the compulsory court order regime should be highlighted: access to the International Mobile Subscriber Identity (IMSI) data regarding especially prepaid mobile phones;⁵² the ⁴⁹ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

⁵⁰ The landmark judgment is Judgment CC No. 114/1984, of 29 November.

⁵¹ Article 7, Law 25/2007 of 18 October regarding the Retention of Telecommunications Data and Public Communications Networks.

⁵² Single Additional Provision Law 25/2007. The IMSI data is a combination of algorithms which prevents telecommunications fraud (it allows the identification of the mobile phone). However, the IMSI itself does not allow the identification of the buyer of the phone or the content of the communication. A court order is required to access this information beyond the access of the mere investigation of terrorism and organised crime,⁵³ and the possibility of suspension of these rights when a state of emergency or siege is declared.⁵⁴

On the other hand, Spanish courts have only added a cautious interpretation of the scope of Law 25/2007 of 18 October implementing the EU Data Retention Directive. The legitimate aim of the access and use of the data retained, i.e. ‘investigation, detection and prosecution of serious crime’, must be determined case by case considering the nature of the offence and in accordance with the proportionality principle.⁵⁵ Spanish courts have declared that the expression ‘serious crime’ cannot automatically be interpreted in the sense of serious crimes as defined in criminal law (i.e. the formal definition under criminal law of a serious crime does not imply per se the existence of a legitimate aim for the purposes of Law 25/2007, which must be determined case by case). Yet ordinary courts have raised neither a constitutional challenge before the CC nor a preliminary reference to the CJEU. Only one, timid constitutional concern regarding Law 25/2007 has been voiced, obiter dicta, by the Spanish Supreme Court (SC), and this referred to the type of law regulating the data retention measures: since a fundamental right was at stake, the SC deemed an organic law to be more appropriate than an ordinary law.⁵⁶

The annulment of the EU Data Retention Directive by the CJEU⁵⁷ has not led to the invalidation of Law 25/2007. This implementing measure is still in force. After the annulment of the EU Data Retention Directive in 2014, the legislator has only introduced minor amendments regarding the sanctioning measures and the procedure for access to data. The procedure shall operate through an electronic format and only government agents – police, customs surveillance and intelligence officers – are able to request ‘essential information for the aims of the Law’.⁵⁸ There is no change to the rule of blanket data retention – or the data to be retained – and, therefore, in light of the inaction on the part of the Spanish legislator, it appears that the initiative of the EU legislator will be necessary to change the national law implementing the EU Data Retention Directive.

IMSI data, as well as to access the specific register of prepaid mobile phones created by the Single Additional Provision Law 25/2007 (Judgment SC No. 249/2008, of 20 May, para. 4).

⁵³ See Art. 55(2) of the Spanish Constitution and Art. 579(3) of the Law on Criminal Procedure, approved by the Royal Decree of 14 September of 1982.

⁵⁴ Article 55(1) of the Spanish Constitution allows the search and seizure of all types of communications in the case of a declaration of one of the two more serious exceptional situations (states of emergency and siege, but not the state of alarm). See also the Organic Law 4/1981 of 1 June regarding the States of Alarm, Emergency and Siege.

⁵⁵ Order of the Provincial Court of Madrid (Section 30) No. 572/2013, of 11 July, para. 2.

⁵⁶ Judgment SC No. 249/2008, of 20 May, para. 4. Under Art. 81 of the Constitution, an organic law is required to regulate the essential elements of some fundamental rights (rights under Art. 18 of the Constitution are included). As stated in previous sections, an organic law is a source of law with the force of legislation, which needs an absolute majority to be passed.

⁵⁷ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

⁵⁸ New Art. 6(2) Law 25/2007, as amended by Final Additional Provision 4(1) of Law No. 9/2014 of 9 May regarding Telecommunications.

The origin in EU law of the rule of blanket data retention may have well facilitated its incorporation into national law. It is uncertain whether an analysis based only on constitutional grounds would have led to a declaration of unconstitutionality. Arguably, the formal protection of communications, well established in the case law of the CC under Art. 18(3) of the Constitution, raises some doubts about the constitutionality of the rule. Ordinary courts, however, have not raised any constitutional challenge in the CC and, even for the cases in which a court order is not needed – in the case of the three exceptions mentioned above – they have upheld the measure.⁵⁹ It appears that for Spanish courts, the safeguard of a court order is enough to sustain the compatibility between the Constitution and the rule of blanket data retention. However, it should be pointed out that in the cases before the SC in which Law 25/2007 has been applicable, the SC has emphasised its nature as a national norm implementing EU law.⁶⁰ This nature has had an important impact on the reasoning of the SC and might have deterred it from submitting a constitutional challenge before the CC.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 As seen in Sect. 2.1.3 on the rule of law, the publication of legal norms is a constitutional obligation established under Art. 9(3) of the Constitution. Moreover, Art. 2(1) of the Civil Code establishes that this general principle is applicable to all kinds of norms. This overall mandate is further reinforced by the Constitution with the obligation to publish State legislation (Art. 91) and international treaties (Art. 96 (1)). The legislation of Autonomous Communities must also be published according to each Autonomous Statute. Finally, administrative regulations with general and binding effects must also be published.⁶¹

Taking into account these constitutional and legislative references to the principle of publicity of norms, the CC has established a direct connection to the requirements of a democratic state.⁶² The CC has declared that only the publicity of norms guarantees the subjection of citizens to the legal system and the exercise of ⁵⁹ See Judgment SC No. 249/2008, of 20 May.

⁶⁰ Ibid. This SC judgment covers all the EU legislative history and the ECHR Convention system approach in the field of personal data. It also confronts, in some way, the case law of the CC with the aforementioned standpoints. The SC ultimately relied heavily on the new framework of Law 25/2007 and the EU Data Retention Directive, and considered all the previous considerations to have been overcome.

⁶¹ Article 52 of Law 30/1992 of 26 November of Rules on Public Administration and Administrative Proceedings. In October 2016, this provision will be derogated and replaced by a provision with identical effects: Art. 131 of Law 39/2015 of 1 October of Rules on Public Administrative Proceedings.

⁶² Judgment CC No. 179/1989, of 2 November, para. 2.

their rights.⁶³ In practice, secret or unpublished legislation has not been an issue in Spain under the 1978 Spanish Constitution.

In view of the above, it seems plausible to say that secret norms and measures in Spain would be declared at least – in line with the CJEU decision on the Heinrich case – to be without general and binding effects on citizens. Moreover, in light of the well-established constitutional principle of publicity and the strong position of the CC, secret norms would be declared invalid.

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 In the last two decades Spain has faced the liberalisation of several markets on the impulse of the EU. The telecommunications, energy and transport markets are examples of the decisive influence of the EU. In this transition from public monopolies to liberal markets, property rights, and principles like non-retroactivity, legal certainty and proportionality have been affected, inter alia, by unexpected changes in the regulatory framework and the imposition of public service obligations on private companies, the alteration of property rights and new regulatory bodies. Indeed, these troubles are commonly shared by all European countries that have faced liberalisation on the impulse and under the supervision of the EU.⁶⁴

As an example, changes in the legal framework of the renewable energy market have raised a huge debate in Spain. First, the elimination of the incentives to the renewable energy sector in 2012⁶⁵ and, secondly, the unexpected changes in the payment scheme of energy in 2014, which diminished the expected incomes of pre-existing renewable energy premises,⁶⁶ have led the renewable-energy sector to challenge these decisions before the Spanish courts alleging, inter alia, the infringement of the principles of legitimate expectations and legal certainty. EU law is at the forefront of this debate because these changes were made in order to implement Directive 2009/28/EC.⁶⁷ The resolution of this conflict, with the possible intervention of the European institutions, is still pending.⁶⁸

⁶³ Ibid.

⁶⁴ For a general overview of the liberalisation of certain markets piloted by the EU and the issues of national reception – from the political, institutional, cultural and legal points of view – see the seminal work of Majone 1996.

⁶⁵ Royal Decree-Law 1/2012, of 27 January.

⁶⁶ Law 24/2013, of 26 December and Royal Decree 413/2014, of 6 June.

⁶⁷ Directive 2009/28/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 23 April 2009 on the promotion of the use of energy from renewable sources [2009] OJ L 140/16.

⁶⁸ Several Autonomous Communities have lodged constitutional challenges and conflicts of competence (Catalonia, Andalusia and Extremadura) before the CC. Also, renewable energy companies and environmental associations have brought several actions for judicial review of the

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 The Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) imposes on Spain a mandatory contribution in the capital stock that amounts to 11.9037% of the total capital stock of the ESM.⁶⁹ Spain would be obliged to contribute 83,514 million EUR should the maximum calls allowed under the ESM Treaty be made. This corresponds to 19.73% of Spain's yearly budget for 2014 and 7.89% of its GDP in 2014.⁷⁰

These data show that the ESM Treaty, if the calls were activated, would heavily determine the budget, and Spain's financial and expenditure obligations. The budgetary autonomy of the State, specially the prerogatives of the Government and Parliament regarding the drafting and approval of the State's general budget, as well as the financial autonomy of the Autonomous Communities, could be jeopardised by the capital calls from the ESM.⁷¹ The ESM Treaty, the imposition of limits to the public debt and deficit (in the TSCG), the European Commission supervision of Member States' budgets prior to their approval (Two-Pack obligations) and the imposition of additional measures to fix macroeconomic imbalances (MIP framework) are factors which challenge the principle of financial autonomy of the Member States.

Despite this significant impact, a serious constitutional debate about the ESM Treaty provisions has not been launched. The possibility to submit this Treaty to an ex ante review by the CC –pursuant to Art. 95 of the Constitution – was not even raised, and the CC has not addressed the issue after the ratification and entry into force of the Treaty either. In the context of the debate about the TSGC, the CC has administration (more than 100 have been heard by the SC since 9 September 2014). The Association to Support Renewable Energies (Coordinadora de Apoyo a las Energías Renovables), which includes more than 50 entities from this sector, has stated that it is preparing legal action at the EU level against the measures taken. Nonetheless, until now, the international strategy lead by international investors has been to present actions before international arbitrators under the Energy Charter Treaty: several actions have been brought before the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSD), the Stockholm Chamber of Commerce (SCC) and the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL).

⁶⁹ Annex I ESM Treaty, Contribution Key for the Kingdom of Spain. The capital stock after the contributions of all the states amounts to 700,000 million EUR.

⁷⁰ The total amount of the yearly budget for 2014 is 423,231 million EUR (Law 22/2013 of 23 December regarding the General Yearly Budget for 2014). The yearly GDP for 2014 was 1,058,469 million EUR according to data provided by Eurostat and Instituto Nacional de Estadística (the Spanish Statistical Office).

⁷¹ In Spain, the Government drafts the general state budget and Parliament approves it by passing a law. Parliament can amend the budget during the legislative process, but any amendments implying an increase of the expenditures or a decrease in the incomes must be approved by the Government (Art. 134 of the Constitution). In relation to the Autonomous Communities, the Constitution recognises their financial autonomy and they are entitled to draft and approve their own budgets (Art. 156 of the Constitution).

declared that the central Government – based on its coordination powers and competence on general economic planning – can intervene and supervise the Autonomous Communities’ budgets, to guarantee budget stability, and that these powers do not unlawfully impinge upon the financial autonomy of the latter.⁷²

In this regard, the incorporation of the fiscal compact golden rule (budget stability or surplus) in national law, ‘preferably’, in the words of the TSCG,⁷³ by means of a constitutional provision, is another example of a mandate coming from the EU without being preceded by a thorough constitutional and democratic debate as discussed in greater detail in Sect. 1.5.

The need to gain access to financial markets at reasonable interest rates moved Spain to go further in the introduction of the golden rule of budget stability. Instead of passing a bill, Spain established at the constitutional level the absolute priority of the payment of public debt over other national expenditures in the amendment to Art. 135 (see Sect. 1.2.3), which included para. 3 according to which: ‘... Loans to meet payment on the interest and capital of the State’s Public Debt shall always be deemed to be included in budget expenditure and their payment shall have absolute priority. These appropriations may not be subject to amendment or modification as long as they conform to the terms of issue. ...’.

Spain changed its priorities and expressed a strong payment commitment to the financial markets over other public expenditures, for instance in the social, education or welfare fields. Again, this important rule, meaning a shift in the balancing of the rights of citizens with those of the international creditor community, especially in the economic, social and cultural spheres, was introduced together with the incorporation of the golden rule and without a thorough constitutional and democratic debate.

In short, the severe impact of the economic and financial crisis in Spain have placed the country in a difficult position in negotiating and discussing the economic and financial measures to fight the crisis at the European Union level.

2.7.2 Other initiatives such as Eurobonds and the Banking Union were seen in Spain as alleviating measures to overcome the economic and financial crisis, especially to decrease dependence on the financial markets to get loans. For these reasons, the measures were generally uncontested from the constitutional perspective.

2.7.3 Nonetheless, some debates and contestation from the constitutional perspective have taken place in relation to certain austerity measures introduced by the Spanish Government. Despite the fact that Spain has not been subject to an official bailout, the banking rescue programme of Spanish financial institutions in 2012, the negative alert mechanism reports and the recommendations of the European Commission and the Council to carry out structural reforms have obliged Spain to launch several austerity programmes that have affected civil servants and other public employees, and the quality, access and organisation of public services. Some of the measures and their origin will be addressed in greater detail in Sect. 3.5.

⁷² Judgment CC No. 215/2014, of 18 December.

⁷³ Article 3(2) TSGC.

From the constitutional perspective, public employees have challenged the suspension of certain benefits before Spanish courts on the grounds of legitimate expectations and the prohibition of retroactivity. One of the contested measures was the suppression of the ‘extra pay’ of December 2012 by Royal Decree-Law 20/2012 of 13 July (the extra pay is included in the annual salary of an employee but is paid in two specific months, normally in December and June, together with the monthly payment). The decision was taken on 15 July and, therefore, the period between 1 June and 14 July could have generated a proportional payable right of the ‘extra pay’. Lower judges and courts had decided differently on the issue, and finally several of them requested the CC to rule on the constitutionality of this measure. The Spanish Government and some Autonomous Communities had decided, before the resolution of the case by the CC, to reinstate this proportional amount of the ‘extra pay’. Therefore, the CC declared the constitutional questions referred by the ordinary courts to be extinguished – without entering into the merits – since the object of the claims in these cases no longer existed.⁷⁴

The reform of the labour market as a consequence of the austerity programmes has also had a special impact on public employees.⁷⁵ Most notable were the 5% reduction in the wages of public employees⁷⁶ and the possibility for the public administration to suspend or unilaterally modify collective agreements in the public sector for economic reasons.⁷⁷ Both measures have been contested based on arguments of their incompatibility with the right to collective bargaining and trade union freedoms (Arts. 28 and 37 of the Constitution). However, the CC upheld the decrease in salary,⁷⁸ and the new power of the public administration to suspend or modify collective agreements has only been condemned by the International Labour Organization (ILO).⁷⁹

Finally, the healthcare reform introduced by the Government as part of its austerity measures has also been challenged before the CC.⁸⁰ The exclusion of illegal immigrants from the public healthcare system, except in cases of emergency situations, pregnancy and minors, and the pharmaceutical co-payment mechanism have been contested from the point of view of the constitutional right to ⁷⁴ Judgment CC No. 83/2015, of 30 April, regarding the extinction of the preliminary reference sent by the Audiencia Nacional (National High Court). The other preliminary references will follow this same result.

⁷⁵ See Luz Rodríguez 2014, pp. 128–139.

⁷⁶ Royal Decree Law No. 8/2010, of 20 May.

⁷⁷ Article 32, Law 7/2007, of 12 April of the Basic Public Employees’ Statute (as amended by Royal Decree Law n° 20/2012 of 13 July).

⁷⁸ Judgment CC No. 85/2011, of 7 June.

⁷⁹ 371st Report ILO, of 13–27 March 2014.

⁸⁰ Royal Decree Law No. 16/2012 of 20 April.

healthcare.⁸¹ The European Committee of Social Rights has considered that such denial of access to healthcare for illegal immigrants is contrary to Art. 11 of the European Social Charter.⁸² Moreover, several Autonomous Communities have decided to secure universal access to healthcare for illegal immigrants. The Government has challenged the norms adopted by the Basque Country and Navarra before the CC. The judgment is still pending but, in the meantime, the CC has lifted the suspension of these norms.⁸³ Also in relation to the healthcare system, the CC has declared unconstitutional the legislation of the Autonomous Communities of Catalonia and Madrid establishing the obligation to pay one euro per prescription.⁸⁴ However, this judgment should be read in light of a conflict of competences, i.e. the Autonomous Communities cannot impose extra charges in the healthcare system on their own (or without the intervention of the national Government).

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 Judicial review of EU measures in Spain through the preliminary ruling mechanism is, in practice, very limited due to the inaction of national judges. In the period 2006–2014, national courts submitted a total of 178 references for a preliminary ruling, out of which only one was a request for a preliminary ruling on the validity of an EU measure.⁸⁵ Lower courts have been the most active in submitting references about the interpretation of EU law, with the submission of a total of 140,⁸⁶ while the SC has submitted 37 requests. The sole submission of a request for a preliminary ruling on the validity of an EU measure was made by the CC in Melloni (see Sect. 2.3.3). These data show that Spanish courts are very reluctant to ask the CJEU to decide on the validity of an EU measure.

2.8.2–2.8.5 On the other hand, the CC has sustained a long-standing position of not assessing the legality of EU measures: conflicts between EU law and national law, ⁸¹ To date, the only decisions of the CC are the Orders CC No. 239/2012, of 12 December and No. 114/2014, of 8 April, in which the CC partially lifted the suspension of the legislation of the Autonomous Communities of the Basque Country and Navarra on the ground that the benefits of the exclusion of illegal immigrants cannot outweigh the right to healthcare. See also Sect. 3.5.

⁸² Conclusions XX-2 of the European Committee of Social Rights, November 2014.

⁸³ Order CC No. 239/2012, of 12 December; Order No. 114/2014, of 8 April.

⁸⁴ Judgments CC No. 71/2014, of 8 May and No. 85/2014, of 29 May.

⁸⁵ Data extracted from search in <http://curia.europa.eu/> (Period of search: 1 January 2006 to 1 September 2014).

⁸⁶ The Audiencia Nacional (National High Court) has sent 3 references; the Tribunales Superiores de Justicia (High Courts of Justice of Autonomous Communities) 33; the Audiencias Provinciales (Provincial Courts) 22; Juzgados de primera instancia de todos los órdenes jurisdiccionales (Courts of First Instance) 80. Other administrative courts have sent 2 references.

and the validity of EU measures have been considered non-constitutional issues.⁸⁷ Therefore, these conflicts and their resolution have been left to the ordinary courts. In this line, the CC's recent case law shows an effort to emphasise the role of ordinary courts as EU judges. In this context, the CC has stated that the failure to submit a preliminary reference when mandatory and to disapply national law that is in conflict with EU law could amount to a violation of the constitutional right to a fair trial (Art. 24 of the Constitution).⁸⁸ Moreover, the CC has declared that, in certain cases, EU law has constitutional relevance and, therefore, the CC itself might submit a preliminary reference.⁸⁹ Notwithstanding these recent developments and the efforts of the CC, ordinary courts remain quite inactive in submitting preliminary questions regarding the validity of EU law.

It is difficult to compare the standard of national judicial review to the one deployed by the CJEU. There are neither official statistics nor scholarly work regarding the success rate of challenges against legislative measures brought before the CC. The data obtained from a statistical research carried out by the authors shows an indicative success rate of approximately 30% of challenges against legislative measures (period from 2006–2014).⁹⁰ This rate includes legislation declared partially or fully invalid or declared constitutional following a specific interpretation in conformity with the Constitution. This indicative success rate shows that the national standard of review is higher than the one sustained by the CJEU with regards to the annulment of EU law by the EU courts in 2001–2005 (success rates of 6.8% in the General Court and 16.1% in the CJEU).⁹¹

In relation to ordinary courts, there is also a lack of official statistical data and scholarly research regarding the standard of judicial review of administrative regulations and acts. Some studies suggest that the standard of judicial review varies depending on the field of administrative action. In areas like licensing or sanctions, ordinary courts exercise a strict scrutiny,⁹² while in areas like economic regulation – telecommunications and the energy sectors – courts maintain a more deferential approach, with success rates of less than 25% against acts of the regulatory bodies.⁹³ These rates in the regulatory field could indicate a softer national judicial ⁸⁷ For all, see the judgments CC No. 28/1991, of 14 February; 64/1991, of 22 March; 147/1996, of 19 September; 13/1998, of 22 January.

⁸⁸ Judgments CC No. 78/2010, of 20 October (Metropole case) and No. 145/2012, of 2 July (Iberdrola case).

⁸⁹ Order CC No. 86/2011, of 9 June (preliminary reference to the CJEU, case Melloni) and the derived judgment of the CC on the merits No. 26/2014, of 13 February.

⁹⁰ This research has been carried out based on the Annual Reports and Statistics published by the CC. However, this data is partial and therefore the conclusions and the success rate calculated by the authors are not definitive and should be taken as mere indicators.

⁹¹ Tridimas and Gari 2010, p. 170.

⁹² Fernández Rodríguez 2009, pp. 34–79.

⁹³ Esteve Pardo 2009, pp. 899–902; Betancor Rodríguez 2012, pp. 619–620.

review standard than the one sustained by the General Court and the CJEU when reviewing the decisions of the European Commission (success rate of 35%).⁹⁴ However, the national standard of review cannot adequately be compared with the CJEU standard due to the lack of publicly available data. Thus, it is not possible to make a conclusive assessment of this issue.

2.8.6 No significant issues have arisen in Spain.

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 The implementation of EU law has entailed challenges in Spain regarding the rule of law, the separation of powers doctrine and the territorial distribution of power. Three examples in this regard include: the obligation imposed by EU law to create independent regulatory bodies in certain markets, the increase of administrative regulations to implement EU measures and the weakening of the political autonomy of the Autonomous Communities.

In the energy and electronic communications sectors, the 2009 EU legislation has left no room for Member States to design their regulatory bodies: they must be separated and independent from the legislative and the executive powers.⁹⁵ In countries like Spain, unfamiliar with such administrative agencies outside the banking and financial sectors, the incorporation process of this new institutional design has been uneasy and has altered the traditional balance among the three branches of power. Several scholars have voiced concerns regarding the independence and judicial and parliamentary oversight of these regulatory bodies.⁹⁶ Following its creation, the European Commission expressed doubts about the independence and attribution of powers to the new Spanish super-regulator – with powers to regulate the energy, telecommunications, audiovisual, transport and postal sectors, as well as its monitoring and sanctioning powers to ensure effective competition in the market.⁹⁷ The Spanish Supreme Court has recently referred a ⁹⁴ Tridimas and Gari 2010, p. 170.

⁹⁵ Article 35(1)(4), Directive 2009/72/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 July 2009 concerning common rules for the internal market in electricity, [2009] OJ L 211/55; Art. 39(1)(4) Directive 2009/73/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 July 2009 concerning common rules for the internal market in natural gas, [2009] OJ 211/94; Art. 3 Directive 2009/140/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 25 November 2009 amending Directives 2002/21/EC on a common regulatory framework for electronic communications networks and services, 2002/19/EC on access to, and interconnection of, electronic communications networks and associated facilities, and 2002/20/EC on the authorisation of electronic communications networks and services, [2009] OJ L 377/37.

⁹⁶ Solanes Mullor 2014, pp. 443–463.

⁹⁷ Before 2013, Spain regulated these sectors through specialised and separate independent regulatory bodies. In 2013, Law 3/2013 of 4 June created the National Markets and Competition Commission (Comisión Nacional de los Mercados y la Competencia), which merged almost all the case to the CJEU for a preliminary ruling on the compatibility of the creation of the new super-regulator with EU law in these fields.⁹⁸

A similar problem arises also in relation to the increasing prominence of the executive vis-à-vis the legislative branch in implementing EU law. The obligation to comply with the deadlines for the implementation of directives and the necessity to directly apply EU regulations have justified the use of governmental regulations instead of legislative acts and, especially, the use of Royal Decree-Laws.⁹⁹ Royal Decree-Laws are in theory an exceptional legislative prerogative of the Government for ‘extraordinary and urgent situations’ (Art. 86 of the Constitution). A clear example of the misuse (and abuse) of Royal Decree-Laws is the implementation of the Services Directive by some Autonomous Communities whose Governments transposed it by Royal Decree-Law when the transposition deadline had already elapsed.¹⁰⁰

The approval of several national legislative measures under the pressure of EU law has undermined the political autonomy of the Autonomous Communities. First, Organic Law 2/2012 of 27 April on Budget Stability and Financial Sustainability has regulated the implications of the golden rule incorporated in Art. 135 of the Constitution and limited the financial autonomy of the Autonomous Communities. Article 135 of the Constitution requires the Autonomous Communities to pass balanced budgets, limits their capacity to issue public debt and, overall, imposes the supervision of their financial system by the Central Government and European institutions. In addition, the material powers and competences of the Autonomous Communities have been constrained as a consequence of legislative measures at the central level such as Law 20/2013 of 9 December on the Guarantee of the Internal Market (see Sect. 2.2). Finally, some austerity measures launched by the Central Government have had an impact on the self-organisation and personnel of the Autonomous Communities. For instance, the Central Government has imposed a reduction of the salaries of the civil servants of the Autonomous Communities, and recently the CC has upheld this measure declaring that the Central Government is existing specialised independent regulatory bodies (only the Stock Exchange Commission – Comisión Nacional del Mercado de Valores – was excluded). The European Commission raised doubts about the transition process and the independence of the appointed members of the existing regulatory bodies, which were dismissed before their mandate had expired. The powers of the new body were curtailed and some regulatory powers were reassigned to the Government. See in this regard the joint letter of the General Directorates of Competition, Energy, Telecommunications, Economy and Finance of the European Commission, sent to the Spanish Government on 29 November 2012, as well as the letter by Neelie Kroes, Vice-President of the European Commission, sent to José Manuel Soria, Spanish Minister of Industry, Energy and Tourism, on 11 February 2013.

⁹⁸ Order SC No. 5896/2015, of 3 July. The Spanish Supreme Court relied on the Hungarian case in which the CJEU decided that the dismissal of the appointed members of independent regulatory bodies before their mandate had expired was an attack against the independence of the regulators, and ruled that the creation of one super-regulator could not justify the dismissals (see Case C-288/12, European Commission v. Hungary [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:237).

⁹⁹ Sánchez Gutiérrez 2012, pp. 1–21; Alonso García 1990, pp. 297–302.

¹⁰⁰ Jiménez Asensio 2010, pp. 197–224.

entitled to take such measures and, therefore, to delve into the organisational structures of subnational entities.¹⁰¹

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 The CJEU has repeatedly declared that the constitutional traditions common to the Member States were one of the main sources of inspiration behind the interpretation of EU fundamental rights as general principles of EU law. Reference to the common constitutional traditions became a rhetorical clause that contributed to the legitimacy of sheer judicial activism in creating fundamental rights for the EU. The Lisbon Treaty retained the general principles of EU law as sources of fundamental rights ‘as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States’ (Art. 6(3) TEU). Nonetheless, after the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty, the Charter has displaced the general principles of EU law as the main source of EU fundamental rights in the CJEU case law. Still, Art. 52(4) of the Charter declares that ‘[i]n so far as this Charter recognises fundamental rights as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, those rights shall be interpreted in harmony with those traditions’.

2.10.2 The use that the CJEU has made of the comparative method has been sharply contested in the literature and regarded as discretionary and superficial.¹⁰² Despite the erratic use of the ‘common constitutional traditions’ clause, taking into account the pluralist nature of the EU compound polity, the coexistence of the Charter and the national constitutions, and the supranational nature of the CJEU, there are good reasons to make use of the comparative method in order to give meaning to Charter rights. Without denying the autonomy of EU fundamental rights, the CJEU ought to take into consideration the existence of common trends and divergences regarding the interpretation of fundamental rights. As argued elsewhere,

[t]his inter-state comparison would help to transcend superficial differences and to strengthen common understandings, while fostering an in-depth appraisal of pervasive particularities. In this way, the CJEU should seek to capture elements of commonality and assess elements of divergence in order to articulate an interpretation that reflects a synthetic understanding.¹⁰³

In order to perform this comparative analysis, the CJEU could obtain the information needed from several sources, including the CJEU Service of Research and Documentation, the Advocate General Opinions; non-judicial actors in procedures before the CJEU such as the Commission, Member State Governments and the parties; and also judicial actors, such as the national courts and the ECtHR.¹⁰⁴

¹⁰¹ Judgment CC No. 81/2015, of 30 April 2015.

¹⁰² Torres Pérez 2009, pp. 158–159; De Witte 1999, p. 878.

¹⁰³ Torres Pérez 2009, p. 168.

¹⁰⁴ Ibid., pp. 162–166.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 In Melloni, the CJEU had the chance to interpret Art. 53 of the Charter for the first time and held that:

Article 53 of the Charter confirms that, where an EU legal act calls for national implementing measures, national authorities and courts remain free to apply national standards of protection of fundamental rights, provided that the level of protection provided for by the Charter, as interpreted by the Court, and the primacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law are not thereby compromised.¹⁰⁵

Following the CJEU's interpretation of Art. 53 of the Charter, the chances to provide for more protective standards under national constitutions are rather limited.¹⁰⁶ Arguably, in situations not totally determined by EU law, such as in Åkerberg Fransson,¹⁰⁷ it might be possible to allow for better protection according to the national constitution, but only as long as the primacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law are not undermined, as the CJEU also stated in Åkerberg Fransson.

In practice, it will not always be easy to determine the margin of manoeuvre left to the Member States. Moreover, whether primacy, unity and effectiveness are compromised is a matter of interpretation. Indeed, we believe that the CJEU should not exclude the possibility for restrictions on those principles to be justified in certain circumstances, such as the need to respect national constitutional identity (Art. 4(2) TEU).

In cases where higher constitutional levels of protection are at issue, a more balanced and deferential approach by the CJEU would be advisable, instead of giving absolute preference to primacy, unity and effectiveness. Article 53 of the Charter could be interpreted as incorporating a mandate for the CJEU to allow for higher levels of constitutional protection, if there are no other rights or general interests that should prevail in the particular case.¹⁰⁸ A more deferential approach would allow the CJEU to accommodate diversity. For instance, the CJEU could have shown more deference in the review of affirmative action measures, such as in *Kalanke*¹⁰⁹ or Abrahamsson.¹¹⁰

In Spain, there are some instances in which EU law has had the effect of lowering the standards of rights protection. In addition to the EAW and the Data Retention Directive, in joined cases ASNEF and FECEMD for example,¹¹¹ the CJEU was questioned about the compatibility between the Data Protection ¹⁰⁵ See the Melloni case, supra n. 42, para. 60.

¹⁰⁶ Torres Pérez 2014, pp. 329–331, has criticised the CJEU's approach.

¹⁰⁷ Case C-617/10 Åkerberg Fransson [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2012:340.

¹⁰⁸ Torres Pérez 2014, p. 331.

¹⁰⁹ Case C-450/93 Kalanke v. Frei Hansestadt Bremen [1995] ECR I-03051.

¹¹⁰ Case C-407/98 Abrahamsson and Anderson [2000] ECR I-05539.

¹¹¹ Joined cases C-468/10 and C-469/10 ASNEF [2011] ECR I-12181.

Directive¹¹² and a domestic provision according to which data had to appear in public sources in order for the processing of personal data to be allowed in certain circumstances. The CJEU declared that ‘Member States cannot add new principles relating to the lawfulness of the processing of personal data to Article 7 of Directive 95/46 or impose additional requirements that have the effect of amending the scope of one of the six principles provided for in Article 7’.¹¹³ In particular, the CJEU considered that the national provision was precluded by the Directive since ‘it excluded in a categorical and generalised manner, the possibility of processing certain categories of personal data, without allowing the opposing rights and interests at issue to be balanced against each other in a particular case’.¹¹⁴

Thus, national legislation was precluded from providing better protection. The case did not reach the Constitutional Court, and it might actually be that the level of protection set by the EU legislator was compatible with the Constitution. Still, as a result of European integration, the level of protection of the right to privacy has been lowered.

Also, in the context of immigration, EU law might have had the effect of restricting certain fundamental rights. According to the Return Directive,¹¹⁵ third country nationals can be detained up to 6 months while they are awaiting expulsion. This period may be extended for a further 12 months. Several Member States amended their respective legislation following the transposition of the Return Directive to increase the maximum length of detention, such as Greece, Italy, Spain and Hungary. In Spain, the maximum length of detention increased from 40 to 60 days. Greece and Italy went from 6 months and 3 months, respectively, to 18 months each. Thus, in some countries, the room for manoeuvre left by the Directive had the effect of worsening restrictions on the right to liberty.

Also, according to Art. 15(3) of the Return Directive: ‘In every case, detention shall be reviewed at reasonable intervals of time either on application by the third-country national concerned or ex officio. In the case of prolonged detention periods, reviews shall be subject to the supervision of a judicial authority.’ In the Mahdi case,¹¹⁶ the CJEU held that ‘EU law does not preclude national legislation from providing ... that the authority which reviews the detention of a third-country national at reasonable intervals ... must adopt, on the conclusion of each review, an express measure containing the factual and legal reasons justifying the measure adopted. Such an obligation would arise solely under national law’. Given the serious restriction on a fundamental right allowed by the Directive, revision should ¹¹² Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 October 1995 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data, [1995] OJ L 281/31.

¹¹³ Joined cases C-468/10 and C-469/10 ASNEF, supra n. 111, para. 32.

¹¹⁴ Ibid. para. 48.

¹¹⁵ Directive 2008/115/EC of the European Parliament and the Council of 16 December on common standards and procedures in Member States for returning illegally staying third-country nationals, [2008] OJ L 348/98.

¹¹⁶ Case C-146/14 Mahdi [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:1320.

not be limited to rubber-stamping a previous decision to hold a person in custody. Indeed, a reasoned decision should be required as a matter of EU law, and this should not just be left to the Member States to decide. To be sure, in this context, the CJEU allowed for better protection at the Member State level, but it did not require it as a matter of EU law. This approach, however, might have an adverse effect and lead to a lowering of the standards of rights protection in other Member States.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1–2.12.3 The adoption (and implementation) of the Framework Decision on the EAW and the Data Retention Directive have not spurred a robust democratic debate, and public deliberation has been rather lacking. However, scholars have shown concern and adopted a critical position towards these instruments.¹¹⁷

In Spain, to our knowledge, there has been no situation in which constitutional issues have arisen and have been referred to the Constitutional Court at the stage of implementing EU law. In any event, we would support a recommendation to suspend the application and carry out a review of EU measures, if important constitutional issues were raised by a number of constitutional courts.

If an infringement proceeding has been initiated against a Member State and it alleges that implementation is hindered because an unconstitutionality has been identified in accordance with the domestic system of control of constitutionality, EU institutions should take this argument seriously and examine the possibility to embrace the interpretation of the fundamental right at stake at the EU level or rather to accommodate diversity, along the lines developed in the previous section. Moreover, the constitutional identity clause (Art. 4(2) TEU) may well have some bite in this context.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 While EU law has contributed to furthering the protection of constitutional rights in certain fields, it has undermined the level of protection in others. On the one hand, for instance, the protection afforded by the Spanish Constitution to the right to non-discrimination has been enhanced by making reference to EU law provisions and the CJEU case law. As such, the notion of indirect discrimination on grounds of sex is built on the CJEU case law and the relevant Directives.¹¹⁸ Also, regarding non-discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation, which is not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution, the CC has referred to the Charter and several Directives that explicitly ban discrimination on this ground.¹¹⁹

¹¹⁷ Regarding the EAW, see Arangüena Fanego 2003, pp. 11–95; Fonseca Morillo 2003, pp. 69–95; De la Quadra-Salcedo Janini 2006, pp. 277–303. Regarding the Data Retention Directive, see Rodotà 2006, pp. 53–60; Vilasau 2006, pp. 1–15.

Moreover, the CJEU case law has had an important impact regarding the protection of the right to housing in the context of the economic crisis and the creeping number of evictions in Spain. However, the CJEU has approached these cases from the perspective of consumer protection and the right to a fair trial, rather than the right to housing as such.¹²⁰

On the other hand, EU integration might also have the effect of undermining the national standard of rights' protection. In Spain, the Melloni case stands out as a clear example of the lowering of standards of constitutional protection to fulfil obligations under EU law, since the CC had no choice but to overrule settled case law after the preliminary ruling.

Regarding the right to privacy and the protection of personal data, while the CC had made use of the Charter to reinforce the constitutional protection in certain cases, the implementation of the Data Retention Directive mandated the incorporation of the blanket data retention rule that has not been amended after the annulment of the Data Retention Directive by the CJEU. Also, as seen above, internal legislation providing for higher protection of personal data was declared incompatible with EU law. With regard to immigration, national legislation was amended to increase the maximum length of detention of third country nationals who are subject to return procedures under the umbrella of the Return Directive.

In the context of the economic and financial crisis, the adoption of austerity measures to fulfil obligations of budget stability has led to curtailing social rights,¹²¹ such as the right to healthcare. The reform of the healthcare system has been challenged before the CC and the decision is still pending.

On the whole, there are several fields in which EU integration has led to a reduction of the levels of protection that individuals once enjoyed. In some cases, the lowering of standards has clashed with the Constitution. Nonetheless, even if the lower protection does not impinge upon the Constitution, it is disturbing that the level of rights protection is eventually reduced as a consequence of obligations derived under EU law.

¹¹⁸ See, among others, judgments CC No. 147/1995, of 16 October; 240/1999, of 20 December; 253/2004, of 22 December; 3/2007, of 15 January.

¹¹⁹ Judgment CC No. 41/2006, of 13 February.

¹²⁰ See Sect. 3.5.

¹²¹ González Pascual 2014, pp. 117–120.

2.13.2–2.13.4 How could such an unwelcome result be avoided? Admittedly, EU integration might imply reducing the level of constitutional rights protection in some instances. The EU general interest or other competing rights might justify a restriction on the level of constitutional protection, but only when such an outcome is strictly necessary and cannot be avoided.

Within the domain of the EU, first of all, throughout the legislative process, the potential violation of the Charter or the need to give room to allow for better protection at the national level should be taken into consideration.¹²² Once legislation has been adopted and a case reaches the CJEU, the Court should not disparage claims regarding constitutional protection for the sake of an absolute understanding of primacy and effectiveness. The CJEU might consider whether to embrace the constitutional understanding as the most adequate interpretation of the corresponding Charter right or accommodate diversity through the exercise of deference. The use of the comparative method by the CJEU in interpreting fundamental rights could be helpful for identifying common trends in the EU, as well as the adequate scope of deference.¹²³ In any event, and particularly if the outcome involves lowering the standards of rights protection, enhanced responsiveness to arguments grounded on the constitutional protection of fundamental rights would be advisable, given the pluralist nature of the EU and the pervasive contestation of its ultimate authority. For instance, in Melloni, one might agree that the countervailing interests and values, such as the need to effectively fight crime and protect victims' rights, in a context of mutual recognition, outweighed individual protection, as the person concerned had been informed and represented by lawyers of his choice. Nonetheless, a better articulation of the balancing of the conflicting rights and principles would have been welcomed, instead of an absolute understanding of primacy and effectiveness of EU law, since, in the end, the CJEU mandated the CC to lower the level of constitutional protection.¹²⁴

In turn, a more proactive role for domestic courts, and particularly constitutional and supreme courts, in highlighting the standard of protection of constitutional rights through a robust use of the preliminary reference would facilitate the awareness of the impact of EU law on the constitutional system, and offer the CJEU the possibility to interpret the Charter accordingly or accommodate diverse interpretations. In the end, the building of a set of common rights can only successfully be achieved through the cooperation of domestic courts and the CJEU through a process of continuous dialogue, understood as the exchange of arguments in order to reach common understandings about the interpretation of fundamental rights.¹²⁵

¹²² De Witte 2013, pp. 1523–1538.

¹²³ Torres Pérez 2009, pp. 153–155.

¹²⁴ Torres Pérez 2014, p. 318.

¹²⁵ Torres Pérez 2009, pp. 179–184.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 The Government is charged with the negotiation and ratification of international treaties. However, in some cases, the prior consent of Parliament is necessary. According to the Spanish constitutional framework, international treaties are classified into three types taking into account the degree of participation of Parliament in the ratification process. First, international treaties that transfer constitutional powers to international organisations are subject to the consent of Parliament through an organic law, which requires an absolute majority (Art. 93 of the Constitution). Secondly, legislative consent by simple majority is required in the case of international treaties on specific matters, such as treaties that involve fundamental rights or financial obligations for Spain (Art. 94(1) of the Constitution).¹²⁶ Finally, in all other instances, the Government shall simply inform Parliament of the conclusion of international treaties and agreements (Art. 94(2) of the Constitution).

Besides the participation of Parliament in the process of ratifying international treaties, the Spanish Constitution also attributes a role to the CC. Prior to ratification, the Government or Parliament may consult the CC and seek a decision stating whether there is a conflict between the Spanish Constitution and the treaty (Art. 95(2) of the Constitution). In the case of a declaration of incompatibility, the treaty may only be ratified if the Constitution is amended accordingly. The CC's intervention prior to ratification is not mandatory, since the CC only intervenes at the request of the Government or Parliament; however, if an action for ex ante review of an international treaty is lodged, the decision of the CC is binding.

These provisions do not establish any explicit limit to the delegation of constitutional powers or the values, principles or objectives that should be respected by international organisations of which Spain is a member. Neither of these provisions contains a reference to any specific international organisation. Only in the context of the Spanish membership in the European Union and the implications of EU law for national law has the CC stated its position in relation to the limits of delegation of constitutional powers to international organisations. The legal scholarship has also debated this issue in connection with the EU debate.¹²⁷

¹²⁶ The treaties are the following: '(a) of political nature; (b) of a military nature; (c) affecting the territorial integrity of the State or the fundamental rights and duties established under Part 1; (d) implying financial liabilities for the Public Treasury; (e) involving amendment or repeal of some law or requiring legislative measures for their execution'.

¹²⁷ See Sect. 1.3.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1–3.2.2 The Constitution establishes that international treaties shall be part of the internal legal system once officially published (Art. 96(1)). Thus, the Constitution encapsulates a sort of ‘moderate monism’, in the sense that only official publication is required for an international treaty to be binding domestically.

There is consensus about the position of international law in relation to domestic legislation (leaving aside the Constitution). Article 96(1) of the Constitution establishes that the provisions of an international treaty ‘may only be repealed, amended or suspended in the manner provided for in the treaties themselves or in accordance with the general rules of international law’. Thus, it is understood that international law enjoys ‘passive resistance’ vis-à-vis domestic legislation in the sense that domestic legislation cannot modify international law. Consequently, Spanish judges are allowed to directly set aside domestic legislation in the case of incompatibility with international law. Yet, international treaties are not deemed to be hierarchically superior to legislative norms, since their interaction is established in terms of applicability rather than validity.

The position of international law with regard to the Constitution is still an open debate confronting constitutional and international law scholars. For constitutionalists, international law is subordinated to the Constitution¹²⁸ because: (i) Art. 95(1) of the Constitution requires the prior amendment of the Constitution in the case of ratifying a treaty that is incompatible with the Constitution; and (ii) the CC is able to declare an international treaty unconstitutional after its ratification.¹²⁹ For international lawyers and scholars, these reasons are inconclusive and they argue for the superiority of international law over the Constitution.¹³⁰

Beyond this debate, the special status of international treaties on human rights ratified by Spain should be highlighted. According to Art. 10(2) of the Constitution, fundamental rights and freedoms recognised by the Constitution shall be interpreted in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and other international treaties and agreements protecting human rights. These treaties, therefore, are considered to be a constitutional canon of interpretation.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 The Constitution does not give a decisive role to Parliament in the ratification and oversight of international treaties. The Government is in charge of the negotiations at the international level, while Parliament shall consent prior to the ratification by means of a simple or qualified majority depending on the type and ¹²⁸ See the seminal work of Pérez Royo 1998, pp. 167–172.

¹²⁹ Article 27(2)(c), Organic Law 2/1979 of 3 October on the Spanish Constitutional Court.

¹³⁰ For instance, see Marín López 1999, pp. 65–67.

content of the treaty.¹³¹ In certain cases, the role of Parliament is reduced to a minimum and it must only be informed of the ratification of the treaty.

In the case of treaties falling under Art. 93 of the Constitution, there are no specific rules that qualify the legislative process for organic laws. In the case of treaties falling under Art. 94(1) of the Constitution, the authorisation does not have a legislative nature and the process contains some specificities (Art. 74(2) of the Constitution): the legislative initiative can only originate in Congress and, in the event of a disagreement between Congress and the Senate, a Mixed Committee will be constituted; if the disagreement persists, Congress will decide by qualified majority. These specific rules bolster the role of the Senate in comparison with its role in the ordinary legislative process, although Congress retains the last word.

Despite these rules, the effective involvement of and control by Parliament in the ratification process is doubtful. The Government has the ‘qualification power’, i.e. determines the type of treaty (i.e. decides whether Arts. 93, 94(1) or 94(2) is applicable to a treaty, see above) and therefore also decides on the level of participation of Parliament. In this decision, the Government has to request the opinion of the Council of State – the supreme consultative body of the Government – but this opinion is not binding.¹³² Parliament, however, has reassessed the qualification on several occasions.¹³³ The Government also decides on the provisional application of a treaty, with the possibility to delay the submission of the treaty to Parliament for consent.¹³⁴ Most importantly, experience shows that parliamentary debates are without substance, being, in the vast majority of cases, a mere formality.¹³⁵

The subsequent control mechanisms of Parliament for scrutinising the application of a treaty or the activities of the international organisation do not improve this poor initial role of Parliament. The Constitution does not foresee any special mechanism and the relevant international treaty determines the role of Parliament. We are only aware of special mechanisms in relation to the role of national parliaments in the European Union (Protocol No. 1 to the TFEU).

3.3.2 In line with the limited oversight of Parliament, referendum is scarcely used in Spain in the ratification process or subsequent oversight of an international treaty. There is neither a specific provision establishing the obligation to hold a referendum nor the ban of this instrument for this purpose. As stated above, Art. 92 of the Constitution allows the Government to call a consultative referendum on ‘political decisions of special importance’. This kind of referendum, which is not binding, has been used only twice, precisely regarding international treaties. These two experiences have shown that the referendums were used for strategic political decisions

¹³¹ See Sect. 3.1.

¹³² Article 5(1)(e), Law 50/1997 of 27 November on the Government and Art. 22(1), Organic Law 3/1980 of 22 April on the Council of State.

¹³³ Izquierdo Sans 2002, pp. 24–27.

¹³⁴ Ibid. p. 19.

¹³⁵ Ibid., pp. 29–30.

rather than to enhance the democratic legitimacy of the ratification of a particular treaty.

Spain became a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) on 30 May 1982, in the context of strong social and political contestation against it. In October 1982, the recently elected socialist Government had advocated for Spain's withdrawal from NATO. However, international commitments and alliances made the new Government change this initial position. In 1986, the Spanish Government decided to call a referendum to enable citizens to have a say on the continuity of the country's membership to NATO.¹³⁶ The Government mounted a political campaign in favour of remaining in NATO. The referendum was used on this occasion to legitimise a controversial change of the Government's position rather than to enhance democratic legitimacy.

The second and last referendum was held in 2005 by the Spanish Government prior to the ratification of the Treaty Establishing a Constitution for Europe, as mentioned before.¹³⁷ Again, the referendum was used strategically to achieve political purposes at EU level – to bolster the EU Constitution against more sceptical countries – rather than to exclusively enhance democracy in the national sphere where the positive outcome could be clearly anticipated before the referendum. The turnout was rather low (42.32% of the voters).

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 The CC is in charge of reviewing the constitutionality of international treaties. According to Art. 95(2) of the Constitution, the CC can be consulted on whether an international treaty is compatible with the Constitution prior to its ratification (ex ante judicial review). In the case of no prior consultation, a ratified treaty can also be declared unconstitutional according to Art. 27(2) of Law 2/1979 of 3 October (ex post judicial review).

In practice, the CC has hardly ever reviewed the constitutionality of an international treaty. Only on two occasions – in 1992 and 2004 – was the CC consulted prior to ratification, first in relation to the Maastricht Treaty and secondly with regard to the Treaty Establishing a Constitution for Europe, which were discussed in Sects. 1.2.3 and 1.3.

The judicial review of international law is even more limited due to the fact that ordinary courts are not entitled to review international treaties. As mentioned above, a conflict between domestic legislation and a treaty should be resolved in favour of the treaty, which entails the disapplication of domestic legislation ('passive resistance' of treaties). In the case of the suspected incompatibility of a treaty with the Constitution, the judge should submit a question of constitutionality to the CC. In any event, if the CC were to find that the Constitution and a treaty were incompatible, it would declare the respective international legal provision to be unconstitutional, but it would not have the power to annul it. Consequently, that provision could not be applied internally, and Spain might incur responsibility under public international law.

¹³⁶ Royal Decree 214/1986 of 6 February.

¹³⁷ Royal Decree 5/2005 of 14 January.

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1–3.5.2 The 1978 Spanish Constitution encapsulates economic, social and cultural rights, but provides a lower level of protection for them than in the case of civil and political rights (see Sect 2.1.1). Most of these rights are categorised as ‘principles governing economic and social policy’ (Title I, Chap. III).¹³⁸ Only some social rights, such as the right to education, are placed in the section providing maximum protection within the Constitution. This lower level of protection for the majority of social rights means that an individual complaint before the CC is not available and, most importantly, that the legislator enjoys more leeway when regulating economic, social and cultural rights. In short, constitutional constraints and barriers are weaker in this field.¹³⁹

Despite the lower level of constitutional protection, Spain has developed a strong social welfare state, including a universal public healthcare system, a solid social security system (with unemployment benefits, public pensions and disability pensions), strong social services and, finally, a public educational system in all levels (primary, secondary and higher education). Globalisation and, in particular, the consequences of the global economic and financial crisis have had a negative impact on the Spanish social welfare state, which has been subject to strong pressure. Financial markets, international organisations, the EU and the IMF at the forefront have pressed Spain to adopt an agenda of structural reforms, i.e. a severe austerity reform programme.¹⁴⁰

In April 2009, the European Commission initiated an excessive deficit procedure against Spain.¹⁴¹ Moreover, Spain has been signalled as a country with ¹³⁸ Inter alia, within Chap. III, the Spanish Constitution recognises the right to social security (Art. 41), the right to healthcare (Art. 43), the right to environment (Art. 45) and the right to housing (Art. 47).

¹³⁹ See Art. 53(3) of the Constitution for the diminished protection of economic, social and cultural rights that are recognised in Chap. III. For a common understanding amongst the Spanish scholarship of social rights as non-enforceable rights, see Díaz Crego 2012, pp. 17–20.

¹⁴⁰ The Spanish Governments have taken measures in all fields, inter alia, the reduction of protection in the case of unemployment, the reform of public pensions and cutting funding to the public education and the healthcare systems. For the implications for the Spanish constitutional system, see González Pascual 2014, pp. 116–127.

¹⁴¹ Council Decision 2009/417/EC of 27 April 2009 on existence of an excessive deficit in Spain. The Council’s Recommendations 15764/09 ECOFIN 775 UEM 301; 12171/12 ECOFIN 669 UEM 252; 10560/1/13 ECOFIN 478 UEM 173 OC 361 to Spain with a view to bringing an end to the situation of an excessive government deficit, follow upon the procedure.

macroeconomic imbalances by the Alert Mechanism Report (AMR).¹⁴² Following this mechanism, Spain was subject to an in-depth review and, as a result, was requested to adopt reforms in the labour market and the social security scheme (with special attention to the pension system). Finally, despite the fact that Spain has not been subject to a formal bailout, the banking rescue programme for Spanish financial institutions in 2012 has implied, in practice, an international intervention in several Spanish financial institutions. The memorandum of understanding signed between Spain and the Troika (the European Commission, the European Central Bank and the IMF) has imposed obligations on financial institutions, but the State is the ultimate accountable party and has to accept the austerity reform programme as a condition for access to the financial assistance granted by the Troika. Precisely, based on the reports of the Troika and the financial assistance provided to the Spanish financial institutions, the Government has challenged several Autonomous Communities' laws protecting the right to housing in the CC, alleging that these laws can jeopardise financial stability;¹⁴³ these have been declared unconstitutional¹⁴⁴ or temporarily suspended by the CC.¹⁴⁵ In short, Spain has launched a massive austerity programme that has impacted all areas of the welfare state. Inter alia, health and education expenditures along with social assistance to dependents have been reduced, and the conditions for receipt of public pensions have been made more restrictive.¹⁴⁶

The austerity reform programme has been widely contested politically by the leftist parties and socially by NGOs and other platforms. Yet, with some exceptions,¹⁴⁷ ordinary courts and the CC have not been able to confront the challenges to the social welfare state. So far, the CC has remained a passive spectator.

¹⁴² Alert Mechanism Report 2014 COM (2013) 790 final of 13 November 2013 (Spain was signalled as a country with 'excessive imbalances', the worst classification) and Alert Mechanism Report 2015 COM (2014) 904 final of 28 November 2014 (the Commission reclassified Spain as a country with only 'imbalances', recognising the improved position of the country).

¹⁴³ Law 4/2013 of 1 October on Measures to Protect the Social Function of Housing of the Autonomous Community of Andalusia and Law 24/2013 of 2 July on Urgent Measures to Guarantee the Right to Housing of the Autonomous Community of Navarra. Inter alia, this legislation provides for the temporary suspension of evictions.

¹⁴⁴ In a recent judgment, the CC has declared unconstitutional some housing measures launched by the Andalusian Government through Decree-Law 6/2013 of 9 April. This Decree-Law included some measures that were subsequently incorporated in Law 4/2013 of 1 October, now temporarily suspended by the CC. The declared unconstitutionality is based on the use of the Decree-Law (this instrument cannot be used to regulate the right to property) and the lack of competence of the Autonomous Communities to expropriate inhabited houses in the context of an eviction procedure. Again, the CC has not approached the right to housing from a substantive point of view and has only faced it indirectly in light of a source of law issue or a conflict of competences between territorial entities. See Judgment CC No. 93/2015, of 14 May 2015.

¹⁴⁵ Order CC No. 69/2014, of 10 February and No. 115/2014, of 8 April.

¹⁴⁶ See González Pascual 2014, pp. 117–120.

¹⁴⁷ See Sect. 2.7.

Moreover, for instance, the CC struck down a law passed by the Autonomous Community of Andalusia to enhance the right to housing.¹⁴⁸

Paradoxically, in certain cases, protection in the social welfare area has come from the CJEU, the ECtHR and the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR). Facing the inaction of the CC, in the last years ordinary courts have turned towards the CJEU seeking collaboration to deal with some of the negative effects of the economic crisis.¹⁴⁹ For instance, the CJEU gave protection to Spanish citizens against evictions, declaring the Spanish mortgage law unfair for the consumer.¹⁵⁰ The Spanish legislation did not allow, in mortgage enforcement proceedings, for the debtor to claim the existence of unfair terms or for the competent court to stay this kind of proceeding to adopt interim measures.¹⁵¹ Moreover, a debtor against whom mortgage enforcement proceedings were brought was precluded from lodging an appeal against any decision of the judge of first instance to dismiss his objection to enforcement.¹⁵² The decisions of the CJEU in the Aziz and Sánchez Morcillo cases, declaring the Spanish legislation incompatible with EU law (based, inter alia, on incompatibility with Art. 47 of the Charter), have had a significant impact in the context of the economic crisis and have led to the amendment of Spanish mortgage law. On the other hand, the ECtHR is timidly providing protection also in this field through interim measures aimed at paralysing evictions.¹⁵³ Finally, in the first decision taken under the individual communication mechanism provided by the Optional Protocol, the CESCR concluded that Spain violated the right to housing (Art. 11 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural rights, in conjunction with Art. 2.1) because its courts failed to take all reasonable measures to adequately notify Ms. I.D.G that the lending institution had filed a mortgage foreclosure against her.¹⁵⁴

¹⁴⁸ See supra n. 144.

¹⁴⁹ Gómez Pomar and Lyczkowska 2014, pp. 7–10.

¹⁵⁰ See Iglesias Sánchez 2014, pp. 955–974.

¹⁵¹ Case C-415/11 Aziz [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:164.

¹⁵² Article 695(4), of Law 1/2000 of 7 January on Civil Procedure; Case C-169/14 Sánchez Morcillo and Abril García [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2099.

¹⁵³ Interim measures taken by the ECtHR in the A.M.B. and others case on 12 December 2012, the Mohamed Raji and others case on 31 January 2013 and in the Salt case on 15 October 2013. However, the ECtHR has not decided on the merits of either case. In A.M.B. and others the ECtHR lifted the interim measures and declared inadmissible the complaint because of the non-exhaustion of domestic remedies (case A.M.B and others v. Spain, no. 77842/12, decision of 28 January 2014). In relation to the Mohamed Raji case, the ECtHR struck the application from its list of cases (case Mohamed Raji and others v. Spain, no. 3637/13, decision of 16 December 2014) because the Madrid city council decided not to enforce the demolition and eviction proceedings. In the Salt case, on 6 November 2013, the ECtHR lifted the interim measures because the Spanish authorities gave guarantees of alternative housing for the families concerned.

¹⁵⁴ Decision CESCR on the individual communication No. 2/2014, of 17 June 2015 (reference E/C.12/55/D/2/2014).

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

Global governance has influenced and transformed certain values of the Spanish constitutional framework. The fight against terrorism – global and national – and the phenomenon of immigration are only some examples.

First, the transformations of Spanish criminal law on terrorism and organised crime should be highlighted. Beyond the EAW, these transformations have implied serious challenges to the rule of law and the principle of proportionality. These changes include the criminalisation of new conducts such as the extension of the concept of terrorist crime to mere collaboration with the aim to constitute a terrorist organisation (Art. 576(1) of the Criminal Code, approved by Organic Law 10/1995 of 23 November), the ‘individual terrorism’ conduct without connection to a criminal organisation (Art. 577 of the Criminal Code), or the mere defence of terrorism (Art. 578 of the Criminal Code). In connection to this, the close relationship of Spain with the United States in fighting terrorism has raised strong criticism in relation to the collaboration of Spain in the secret detention and unlawful inter-state transfers of suspected terrorists.¹⁵⁵

Secondly, also in the context of the fight against terrorism, the law adopted in Spain to ban political parties (Organic Law 6/2002 of 27 June on Political Parties) is still contested. The right of association (Art. 22 of the Constitution) and the right to vote (Art. 23 of the Constitution) are at the forefront of the debate. The measures introduced by Organic Law 6/2002 were highly controversial, including, inter alia, the regulation of a specific procedure of illegalisation before a specialised section of the SC (Art. 11), the effects of the illegalisation decision for future associations (Art. 12), and the detailed clauses for illegalisation of a political party (Art. 9). This has led to the characterisation of Spain as a militant democracy. Yet in several judgments, the ECtHR has endorsed these measures.¹⁵⁶ Moreover, the so-called Parot doctrine adopted by the SC in 2006, aimed at extending the sentence of terrorists whose convictions are about to end, raised serious issues in relation to legal certainty, unexpected changes in the case law and the principle of non-imposition of heavier penalties than the ones that were applicable at the time that the criminal offence was committed. Eventually, this doctrine was declared incompatible with the ECHR by the Strasbourg Court.¹⁵⁷

¹⁵⁵ Marty, D. Alleged secret detentions and unlawful inter-state transfers of detainees involving Council of Europe member states. Report of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (Committee on Legal Affairs and Human Rights), 12 June 2006.

¹⁵⁶ See for instance, case Etxeberria and Others v. Spain, nos. 35579/03, 35613/03, 35626/03, 35634/03, judgment of 6 November 2009.

¹⁵⁷ In 2006, the SC ruled that for crimes committed before the current Criminal Code came into effect in 1995, reductions would no longer apply to the accumulative maximum sentence of 30 years, but to the absolute total term of the sentence (judgment SC No. 197/2006, of 20 February). The CC ratified and declared constitutional this interpretation by the SC (judgment CC No. 114/2012, of 24 May). The ECtHR declared a violation of Arts. 5(1) and 7 of the ECHR (see Del Rio Prada v. Spain [GC], no. 42750/09, judgment of 21 October 2013).

Finally, the global phenomenon of immigration, combined with the economic and financial crisis, has also produced tensions in relation to welfare rights, the right to a fair trial, the right not to be discriminated against and, above all, the more basic principle of human dignity. Several humanitarian crises on Spanish borders – the attempt by immigrants to surpass the fences of Ceuta and Melilla – have been a constant in the last years. The refortification of the fences, the treatment of the incoming immigrants by the police – reported deaths and mistreatments on the fences – and the deportations by public authorities are some of the challenges for the more basic human rights on Spanish soil. Along the same line of fighting illegal immigration, a 2003 reform established a mechanism for the automatic expulsion from Spanish territory of illegal immigrants sentenced to prison for less than six years.¹⁵⁸ The law does not provide for proportionality or a balancing test for taking into account all the personal and general interests in a particular case. The SC, however, reinterpreted this article in a constitutional spirit and introduced a balancing test.¹⁵⁹

As it has been put, the Spanish constitutional system is ‘under stress’.¹⁶⁰ European and global governance, and particularly the economic and financial crisis, have had a deep impact on basic constitutional values and principles such as the welfare state, the territorial distribution of power and the democratic legitimization of governmental powers. The consequences of this new scenario are hard to predict and might result in social contestation against the transformed constitutional framework. Indeed, there are already social and political signs in this direction, such as the emergence of new political parties and groups deeply opposed to the austerity measures. In any event, it seems necessary to recast the relationship between the Global-European spheres and the national constitutional order so as to reinforce basic principles such as democracy, the rule of law and a high level of protection of fundamental rights.

References

- Albertí Rovira E. (2006) La cláusula europea en la Reforma de la Constitución española (The European integration clause in the reform of the Spanish Constitution). In: Álvarez Junco J., Rubio Llorente F. (eds.) El Informe del Consejo de Estado sobre la reforma constitucional: texto del informe y debates académicos (The Report of the Council of State about the constitutional reform: text of the report and academic debates). Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales/Consejo de Estado, Madrid, pp. 457–482.

¹⁵⁸ Article 89 of the Criminal Code, as amended by Organic Law 11/2003 of 29 September.

¹⁵⁹ See for all, judgment SC No. 588/2012, of 29 June.

¹⁶⁰ González Pascual 2014, pp. 116–127.

- Alonso García R. (1990) Sobre la posibilidad de desarrollo del Derecho comunitario a través de la técnica del Decreto-Ley (The possibility of applying EU law through royal decree-laws). Revista de Administración Pública 123:297–302.
- Alonso García R. (2006) Reforma constitucional: la recepción en la Constitución del proceso de construcción europea (Constitutional reform: the reception of European integration in the Constitution). In: Álvarez Junco J., Rubio Llorente F. (eds.) El Informe del Consejo de Estado sobre la reforma constitucional: texto del informe y debates académicos (The Report of the Council of State about the constitutional reform: text of the report and academic debates). Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales/Consejo de Estado, Madrid, pp. 557–561.
- Arangüena Fanego C. (2003) La orden europea de detención y entrega. Análisis de las leyes 2 y 3 de 14 de marzo de 2003, de transposición al ordenamiento jurídico español de la decisión marco sobre la ‘Euroorden’ (The EAW. Analysis of Laws 2 and 3 of 14 May 2003, regarding the transposition of the EAW framework decision into the Spanish legal system). Revista de Derecho Penal 10:11–95.
- Arroyo Jiménez L. (2011) Sobre la primera cuestión prejudicial planteada por el Tribunal Constitucional. Bases, contenido y consecuencias (About the first preliminary reference of the Spanish Constitutional Court. Bases, content and consequences). Indret, Revista para el análisis del derecho, 4:1–25.
- Betancor Rodríguez A. (2012) Regulación: Mito y Derecho. Desmontando el mito para controlar la intervención de los reguladores económicos (Regulation: myth and law. Dismantling the myth of reviewing the decisions of regulatory agencies). Civitas, Cizur Menor.
- Blanco Baldés R. (2011) La reforma de 2011: de las musas al teatro (The reform of 2011: from contemplation to action). Claves de la razón práctica 216:8–18.
- Brkan M. (2013) L’arrêt Melloni: nouvelle pierre dans la mosaïque de la protection des droits fondamentaux dans l’Union européenne. Revue des affaires européennes 1:139–145.
- Bustos Gisbert R. (2009) Integración europea y constitución española: ¿Tancredismo, desnudez o invisibilidad? (European integration and the Spanish Constitution: Risk, nudity or invisibility?). In: García Roca J., Albertí Rovira E. (eds.) Trenta años de Constitución (30 years of the Constitution). Tirant lo Blanch, Valencia, pp. 401–428.
- Carrera S., Guild E., Hernanz N. (2013) Europe’s most wanted? Recalibrating Trust in the European Arrest Warrant System. CEPS paper in Liberty and Security in Europe 55:1–46.
- Cedeño Hernán M. (2010) Vulneración indirecta de derechos fundamentales y juicio en ausencia en el ámbito de la orden europea de detención y entrega, a propósito de la STC 199/2009, de 28 de septiembre (Indirect violation of fundamental rights and in absentia trials in the context of the EAW: a commentary to the judgment CC 1999/2009, of 28 September). Revista General de Derecho Europeo 20:1–15.
- Cruz Villalón P. (2006a) Europeanización de la Constitución española: una introducción al problema (Europeanisation of the Spanish Constitution: an introduction to the problem). In: Cruz Villalón, P. (ed.) Hacia la europeización de la Constitución española. La adaptación de la Constitución española al marco constitucional de la Unión Europea (Towards the Europeanisation of the Spanish Constitution: The adaptation of the Spanish Constitution to the constitutional framework of the European Union). Fundación BBVA, Bilbao, pp. 23–48.
- Cruz Villalón P. (2006b) La cláusula general europea (The European general clause). In: Cruz Villalón P. (ed.) Hacia la europeización de la Constitución española. La adaptación de la Constitución española al marco constitucional de la Unión Europea (Towards the Europeanisation of the Spanish Constitution: The adaptation of the Spanish Constitution to the constitutional framework of the European Union). Fundación BBVA, Bilbao, pp. 51–74.
- De Boer N. (2013) Addressing Rights Divergences under the Charter: Melloni. CML Rev. 50:1083–1104.
- De la Quadra Salcedo Janini T. (2006) El encaje constitucional del nuevo sistema europeo de detención y entrega (Reflexiones tras la STC 177/2006, de 5 de junio) (The constitutionality of the EAW (Notes after the judgment CC No. 177/2006 of 5 June)). Revista española de derecho constitucional 78:277–303.

- De Witte B. (1999) The Past and Future of the European Court of Justice in the Protection of Human Rights. In: Alston, P. (ed.) The EU and Human Rights. Oxford University Press, Oxford, pp. 859–898.
- De Witte B. (2013) Article 53. In: Peers S., Hervey T., Kenner J., Ward A. (eds.) The EU Charter of Fundamental Rights. A Commentary. Hart Publishing, Oxford, pp. 1523–1538.
- Díaz Crego M. (2012) Derechos sociales y amparo constitucional (Social rights and the individual constitutional complaint). Revista vasca de administración pública 94:17–47.
- Díez-Hochleitner J. (2013) El derecho a la última palabra: ¿Tribunales constitucionales o Tribunal de Justicia de la Unión? (The right to the last word: Constitutional Courts or the CJEU?). WP IDEIR 17:1–38.
- Escobar Hernández C. (2006) La cláusula europea en la Constitución española: algunas reflexiones para una eventual reforma constitucional (The European integration clause in the Spanish Constitution: some thoughts for a possible constitutional reform). In: Álvarez Junco J., Rubio Llorente F. (eds.) El Informe del Consejo de Estado sobre la reforma constitucional: texto del informe y debates académicos (The Report of the Council of State about the constitutional reform: text of the report and academic debates). Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales/Consejo de Estado, Madrid, pp. 483–499.
- Esteve Pardo J. (2009) La revisión judicial de las decisiones de las autoridades reguladoras (Judicial review of decisions of regulatory agencies). In: Muñoz Machado S., Esteve Pardo J. (eds.) Derecho de la regulación económica (Regulatory Law). Iustel, Madrid, pp. 881–921.
- Fernández Rodríguez T. (2009) De la arbitrariedad de la administración, 3^a ed (About the arbitrariness of the public administration, 3rd edn.). Civitas, Cizur Menor.
- Ferreres Comella V. (2000) Una defensa de la rigidez constitucional (A defense of the constitutional rigidity). Cuadernos de filosofía del derecho, Doxa 23:29–43.
- Ferreres Comella V. (2013a) The Constitution of Spain. A Contextual Analysis. Hart Publishing, Oxford.
- Ferreres Comella V. (2013b) Amending the National Constitutions to Save the Euro: Is This the Right Strategy? Texas International Law Journal 48:223–240.
- Fonseca Morillo F. (2003) La orden de detención y entrega europea. (The EAW). Revista de Derecho Comunitario Europeo 14:69–95.
- Fontanelli F. (2010) How Interpretation Techniques Can Shape the Relationship between Constitutional Courts and the European Union: A comment on the Spanish Tribunal Constitutional's Judgment No. 199/2009 and the Czech Constitutional Court's judgment No. 29/2009. King's Law Journal 21:371–392.
- García-Escudero P. (2012) La acelerada tramitación parlamentaria de la reforma del artículo 135 de la Constitución (The quick parliamentary approval of the reform of article 135 of the Constitution). Teoría y Realidad Constitucional 29:165–198.
- García Sánchez B. (2013) ¿Homogeneidad o estándar mínimo de protección de los derechos fundamentales en la Unión Europea? (Homogeneity or a minimum standard for the protection of fundamental rights in the European Union?). Revista de Derecho Comunitario Europeo 46:1137–1156.
- Gómez Pomar F., Lyczkowska K. (2014) Spanish Courts, the Court of Justice of the European Union, and Consumer Law. Indret, Revista para el análisis del derecho 4:1–34.
- González Pascual M. (2012) Mutual Recognition and Fundamental Constitutional Rights: The First Preliminary Reference of the Spanish Constitutional Court. In: Claes M., De Visser M., Popelier P. (eds.) Constitutional Conversations in Europe: Actors, Topics and Procedures. Intersentia, Cambridge, pp. 161–178.
- González Pascual M. (2014) Austerity measures and welfare rights: the Spanish constitutional system under stress. EJSL 1–2:116–127.
- Groussot X., Olsson I. (2013) Clarifying or Diluting the Application of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights? – The Judgments in Åkerberg and Melloni. Lund Student EU Law Review 2:7–35.

- Iglesias Sánchez S. (2014) Unfair Terms in Mortgage Loans and Protection of Housing in Times of Economic Crisis: Aziz v. CatalunyaCaixa, Judgment of the Court of Justice (First Chamber) of 14 March 2013. CML Rev. 51:955–974.
- Izquierdo Sans C. (2002) Intervención parlamentaria en la celebración de tratados internacionales en España (Spanish parliamentary oversight on ratification of international treaties). Revista Electrónica de Estudios Internacionales 4:1–46.
- Izquierdo Sans C. (2010) Conflictos entre la jurisdicción comunitaria y la jurisdicción constitucional española (en materia de derechos fundamentales) (Conflicts between the European judiciary and the Spanish Constitutional Court (in the field of fundamental rights)). Revista Española de Derecho Europeo 34:193–233.
- Jimena Quesada L. (2012) La reforma del artículo 135 de la Carta Magna Española (la superación de los clichés del tabú y la rigidez constitucionales) (The reform of Art. 135 of the Spanish Constitution: overcoming the taboo and cliché of amending the Constitution). Teoría y Realidad Constitucional 30:335–356.
- Jiménez Asensio R. (2010) La incorporación de la Directiva de Servicios al derecho interno (Transposition of the services directive into the Spanish national legal system). Instituto Vasco de Administración Pública (IVAP), Oñati.
- López Castillo A. (2006) A propósito de la proyectada articulación de una cláusula europea en la Constitución española: propuestas y apuntes para el debate (In relation to the proposal of introducing a European integration clause in the Spanish Constitution: some proposals and thoughts for the debate). In: Álvarez Junco J., Rubio Llorente F. (eds.) El Informe del Consejo de Estado sobre la reforma constitucional: texto del informe y debates académicos (The Report of the Council of State about the constitutional reform: text of the report and academic debates). Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales/Consejo de Estado, Madrid, pp. 501–532.
- Luz Rodríguez M. (2014) Labour rights in crisis in the Eurozone: the Spanish case. EJSL 1–2:128–139.
- Majone G. (1996) Regulating Europe. Routledge, London and New York.
- Mangas Martín A. (2006) La reforma del artículo 93 de la Constitución española (The reform of article 93 of the Spanish Constitution). In: Álvarez Junco J.; Rubio Llorente F. (eds.) El Informe del Consejo de Estado sobre la reforma constitucional: texto del informe y debates académicos (The Report of the Council of State about the constitutional reform: text of the report and academic debates). Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales/Consejo de Estado, Madrid, pp. 533–566.
- Marín López A. (1999) Orden jurídico internacional y Constitución española (International law and the Spanish Constitution). Revista de Derecho Político 45:35–67.
- Martín Rodríguez P. (2013) Crónica de una muerte anunciada: comentario a la sentencia del Tribunal de Justicia (Gran Sala), de 26 de febrero de 2013, Stefano Melloni, C-399/11 (Chronicle of an announced death: a commentary to the judgment of the CJEU (Grand Chamber), of 26 February 2013, Stefano Melloni, C-399/11. Revista General de Derecho Europeo 30:1–13.
- Pérez Manzano, M. (2012) El Tribunal Constitucional español ante la tutela multinivel de derechos fundamentales en Europa. Sobre el ATC 86/2011, de 9 de junio (The Spanish Constitutional Court before the multilevel protection of fundamental rights in Europe. About the constitutional court ruling No. 86/2011, 9 June). Revista Española de Derecho Constitucional 95:311–345.
- Pérez Royo J. (1998) Las fuentes del derecho (The sources of law). Tecnos, Madrid.
- Pérez Tremps P. (1994) Constitución Española y Comunidad Europea (The Spanish Constitution and the European Community). Fundación Universidad Empresa/Civitas.
- Pérez Tremps P. (2004) Constitución española y Unión Europea (The Spanish Constitution and the European Union). Revista española de derecho constitucional 71:103–121.
- Revenga Sánchez M. (2012) Rectificar preguntando. El Tribunal Constitucional acude al Tribunal de Justicia (ATC 86/2011, de 9 de junio) (Rectifying through asking. The Spanish Constitutional Court goes to the CJEU (Order CC No. 86/2011, of 9 June)). Revista Española de Derecho Constitucional 41:139–150.

- Ridaura Martínez J. (2012) La reforma del artículo 135 de la Constitución española: ¿pueden los mercados quebrar el consenso constitucional? (The reform of article 135 of the Spanish Constitution: Can the markets break the constitutional consensus?). Teoría y Realidad Constitucional 29:237–260.
- Rodotà S. (2006) La conservación de los datos de tráfico en las comunicaciones electrónicas (The conservation of data in electronic communications). IDP. Revista de Internet, Derecho y Política (UOC) 3:53–60.
- Saiz Arnaiz A. (1999) La apertura constitucional al derecho internacional y europeo de los derechos humanos: el artículo 10.2 de la Constitución española (The constitutional gate to international and European human rights law: article 10.2 of the Spanish Constitution). Consejo General del Poder Judicial, Madrid.
- Saiz Arnaiz A. (2005) De primacía, supremacía y derechos fundamentales en la Europa integrada: la Declaración del Tribunal Constitucional 1/2004 de 13 de diciembre de 2004 y el Tratado por el que se establece una Constitución para Europa (Primacy, supremacy and fundamental rights in the European integration process: Declaration CC No. 1/2004, of 13 December 2004). In: López Castillo A., Saiz Arnaiz A., Ferreres Comella V. (eds.) Constitución Española y Constitución Europea (The Spanish Constitution and the European Constitution). Centro de Estudios Políticos y Constitucionales, pp. 51–71.
- Sánchez Gutiérrez M. (2012) Los Decretos-Leyes como instrumento de transposición de directivas comunitarias (Royal decree-laws as tools for transposing EU directives). Revista General de Derecho Administrativo 31:1–21.
- Skouris, V. (2013) Développements récents de la protection des droits fondamentaux dans l'Union européenne: les arrêts Melloni et Akerberg Fransson. Il diritto dell'Unione Europea 2:229–243.
- Solanes Mullor J. (2014) La introducción del Estado regulador y la administración independiente en España. El impulso del Derecho de la Unión Europea y las transformaciones del Derecho Público español (The introduction of the regulatory state and independent agencies in Spain: an innovation of the European Union and the transformation of Spanish public law). Doctoral dissertation, Universitat Pompeu Fabra.
- Solazabal Echavarriá J. (2005) El Tratado Constitucional europeo y la reforma de la Constitución española (The Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe and the reform of the Spanish Constitution). Revista del Ministerio de Trabajo y Asuntos Sociales 57:33–47.
- Torres Muro I. (2013) La condena en ausencia: unas preguntas osadas (ATC 86/2011, de 9 de junio) y una respuesta contundente (Sentencia del Tribunal de Justicia de la Unión Europea de 26 de febrero de 2013) (The sentence in absentia: courageous questions (Order CC nº 86/2011, of 9 June) and one conclusive answer (Judgment of the CJEU of 26 February 2013)). Revista Española de Derecho Constitucional 97:343–370.
- Torres Pérez A. (2009) Conflicts of rights in the European Union. A theory of supranational adjudication. Oxford University Press, New York.
- Torres Pérez A. (2010) Euroorden y conflictos constitucionales: A propósito de la STC 199/2009, de 28.9.2009 (EAW and constitutional conflicts: a commentary of the judgment CC 199/2009, of 28 September 2009). Revista Española de Derecho Europeo 35:441–472.
- Torres Pérez A. (2011) The judicial impact of European Law in Spain: ECHR and EU Law compared. Yearbook of European Law 30(1):159–179.
- Torres Pérez A. (2014) Melloni in three acts. EuConst 10(2):308–331.
- Tridimas T., Gari G. (2010) Winners and losers in Luxembourg: A statistical analysis of judicial review before the European Court of Justice and the Court of First Instance (2001–2005). E.L.Rev. 35(2):131–173.
- Vilasau M. (2006) La Directiva 2006/24/CE sobre conservación de datos del tráfico en las comunicaciones electrónicas: seguridad v. privacidad (Directive 2006/24/EC regarding the retention of data: security v. privacy). IDP. Revista de Internet, Derecho y Política (UOC) 3:1–15.

- Von Bogdandy A. (2001) La integración europea a la luz de la Constitución alemana: una reflexión entorno a la Sentencia del Tribunal Constitucional Federal sobre el caso Maastricht (The European integration in light of the German Constitution: thoughts about the judgment of the German Federal Constitutional Court in the Maastricht case). Cuadernos de Derecho Público 13:195–213.
- Walter C. (2001) Constitutionalizing (Inter)national Governance. Possibilities and Limits to the Development of an International Constitutional Law. German Yearbook of International Law 44:170–201.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

Portugal: The Impact of European Integration and the Economic Crisis on the Identity of the Constitution

Francisco Pereira Coutinho and Nuno Piçarra

Abstract The Portuguese Constitution of 1976 shares some of the main features of the constitutions adopted after the fall of an authoritarian regime, such as detailed rules and enforceability in court. The constitutional culture is mostly influenced by continental constitutional traditions, especially the French constitutional experience as regards the organisation of the state, and Germany in relation to the rule of law and fundamental rights. Rights from the first to the fourth generation are protected in some sixty articles, with detailed sub-clauses, and with a particularly strong social solidarity dimension and social rights. In the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, measures have often been annulled on the grounds of violation of the principles of equality, proportionality and the protection of legitimate expectations. This approach was enhanced in relation to the drastic austerity measures resulting from the European Union and IMF bailout programmes. The so-called austerity case law has been praised by some commentators, but criticised by others who have accused the Court of insularity, inconsistency and of engaging in judicial activism. Other areas where transnational law has presented challenges include retroactive effect of EU regulations, publication of IMF decisions and

Francisco Pereira Coutinho is Professor at Faculdade de Direito da Universidade Nova de Lisboa (NOVA School of Law) and Member of CEDIS – Centre for Research in Law and Society. e-mail: fpereiracoutinho@fd.unl.pt.

Nuno Piçarra is Professor at Faculdade de Direito da Universidade Nova de Lisboa (NOVA School of Law) and Member of CEDIS – Centre for Research in Law and Society. e-mail: np@fd.unl.pt.

Francisco Pereira Coutinho wrote Part I, Part II (Sections 2.4, 2.5, 2.7 and 2.8.1) and Part III. Nuno Piçarra wrote Part II (Sections 2.1–2.3, 2.6, 2.8.2–2.8.6, 2.9, 2.10–2.13).

All websites accessed 1 March 2015. Text submitted 24 August 2015.

F. P. Coutinho (✉) · N. Piçarra
CEDIS – Centre for Research in Law and Society, Faculdade de Direito da Universidade Nova de Lisboa (NOVA School of Law), Lisbon, Portugal e-mail: fpereiracoutinho@fd.unl.pt

N. Piçarra
e-mail: np@fd.unl.pt

international extraditions. The European Arrest Warrant and Data Retention Directive did not raise constitutional issues. Amendments of the Constitution with a view to EU and international co-operation are extensive. These include removal of several programmatic provisions regarding the social orientation.

Keywords The Constitution of Portugal • Constitutional amendments regarding European and international integration • The Portuguese Constitutional Court • Constitutional review statistics and grounds • Fundamental rights and the rule of law • European Union and IMF austerity programmes • The principles of legal certainty, legitimate expectations and non-retroactivity • Social rights and the social state • European Arrest Warrant • Data Retention Directive • Publication of IMF decisions

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The Portuguese Constitution was, and to some extent still is, a by-product of the revolutionary years that followed the military coup that overthrew the authoritarian right-wing regime of the ‘Estado Novo’ (1926–1974). The ‘Carnation Revolution’ was made by middle-rank military officers but was quickly taken over by leftist political parties and movements. The military organised under a movement called ‘Movimento das Forças Armadas – MFA’ (‘Movement of the Armed Forces’).

An assembly was democratically elected on 25 April 1975 to enact a new constitution, but during the following year its proceedings were heavily influenced by the military. Two pacts with the main political parties represented in the assembly were signed to assure that the ‘spirit’ of the revolution was not lost. The Constitution that entered into force on 25 April 1976 stated that the MFA exercised sovereign powers in order to safeguard the conquests of the revolution, and foresaw the creation of the ‘Council of the Revolution’ (Conselho da Revolução). The latter was composed of military officers and had the competence to review the constitutionality of laws.

The 1976 Portuguese Constitution shares some of the main features of the constitutions adopted after the fall of an authoritarian regime, such as detailed rules and enforceability in court. From the outset it was also very programmatic and ideological, as it was envisioned as a transitional tool for the creation of a socialist society through the collectivisation of the means of production.¹ Some of the most ideological provisions were removed in 1982, and others became obsolete after the accession to the European Communities in 1986.

¹ The Preamble of the Constitution still reads that one of the aims of the Constitution is to ‘open up a path to a socialist society’.

The extent of the revolutionary DNA that remains is still a topic of contention in Portugal. As we will see below, it was tested in the context of the constitutionality review of the austerity measures adopted after the 2011 international bailout.

Portuguese constitutional culture is mostly influenced by continental constitutional traditions. The French constitutional experience was preferentially chosen for the adoption of the main tenets of the political system and the organisation of the state. Germany's fundamental law was mirrored for the basic principles of the rule of law and the protection of fundamental rights.²

1.1.2 Article 1 of the Portuguese Constitution establishes that 'Portugal shall be a sovereign Republic, based on the dignity of the human person and the will of the people and committed to building a free, just and solidary society'.³ The next 295 articles establish the sovereignty and organisation of the state and, simultaneously, limit its powers through the protection of individual rights and liberties, the adoption of the rule of law and the separation of powers with due checks and balances. The Constitution also encapsulates the core values of the political community, which is to achieve an 'economic, social and cultural democracy' (Art. 2). To this end, the state is given a wide range of objectives in several programmatic provisions that recognise a vast array of social and cultural rights, such as the right to employment (Art. 58), social security (Art. 63), health (Art. 64), housing (Art. 65) and education (Art. 73). The Portuguese Constitution inaugurated a tradition of 'analytical constitutional texts' that was quickly followed in Spain (1978) and Brazil (1988), which are characterised by the thoroughness of the constitutional provisions and by the inclusion of novel subject matters in the Constitution.⁴

None of the main purposes of the Constitution could be said to have an edge over the others.

1.2 The Amendments of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1 The original version of the text of the 1976 Portuguese Constitution did not mention European integration. Although arguably the majority of the Portuguese political elites were then already pro-European, the correlation of forces was still dominated by Marxist political parties and the military. The latter was able to impose some ideas that were simply at odds with accession to a political project that pursued the creation of a single market based on liberal fundamental freedoms. The ‘transition to socialism’ was declared as an objective of the state (Art. 2). A mixed economic model was adopted, which included several provisions inspired by the socialist experiences of the former Eastern socialist bloc, such as the collectivisation of the sectors of production and wealth (e.g. Arts. 9(c) and 80) or the irreversibility of nationalisation carried out after the revolution, said to be ‘a conquest of the working class’ (Art. 83(2)).

² Piçarra 1994, p. 55.

³ All translations of the current version of the Portuguese Constitution are taken from the website of the Portuguese Parliament (available at <http://www.en.parlamento.pt/Legislation/CRP/Constitution7th.pdf>) (Minor stylistic revisions have been made by the authors). Translations of earlier versions of the Constitution are the sole responsibility of the authors.

⁴ Barroso 2006, p. 75.

An inconclusive doctrinal debate over the compatibility of the Constitution with the Treaties of Paris and Rome followed. Some argued for the introduction of structural amendments in the Constitution, especially in the economic chapter,⁵ while others referred to a constitutional praxis that was already compatible with the European project.⁶

The first constitutional amendments were introduced in 1982 also with the purpose of preparing a path for accession to the European Communities. The subsequent six constitutional revision processes were also based, albeit in different degrees of intensity, on the necessity to keep pace with the European integration project. For the sake of simplicity, the constitutional amendments related to European integration are schematically described in Table 1.

1.2.2 Title II of Part IV of the Constitution establishes two amendment procedures: (i) the ordinary, initiated by Parliament at least five years after the publication of the last ordinary constitutional revision law (Art. 284(1)); (ii) the extraordinary, initiated at any moment by a four-fifths majority of the Members of Parliament in exercise of their office (Art. 284(2)). In both cases, constitutional amendments need the approval of a two-thirds majority of the Members of Parliament who cast a vote (Art. 286). Of the seven constitutional revisions, three were extraordinary and motivated by the necessity to introduce amendments related to the ratification of the Maastricht Treaty (1992), the ratification of the Statute of the International Criminal Court (2001) and a referendum on the European Constitutional Treaty (2005).

1.2.3 Since the accession, we can identify three sets of amendments aimed at answering constitutional questions related to the EU.

The first regarded the democratic legitimisation of Portugal’s participation in the European integration process, namely through the adoption and continuous update of a provision that delegates the exercise of sovereign powers to the EU (Art. 7(6)) and through several amendments introduced to the legal framework for referendums to allow for a popular consultation on the text of the European treaties (Arts. 115(5) and 296).

The second set of amendments sought to tackle the problem of the so-called European democratic deficit. The intergovernmental nature of decision-making in the Council and the ever-increasing competences delegated to the EU challenged

⁵ Fausto de Quadros 1978, p. 12; Pitta e Cunha 1979, p. 79.

⁶ Rebelo de Sousa 1981, p. 149.

Table 1 EU related constitutional amendments

Year	Amendments	Purpose
1982	Abolition of the 'Council of the Revolution'	The Council was composed of military officers who were involved in the 1974 revolution. The wide scope of its competences breached democratic principles and could be considered as incompatible with accession to the European Communities ^a
1982	Article 8 (International Law): '3. The norms issued by the competent organs of international organisations to which Portugal belongs come directly into force in Portuguese internal law, on condition that this is expressly laid down in the respective constituent treaties.'	Allowed the direct application of the secondary law of the European Communities in the domestic legal order ^b
1982	Revocation of Art. 50 that stated that 'the collective appropriation of the primary means of production, economic development planning and the democratisation of the institutions are guarantees and conditions for the fulfilment of economic, social and cultural rights and duties' • In Art. 61(1) a reference to the possibility of free private initiative as 'an instrument of the collective progress' is included • Elimination in Art. 80 of the reference to the social and economic organisation of the state being based in the 'development of socialist relations'	These (and other) amendments reflected a deflection from the socialist economic model chosen in the original version of the Constitution. However, most of the structural provisions of that model remained unchanged, namely those related to nationalisation and the collectivisation of the agrarian sector ^c
1989	Article 7 (International relations): '5. Portugal is committed to reinforcing the European identity and to strengthening the European states' actions in favour of democracy, peace, economic progress and justice in the relations between peoples.'	Proclaimed a firm commitment to European integration ^d
1989	The adverb 'expressly' is deleted from Art. 8(3)	Removed any doubts regarding the direct effect of European Communities' directives ^e
1989	Article 15 (Foreigners, stateless persons): '4. Under reciprocal terms, the law may accord foreigners who reside in Portugal the eligibility to vote for and stand for election as officeholders of local authority organs.'	In 1989, the Constitutional Court had discussed at length the scope of Art. 8(3) and declared that it only included regulations which, according to the express wording of Treaties, are the only directly applicable EU legal acts ^f
		Strengthened bonds with EU Member States' citizens (and other foreigners) who reside in Portugal ^g

(continued)

Table 1 (continued)

Year	Amendments	Purpose
1989	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Article 85 (Reprivatisation of property nationalised after 25 April 1974) (now with a different version in Art. 293): <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ‘1. The reprivatisation of the ownership of the means of production and other nationalised assets after 25 April 1974 can only be made through a framework-law approved by an absolute majority of the Deputies in full exercise of their office.’ • Deletion of the reference to nationalisation as one of the objectives of the state (Art. 81(e)) • Amendments introduced in Art. 83 that allowed for the reprivatisation of nationalised companies • Deletion in Art. 288 of the reference to the collective appropriation of the means of production, as a matter with regard to which constitutional amendments are not possible 	Following the path initiated in 1982, the economic framework of the Constitution was revised to remove ideological references to socialism and foster the creation of a mixed economy more open to private initiative ^b . Of utmost importance for long-term incorporation in a unified European economic space was the revocation of the principle of the irreversibility of nationalisation. ⁱ
1989	References to the European Parliament elections included in Arts. 118(5) (now 115(7)), 136 (b) (now 133(b)) and 136(c)	Technical amendments related to elections and referendum procedures.
1992	Article 7 (International relations): <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ‘6. Subject to reciprocity and to respect for the principle of subsidiarity, and with a view to the achievement of economic and social cohesion, Portugal may enter into agreements for the joint exercise of the powers needed to build the European Union.’ 	Conditioned the delegation of powers to European Union included in the Maastricht Treaty
1992	Article 15 (Foreigners, stateless persons, European citizens): <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ‘5. Under reciprocal terms, the law may also accord citizens of European Union Member States who reside in Portugal the eligibility to vote for and stand for election as Members of the European Parliament.’ 	Anticipated one of the legal outcomes of the European citizenship created by the Maastricht Treaty
1992	Article 105 (Bank of Portugal) (now 102 after further amendments introduced in 1997) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ‘The Bank of Portugal is the national central bank and performs its functions as laid down by law and in accordance with the international rules by which the Portuguese state is bound.’ 	Opened the path for the adoption of the European single currency (euro)
1992	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Article 166(f) (now 163(f)) (Responsibilities in relation to other bodies): <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ‘In relation to other bodies, the Assembly of the Republic is responsible for: As laid down by law, to monitor and consider Portugal’s participation in the process of constructing the European Union.’ • Article 200(1)(i) (now 197(1)(i)) <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • (Political responsibilities): <ul style="list-style-type: none"> ‘The Council of Ministers shall be responsible for: submitting information concerning the process of constructing the European Union to the Assembly of the Republic.’ 	Mitigated the European democratic deficit by increasing Parliament’s powers to monitor Governmental actions in the EU institutions

(continued)

Table 1 (continued)

Year	Amendments	Purpose
1997	Article 112(9) (now (8)) (Legislation): ‘The transposition of European Union legal acts into the internal legal order shall take the form of a law, an executive law, or, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (4), a regional legislative decree.’	Imposed the requirement of transposition of EU law through legislative acts
1997	Article 115(5) (Referendum): ‘The provisions of the previous paragraph do not prejudice the submission to referendum of important issues concerning the national interest that must be the object of an international convention pursuant to Art. 161(i), except when they concern peace or the rectification of borders.’	Allowed referendums on questions related to European integration
1997	• Article 161 ‘The Assembly of the Republic is responsible for: ... (n) to pronounce, as laid down by law, on matters awaiting decision by European Union organs that concern the sphere of its exclusive legislative competence.’ • Article 164. ‘The Assembly of the Republic has exclusive responsibility to legislate on the following matters: (p) The regime governing the appointment of members of European Union organs, with the exception of the Commission.’	Mitigated the European democratic deficit by providing Parliament with the competence to regulate the appointment of Portuguese nationals to the EU’s bodies, as well as by increasing parliamentary influence in the European legislative procedure
1997	• Article 227 (Powers of the autonomous regions) ‘1. The autonomous regions are territorial bodies that are given the following powers: ... (v) on their own initiative, or when consulted by entities that exercise sovereignty, to pronounce on issues that are within the latter’s competences and concern the autonomous regions, as well as, in matters that concern their specific interests, on the definition of the Portuguese state’s positions within the ambit of the process of constructing the European Union; (x) To participate, when matters that concern them are at stake, in the process of constructing the European Union by means of their representation in the respective regional institutions and in the delegations involved in European Union decision-making processes.’	Mitigated the European democratic deficit by giving a say to the Parliaments of the autonomous regions of Azores and Madeira in the definition of the position of the Portuguese state whenever an issue that concerns matters of their specific interest is being discussed in the EU

(continued)

Table 1 (continued)

Year	Amendments	Purpose
2001	New version of Art. 7. '6. Subject to reciprocity and to the respect for the principle of subsidiarity, and with a view to the achievement of the economic and social cohesion of an area of freedom and security, Portugal may enter into agreements for the joint exercise of the powers needed to build the European Union.'	Conditioned the delegation of powers to the EU in the area of freedom, security and justice
2001	Article 33 (Deportation, extradition and right of asylum): '5. The provisions of the previous paragraphs do not prejudice the application of the norms governing judicial cooperation in the criminal field that are laid down within the scope of the European Union.'	Incorporated developments of European integration in the area of freedom, security and justice
2004	New version of Art. 7: '6. Subject to reciprocity and with respect for the fundamental principles of a democratic state based on the rule of law and for the principle of subsidiarity, and with a view to the achievement of the economic, social and territorial cohesion of an area of freedom, security and justice and the definition and implementation of a common external, security and defence policy, Portugal may agree to the joint exercise, in cooperation or by the Union's institutions, of the powers needed to construct and deepen the European Union.'	Conditioned the delegation of powers to the European Union in the area of common external relations, security and defence
2004	Article 8 (International law): '4. The provisions of the treaties that govern the European Union and the norms issued by its institutions in the exercise of their respective competences are applicable in Portuguese internal law in accordance with Union law and with respect for the fundamental principles of a democratic state based on the rule of law.'	Adopted a position on the supremacy of EU law vis-à-vis the Constitution
2004	• Article 112 (Legislation) '8. The transposition of European Union legal acts into the internal legal order shall take the form of a law, an executive law, or, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (4), a regional legislative decree.' • Article 227 (Powers of the autonomous regions). '1. The autonomous regions are territorial bodies corporate and possess the following power: ... (x) to participate, when matters that concern them are at stake, in the process of constructing the European Union by means of their representation in European regional institutions and	Allowed the autonomous regions of the Azores and Madeira to transpose EU legislation through regional legislative acts

(continued)

Table 1 (continued)

Year	Amendments	Purpose
	in the delegations involved in European Union decision-making processes, as well as to transpose Union legislation and other legal acts in accordance with Art. 112;
2005 Articles 295 (Referendum on European Treaties)	'The provisions of Art. 115(3) do not prejudice the possibility of calling and holding referenda on the approval of treaties concerning the construction and deepening of the European Union.'	Allowed referendums on the text of treaties related to the EU

Source Authors^aVitorino 1984, p. 12.^bMiranda 1996, p. 47.^cLeitão Marques 1990, p. 3.^dBesselink et al. 2014, p. 246.^eMarques Guedes and Pereira Coutinho 2006, p. 92.^fCase 184/89, 1 February 1989. This and other constitutional judgments are available in Portuguese at the website of the Portuguese Constitutional Court (www.tribunalconstitucional.pt).^gMarques Guedes and Pereira Coutinho 2006, p. 92.^hLeitão Marques 1990, p. 19.

EU law does not prohibit nationalisation. Article 345 TFEU states that the Treaties shall in no way 'prejudice the rules in Member States governing the system of property ownership'. However, State Aid Treaty provisions (Arts. 107 and 108) are applicable both to the acquisition and management of companies controlled by the state. In Portugal, during the revolutionary year of 1975, crucial economic sectors were nationalised without compensation (foreign capital was excluded), which included banking and insurance (with some exceptions), transport, shipyards, public utilities, media and the petrochemical, iron, steel, fertilizers and cement industries. Since many of the nationalised companies were holdings, the state also became the owner of hundreds of companies in a vast array of sectors, ranging from breweries, restaurants, hotels and even florists and barbershops! This widespread nationalisation was subsequently frozen by the irreversibility clause inserted in the 1976 Constitution (Art. 83 (1)). The combination of these two factors inevitably transformed Portugal during the 1980's into a country with one of the biggest and more comprehensive public sectors among OECD states (Balkanoff 1996, pp. 932-936). The accession to the European Communities in 1986 was perceived as a decisive momentum to liberalise the economy in order to prepare it for the end of the transitional period of incorporation of the acquis communautaire (1996) and the establishment of the single market in December 1992 (Braga de Macedo 1990, p. 3). An agreement was thus reached between the main political parties that allowed the unfreezing of the public sector through the repeal of the constitutional principle of the irreversibility of nationalisation in 1989. Bacelar Gouveia 2011, p. 518.

the pre-eminence of the national Parliament as ‘the house of Democracy’.⁷ In 1992 and 1997 provisions were introduced to increase Parliament’s powers to monitor and exercise control over Governmental intervention within the European institutions.

The third set of amendments aimed at preventing conflicts between the Portuguese and the European legal orders. Some amendments were rather surgical and did not raise significant legal debates. This was the case for the amendment included in 2001 to allow for the adoption of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW).⁸ Moreover, no relevant discussions arose regarding the obligation to transpose directives through legislative acts adopted in 1997 and 2004. This amendment was introduced to remove any doubts about the legal notice of national acts of European origin. Other amendments were more contentious, such as the transformations introduced in Art. 8 in order to prevent conflicts between constitutional law and EU law. Although the Constitution already contained a provision on the domestic incorporation of international law, that provision was specifically revised before Portugal’s accession to the European Communities so that it covered secondary law. It was further revised to resolve any doubts regarding the direct effect of directives in 1989 and on the magna question of the supremacy of EU law in 2004.

1.2.4 Most of the EU-related amendment proposals or constitutional reforms were enacted. Some, for example the amendment to the referendum procedure to allow for popular consultations on European treaties, were postponed for a while (see below Sect. 1.4.2), but materialised in the end. Recently, there was some discussion over the inclusion of the so-called deficit ‘golden rule’ adopted by the ‘Fiscal Compact’ in the Constitution, but no agreement was achieved between the main political parties to reach the necessary two-thirds majority to amend the Constitution (see below Sect. 2.7.1).

Notwithstanding the revision undertaken in 1989, several social and economic provisions of the Constitution are still regarded as in need of amendment to reflect the evolution of European integration. In this context, one constitutional scholar refers to an interpretative reorientation of the constitutional text in conformity with EU law in social and economic matters that could even lead to the ‘marginalisation or ignorance of constitutional provisions contrary or barely compatible with certain imperatives that stem from EU law’.⁹

⁷ Leading Portuguese scholars in constitutional law refer to these phenomena as a ‘legislative evasion that benefits the government’ (Miranda 2007, p. 181) and even a ‘fraud’ (Bacelar Gouveia 2011, p. 528).

⁸ Piçarra 2006, pp. 238–239.

⁹ Otero 2003, p. 549. Authors’ translation of the original text.

1.3 Conceptualising Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1 Article 7(6) of the Constitution governs the delegation of powers to the European Union by stating:

Subject to reciprocity and with respect for the fundamental principles of a democratic state based on the rule of law and for the principle of subsidiarity, and with a view to the achievement of the economic, social and territorial cohesion of an area of freedom, security and justice and the definition and implementation of a common external, security and defence policy, Portugal may agree to the joint exercise, in cooperation or by the Union's institutions, of the powers needed to construct and deepen the European Union.

This provision develops the general commitment, expressed in Art. 7(5), to the reinforcement of the European identity and the strengthening of ‘European states’ actions in favour of democracy, peace, economic progress and justice in the relations between peoples’.

Supremacy and direct effect are indirectly recognised in Art. 8(4) of the Constitution:

The provisions of the treaties that govern the European Union and the norms issued by its institutions in the exercise of their respective competences are applicable in Portuguese internal law in accordance with Union law and with respect for the fundamental principles of a democratic state based on the rule of law.

1.3.2 The Portuguese Constitution follows a traditional notion of absolute sovereignty. Article 3(1) states that ‘sovereignty is single and indivisible and lies with the people’. This explains the absence of a clause for the transfer of sovereign powers to the EU. The majority of Portuguese constitutional scholars consider Art. 7(6) as a mere delegation of powers through inter-governmental cooperation.¹⁰ It is as if European integration could be subsumed as ‘a mere participation in an inter-governmental process where the powers transferred by the States would be a priori clearly defined and subject to consensus decision-making’.¹¹ Remarkably, it was only on the eve of the ratification of the Maastricht Treaty, when the commitments assumed by the Portuguese state in the European integration process assumed a more pronounced political nature, that a provision regarding the exercise of competences by the EU was included in the Constitution. More recently, some authors have been advocating the need to recognise the EU’s claim of being an independent constitutional authority that exercises sovereign powers transferred by the Member States.¹²

¹⁰ Duarte 1994, p. 990.

¹¹ Poiares Maduro 2009, p. 549.

¹² Guerra Martins 2000, p. 71.

1.3.3 The delegation of powers to the European Union is limited by satisfaction of the general conditions set forth in Art. 7(6) of the Constitution, which include reciprocity, and respect for the fundamental principles of a democratic state based on the rule of law and for the principle of subsidiary. There are no specific limits to the extent of delegation.

The amendments introduced over the years in Art. 7(6) were aimed at legitimising Portuguese participation in European integration in areas more akin to the exercise of the state's traditional sovereign competences.

1.3.4 Article 8(4) of the Constitution recognises that the legal authority of EU law in the Portuguese legal order must be established according to the parameters laid out by the EU legal order. This recognition is not unconditional, as it must comply with the fundamental principles of a democratic rule of law. In other words, the Portuguese Constitution recognises the primacy of EU law as long as both legal systems are compatible in systemic terms. This compatibility can be found in the mutual respect of the fundamental principles of a democratic rule of law. This means that the recognition of the supremacy of EU law in Art. 8(4) is not a constitutional capitulation, as it is limited by respect of the fundamental values of the Portuguese constitutional order. It is precisely this systemic identification between these two legal orders that will ultimately prevent the existence of any conflicts of normative authority.¹³

The Constitutional Court has declared that the legislative branch is bound to respect the obligations stemming from EU law,¹⁴ but has never accepted the supremacy of EU law over the Constitution. However, it has always shown restraint in reviewing the constitutionality of EU law. The Court seems to follow the generalised perception within Portuguese legal doctrine that the core legal values of the Portuguese Constitution are shared by the EU legal order and, therefore, it is unlikely that an EU legal act will go against the Constitution. This reasoning was clear in a decision from 14 August 2014. The case concerned the review of austerity measures which the Government contended were implemented to comply with binding recommendations of the European Commission adopted in the context of an excessive deficit procedure initiated against Portugal in January 2010. The Constitutional Court declared that the applicable EU law only set objectives to be reached by the Member States, and added that:

In a multilevel Constitutional system, in which several legal orders interact, internal legal norms cannot breach the Constitution (being that it is for the Constitutional Court, according to the Constitution, to administer justice in constitutional matters).

EU law respects the national identity of the Member States, reflected in the fundamental political structures of each of them [Art. 4(2) TEU]. Moreover, in this case there is no disagreement between EU law and Portuguese constitutional law. The Constitutional ¹³ Poiares Maduro and Pereira Coutinho 2007, p. 55.

¹⁴ See Case 141/2015, 25 February 2015, para. 7.

principles of equality, proportionality and the protection of legitimate expectations that have been used by the Constitutional Court to assess the constitutionality of internal norms in matters related to those that are being reviewed are at the core of the rule of law and the common European legal traditions that also bind the EU.¹⁵

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 Parliamentary control of Governmental participation in the EU's decision-making procedure was marginal until the approval of Law 43/2006 of 25 August 2006 regarding the intervention of the Portuguese Parliament (Assembleia da República) within the scope of the process of constructing the European Union. This law, with the amendments introduced in 2012 (Law 21/2012 of 17 May), transformed the Portuguese Parliament into by far the most active Parliament based on the number of opinions sent to the European Commission,¹⁶ especially after the adoption of an 'enhanced scrutiny procedure' in 2010 by the European Affairs Committee (EAC) for what it regards as priority initiatives.¹⁷ The assessment procedure for European legislative initiatives takes a maximum of eight weeks and is better described in the following diagram (Fig. 1).

The EAC receives draft legislative initiatives sent by the European institutions or by the Government. The latter is obliged to keep Parliament informed of any relevant European legislative initiatives and is bound to ask for an opinion whenever such initiatives fall within the scope of Parliament's reserved legislative competence (see Arts. 164 and 165 of the Constitution). The EAC then sends the draft legal acts to the parliamentary standing committees that are competent on the matter and, eventually, to the Legislative Assemblies of the Autonomous Regions, which have to be consulted if the subject matter of the draft legal act falls within their sphere of competence. After the reception of the report made by the parliamentary standing committee(s), the EAC approves a final written opinion. The written opinion, together with the report of the competent committee, is sent by the President of the Parliament to the European institutions and to the Government. If the draft legal act is deemed to breach the principle of subsidiarity or is considered to be politically relevant, the EAC will submit a draft resolution for the approval of the Plenary of Parliament. This procedure is applicable mutatis mutandis to the scrutiny of other European initiatives.

¹⁵ Case 575/2014, 15 August 2014, para. 25. Authors' translation of the original text.

¹⁶ See Annex 1 of the European Commission 2013 Annual Report on the relations between the European Commission and the National Parliaments, COM (2014) 507 Final, p. 10. http://ec.europa.eu/dgs/secretariat_general/relations/relations_other/npo/docs/ar_2013_en.pdf.

¹⁷ This procedure is explained in English at: <http://www.en.parlamento.pt/EuropeanAffairs/EuropInitiativesScrutiny.html>.

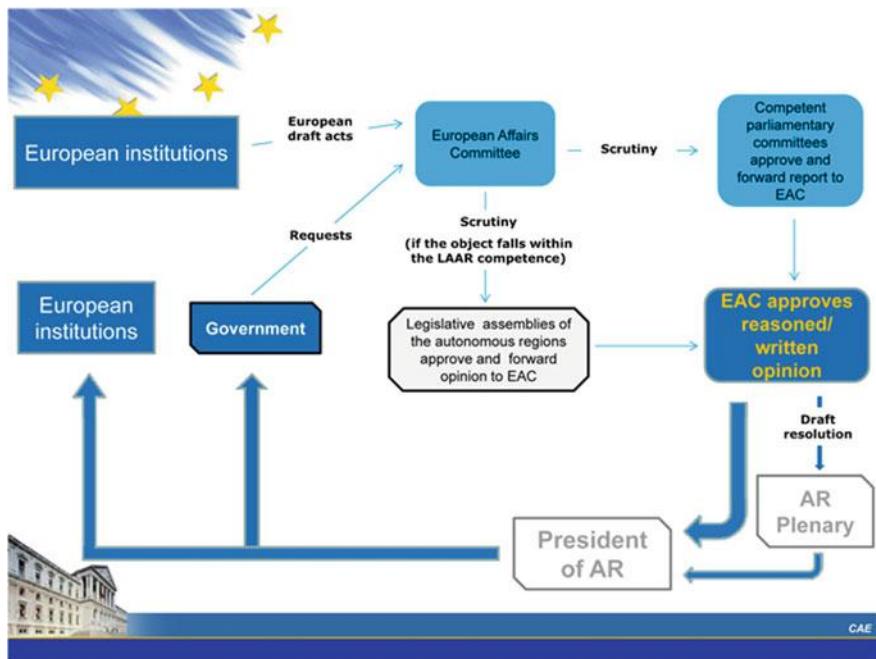

Fig. 1 European legislative initiatives assessment procedure (Source European Affairs Committee (<http://www.en.parlamento.pt/>). Reproduced with the authorisation of the Portuguese Parliament.) The abbreviations refer to the following: AR – Portuguese parliament; EAC – European Affairs Committee; LAAR – Legislative Assemblies of the Autonomous Regions.

Parliament has proven extremely effective in monitoring EU policy documents and proposals for action, but less so in detecting breaches of the principle of subsidiarity. In fact, the number of reasoned opinions on the application of the principle of subsidiarity (Protocol 2 to the EU Treaties) has averaged only one a year, which is below the average of other European parliaments.

1.4.2 Since accession, the idea of calling a referendum on European integration has been discussed but has never materialised. At the time of accession, the Constitution only foresaw local referendums. The 1989 amendments introduced national referendums, but did not allow the people to be called upon to decide on questions included in international treaties. After two failed attempts to amend the Constitution for this purpose in 1992 and in 1994, the possibility of a referendum on matters included in international treaties was introduced in 1997. However, the referendum could not be on the text of the treaty itself. For that reason, two proposals for a referendum on the Amsterdam Treaty (1997) and on the Constitutional Treaty (2004) were both rejected by the Constitutional Court, with the argument that the questions drafted by Parliament were misleading.¹⁸ To overcome this legal hurdle, in 2005 an extraordinary constitutional revision procedure was initiated to include the possibility of consulting the people directly on the text of a treaty aimed at deepening European integration (Art. 295).¹⁹ Ironically, no vote was called on the Constitutional Treaty because other Member States in the meantime had abandoned its ratification, after popular rejections in France and in the Netherlands in the spring of 2005. Notwithstanding all the efforts to let the people have a direct say on Europe, political constraints determined that in 2008 a referendum was not called in the process of ratification of the Lisbon Treaty. More recently, on 12 June 2012, proposals for a referendum on the ‘Fiscal Compact’ treaty were also rejected by Parliament; it is likely that this proposal would have been rejected by the Constitutional Court, as the Constitution does not allow for referendums that concern budgetary or financial issues (Art. 115(4)(b)).

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1 Although the Portuguese constitutional amendment procedure is very rigid – it establishes several formal, material and temporal conditions – the Portuguese constitutional culture is very favourable to the introduction of constitutional amendments as soon as a question of importance for society emerges. This is probably connected to a contentious constitutional history and to the lack of a national consensus on the original text of the 1976 Constitution, which soon became disconnected from the mainstream political choice towards European integration. Amendments were introduced to legitimise this option and to prevent conflicts with EU law.

European integration is a common trend in Portuguese constitutional revision procedures. In 1982 amendments were introduced to pave the way for accession to the European Communities. In 1989, 1992, 2001 and 2004 a systemic revision of the Constitution was implemented in order to prevent the risk of collisions with the EU legal order. These revisions involved the suppression of national provisions that could breach EU law (1989, 1992 and 2004) and a limited recognition of the supremacy of EU law (2004). Finally, the constitutional revisions of 1997 and 2005 were justified by the will to legitimise European integration through a referendum (1997 and 2005) and by the need to include safeguards to guarantee the democratic control of the actions of the Government in the European institutions (1992, 1997 and 2004).

1.5.2 Not applicable (see Sect. 1.5.1).

1.5.3 Over the years, constitutional amendments have been introduced ex ante to reflect treaty developments in the EU. For this reason, some argue that Treaty ratification reflects the only real exercise of constitutional authority in Europe.²⁰ This position, which is a reminiscence of a classic voluntaristic public international law perspective according to which no effects could emerge from treaties except those expressly foreseen by states, stems from a conception of absolute sovereignty that is still enshrined in Art. 3(1), but contradicts the constitutionalisation process that is ongoing both in the international and European legal sphere. The introduction of Art. 8(4) may have been a turning point. This provision indirectly recognises the autonomy of the European legal order. It was within this novel legal framework that the Constitutional Court mentioned the existence of a ‘multilevel constitutional system’²¹ and referred to the principle of supremacy as imposing obligations that emerge directly from EU law, as well as from Art. 8(4) of the Constitution.²² This recognition does not imply a constitutional surrender. The Constitution remains the basic law that defines and protects the core values of the political community and the basic rights and liberties of individuals. This implies that the Constitutional Court is not bound to recognise the supremacy of a supranational legal order in the unlikely event of a breach of those values, rights and liberties.

¹⁸ Case 531/98, 29 July 1998 and Case 704/2004, 17 December 2004.

¹⁹ Proposals with this content were rejected in the 2001 and 2004 revision procedures.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1 The 1976 Constitution begins with a general introductory part, titled ‘Fundamental Principles’. It includes the protection of human dignity and the rule of law and its corollaries or sub-principles: legal certainty, the protection of legitimate expectations and proportionality. Part I opens with a section dedicated to the general principles that belong to the regime governing fundamental rights: the principle of universality (Art. 12), the principle of equality (Art. 13), etc. This part of the Constitution includes an extensive and detailed (perhaps too detailed) catalogue of fundamental rights encompassing rights from the first to the fourth generation (Art. 24 to Art. 79). This catalogue distinguishes between (i) civil rights, freedoms and guarantees (safeguards), (ii) rights, freedoms and guarantees concerning political participation, (iii) workers’ rights, freedoms and guarantees and (iv) economic, social and cultural rights. Amongst civil rights, freedoms and guarantees, Arts. 27 to 32 provide extensive and detailed provisions on deprivation of liberty, defence rights and guarantees in criminal proceedings, on the application of criminal law and on limits on sentences and security measures. Such an extensive and detailed list of rights, freedoms and guarantees for the individual in the criminal justice system is unusual from a point of view of comparative constitutional law.

²⁰ Miranda 1996, p. 52.

²¹ In Portuguese: ‘sistema constitucional multinível’. See Case 575/2014, 15 August 2014, para. 25.

²² Case 141/2015, 25 February 2015, para. 7.

The dividing line between each of these sets of rights and freedoms is not always very clear, although it is possible to say that each of the sets delimits a field of human activity: personal life, political life and work life.²³

The so-called ‘rights, liberties and guarantees’, be they civil, of political participation or, more specifically, of workers, are submitted to a common legal framework (which does not extend to economic, social and cultural rights). This framework is foreseen in Art. 18(1), which states that the ‘Constitutional provisions with regard to rights, freedoms and guarantees shall be directly applicable to and binding on public and private persons and bodies’.

On that constitutional basis, such rights, freedoms and guarantees, as well as the above-mentioned principles, are generally enforceable in courts, and their enforcement by ordinary courts may be submitted to a final review by the Constitutional Court (see above Sect. 1.1.2).

Furthermore, Art. 21 states that everyone has ‘the right to resist any order that infringes their rights, freedoms or guarantees and, when it is not possible to resort to the public authorities, to use force to repel any aggression’.

2.1.2 The constitutional provisions stipulating the conditions under which restrictions can be imposed on rights are found in Art. 18(2) and (3). They provide:

A statute may only restrict rights, freedoms and guarantees in cases expressly provided for in this Constitution, and such restrictions shall be limited to those needed to safeguard other rights and interests protected by this Constitution. ... Statutes restricting rights, freedoms and guarantees shall possess an abstract and general nature and shall not have a retroactive effect or reduce the extent and the scope of the essential content of the provisions of this Constitution.

2.1.3 According to Art. 2 of the Constitution, the Portuguese Republic is a democratic state based on the rule of law, the sovereignty of the people, on plural democratic expression and organisation, on respect for and the guarantee of the effective implementation of fundamental rights and freedoms, and the separation and interdependence of powers.

Jurisprudence and legal literature conceptualise the rule of law as a structuring constitutional principle encompassing a variety of sub-principles: not only legal certainty, proportionality, non-retroactivity and legitimate expectations, as already mentioned, but also the separation of powers (Art. 111(1)), the independence of judicial power (Art. 203) and access to law and effective judicial protection as established in the detailed Art. 20. The rule of law principle is normally justiciable through its sub-principles. The argument of the violation of, for instance, the principle of proportionality, contained within the principle of the rule of law in Art. 2 of the Constitution, is frequently invoked by applicants and by ordinary courts exercising judicial review of constitutionality under Art. 204, and naturally by the Constitutional Court, as ‘the court with specific responsibility for administering justice in matters of legal and constitutional nature’, under Art. 221.

²³ Bacelar Gouveia 2015, p. 127.

Access to courts and the right to judicial review are foreseen by Art. 20(1), according to which everyone shall be guaranteed access to the law and the courts in order to defend their rights and legitimate interests, and justice shall not be denied to anyone due to a lack of financial means. The same article also states that everyone has the right to secure a ruling in any lawsuit to which he or she is a party, within a reasonable period of time and by means of a fair process (para. 4).

The rule that only published law can be enforced, the rule that any imposition of obligations, administrative charges or penalties and criminal punishments is only permissible on the basis of a parliamentary statute or of a governmental legislative act previously authorised by Parliament, and the rule according to which sanctions cannot be applied either retroactively or by analogy, are also considered as core elements of the rule of law principle (and incorporated e.g. in Art. 103(2) and (3) regarding the tax system).

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 Until the zenith of the financial crisis in Portugal in 2010, which culminated in an international bailout in the first semester of 2011, the balancing of constitutional fundamental rights with economic free movement rights did not raise noteworthy issues. Since then and especially within the framework of the privatisation of relevant public enterprises with their shares made available for acquisition by foreign economic entities, the balancing of the main constitutional goods at stake is becoming more controversial: on the one side, the freedom of establishment – inasmuch as it allows the possibility of transferring the head office of a privatised enterprise to another Member State; on the other side, the fundamental rights of workers, and namely their right to take collective action, which are possibly affected or limited by such transfer. In cases such as the privatisation of TAP Air Portugal (the national airline), these questions were openly discussed.

It has yet to be seen if the national courts will adjust their balancing towards generally favouring workers’ rights over economic freedoms to match the approach of the Court of Justice (ECJ).

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1 According to Art. 32(2) of the Constitution, ‘[e]very defendant shall be presumed innocent until a sentence has been pronounced, and shall be brought to trial as quickly as it is compatible with the safeguards of the defence’. We are not aware that such constitutional provision has been invoked in the Portuguese legal literature or in the case law in the context of the European Arrest Warrant (EAW) with a view to raising concerns about a hypothetical weakening or jeopardising effect of the EAW on the principle of the presumption of innocence.

Therefore, a conclusion that such principle can no longer be fully granted the same level of protection as prior to the entry into force of the EAW Framework Decision²⁴ (EAW FD) cannot be drawn. In the context of the Portuguese experience with the EAW, that conclusion seems indefensible. Furthermore, it presupposes an ideological conception, according to which beyond the framework of the national state the protection of fundamental rights and liberties is always weaker than inside, and therefore such shift represents a loss in terms of the rule of law.²⁵

2.3.1.2 In the context of the execution of international conventions on extradition binding on the Portuguese state, national judges must be more ‘pro-active’ than in the framework of the EAW. As a matter of fact, in the context of extradition they have to observe constitutional provisions that are not applicable to the EAW by virtue of Art. 33(5) of the Constitution. According to the latter, the provisions of the previous paragraphs of Art. 35 (limiting extradition) shall not ‘prejudice the application of such rules governing judicial cooperation in the criminal field as may be laid down under the aegis of the European Union’, and namely the rules of transposition of the EAW FD.

It follows that cases of refusal of extradition are more frequent than cases of refusal of execution of an EAW. In the former, revision of evidence by the courts is not excluded when the person whose extradition is requested claims his or her innocence.

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 Article 29(1) of the Constitution provides that ‘[n]o one shall be sentenced under the criminal law unless the action or omission in question is punishable under the terms of a pre-existing law, nor shall any person be the object of a security measure unless the prerequisites therefor are laid down by a pre-existing law’.

²⁴ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

²⁵ See Tomuschat 2005, p. 455 and also Piçarra 2005, pp. 91–93.

The fact that the list in Art. 2(2) of the EAW FD includes merely ‘types’ and not well-defined offences does not jeopardise eo ipso the principle nullum crimen.²⁶ As a matter of fact, such types are not directly applicable, and the national criminal law cannot include ‘types’ but only precisely defined offences, according to the principle of legality, which is very strict in this context. As the ECJ stated in Advocaten voor de Wereld:

... even if the Member States reproduce word-for-word the list of the categories of offences set out in Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision for the purposes of its implementation, the actual definition of those offences and the penalties applicable are those which follow from the law of ‘the issuing Member State’. The Framework Decision does not seek to harmonise the criminal offences in question in respect of their constituent elements or of the penalties which they attract.

Accordingly, while Article 2(2) of the Framework Decision dispenses with verification of double criminality for the categories of offences mentioned therein, the definition of those offences and of the penalties applicable continue to be matters determined by the law of the issuing Member State, which, as is, moreover, stated in Article 1(3) of the Framework Decision, must respect fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles as enshrined in Article 6 EU, and, consequently, the principle of the legality of criminal offences and penalties.²⁷

The Portuguese act transposing the EAW FD (Law 65/2003 of 23 August) reproduces the list of the categories of offences set out in Art. 2(2) of the EAW FD, but the Criminal Code defines, in strict conformity with the legality principle, such offences and the penalties applicable.

In any case, it should not be forgotten that the offences included in the EAW FD list, due to their gravity, are inevitably foreseen by the criminal laws of the Member States, and some of them had already been harmonised at EU level before the entry into force of the EAW FD. Furthermore, this legislative harmonisation did not stop after the entry into force of the EAW FD, since its development is crucial in this area, as the TFEU itself recognises in Art. 82(1). According to this provision, ‘judicial cooperation in criminal matters in the Union shall be based on the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions and shall include the approximation of the laws and regulations of the Member States in the areas referred to in para. 2 and in Art. 83’. The latter coincide largely with the offences listed in Art. 2(2) of the EAW FD.

At the level of national case law, the Portuguese Supreme Court of Justice, in a judgment of 4 January 2007, held that the abolition of the double criminality test presupposes that the executing authority verify, in accordance with the principles of trust and mutual recognition, whether the acts underlying the EAW, as qualified by the issuing authority, integrate the ‘material domains of criminality’ defined in Art.

²⁶ According to Jegouzo 2005, p. 43, the EAW FD list is inspired by a more criminologist than legal approach and is very similar to the Europol Decision list.

²⁷ Case C-303/05 Advocaten voor de Wereld [2007] ECR I-03633, paras. 52–53. For a commentary on this decision, see Figueiredo Dias and Caeiro 2013, p. 26.

2(2) of the EAW FD or are rather ‘manifestly beyond them’.²⁸ In the latter cases, where double criminality is effectively absent, it is generally assumed by the national courts that such a situation constitutes a ground for optional and not mandatory non-execution. This solution has given rise to criticism in the legal literature, which generally considers that non-execution is mandatory in such cases.²⁹

In any case, a conclusion that the principle of nullum crimen can no longer be fully granted the same level of protection as prior to the entry into force of the EAW FD does not seem objectively permissible in this context. The observation made above (Sect. 2.3.1.1) is fully transposable to this context: such conclusion would be mainly ideological and not based on sound evidence.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 According to Art. 32(6) of the Constitution, ‘[t]he law shall define the cases in which, subject to the safeguarding of the rights of defence, the presence of the defendant or the accused at procedural acts, including trial hearings, may be dispensed with’. It follows that in absentia judgments, being exceptional, are not necessarily contrary to the Constitution and to the safeguards for the defence that criminal proceedings must ensure by virtue of Art. 32(1).

Furthermore, that constitutional provision is in accordance with the ECHR jurisprudence according to which the right of the accused to appear in person at the trial is not absolute, and under certain conditions the accused may, of his or her own free will, expressly or tacitly but unequivocally waive this right.

The cases of judgments in absentia foreseen by the EAW FD as amended by FD 2009/299/JHA of 26 February 2009, which do not allow the executing authority of a Member State to impose conditions on the execution of an EAW issued by another Member State, are cases of so-called false in absentia judgments where:

- (i) the person was summoned in person and thereby informed of the scheduled date and place of the trial which resulted in the decision and was informed that a decision might be handed down if he or she did not appear for the trial;
- (ii) the person was not summoned in person but by other means actually received official information of the scheduled date and place of the trial which resulted in the decision, in such a manner that it was unequivocally established that he or she was aware of the scheduled trial, and was informed that a decision might be handed down if he or she did not appear for the trial;
- (iii) being aware of the scheduled trial, the person had given a mandate to a legal counsellor, who was either appointed by the person concerned or by the state, to defend him or her at the trial, and was indeed defended by that counsellor at the trial.

²⁸ Supreme Court of Justice, 4 January 2007, case 06P4707. This and other judgments of the Portuguese higher courts are available in Portuguese at www.dgsi.pt.

²⁹ See for instance Caeiro and Fidalgo 2009, pp. 261–262. More recently, see Caeiro and Fidalgo 2015, pp. 186–191.

In these cases, the execution of an EAW by a national court does not raise any constitutional issues and does not prompt any revisiting of the established standards of protection.

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 Beyond standard consular assistance, the Portuguese state does not usually provide assistance to its extradited citizens or residents.

The introduction of a publicly funded state or non-governmental body to provide assistance to residents of Portugal who are involved in trials abroad could make sense, especially in cases where the state in which the trial is held is not governed by the rule of law, or where the death penalty is applicable. The criteria for the intervention of such a body should be very clear in order to limit it to cases where it would be indispensable. In principle, the intervention of such body would be excluded regarding trials in other EU Member States, considering the general safeguards of defence ensured in the framework of their criminal proceedings.

2.3.4.2 We were unable to gather data concerning the number of individuals extradited by Portugal who have subsequently been found innocent.

2.3.5 The Right to Effective Judicial Protection: The Principle of Mutual Recognition in EU Criminal Law and Abolition of the Exequatur in Civil and Commercial Matters

2.3.5.1 The move to mutual recognition is not incompatible with the requirements of the rule of law and the right to effective judicial protection, provided that the states among which mutual recognition is put in effect are themselves governed by the rule of law and guarantee the right to effective judicial protection, as are and do in principle the EU Member States.

Contrary to the idea that underlies this questionnaire, a supranational or transnational framework of judicial cooperation in criminal matters does not necessarily imply a loss or a minus in terms of the rule of law when compared with the national framework. In the legal framework of the EU, mutual recognition should even be taken as an opportunity to improve the rule of law in the Member States. For instance, if in a Member State there is a deficit in judicial protection, the fact that the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union (Charter) and its Art. 47 ('Right to an effective remedy and to a fair trial'), which are fully justiciable, become applicable in the context of the issuing and execution of an EAW can contribute to improving such deficit at the national level.

Since a right of appeal is an essential element of the right to effective judicial protection (according to Art. 29(1) of the Constitution, the right to appeal is a necessary safeguard for the defence in criminal proceedings), it has to be put in ‘practical accordance’ (balanced) with the principle of mutual recognition. Although ‘the full exercise of the right of defence against the accusation must take place in the courts of the issuing State, because the EAW is based on the principles of judicial cooperation between Member States, mutual recognition of their respective legal systems and trust between the said States’,³⁰ if such defence really does not take place, it is the duty of the executing judge of the other Member State to guarantee that Art. 47 of the Charter is not violated in that case. The same is applicable mutatis mutandis to civil and commercial matters.

For all these reasons, the answer to the sacramental question whether a conclusion can be drawn that the principle of effective judicial protection and the rule of law can no longer fully be granted the same level of protection as prior to the introduction of the mutual recognition rule in criminal law and the abolition of the exequatur in civil and commercial matters, is negative.

2.3.5.2 It is a fact that the principle of mutual recognition was an ECJ creation in the framework of the freedom of movement of goods when it was not yet decided whether that freedom of the common market presupposed the general harmonisation of national legislation on the production and commercialisation of goods, or could coexist with different national legislation on those matters. In that context, the principle of mutual recognition rendered a considerable quantity of EU harmonising legislation unnecessary.

It was with the purpose of limiting the legislative competence of the EU that the principle of mutual recognition was extended to the fields of judicial cooperation in criminal and civil matters. However, the material differences between those areas and the internal market have as a consequence that the necessity of approximation of the laws of the Member States is much higher in the former areas than in the latter. While in the internal market mutual recognition can be seen as a real alternative to approximation of the legislation of the Member States, in the areas of judicial cooperation in criminal and civil matters, one of the indispensable conditions for the effectiveness of the principle of mutual recognition of judgments and judicial decisions is that such judgments and decisions are based on harmonised legislation reflecting the same fundamental substantive and procedural principles.³¹

In conclusion, in the areas of judicial cooperation in criminal and civil matters mutual recognition and legislative harmonisation are more closely associated than in other areas. These are the main aspects of the national debate.

³⁰ Supreme Court of Justice, case 08P1891, 29 May 2008.

³¹ Along the same line of thought, see Vitorino and Vasconcelos 2012, p. 542. These authors also observe laconically that the abolition of double criminality ‘which is the very essence of mutual trust ... may foster a repressive “European criminal space”’ (p. 540).

2.3.5.3 For all the above mentioned reasons, a supposed change in the role of the Member States' courts, from providing judicial protection against unwarranted national measures to becoming actors of loyal co-operation, efficiency and trust as 'EU law courts of ordinary jurisdiction' is, in our view, somewhat of a false dilemma. Mutual recognition does not suppress the fundamental role of every court to protect against illegal measures.

The EAW FD is sufficiently clear on this point. According to its recital 12, nothing in the EAW FD may be interpreted as prohibiting refusal to surrender a person for whom a European arrest warrant has been issued when there are reasons to believe, on the basis of objective elements, that the said arrest warrant has been issued for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing a person on the grounds of his or her sex, race, religion, ethnic origin, nationality, language, political opinions or sexual orientation, or that that person's position may be prejudiced for any of these reasons.

Furthermore, according to Art. 1(3), '[t]his Framework Decision shall not have the effect of modifying the obligation to respect fundamental rights and fundamental principles as enshrined in Article 6 of the Treaty on European Union'. An evolutionary approach to this provision obliges the interpreter to add the following normative segment: 'and as enshrined in the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union'.³²

2.3.5.4 Extradition requests for trivial offences should not happen, simply because the relevant conventions generally exclude 'trivial offences' from their scope. The required courts must deny requests for extradition that are not based on the applicable convention, as duly interpreted.

In the context of the EAW, the FD is clear. According to Art. 2(1), '[a] European arrest warrant may be issued for acts punishable by the law of the issuing Member State by a custodial sentence or a detention order for a maximum period of at least 12 months or, where a sentence has been passed or a detention order has been made, for sentences of at least four months'. Such acts are not, in principle, 'trivial offences'.

In our view, recommendations that undermine the essential logic of the EAW should not be supported. On the other hand, concerning the classic institute of extradition, several forms of judicial and political review are foreseen by the applicable conventions aimed at ensuring that there is sufficient evidence that the offence is sufficiently serious and that there is a sufficient link between the offence and the country to which the individual is extradited.

There is no point to call for amendments in the extradition legal framework when the reasonable solutions already flow from this framework.

³² Therefore, it is simply false to affirm that nowhere in the EAW FD is non-execution of an EAW on the grounds of disrespect for human rights foreseen.

2.4 The EU Data Retention Directive

2.4.1 The Portuguese Constitution protects the privacy of personal life in Art. 26(1), according to which

[e]veryone shall possess the right to a personal identity, to the development of their personality, to civil capacity, to citizenship, to a good name and reputation, to their likeness, to speak out, to protect the privacy of their personal and family life, and to legal protection against any form of discrimination.

According to Art. 35(4), '[t]hird-party access to personal data shall be prohibited, save in exceptional cases provided for by the law'. Article 34(1) proclaims that '[p]ersonal homes and the secrecy of correspondence and other means of private communication shall be inviolable', and Art. 32(8) forbids evidence obtained by improper tampering with personal telecommunications. Limits to the privacy of electronic communications may be allowed in criminal cases (Art. 34(4)). Any restriction has to be established by law, which has to be necessary, abstract, general and cannot have retroactive effect or reduce the extent or the scope of the essential content of the constitutional right to privacy (Art. 18(2) and (3)).

Law 32/2008 of 17 July that transposed the EU Data Retention Directive 2006/24³³ is in force. It was never contested prior to the annulment of the directive, and it is unlikely to be challenged based on the rules regarding safeguards for access to and time limits for data retained. Data are preserved for one year and can only be accessed with the permission of a judge (Arts. 6 and 7 of Law 32/2008). This explains why Portugal has only had a few hundred requests for access to data retained compared to millions in the United Kingdom.³⁴

Prior to the decision of the ECJ that invalidated the EU Data Retention Directive 2006/24, it was unclear whether the rule on blanket data protection was compatible with the Constitution. In 2010, a decision of the Portuguese Supreme Court of Justice adopted a strong stance against 'fundamental readings' of the right to privacy that could jeopardise the safety of the community.³⁵ After the Digital Rights decision,³⁶ this position is no longer sustainable.

³³ Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC, [2006] OJ L 105/54.

³⁴ DG Home Affairs, European Commission, Statistics on Requests for data under the Data Retention Directive (October 2013). http://ec.europa.eu/dgs/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/police-cooperation/data-retention/docs/statistics_on_requests_for_data_under_the_data_retention_directive_en.pdf.

Law 32/2008 still implements EU law, even if it was originally enacted to transpose an EU legal act that has in the meantime been invalidated.³⁷ It thus falls within the scope of the Charter (Art. 51). As ‘EU law courts of ordinary jurisdiction’, Portuguese courts are thus under the obligation to apply the principle of supremacy and trump its application.

Moreover, the Constitutional Court, if called to decide on the constitutionality of Law 32/2008 of 17 July, would be likely to declare the unconstitutionality of the latter, with the argument that automatic blanket retention of data for one year is a mechanism of ‘mass surveillance’ that involves a disproportionate restriction on the right to privacy (Art. 26(1) of the Constitution), since it allows for the retention of data of citizens who are not involved in any criminal activity (Art. 34(4) of the Constitution). Such a decision would follow its case law that recognises the existence of a ‘multilevel’ system of protection of fundamental rights,³⁸ but it could have the effect of reopening criminal cases that have been decided based on access to data retained under Law 32/2008.

2.5 Unpublished or Secret Legislation

2.5.1 We are unaware of any cases concerning the constitutionality of unpublished or secret measures. Article 119(2) of the Constitution establishes that unpublished

³⁵ The Portuguese Supreme Court of Justice, in case 886/07.8PSLSB, 3 March 2010, held that Art. 34(4) of the Constitution incorporates other interests and values that also have to be protected. The Court declared that a ‘fundamentalist reading of personal rights could leave the community unarmed vis-à-vis the demands of the fight against ever more organised and efficient criminals’. (Translation by the authors).

³⁶ Joined cases C-293/12 and C-594/12 Digital Rights Ireland and Seitlinger and Others [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:238.

³⁷ See Art. 15(1) of Directive 2002/58/EC Directive 2002/58/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 12 July 2002 concerning the processing of personal data and the protection of privacy in the electronic communications sector (Directive on privacy and electronic communications) (E-privacy Directive), [2002] OJ L 201/37, which states that Member States may restrict the rights relating to the confidentiality of communications, location and other traffic data and caller identification ‘when such restriction constitutes a necessary, appropriate and proportionate measure within a democratic society to safeguard national security (i.e. state security), defence, public security, and the prevention, investigation, detection and prosecution of criminal offences or of unauthorised use of the electronic communication system, as referred to in Art. 13(1) of Directive 95/46/EC. To this end, Member States may, inter alia, adopt legislative measures providing for the retention of data for a limited period justified on the grounds laid down in this paragraph. All the measures referred to in this paragraph shall be in accordance with the general principles of Community law, including those referred to in Art. 6(1) and (2) of the TEU’.

³⁸ On this topic, see Guerra Martins and Prata Roque 2014.

legal acts ‘do not have legal force’. This means that they are valid but cannot produce any effects on individuals.³⁹

2.6 Rights and General Principles of Law in the Context of Market Regulation: Property Rights, Legal Certainty, Non-retroactivity and Proportionality

2.6.1 Until the recent economic and financial crisis, issues regarding constitutional standards of protection of property rights, legal certainty, legitimate expectations, non-retroactivity and proportionality had arisen rarely in practice in relation to EU measures on market regulation (some cases regarding constitutional non-retroactivity of tax law in the case of an EU legislative corrigendum are summarised below 2.8.1).

2.7 The ESM Treaty, Austerity Programmes and the Democratic, Rule-of-Law-Based State

2.7.1 Capital calls that could be requested from Portugal under the Treaty Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty) amount to a maximum of 17,564,400,000 EUR,⁴⁰ or approximately 10% of the annual GDP (at market prices) and 9% of the annual state budget (2013).⁴¹ Notwithstanding these impressive figures, in the parliamentary commission reports we found no reference to specific constitutional problems related to this financial commitment of the Portuguese state under the ESM Treaty.⁴²

Constitutional arguments were discussed during the ratification of the Fiscal Compact Treaty.⁴³ There were some discussions on the inclusion in the ³⁹ See Lopes Luís 2013, p. 311.

⁴⁰ Opinion of 10 April 2012 of the Commission on European Issues of the Portuguese Parliament, Resolution Proposal 28/XII, Diário da Assembleia da República 2012 II (159: 86, footnote 4).

⁴¹ Data from the European Central Bank. http://sdw.ecb.europa.eu/quickview.do?SERIES_KEY=119.ESA.A.PT.N.0000.B1QG00.1000.TTTT.V.U.A and <http://www.pordata.pt/Portugal/Despesas+do+Estado+orcamento+final->.

⁴² See Opinion of 10 April 2012 of the Commission on European Issues, Resolution Proposal 28/XII, Diário da Assembleia da República 2012 II (159: 85–88) and Opinion of 28 March 2012 of the Commission on Budgetary Issues, Resolution Proposal 28/XII, Diário da Assembleia da República 2012 II (159: 88–91).

⁴³ The Portuguese constitutional scholar Jorge Miranda declared to the press that this Treaty should have been reviewed by the Constitutional Court prior to its ratification. See Valente, L. (2014, November 4) Assessor do PR defende revisão constitucional para incluir ‘estado de necessidade financeira’ (Advisor of the President of the Republic advocates a constitutional revision process to recognize a ‘financial state of emergency’). O Observador. <http://observador.pt/2014/11/04/assessor-do-pr-defende-revisao-constitucional-para-incluir-estado-de-necessidade-financeira/>.

Constitution of annual limits to the public deficit and debt. Parliament decided to include such limits, but only in the ‘budget framework law’ (Law 91/2001 of August 20), which is an act that has a parametric nature in relation to ordinary laws (Art. 112(3)). Some concerns were also articulated regarding the powers at the disposal of the European Commission to determine substantive public policies in Member States that are experiencing budgetary and debt problems. A Member of Parliament declared that these powers breached the principle of national sovereignty, the principle of popular sovereignty, the principle of democracy and the principle of budgetary sovereignty.⁴⁴

2.7.2 With a crumbling banking sector and a chronic public debt, there is a wide agreement in Portugal in favour of Eurobonds and of a stronger Banking Union as quickly as possible. No relevant discussions have arisen with regard to potential constitutional problems related to exposure to other countries’ debt or banking failures.

2.7.3 The Portuguese Constitutional Court emerged during the financial crisis as a key protagonist in the political system when it had to address the compatibility with the Constitution of legislative acts that established increases in taxes and reductions of expenditures that included drastic cuts in the wages of public servants and in several social benefits, including pensions.

Austerity measures were enacted between mid-2010 and May 2011 to avoid an international bailout, between May 2011 and May 2014 to reflect the requirements of the Financial Assistance Programme set forth in several memoranda of understanding imposed by the European Commission, the European Central Bank and the International Monetary Fund (the so-called Troika), and have been enacted since May 2014 to comply with the Commission’s recommendations adopted in the context of an excessive deficit procedure initiated against Portugal in January 2010.⁴⁵ Table 2 portrays all of the high profile decisions taken by the Constitutional Court during this period.

The Portuguese Constitutional Court cannot be identified as a sort of ‘Don Quixote’ fighting the windmills of austerity. Such an image would be completely at odds with the fact that from the outset of the crisis, the Court made every effort to ⁴⁴ Opinion of Member of Parliament João Galamba, Opinion of 4 April 2012, Commission on Budgetary Issues, Resolution Proposal 30/XII, Diário da Assembleia da República 2012 II (159: 98).

⁴⁵ Contrarily to what happened in Ireland and Spain, a failure of the Portuguese banking system was not the key factor leading to the international bailout, although a bank recapitalisation fund was contemplated in the bailout agreement. In fact, the Portuguese banks did not use all the money that was reserved to them under that programme. At the heart of the problem was a mounting public external debt. The latter was created by unsustainable public deficits and chronic profligacy, coupled with a large stock of private debt. The increase in public external debt led in turn to large deficits in the current account. The deteriorating macroeconomic situation of Portugal and the repeated warnings by rating agencies, followed by an effective decrease in the credit rating of the country, concerned private and institutional investors, thereby putting pressure on the public debt bonds, which caused an increase in yields to a point where Portugal was virtually kept out of the capital markets.

Table 2 'Austerity case law' of the Portuguese Constitutional Court

Case	Date	Ruling
399/ 2010	27.10.2010	Accepted inauthentic retroactivity of personal income tax increases (7-3[2]) ^a
396/ 2011	21.9.2011	Accepted transitory cuts of public servants' wages included in the Budget Act for 2011 (9-3)
353/ 2012	5.7.2012	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Rejected the suspension of two months of salary/allowances for public servants and pensioners ('holiday and Christmas allowances') included in the Budget Act of 2012 based on violation of the principle of equality (Art. 13 of the Constitution)^b (10-3); • Limited the effects of the declaration of unconstitutionality and allowed cuts to continue until the end of the tax year (10-3)
187/ 2013	5.4.2013	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Rejected the suspension of one month's salary/allowance for public servants and pensioners ('holiday allowance') included in the Budget Act for 2013 based on violation of the principle of equality (Art. 13 of the Constitution) (7-5[1]); • Rejected cuts in unemployment and health benefits because they were not progressive and, therefore, breached the principle of proportionality enshrined in the principle of the rule of law (Art. 2 of the Constitution) and the constitutional safeguard to a 'descent human existence' (11-2); • Accepted transitory cuts in public servants' wages (10-3); cuts in overtime work (13-0), temporary cuts in pensions (7-5[1]), a reduction of tax brackets (10-0 [3]), the adoption of a solidarity tax (10-0[3]), the elimination of several health, education and house deductions from personal income tax (10-0[3]) and the adoption of a tax surcharge (13-0)
474/ 2013	29.8.2013	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Rejected the adoption of new grounds for the dismissal of public servants under contract, as this breached the constitutional protection of job security and the prohibition of dismissal without fair cause (Art. 53 of the Constitution), as well as failed the proportionality test for a restriction of a fundamental right (Arts. 18 (2) of the Constitution) (6-1); • Rejected the adoption of new grounds of dismissal for public servants under nomination, since this breached their legitimate expectations protected by the principle of the rule of law (Art. 2 of the Constitution) (7-0)
602/ 2013	20.9.2013	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Rejected changes in the conditions of dismissal of private sector workers grounded on the extinction of the work post (10-2) and on worker inadequacy for the work post (13-0) because they breached the constitutional protection of job security and the prohibition of dismissal without fair cause (Art. 53 of the Constitution); • Rejected the nullity of collective agreements and work contracts that foresaw compensatory rest for supplementary work (7-6) and established the reduction of increases in holidays to a maximum of three days (9-4) because they breached the right to enter into collective agreements (Art. 53 (3) and (4) of the Constitution) and failed the proportionality test for a restriction of a fundamental right (Art. 18 (2) of the Constitution); • Upheld other measures, such as the introduction of individual (13-0) and collective 'bank hours' (7-6), the elimination of compensatory rest and the reduction of payment for extraordinary work (13-0), the elimination of several bank holidays (13-0), the revocation of holidays increased based on the worker's assiduity (13-0), the elimination of a requisite for dismissal based on worker inadequacy for the work post (13-0), new grounds for dismissal based on worker inadequacy for the work post (8-5), the nullity of collective agreements that foresaw higher compensation for the dismissal of workers (9-4) and a two-year suspension of retributions granted for supplementary work and for work on holidays (or the equivalent compensatory rest) included in collective agreements and work contracts (11-2);

(continued)

Table 2 (continued)

Case	Date	Ruling
		<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Rejected a permanent reduction of retributions granted for supplementary work and work on holidays (or the equivalent compensatory rest) included in collective agreements and work contracts because it breached the right to enter into collective agreements (Art. 53 (3) and (4) of the Constitution) and failed the proportionality test for a restriction of a fundamental right (Art. 18 (2) of the Constitution) (8-5).
794/2013	21.11.2013	Upheld the constitutionality of rules that increased the daily work of public servants from 7 to 8 hours and from 35 to 40 hours a week (7-0[6]).
862/2013	19.12.2013	Rejected permanent cuts in the pensions of former public servants since this breached the principle of the protection of legitimate expectations (13-0)
413/2014	30.5.2014	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Rejected cuts in public servants' wages included in the Budget Act for 2014 based on violation of the principle of equality (Art. 13 of the Constitution) (8-3 [2]), limited the effects of the declaration of unconstitutionality by safeguarding cuts made until the date of the decision of the Court (9-4); Rejected cuts included in the Budget Act for 2014 to unemployment and sickness benefits based on violation of the principle of proportionality enshrined in the principle of the rule of law (Art. 2 of the Constitution) (8-5); Rejected cuts in survival pensions included in the Budget Act for 2014 based on violation of the principle of equality (Art. 13 of the Constitution) (7-6); Upheled the suspension of the payment of pension supplements in public sector companies that had negative liquid results during three consecutive years (7-6)
572/2014	30.7.2014	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Accepted the applicability of pension cuts in 2014 (7-6); Upheled the increase of contributions to the health public insurance system included in the Budget Act for 2014 (12-1);
574/2014	14.9.2014	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Accepted cuts in public servants' wages during 2014 and 2015 in the percentages set in the Budget Act for 2011 (10-2[1]); Rejected cuts in public servants' wages planned for 2016, 2017 and 2018 based on violation of the principle of equality (Art. 13 of the Constitution) (8-5)
575/2014	14.9.2014	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Rejected cuts in pensions to be applied from 2015 onwards based on violation of the principle of the protection of pensioners protected by the principle of the rule of law (Art. 2 of the Constitution) (10-3)
141/2015	25.2.2015	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> Rejected the conditioning of the grant of a social benefit on a one-year minimum legal residence in the Portuguese territory because it breached the principle of equality (Art. 13 of the Constitution) (10-2)

Source Authors

^aJudges who concurred (in this case seven) and dissented (in this case three). In square brackets, judges who dissented partially (in this case two). According to Article 222 of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court has thirteen judges. Some of the decisions were decided with a lower number of judges.

^bThese measures were unsuccessfully challenged before the ECtHR in Da Conceição Matens v. Portugal, nos. 62235/12 and 57725/12, 8 October 2013 and the ECJ in Case C-128/12 Sindicato dos Bancários do Norte and Others v. BPN [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:149, in Case C-264/12 Sindicato Nacional dos Profissionais de Seguros e Afins v. Fidelidade Mundial [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2036; and in Case C-566/13 Jorge Iullo Assis dos Santos v. Banco de Portugal [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:209 (removed from the register by an order of the President of the Court of 25 March 2014).

internalise the European and international obligations of the Portuguese state.⁴⁶ In case 396/2011, the Court declared that the austerity measures were important to enforce the Growth and Stability Pact obligations, in case 353/2012 the Court recognised (wrongly) that the memoranda signed by the Portuguese Government with international and European institutions were legally binding to the extent that they were based on international law and EU law instruments, and in case 602/2013 the Court went through a detailed examination of how the provisions under review were a result of a direct transposition of the memoranda into national law. More recently, in case 575/2014, although any declaration on the legal nature of the European Commission's recommendations adopted in the context of the excessive deficit procedure was avoided, the Court considered that the objective set forth in the recommendations was binding (see above Sect. 1.3.4).

The Constitutional Court has always made the caveat that the austerity measures adopted during the international bailout to comply with the conditionality programmes imposed by the Troika were approved within the limits of the discretion given by international and European Union law. In other words, they were a direct result of a political option and, therefore, had to be reviewed according to the usual constitutional standards of adjudication. In this context, the Court rejected the adoption of a 'crisis law' criterion that would imply accepting the argument of the financial emergency of the state as a justification for austerity measures.⁴⁷ Instead it went through a case-by-case analysis of each measure, which determined the acceptance of some (mostly transitory) and the rejection of others because they breached the principle of equality, failed the proportionality test or did not meet legitimate expectations. This case law, which in several decisions was adopted with a slim majority inside the Court, was praised by some authors⁴⁸ but contested by others who accused the Court of inconsistency and of engaging in judicial activism.⁴⁹

2.8 Judicial Review of EU Measures: Access to Justice and the Standard of Review

2.8.1 We found three cases since 2001 in which a preliminary ruling regarding the validity of an EU law act was requested by an applicant in a Portuguese court, but only in one was a preliminary reference sent to Luxembourg.

⁴⁶ Joerges 2014, p. 44, identifies a 'signal' of judicial opposition against the European crisis management in the Portuguese Constitutional Court case law, although he recognises that it is a rather weak signal since the implementation of austerity measures was objected to on the basis of violation of the principles of proportionality and equality.

⁴⁷ Urbano 2014, pp. 14–15.

⁴⁸ The most notable example being Reis Novais 2014a.

⁴⁹ See the contributions included in Almeida Ribeiro and Pereira Coutinho 2014.

The first two were identical and concerned a corrigendum to Council Regulation (EC) 1771/2003 of 7 October 2003 regarding quotas for certain fishery products.⁵⁰ The corrigendum was published on 31 March 2004 and clarified that the quotas were applicable from the date of the entry into force of the regulation (13 October 2003) and not from the beginning of 2003, as it was stated in the original version of the regulation. The applicant in the national proceedings argued that the corrigendum had a retroactive effect and thus materially should be considered as an amendment and not a correction to the regulation. The corrigendum was thus deemed invalid by the national court, as it had not followed the EU legislative procedure, namely voting by qualified majority in the Council, and could not be considered as an EU legal act, since it was not foreseen in Art. 288 TFEU.⁵¹

The Portuguese administrative court of appeal refused to apply the corrigendum based on a violation of the constitutional principle of the non-retroactivity of tax law (Art. 103(3) of the Constitution). These are, as far as we know, the first decisions on the unconstitutionality of an EU law act adopted in the Portuguese legal order. According to the Court:

the (EU) law provisions in question breach ... the constitutional principle of non-retroactivity of tax law ... Art. 204 of the Constitution grants a national judge the competence to judicially raise and declare the unconstitutionality and, therefore, the internal inapplicability of the (EU) law provision.⁵²

These decisions are also noteworthy because the Portuguese court went on to declare in an obiter dictum that the corrigendum was invalid but a preliminary reference was not mandatory: according to the ‘acte clair doctrine’ set forth in Cilfit, the grounds of invalidity argued by the applicant were said to be in these cases ‘completely clear’.⁵³

In the third case, the respondent in the national proceedings invoked several infringements of Art. 107 TFEU to argue for the invalidity of the Commission Decision 2011/346/EU of 20 July 2010 on the State aid C 33/09, which was implemented by Portugal in the form of a state guarantee to a bank. This claim was dismissed by the ECJ.⁵⁴

2.8.2 A systematic contrast in the standard of judicial review applied by the EU courts and by the Portuguese courts has not been generally perceptible until now. However, we should be aware of the possibility of a more serious and systematic

⁵⁰ Corrigendum to Council Regulation (EC) No 1771/2003 of 7 October 2003 amending Regulation (EC) No 2803/2000 as regards the opening and increase of autonomous Community tariff quotas for certain fishery products, [2004] OJ L 258/69.

⁵¹ Administrative Appeal Court (South), 22 May 2007, case 01685/07, and 8 July 2008, case 2296/08.

⁵² Translation by the authors.

⁵³ See, however, Case C-461/03 Gaston Schul [2005] ECR I-10513, para. 23, where the ECJ declared that the interpretation adopted in the Cilfit judgment refers to questions of interpretation and thus cannot be extended to questions relating to the validity of EU acts.

⁵⁴ See Case C-667/13 Banco Privado Português and Massa Insolvente do Banco Privado Português [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2015:151, para. 17.

contrast between the case law of the ECJ and that of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), with unavoidable repercussions on the scrutiny powers of the national courts. The most recent example is the judgment of the ECtHR, Tarakhel v. Switzerland,⁵⁵ of 4 November 2014, concerning the enforcement of the Dublin III regulation, which contrasts, to some extent, with the judgment of the ECJ in N.S. and Others.^{56,57}

For its part, Opinion 2/13 of 18 December 2014 of the ECJ,⁵⁸ having seriously obstructed the accession of the EU to the ECHR, does not contribute to the solution of this problem. As it is well known, EU Member States are all Contracting Parties to the ECHR and in that quality they are bound by the latter, even when they enforce EU law. Furthermore, according to Art. 2 of Protocol No 8 relating to Art. 6(2) of the TEU on the accession of the Union to the ECHR, the agreement relating to this accession 'shall ensure that nothing therein affects the situation of Member States in relation to the European Convention, in particular in relation to the Protocols thereto'.

It is to be seen if the above-mentioned divergences are sufficient to make a case for a stricter standard of judicial review of EU measures.

2.8.3 The Constitutional Court and the two Portuguese Supreme Courts (Supreme Court of Justice and Supreme Administrative Court) take in general a more deferential than vigorous approach to the review of constitutionality and of legality, oriented by a conception of self-restraint imposed by the principle of the separation of powers. The idea is that such courts do not want to become alternative legislators or administrators when exercising their judicial review.

This does not mean that a considerable number of legislative and executive acts are not annulled not only on grounds of lack of competence or infringement of formal or procedural requirements,⁵⁹ but also due to infringement of substantive constitutional law (fundamental rights and principles). Some of the judgments referred to above in Sect. 2.7.3 (Table 2) are good examples of annulment judgments of the Constitutional Court on grounds of the violation of the fundamental principles of equality, proportionality and the protection of legitimate expectations, as concretised by a previous, consolidated jurisprudence, which did not change substantially in those judgments (notwithstanding some occasional and limited adaptations). They also show that it is not correct to affirm in general terms that the Constitutional Court became significantly more vigorous in its approach during the economic and financial crisis and that it built upon the principles and tests developed before the crisis. It was rather the legislator, urged by the Memorandum of Understanding signed with the Troika, that revealed a controversial political will to ⁵⁵ Tarakhel v. Switzerland [GC], no. 29217/12, ECHR 2014 (extracts).

⁵⁶ Joined cases C-411/10 and 493/11 N.S. and Others [2011] ECR I-13905.

⁵⁷ Maiani 2015.

⁵⁸ Opinion 2/13 Opinion pursuant to Art. 218(11) TFEU [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2454.

⁵⁹ When the courts annul a measure on grounds of lack of competence or of an infringement of formal or procedural requirements, they normally do not review the measure on the grounds of an infringement of substantial law, even if such infringement is invoked by the parties.

go even ‘beyond the (bailout) agreement’.⁶⁰ This voluntary stance led to the adoption of a considerable number of austerity measures, including of budgetary nature (e.g. cuts in public servants’ wages, suspension of two months’ salary for public servants and pensioners, cuts in unemployment and health benefits) in contradiction with the above-mentioned constitutional principles, in their previously stabilised interpretation, on an unprecedented scale.

2.8.4 On several occasions the Constitutional Court and the two Supreme Courts have reviewed national measures implementing EU legislation through the application of internal constitutional and legal standards. Concerning EU measures, such courts have so far not expressly adopted a position similar to the German Constitutional Court’s *Solange II*⁶¹ judgment. However, Art. 7(6) of the Constitution – in so far as it subjects ‘the joint exercise, in cooperation or by the Union’s institutions, of the powers needed to construct and deepen the European Union’ to ‘respect for the fundamental principles of a democratic state based on the rule of law’ – creates a basis for a claim by the Constitutional Court of the competence to review, as a last resort, EU measures on grounds of inconsistency with one of those fundamental principles, in the not very likely case of failure to safeguard such principles at the EU level.

2.8.5 Article 2 TEU, in so far as it enumerates the list of common fundamental values and principles binding on the EU and also the Member States, allows, in principle, the Member States to fill any potential gap in judicial review. However, if the contrast between the case law of the ECJ and the case law of the ECtHR becomes aggravated, the national courts cannot continue to refrain from scrutinising acts of EU law from the perspective of their compatibility with the ECHR. As a matter of fact, Member States fully maintain their quality of Contracting Parties in that Convention in the sense that their obligations are not reduced or suspended because of EU membership. Moreover, with or without accession to the ECHR by the EU, the fundamental rights guaranteed by the ECHR are general principles of EU law. From this point of view, the use by national courts of the standard of human rights protection under the ECHR to scrutinise EU measures and not the standard used by the EU itself would not be problematic vis-à-vis the principle of sincere cooperation enshrined in Art. 4(3) TEU, even if through this kind of scrutiny the primacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law could eventually be compromised (see below Sect. 2.11.1).

Furthermore, in circumstances of a growing contrast between the case law of the ECJ and of the ECtHR, the latter might be led to re-examine its *Bosphorus*⁶² judgment.

⁶⁰ Pedro Passos Coelho – the Portuguese Prime Minister from 2011–2015 – in an interview to Reuters given after he had won the parliamentary elections held in May 2011. <http://uk.reuters.com/article/2011/06/06/uk-portugal-election-idUKTRE7532MA20110606>.

⁶¹ 19 BVerfGE 73, 339 [1986] (Solange II).

⁶² Bosphorus Hava Yolları Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Şirketi v. Ireland [GC], no. 45036/98, ECHR 2005-VI.

2.8.6 The broader issue of equal treatment of individuals falling within the scope of EU law and those falling within the scope of domestic protection of constitutional rights is a permanent question which did not have to wait for the Advocaten voor the Wereld case to arise. This issue is very present for instance in respect to reverse discrimination or discrimination against a Member State's own nationals who have not exercised their rights of free movement.

In our view, this ECJ judgment demonstrates sufficiently that the risk of discrimination within the scope of the EAW FD in what concerns the nulla poena sine lege principle is very low. In any case, the courts of the Member States in question have an important role to play in preventing such discrimination (see above Sect. 2.3.2).

2.9 Other Constitutional Rights and Principles

2.9.1 Article 165 of the Constitution describes the list of matters of exclusive legislative competence of the Portuguese Parliament. However, from Art. 165(1)(c) and (d) we can conclude that, subject to previous authorisation by Parliament,⁶³ the Government may legislate, through an executive law (Decreto-Lei), on the definition of crimes, sentences, security measures, criminal procedure, disciplinary infractions and administrative offences. This dichotomy between 'exclusive responsibility of Parliament to legislate' (reserva absoluta de competência legislativa) and 'partially exclusive responsibility of Parliament to legislate' (reserva relativa de competência legislativa) applies generally and was established in the Constitution before the accession of Portugal to the EU. These provisions must be read in conjunction with Art. 112(8) of the Constitution according to which 'the transposition of European Union legislation and other legal acts into the internal legal system shall take the form of a law (lei), an executive law (decreto-lei), or ... a regional legislative decree' (see above Table 1, 1997).

2.10 Common Constitutional Traditions

2.10.1 Article 2 TEU in conjunction with the ECHR encompasses the so-called Europe-wide common constitutional traditions. Principles like nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege, the right to judicial protection, the right to a fair trial, etc., should be regarded as corollaries of the principle of the rule of law and, to that extent, also as common constitutional traditions.

⁶³ According to Art. 165(2), every act of the Portuguese Parliament granting authorisation to the Government to legislate 'shall define the object, purpose, extent and duration of such authorisation, which may be extended'.

Some of these common traditions coexist with idiosyncratic elements resulting from a national constitutional identity or simply from the national history, as is the case, for instance, with the requirements for the protection of the dignity of the human person consecrated in the Bonner Grundgesetz. This was already recognised by the ECJ in the Omega judgment.⁶⁴

2.10.2 It should not be forgotten that the concept of ‘common constitutional traditions’ was adopted by the ECJ at a moment when the then European Communities were not bound by a catalogue of fundamental rights of their own. Since nowadays the EU is bound by Art. 2 and Art. 6 TEU and by the Charter of Fundamental Rights, which are largely based on the common constitutional traditions of the Member States, the latter tend to be absorbed by the former. Therefore, we do not see much merit in the proposition that national courts refer to national constitutions before questioning the ECJ in the framework of the preliminary ruling procedure, except in cases in which the fundamental right or principle invoked has an idiosyncratic element which is deemed to be essential to the constitutional identity of the Member State in question.

In any case, the Charter, for its part, foresees in broader terms in Art. 52(4) that in so far as the Charter recognises fundamental rights as they result from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States, these rights shall be interpreted in harmony with those traditions. This provision is obviously mandatory for the ECJ.

2.11 Article 53 of the Charter and the Issue of Stricter Constitutional Standards

2.11.1 According to Art. 52(3) of the Charter, in so far as the Charter contains rights that correspond to rights guaranteed by the ECHR, the meaning and scope of those rights shall be the same as those laid down by the said Convention. This provision does not prevent EU law from providing more extensive protection. It also does not preclude the existence of cases in which the standard is increased to match that provided under national constitutions. This is expressly allowed by Art. 53 of the Charter, although such authorisation cannot be interpreted as absolute or unlimited.⁶⁵

As the ECJ stated in the Melloni judgment, the application of national standards of protection of fundamental rights is allowed at the stage of implementing EU law, provided that the level of protection granted by the Charter, as interpreted by the said Court, and the primacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law are not thereby compromised.⁶⁶ This judgment confirms that Art. 53, in fine, must be balanced with the fundamental principles of the EU legal order, namely those enumerated by the ECJ in Melloni.⁶⁷ However, this is not incompatible with a presumption (juris tantum) in favour of a ‘more extensive protection’ allowed, but not imposed, by Art. 53 of the Charter.

⁶⁴ Case C-36/02 Omega [2004] ECR I-09609.

⁶⁵ See Canotilho 2013.

⁶⁶ Case C-399/11 Melloni [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:107, para. 60.

In any case, it should not be forgotten that the highest protection ensured by EU law may be the protection established by the Charter, by the ECHR or by national constitutions, as there may be ‘differences between the legally relevant levels of protection that derive both from the texts and from their interpretation/practical application, done by the different judicial organs of the different levels of the system’.⁶⁸ In that context, it becomes clear that the ECHR, as interpreted by the ECtHR, does not necessarily provide a ‘minimum floor’ of protection of fundamental rights and that the Charter and national constitutions do not always provide a higher level of protection. If a right recognised by the ECHR, as interpreted by the ECtHR, which corresponds to a right guaranteed by the Charter, provides more extensive protection than the latter, the national courts, when they are implementing Union law, must enforce the right as interpreted by the ECHR. As a matter of fact, Art. 52(3) of the Charter does not prevent courts from providing more extensive protection than the ECHR, but prohibits such courts from providing less protection than the latter.

2.12 Democratic Debate on Constitutional Rights and Values

2.12.1 At the time of the national transposition of the EAW FD and of the Data Retention Directive there was a mild debate in the national Parliament concerning the conformity of the transposition acts with the fundamental rights granted by the Portuguese Constitution. In both cases, a parliamentary majority considered that these legislative acts were not incompatible with the Constitution.

2.12.2 The fact that a national Constitutional Court is confronted with ‘important constitutional issues’ ‘at the stage of implementing EU law’ obviously does not preclude the exercise of judicial review of the national measures at stake, eventually in dialogue with the ECJ. If the measures are of EU origin, their validity must be challenged before the ECJ through a request for a preliminary ruling. In parallel with this multilevel judicial review, the democratic debate about national measures implementing the contested EU law may proceed at national level.

2.12.3 If the cases in which important constitutional issues have been identified by a number of constitutional courts concern EU measures directly, those constitutional courts must request the ECJ to give a preliminary ruling on their validity and seize ⁶⁷ See Wathelet 2014, p. 444.

⁶⁸ In that sense, see Silveira, Froufe and Canotilho, p. 742.

the opportunity to explain in detail why they think such EU measures should be invalidated. If the cases in which such important constitutional issues concern national measures implementing EU law, the constitutional courts are usually competent to review such national measures.

2.13 Experts' Analysis on the Protection of Constitutional Rights in EU Law

2.13.1 We share concerns on the reduction in the standard of protection and in the rule of law in some domains where rights arise directly from EU law, such as in immigration and asylum (see above Sect. 2.8.2). However, we do not consider it accurate to declare that an overall reduction in the standard of protection of national constitutional rights in the context of or due to EU law has occurred.

That is in principle not the case with regard to the so-called ‘personal rights, freedoms and guarantees’ enumerated in Arts. 24 to 47 of the Constitution, nor with regard to the ‘rights, freedoms and guarantees’ concerning participation in politics established in Arts. 48 to 52 (see above Sect. 2.1.1). The same cannot be said about the ‘workers’ rights, freedoms and guarantees’ (Arts. 53 to 57) and the ‘economic, social and cultural rights’ (Arts. 58 to 79). The 2011 Memorandum of Understanding signed with the Commission – which may be considered binding EU law⁶⁹ – had indeed as its object or effect a reduction in the standard of protection of some of such rights, freedoms and guarantees (see infra Sect. 3.5.1).

In any case, it should not be forgotten, on the one hand, that some of the national legislative and executive measures implementing the Memorandum were rejected by the Constitutional Court, such as, for instance, a legislative act foreseeing the dismissal of workers without fair cause, in flagrant contradiction with Art. 53 (which expressly prohibits such dismissal to protect job security; see above Table 2). On the other hand, it should be borne in mind that the implementation and enforcement of economic, social and cultural rights is made under the so-called ‘reserve of the possible’, i.e. under the constraints of the financial and material resources of the state or under a ‘certain empirical situation’.⁷⁰ Furthermore, the constitutional case law concerning such rights, freedoms and guarantees has always been cautious, contained and ‘condescending regarding the margins of political option of the legislator’.⁷¹ Neither does such case law interpret the Constitution as establishing a general principle of prohibition of ‘social retrocession’ i.e. of reversibility of the economic, social and cultural rights, freedoms and guarantees, except when the object or the effect of the measure is to jeopardise the essential core of a minimal existence which is inherent to the respect for the dignity of the human person.⁷²

⁶⁹ According to Pereira Coutinho 2013a, p. 166, the Memorandum (and its subsequent supplements) is an atypical act of EU law that specifies measures that condition the release of instalments of a bailout authorised and structured by Council Implementing Decisions (e.g. 334/2011, of 17 of May) adopted under the scope of a regulation (407/2010, of 11 of May) that created an emergency mechanism for the financial rescue of eurozone Member States (the European Financial Stabilization Mechanism). Its binding nature for the Portuguese state is especially connected to compliance with budgetary consolidation obligations stemming from Art. 126 TFEU on the excessive deficit procedure. A Council recommendation (566/2012, of 2 of October) mentions the need to fulfil measures foreseen in the memorandum in order to put an end to the situation of excessive deficit (Recital 18). The breach of these measures may determine, as a last resort, the imposition of sanctions foreseen in Art. 126 (11) TFEU. On the binding legal nature of the Memorandum see also Kilpatrick 2014, pp. 411–412.

2.13.2 Some specific reductions are not inevitable, as the case law of the ECtHR has already demonstrated. We see merit in the following paths for upholding and enhancing the protection of constitutional rights: (i) EU accession to the ECHR, although the latter, as interpreted by the ECtHR, does not necessarily provide just a minimum level of protection (see above Sect. 2.11.1); (ii) a more proactive role for the national constitutional courts and/or supreme courts in highlighting the issues surrounding the standard of protection of constitutional rights in European judicial dialogues; (iii) a more proactive role for other national institutions, such as national parliaments and ombudsmen in stressing constitutional issues in European governance.

2.13.3 To date the Portuguese Constitutional Court has not raised any constitutional issues in preliminary ruling requests to the ECJ.

3 Constitutional Issues in Global Governance

3.1 Constitutional Rules on International Organisations and the Ratification of Treaties

3.1.1 Article 7 of the Constitution sets the basic guidelines for Portugal’s international relations by establishing the principles and objectives that ought to be upheld by the state when participating in international co-operation:

- (1) In its international relations Portugal shall be governed by the principles of national independence, respect for human rights, the rights of peoples, equality between states, the peaceful settlement of international conflicts, non-interference in the internal affairs of other states and cooperation with all other peoples with a view to the emancipation and progress of mankind;
- (2) Portugal shall advocate the abolition of imperialism, colonialism and all other forms of aggression, dominion and exploitation in the relations between peoples, as well as simultaneous and controlled general disarmament, the dissolution of the political-military blocs and the setting up of a collective security system, all with a view to the creation of an international order with the ability to ensure peace and justice in the relations between peoples;

⁷⁰ See recently Rosado Pacheco 2015, p. 276.

⁷¹ Alexandrino 2011, p. 187 and also Mac Crorie 2014, p. 117.

⁷² See Mac Crorie 2014, pp. 118–121 and Botelho 2015, p. 253.

(iii) Portugal shall recognise peoples' rights to self-determination and independence and to development, as well as the right to insurrection against all forms of oppression.

Conditions on the delegation of powers to international organisations are only expressly foreseen regarding agreements concerning the deepening of the European Union (Art. 7(6)).

Finally, constitutional compatibility with the Statute of the International Criminal Court is ensured by Art. 7(7):

With a view to achieving an international justice that promotes respect for the rights of both individual human persons and peoples, and subject to the provisions governing complementarity and the other terms laid down in the Rome Statute, Portugal may accept the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court.

3.1.2 In 1997, some minor stylistic changes were introduced in Arts. 7(1) to (3). In 2001, an extraordinary amendment procedure was initiated with the purpose of harmonising the Constitution with the Statute of the International Criminal Court. The latter included several provisions that were constitutionally problematic, namely the possibility under the Statute to sentence someone to life in prison and the irrelevance of constitutional immunities. Portuguese scholars suggested two options to constitutionally accommodate the Statute: either through amendments to the provisions that collided with the Statute or through the adoption of a single provision that accepted the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court.⁷³ This last option is now included in Art. 7(7).⁷⁴

3.1.3 Portuguese legal doctrine and courts do not highlight any necessity to update Art. 7 in order to reflect new trends in international law or in global governance, namely regarding the transfer of powers to the transnational level or the need to uphold constitutional values in international cooperation more effectively.

3.1.4 See above Sect. 1.5.3 in Part 1.

3.2 The Position of International Law in National Law

3.2.1 Article 8(2) of the Constitution foresees the conditions for the application of treaty law in the domestic legal order:

The rules set out in duly ratified or passed international agreements shall come into force in Portuguese internal law once they have been officially published, and shall remain so for as long as they are internationally binding on the Portuguese state.

⁷³ On this debate, see Moreira 2004.

⁷⁴ Bacelar Gouveia 2001, pp. 639–640, considers that this solution does not solve conflicts with specific constitutional provisions. The same author goes even further by stating that Art. 7(7) is an ‘unconstitutional constitutional’ amendment. See Bacelar Gouveia 1998, p. 1484.

This provision adopts a monistic system where the internal application of international conventions is conditioned on their ratification (treaties) or approbation (agreements), publication in the official journal and entry into force in the international legal order.

The Constitution is silent about the position of international law within the hierarchy of the domestic sources of law. The majority of legal doctrine, which is closely followed by the courts, considers international law to rank superior to ordinary law but inferior to constitutional law (see below Sect. 3.4.1).

3.2.2 Portuguese international law scholars still teach the classic distinction between monism and dualism.⁷⁵ However, since nowadays there is wide support for monism with the supremacy of international law,⁷⁶ the distinction is usually used to describe the choice of methodology for incorporating international law into the domestic legal realm. This, in turn, is mostly irrelevant for the international legal order given the developments in the legal regime of the responsibility of states for internationally wrongful acts.⁷⁷

Legal integration with EU law renewed the debate. In the Internationale Handelsgesellschaft case, the ECJ declared the supremacy of EU law over national constitutional law.⁷⁸ The Luxembourg court envisions a ‘European monism’ in which it always has the final say on the resolution of conflicts between EU law and national law.⁷⁹ This perspective has been rejected by some national constitutional courts, which have not waived the so-called Kompetenz-Kompetenz to review the constitutionality of EU law.⁸⁰ These positions have been challenged in the last two decades by a pluralist (for some dualist) perspective on legal integration. This is based on the idea that the EU and national legal orders have different ‘rules of recognition’ (in the Hartian sense)⁸¹ but this does not necessarily entail a conflict of applicable norms if the courts in both legal orders respect common principles and rules of what has been described as ‘contrapunctual law’.⁸²

The contemporary relevance of the monism/dualism debate became clear in the Kadi decisions of the ECJ. This case presented concurring monist (General Court) and dualist (Court of Justice) perspectives on the relations between EU law and ⁷⁵ Amongst others, Duarte 2014, pp. 269–280.

⁷⁶ Based in Art. 27 of the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, according to which a state ‘may not invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty’.

⁷⁷ See Draft Articles on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts, November 2001, Supplement No. 10 (A/56/10), Chap. IV. E. 1. <http://www.refworld.org/docid/3ddb8f804.html>.

⁷⁸ Case 11-70 Internationale Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 01125.

⁷⁹ Kumm 1999, p. 354.

⁸⁰ The most famous case being the Maastricht decision of the German Constitutional Court [2 BvR 2134/92 e 2 BvR 2159/92, Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts (1993) 89:155].

⁸¹ MacCormick 1993, pp. 8–9.

⁸² Poiares Maduro 2003.

international law.⁸³ Both reveal that one of the effects of globalisation is the increasing incapacity of a simple monist answer based on the supremacy of international law to offer solutions to every systemic conflict between legal orders in an increasing fragmented transnational legal environment.

3.3 Democratic Control

3.3.1 The Portuguese Parliament adopts international treaties and international agreements that address matters included in its exclusive competence, or which the Government deems fit to submit for its consideration (Art. 161(i)). The negotiation of international treaties and agreements is a competence reserved solely for the Government (Art. 197(b)). The Parliament Rules of Procedure (Law 1/2007 of 20 of August) does not foresee a specific procedure dedicated to monitoring international organisations beyond the initial process of ratification. An ordinary examination may, in any event, be made either in a parliamentary commission or in the plenary of Parliament.

We are not aware of any study on the extent of parliamentary debates on substantive matters arising from international obligations.

3.3.2 Notwithstanding the fact that the Constitutional revision of 1997 introduced the possibility, no referendums have ever been held in relation to international organisations or treaties.

3.4 Judicial Review

3.4.1 The majority of Portuguese doctrine and courts consider that the Portuguese Constitution has supremacy over treaty law and acts of international organisations.⁸⁴ Article 204 of the Constitution states that in matters that are brought to trial, the courts shall not apply rules that breach the provisions of the Constitution. However, the principle of pacta sunt servanda obliges courts to forestall normative conflicts as much as possible by interpreting constitutional norms in conformity with international law.⁸⁵ If such an interpretation is not possible, the court is bound to not apply the international law provision that breaches the Constitution.⁸⁶ In this case, an appeal must be lodged to the Constitutional Court by the Public ⁸³ Case T-85/09 Kadi v. Commission [2010] ECR II-05177; C-584/10 P Commission and Others v. Kadi, [2013] ECLI:EU:C:2013:518.

⁸⁴ This reasoning does not apply to general international law, namely ius cogens norms, which are considered to have a supraconstitutional character. See Bacelar Gouveia 2013, pp. 418–423.

⁸⁵ Duarte 2014, p. 307.

⁸⁶ See, for instance, Supreme Court Decision 27 November 2007, case 07B4055.

Prosecutor's Office (Art. 280(1)(a)). If the constitutionality of international law is raised during judicial proceedings but is dismissed by the court, a constitutional review by the Constitutional Court may be initiated upon the request of one of the parties to the case (Art. 280(1)(b)). A declaration of unconstitutionality of a binding international treaty by the Constitutional Court does not necessarily entail a violation of the pacta sunt servanda principle. Article 277(2) of the Constitution safeguards the application of international law provisions:

On condition that the rules laid down by properly ratified international treaties are applied in the legal system of the other party thereto, the unconstitutionality in form or substance of such rules shall not prevent their application in the Portuguese legal system, save if such unconstitutionality results from the breach of a fundamental provision of this Constitution.

The majority of Portuguese legal doctrine and jurisprudence argue that the hierarchical position of international treaties in the Portuguese legal order is superior to that of ordinary national law (i.e. all other legal acts of the Portuguese legal order except the Constitution).⁸⁷ One of the arguments invoked to support this position is the obligation to respect the pacta sunt servanda rule and its corresponding duty to implement international obligations domestically in good faith, which could be easily breached if it were possible for courts to trump international treaty law that contradicted ordinary laws based on the application of the lex posterior derogat priori principle.⁸⁸ Another argument derives from Art. 70(i) of the Law of the Constitutional Court that states that an appeal may be lodged with the Constitutional Court against ordinary court decisions that reject 'the application of a rule appearing in a legislative act on the grounds that it contradicts an international convention'.⁸⁹ The review is, however, restricted to 'questions of a juridic-constitutional and juridic-international nature implied in the decision submitted for appeal' (Art. 71(2) of the Statute of the Constitutional Court) and, therefore, does not include assessment of conflicts between domestic law and treaty law.⁹⁰

3.5 The Social Welfare Dimension of the Constitution

3.5.1 The Portuguese Constitution protects a wide range of social rights, such as the right to social security (Art. 63), healthcare (Art. 64) and appropriate housing (Art. 65). Between 2011 and 2014, the adoption of an International Monetary Fund-inspired programme led to a 'dramatic' erosion of these rights,⁹¹ namely ⁸⁷ See, for instance, Supreme Administrative Court, case 0308/07, 28 November 2007, or Supreme Administrative Court, case 68/09, 25 March 2009.

⁸⁸ Bacelar Gouveia 2013, pp. 424–426.

⁸⁹ Official translation taken from the website of the Portuguese Constitutional Court with minor stylistic changes introduced by the authors.

⁹⁰ Constitutional Court, case 290/2002, 3 July.

⁹¹ This adjective was used in this context by Nogueira de Brito 2014, p. 69. See also Canotilho 2015.

through the adoption of drastic cuts in several social allowances and in expenditure in the education and health sectors. The Constitutional Court rejected several elements of the programme (see above Table 2). However, the Court also reversed a long-standing opinion of the majority of Portuguese constitutional law scholarship regarding the welfare state, according to which it would be unconstitutional to lower current pensions and other social benefits, such as illness and unemployment allowances (See above Sect. 2.13.1).⁹²

3.5.2 Portugal had to apply an austerity programme designed by the International Monetary Fund with the assistance of the European Central Bank and the European Commission. The opacity of the International Monetary Fund modus operandi seems to have contaminated the EU institutions. For instance, the memorandum of understanding signed between the Commission and the Portuguese state in May 2011 was not published in any official journal – Portuguese (Diário da República) or European (Official Journal of the European Union) – and was not even translated into Portuguese.⁹³ Moreover, during the three-year Troika programme there was always some degree of uncertainty regarding whether the measures proposed by the Government were part of the conditionality agreed with the international institutions.⁹⁴

3.6 Constitutional Rights and Values in Selected Areas of Global Governance

3.6.1 The Constitutional Court decision of 5 July 2012 is an example of a high profile case where constitutional rights and the rule of law may have been affected by security concerns associated with global governance trends.⁹⁵

The Constitutional Court declared that a judicial decision that revoked authorisation for the extradition of an Indian national to India based on the International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombing⁹⁶ on the grounds of violation of the principle of speciality, is just one of the elements to be taken into consideration

⁹² On this topic, see Loureiro 2014, pp. 196–197. This jurisprudence was criticised by Novais 2014b.

⁹³ Since the memoranda are mentioned in the Council implementation decisions as documents that establish conditions for the delivery of financial assistance to Member States, the absence of publication and translation is a clear violation of the principle of transparency (Art. 1 TEU) as well as of the principle of the linguistic diversity of the European Union enshrined in Art. 6(3) TEU. On this topic, see Pereira Coutinho 2013a, pp. 166–167 and Kilpatrick 2015, pp. 342–344.

⁹⁴ See the discussion on the introduction of the ‘Taxa Social Única’ (‘Common Social Tax’) in Pereira Coutinho 2013a, p. 160, footnote 37.

⁹⁵ Case 360/2012, 5 July. For a commentary on this decision, see Pereira Coutinho 2013b.

⁹⁶ International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombing, of 25 November 1997, UN Doc A/52/49 1998, entered into force 23 May 2001.

by the Portuguese Ministry for Foreign Affairs in its political relations with the Indian State.

The Indian national based his claim on Art. 16(2) of Law 144/99, which provides a person who is subject to extradition the right to invoke a violation of the principle of speciality in court. Unfortunately, the Constitutional Court decision of 5 July 2012 determines that such a right does not have an effective legal remedy. If the decision of the Portuguese courts on the violation of the principle of speciality is just one element to be taken into consideration in the diplomatic relations between Portugal and India, then there is a risk that the executive branch could simply disregard the decision, for example for plausible Realpolitik considerations.

The Portuguese Supreme Court of Justice had earlier taken a different path on the same case. In 11 January 2012, the Court confirmed the revocation of the extradition authorisation and demanded that the executive branch ask for the surrender of the Indian national.⁹⁷ The Court declared that the Portuguese state, as a sovereign state, could not be immune from a judicial decision of its highest court, and, therefore, had to act in conformity with that decision. In this case there was simply no leeway for the Government to decide the best course of political or diplomatic actions to adopt towards India. In fact, any other interpretation would withdraw any effect utile from Art. 16(2) of Law 144/99 and ignore the human rights dimension of the principle of speciality.

References

- Alexandrino J. (2011) O Discurso dos Direitos (Rights discourses). Coimbra Editora, Coimbra.
- Almeida Ribeiro G., Pereira Coutinho L. (eds.) (2014) O Tribunal Constitucional e a Crise: ensaios críticos (The Constitutional Court and the crisis: critical essays). Almedina, Coimbra.
- Bacelar Gouveia J. (1998) O estado de exceção no Direito Constitucional – entre a eficiência e a normatividade das estruturas de defesa extraordinária da Constituição (The state of exception in constitutional law – between the efficiency and the normativity of the structures of extraordinary defence of the Constitution). Almedina, Coimbra.
- Bacelar Gouveia J. (2001) Reflexões sobre a 5^a Revisão da Constituição (Reflexions on the 5th revision of the Constitution). In: Miranda, J. et al. (eds.) Nos 25 anos da Constituição da República Portuguesa de 1976 – evolução constitucional e perspectiva de futuro (On the 25 years of the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic – constitutional evolution and perspectives for the future). AAFDL, Lisbon, pp. 631–649.
- Bacelar Gouveia J. (2011) Manual de Direito Constitucional (Constitutional law textbook). Almedina, Coimbra.
- Bacelar Gouveia J. (2013) Direito Internacional Públco (Public international law). Almedina, Coimbra.
- Bacelar Gouveia J. (2015) Constitutional Law in Portugal, 2nd edition. Kluwer, Leiden.
- Backlanoff E. (1996) Breve experiência de socialismo em Portugal: o sector das empresas estatais (The short experience of socialism in Portugal: the public companies sector). Análise Social 138:925–947.

⁹⁷ Case 111/11.7 YFLSB.

- Barroso L. (2006) Influência da Reconstitucionalização de Portugal sobre a Experiência Constitucional Brasileira (Influence of the reconstitutionalisation of Portugal on the Brazilian constitutional experience). Themis (Special Edition):71–80.
- Besselink L., Claes M., Imamovic S., Reestman J.H. (2014) National Constitutional Avenues for European Integration. European Parliament, Brussels.
- Botelho C. (2015) Os Direitos Sociais em Tempos de Crise (Social rights in times of crisis). Almedina, Coimbra.
- Braga de Macedo J. (1990) External Liberalization with Ambiguous Public Response: The Experience of Portugal. Nova SBE Working Paper n.º 138. <http://libraries.fe.unl.pt/>.
- Caeiro P., Fidalgo S. (2009) The Portuguese experience of mutual recognition in criminal matters: five years of European Arrest Warrant. In Vernimmen-Van Tiggelen G. (ed.) The future of mutual recognition in criminal matters in the European Union. Editions de l'U.L.B., Brussels, pp. 445–463.
- Caeiro P., Fidalgo S. (2015) O mandado de detenção europeu na experiência portuguesa: tópicos da primeira década (The European Arrest Warrant in Portugal: notes on the first decade). In Caeiro P. (ed.) Temas de Extradição e Entrega (Topics on extradition and surrender). Almedina, Coimbra, 2015, pp. 157–194.
- Canotilho M. (2013) Comentário ao Art. 53 (Commentary on Art. 53). In: Silveira A., Canotilho M. (eds.) Carta dos Direitos Fundamentais da União Europeia Comentada (Comments on the Charter of Fundamental Rights). Almedina, Coimbra, pp. 606–624.
- Canotilho M. (2015) Country Report on Portugal. The impact of the crisis on fundamental rights across Member States of the EU. Studies for the LIBE Committee, European Parliament.
- Duarte M.L. (1994) O Tratado da União Europeia e a Garantia da Constituição (The European Union Treaty and the Constitution). In: Marques dos Santos, A. et al. (eds.) Estudos em Memória do Professor Doutor João de Castro Mendes (Studies in tribute to Professor Doctor João de Castro Mendes). Lex, Lisbon, pp. 667–715.
- Duarte M.L. (2014) Direito Internacional Público e Ordem Jurídica Global do Século XXI (Public international law and the global legal order of the XXI century). Coimbra Editora, Coimbra.
- Fausto Quadros C.J. (1978) Problemas Políticos e Constitucionais do alargamento da Comunidade (Political and constitutional problems of the Community enlargement). Revista de Política Externa 2:33–42.
- Figueiredo Dias J., Caeiro P. (2013) Comentário ao Acórdão Advocaten voor de Wereld VZW c. Leden van de Ministerraad (Comment on the case Advocaten voor de Wereld VZW c. Leden van de Ministerraad). In: Paz Ferreira E., Duarte M.L., Sousa Ferro M. (eds.) Jurisprudência. Cunha Rodrigues – Comentários (Cunha Rodrigues jurisprudence – commentaries). AAFDL, Lisbon, pp. 14–29.
- Guerra Martins A.M. (2000), A Natureza Jurídica da Revisão do Tratado da União Europeia (The legal nature of the amendment of the European Union Treaty). Lex, Lisbon.
- Guerra Martins A.M., Prata Roque M. (2014) A tutela multinível de direitos fundamentais: a posição do Tribunal Constitutional português (The multilevel review of fundamental rights: the position of the Portuguese Constitutional Court). In: 16.^a Conferência Trilateral dos Tribunais Constitucionais de Espanha, Itália e Portugal (16th trilateral conference of constitutional courts of Spain, Italy and Portugal), Santiago de Compostela, 16–18 October 2014. <http://www.tribunalconstitucional.es/es/actividades/Documents/XVITrilateral/PONENCIA%20PORTUGAL.pdf>.
- Jegouzo I. (2005) Le mandat d'arrêt européen, acte de naissance de l'Europe judiciaire pénale In: Cartier M.E. (ed.) Le mandat d'arrêt européen. Bruylant, Brussels, pp. 33–45.
- Joerges C. (2014) Three Transformations of Europe and the Search for a Way Out of its Crisis. In: Joerges C., Glinski C. (eds.) The European Crisis and the Transformation of Transnational Governance: authoritarian managerialism vs democratic governance. Hart, Oxford and Portland, pp. 25–46.
- Kilpatrick C. (2014). Are Bailouts Immune of EU Social Challenge Because They Are Not EU Law? EuConst 10:393–421.

- Kilpatrick C. (2015) On the Rule of Law and Economic Emergency: The Degradation of Basic Legal Values in Europe's Bailouts. Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 35:325–353.
- Kumm M. (1999) Who is the Final Arbiter of Constitutionality in Europe? Three Conceptions of the Relationship between the German Federal Constitutional Court and the European Court of Justice and the Fate of the European Market Order for Bananas. CML Rev. 36:351–383.
- Leitão Marques M.M. (1990) A Constituição Económica Portuguesa depois da Revisão Constitucional de 1989 (The Portuguese economic constitution after the 1989 constitutional revision). Centro de Estudos Sociais 16:1–21.
- Lopes Luís S. (2013) Publicidade dos Atos (Publicity of Legal Acts). In: Bacelar Gouveia J., Pereira Coutinho F. (eds.) Encyclopédia da Constituição Portuguesa (Encyclopedia of the Portuguese Constitution). Quid Juris, Lisbon, pp. 310–312.
- Loureiro J.C. (2014) Cortes, pensões e jurisprudência em tempos de crise: entre o transitório e o permanente (Cuts, pensions and jurisprudence in times of crisis: between the transitory and the permanent). In: Almeida Ribeiro G., Pereira Coutinho L. (eds.) O Tribunal Constitucional e a Crise: ensaios críticos (The Constitutional Court and the crisis: critical essays). Almedina, Coimbra, pp. 185–201.
- MacCormick N. (1993) Beyond the Sovereign State. MLR 56:1–18.
- Mac Crorie B. (2014) Os direitos sociais em crise? (Social rights in crisis?). In: Monte M., Rocha J., Silva J., Fernandez E. (eds.) Estudos em Comemoração dos 20 Anos da Escola de Direito da Universidade do Minho (Commemorative studies of the 20th anniversary of Escola de Direito da Universidade do Minho). Coimbra Editora, Coimbra, pp. 115–126.
- Maiani F. (2015) Establishing a Common European Asylum System by Leaving European Human Rights Standards Behind: Is this the Way Forward? RefLAW, a project of Michigan Law School. <http://www.reflaw.org>.
- Marques Guedes A., Pereira Coutinho F. (2006) O processo de integração europeia e a Constituição portuguesa (The European integration process and the Portuguese Constitution). Nação e Defesa 115:83–112.
- Miranda J. (1996) O Tratado de Maastricht e a Constituição Portuguesa (The Maastricht Treaty and the Portuguese Constitution). In: A União Europeia numa encruzilhada (The European Union in a dilemma). Almedina, Lisbon, pp. 45–62.
- Miranda J. (2007) Manual de Direito Constitucional V. (Constitutional law textbook). Almedina, Coimbra.
- Moreira V. (2004) O Tribunal Penal Internacional e a Constituição (The International Criminal Court and the Constitution). In: Moreira V., Caeiro P., Assunção L., Riquito A.L. (eds.) O Tribunal Penal Internacional e a Ordem Jurídica Portuguesa (The International Criminal Court and the Portuguese legal order). Almedina, Coimbra, pp. 13–47.
- Nogueira de Brito M. (2014) Putting Social Rights in Brackets? The Portuguese Experience with Welfare Challenges in Times of Crisis. In: Kilpatrick C., De Witte B. (eds.) Social Rights in Times of Crisis in the Eurozone: The Role of Fundamental Rights' Challenges. EUI Working Papers, 5/2014, pp. 67–77.
- Novais J. (2014a) Em Defesa do Tribunal Constitucional: resposta aos críticos (In the defence of the Constitutional Court: a response to the critics). Almedina, Coimbra.
- Novais J. (2014b) O direito fundamental à pensão de reforma em situação de emergência financeira (The fundamental right to a retirement pension in a financial emergency situation) Epública. <http://e-publica.pt/odireitofundamentalpensao.html>.
- Otero P. (2003) Legalidade e Administração Pública: o sentido da vinculação administrativa à juridicidade (Legality and public administration: the scope of administrative obligations towards legality). Almedina, Coimbra.
- Pereira Coutinho F. (2013a) A natureza jurídica dos memorandos da ‘Troika’ (The legal nature of the ‘Troika’s’ memoranda). Themis 24/25:147–179.
- Pereira Coutinho F. (2013b) India v. State (Public Prosecutor Office), Constitutional Appeal, Case No. 360/2012, ILDC 2116 (PT 2012), 5 July 2012, Constitutional Court. <http://www.oxfordlawreports.com>.

- Piçarra N. (1994) Die Einflüsse des deutschen Verfassungsrechts auf das portugiesische Verfassungsrecht. In: Jayme E. (ed.) 2. Deutsch-Lusitanische Rechtstage, Baden-Baden, pp. 55–70.
- Piçarra N. (2005) A transposição da decisão-quadro relativa ao mandado de detenção europeu sob escrutínio dos juízes constitucionais nacionais (The transposition of the framework decision regarding the European Arrest Warrant under the review of national constitutional judges). Jurisprudência Constitucional 8:56–101.
- Piçarra N. (2006) As revisões constitucionais em matéria de extradição e a influência da União Europeia (Constitutional amendments regarding extradition and the influence of the European Union). Themis (Special Edition):217–244.
- Pitta e Cunha P. (1979) A regulação constitucional da organização económica e a adesão à C.E.E. (The constitutional regulation of economic organisation and the accession to the EEC). In: Miranda J. (ed.) Estudos sobre a Constituição (Constitutional studies), Vol III. Petrony, Lisbon, pp. 439–456.
- Poiares Maduro M. (2003) Contrapunctual Law: Europe's Constitutional Pluralism in Action. In: Neil Walker (ed.) Sovereignty in Transition. Hart, Oxford and Portland, pp. 501–538.
- Poiares Maduro M. (2009) O Discurso Jurídico Português sobre o Constitucionalismo Europeu (The Portuguese legal discourse on European constitutionalism). In: Estudos de Direito Europeu (Congressos da FIDE: Relatórios Portugueses – 1990–2008) (European Law Studies (FIDE Congresses: Portuguese Reports – 1990–2008)). Principia, Lisbon, pp. 527–552.
- Poiares Maduro M., Pereira Coutinho F. (2007) EU Law and Portuguese Law. In: Ferreira de Almeida C., Cristas A., Piçarra N. (eds.) Portuguese Law – An Overview. Almedina, Coimbra.
- Rebelo de Sousa M. (1981) Aspectos Institucionais da Adesão de Portugal (Institutional aspects of Portugal's accession). In: Pitta e Cunha P. (ed.) Portugal e o Alargamento das Comunidades Europeias (Portugal and the enlargement of the European Communities). Inteuropa, Lisbon, pp. 141–154.
- Rosado Pacheco S. (2015) El Estado de Derecho en las Resoluciones del Tribunal Constitutional Portugués sobre el Presupuesto (The rule of law in the budgetary decisions of the Portuguese Constitutional Court). Themis 5:269–288.
- Silveira A., Froufe P., Canotilho M. (2012) Portugal. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 1. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 727–745.
- Tomuschat C. (2005) Ungereimtes. Zum Urteil des Bundesverfassungsgerichts vom 18. Juli 2005 über den Europäischen Haftbefehl. Europäische Grundrechte Zeitschrift 17/18:453–460.
- Urbano M.B. (2014) A Jurisprudência da Crise no Divã. Diagnóstico: Bipolaridade? (The crisis jurisprudence on the couch. Diagnosis: bipolarity?). In: Almeida Ribeiro G., Pereira Coutinho L. (eds.) O Tribunal Constitucional e a Crise: ensaios críticos (The Constitutional Court and the crisis: critical essays). Almedina, Coimbra, pp. 11–48.
- Vitorino A. (1984) A adesão de Portugal às Comunidades Europeias – A problemática da aplicabilidade directa e do primado do Direito comunitário face ao nosso ordenamento jurídico (The accession of Portugal to the European Communities – the question of the direct applicability and supremacy of community law in our legal order). In: Estudos de Direito Público (Studies of public law), Vol. 3. Cognitio, Lisbon.
- Vitorino A., Leandro Vasconcelos R. (2012) Portugal. In: Laffranque J. (ed.) The Area of Freedom Security and Justice, Including Information Society Issues, Reports of the XXV FIDE Congress Tallinn 2012, Vol. 3. Tartu University Press, Tallinn, pp. 531–554.
- Wathelet M. (2014) Commentaire aux arrêts de la Cour de justice Fransson et Melloni. In: Karpenschif M., Nourissat C. (eds.) Les grands arrêts de la jurisprudence de l'Union européenne, 2nd Edn. Thémis Droit, Paris, pp. 440–445.

Open Access This chapter is licensed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/>), which permits use, sharing, adaptation, distribution and reproduction in any medium or format, as long as you give appropriate credit to the original author(s) and the source, provide a link to the Creative Commons license and indicate if changes were made.

The images or other third party material in this chapter are included in the chapter's Creative Commons license, unless indicated otherwise in a credit line to the material. If material is not included in the chapter's Creative Commons license and your intended use is not permitted by statutory regulation or exceeds the permitted use, you will need to obtain permission directly from the copyright holder.

The Constitution of Greece: EU Membership Perspectives

Xenophon Contiades, Charalambos Papacharalambous and Christos Papastylianatos

Abstract The Constitution of Greece, adopted in 1975 after the collapse of the military dictatorship, was drafted with provisions providing the constitutional grounds for European integration. Subsequently, two EU related amendments were introduced and, additionally, constitutional interpretation is used to overcome further conflicts. The Constitution is described in the report as detailed and comprehensive, with a legal character and strong normative force. It includes a detailed list of rights, including social rights. The Constitution refers to the concept of ‘welfare state rule of law’. By way of an exception to constitutional systems of this type, Greece does not have a constitutional court, but instead a decentralised system of review of constitutionality. Adhering to the French ‘État de droit’ and the German ‘Rechtsstaat’ traditions, the rule of law works in conjunction with specific constitutional provisions. In particular, nulla poena sine lege is a cornerstone Xenophon Contiades is Professor of Public Law at the Panteion University, Athens, and Managing Director, Centre for European Constitutional Law, Athens. e-mail: xcontiades@hotmail.com.

Charalambos Papacharalambous is Associate Professor in Criminal Law and Law Philosophy, Law Department, University of Cyprus. e-mail: papacharalambous.charalambos@ucy.ac.cy.

Christos Papastylianatos is Assistant Professor for Public Law, University of Nicosia School of Law. e-mail: papastylianatos.c@unic.ac.cy.

Xenophon Contiades wrote Sects. 1, 2.1 and 3.1. Charalambos Papacharalambous wrote Sects. 2.3–2.6. Christos Papastylianatos wrote Sects. 2.2, 2.7, 2.8, 2.9, 2.10, 2.11, 2.12, 2.13, 3.3–3.6.

All websites accessed 30 November 2015. Text submitted 20 March 2015.

X. Contiades (✉)
Panteion University, Athens, Greece
e-mail: xcontiades@hotmail.com

C. Papacharalambous
Law Department, University of Cyprus, Nicosia, Cyprus
e-mail: papacharalambous.charalambos@ucy.ac.cy

C. Papastylianatos
School of Law, University of Nicosia, Nicosia, Cyprus
e-mail: papastylianatos.c@unic.ac.cy principle of constitutionality and the rule of law, and has prompted extensive scholarly concerns in relation to the European Arrest Warrant system. More widely known are the constitutional and fundamental rights issues raised in the context of the EU and IMF austerity and conditionality programmes, marking, according to the report, a darker side of sovereignty loss. The report summarises a broader concern in Greek academic commentary that constitutional rights and values have been given marginal protection, as the national constitution is no longer the guarantor of popular sovereignty rooted in a political decision made by the people, but rather has become a guarantor of the state's compliance with EMU obligations.

Keywords The Constitution of Greece · Constitutional amendments regarding European and international co-operation · Decentralised constitutional review · ‘Welfare state rule of law’ · The French ‘État de droit’ and German ‘Rechtsstaat’ traditions · European Arrest Warrant · nulla poena sine lege and defence rights in extradition cases · Fundamental rights · EU and IMF austerity and conditionality programmes · Social rights · Trade union rights and the economic emergency regime · Data Retention Directive · Limitation of rights and public interest · Change away from popular sovereignty based on the Constitution

1 Constitutional Amendments Regarding EU Membership

1.1 Constitutional Culture

1.1.1 The current constitution of Greece was promulgated in 1975 after the collapse of a seven-year military dictatorship. The constituent power exercised by the Parliament elected in 1974 was described as delegated power to convey the image of constitutional continuity. Indeed, the 1975 Constitution, which has been revised three times (1986, 2001, 2008) has its roots in the Constitution of 1864, the most long-lived Constitution in Greek constitutional history, which contributed greatly to the establishment of the rule of law and parliamentarism. The 1864 Constitution had been enacted after a revolution against the monarch and was influenced by the 1831 Constitution of Belgium and the 1849 Constitution of Denmark. The election of a new king by the Constituent Assembly and the enactment of a liberal constitution marked the passage from constitutional monarchy to parliamentary democracy.

The Constitution of Greece is written and difficult to amend.¹ Detailed, analytical and comprehensive, the Constitution has legal character and strong normative force. Due to the existence of a system of diffused constitutional review, all courts have competence to review the constitutionality of laws. In other words, Greece does not have a constitutional court, but instead a tradition of diffused review. The current Constitution thus enshrines a decentralised system of judicial review of the constitutionality of laws (Art. 93(4)). However, constitutional review is to a great extent concentrated through jurisdictional mechanisms of appellate review by the three supreme courts, i.e. Areios Pagos (Supreme Civil and Criminal Court), the Council of State (Supreme Administrative Court), and the Court of Audit. Article 100(5) of the Constitution regulates constitutional review as follows:

¹ Spyropoulos and Fortsakis 2009.

When a section of the Supreme Administrative Court or chamber of the Supreme Civil and Criminal Court or of the Court of Audit judges a provision of a statute to be contrary to the Constitution, it is bound to refer the question to the respective plenum, unless this has been judged by a previous decision of the plenum or of the Special Highest Court of this article. The plenum shall be assembled into judicial formation and shall decide definitively, as specified by law. This regulation shall also apply accordingly to the elaboration of regulatory decrees by the Supreme Administrative Court.

Thus, the Greek Constitution belongs to the type of constitutions that have legal character, contain detailed norms and are enforceable in courts.

1.1.2 The Constitution sets out the form of government, establishes the separation of powers and provides for checks and balances. Furthermore, it includes a detailed list of fundamental rights enshrining civil, political and socio-economic rights. It is noteworthy that all former Greek constitutions have also included catalogues of rights, gradually incorporating the three generations of rights. Since the adoption of the Constitution of 1864, the principle of popular sovereignty has been enshrined in constitutional texts. According to Art. 1 of the current Constitution, '[s]overeignty lies with the people; all powers derive from the people and exist for the people and the Nation'.

The Constitution of Greece sets out the basic rules of the game, organising and allocating powers and providing for the detailed protection of fundamental rights. It has therefore been central to the legal and political life of Greece, generating a strong culture of constitutionalism; constitutional narratives are dominant in the Greek political discourse.

1.2 Amendment of the Constitution in Relation to the European Union

1.2.1, 1.2.3 The application for accession to the EU was submitted on the day the Constitution of 1975 was enacted. Specific provisions were included in the constitutional text in order to provide the constitutional grounds for the accession. Thus, accession to the EU did not take place under an aged constitution, rather the Constitution itself was drafted in such way as to include provisions facilitating this goal. The advice of legal scholars in favour of this choice proved invaluable for a smooth accession procedure.

Articles 28(2) and (3) of the Constitution² set out the substantive and procedural requirements allowing the accession as follows:

Article 28(2) Authorities provided by the Constitution may by treaty or agreement be vested in agencies of international organizations, when this serves an important national interest and promotes cooperation with other States. A majority of three-fifths of the total number of Members of Parliament shall be necessary to vote the law ratifying the treaty or agreement.

Article 28(3) Greece shall freely proceed by law passed by an absolute majority of the total number of Members of Parliament to limit the exercise of national sovereignty, insofar as this is dictated by an important national interest, does not infringe upon the rights of man and the foundations of democratic government and is effected on the basis of the principles of equality and under the condition of reciprocity.

In 2001 an interpretative clause was added, according to which: ‘Article 28 constitutes the foundation for the participation of the Country in the European integration process’. Still, the wording of the above provisions was rather ambiguous and left room for different interpretations. Thus, Greek scholars disagreed on whether the accession of Greece to the EU should be understood as vesting powers in agencies of international organisations, which would require the three-fifths majority of the total number of Members of Parliament (MPs), or it constituted a limitation on the exercise of state sovereignty, which could be made through the enactment of legislation voted by the absolute majority of the total number of MPs. The dominant view was that both paras. (2) and (3) of Art. 28 in combination provided the constitutional grounds for the accession. Thus, a combination of the stricter substantive conditions provided for by para. (3) and the stringent procedural requirements set by para. 2 was applicable. What the Parliament actually did was to vote the law ratifying the accession of Greece to the EU with a three-fifths majority, leaving open the relevant interpretative issues. The same procedure was followed for the ratification of the treaties of Maastricht, Amsterdam, Nice and Lisbon, leaving the interpretational ambiguity unresolved. However, all ratifications took place smoothly since the two major political parties of the pre-financial crisis period were pro-European.³

1.2.2, 1.2.4 So far, constitutional amendment procedures have not been used to address the application of EU law. Although the relationship between EU law and the Greek Constitution from the aspect of the hierarchy of legal rules has been the subject of debate, with the doctrine of primacy of EU law having gained ground during recent years, in practice the issue has not yet created serious problems. So far, the incompatibility of constitutional norms with EU law has emerged as a problem with regard to two provisions. The first is Art. 14(9) of the Constitution, which provides that the capacity of owner, partner, major shareholder or managing director of a media enterprise is incompatible with the capacity of owner, partner, major shareholder or managing director of an enterprise that undertakes to perform works or to supply goods or services to the public sector, with the prohibition extended to all types of intermediary persons. The Greek Council of State⁴ referred questions to the European Court of Justice (CJEU) regarding the compatibility of the ‘major shareholder’ provision with EU law. The CJEU in its judgment of 16 December 2008⁵ concluded that an incompatibility existed. The contested provision has not been enforced since, and its revision is pending because, due to procedural hurdles set by the amending formula, no constitutional revision to allow such amendment has as yet taken place.

² The official translation, which is used here and subsequently in the report, is available at <http://www.hellenicparliament.gr/UserFiles/f3c70a23-7696-49db-9148-f24dce6a27c8/001-156%20agliko.pdf>.

³ For details and references to further literature, see Contiades and Fotiadou 2014.

The second provision of the Constitution that creates tension with EU law is Art. 16(5), according to which ‘education at university level shall be provided exclusively by institutions which are fully self-governed public law legal persons’. Incompatibility with EU rules on the recognition of professional rights with regard to graduates of private colleges, as well as with EU rules on freedom to offer and receive services, has often triggered discussion about amending this constitutional provision. Nonetheless, agreement among the political parties to do so has been hard to achieve.

As mentioned, such tensions with EU law are difficult to promptly address through formal amendment, since the amending formula is very stringent, rendering the Greek Constitution difficult to change. In particular, formal amendment rules consist of a combination of procedural and material limits. Procedural limits set out in Arts. 110(2)–(6) are very strict, providing for a two-phase process, with intervening general elections. In the first phase, the need for a constitutional revision is ascertained by a resolution of Parliament, adopted on the proposal of at least fifty Members of Parliament either by a three-fifths majority or by an absolute majority of the total number of its members in two ballots, held at least one month apart. This resolution specifically determines the provisions that are to be revised. In the second phase, the next Parliament proceeds with the amendment of the provisions that are to be revised. It is noteworthy that the timing of the intervening elections is not influenced by the initiation of the amending process. If a proposal for amendment of the Constitution receives an absolute majority of the votes of the total number of members but not the three-fifths majority, the next Parliament shall proceed with the revision of the proposed provisions by a three-fifths majority of the total number of its members, and vice versa. Constitutional revision is concluded with the publication of the revised provisions in the government gazette within ten days after their adoption by order of the Speaker of Parliament. Rigidity is enhanced by a mandatory time lapse between revisions: revision of the Constitution is not permitted before a lapse of five years from the completion of a previous revision.⁶ Material limits are provided for by Art. 110(1), which entrenches the provisions defining the form of government and also Art. 2(1) (respect of human dignity), Arts. 4(1), (4) and (7) (equality before the law, eligibility of Greek citizens for public service, and prohibition of titles of nobility or distinction), Arts. 5(1) (right to free development of personality) and (3) (personal liberty), Art. 13(1) (freedom of religious conscience) and Art. 26 (separation of powers).

⁴ Decision 3760/2006 of the Greek Council of State.

⁵ Case C-213/07 Michaniki [2008] ECR I-09999.

⁶ Contiades and Fotiadou 2014, p. 712.

The stringency of the amending formula works within a predominant culture of political distrust between the political parties. Thus, the constitutional culture enhances the rigidity level.⁷ Within this context, the sort of constitutional maintenance culture required to ‘fix’ incompatibilities of specific constitutional provisions with EU law does not exist. Consequently, in the course of the three revisions of the 1975 Constitution, EU law exerted implicit influence in shaping the content of specific provisions. For example, EU law influenced the design of constitutional provisions such as Art. 116(2), according to which the adoption of positive measures for promoting equality between men and women does not constitute discrimination on grounds of sex. According to this provision, the state shall take measures for the elimination of actual inequality, in particular to the detriment of women. Another provision shaped in light of EU law is Art. 4(4), providing that only Greek citizens shall be eligible for public service. This provision was subject to interpretation imposed by EU law, opening the Greek public service to EU citizens, while Art. 102(2), according to which the authorities of local government agencies which enjoy administrative and financial independence are elected by universal and secret ballot, was influenced by EU law introducing interpretations that allow EU citizens to vote in municipal elections.⁸ Thus, these examples show that informal amendment was the route chosen and that formal amendment is neither a necessary nor suitable tool to address incompatibilities between the Constitution and EU law.

Consequently, the strictly and directly EU-related formal amendments are two interrelated interpretative clauses. The first is the above-mentioned clause added to address the debate regarding the foundation for participation in the European integration process. The clause adopts the view, which prevailed during the discussions in Parliament as part of the revision process, that different possibilities exist, which may accordingly trigger the application of different paragraphs of Art. 28. This interpretative clause was complemented in 2001 by the interpretative clause of Art. 80 of the Constitution, providing in para. 2 that the minting or issuing of currency shall be regulated by law. According to this interpretative clause, ‘[p]aragraph 2 does not impede the participation of Greece in the process of the Economic and Monetary Union, in the wider framework of European integration, according to the provisions of article 2’.

⁷ Contiades and Fotiadou 2012, p. 450.

⁸ Contiades and Tassopoulos 2012, p. 166.

1.3 Conceptualizing Sovereignty and the Limits to the Transfer of Powers

1.3.1, 1.3.4 For many years the supremacy of EU law appeared to puzzle constitutional scholars and judges alike.⁹ Reluctant to clearly recognise the supremacy of legal norms over the Constitution, theory and jurisprudence found refuge in the concept that such rules have a different scope and cannot be in conflict. In extreme cases of tension, interpretative choices that harmonise the crucial constitutional provision with EU law should prevail.¹⁰ This hesitation to address the issue gradually gave way. In Decision 161/2010, the Grand Chamber of the Council of State stated that when reviewing a law, the courts must first consider whether the law is contrary to the Constitution. Only if the answer to that question is negative should the courts consider whether the law is contrary to EU law. If the contested provision is found to be in violation of the Constitution, it is rendered inapplicable, and thus there is no reason to review it further. The Court stressed that this way of reviewing national laws is not contrary to the principle of the primacy and direct effect of EU law, but appropriate, since in order to assess the compatibility of a national law with EU law (and perhaps ask the European Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling), the exclusively competent national judge should firstly adjudicate on all the issues of interpretation and applicability of national law. It is noteworthy that 13 members of the Court dissented, stating that the Court in the specific case should first have adjudicated on the compatibility of the specific law with EU legislation, since the specific piece of legislation was enacted in order to comply with rulings of the European Court of Justice. The dissenting opinion also stressed that in accordance with the principles of primacy and direct effect of EU law, the Court should interpret the relevant constitutional provisions in line with EU law, so as to minimise the possibility of conflict between the Constitution and EU legislation.¹¹

As a whole, although sovereignty narratives have not changed, in practice the Constitution operates in harmony with EU law, the supreme courts refer questions to the Court of Justice of the EU, and EU-friendly interpretation of legislation is common practice.

It is noteworthy that the crisis-related EU treaties were ratified via the normal law-making procedure provided for in Arts. 70–77 of the Constitution. In other words, Art. 28(1) of the Constitution, which dictates that international conventions are ratified by law, was applied instead of the special procedures set up by Art. 28(2) for vesting constitutional powers in agencies or international organisations. Statute 4063/2012 contained, among other rules, the ratification of the Treaty

⁹ Chryssogonos 2003, pp. 210–213.

¹⁰ See Decision 247/1997 of the Council of State recognising the supremacy of EU law, and contrarily Decision 2809/1997 not recognising supremacy of EU law over the national Constitution.

¹¹ See Association of European Administrative Judges, Greek Report, 2013.

Establishing the European Stability Mechanism (ESM Treaty), the amendment of Art. 136 TFEU and the ratification of the Fiscal Compact. The balance of political powers in Parliament allowed for this to happen quite smoothly, although concerns about the informal amendment of the Constitution effected by these treaties were expressed by parties of the opposition. So far, the dilemma about the constitutionalisation of the balanced budget rule implementing the Fiscal Compact has not been addressed due to the stringency of the amending formula. Nonetheless, when a constitutional revision process is initiated, the issue will inevitably emerge.

For more recent discussion on sovereignty in the context of the judicial adjudication of the financial crisis, see Sect. 1.5.

1.4 Democratic Control

1.4.1 The Standing Orders of Parliament¹² (Standing Orders) provide for the rules governing the relation of the Greek Parliament with the EU decision-making process. According to Art. 70(8) of the Constitution, ‘the Standing Orders of Parliament shall specify the manner in which the Parliament is informed by the Government on issues being the object of regulation in the framework of the European Union, and debates on these’. This amendment, explicitly mentioning the EU, was added in the 2001 constitutional revision.

Article 32 of the Standing Orders sets out the rules on the Committee of European Affairs, providing that the Speaker of the Parliament shall, at the onset of every parliamentary term, establish by his/her decision a special standing Committee of European Affairs. The Committee is composed by 30 MPs and one of the Parliament’s Deputy Speakers, acting as the Committee’s president. In the sittings of the Committee, Greek members of the European Parliament can participate with a right to speak. The Speaker of the Parliament may refer to the Committee any issue that he/she deems as relevant or any issue submitted to him/her by the standing or special committees of the Parliament or by MPs and Members of the European Parliament. The competences of the Committee mainly include the following: (a) institutional issues of the EU, (b) issues of co-operation between the Hellenic Parliament and other national Parliaments of the EU, of the European Parliament and of the Conference of Community and European Affairs Committees of Parliaments of the EU (COSAC), (c) issues of European policy and (d) acts of EU bodies with a regulative content. The Committee can express its consultative opinion on the aforementioned issues through the submission of a respective report to the Parliament and the Government.

With regard to opinions on the regulatory acts of the European Parliament, Art. 41B of the Standing Orders provides that the Government shall forward the draft legislative acts of the EU to the Speaker of the Parliament immediately after they are communicated to the Council of Ministers. The Speaker of Parliament refers the documents to the competent standing committee or/and to the Committee on European Affairs. The Speaker of Parliament or the Committee by its own decision may invite the competent Minister to provide information to the Committee if it is so requested by one third of its members. The competent committee delivers its opinion, which is forwarded to the competent Minister and, if this is provided by EU legislation, to the Union's competent bodies. By a decision of the Speaker of Parliament or if this is requested by the competent Committee, the issue on which an opinion is delivered is entered in the Plenum's parliamentary control order of the day. In recent years, the Hellenic Parliament Committee on European Affairs has adopted several opinions on EU legislative acts, which it has then submitted to the European Commission, and has taken part in consultation procedures with regard to green papers.

¹² <http://www.hellenicparliament.gr/en/Vouli-ton-Ellinon/Kanonismos-tis-Voulis/>.

1.4.2 Since constitutional referendums are not provided for and referendums have not been employed in practice during the last 40 years, democratic control is exercised by the Parliament.

However, it is noteworthy that in the midst of the financial crisis that struck Greece in 2010, the idea of holding a referendum was brought forth by the then Prime Minister George Papandreou. His Government was constantly under stress caused by general strikes and violent clashes between police and protestors, and narrowly won a vote of confidence in June 2011 while Parliament approved a five-year austerity package. On 26–27 October, a second bailout loan, which reduced Greece's debt by 50%, was agreed by EU leaders, the IMF and banks. As the adoption of new harsh measures was due, Papandreou decided to hold a referendum to request the opinion of the people on the conditions of the new agreement. Under immense pressure exerted by both the French and German leaders, by his own party, and by the opposition parties as well, Papandreou called off the referendum on 3 November. As a vote of confidence was pending in Parliament and Papandreou was faced with the imminent danger of losing it, a constitutional absurdum occurred: the Prime Minister won the vote of confidence under the unprecedented condition that he would subsequently resign so that a coalition Government would be formed. One week later, on 11 November, an interim coalition Government was indeed formed with the participation of PASOK, New Democracy and a far right wing party, the Popular Orthodox Rally (LAOS). The new Prime Minister, Loukas Papademos, was a highly regarded technocrat, a former Vice-President of the European Central Bank, while the Government's main task was to lead the country up to new elections. Thus, the referendum proposal actually led to the collapse of the Papandreou Government.

1.5 The Reasons for, and the Role of, EU Amendments

1.5.1–1.5.2 The limited scope of EU-related formal amendments is explicable by a combination of factors. The Constitution of Greece is recent and modern, its very drafting was done with the aim of EU membership and thus it included the appropriate accession mechanisms. The detailed and extensive protection of fundamental rights is in line with the EU culture of rights protection, which is also reflected in the addition of modern aspects of rights protection, such as the protection of genetic identity and the protection against biomedical interventions (Art. 5(5)), the right to information (Art. 5A(1)), the right to participate in the information society (Art. 5A(2)) and the protection of the person against the electronic processing of personal data (Art. 9A). Although the amending formula and the constitutional culture create a context of augmented constitutional rigidity, alternative routes for relieving possible tensions exist. Issues such as the ban of non-state university-level education, even if the political context fails to produce the level of consent required for a formal revision, can be resolved by way of judicial interpretation.

Furthermore, there has always been strong support for EU membership among the public in Greece, with Euroscepticism being expressed mostly by smaller political parties.

1.5.3 Sovereignty issues with regard to the EU integration process had been merely the subject of discussion among scholars, at least until the financial crisis broke out. The bailout agreements, however, marked a darker side of sovereignty loss. Delayed dismay at this loss apparent in the political discourse and in constitutional challenges against the bailout agreements suggest that an abrupt realisation of waning sovereignty in the age of globalisation occurred as a result of the financial crisis.¹³ Its concrete expression was the challenge against Law 3845/2010 incorporating the Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) between Greece and its international lenders brought before the Greek Council of State, in which it was argued that this law, despite the fact that it made concessions of sovereignty and transferred state competences to international organisations (i.e. the Troika), was not adopted with the necessary enhanced majority of three-fifths of votes, as provided by Art. 28 of the Constitution. It is clear that despite the participation of the International Monetary Fund (IMF), which did however complicate matters legally, the bailout scheme was important if Greece was to remain in the eurozone. The Court resolved the issue by rejecting the very applicability of Art. 28 of the Constitution, characterising the Memorandum not as an international treaty but a political programme.¹⁴ Although the Court thus did not invoke sovereignty issues to resolve the case, narratives of lost sovereignty are part of the influence of the financial crisis on the Constitution. Constitutional normativity has often been challenged because of the impact of austerity measures on the application of fundamental rights and because of deviations from normal law-making processes and the enhanced role of the executive in law-making.

Nonetheless, the Constitution is far from becoming obsolete. As regards the EU, it creates no problems with regard to the integration process, while it has an immense role in adjudication and politics. Still, the financial crisis has put a severe strain on the Constitution and exerted a continuous influence on it, as it has on most constitutions in the legal orders that have been struck by the financial crisis. It is arguable that the amending formula itself could be considered as an area in demand of reconsideration. Over-stringency has proved to be an obstacle to constitutional updating as well as to allowing the people to be more involved in the amending process.

¹³ Contiades and Fotiadou 2013, pp. 9–59.

¹⁴ Contiades and Tassopoulos 2013, pp. 195–218.

2 Constitutional Rights, the Rule of Law and EU Law

2.1 The Position of Constitutional Rights and the Rule of Law in the Constitution

2.1.1–2.1.2 Part II of the Greek Constitution protects individual and social rights, while political rights are also enshrined in other constitutional provisions. Ever since the creation of the Greek state, fundamental rights have been constitutionally protected. All Greek Constitutions have included catalogues of rights that have gradually acquired their present status. This gradual evolution has been marked by the continuous enhancement of rights protection. The current Constitution of 1975 has a comprehensive and very detailed list of rights, which was further enhanced in the 2001 constitutional revision that was also marked by the constitutionalisation of interpretative principles.

As part of the 2001 revision, the proportionality doctrine and the horizontal application of rights were explicitly included in the Constitution (Art. 25(1)), which also guarantees the rule of law and the welfare state. The provision also provides that restrictions to rights may be imposed by the Constitution or by statute. In accordance with the wording of Art. 25(1):

[t]he rights of the human being as an individual and as a member of the society and the principle of the welfare state rule of law are guaranteed by the State. All agents of the State shall be obliged to ensure the unhindered and effective exercise thereof. These rights also apply to the relations between individuals to which they are appropriate. Restrictions of any kind which, according to the Constitution, may be imposed upon these rights, should be provided either directly by the Constitution or by statute, should a reservation exist in the latter's favour, and should respect the principle of proportionality.

It is noteworthy that proportionality had already been extensively elaborated in the case law as a normative principle delineating the permissibility of restrictions imposed on constitutional rights. Interpretatively derived from the rule of law principle in a landmark case of the Council of State in 1984,¹⁵ the proportionality doctrine is constantly employed by the Greek courts. The constitutionalisation of the principle encourages the judge to employ all tiers of the test rigorously. Under the rule of law umbrella, the principles of legal certainty and legitimate expectation have been judicially elaborated.

¹⁵ Decision 2112/1984 of the Council of State.

Greek courts in exercising judicial review of the constitutionality of laws often address constitutional rights protection issues. The absence of a constitutional court often works against a unified, coherent jurisprudence. Nonetheless, a large part of Greek constitutional jurisprudence deals with the delineation of the protective scope of rights and the permissibility of restrictions.

2.1.3 The rule of law principle was explicitly enshrined in 2001, although it had been part of the Greek constitutional culture ever since the birth of the Greek state, with a landmark point in its evolution being the Constitution of 1864. The above-mentioned concept of the ‘welfare state rule of law’,¹⁶ is considered to be one of the fundamental principles of the state, along with the principle of democracy and the separation of powers doctrine. The Greek constitutional literature had interpretatively derived the principle from a combination of a long list of constitutional provisions. Jurisprudential references to the doctrine had also found multiple constitutional grounds for its elaboration. The welfare state dimension operates under the rule of law rationale, while welfare state redistribution complements the constitutional protection of social rights. Adhering to the French ‘État de droit’ and the German ‘Rechtsstaat’ traditions, the Greek conceptualisation of the rule of law works in conjunction with other specific constitutional provisions.

Article 42 of the Constitution dictates that statutes passed by the Parliament shall be promulgated and published by the President of the Republic. Statutes obtain formal legal effect with their publication in the government gazette, and substantive legal effect ten days after publication; i.e. legal validity begins with publication and legal enforceability ten days later. Statutes may also contain provisions that set a different starting point for legal bindingness. Retroactivity is possible if explicitly provided for under the condition that this is not prohibited by the Constitution. Retroactive force is not constitutionally permissible in the following provisions: Art. 7(1), according to which no crime exists and no punishment can be inflicted unless specified by law in force prior to the perpetration of the act, while criminal liability also cannot be retroactively increased; Art. 77(2), according to which pseudo-interpretative statutes may not be used to produce retroactivity;¹⁷ and Art. 78(2), according to which taxes or other financial charges may not be imposed by a retroactive statute effective prior to the fiscal year preceding their imposition.¹⁸ In other words, the rule of law is substantiated through specific constitutional provisions that pre-existed the explicit enshrinement of this principle, providing the grounds for its interpretative conceptualisation, while these provisions are currently read in conjunction with the doctrine.

¹⁶ The terminology used in the official translation of the Constitution, see supra n. 2.

¹⁷ ‘A statute which is not truly interpretative shall enter into force only as of its publication.’

¹⁸ Contiades and Fotiadou 2014, p. 714.

2.2 The Balancing of Fundamental Rights and Economic Freedoms in EU Law

2.2.1 According to the CJEU's jurisprudence, conflicts that may arise between fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms enshrined in the Treaties are resolved when the Court, following a balancing procedure, rules whether or not a fundamental right can prevail over fundamental freedoms. In the light of the CJEU's jurisprudence, fundamental freedoms can justify a restriction of rights, which are not considered as absolute.¹⁹ The evaluation of whether a right is considered absolute or not is based, among other criteria, on the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). Consequently, in relation to all the rights which, according to the ECHR, can be subject to limitations justified by objectives of public interest, fundamental freedoms are considered by the jurisprudence of the CJEU as a 'form' of public interest, the protection of which potentially requires the restriction of rights.²⁰ The CJEU's jurisprudence is not clear about whether rights generally prevail over freedoms. In every case the balancing procedure is based on the principle of proportionality. Consequently, the limitation of a freedom is considered legitimate if it takes place within the framework of the exercise of a fundamental right, and is considered to be appropriate, necessary and proportional stricto sensu for the achievement of the objectives of the right at issue. On the other hand, the limitation of a right is appropriate, necessary and proportional stricto sensu, if it serves the achievement of a given end which is protected by the freedom at issue. Nevertheless, the most crucial issue is that according to the CJEU's jurisprudence, fundamental freedoms must be balanced against fundamental rights even in those circumstances in which the exercise of rights concerns activities that fall outside the scope of the EU's competence, given that the CJEU has ruled that the exercise of rights cannot jeopardise the achievement of goals protected by fundamental freedoms.²¹ Within the balancing context, fundamental rights do not prevail over economic freedoms. As a commentator on case C-112/00²² has observed, 'the language of prima facie breach of economic rights, suggests that it remains something, which is at the heart wrong, but tolerated'.²³

With regard to the question of constitutional issues in Greece due to the jurisprudence of the CJEU on the balancing of fundamental rights with economic freedoms, we can observe that the jurisprudence of the Council of State has been influenced by the CJEU's approach concerning the primacy of fundamental ¹⁹ See Case C-112/00 Schmidberger (2003) ECR I-05659.

²⁰ Ibid., para. 79. The CJEU makes a direct reference to the text of Arts. 10 and 11 of the ECHR and their limitations due to objectives in the public interest.

²¹ Case C-438/05 International Transport Workers Federation (Viking) [2008] ECR I-10779, para. 40 and Case C-341/05 Laval un Partneri [2007] ECR I-11767, para. 87. On this issue see Amtenbrink 2012, pp. 35–64, especially pp. 60–62.

²² Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-05659.

²³ Brown 2003, p. 1508.

freedoms of EU law over national constitutions, which may act as trumps over the enforcement of certain constitutional provisions. However, the Council of State has not developed a sound constitutional policy regarding the relation between the Greek Constitution and EU law (see below Sects. 2.7–2.8).

2.3 Constitutional Rights, the European Arrest Warrant and EU Criminal Law

2.3.1 The Presumption of Innocence

2.3.1.1–2.3.1.2 This presumption applies in Greece; Greece has incorporated the ECHR as well the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), among other conventions, into its legal order. Both academic commentary and the courts hold that the presumption is not violated through the execution of a European Arrest Warrant (EAW).

According to the national provisions concerning arrest, an arrest warrant is in conformity with the law if there is probable cause indicating guilt, and the proceedings are controlled by the judiciary (Arts. 5(3) and 6(1) of the Constitution; Art. 276 et seq. of the Code of Criminal Procedure (CCP)). Although these are provisions of domestic law, they apply to the EAW along the same lines, since it is considered as a procedural means in the common EU space, where mutual trust and especially the principle of mutual recognition have to prevail. Therefore, the Supreme Court (Areios Pagos, hereinafter AP) has no competence to control the substance of the case; it can only control the legality of the EAW.²⁴ However, part of the academic commentary holds that control must always be carried out in cases where procedural requirements for the execution of the EAW are not met. This is the case especially when the issuing state has no jurisdiction over the alleged deed.²⁵

One aspect of the presumption of innocence that could be regarded as having been violated is the ‘pro mitiore’ principle, which means that if several reasoned scientific views exist, the one that best safeguards the rights of the accused ought to be preferred. Such a violation occurs when national ‘indictment’ (i.e. charging the person sought, which in Greece is a ground not to execute an EAW according to the law (Arts. 12(1a') and (b') of Law No. 3251/2004), is interpreted narrowly by the courts and thus its scope is not exhausted to allow the person to be treated in more favourable terms. This narrow interpretation runs contrary to the very meaning of the legislative ground for non-execution, as long as the latter aims at avoiding ²⁴ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 29–30, 71; Mouzakis 2009, pp. 572 et seq.; Mouzakis 2012, p. 67. From the case law see e.g. AP 1836/2007, Poiniki Dikaiosini 2008, p. 535 (summary); 1811/2009, Poiniki Dikaiosini 2010, pp. 37 et seq.

²⁵ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 71–72.

double jeopardy and thus should be interpreted generously to benefit the person sought. Since, according to the commentary, a preliminary investigation, possible henceforth in Greece for almost all crimes and obligatory now for felonies (Laws Nos. 3904/2010 and 4055/2012, accordingly amending Art. 43 CCP,) blocks the execution of an EAW as an indictment does, the execution of an EAW should be denied also in the case of such an investigation. Contrary, however, to the viewpoint in the above commentary, the Supreme Court considers preliminary investigation as separate from indictment (which as such may or may not follow, according to the evidence obtained after the investigation has ended). Here one could consider the Court's approach to identifying indictment in the wider sense of the EAW Framework Decision²⁶ (EAWFD) with the formal and narrow meaning that this term has in domestic law to be erroneous. The case seems ripe for a request for a preliminary ruling from the CJEU.²⁷ However, the Supreme Court has recently held that indictment, even if thus narrowly conceived, may exclude the execution of an EAW even when it temporally follows the issuing of the latter; the only condition is that indictment take place during the hearings on the EAW at the Appeals Judicial Council or the Supreme Court and not later.²⁸ However, pending indictments may adversely impact the proper application of the EAWFD, given that the optional refusal of execution has been reshaped as obligatory with regard to nationals under Arts. 11(h') and 12(a') of Law No. 3251/2004, which provides for a possibility of abuse since consciously unfounded complaints may be submitted with the aim of paralysing the execution of an EAW through a subsequent indictment. This reshaping into an obligatory ground deprives the judge of the discretionary power that he/she otherwise had to declare such submissions abusive and allow execution. The Greek legislator has thus distorted the EAWFD in a 'nationalist' manner.²⁹

2.3.2 Nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege

2.3.2.1 The principle of nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege is recognised in Greece as a cornerstone of criminal law and, as discussed in Sect. 2.1.3 above, as part of the rule of law (Arts. 2(1), 6(1) and especially Art. 7(1) of the Constitution

²⁶ Council Framework Decision of 13 June 2002 on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between Member States (2002/584/JHA), [2002] OJ L 190/1.

²⁷ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 129–134. As to commentary, see also Anagnostopoulos 2005, pp. 855–856; Fytrakis 2006, pp. 219; Kalafelis 2006, pp. 203; Mouzakis 2012, pp. 59–60. Cf. the opposite stance of the judiciary in AP 591/2005, Poinika Chronika 2005, pp. 840 et seq.; AP 2149/2005, Poiniki Dikaiosini 2006, pp. 169 et seq.; AP 1773/2007, Poinika Chronika 2008, pp. 556 et seq., as well as of Karaflos 2013, p. 98.

²⁸ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 136–137. Cf. AP 678/2012, Poinika Chronika 2013, pp. 440–441; AP 558/2007, Poinika Chronika 2007, pp. 597 et seq.; AP 2135/2005, Poinika Chronika 2006, pp. 597 et seq.

²⁹ Togias 2013, pp. 1156–1157.

and Arts. 1 and 2 of the Criminal Code (CC)). Article 2(1) of the Constitution provides that ‘[t]he primary obligation of the State is to respect and protect human dignity’. Art. 6(1) provides that ‘[w]ith the exemption of in flagranti crimes, nobody shall be arrested or imprisoned without a reasoned warrant, which must be presented at the time of arrest or detention’. Article 7(1) provides:

No crime is constituted and no criminal sanction shall be imposed without a law valid before the commission of the deed and defining its component elements. A criminal sanction that is harsher than the one provided for at the time of commission of the deed, shall never be imposed.

Therefore, the legal commentary has strongly contested the EAW from the point of view of respect of the principle of nulla poena sine lege, especially as regards the erosion of the dual criminality principle. The points stressed in the theory are the following: it is absurd for the executing state to extradite a person for an act which the state itself does not consider as punishable; the very fundamentals of extradition are thus dismantled; the guarantees of the person sought and laid down in the above-mentioned constitutional provisions are undermined; sovereignty is negated; without dual criminality, criminalisation overwhelms the EU legal space.³⁰ It seems clear that despite the symbolic maintenance of the principle of dual criminality, it has in fact been totally eroded, especially if the 32 ‘crime types’ in Art. 2(2) of the EAWFD (Art. 10(2) of Law No. 3251/2004) are taken into consideration, whereby dual criminality is already ex lege excluded. The principle functions only marginally, e.g. when an execution is refused due to defects in the legality principle traced in concreto when, for instance, the crime for which a person is sought is not provided for as such in Greece and simultaneously is not included in the 32 ‘crime types’.³¹ The removal of double criminality has been considered problematic in Greece in particular with regard to the following crimes and offences in the list, which are not considered as crimes or offences in Greece. First, Greece may face problems as to the forms of certain crimes: e.g. in Greece, ‘homicide’ does not include participation in suicide or acts of euthanasia, both specifically provided for ³⁰ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 56–57, 68; Kaifa-Gbandi 2004, pp. 1297–1301, noting ‘... for the person sought the offering of procedural guarantees for the materialization of extradition cannot counter the eventual dismantlement of basic obstacles blocking it, since, as it is obvious, there is no comparison between the possibility of non-extradition and the extradition under procedural safeguards’ (at p. 1297); Fytrakis 2006, pp. 214–215, noting: ‘... narrowing the requirement of dual criminality constitutes a dangerous diversion from the fundamental principles of criminal law, as they are laid down in our Constitution’ (at 215’); Kalfelis 2006, p. 201; Vasilakakis 2006, p. 207, noting: ‘... the deletion of dual criminality produces an over-incrimination at a European level, since the probability of being confronted with a EAW grows ... under conditions of intense international mobility like nowadays the possibility grows that somebody may behave legally according to the law of his/her nationality or usual residence, in conformity with which he/she coordinates his/her behavior, but illegally according to another country’s law, which he/she may ignore’.

³¹ See in this regard Togias 2013, pp. 1154–1156, referring in this regard e.g. to AP 116/2011, as well as Decision 8/2011 of the Piraeus Appeals Judicial Council and Decisions 38/2012 and 89/2012 of the Athens Appeals Judicial Council.

in Greece separately from the former; however these may be part of ‘homicide’ in some other Member States. Problems may also arise with regard to the question whether crimes procedurally related to those in the EAW are to be considered as included in the list. Secondly, issues around dual criminality may arise with regard to crimes concerning tax evasion, customs fees or currency (Art. 10(1a’), last sentence of Law No. 3251/2004, incorporating Art. 4 of the EAWFD), whereby Greece is obliged to extradite persons even to countries that do not accept this EAWFD clause, like some Scandinavian and Baltic countries or the Netherlands. Furthermore, Greece in its domestic law has also widened the list of offences provided for in the EAWFD by providing also for ‘violations of sexual freedom’ in general, ‘corruption’ and preparatory acts of currency-related crimes.³² Finally, the case law of the Supreme Court does not consider it to be a violation of the nulla poena principle if the EAW provisions also apply to alleged deeds committed before the entry into force of Law No. 3251/2004, provided that the EAW request has been received after this temporal point; the reasoning is that in procedural law matters, unlike in substantive law, the nulla poena principle is not binding, allowing thus for retroactivity.³³

Counterarguments to the above critical points could be that the above-mentioned constitutional provisions concern only indictments made by the Greek state, whereas in the case of the EAW, Greece is only assisting another EU Member State legally and, moreover, the crimes included in the 32 ‘crime types’ will mainly be committed abroad (however, in this case the problem remains with regard to crimes that are not punishable in Greece and have been allegedly committed by nationals).³⁴ There is thus a clear setback for the constitutional guarantees for arrested persons, which has been considered as a necessary ‘sacrifice’ for the good functioning of co-operation inside the EU legal space.

2.3.3 Fair Trial and In Absentia Judgments

2.3.3.1 According to Greek law (Art. 13(1) of Law No. 3251/2004, incorporating Art. 5 EAWFD), the execution of an EAW for the execution of a penal sanction based on a court judgment issued in absentia is not automatic; it may be made dependent on a declaration from the part of the issuing state, satisfying the executing state, that procedural possibilities exist for a new trial in the issuing state in the presence of the person sought. This declaration should originate only from a court, not from any other, administrative authority. A practical difficulty as to the handling of such cases is the multiplicity of the Member States’ legislation on ³² Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 59–67, and pp. 72–75.

³³ See Art. 39 of Law No 3251/2004 and Mouzakis 2012, p. 65, respectively. In favour of the judiciary’s stance also Karaflos 2013, p. 99. For a comprehensive critique of the viewpoint that favours retroactivity in criminal procedure, see passim Fytrakis 1998.

³⁴ Kedikoglou 2014, p. 69.

summonses and subpoenas, which makes the respective control of whether the foreign law has been respected rather complicated for the executing state.³⁵ When the person sought for extradition is a national, Art. 11(f') of Law No. 3251/2004 also applies: the Greek state may insist on execution in Greece as a condition for execution of the EAW. It may then also refuse execution due to the fact that the in absentia judgment, if issued without compliance with the proper procedure on summonses and subpoenas, violates the principle of fair trial (scil. Art. 6(1) ECHR) and therefore execution of the sanction cannot be allowed by the Greek state (this rule applies both to nationals as well as non-nationals).³⁶ The ‘collateral damage’ of such potential refusals is of course the loss of a new trial of the person sought, i.e. the loss of the chance of an acquittal or a diminution of the sanction, and the risk of the judgment becoming final, if Greece, instead of taking refuge in Art. 6(1) ECHR, chooses to execute the sanction.³⁷ A solution in such cases could be that the Greek courts would adjudicate in conformity with the I.B. judgment of the CJEU. In that case, the CJEU would approach EAW requests for extradition for the execution of sanctions as requests for initiating criminal proceedings, provided that there exists in the issuing state an exceptional appeal for a new trial (in the form of a ‘revisio propter nova’ or something analogous to it); meanwhile the execution of the existing judgment would be left pending.³⁸

2.3.4 The Right to a Fair Trial – Practical Challenges Regarding a Trial Abroad

2.3.4.1 The absence of the protection guaranteed by domestic legislation is a real challenge for the person sought, as well as for the family. In Greek legislation there are no special measures provided for assisting these persons in such cases. The Ombudsman cannot be involved, since this institution mediates between public administration services and citizens; cases having to do with the judiciary, like EAW cases, are excluded. As to legal aid, Law No. 3226/2004 provides that every EU resident of low income may become a beneficiary. Low income means an income less than two-thirds of the annual family income as stipulated by the conditions of the General National Collective Labour Agreement. Such aid must be applied for. The aid also covers appeals, provided that they are not blatantly unfounded (Arts. 1, 2 and 7(4) of Law No. 3226/2004).

One can consider perhaps the provisions of the Law incorporating the EAWFD in Greece concerning residents and inhabitants (Arts. 12(1e'), 13(3) of Law No. 3251/2004) as a kind of pre-emption and thus ‘circumvention’ of the challenges mentioned above. According to these provisions, Greece may refuse to execute an ³⁵ Kedikoglou 2014, p. 162.

³⁶ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 162–163.

³⁷ Mouzakis 2012, p. 60.

³⁸ See Case C-306/09 I.B. [2010] I-10341, paras. 56–57; cf. on this also Mouzakis 2012, pp. 60–61.

EAW if execution of the sanction in Greece (provided that such execution is possible according to domestic law) is guaranteed, if the person sought is resident in Greece, which is judged depending on the ad hoc personal, economic and social relations the person has to the country, indicating a link or connection of a more or less stable character. A certain period of stay is not a prerequisite, nor is it required that the person originate from an EU country, nor that he/she have no criminal record. Provided that the same conditions are fulfilled, custody of the arrested person may be replaced by non-custodial restrictive terms (Arts. 16(1)–(3) of Law No. 3251/2004). Exceptionally, when the person sought is a citizen of the issuing state, the link to the latter will probably prevail as to the execution of the EAW, but there is still a margin of appreciation for the Greek courts when the rights and freedoms of the person sought might be put at risk.³⁹

The aim of the provisions is the successful rehabilitation of the person sought into the social circumstances with which he/she is familiar. This aim is also in harmony with Art. 8 ECHR, a provision the EAWFD also aims at enhancing.⁴⁰ Despite the conformity of the statute and the case law with the ruling in the Szymon Kozłowski case,⁴¹ the differentiation of the treatment of nationals where refusal is obligatory (cf. Art. 11(f') of Law No. 3251/200⁴²), is not in full compliance with the EU scope of protection for aliens, in so far as e.g. the court judgment may depend on administrative prerequisites like the possession of a valid residence permit. The CJEU preliminary ruling which was expected after the French request submitted in Joao Pedro Lopes Da Silva Jorge concluded that a Member State's legislation restricting the power not to execute an EAW to cases where the requested persons are its nationals runs contrary to the principle of non-discrimination.⁴³ A final complication that negatively impacts the situation of the sought person is the incorrect stance of the prevailing opinion in the Supreme Court's jurisprudence concerning the costs of the proceedings. Such costs, according to the Supreme Court's opinion, shall be borne by the person sought according to the respective domestic legislation, when he/she is extradited after his/her appeal has been rejected; however, Art. 37 of Law No. 3251/2004 provides otherwise, putting such charges at the expense of the executing state. This provision, especially as regards dealing with the costs of EAW proceedings on the basis of the territory on which they have arisen, has to apply in lieu of the general

³⁹ Kedikoglou 2014, pp. 91–94. See from the respective case law AP 854/2012, Poinika Chronika 2013, p. 116; AP 437/2012, Poinika Chronika 2013, pp. 113–115.

⁴⁰ See e.g. AP 1676/2010, Poinika Chronika 2011: 670–672.

⁴¹ Case C-66/08 Kozłowski [2008] ECR I-06041.

⁴² Whereby it remains contentious whether the court judgment of the issuing state should be 'irrevocable' (and not merely 'final' without suspension of the sanction's execution); fair trial considerations promote the affirmative answer, whereas the letter of the law allows for a negative one: cf. Karaflos 2013, p. 95.

⁴³ See Case C-66/08 Kozłowski [2008] ECR I-06041 and Case C-42/11 Joao Pedro Lopes Da Silva Jorge [2012] ECLI:EU:C:2012:517. See also: Mouzakis 2012, pp. 57–59.

